[5] Lib. II. Tit. I. § 1, 2. Mr. NOODT, in his Probabilia Juris, Lib. I. Cap. VII. VIII. has proved at large, that, according to the Language of the Antients on this Subject, the Terms publick and common meant the same thing. Whence he concludes, that either TRIBONIUS forged a new Division, for want of understanding MARCIAN, whose Words he copies; or that here is an Error in the Text; so that, according to the Conjecture of some learned Men, instead of Quaedam naturali jure communia sunt omnium; quaedam publica, we ought to read, Quaedam naturali jure communia sunt omnium, quae eadem publica. That is, Some Things are common to all Men, which are also called publick. What that excellent Lawyer says on this Head, seems to me very plausible. As to the Merits of the Question itself, the Antients were agreed that, tho' all Mankind are to be allowed an innocent Use of Shores, Rivers, &c. yet such Things still depended on the Jurisdiction of the People, so that if a Man had a Mind to build; for Example, on the Sea-Coast, a Permission from the Magistrate was necessary. See the Law cited hereafter, in Note 10. and Mr. NOODT, Probab. Juris, Lib. IV. Cap. I. This being granted, I do not see how we can avoid conceiving an Idea of Property, if we would think and reason justly. I easily conceive that the Jurisdiction of the Sovereign is reconcilable with the Property of particular Persons, in the Lands lying in his Territories; because that Jurisdiction, and that Property, tho' separate, have an equal Tendency toward hindering any but the Proprietor and the Sovereign from having a Right to demand in Rigour a free Use of a Land. But I do not comprehend how Jurisdiction can be compatible with a Community, properly so called, of the Place over which this Jurisdiction is exercised; the Establishment of one, in my Opinion, is the Destruction of the other. Besides all that is said of this Community, implies no more at the Bottom than the Liberty of making an innocent Use of the Sea, Banks, Rivers, &c. which depend on another Man's Jurisdiction. Now, on this Foot it no more excludes the Right of Property, than that Jurisdiction, which will plainly appear by the following Example. A Spring which rises in my Grounds, certainly belongs to me, but I am obliged by the Law of Nature, to allow such as want it to drink of it, or draw Water out of it, when that can be done without incommoding my self. Mr. NOODT allows this, after the Antients, Lib. IV. Cap. VII. § 2. And, even according to the Roman Law, the Banks of a River are of publick Use, tho' they belong to the Proprietors of the adjacent Lands. See Chap. VIII. of this Book, § 8. Note. 1.

[6] Thus MICHAEL ATTALIATES expresses himself, Some Things belong to all Men, as the Air, running Water, the Sea, and the Sea-Shore. (Pragmatic. Tit. II) GROTIUS.

[7] Lib. II. Tit. I. § 2.

[8] In the Body of the Greek Law we have this Expression, The Coasts, or Shores, are in every Man's Power. BASILIC. Eclog. Lib. I. Tit. I. Cap. XIII. See also Lib. LIII. Tit. VI. GROTIUS.

[9] DIGEST. Lib. XLI. Tit. I. De adquir. rerum Dominio. Leg. XIV.

[10] DIGEST. Lib. XLIII. Tit. VIII. Ne quid in loco publico, &c. Leg. III.

[11] Quatenus ad utilitatem assumitur. Mr. BARBEYRAC, in his Latin Edition, adds perpetuam, which he translates  durable; being persuaded that his Author designed to write so, as the Context manifestly requires; the Opposition being imperfect without that Word.

[12] DIGEST. Lib. XLI. Tit. I. De adquir. rerum Dominio, Leg I. The Term here used by GROTIUS, is Praetor, and the common Reading in the Place quoted is decretum Praetoris. Some, as the learned GRONOVIVS observes, read decretum Principis; which Correction is followed by Mr. NOODT, in his Commentary on the DIGEST. Lib. I. Tit. VIII. p. 53. But Mr. DE BYNKERSHOEK, in his Dissertation De Dominio Maris, Cap. IX. p. 81. expresses his Surprise, that any one could think of such an Alteration in the Text. The Thing is of little Importance, in Regard to the Substance of the Question. Mr. SCHULTING is likewise of Opinion that the Correction is unnecessary. See his Enarratio primae partis Pandect. Tit. De divisione rerum. §5.

[1] The English alledge such an Establishment against the Danes. See CAMDEN's Reign of Queen Elizabeth, Anno 1600. GROTIUS.

[2] DIGEST. Lib. XLIV. Tit. III. De diversis tempor. praescript. &c. Leg. VII.

[3] DIGEST. Lib. XLVII. Tit. X. De injuriis & famosis libell. Leg. XIV.

[4] SALLUST, speaking of the Luxury of his Times, says, Several private Persons beat down Mountains, and built in the Sea. (Bell. Catal. Cap. XIII. Edit. Wech.) HORACE reproaches the Romans with straightening the Sea, and contracting the Habitation of the Fishes, by the Moles they built. Lib. II. Od. XVIII. v. 20, 21. and Lib. III. Od. I. 33, 34. The same Observation is made by SENECA, in Excerpt. Controv. Lib. V. Controv. V. PLINY tells us, that The Earth was suffered to be washed away by the Waters, to make Way for the Sea. Hist. Nat. Lib. II. Cap. LXIII. The Emperor Alexander Severus raised several magnificent Works at Baiae, in Honour of his Relations, and Ponds of a stupendous Bigness, by letting in the Sea. LAMPRIIDIUS, in his Life. (Cap. XXVI.) CASSIODORE in his Time admired those Ponds, as appears from Variar. Lib. IX. Cap. VI. TIBULLUS represents the Fishes thus secured and screened in the enclosed Spaces of the Sea, as laughing at Storms:

*Claudit & indomitum moles mare, lentus ut intra
Negligat bibernas piscis adesse minas.*

Lib. II. Eleg. VI. 27, 28.

PLINY mentions this Sort of Fish-Ponds, made out of the Sea, Hist. Nat. Lib. XXXI. Cap. VI. See COLUMELLA, De Re Rusticâ, Lib. VIII. Cap. XVI. XVII. where he observes, among other Things, that The Luxury of the Wealthy had inclosed the very Seas and Neptune. (p. 377. Edit. Commelin. 1595.) We find something to the same Purpose in St. AMBROSE, Hexaem. Lib. V. Cap. X. and in his Treatise of Naboth, Cap. III. as also in several Places of MARTIAL, (viz. Lib. X. Epigr. XXX. ver. 19, &c.) GROTIUS.

[5] VARRO tells us, that Lucullus having hollowed a Mountain near Naples, and let the Waters of the Sea into Reservoirs for Fish, which had a Sort of Flux and Reflux, boasted he would not yield to Neptune in the Point of Fishing. (De Re Rusticâ, Lib. III. Cap. XVII. p. 129. Edit. 3. H. Steph.) PLUTARCH speaks of that celebrated Roman's Country-Seats, round which he made the Sea pass, and had large Fish Ponds; and adds, that He built Apartments in the Sea. (Whereupon Tubero, the Stoick, called him the Roman Xerxes.) Vit. Lucull. (p. 518. Tom. II. Edit. Wech.) PLINY ascribes that Expression to Pompey the Great. Hist. Nat. Lib. IX. Cap. LIV. VELLEIUS PATERCULUS relates it in the same Manner. (Lib. II. Cap. XXXIII.) GROTIUS.

[6] DIGEST. Lib. XLVII. Tit. X. De Injuriis, &c. Leg. XIII. § 7.

[7] ΠΡΟΘΥΡΑ. See LEONIS, Novell. LVII. CII. CIII. CIV. MICHAEL ATTALIATES, Pragmat. Tit. XCV. HARMENOPULUS, Prochir. Jur. Lib. II. Tit. I. § περὶ προθύρων. See also CUJAS, Observ. Lib. XIV. Cap. I. GROTIUS.

[8] But this common Consent of Nations, supposed to have the Force of a Law, is a Thing that will never be proved.

[1] There is a certain Space which is supposed to belong to every People who has Lands on the Sea-Shore, without any corporal Act of taking Possession. See PUFENDORF, B. IV. Chap. V. § 7, 8. with the Notes.

[2] It is not usual to allow the Prescription of long Possession, in Order to obtain Places publick by the Law of Nations. Which proceeds thus, if any one having entirely demolished a Building, which he had raised on the Shore, or abandoned the Building, another Man afterwards building on the same Ground, opposes the Occupier with the said Exception; or if any one, because he hath fished several Years in a Winding of a publick River, hinders another Man of the same Privilege. DIGEST. Lib. XLI. Tit. III. De usurp. & usucaption. Leg. XLV. In producing this Law, where the most able Lawyers agree there is some Mistake, I have followed the Florentine Edition; only I have used the Word occupanti which appears in other old Editions, instead of occupantis, which can have no Place here. Mr. NOODT, in his Commentary on the first Part of the DIGEST. p. 54, &c. conjectures that the Words or abandoned the Building, are a Gloss which was afterwards foisted into the Text; and his Explication of this Law appears very ingenious. Others give it a different Sense. The Reader may see CUJAS on the Law under Consideration, p. 1165, 1166. Tom. I. Opp. Edit. Fabrott. and Mr. DE BYNCKERSHOEK'S Dissertation, De Dominio Maris, Cap. IX. p. 85. We have something on the same Subject, in a Dissertation written by Mr. DE TOULLIEU, De Luitione Pignoris, & Rebus morae Facultatis, § 45. to which I refer the Reader with Pleasure.

[1] But we have no Right, in Rigour, to pretend that any one should let us pass over his Lands, as I have shewed on the foregoing Chapter.

[1] PHILO, the Jew, speaking of Kings, says they have no Reason to boast of having made themselves Masters of all the Rivers, and even of Seas infinite in Number, and immense in Extent. (De Plant. Noe, p. 223. Edit. Paris.) LYCOPHRON introduces Cassandra foretelling the Romans should enjoy the Empire of both Sea and Land. (In Allusion to which, VIRGIL, to flatter Augustus, tells him) Tethys should give all her Waters to purchase him for her Son-in-Law. (Georg. Lib. I. v. 31.) And JULIUS FIRMICUS says, that such as are born under a certain Situation of the Stars, shall be Masters of Land and Sea, wherever they lead their Armies. (Mathes. Lib. VI. Cap. I.) NONNUS speaks of Beroe, (or Berythus, a City of Phenicia) as being possessed of the Empire of the Sea. (Dionysiac. Lib. XLIII. p. 1106. Edit. Wech.) QUINTUS CURTIUS says, that Tyre was a long Time Mistress, not only of the neighbouring Sea, but of all the Seas where her Ships had sailed. (Lib. IV. Cap. IV. Num. 19.) Hence arose the proverbial Expression Maria Tyria; the Tyrian Seas. FESTUS under the Word Tyria. The Athenians and Lacedemonians, as ISOCRATES observes, had in their Turns the Empire of the Sea, so that as each of them prevailed, they held most of the Cities (of Greece) in Subjection. (Panathen. p. 243. Edit. H. Steph.) DEMOSTHENES says, The Lacedemonians formerly commanded all the Sea, and all the Land (of Greece). Philip. III. (p. 49. Edit. Basil. 1572. See also his Oration on the Crown, p. 326.) The Author of the Life of Timotheus, (CORNELIUS NEPOS) says, that after the Exploits of that General, the Lacedemonians willingly yielded the Athenians the Empire of the Sea, which they had long disputed with that People. (Cap. II. Num. 2. Edit. Cellar.) The Author of the Oration concerning the Island of Halonesos, which appears among the Works of DEMOSTHENES, says, that Philip had no other View than that the Athenians should put him in Possession of the Sea, and acknowledge they could not keep the Dominion of the Sea without him. (p. 31.) According to the Emperor JULIAN, Alexander the Great, in his military Expeditions, proposed to make himself Master of the whole Earth and Sea. (Orat. III. p. 107. Edit. Spanhem.) JOSEPHUS, the Son of Gerion, makes Antiochus Epiphanes, one of Alexander's Successors, ask, Are not the Earth and the Sea mine? (Lib. III. Cap. XII. Edit. Munster.) Ptolomy Philadelphus, another of his Successors, is commended by THEOCRITUS for extending his Dominions over much Sea and Land. Idyll. XVII. ver. 76, 91, 92. So much for the Grecians, it is now Time to speak of the Romans. Hannibal, speaking to Scipio Africanus, the first of that Name, tells him that The Carthaginians, enclosed by the Shores of Africa, consented that the Romans, since such was the Pleasure of the Gods, should command elsewhere, both by Sea and Land. LIVY, (Lib. XXX. Cap. XXX. Num. 26) CLAUDIAN represents the other Scipio, as subjecting the Spanish Ocean to the Laws of Rome, (De secundo Consul. Stilicon. Praef. ver. 7, 8.) Hence it is that the Roman Authors, as SALLUST, FLORUS, POMPONIUS MELA, &c. frequently call the inward Sea our Sea. (See Bell. Jugurth. Cap. XX. with Wasse's Notes. FLORUS, Lib. III. Cap. VI. Numb. 9. POMPONIUS MELA, Lib. I. Cap. I. Numb. 34. Edit. Wass. 1700.) But DIONYSIUS HALICARNASSENSIS goes still further, and pretends that the Romans were Masters not only of all the Sea on this Side of Hercules' s Pillars, but also of the Ocean, where it is navigable. (Antiq. Rom. Lib. I. Cap. III. p. 3. Edit. Oxon.) DION CASSIUS says, They reigned over almost the whole Earth and Sea. [GROTIUS perhaps quotes this Historian by Heart, instead of the Orator THEMISTIUS, who, speaking of Theodosius the Emperor, says, What would you say of one who commands almost the whole Earth and Sea? Orat. V.] APPIAN, in his Preface, describing the Grandeur of the Roman Empire, comprehends in it the Euxin Sea, the Propontis, the Hellespont, the Egean, Pamphylian, and Aegyptian Seas. A Decree of the Senate gave Pompey a Power of commanding all the Sea on this Side of Hercules' s Pillars. APPIAN. Alexandr. (Bell. Mithridat. p. 391. Edit. Amstel. 235. H. Steph.) PLUTARCH, (in his Life of Pompey, p.631. Tom I. Edit. Wech.) OVID introduces Jupiter foretelling, that even the Sea should obey Augustus. Metam. Lib. XV. ver. 831. An antient Inscription in Honour of that Emperor, tells us, He shut the Temple of Janus, after he had established Peace both by Sea and Land. (In GRUTER 1 Edit. p. 194. Numb. 4.) See also SÜETONIUS, in his Life, (Cap. XXII.) That Historian elsewhere speaks of two Fleets which Augustus had, one at Misenus, the other at Ravenna, for guarding the upper and the lower Sea. (Cap. XLIX.) VALERIUS MAXIMUS tells Tiberius, that he had been made Master of the Earth and Sea, by the joint Consent of Gods and Men. (Prefat. p. 2.) PHILO the Jew observes, that the same Emperor held the Empire of the Earth and Sea twenty-three Years. (De Legat. ad Caium. p. 1012. Edit. Paris.) He attributes the like Extent of Dominions to Caligula, Successor to Tiberius. (Ibid. p. 993.) JOSEPHUS, the Jewish Historian, calls Vespasian Lord of the Earth and Sea. (De Bell. Jud. Lib. III. Cap. XXVII.) ARISTIDES says the same of Marcus Antoninus in several Places. (See, for Example, Orat. IX. p. 119. Tom. 1.) PROCOPIUS relates, that there were some Statues of the Emperor, representing him holding the World in one Hand, in Order to signify that the whole Earth and Sea were subject to him. (De Aedific. Justinian. Cap. II. de Augustaeo). Constantine Monomachus, Emperor of the East, is stiled Lord and Master of the Earth and Sea. (JOANNES, Episcop. in Euchait. p. 51.) The Egean Sea is reckoned among the Provinces of the Roman Empire. (CONSTANTINE Porphyrogon. Lib. I. Them. XVII.) The antient Franks commanded the Sea of Marseille, and the adjacent Places; as we learn from PROCOPIUS, Hist. Gothic. Lib. III. (Cap. XXXIII.) In the Letter of LEWIS II. to Basil. Emperor of the East, we read of Nicetas, a noble Venetian, who was Master of the Adriatick Sea. (GOLDAST. Constit. Imperial. Tom. I. p. 118.) Concerning the Jurisdiction of the Republick of Venice, see PARUTA, Lib. VII. and the particular History of the Uscochi. The Bounds of the Kingdom of Sweden are in the Middle of the Streights of Oresand. JOANNES MAGNUS, Hist. Metropolit. seu Episcop. & Archiepiscop. Upsal. Cap. XV. Add to all this the modern Lawyers on the Decretals, in VI. Lib. I. Tit. VI. De Electione, &c. Cap. III. BARTOLUS, ANGELUS, FELINUS on Lib. V. Tit. VI. De Judaeis. Cap. XVII. BALDUS, on the Title of the Digest. de rerum divisione, Col. II. AFFLICTUS, on the Title Quae sunt Regalia. FEUD. Lib. II. Tit. LVI. CACHERANUS, Decis. Pedemont. CLV. Numb. 4. where it is said, after BALDUS, that this Right is established through the whole World. And lastly, ALBERIC GENTILIS, Advocat. Hispan. Lib. 1. Cap. VIII. GROTIUS.

Almost all these Authorities are produced by SELDEN, in his Mare clausum, who sets down a great many more; to which several others might still be added, as appears by the Sample given in Mr. DE BYNCKERSHOEK's Dissertation De Dominio Maris, Cap. VIII. But the Lawyer last mentioned with Reason rejects our Author's Distinction between the Jurisdiction and the Property of the Sea. He observes (Cap. IV. p. 26, &c.) that till it is proved by good Reasons, (those alledged by our Author are far from being such) that the Sea of its own Nature is not susceptible of Property, we may be allowed to say, that by taking Possession of the Sea, the same Right is acquired as by taking Possession of other Things. Jurisdiction and Property, he adds, are really distinct in Regard to Goods contained in the Lands of a State, as SENECA explains the Matter, De Benef. Lib. VII. Cap. IV. V. (See above, § 4. Note 3.) but in Regard to the Sea, they are only two Names for one and the same Thing; unless a Man would say, that all who sail on a Sea of which any one is in Possession, are subject to him. And even in that Case, it would not be on Account of the Sea, the Dependence ought to be derived from some other Cause, because it is supposed that the Master of the Sea has no Right of Property in it. If several Persons, having at the same Time taken Possession of a Sea, had appointed one of their Number to command the Rest, the Property would then be distinct from the Jurisdiction. But as there neither is, nor ever was, such a Regulation, he who commands a Sea, and the real Proprietor of it, is the same Person. So that, whoever is Master of a Sea, may, like the Proprietor of all other Things, sell that Sea, exchange it, give it away; in short, dispose of it in any other Manner as he pleases; provided he transfers no more Right than he himself hath; that is, that those who shall purchase such a Sea of him, shall keep their Property no longer than they keep Possession. See Note 6. on PUFENDORF, B. IV. Chap. V. §8.

[2] THUCYDIDES, Lib. V. Cap. LVI. Edit. Oxon.

[3] Idem. Lib. IV. Cap. CXVIII.

[4] Lib. XLVI. p. 211. Edit. H. Steph.

[5] Halieutic. Lib. III. ver. 4, 5.

[6] Orat. II. ad Tarsenses, § 34.

[7] Aeneid. I. ver. 235, 236.

[8] It is agreed, that the Nile is the largest of all those Rivers which flow into the Sea, subject to the Romans, called by the Grecians ἡ εἰς τὸ θάλασσαν. SALLUST writes that The Ister is the next to it in Greatness. Noct. Attic. Lib. X. Cap. VII.

[9] Georg. Lib. IV. p. 272. Edit. Amst. (180, Paris.)

[10] Lib. XII. p. 821. Edit. Amst. 545, Paris.

[11] That is, when a Prince, or a People, keeps a Fleet constantly on Foot, in a certain Place of the Sea, with a Design to make themselves Masters of it. Mr. DE BYNCKERSHOEK, (De Dom. Mari, Cap. IX.) draws his Advantage from this Confession against our Author. If, says he, a Prince or a People may, with a small Fleet, make themselves Masters of a small Part of the Sea, why may they not, with a larger Fleet, make themselves Masters of a larger Part of the Seas, and with several Fleets, of the whole Mediterranean, as the Romans formerly did?

- [1] The Romans formerly exacted an Impost of the Islands as far as Pharos of Alexandria; as appears from AMMIANUS MARCELLINUS, Lib. XXII. (Cap. XVI. p. 373. Edit. Vales. Gron.) CAESAR, speaking of the Veneti, the antient People of Vennes, observes, that Tho' their Sea was very impetuous, entirely open, and furnished with but few Ports, they received a Tribute from almost all who sailed in that Sea. (De Bell. Gall. Lib. III. Cap. VIII.) FLORUS tells us, that after the first Punic War, the Romans (the Carthaginians) were ashamed of the Loss of the Sea and Islands, and being obliged to pay Tribute, which they had been used to command from others. (Lib. II. Cap. VI. Num. 2.) PLINY, in his Nat. Hist. Lib. VI. Cap. XXII. speaks of one Annius Plocamus, who had farmed the Customs of the Red Sea. And in the following Chapter, where he treats of the Navigation to the Indies, he says, The Ships that sailed thither every Year, carried Companies of Bow-Men on board, as a Defence against Pirates. (p. 350. Edit. Elziv.) As to the Quantity of Customs, see CAMBDEN's excellent Discourse, in his Life of Queen Elizabeth, Anno 1582, and 1602. GROTIUS.
- [2] In all Editions of this Work, we have STRABO, Lib. XVII. and PLINY, Hist. Nat. Lib. XIX. Cap. IV. in the Margin. The first Passage is p. 1149. Edit. Amst. (798, Paris.) but I can find nothing like the second. Our Author certainly had his Eye on those Passages of PLINY which he had quoted in the preceding Note.
- [3] HERODIAN speaks of this Impost which the Byzantins demanded, in his History of the Emperor Severus. (Lib. III. Cap. I. Num. II. Edit. Boecler.) PROCOPIUS, both in his Publick and Secret History, (Cap. XXV.) mentions the antient Impost laid on the Hellespont; as also, the new one established at the Entrance of the Euxin Sea, and in the Streights of Byzantium. THEOPHANES tells us, that the Byzantin Impost was paid in the Place where the Church of Blacherns now stands; and that of the Hellespont at Abydos. AGATHIAS, Lib. V. calls the latter an Impost of a Tenth, Δεκατευτήριου. But it was afterwards reduced by the Empress Irene. Immanuel Commenus gave some Monasteries maritime Revenues, θαλάσσια δίκαια, as we are assured by THEODORUS BALSAMON, in Concil. Chalced. Can. IV. and Can. XII. Synod. VII. GROTIUS.
- [4] In B. V. of his History, Chap. XLIV.
- [5] He says in the same Place, that when Thrasibulus took Possession of Byzantium, the Athenians became Masters of the Hellespont. Orat. ad Leptinem. (p. 369). On which the Scholiast ULPIAN observes, that The Athenians received the Tenth of the Value of all the Goods and Merchandize that sailed through that Sea: That the Athenians sold those Customs, and thus enriched their Country. p. 134. Tom. II. Opp. Demosthen. and Aeschin. Ed. Basil. GROTIUS.
See also XENOPHON, Hist. Graec. Lib. IV. Cap. VIII. § 27, 31. Edit. Oxon.
- [1] PHILOSTRATUS, whom our Author here quotes in the Margin, speaks only of King Erythras, who, he says, was Master of the Red Sea. Vit. Apollon. Tyan. Lib. III. Cap. XXXV. Edit. Lips. Olear.
- [2] This is that famous Treaty of Peace, εἰρήνη περιβόητος, as PLUTARCH terms it, in which it was also stipulated, That the Persians should not come nearer to the Grecian Sea than the Distance of a Horse-Race; that is, XL. Stadia. p. 486, 487. Edit. Wech. in Vit. Cimon. See likewise DIODORUS SICULUS, Lib. XI. (Cap. XLI.) ISOCRATES takes Notice of this Treaty in his Penathenaic. (p. 244. Edit. H. Steph.) GROTIUS.
This Equi cursus, ἵππου δρόμος, is a Day's Journey of a Horse; as appears from a Passage of ARISTIDES, quoted by our Author in the Margin. The Words are τῆς ἵππου δρόμον ἡμέρας. Orat. Panath. p. 294. Tom. I. Edit. Paul. Steph. See also his Oration in praise of Rome, p. 349. where we read ἵππου δρόμος ἡμερήσιος ἐπι θάλατταν. I may add the Authority of a much more antient Greek Orator, viz. DEMOSTHENES, who, speaking of Callias, deputed by the Athenians for concluding that famous Treaty, uses the Terms ἵππου δρόμον ἡμέρας. Orat. de falsâ legat. p. 287. Edit. Basil. 1572. I am much mistaken if PLUTARCH had not this very Passage in View. Our Author is mistaken in fixing the Distance to forty Stadia, which make only one League and two Thirds, reckoning three thousand Paces to a League; for it is well known, the Stadium was a hundred and twenty-five Paces. PLUTARCH himself, as JAMES PAUMIER, de Grentesmenil, observes, explains what was then understood by a Day's Journey of a Horse, when, towards the Close of Cimon's Life, he says, that while that General had the Command, no Persian Courier, or Horse dared come within four hundred Stadia, (or sixteen Leagues and two Thirds) of the Sea, p. 491. I take the Liberty on this Occasion of observing a Mistake in a very useful Treatise of Mr. EISENSCHMID, De Ponderib. & Mens. Veterum, &c. printed at Strasbourg, in 1708. where he (Sect. III. Cap. III. p. 113.) confounds ἵππικὸς δρόμος with what PLUTARCH elsewhere calls ἵππικόν, Vit. Solon. p. 91. and says, contained four Stadia, or five hundred Paces. But the latter Word signifies the Space of Ground that a Horse runs when he goes full Speed in a Race, which it is evident cannot be a Day's Journey.

[3] This new Treaty is a chimerical Treaty, as the learned GRONOVIVS remarks. There was none made after the Battle of Salamis, which was soon followed by those of Platea and Mycale. Besides, it appears from the Thing itself, that there is no Difference between those two pretended Articles of Peace; for the Chelidonian Islands are three Islands situated in the Pamphylian Sea, over-against the City of Phaselis; so that it is exactly the same Space of Sea. I do not understand what induced our Author thus to multiply Beings without Necessity, for in the first Edition we read only, Ne qua navis Medica Cyaneas navigaret.

[4] THUCYDIDES, Lib. IV. Cap. CXVIII.

[5] POLYBIUS, Lib. III. Cap. XXII.

[6] SERVIUS, on Aeneid. IV. (628.) observes, that By this Treaty, neither the Romans were allowed to land on the Carthaginian Coasts, nor the Carthaginians on those of the Romans. The People last mentioned, made a like Treaty with the Tarentins, by which they engaged themselves, not to send any of their Ships beyond the Cape of Lacinium. Excerpt. Legat. ex APPIANO. We learn from STRABO, that The Carthaginians made a Practice of sinking all foreign Ships which they found sailing toward Sardinia, or Hercules's Pillars. Geogr. Lib. XVII. p. 1154. Edit. Amst. (802, Paris.) GROTIUS.

[7] POLYBIUS, Hist. Lib. III. Cap. XXII. In the same Treaty it was stipulated, That no Roman should land in Sardinia, or Libya, unless it was to take in Provisions, or refit their Vessels. Ibid. Cap. XXIV. After the third Punic War, a Complaint was made of the Senate of Carthage for fitting out a Fleet, and raising a naval Army. Epitome LIVII, Lib. XLVIII, XLIX. An Article of the Treaty of Peace with Antiochus obliged that Prince to Have only twelve Ships of War, for keeping his Subjects in Order. APPIAN, De Bello Syriac. (p. 181. Edit. Amst. 112. H. Steph.) By an Agreement between the Sultan of Egypt and the Grecians, the former was allowed to send two Ships beyond the Bosphorus every Year. NICEPH. GREGORIUS, Lib. IV. The Venetians pretend, that, by Vertue of Several Treaties, no Ship of War ought to enter their Gulf. See Mr. DE THOU. Lib. LXXX. at A. C. 1584. (p. 200. Edit. Franckfort.) GROTIUS.

Our Author, in all the Editions of this Work, has written Massia, instead of Mastiâ, (Μάστια) as also Lessum, instead of Lissum. POLYBIUS has ἕξω τοῦ Λισσοῦ, Lib. II. Cap. XII. This Article concerning the Treaty concluded with the Illyrians, is taken from thence, though our Author quotes only APPIAN of Alexandria, in his Margin, who relates the Matter somewhat differently. Besides, by the By, Massia and Tarseius are omitted in CELLARIUS's antient Geography; an Omission which may be supplied by consulting BOCHART, Phaleg. Lib. III. Cap. VII.

[8] LIVY, Lib. XXXVIII. Cap. XXXVIII. Num. 9.

[9] True: But still, when Men enter into Treaties, like those under Consideration, they may have a Design of securing to themselves, by such Negotiations, the Property of some one Sea, and obliging others to acknowledge their Right. Mr. VITRIARIUS, in his Abridgment of our Author, Lib. II. Cap. III. § 18. pretends, that if the Person engaged by such a Treaty, was before that Time Master of the Sea, which he would hinder another contracting Party from using, it would be unnecessary to insert such a Clause. But he forgets what he had himself laid down, after our Author, Lib. II. Cap. XV. viz. that some Treaties turn on Things, before due, even by the Law of Nature.

[10] Lib. VIII. Tit. IV. Communia Praediorum, &c. Leg. XIII.

[1] FRONTINUS, De Agrorum Qualitatibus. p. 38. Edit. Goës.

[2] DIGEST. XLI. Tit. I. De acquirendo rerum Dominio. Leg. XVI.

[3] GRONOVIVS, and the late Mr. GOES, Editor of the Writers, who treat on the Res Agraria, criticize our Author in this Place, as not rightly understanding the Nature of these three Sorts of Lands, and the Difference made between them by the antient Romans. They tell us, the Limited Lands were not called so, because as to their exterior Extent, they were enclosed by Limits made by the Hands of Man; but because their whole Extent, both interior and exterior, was cut and divided by Limits, which distinguished the Acres, or hundreds of Acres, to be allotted to each of those, to whom the Distribution of those Lands was to be made. Besides, these Sorts of Lands might be bounded by a River; and in that Case, the Portions assigned to such and such Persons, sometimes reached to the River, which served as a Boundary to them. See AGGENUS URBICUS, De Controversiâ Agrorum, p. 70. I observe, however, that our Author has some Kind of Authority for his Manner of explaining the Terms in Question; the same AGGENUS URBICUS understanding by Limits, whatever is made by the Hand of Man, for determining the Bounds. Comment. p. 46. Mr. GOES indeed maintains, that this Work either doth not belong to him whose Name it bears, or has been corrupted by the Interpolation of a great Number of Falsities and Absurdities. It is certain, however, that the Lands under Consideration were commonly bounded by some exterior Limits, made by the Hand of Man, which determined their just Extent, and this is sufficient for our Author's Purpose, who, in my Opinion, was not ignorant that the interior Extent was divided by Limits, as well as the exterior.

[4] These were such as were given in the Whole to any one City or People, without Division, so that they belonged to the Publick, not to any one in particular. FRONTINUS, p. 38. Thus the Imposts were paid out of Lands belonging to the Publick, not out of the Property of each private Person. See Mr. GOES's Notes, p. 153, 198.

[5] Per Centurias ac Jugera. An Acre, Jugerum, was a Measure of 120 Feet in Breadth, and 240 in Length. Centuria contained 200, or 250, such Jugera; and was called Centuria, because it was the Portion of a hundred Persons; for no one had less than two Acres or, Jugera; so that it may with good Reason be said, this Sort of Measure does not agree to the Lands in Question, which were measured only by the Extremities. Here again I find our Author has been misled by AGGENUS URBICUS's Commentary on FRONTINUS; for he says there expressly, that Some give the Name of Centuria to a Measure taken by the Extremities. p. 45. I imagine our Author conceived, that tho' the Lands under Consideration, were not divided and intersected by Boundaries, yet there was a Necessity of measuring their whole Extent in some Manner, in Order to determine the Measure of their Extremities. He may have taken up this Notion from a Passage in FRONTINUS, who says, that In many Places the Measurers, tho' they measured such Lands by their Extremities, formed the Plan of them, as if they were limited. p. 38. But whatever our Author's Mistake may be, it is sufficient for his Purpose, that the two first Sorts of Lands, which he distinguishes, are opposite to the last, in having fixt Boundaries. Mr. GOES owns that the Emperor Antoninus Pius, who by a Constitution, mentioned in the DIGEST. De acquirendo rerum Dominio. Lib. XLI. Tit. I. Leg. XVI. refused the Alluvions to the Proprietors of limited Lands, would have refused them likewise to a People, in Regard to such Lands as had been given them in the Whole; his Reason is, Because this Land (assigned in gross) has its certain and determinate Extremities.—And, says he, what is it to the Purpose, that one is divided by interior Limits and not the other, as long as there is no Difference in the Exterior? Not. p. 198. I shall however observe another Mistake of our Author, which has escaped the Censure of his Commentators. It is in a short Note on this Place, where, in Order to give his Readers an Example of Lands enclosed within a certain Measure, he refers them to SERVIUS, on the ninth Eclogue of VIRGIL. Now it is certain, the Lands there mentioned were limited, since the Poet is speaking of such as were taken from the Mantuans, to make up for the Defect of the Territories of Cremona, which Augustus divided among his Soldiers. See that antient Commentator on Verses 7, and 28.

[6] FRONTINUS, p. 38. But SICULUS FLACCUS tells us, these Lands were called Arcifinales, (or Arcifinii) because every Man appropriated to himself as much Ground as he hoped he should be able to cultivate, and thus kept off his Neighbours, (arcendovicinos) p. 3. The Etymology, given by GRONOVIVS, seems to me more natural, and comes to the same in the Main. He derives it ab arcendis finibus; because such Lands had no Boundaries fixt and determined by any Measure. This is in my Opinion, the very Idea which our Author would give us of these Agriarcifinii; and if he speaks of natural Boundaries, it is because Lands which have such Boundaries, are not usually measured. As Mr. GOES observes, after FRONTINUS, the Boundaries of the Agri arcifinii were sometimes made by the Hands of Men, and the Disputes which afterwards a rose among Neighbours, made it necessary to limit the Extent of them by some Measure. But it is sufficient, that originally such Lands were in themselves unlimited.

[7] TACITUS observes, that Germany was divided from the Sarmatae and the Dacians, either by their mutual Fear, or by Mountains. De morib. Germ. Cap. 1. Num. 1. PLINY, speaking of the Alps, says, We carry away what was designed as Boundaries between different Nations. Hist. Nat. Lib. XXXVI. (Cap. 1.) GROTIUS.

I am very much mistaken, if the first Word in the Passage of PLINY, evelimus, is not corrupted, but may be easily restored. That Historian is speaking of the Stones, and particularly the Marbles, which were cut in the Mountains, and which he represents as Boundaries, that ought to be treated with Respect. So that, I think, it should be read evellimus, &c. we tear up, &c. Every one sees how easily the Transcribers might write one of these Words instead of the other. I own the Word evelimus may form a good Sense in this Place; but the other is without Doubt more to the Purpose: And besides, it prevents a Repetition in the following Words, The Tops of the Mountains are carried (portantur) from Place to Place, &c. To which it may be added, that no Term is more proper for expressing the Removal of Boundaries than evellere, or revellere, as HORACE speaks,

- [8] Page 45; Edit Goes.
- [9] Because their Extent and Bounds are fixed and determined. See PUFENDORF, B. IV. Chap. VIII. § 11.
- [10] See an Example of this Kind in MARIANA, Hisp. Lib. XXIX. Cap. XXIII. in Regard to the River Vedusus, (now called Bidassoa). GROTIUS.
- [11] De morib. Germ. (Cap. XXXII. Num. 1.) SPARTIAN, in his Life of the Emperor Hadrian, (Cap. XII.) tells us, that Prince Planted great Posts joined together, like a Sort of Wall, in several Places, (on the Frontiers of the Roman Empire) where there were no Rivers for separating them from the Barbarians. CONSTANTINE, Porphyrogenetus, calls the River Phasis ὄνομα, as serving for a Boundary. Cap. XLV. GROTIUS.
- [12] Lib. XII. Cap. LXXXII. p. 328. Edit. H. Steph.
- [13] He there speaks of a River, without naming it, which discharged itself into another, not named. The former divided the Country of the Macronians, from that of the Scythinians. De Exped. Cyri. Lib. IV. Cap. VIII. § 1. Edit. Oxon.
N.B. The Word, by which the River is distinguished, by the Historian, is ὁ ὄριζων ; which may have been its proper Name, on the Account of its serving as a Boundary.
- [1] See a Law in the Digest. referred to in the Margin, which shall be produced, in Note 3. on § 3. of Chap. IX. of this Book.
- [2] As did formerly the River Bardanus (or rather Vardarus) according to ANN. COMNEN. Hist. Lib. 1. (Cap. V.) GROTIUS.
- [3] Darius called the Tigris and Euphrates the two great Bulwarks of his Kingdom. Q. CURTIUS, Lib. IV. Cap. XIV. Num. 10.
- [1] Thus the Romans, as GRONOVIVS observes, were sole Masters of the Rhine, the Danube, and some other Rivers; because the Barbarians, who inhabited on the opposite Bank, having no Boats, the Romans constantly kept what they called Naves Lusoriae, on them. See SALMASIVS, on VOPISCUS, Vit. Bonosi. Cap. XV.
- [1] See PUFENDORF, B. IV. Chap. VI. § 12.
- [2] When a Man dies without leaving an Heir: On this is founded a Passage of JUSTIN, which the learned GRONOVIVS quotes in this Place. Imilcar, General of the Carthaginians, having lost his Army in Sicily, by the Plague that raged in that Island, consoles himself, after his Return to Carthage, by observing, that The Enemy had plundered his Camp, not in Quality of Conquerors, but as Persons who seized on such Goods as, by the Death of the Owners, belonged to the first Occupant. Lib. XIX. Cap. III. Num. 6.
- [3] B. 1. Chap. 1. § 6.
- [4] See Note 4. on PUFENDORF, B. IV. Chap. VIII. § 12.
- [5] See PUFENDORF, B. IV. Chap. VIII. § 3.

[6] Jus in rem, or rather, in re, as we commonly say, in Opposition to Jus ad rem; a Distinction used by the scholastick Interpreters of the Roman Law. The Reader may see what I have said on it in my second Note on PUFENDORF, B. IV. Chap. IX. § 8. as also Mr. NOODT's Commentary on the first Part of the DIGEST. p. 60, 61.

The Right of a Proprietor over his Goods, that of a Creditor over the Pledge lodged in his Hands, the Rights of Servitude over the Goods of another, the Right of Possession, and that of an Heir, are placed among the Rights in rem. But the Doctors are not universally agreed in admitting the Right of Possession into that Class, according to the Notions of the antient Law. See Mr. SCHULTING's excellent Notes on the Jurisprud. Ante-Justin. p. 428.

[7] Institut. Lib. II. Cap. XXIII. De Fidei commissariis hereditatibus, § 2. Our Author is censured for placing this Right, as he understands it, contrary to the scholastick Notions, among Rights over a Thing. It is observed against him, that, according to the Civil Law, a Legacy bequeathed under a certain Condition, is not acquired by the Legatee, but when the Condition is accomplished by the Event. 'Till that Time, the Legatee is not considered as a Creditor (See DIGEST. Lib. XLIV. Tit VII. De obligat. & Actionib. Leg. XLII. And CUJAS's publick Lectures on that Law. Tom. VIII. Opp. Edit. Fabrot. p. 400.) and if he dies before the Condition is performed, he even transmits no Hope to his Successors. Much more ought the same to hold good in Regard to an Heir in Trust, while the Condition is depending: As he yet acquires nothing, he has neither a Right over the Thing, nor even a Right to the Thing; and only amuses himself with vain Hopes. All this is true, according to the Roman Law; but, when we consider the Simplicity of natural Law, tho' the Right of such a Person has no Effect, and may never have any, in Regard to the actual Acquisition of the Thing; it is not therefore less real, or falls less on the Thing. This is evident, because he who is charged with a Feoffment of Trust, cannot dispose of the Goods according to his own Fancy, till the Condition fails entirely.

[8] De Benef. Lib. VII. Cap. XII. The Philosopher had said, a little before, that Some Things belong to some Persons, under a certain Condition. GROTIUS.

Our Author quotes the last Passage, as if taken from B. VIII. Chap. XII. of the Treatise De Benef. which, it is well known, has but seven Books. As to what concerns the Thing itself, see B. I. Ch. III. § 16.

[9] Orat. Rhod.

[10] Lib. XII. p. 558. Edit. Casaub.

[11] From a Passage in the Close of the second Book of the Odyssey, it may be gathered, that the Estate of a Man who died without Children, fell to the People. And thus EUSTATHIUS explains that Place in the Iliad. B. V. where the Poet says, that The Magistrates of the City divided the Estate, of such a Person, — — Χηρῶσται δὲ διὰ κτήσιν δατέοντο.

Ver. 158.

For by Χηρῶσταις he understands a Magistrate, who undertook the Administration of the Estates of such as left no Children. We learn from History, that something like this was formerly practised in the Kingdom of Mexico. GROTIUS.

The Passage of the Odyssey, hinted by our Author, is probably that where one of Penelope's Suitors says, that, if Telemachus should be lost at Sea as his Father had been, they would divide his Effects, and leave only the House to his Mother, and to the Man she should marry.

Κτήματα γὰρ κεν πάντα δασαίμεθα· οἰκία δ' ἀϕ̄τε

Τούτου μητέρι δοῖμεν ἔχειν, ἥδ' ὅστις ὀπίωι.

Verses 335, 336.

See also Verse 368. But I do not see how the Inference made by our Author can be sufficiently grounded on those Words. It is more probable, that HOMER only insinuates, as Madam DACIER observes, that Penelope's Suitors had agreed, that, if they could get rid of Telemachus, they would make an equal Division of all his Effects among themselves, that thus the Persons rejected by Penelope might have some Sort of Consolation. In Regard to the Passage of the Iliad, the Poet is there speaking of Phenops, an old Trojan, who had only two Sons. Diomedes killed them both, and thus, says the Poet, left their Father sufficient Cause for Mourning and Affliction. Then follow the Words in Question. The Word Χηρῶσταί does not, in any Greek Author with whom we are acquainted, plainly signify such Magistrates as EUSTATHIUS mentions; so that this looks very like an Invention of his own. POLLUX and HESYCHIUS make this Word signify distant Relations, who succeed a Father thus deprived of his Children. Madam DACIER indeed thinks the Word Χηρῶσταί was not explained by collateral Relations, who had a Right of Succession, till after HOMER's Time. But then she ought first to have proved that HOMER speaks of such. I shall here insert her Translation, which gives a great Light to the Original, Dans une Affliction & dans un Deuil, qu' augmentoit encore la Douleur de voir des Curateurs s' emparer de sa Succession, pour la conserver à des Collatéraux éloignez, qui la dévoreroient déjà des Yeux, & auxquelles elle n' étoit pas Destinée. That is, In an Affliction and Mourning, which was encreased by the Grief at seeing the Guardians seize on the Succession, in Order to keep it for distant collateral Relations, who already devoured it with their Eyes, and for whom it was not designed. She here supposes, that these pretended Guardians took the Administration of a Man's Estate into their Hands, even in his Life-Time, if he died without Children, But where did she learn this? It appears clearly, from a like Passage of HESIOD, that this Division was not made till after the Decease of the Person who left no Issue.

— — ἴο δ' οἴ βιότου ἐπιδευῆς

Ζώει, ἀποφθιμένου δὲ διὰ κτήσιν δάτεονται

Χηρῶσται

Theogon. ver. 605, &c.

That Lady indeed makes the Χηρῶσταί here mentioned, those very collateral Relations who enjoyed the Succession. But in Vertue of what does she give a different Sense to this Passage, which visibly treats of the same Thing, and which belongs to a Poet, who lived either at, or very near the same Time with the other? And what Probability is there, that the Administration of a Man's Estate, who had no Children, was taken out of his Hands, in Order to secure the Succession to his distant Relations? In Reality, this Passage of HOMER is not clear enough for proving either what Madam DACIER thinks she finds in it, nor what our Author infers from it. I do not, however, deny, that even in those Times, vacant Estates might be considered as devolving to the Publick. It is certain, that Sovereigns have long attributed to themselves a Right of appropriating such Estates to themselves, with the Consent of the People.

[12] See the foregoing Chapter, § 4, 5.

[1] As our Author, in the last Paragraph of the preceding Chapter, has placed Things as are abandoned by their Masters, among such as are acquired by Right of prior Occupancy; he, on this Occasion, enquires into the Right of Prescription, founded on a tacit abandoning. According to the antient Roman Law, however, there was this principal Difference between Usucaption and Prescription, that whoever acquired a Thing by Right of Usucaption, at the same Time acquired a Right of claiming it wherever he found it; whereas Prescription only enabled him to elude the Demand of the former Master, but afforded no Means to recover Possession, when once lost. See the Commentators, particularly JANUS A COTTA, on the Title of the Institutes, De Usucaptionibus, &c. Lib. II. Tit. VI. The Reader may likewise find several Things on this Subject in PUFENDORF, B. IV. Chap. XII. § 1. &c.

[2] CICERO observing that in antient Times, the Romans gave the Appellation of Enemy (Hostis) to the Person, in his Days called a Foreigner, (Peregrinus) confirms this Remark, by a Law of the Twelve Tables, which says, Propriety is preserved eternally against a foreign Possessor. Adversus Hostem aeterna auctoritas. De Offic. Lib. I. Cap. XII. GROTIUS.

[3] That is, supposing the Right of Prescription founded only on the Will of the Legislators, and that there is nothing in the Law of Nature and Nations to authorize it. Besides, even tho' it had some Foundation in the Principles of a Law common to all Men, and all People; the precise Determination of the Time allowed for Prescription, which is not the same in different Countries, serves as a Rule only to the Subjects of the same Nation.

[4] Even tho' Prescription were purely of Civil Right; yet, if any Native of the Country had been in Possession of Goods or a Right belonging to a Foreigner, during the Term fixed by the Laws, such Foreigner shall be cast at Law, when he enters his Claim after that Term; and that for the same Reason which would exclude him from an Inheritance, if the Laws did not allow the Estates of the Country to pass to Foreigners by Will, or by Persons dying intestate. This is our Author's Meaning, which at first Sight appears pretty obscure.

[5] PETER DU PUY, in a Dissertation, tending to prove that Prescription doth not take Place between Sovereign Princes, reasons thus, "Those, who have asserted that the negative Opinion is repugnant to the common Sense of all Nations, will, I believe, find it difficult to make a Reply to that universal Consent of all Kings and Sovereign Princes, who have never waved any Part of their antient Pretensions. Some of them have retained the Titles of their pretended Kingdoms and Lordships, others the Arms, and a third Sort both the Arms and Titles of those Dominions, tho' not in Possession of one Foot of Land in them." The Author then sets down a great Number of Examples, which it is not necessary to specify in this Place. The late Mr. WERLHOF, Professor at Helmstadt, (of whom I have spoken in my third Note on PUFENDORF, B. IV. Chap. XII. § 11. second Edition) answers judiciously. First, That if such Princes, by keeping the Titles or Arms of a Kingdom, of which they have not been in Possession of a considerable Time, really design to preserve their Right, here is a Sort of Protestation made, which hinders Prescription; and thus, this is so far from proving that Kings and Princes look on Prescription as a Thing which hath no Place among them, that it may very reasonably be inferred from hence, that they are persuaded of the contrary; because, otherwise, there would be no Necessity of their being so eager in interrupting, as much as in them lies, the Detainer's Possession of Fact. Secondly, It frequently happens, that Custom and Vanity have a great Share in this Care of retaining the Titles or Arms of a Kingdom, when they have abandoned the Possession of it. So that this Act cannot be supposed to interrupt the Possession, or in any Manner prejudice the Right of the Possessor, when there are other Acts and Circumstances sufficient for grounding a Presumption of abandoning such Right. Vindiciae Grotiani Dogm. de Praescript. inter Gentes liberas, &c. § 47.

[1] Orat. Archidam. p. 121. Edit. H. Steph.

Our Author quotes the next Passage, as belonging to ISOCRATES, Orat. ad Philippum. But it is taken from DIONYSIUS of Halicarnassus, in that of his Judgment on Isocrates, where he gives us the Substance of the Oration made under the Name of Archidamus, Cap. IX. p. 155. Tom. II. Edit. Oxon.

[2] Lewis of Gonzaga, Duke of Nevers, reasoned on the same Principle. See Mr. DE THOU, Lib. LIX. at the Year 1574. GROTIUS.

[3] LIVY, Lib. XXXII. Cap. X. Num. 4.

[4] Idem. Lib. XXXV. Cap. XVI. Num. 10.

[5] It is where the Historian speaks of Artabanus, King of the Parthians, who attempted to invade the Possessions and Conquests of Cyrus and Alexander. Annal. Lib. VI. Cap. XXXI. Num. 3.

[6] This is what the Greeks called, by Way of Allusion to a Fact in the History of Athens, Τὸ πρὸ Ἐυκλείδου, to seek for that which was before Euclides. A proverbial Way of Speaking, made use of, among other Writers, by NICETAS, in the Life of Alexis Comnena, Brother of Isaac Angelus, where he speaks of the Emperor Henry, Son to Frederick, καὶ ταῦτα δὴ τὸ πρὸ Ἐυκλείδου ἀνυποστόλως ἀνακινῶν. He was not ashamed to go and seek for that which was before Euclides.

This Euclides was Archon at Athens, soon after that Office was introduced. Our Author might have shewn the Use of this Proverb from more antient Writers; such as LUCAN in Cataplo, Tom. I. p. 426. and in Hermotimo, p. 563. Edit. Amstel. The learned CASAUBON, in his Remarks on ATHENAEUS, Lib. I. Cap. II. promised to explain and illustrate it at large, in a Treatise Of Proverbs which has never been published.

[7] I know not from what Part of the Greek Historian our Author took these Words.

[8] De Offic. Lib. II. Cap. XXII. FLORUS, speaking of the Sedition, raised by the Tribunes, who required a new Division of the Lands, which had been usurped by several Persons, observes, that this could not be effected without the Ruin of the Possessors, who were part of the People, and possessed those Lands by a Sort of hereditary Title, as having been left them by their Ancestors. Lib. III. Cap. XIII. (Num. 9, 10.) GROTIUS.

[1] See Chap. VI. of this Book, § 1.

[2] This will be treated of Chap. XX. § 18. of this Book.

[3] Even tho' he did it not with a Design of deceiving; for every one ought to think of what he says. See Chap. XVI. of this Book, § 1.

[1] Thus, when Men throw their Goods into the Sea, with a View of saving the Ship, they do not design to abandon the Possession of them; on the contrary, they will take them up, if they find them, or look for them, if they suspect where they lie. In which Case they act like a Traveller, who leaves what he cannot carry on the Highway, intending to return with Assistance for carrying it off. This is the Decision of the Roman Lawyers, quoted by our Author in his Margin. DIGEST. Lib. XIV. Tit. II. Ad Leg. Rhod. de jactu. Leg. VIII. See also Lib. XLI. Tit. I. De adquir. rerum Dominio. Leg. IX. § 8. and Lib. XLVII. Tit. II. De Furtis, Leg. XLIII. § 11.

[2] DIGEST. Lib. XIV. Tit. II. De Pactis, &c. Leg. II. Princip. and § 1. See PUFENDORF, B. III. Chap. VI. § 2. Note 7. second Edition. But when there is any manifest Reason, which shews, that the Note is not given up, or cancelled, with a Design of releasing from the Debt, the Presumption ceases. Lib. XXII. Tit. III. De probation. & praesumptionibus, Leg. XXIV. See Mr. NOODT's excellent Treatise De Factis & Transactionibus, Cap. II. p. 651, 652. Opp.

- [3] DIGEST. Lib. XXIX. Tit. II. De adquir. vel. amittend. haeredit. Leg. XCV.
- [4] In a Law of the Digest. quoted by our Author in his Margin, it is said, that If a Minor acts as a Magistrate, his Jurisdiction is not to be disallowed.—So that, if a Minor, being Pretor or Consul, pronounces Sentence, it will be valid; because the Prince, who gave him the Post, decreed that he should do every Act belonging to it. Lib. XLII. Tit. I. De re judicatâ. Leg. LVII. See also Lib. I. Tit. XIV. De Officio Praetor. Leg. III. and JAMES GODEFROY's Commentary on it, in his miscellaneous Dissertations.
- [5] DIGEST. Lib. XLVI. Tit. IV. De acceptilat. Leg. VIII. Only the Formalities of Acceptilation, belonged to the Civil Law. See PUFENDORF, B. V. Chap. XI. § 7. and Mr. NOODT, De Pactis & Transaction. Cap. VIII. p. 671. as also his Probabilia Juris, Lib. I. Cap. II. in fine.
- [1] DIGEST. Lib. XLI. Tit. I. De adquir. rerum Dominio, Leg. XLIV. See Chap. VIII. of this Book, § 3.
- [2] This Explication has been criticised by the late Mr. HUBER, in his Commentary on the Title of the Institutes, De rerum Divisione, &c. § 27. The Lawyer ULPIAN, says he, does not speak of a Man's having or not having Hopes of recovering what he has lost. He means only, that Things thrown into the Sea, or carried off by some wild Beast, do not cease to belong to the Proprietor as long as they may be recovered. So that, if a Bird that flies by takes from us a Jewel, it still remains ours, because it is possible we may recover it; tho' in that Case we cannot venture to flatter ourselves with such a Prospect. As to the Question in itself, I own it does not follow, from the sole Consideration that we have little or no Hope of recovering a Thing, that we entirely abandon it; and even when we give over the Search, we do not thereby renounce our Right. Thus the Abandoning cannot well be presumed, so as to secure the Right of him who has found the Thing lost, but when there is all the Reason to believe the former Master will neither ever be known, nor have any Knowledge what is become of his Goods.
- [3] DIGEST. Lib. XXXIX. Tit. II. De damno infecto. Leg. XV. § 21.
- [4] DIGEST. Lib. XXII. Tit. I. De Usuris, &c. Leg. XVII. § 1. See Mr. NOODT's excellent Treatise De Foenore & Usuris, Lib. III. Cap. XVI. where this Law is explained.
- [5] As the Sovereign, unless he be extremely negligent, cannot be ignorant of the Customs which are introduced into his Dominions, and it depends, on him only to hinder their taking Effect; if he suffers them to have the Force of Law for a certain Time, he is and may be supposed to authorize them. Farther yet, the Laws which he himself has made, are abolished by Non-Usage, or a contrary Custom. Princes may have good Reasons for thus letting a Law fall imperceptibly, which they do not judge necessary. But even tho' this happens by their Negligence, as is pretty often the Case, either because they themselves are not sufficiently careful of maintaining the Law, or have not been sufficiently attentive to the Conduct of inferior Magistrates, who were charged with enforcing the Observation of that Law; it doth not therefore fail of losing its Force after a considerable Time: The Reason of this is, because as every Law has a Tendency to lay a Restraint on the Liberty of the Subject, and the Sovereign may, and ought, to explain his Will in that Particular, in a clear and distinct Manner; the Moment there are on his Side sufficient Tokens of a Change of Will, the Interpretation ought naturally to be made in Favour of the Subject. Thus the Sovereign may, if he pleases, order the Revival of the Law for the Time to come, by the same Right which he has to make entirely new Laws; but as to what has passed while the Law was not observed, we are to judge of it as if there never had been such a Law. PLINY the Younger gives a remarkable Example of this Kind: There was a Law originally made on Pompey's Proposal, which allowed all the Cities in the Province of Bithynia, to elect what Persons they pleased Senators, provided they were Natives of the City itself. In Process of Time it appeared that they contented themselves with chusing Men of the Province; and the Censors attempted, in Vertue of the old Law, to divest all the Senators of their Charge, who were not Natives of the City where they enjoyed that Dignity. Pliny, who was Pro-Consul of Bithynia, consulted the Emperor Trajan on that Affair, who answered, The Authority of the Law, and the long Practice usurped against Law, might carry you different Ways. It is my Pleasure to accommodate the Matter thus; that we make no Innovation in Regard to what is past, but that the Persons chosen from every City remain in Possession of their Dignity; and that for the future the Pompeian Law be observed; the Force of which if we should attempt to revive by a retroactive Effect, much Confusion must necessarily ensue. Lib. X. Epist. CXVI. See also a Dissertation of Mr. THOMASIVS, De Morum cum Jure Scripto contentione. § 52, &c. and Mr. SCHULTING's Dissertations on the first Part of the Digest. Lib. I. Tit. III. § 20, 21. as likewise the Interpretationes Juris, by Mr. AVERANI, Lib. II. Cap. I.

[6] See Chap. XXI. of this Book, § 2. and BARTHOLSOCIN, Consil. CLXXXVII. Col. 8. MEISCHREN, Decis. Cameral. IX. Num. 113. Tom. III. GROTIUS.

[1] I have shewn in the second Edition of my PUFENDORF, B. IV. Chap. XII. §8. Note 3. that, without all these Presumptions, which are most commonly not well founded, the Right of Prescription may be drawn from the Nature and End of Property itself, by Principles which suppose rather what the former Master ought to think, than what he really does.

[2] See the Chapter of PUFENDORF, last quoted, § 4. Note 6. and § 9.

[1] Thus by the Roman Laws, such a Time is sufficient for establishing a Right of Service; as, for Example, that of carrying Water through another Man's Grounds. DIGEST. Lib. XLIII. Tit. XX. De aquâ quotid. & aestivâ, Leg. III. § 4. See ANDREW KNICH, De Jure Territorii. THEODORE REINKING, Lib. I. Class V. Cap. II. Num. 5. OLDENDORP, Class III. Art. 2. GROTIUS.

This Time is called Immemorial, not because there can be no Monument by which it may appear that the Possession was not originally acquired by a just Title; (for no Time is so long that some Writing concerning it may not remain; and thus the Length of Time would not give Place to the best grounded Prescription) but because there is no Man living who remembers a Thing belonged to any other than the Possessor, and those from whom he inherited it, or has heard it said by those of his Time; while no other Title appears, that gives Room for disputing the Right of the Possessor. Thus this Time may sometimes be pretty short, as after a bloody War, which has swept away great Part of the Inhabitants of a Country. See the late Mr. WERLHOF's Dissertation, by me quoted, § 18, &c. as also the Jus Controversum of Mr. COCCEIVS, jun. Tom. II. p. 467, &c.

[2] This is observed by BALBUS, De Praescriptionibus; and COVARRUVIAS on the same Subject; as also REINKING, Dict. Lib. I. Class V. Cap. XI. Num. 40. Concerning Time immemorial, see the learned ANT. FAUKE, Consil. pro Ducatu Montisferrat. GROTIUS.

[3] This is what JUSTINIAN calls ἄμνηστος μᾶλλον ἢ περὶ χρόνου. in his fifth Edict, published among the Notes on PROCOPIUS's Secret History. GROTIUS.

[4] For a Generation, Γενεά, is a Space of thirty Years, Τριακονταετία, as PORPHYRY observes, in his Questions on HOMER, (p. 99. Edit. Barnes.) HERODIAN, speaking of the Secular Games, includes three Generations in one Age, (Lib. III. Cap. VIII. Edit. Boecl.) PHILO the Jew says, there were ten Kings in Aegypt, in the Space of three hundred Years. De Legat. And PLUTARCH that there were fourteen at Lacedemon in five hundred Years. Vit. Lycurg. (p. 58. Tom. I. Edit. Wech.) JUSTINIAN refuses Permission for bringing a certain Affair to, a Trial, because four Generations had passed since the Fact in Question. Novell. CXLIX. (Cap. II.) GROTIUS.

There is some small Variation in the Number of Years, which the antient People of the East, and the Grecians, included in a Generation; but commonly they kept pretty near to thirty Years, and made an Addition of three or four Months, in Order to bring the three Generations exactly to a hundred Years. See Mr. LE CLERC, on Genesis v. 1. and xv. 16. as also the Origines Aegyptiacae, by the late Mr. PERIZONIUS, Cap. XI. p. 175, &c. and BOECLER'S Notes on the Passage of HERODIAN, quoted by our Author. I do not find in PHILO, what is here produced as from his Treatise, De Legatione.

[5] LIVY, Lib. XXXIV. Cap. LVIII. Num. 10.

[1] It has been very justly observed, that this Reason is more conformable to Christian Charity than to the common Sentiments of Mankind, and the Nature of Things. The Truth is, we are here to suppose a Possessor bonâ Fide, as I have shewn on PUFENDORF, B. IV. Chap. XII. § 3. Note 5. second Edition. So that the Presumption, or Kind of Absolution, mentioned by our Author, is by no Means necessary, since after the Expiration of the Term of Prescription, the Possessor, having acquired a real Right, is guilty of no Crime.

[2] The same is to be said of this Answer, as of the foregoing. Besides, it is more proper for consoling a Prince, who has lost his Dominions, without Hopes of regaining them, than for hindering him from recovering the Administration if he can, of which every one is very apt to think himself sufficiently capable. See the last Paragraph of PUFENDORF, as quoted in the preceding Note.

[3] Our Author, in his Margin, quotes Lib. I. without telling whether it be of the Treatise Of the Commonwealth, or that of Laws. I imagine he meant the former, where the Philosopher frequently employs the Comparison of a Pilot and Sailors, with the Government of a State; but without applying it to the Subject before us. All I can find there, which has any Relation to it, is what PLATO says, that If the Members of a State were all good Men, they would, on Consideration of the Danger, strive as much to avoid governing it, as they now do to get it into their Hands. p. 347. Tom. II. Edit. H. Steph. But in the sixth Book of the same Treatise, p. 488. we find a Comparison nearly resembling this, which is too long to be inserted here.

[4] VALERIUS MAXIMUS, Lib. IV. Cap. I. Num. 9. extern. See CICERO'S Oration pro Dejotaro. Cap. XIII.

[5] Jonathan, the Son of Saul, seems to have had the same Sentiments. GROTIUS.

Our Author, without Doubt, alludes to what Jonathan said to David, in the Desart of Zeph. 1 SAMUEL xxiii. 17. Fear not, for the Hand of Saul, my Father, shall not find thee; and thou shalt be King over Israel, and I shall be next unto thee, Here I cannot forbear taking Notice of the egregious Rashness, to say no worse, of the Commentator BOECLER, who has the Assurance to treat this short Remark of our Author as impious and profane. It is not easy to guess on what so harsh and uncharitable a Censure is grounded, since GROTIUS here attributes to Jonathan none but very commendable Sentiments. If we read the Sacred History with Care and Attention, we shall there find, says our choleric Grammarian, that Jonathan is cleared of all injurious Suspicions of Cowardise, and of all other Thoughts contrary to the Sentiments and Order of GOD. He acquiesces in the Will of one only GOD, as soon as it is made known to him; and, if he renounces his Pretensions to his Father's Kingdom, the Possession of which he, without Doubt, otherwise longed for, by a natural Desire, it was only out of Respect to the Orders of GOD. Is not the bare Representation of this wretched Reasoning sufficient for confuting it? But it is pleasant to find BOECLER afterwards owning, as a Favour done to our Author, that he might mean that Jonathan to Sentiments of Resignation to the Divine Will joined Sentiments of Modesty, founded on the Difficulty of supporting so great a Weight as the Government of a Kingdom.

[6] Pharsal. Lib. II. ver. 60, &c.

[7] (CICERO, De Offic. Lib. II. Cap. XXIII) Thus at Athens, when the Peace was concluded, Thrasybulus left the Possessions as he found them. GROTIUS.

I know not where our Author found what he says of Thrasybulus. That brave Athenian having driven out the thirty Tyrants, after a Reign of about two Years, procured a Law for a general Amnesty, which ordered, that no Man should be accused or punished for what had passed during the Troubles, and that all Spirit of Animosity should be laid aside. This is all that is reported by XENOPHON, Hist. Graec. Lib. II. in fine. DIODORUS SICULUS, Lib. XIV. Cap. XXXIV. AESCHINES, Orat. de falsâ Legat. p. 271. Edit. Basil. 1572. JUSTIN, Lib. V. Cap. X. Num. 10. VALERIUS MAXIMUS, Lib. IV. Cap. I. Num. 4. extern. &c. I am much mistaken if our Author has not confounded what he had read in THUCYDIDES, concerning the Peace of Sicily, with an Article of the Peace of Athens: By the former Treaty it was agreed, that Each of the Sicilians should remain in Possession of what he then enjoyed, Lib. IV. Cap. LXV. Edit. Oxon. What might have given Occasion to this Mistake, is, that BONGRAS, in a Note on the Place of JUSTIN, which I have quoted, produces the Passage of THUCYDIDES, as an Example like what Thrasybulus did.

[8] This Saying is recorded by MACROBIUS, with several others of the same Emperor, and the learned GRONOVIVS has not failed of pointing out the Place. Saturnal. Lib. II. Cap. IV. p. 334, 335. Edit. Jacob Gronov.

[9] THUCYDIDES, (Lib. VI. Cap. LXXIX. Ed. Oxon.) ISOCRATES, Orat. in Callimach. CICERO, De Leg. Agrar. contra Rull. (Orat. III. Cap. II.) LIVY, Lib. XXXV. This last Passage does not contain exactly the Thought which our Author attributes to LIVY. The Historian there relates historically, that while the Etolians were thinking of revolting from their Alliance with the Romans, and engaging the other States of Greece to do the same, it appeared that the honestest Part of the principal Men of each State were in the Interest of the Romans, and were pleased with the present State of Things. Cap. XXXIV. Num. 3.

[1] NICEPHORUS GREGORAS reports, that the Greek Emperors had given the City of Phocaea to the Ancestors of Catanas, on Condition that each Successor should give a Declaration in Writing, that he held that City only in Quality of Administrator, lest Length of Time should exclude the Imperial Right. GROTIUS.

[2] This arbitrary Law of Nations, is as little necessary as hard to prove. The Whole comes to this: Prescription being authorized by the Opinion and Custom of the Generality of Nations, it is a favourable Prejudice, that gives Room to believe this Right is founded on some evident Principle of natural Laws.

[3] See PUFENDORF, B. IV. Chap. XII. § 4.

[4] Lib. XXXV. Cap. XVI. Num. 7, 8, 9.

[5] Idem. Lib. XXXIV. Cap. LXII. Num. 13.

- [1] See PUFENDORF, B. IV. Chap. XII. § 10.
- [2] When he who would have transmitted his Right to his Descendents, then unborn, renounces it either expressly or tacitly, and the People knowing and seeing this, do not oppose it, tho' in their Power; in that Case they are reasonably supposed to consent to the Renunciation, and consequently, to change their Mind.
- [3] History furnishes us with several Instances of such Renunciations. See a remarkable one in the Person of Lewis IX. King of France, who renounced for himself and his Children, all the Right he might have to the Kingdom of Castile, by his Mother Blanche. MARIANA, Hist. Hispan. Lib. XIII. Cap. XVIII. GROTIUS.
See also Fa. DANIEL's History of France, Tom. III. p. 149. Edit. Amst.
- [4] This is done by Civil Law, in Regard to an Inheritance, for which no one yet presents himself. GROTIUS.
According to the nice Principles of the Roman Law, an Inheritance of which no one has yet taken Possession, is supposed to represent the Deceased, and to continue his Right of Property, so that it passes from it to the Heir; for which Reason it is sometimes stiled the Mistress of the Estate, as if it was a real Person. DIGEST. Lib. XLI. Tit. 1. De adquir. rerum Dominio. Leg. XXXIV. and Lib. XLIII. Tit. XXIV. Quod vi aut clam. Leg. XIII. § 5. See ANTHONY FAURE, Conject. Jur. Civ. Lib. XIV. Cap. 20. and De Errorib. pragmatic. Dec. III. Err. 3.
- [5] Which requires that Possessions should not be disturbed on slight Occasions.
- [6] That is, when the Succession has been regulated from the Beginning, so that every one of those, who succeed in their Order, holds his Right, not from his Predecessors, who could not bestow the Inheritance on whom he pleased, or otherwise dispose of the Fief, by any one valid Act; but from the Will of him who first established the Fief.
- [7] If any one to whom the Fief devolved, not having Children, yields his Right, in what Manner so ever, to another, who ought not to succeed till after him and his; the Children who shall be born to the former, after the Time of the Prescription expires, are not admitted to demand the Succession. The Case is the same when the Children that are born before the Time of Prescription is expired, allow the finishing what was wanting, as soon as they come to the Age of Majority. Much more doth this take Place in Regard to Successors in the collateral Line. Besides, a Possessor, tho' a Foreigner, may acquire the Fief in this, or some other Manner, by a Prescription of thirty Years, termed Praescriptio longissimi temporis; for our Author means that, those whose Opinion he produces, owning, as well as others, that the ordinary Prescription of ten Years, in Regard to Persons present, and of twenty in Regard to the absent, is not sufficient in this Case. See CUJAS, on FEUD. Lib. IV. Tit. XIV. Quando agnatus ad Feudum admittatur, &c. (II. 26. 5 Edit. Vulg.) and Tit. XLIX. De Capitulis Conradi Regis, &c. (II. 40. Fuig.) as also ANDREW GAILL. Observ. Practic. Lib. II. Obs. 159.
- [8] Majorazgo. It is a Right established in Spain, by Vertue of which the eldest of the Family alone inherits Count ships, Marquisates, Duchies, Fiefs, and other such like Estates, which are intailed from one to the other; so that, when the Eldest dies without Children, he is succeeded by the next eldest. In the Case in Hand, which is easily conceived, after what has been said in the foregoing Note, we are also to distinguish the two Kinds of Prescription there specified. See FERNANDO VASQUEZ, a Spanish Writer, De Successionib. Lib. III. § 26.

[9] Our Author here supposes a Feoffment of Trust established in such a Manner, that several Persons are called one after the other; that is, one on Default of another, to inherit an Estate. This being the Case, if the first resigns his Right to the next, the Children of the first, yet unborn, lose the Right which the Father would have transmitted to them, if the Possessor of the Estate subject to a Feoffment of Trust, continues in peaceable Possession of it to the Term of the Prescription. A Law of the Code is objected on this Occasion, Lib. VI. Tit. XLIII. Communia de Legatis, &c. Leg. II. § 3. from which it is inferred, that a Possessor, whether a Foreigner, or one whose Right to a Feoffment of Trust is yet to come, cannot prescribe to the Prejudice of the Feoffee, actually called to the Succession. But that Law speaks only of the ordinary Prescription of ten or twenty Years, not of that of thirty or forty. See ANTHONY FAURE, De Errorib. Pragmat. Decad LXXXVIII. Err. 5, &c.

[1] DIGEST. Lib. L. Tit. XVII. De diversis Reg. Jur. Leg. XXIX. See JAMES GODEFROY'S Comment on that Law; and PUFENDORF, B. III. Chap. VI. § 14.

[2] Concerning all this see HUBER, De Jure Civitatis, Lib. I. Sect. III. Cap. IX.

[3] See VASQUEZ, Controv. illustr. Lib. I. Cap. XXIII. § 3. Lib. II. Cap. LXXXII. § 8, 9, &c. as also PANORMITAN, Lib. I. Cons. LXXXII. and PEREGRINUS, De Jure Fisci, Lib. VI. Cap. VIII. § 10. GROTIUS.

[1] That is, the Laws considered as to what they have in particular in Regard to the Time and Manner of Prescription. For as to those Parts of them that are founded on the Law of Nature and Nations, our Author is so far from securing the Supreme Power from Prescription, that he even maintains, that, as the Term of Prescription, regulated by the Laws, is not always sufficient for acquiring the supreme Authority, it may likewise happen, that so long a Space of Time is not necessary for it. He goes still farther, and holds, that even in those Countries, where Prescription is not authorized by the Civil Laws, it takes Place in Regard to Things relating to the Sovereignty. Thus the learned GRONOVIVS'S Criticism on our Author's Opinion in this Place falls of itself, being founded only on a Misunderstanding, or a false Supposition. As to what he says against the Reason taken from a Legislator's not being able to impose on himself an Obligation, properly so called; see my Remarks on that Question, Note 4. on PUFENDORF, B. VII. Chap. VI. § 3.

[2] In this I am supported by the Authority of DON GARZIAS MASTRILLAS, De Magistratu, Lib. III. Cap. II. Num. 26. JOHN OLDENDORP, Consil. Marp. V. Num. 47. Tom. I. GROTIUS.

[3] See Chap. XX. of this Book, § 24. SENECA observes, that A Pilot may be considered under two distinct Characters, one of which he bears in common with the whole Ship's Crew; the other peculiar to himself, as guiding and governing the Ship. Epist. LXXV. (p. 360.) On this Subject, see CLAUD DE SEYSSEL, Of the Monarchy of France, B. I. (Chap. XII.) CHASSAGNE, Of the Glory of the World, Part II. Can. 5. GAILLIUS, Lib. II. Observ. LV. Num. 7. BODIN, De Repub. Lib. I. Cap. 8. And REINKING, I. Cap. XII. GROTIUS.

[4] See Chap. XIV. of this Book, § 5.

[1] The Author here employs the Distinction made by the scholastick Lawyers, who call the Rights here specified, Regalia minora, in Opposition to the Regalia majora, or essential Parts of the Sovereignty. Among the Regalia minora are reckoned the Right of creating subaltern Magistrates, or conferring certain Dignities; the Right of erecting Fairs; the Right of legitimating Bastards, or granting the Privilege of Age; the Right of coining Money; the Right of confiscating a Criminal's Estate and Goods; the Right of appropriating to himself vacant Estates; the Right of Hunting; the Right of levying certain Customs; and other Rights of the same Nature. Mr. THOMASIVS rejects this Distinction, and at the same Time, the Consequence drawn from it by our Author in Relation to his Subject. The Division, says he, of the Regalia into majora and minora, is not founded on a Principle sufficiently clear; and hence arises the great Difficulty of settling the Difference of these two Sorts of Rights, on which the Lawyers are not agreed among themselves. This Division is borrowed from the Interpreters of the Feodal Law of the Lombards. There is a Title, viz. the LVI. of Book II. the Rubrick of which is, Quae sunt Regalia, in which we have an Enumeration of several Sorts of Rights of Sovereignty annexed to the Royal Fiefs. As it makes no Mention of the legislative Power, of the Right of making Peace and War, and such like, the Interpreters to explain this Omission, have invented the Distinction of Regalia majora and minora, understanding by the latter, those specified in the Title; and by the former those there omitted. Now a Vassal being possessed of the useful Domain of the Fief, and it being in his Power to acquire the Fief itself by Prescription, to the Prejudice of his Lord; the Lawyers, who, almost till GROTIUS's Time, very often confounded Vassals with Subjects, said therefore, that the Regalia minora might be alienated, and acquired by Prescription. The old Kings of the Franks, from whom came the Laws or Customs of Feodal Right, attributed to the Lombards, found by Experience, tho' too late, how dangerous it is for a Sovereign to allow any one of his Subjects the Regalia minora, with Power to alienate them, or transmit them to their Successors; the Regalia minora in Process of Time drawing the Regalia majora after them; so that several Subjects have set up for real Sovereigns. See Mr. THOMASIVS's Notes on HUBER, De Jure Civitatis, Lib. I. Sect. III. Cap. VI. Num. 3. p. 91, 92. To which may be added, the Notes of CUJAS on the Title of the Feodal Law, already quoted; where that great Lawyer shews, that it treats of the Rights restored by the Bishops, Princes, and Cities of Italy to the Emperor Frederick, who had been long deprived of them. To come now to the Question in Hand, I am entirely of the same Lawyer's Opinion, who maintains that a Subject, remaining such, cannot acquire by Prescription any Right of the Sovereignty, great or small. When a Subject continues a long Time in the Exercise of certain Rights belonging to the Sovereign, without the express Concession of the Sovereign, they are either such Rights as relate to the Exercise of some publick Office with which the Subject is invested; and in that Case, he doth not exercise them in his own Name, but in the Name of the Sovereign, of whom he holds that Employ; which leaves no more Room for Prescription in his Favour than a Farmer would have, under Pretence that he had farmed another Man's Lands a hundred Years: Or they are such Rights as are not exercised by the Person as holding a publick Office, and then they can be considered only as Privileges granted merely by Favour; so that their Duration depends on the Will of the Sovereign, as that even of Privileges granted expressly, but without any Clause of Irrevocability. See the same Author's Notes on the same Book, p. 111. and his Dissertation, De Praescriptione Regalium ad Jura Subditorum non pertinente. Printed at Hall in Saxony, 1696.

[1] That is, so long as the Person, on whom the Right is conferred, keeps within the Bounds prescribed either expressly or tacitly.

[2] Bell. Jud. Lib. II. Cap. XXVI.

[3] Ibid. Lib. VI. Cap. XXV. We find almost the same Words in the Count De Blanderate's Speech to the Milanese. RADEVIC, Lib. I. Cap. XL. GROTIUS.

[4] Cyroped. Lib. III. Cap. I. § 6, 7.

[1] The late Mr. HUBER, in his Praelectiones ad Pandectas, Lib. XX. Tit. V. Quibus modis Pignus vel Hypothec. solvit. Num. 11. censures this Definition of our Author. It is not complete, says he, for the Right which a Proprietor hath to claim his own Goods, possessed by another, and the Right which a Creditor hath to re-demand Money lent to his Debtor, do not consist in a Series of repeated Acts; they are both exercised by a single Act, and when a Man has a convenient Opportunity of making the Claim or Demand; and yet neither of them relate to the Res merae facultatis, in Question; since the Possessor and the Debtor in contestably prescribe against the Proprietor and the Creditor. But that Lawyer, and such as approve of his Criticism, have not observed that those Words contain only Part of the Definition, or rather of the Division, here proposed by our Author; for explaining the Nature of imprescriptible Rights, of which he treats in few Words. In the Summary of this Chapter, he calls them in general, Quae sunt merae Facultatis, or Rights which consist in a bare Power of doing such or such a Thing; but in the Paragraph itself, he plainly reduces them to two Classes, the latter of which is more extensive and considerable, insomuch that what he says of that, ought rather to be considered as a Definition, than the Description he gives us of the other. According to him, there are some Rights which we use only by one single Act, which is limited to no Term, and which, consequently, we may exercise at any Time, and have the Liberty of deferring it. These are the Rights here first specified; and of which he gives, for Instance, the Right of redeeming a Pledge, by paying what was borrowed on it. See the following Note. There are others, which are the Result of every Man's natural Liberty to dispose of his Actions and Goods, and of all his Rights in general, of what Sort so ever, so long as he has not either expressly or tacitly renounced any Part of that Liberty. These are what he immediately after terms Jura Libertatis: They are both called Jura merae Facultatis, because no one has a Right directly or indirectly, to require we should make Use of them, before a certain Term, or during a certain Space of Time, and thus impose on us an Obligation to make Use of them, if we would not lose them. This Necessity may proceed either from our own Consent, as when we engage to redeem at a certain Time the Pledge delivered to a Creditor; or from some Law, whether natural or civil, as in the Case of Prescription, which in itself is founded on natural Law, and for the Term commonly regulated by the Civil Law of each Country; or lastly, from the Will of him who has permitted something which he might have hindered, or granted a Privilege which he might have refused, on Condition of using such Permission or Privilege from Time to Time, or within a certain Space of Time. These, I think, were our Author's Notions in this Affair; and when thus proposed, they are sufficient for distinguishing the Rights which he has undertaken to explain, from such as in themselves are subject to Prescription. The Definition which the Lawyer, against whom I am defending him, has pretended to give in its Room, instead of being more clear and exact, is equally obscure and false, as Mr. THOMASIVS observes, in his Notes on this Place; and as is shewn also by Mr. DE TOULLIEU, my very much honoured Colleague, in a learned Dissertation, De Luitione Pignoris, & Rebus merae facultatis. § 8. which is the third of his Dissertationum Juridicarum trias, printed at Utrecht in 1706. The Author last mentioned, who has treated the Subject much more exactly and clearly than it had been before handled, likewise confutes the Definitions which others have endeavoured to establish; and in Order to supply the Defect of them, he lays down one, which in Substance comes to what I have said. By Res merae Facultatis, he understands, § 25. certain Powers, which a Man hath by the Law of Nature, or by the common Law of the State, of which he is a Member, in Regard to the Use and Disposal of what belongs to him, (that is, of his Rights and Goods) so long as we are in Possession of them. It is true, both he and Mr. THOMASIVS, (as above) excludes from the Number of those Rights, such as are originally derived from the Concession of a private Person, or from some Agreement and Obligation, which imply, on the Part of him on whom they are exercised, some Diminution of his Liberty. But I do not see why a Man might not grant anyone a Permission or Privilege, in such a Manner that he should be entirely at Liberty to use it or not use it, and yet a Non-Usage of it, how long so ever continued, should not deprive him of his Right. There is nothing in this repugnant to the Simplicity of the Law of Nature, which is the Thing in Question; and in that Case it will not be less a simple and imprescriptible Power, than that of Building on our own Land. See GAILLIUS, Observat. Practic. Lib. II. Cap. LX. Num 9. To return to Mr. HUBER, one of the Instances by him alledged of Rights subject to Prescription, I mean that of obliging the Payment of Money lent, is not to the Purpose, but on the Principles of the Civil Law. For the Law of Nature rightly understood, secures to the Creditor, or his Heirs, while there are sufficient Proofs of the Debt, a full Power to demand the Payment of it, after the longest Term, which is otherwise sufficient for Prescription. See my first Note on PUFENDORF, B. IV. Chap. XII. § 2.

[2] Luitio Pignoris. By these Words our Author understands the Right of recovering a Pledge by paying. Some Doctors maintain, that Luitio pignoris is barely paying the Debt, and thus redeeming the Thing pledged; which, according to them, may be always done; but they will have it, that the Right of redemanding the Pledge, by Vertue of Contract, is not included in it; and that it is subject to Prescription, notwithstanding the Payment, reserving to the Debtor a Right of claiming afterwards the Thing redeemed, as belonging to him. If this Distinction is well grounded, it is certainly only of Civil Law. As to the Question itself, we are likewise to distinguish between the Law of Nature, and the Roman Law. According to the Law of Nature, it is, in my Opinion, beyond Dispute, that so long as the Creditor, or his Heirs, are in Possession of the Pledge, held as such, as the Debt subsists eternally, in the Manner a fore said, so the Right of redeeming the Pledge is never extinguished, if there be no commissory Clause, express or tacit, nor any Renunciation. See B. III. Chap. XX. § 60. In Regard to the Roman Law, the Question seems to me very problematical. There are specious Reasons on both Sides; and the ablest Doctors are divided on it. The Design of these Notes doth not require me to engage in examining where the greater Probability appears. Those, who are disposed to make that Enquiry, may consult, among others, the great CUJAS, on the Digest. Lib. XIII. De Usurpation. & Usucaptionib. & Paratitl. Cod. De Praescript. 30. vel 40. Ann. BACHOVIUS, De Pignorib. & Hypoth. Lib. V. Cap. XX. VINNIUS, Select. Quaest. Lib. II. Cap. XXVI. JAC. GOTHOFRED, in Cod. THEODOS. Tom. I. p. 255. J. VOET. in Tit. D. De Pigneratitia Actione, Num. 7. HUBER, in Tit. D. Quibus modis Pignus vel Hypotheca solvitur, Num. 11. with the Notes of Mr. THOMASIVS, &c. but above all, Mr. DE TOULLIEU's curious Dissertation, quoted in the foregoing Note. It is in general very difficult to explain, according to the Principles of the Civil Law, the other Things ranked under the Jura merae Facultatis; so that either the antient Lawyers must not have had very clear and well-connected Ideas on this Subject, or the Fragments of their Writings now in our Hands are obscure and imperfect on this Point, as on many others.

[3] The learned GRONOVIVS on this Place alleges the Example of C. Valerius Flaccus, a Priest of Jupiter (Flamen Dialis) who, in Spight of all Opposition, entered the Senate of Rome; tho' from Time immemorial, his Predecessors had not appeared there, as they might have done by Vertue of their Office. LIVY, Lib. XXVII. Cap. VIII. But I doubt whether this Example is intirely to the Purpose. For the Privilege, there mentioned, is of such a Nature, that one would think a Man ought to use it, at least sometimes, to avoid giving Room at last to suppose he renounces it. Thus the Historian observes, that if the Priest obtained Permission to enter the Senate as he desired, it was more in Consideration of the Sanctity of his Life, than of any Right annexed to the Priesthood. Ibid. Num. 10.

[4] See Note 2. on this Paragraph.

[1] That is, so that the Person over whom a Right is acquired, was not before dependent on any one; for if he was, the Acquisition is then Derivative, as that made of Goods which before belonged to another. The Author treats of the latter Sort in the following Chapters, both in Regard to Things and Persons.

[2] See my first Note on PUFENDORF, B. VI. Chap. II. § 4.

[3] SENECA maintains, that the Father hath the first Right, over his Children, and the Mother the second, Controv. Lib. III. Controv. XIX (p. 255. Edit. Elziv. 1672.) St. CHRYSOSTOM likewise establishes this Inequality, when he says, it is just and reasonable that the Wife should be subject to her Husband, because an Equality of Authority, over the same Persons, produces Strife and Contention. In I. ad Corinth. xi. 3. He elsewhere allows the Wife to be the second Power in a Family; but neither allows her, on one Hand, to claim an Equality of Power, because she is subject to a Head; nor the Husband, on the other, to despise his Wife, as being subject to him, because she is one Body with him. In Ephes. vi. To which he adds a little after, This (the Power of the Wife) is a second Power, attended with Authority, and a great Share of Honour; but still the Husband has somewhat more. St. AUGUSTIN, writing to Ecdicia, asks her this Question, Who doth not know that your Son, because born of lawful and honest Wedlock, is more in the Power of his Father than in yours? Epist. CXCIX. Edit. Basil. 1569. One of the Byzantine Historians, speaking of Andronicus Palaeologus and Irene, observes that, among other Reasons, it was urged, that A Father has more Power than a Mother, and that there was no Reason why the Father's Will, in Regard to his Child, should not take Place, even preferably to that of the Mother. NICEPHORUS GREGORAS, Lib. VII. Concerning the Respect due to a Mother. See Code, Lib. VIII. Tit. XI.VII. De Patriâ Protestate, Leg. IV. GROTIUS.

[1] Politic. Lib. I. Cap. XIII. p. 3111. Edit. Paris.

[2] Ethic. Nicom. Lib. III. Cap. IV.

[3] The Philosopher considers a Son during that Time as a Part of his Father; whence he infers, that the Father is not allowed to commit any Injustice against him. Ibid. Lib. V. Cap. X.

[4] At that Age Children belong to their Parents, in the same Manner as their other Possessions, says MAIMONIDES, Can. Poenitential. Cap. VI. § 2. GROTIUS.

[5] The Author quotes this Passage in Latin only, according to his own Version of it, in the Excerpta ex Tragoed. & Comoed. Graecis, p. 34. In the Original it stands thus, τρέφειν ἀνάγκη (πῶς γὰρ οὔ;) τρόπιφ φρένοσ.

— — Τὸ μὴ φρονοῦν γὰρ, ὥσπερ εἰ βουτόν,

Coephor. (p.275. Edit. H. Steph.)

To which may be added, what is said in the Institutes, Lib. I. Tit. XX. De Atiliano Tutore, &c. 6. viz. It is consonant to the Law of Nature, that Children (impuberes) should be under Guardianship; that thus he who has not arrived to a perfect Age, may be governed by the Care of another.

[6] Jus ἐν κτήσει, non ἐν χρήσει. Thus our Author expresses himself. The whole Passage of PLUTARCH, from whence this Distinction is borrowed, runs thus, Grandeur consists not in the bare Possession of Things, but in the Use of them; for even Infants inherit their Father's Kingdoms and Authority. De Fortun. Alexandri. Orat. II. p. 337. Tom. II. Edit. Wech.

[7] All those Distinctions took Place by the Roman Law; which expressly forbids Women having their Children in their Power. Institut. Lib. I. Cap. XI. De Adoptionib. § 10. See Mr. NOODT's Observat. Lib. II. Cap. XV. So that the Father alone acquired all the Goods or Estates of his Children, not emancipated, exclusive of some certain Sorts of Goods, which were excepted in Process of Time. See the Interpreters on the Institutes, Lib. II. Cap. IX. Per quas personas nobis acquiritur. Natural Children, or Bastards, were not under the Father's Power, Such Children as we shall have born from lawful Wedlock, are in our Power. Institut. Lib. I. Tit. IX. De Patriâ potestate, in it. Therefore those who are born from a criminal Conversation, are not in the Father's Power, &c. Ibid. Tit. X. De Nuptiis, § 12. Whence it follows, that the Father could not appropriate their Goods to himself, because he had that Right only by Vertue of the fatherly Power, established by the Laws.

[1] Thus MAIMONIDES explains the Law, which occurs in the Book of Numbers, Chap. xxx. ver. 6. GROTIUS.

[2] See § 10. of this Chapter; and B. III. Chap. XXXIII. § 3. As also what I have said at large on this Subject. Note 2. on PUFENDORF, B. III. Chap. VII. § 6. second Edition; and my two Letters against Mr. DU TREMELAI, inserted in the Journal des Savans, Ann. 1712, 1713.

[1] JORNANDES observes, that Parents judge it better that Liberty should be lost than Life; when they sell their children, in Order to have them mercifully provided for, rather than keep them to starve. Hist. Goth. (Cap. XXVI. p. 75. Edit. Vulcan. 1597.) I find the Mexicans had a Law which allowed of this. GROTIUS.

In the General History of the West-Indies, written by FRANCIS LOPEZ DE GOMARA, B. II. Chap. LXXXVI. we read that in Mexico, the Fathers might sell their Children for Slaves, without any Distinction or Exception of Cases; as all their Men and Women might also sell themselves. On that Foot the Example would not be to the Purpose.

[2] That Law requires the Thing should be done by the Authority of the Magistrates, who should oblige the Purchaser of the Child to make a solemn Promise to keep the Child well, till it was in a Condition of doing him Service. AELIAN, Var. Hist. Lib. II. Cap. VII. The Writer here quoted doth not speak precisely of Children. APOLLONIUS only says, It is common among the Phrygians to sell their People; and if any of them are made Slaves by Force, they give themselves no Concern about redeeming them. Vit. Apoll. Tyan. Lib. VIII. Cap. VII. § 12. p. 346. Edit. Olear.

[3] See Exod. xxi. 7. Levit. xxv. 39. and Deut. xv. 12.

[1] Either they are private Matters, in which the King doth not act as King; and in that Case he doth not depend on the Will of his Parents, as being no longer a Member of the Family; or they are of a publick Nature; and then he is much less obliged to consult his Parents on them; since even a Subject, employed in a publick Office, is independent of his Father in what relates to the Execution of that Office, tho' in other Respects he is under the paternal Power. This is a Decision of the Roman Law, which, notwithstanding the excessive Power it gives Fathers over their Children in other Cases, considers a Son as Master of a Family, when he is made a Magistrate or Guardian. DIGEST. Lib. I. Tit. VI. De his, qui sui vel alieni Juris sunt, Leg. IX. By the same Law, a Son, as a Magistrate, may even force his Father to such Things as belong to his Jurisdiction. Lib. XXXVI. Tit. I. Ad Senatus consult. Tertull. Leg. XIII. § 5. and Leg. XIV. In like Manner, tho' a Son always owes his Father Respect, the Father is obliged to submit to him, in what regards the Honour due to his Post. See PUFENDORF, B. VI. Chap. II. § 12.

[1] SENECA says, that As it is advantageous for young People to be governed, the Law has put over them a Sort of domestick Magistrates, for directing their Conduct. De Benefic. Lib. III. Cap. IX. GROTIUS.

[2] The Roman Lawyers themselves acknowledge, as our Author observes, that this Right of Power over Children is peculiar to the Romans; and that no other Nation has such a Power over them. Instit. Lib. I. Tit. IX. De Patriâ Potestate, § 2. All the Subjects of the Roman Empire had not this Right till after the Constitution of Antoninus Caracalla. See SPANHEIM's Orbis Romanus, Exercit. II. Cap. XXIII.

[3] See Note 5. on PUFENDORF, B. V. Chap. X. §. 8.

[4] Pyrrhonic. Hypotypos. Lib. III. (Cap. XXIV. § 211. Edit. Fabric.) PHILO observes, that according to the Roman Laws, a Father was invested with a full Power over his Son. De Legat. ad Caium. (p. 996.) GROTIUS.

[5] On Cap. XXXVII, p. 199. Edit. Heins.

[6] Ethic. Nicom. Lib. VIII. Cap. XII.

[1] Concerning this whole Matter, consult PUFENDORF, who treats of it at large, B. VI. Chap. 1, whereas our Author only slightly touches the principal Questions.

[1] St. CHRYSOSTOM, speaking of Sarah, says, She endeavoured to comfort her Husband under her Barrenness, with Children by her Handmaid; for such Things were not then forbidden. (Hom. in Genes.) See the same Father on 1 TIMOTHY, III. [and another Passage in his Treatise On Virginité, already quoted, B. I. Chap. II. § 6. Note 5]. St. AUGUSTIN speaks of the Custom of having several Wives at the same Time as an innocent Thing, inculpabilis consuetudo. De Doctr. Christ. Lib. III. Cap. XII. and observes, that it was prohibited by no Law. De Civit. Dei, Lib. XVI. Cap. XXXVIII. See also De Doctr. Christ. Lib. III. Cap. XVIII. He elsewhere says, in Cap. XXII. of the same Work, Several Things were then done lawfully which cannot now be done without a Crime. GROTIUS.

[2] JOSEPHUS says, It was the Custom of his Country to have several Wives at the same Time. Antiq. Jud. Lib. XVII. Cap. I. GROTIUS.

[3] See SELDEN, De Uxore Hebraicâ, Lib. I. Cap. VIII.

[4] JOSEPHUS relating this, makes Nathan say, that GOD had given David Wives, whom he might justly and lawfully have. (Antiq. Jud. Lib. VII. Cap. VII. p. 227. Edit. Lips.) The Author of the Pesichta Zotertha, says, on Leviticus xviii, it is very well known, that those who pretend a Plurality of Wives was prohibited, do not understand what the Law is. (Fol. 24. Col. 1.) GROTIUS.

See also SELDEN, De Jure Nat. & Gent. juxta Discipl. Ebraeorum. Lib. V. Cap. VI.

[5] Leviticus xxi. 7. Nor was a Priest allowed to marry a Widow, as appears from Verse 14. of the same Chapter. PHILO the Jew, (De Monarchiâ, p. 827. Edit. Paris.) And most of the modern Interpreters understand this of the High-Priest, on Account of what goes before, Ver. 10, &c. But that it is spoken of all Priests without Exception, appears both from a Passage in EZEKIEL xliv. 22. and from JOSEPHUS, both in his Explication of that Law, and in his first Book against Apion. The Law in Question therefore must be connected with the Beginning of the Chapter; so that what is said of the High-Priest, Ver. 10, 11, 12, 13. is to be considered as in a Parenthesis. GROTIUS.

The Jewish Historian's Authority, urged by our Author, makes directly against him; for having spoken of such Women as the Priests in general were not to marry, he adds, that MOSES doth not allow the High-Priest to marry a Widow, tho' he permits the other Priests to do it. Antiq. Jud. Lib. III. Cap. X. p. 95. As to the other Passage, quoted as from the first Book against Apion, there is indeed a Place where JOSEPHUS speaks of the Marriage of Priests, p. 1036. but not one Word about Widows. Nor doth our Author quote JOSEPHUS at all in his Note on the Passage of Leviticus, where he makes the same Remark. As to the Passage of EZEKIEL, Mr. LE CLERC, who with good Reason thinks there is somewhat harsh and forced in the Parenthesis here supposed, promises to explain the Words of the Prophet so as to reconcile the seeming Contradiction. See SELDEN, De Uxore Hebr. Lib. I. Cap. VII. and De Successione, in Pontificat. Lib. II. Cap. II.

[6] Speaking of Augustus, who, having taken Livia from her Husband, consulted the Priests by Way of Banter, on this Question. Annal. Lib. I. Cap. X. Num. 7.

[7] In Order to clear up this Matter, and at the same Time know what was our Author's Opinion, after the first Edition of this Work, tho' he has made no Alteration in this Place, it will be proper to add here some of the Reflections, which appear in his Commentary on the New Testament, MATTHEW v. 32. First then, he observes, that our Lord JESUS CHRIST doth not design, either in this Passage, or in the Rest of his Discourse on the Mount, to abolish any Part of the Mosaic Law; his Intention is only to shew us in what Manner, and in what Case, a good Man may make his Advantage of the Allowance of Divorce, granted by one of the political Regulations of that Law, which was still in Force, at the Time of his Speaking. Consequently, the Question doth not turn on a Cause of Divorce brought before the Judges; for, beside that a Husband, who had a Mind to put away his Wife, was not obliged, according to the Law, to do it in a judiciary Manner; when he accused his Wife of Adultery before the Judges, that was done with a View of having her punished with Death, not of obtaining a Dissolution of Marriage. Thus, when our Lord speaks of Adultery, as a just Cause of Divorce, he supposes either a mild and merciful Husband, who is not disposed to bring his Wife to Punishment, how culpable so ever she may be, as was the Case of Joseph in Regard to Mary, before he was able to conceive the miraculous Cause of her Pregnancy: Or, a Husband, who had not sufficient Proofs of his Wife's Crime to alledge in Court, tho' he himself was persuaded of her Guilt, or had such Assurance of it as placed it beyond Doubt in his Opinion. On which St. JEROME says, that Whenever there is Adultery, or Suspicion of Adultery, the Wife may be divorced without Scruple. On MATTHEW XIX. p. 56. Tom. IX. Edit. Basil. 1537. Not that every Imagination of a suspicious Mind doth authorize a Man in Conscience to make Use of this Right; but he is not obliged to stay till he is furnished with all the Proofs necessary in a Court of Justice, and according to the Rigour of the Laws. It is sufficient in this Case, that a just Medium be observed between too credulous Jealousy and stupid Indolence. THEODOSIUS the younger, a Christian Emperor, who frequently consulted the Bishops, fixing the Conjectures of a Wife's Guilt, according to the Manners of the Age in which he lived, thought it sufficient for authorizing a Divorce, that the Wife went to eat with other Men against her Husband's Prohibition, or without his Knowledge; that she lay abroad without good Reasons, except at a Father's or Mother's House; or appeared at the publick Shows against her Husband's Will. JUSTINIAN added the following Cases, if a Woman designedly caused herself to miscarry; if she bathed with other Men, or talked of Marriage with another Man. See Code, Lib. V. Tit. XVII. De Repudiis, &c. Leg. VIII. and XI. But ought our Saviour's Words, Saving for the Cause of Adultery, to be taken so rigorously, that this should be the only Reason capable of quieting the Conscience of a Man who puts away his Wife? Those who acknowledge no other, urge the Terms of the Original, employed here, or in the other Evangelists, Παρεκτός λόγου πορνείας, ἐκτός, εἰ μὴ, &c. But we may understand this Exception, as ORIGEN doth, (Hom. in MATTHEW VII.) so as to make it contain but one Example of the Cases in which a Divorce is allowed. It is not uncommon, both in human and divine Laws, to specify only the most common Cases, from which we ought to infer others not expressed. See Exod. xxi. 18, 19, 20, 26. Deut. xix. 5. The Matter will be still more plausible, if, as may be done, we explain the Words in St. MATTHEW v. 32. Παρεκτός λόγου πορνείας, Whoever shall put away his Wife, when there is no Cause of Adultery, &c. and if in Chap. xix. 9. instead of εἰ μὴ ἐπὶ πορνείῃ, as it is in the common Editions, we read μὴ ἐπὶ πορνείῃ, as it is in that of Complutum, and several Manuscripts used by Dr. MILLS; that is, not for Cause of Adultery. For such Sort of Expressions, which the Syriack Version seems to have imitated in the two Passages quoted, rather imply an Example than a Restriction, which still leaves the Terms intirely general. But supposing a real Exception here, the Sense will be still the same: For in all Laws, not excepting the most odious, such as penal Laws, what is established by the Legislator takes Place in all Cases, where the Reason is the same; and favourable Laws are applied to like Cases. If we rightly consider the Nature of all the Precepts of JESUS CHRIST, we shall find that Charity is their Principle and Perfection: Now Charity requires we should procure the Advantage of others, but so as to think of our own, and not be cruel to ourselves, as St. PAUL teaches, 2 Cor. viii. 13. It would be barbarous and inhuman to put away a Wife for all Sorts of Reasons; as the Pagans themselves have acknowledged. See AULUS GELLIUS, Noct. Attic. Lib. I. Cap. XVII. How much more is it the Duty of a Christian, who makes Profession of Patience, and who is commanded to love his greatest Enemies, not rashly to conceive an implacable Resentment against his Wife? But then, on the other Hand, when, for Example, she becomes guilty of Adultery, it would not be just that he should be reduced to the hard Necessity of keeping such a Wife. The Thing speaks for itself; and this perhaps is the Reason why St. MARK, Chap. x. 11. and St. PAUL, 1. Cor. vii. 10. repeating the Precept under Consideration, express it in a general Manner, without adding any Exception; supposing, in my Opinion, that such Restrictions are tacitly included in the most general Laws, by Vertue of natural Equity. And may not the same Equity authorize a Divorce in other less frequent Cases, and which, therefore, it was not so necessary to mention? Let us suppose that a Woman has attempted to poison her Husband, or killed the Children she had by him; will any Man say, that Crimes of this Nature are not as contrary to the End of Matrimony as Adultery? But Matrimony was not instituted only for the Propagation of Mankind; the mutual Assistance which is expected from that Union, is certainly to be considered as something in that State; and nothing can be more contrary to the Engagements of so close a Society, than an Attempt on the Life of one of the married Persons. In the Affair of a Divorce, the Romans considered whether the Conduct of a Wife was supportable, or not. Perhaps our Saviour had this Distinction in View; and therefore expressed the insupportable Behaviour by the Example of the most common and best known Case. The Christian Emperors, of whom we have spoken, add to Adultery, and such Actions as give just Suspicions of that Crime, some others, which, being proved, authorize a Husband to put away his Wife with Impunity: Even tho' he had not sufficient Proof, he was not absolutely forbid to put her away; but it was left to his Choice, either to keep her, or restore her Portion, or lose what he had settled on her at Marriage. The Jewish Wives were not allowed to separate from their Husbands, without the Husband's Consent; Our Saviour therefore says nothing tending toward giving them that Permission, even tho' the Husband had committed Adultery. But, by the Roman Laws, the Husband and Wife had an equal Right in this Case; for which Reason St. PAUL allows it, 1 Cor. vii. 15. JUSTIN MARTYR, who lived near the Times of the Apostles, speaking to the Roman Senate, commends a Christian Woman, who taking the Benefit of the Roman Laws, left her Husband on the Account of his Debaucheries, That she might not partake of his Crimes by remaining and cohabiting with him. Apol. 11. § 3. Edit. Oxon. But the same Father adds, that she did not proceed to this Extremity, till she had in vain done all in her Power for reclaiming her Husband. And if we thoroughly examine what St. PAUL says in the Chapter last quoted, we shall be convinced that our Saviour's Words are to be understood only of the Marriage of two Christians; for it is in Regard to such that the Apostle says he hath a Command from the LORD: As to others, he expressly declares, that the LORD had given no Orders about them; as St. AUGUSTIN observes, Epist. LXXXIX. In Reality, among Christians, even tho' one of the married Persons has committed a great Fault, the other ought not early to despair of a Reformation, while the criminal Person remains in the Profession of Christianity. As to what our Saviour says, that he who puts away his Wife for some slight Reason, causeth her to commit Adultery; the Term  $\mu\omicron\iota\chi\acute{\alpha}\sigma\theta\alpha\iota$  in the Original, does not properly signify Adultery; it stands for all Sort of Immodesty in general, and most commonly for simple Fornication; so that, if it is rightly translated Adultery, where the Scripture speaks of a married Woman, it does not thence follow, that it is to be so understood in this Place, where our Saviour speaks of a Woman divorced, who, consequently, was no longer tied to her Husband, according to the Law of MOSES: His Meaning therefore is, that a Man who puts away his Wife for slight Reasons, thereby exposes her, as much as in him lies, to the Danger of leading an abandoned Life, because divorced Wives seldom find other Husbands. St. AMBROSE had this Thought, when he said, How dangerous is it to expose the frail Age of a young Woman to the World! On LUKE XVI. Lib. VIII. p. 1754. Edit. Paris. 1569. In the following Words, And he who shall marry the divorced Woman, committeth Adultery, our Saviour still speaks of a Woman divorced by her Husband, remaining a Christian, and consequently, whose Reformation may be hoped; for the Law of MOSES being then in Force, as has been observed, it would have been too severe to treat all who should marry a divorced Wife as Adulterers; supposing, for Example, such a Woman's Virtue being in Danger, a Man married her out of Compassion, would not this rather have been a commendable Action? We are therefore to understand the Words of JESUS CHRIST, as spoken of him, who marries a divorced Woman, before all Means are tried for reconciling her with her Husband, as the Apostle St. PAUL directs, 1 Cor. vii. 11. or, which is still worse, of those who falling in Love with other Men's Wives, endeavoured to get them into their Hands by a Divorce. To this relates what our Saviour says, MATT. xix. 9. where he explains himself more at large, He who shall put away his Wife, and marry another, &c. For both he who marries a divorced Woman, thereby hinders her from returning to her Husband, who cannot after that take her again if he would; and the Husband of the divorced Woman, as soon as he marries another, gives Reason to believe he was not disposed to receive the former again, and thus gives her an Occasion, as far as in him lies, to abandon herself to an immodest Life, or engage with another Husband; for thus we are to understand the Word  $\mu\omicron\iota\chi\acute{\alpha}\tau\alpha\iota$ , which is rendered committeth Adultery; but which ought to signify the same as  $\pi\omicron\tau\epsilon\acute{\iota}\ \mu\omicron\iota\chi\acute{\alpha}\sigma\theta\alpha\iota$ , maketh her commit Adultery in the parallel Text of the same Evangelist, according to the Stile of the Hebrews, who directly attribute to any one what he gives Occasion to, by some Action of his own. See Rom. viii. 26. Galat. iv. 6. Besides, when St. PAUL says, 1 Cor. vii. 39. that The Wife is bound by the Law as long as her Husband liveth, he doth not there speak of a Divorce. The Apostle designs only to prove, that the Tie of Marriage doth not subsist after the Husband's Death; and therefore the Woman may then marry again. The same Apostle saying the same Thing, Rom. vii. 1, 2. tho' with a different View, speaks of the Law of MOSES: Now it is certain, that, according to the Law of MOSES, a Woman was at Liberty to marry again when she had been divorced, and consequently, before the Death of her Husband. This is the Substance of what our Author says, in his Notes on the New Testament. Whence it appears, that his Notions were not entirely the same, as when he wrote the Work before us, tho' he since made no Alteration in this Place. From all we have seen it follows, that in the Passages of the Gospel which he quotes in his Margin, to shew that our Saviour JESUS CHRIST prohibited Polygamy by one of his Laws, he speaks only of a Divorce; and that in Opposition to the false Notions of the Jews, who thought it allowable in Conscience for every Cause. MATT. xix. 3. Thus we find that our Author, in his Treatise of The Truth of the Christian Religion, first published in 1639; that is, about two Years before his Notes on the New Testament, when he speaks of the Marriage of one Man and one Woman, having observed, that There were but few Nations among the Pagans where Men were contented with one Wife, like the Germans and Romans; adds only, that the Christians observe this Manner of Marrying, Lib. II. § 13.

And in the Notes he quotes no one Passage of the Gospel, but only those Words of Saint PAUL, 1 Cor. vii. 4. The Wife hath not Power of her own Body, but the Husband; and likewise the Husband hath not the Power of his own Body, but the Wife. In his posthumous Notes on the Epistles, he explains those Words agreeably to the Sequel of the Discourse, as implying only the Right which a Wife has to require that her Husband refuse her not the conjugal Duty; because by Vertue of Marriage she enters into a Society with him, which demands the reciprocal Use of their Bodies: But it doth not thence follow, that a Husband may not have more than one Wife; for Societies are not always formed on an equal Foot. So that our Author here applies the Words of St. PAUL, by Way of Accommodation only, and to shew that Christians have renounced Polygamy, rather with a View of following the Spirit and Genius of the Gospel, which directs us to avoid what may easily be abused, than that of obeying any express Law of our Saviour or his Apostles. See Mr. LE CLERC, Hist. Eccles. Prolegom. Sect. III. Cap. IV. § 5. Num. 9. p. 162. It is not at all probable, that JESUS CHRIST designed to oblige such as had several Wives before they became his Disciples, to dismiss them all but one. And when the political Laws of MOSES were tacitly abrogated by the Destruction of Jerusalem, and the Jewish Government; as the Jews and Christians were dispersed through the Roman Empire, where a Plurality of Wives was not allowed; it was not to be apprehended that the Christians would revive the Practice of the Jewish Nation, which is yet less to be feared at present, since all the Laws both Civil and Ecclesiastical have so long prohibited Polygamy.

[8] Oneirocrit.

[9] Institut. Divin. Lib. VI. Cap. XXIII. That Father adds in the same Chapter, that A mutual Fidelity is to be observed; and that the Wife is to be taught Chastity, by (her Husband's) Example, it being unjust to require that of her, which he himself cannot perform. We have the same Thought in GREGORY NAZIANZEN, How do you demand, and make no Return? [Orat. XXXI. p. 500. Edit. Colon. seu Lips.] St. JEROME observes, that The Laws of CHRIST differ from the Laws of the Emperors; and the Precepts of St. PAUL from those of PAPINIANUS. The latter give a Loose to the Debaucheries of Men, and condemning only Fornication with free Women, and Adultery, allow of carnal Conversation with Slaves in publick Brothels; as if the Quality of the Person, not the Will made the Crime. Among us Men have no more Liberty than Women; but both are subject to the same Laws. Ad Ocean. (Tom. I. p. 198. Edit. Basil.) GROTIUS.

[10] Several wise Men of Antiquity have likewise preferred the Marriage of one Man to one Woman to Polygamy. EURIPIDES maintains, that It is not decent for one Man to command two Wives; and that, Whoever would have his Family well governed, ought to be content with one Partner of his Bed. Andromach. (ver. 177, &c.) And in the same Tragedy, the Chorus says, I shall never approve of two Beds at the same Time, or the Offspring of two Mothers, both living, which occasion Contention and dreadful Discontents in a Family. Let a Man be content with one chaste Partner of his Bed. In States Men are not better governed by two than by one: The Multiplicity of Masters make the Yoke heavier, and causes Seditions among the Citizens. The Muses themselves take a Pleasure in raising Quarrels between two Poets. At Sea it is better that one Pilot, tho' less skillful, should steer the Ship, than that it should be conducted by two, or a Company of able Hands. Let one Power govern the House and the State, if you would enjoy Tranquillity and Happiness. Ver. 464, &c. In PLAUTUS'S Mercator, one of the Actresses reasons thus, A Wife, if she is honest, is content with one Husband; why then should not a Husband be satisfied with one Wife? (Act. IV. Scen. VI. ver. 8.) GROTIUS.

If we judge of this Question independently of the Civil Laws, it is certain it will frequently happen that a Man that cannot use the Liberty of Polygamy and Divorce, without sinning against some Virtue, and engaging himself in great Inconveniences; in Consideration of which the Prudence of Legislators has required an intire Prohibition of a Plurality of Wives, and Divorces, except in certain Cases, and for certain Reasons. But it cannot thence be inferred, that the Thing is evil in itself, according to the Law of Nature. All that can be said is, that it is one of those Things in different in their own Nature, which may be easily abused, like Play, and several other Diversions, from which it is safest to abstain, how little so ever we find our selves inclined to make a bad Use of them. See what I have said farther on this Subject, in my third Note on Book I. Chap. 1. § 15. and Note 3. on § 17.

[11] Thus St. AMBROSE, speaking of Polygamy, says, that GOD, in the terrestrial Paradise approved of the Marriage of one with one, but without condemning the contrary Practice; because Sarah said to Abraham, Behold now the LORD hath restrained me from Bearing: I pray thee go in unto my Maid; it may be that I may obtain Children from her. And Abraham hearkened to the Voice of Sarah, &c. Lib. I. De Abraham. Cap. IV. GRATIAN has inserted this Passage, and another to the same Purpose, in the Canon Law, Caus. XXXII. Quest. IV. (C. III.) Cujus arbitrium aliqua sequatur, &c. GROTIUS.

That Father had good Reason for saying Polygamy was not prohibited in Abraham's Time; but then he ought not to call it Adultery (Adulterium) as he doth, in Regard to that Time; much less advance, that Adultery was then allowed. Here is at least a great Confusion of Ideas, and such a Want of Exactness in the Expression, as may lead an ignorant Reader into an Error.

[12] De morib. German. Cap. XVIII. The Historian adds, Except a small Number, who marry several Wives, not out of Lust, but for State. From which Words it appears, that tho' this Practice was uncommon among the Germans, there were yet some Examples of it; so that it was rather a Fashion, than a Thing looked on as unlawful.

[13] See BRISSON, De Regno Persarum, Lib. II. p. 229, &c. Edit. Sylburg. 1595.

[14] STRABO, Geogr. Lib. XV. p. 1041. Edit. Amst. (714. Paris.)

[15] To these add the Thracians, concerning whom we have some Verses of MENANDER. [In STRABO, Lib. VII. p. 455, 456. Edit. Amst. 297 Paris.] and of EURIPIDES, in his Andromache, (v. 214, &c.) GROTIUS.

[16] Among the Aegyptians the Priests marry but one Wife; but other Men as many as they please. DIODORUS SICULUS, Lib. I. Cap. LXXXI p. 51; Edit. H. Steph. Our Author, who quotes this Passage in his Margin, refers likewise, in a little Note, to HERODIAN, Lib. II. He certainly means HERODOTUS; for the former Historian says nothing on this Subject; and the latter treats at large of the Manners of the Aegyptians, in his second Book. But then he tells us the direct contrary; for, having spoken of the Aegyptians, who live beyond the Marshes, he remarks, that Those who lived in the Marshes observe the same Customs as the other Aegyptians; and among others, that of each having but one Wife, like the Grecians. Cap. XCII. Let the Learned consider how to reconcile these two Historians, or which of them is to be credited.

[17] ATHENAEUS, Lib. XIII. Cap. I.

[18] See his Life in DIOGENES LAERTIUS, Lib. II. § 26. Edit. Amst.

[19] As EURIPIDES, quoted by AULUS GELLIUS, Noct. Attic. Lib. XV. Cap. XX.

[20] Above five hundred Years. Spurius Carvilius Ruga was the first who divorced his Wife on the Account of Barrenness. See DIONYSIUS HALICARNASSENSIS, Antiq. Rom. Lib. II. Cap. XXV. p. 93. Edit. Oxon. (96. Sylburg.) VALERIUS MAXIMUS, Lib. II. Cap. I. Num. 4. AULUS

[21] AULUS GELLIUS, Noct. Attic. Lib. X. Cap. XV.

[22] St. AUGUSTIN says, It is objected against Jacob, that he had four Wives; to which he answers, which, when a Custom, was not a Crime. Lib. XXII. contra Faustum. Cap. XLVII. GRATIAN has inserted this Passage in the Canon Law, (Caus. XXXII. Quaest. IV. Can. VII.) but has put the Name of St. AMBROSE instead of that of the true Author. GROTIUS.

In the Edition published by the PITHOU, this Passage is restored to its true Author, from the antient Manuscripts. THEODORET also is quoted, who says, that in Abraham's Time, Polygamy was forbidden, neither by the Law of Nature, nor by any written Law, Quaest. XLVII. in Genes.

[1] See § 3. of this Chapter, Note 2.

[2] Ea, in quibus vitium durat in effectu. Our Author, in his Note on MATTHEW xxii. 30. where he likewise treats of this Subject, expresses himself thus, Ubi nulla turpitude est permanens. We shall explain his Thought by a familiar Example. He who possesses another Man's Goods, which he has acquired unjustly, doth ill, not only in stealing, or otherwise seizing them, but also in keeping them; so that, every Time he makes Use of such Goods which do not lawfully belong to him, he commits an Act of Injustice. The Turpitude is in this Case fixed, as I may say, to the Thing itself, and every Act of the unjust Possessor in Regard to it. But it is not the same in Relation to a Son, who being of sufficient Age for regulating his own Conduct, marries without the Consent of his Parents. He may have done ill in taking this Step, but the Moment the Marriage is concluded and agreed, the Evil that there may have been in the Engagement ceases, if there be nothing else that renders it criminal or dishonest. The Consent of Parents is an exterior Thing, which doth not enter into the Essence of the Contract of Marriage, except some Civil Law gives it that Force.

[3] The Roman Law speaks thus on this Occasion, Yet so that, if they are under the Power of Parents, they gain their Consent. For both civil and natural Reason speak the Necessity of so doing. Institut. Lib. I. Tit. X. De Nuptiis.

[4] Nay, farther, the Will of the Grandfather, if he be free, has in this Case more Force than the Will of the Father who is a Slave. This is determined by the Canon Law, Caus. XXXII. Quaest. III. Canon unic. GROTIUS.

[5] An emancipated Son may marry, even without his Father's Consent, and his Son shall inherit his Estate. DIGEST. Lib. XXIII. Tit. II. De ritu nuptiarum, Leg. XXV.

[6] If a Grandson marries, the Consent of his Father is also requisite; but the Will and Authority of the Grandfather alone is sufficient for the Marriage of a Grand-Daughter. Ibid. Leg. XVI. § 1. See CUJAS, Recit. in Jul. Paul. Tom. V. Opp. Edit. Fabrott. and ANTONIUS FABRIUS. Jurisprud. Papinian, Tit. IX. Princip. IV. Illat. 2, & 4.

[7] For it is not suitable to the Modesty of a Virgin to chuse a Husband, says St. AMBROSE, De Abraham. Lib. I. Cap. ult. This Sentence is by GRATIAN inserted in the Canon Law, Caus. XXXII. Quaest. II. (Can. XIII.) DONATUS, in his Commentary on TERENCE's Andria, (Act. IV. Scen. IV. ver. 2.) observes, that the Word Jubeam is properly used in that Place, because the chief Power, in Regard to the Marriage of a young Woman, is in her Father. EURIPIDES makes Hermione say, Her Father shall have the Care of her Marriage, and that, it is not her Business to make a Choice. (Androm. ver. 987.) Hero tells Leander, that She could not marry him, because her Parents were unwilling. MUSAEUS, (ver. 179, 180.)

[8] Declam. CCLVII. p. 470. Edit. Burman. Our Author, in a Note on the Gospels, which I have already quoted, says, that in Reality Children are in nothing obliged to shew more Deference to the Will of their Parents, than when their Marriage is concerned; as ARISTOTLE somewhere observes. But adds, that there are some Circumstances, which form a reasonable Exception in this Case. If Parents, out of a Principle of Hatred, Covetousness, or influenced by some other Passion, are wanting in their Duty to their Children, would it be just that they should therefore be deprived of their natural Liberty? By the Roman Law, if a Daughter, twenty-five Years old, married without the Consent of her Parents, who delayed to provide her with a Husband, or even sinned against her own Body, she was reckoned innocent in Regard to them, who were not allowed to disinherit her on that Account. NOVELL. CXV. Cap. III. § 11. We know likewise what Care St. PAUL would have taken for avoiding the Inconveniencies of Incontinence, 1 Cor. vii. 9. See PUFENDORF, B. VI. Chap. II. Paragr. last.

[9] ENGRAPHIUS, in his Comment on the Andria, Act. I. Scen. V. says, It is evident, that Children may follow their own Will in disposing of themselves in Marriage. And CASSIODORE thinks it hard to lay a Restraint in the Affair of Matrimony, from which Children are to be born. Variar. Lib. VII. Cap. XL. GROTIUS.

[1] See Note 7. on Paragraph 9. of this Chapter.

[2] Consult the Note last referred to.

[1] We may be convinced of this, on reading the subtile Reasons offered for it by two Authors, who have taken great Pains to establish Principles drawn from the Law of Nature, for the Solution of this Question. The first is MOSES AMYRAUT, in a French Treatise, entitled, Considerations on the Laws by which Nature has regulated Marriages, printed at Saumur, Anno 1648: The other is LAMBERT VELTHUYSEN, in his Tractatus Moralis de naturali Pudore, & dignitate Hominis; in quo agitur de Incestu, Scortatione, Voto coelibatus, Conjugio, Adulterio, Poligamia, & Divortiis, &c. Tom. I. of his Works, printed at Rotterdam in 1680. See also a Dissertation by Mr. THOMASIIUS, De fundamentorum definiendi causas matrimoniales hactenus receptorum insufficientia; printed at Hall in Saxony, 1698.

[2] But why do not near Relations marry? Is it with a View of multiplying Alliances by Inter-marriages? Quaest. Rom. Quaest. CVIII. p. 289. Tom. II. Edit. Wech.

[3] For a strict Regard has been had for Charity, that Men, to whom Concord is both useful and honourable, might be united by the Tie of a Variety of Friendships; and not that one Man should have several Wives in one Family, but that the Women should be dispersed among several Families for the improvement and strengthening of a social Life. De Civit. Dei. Lib. XV. Cap. XVI. This Passage is inserted in the Canon Law, Caus. XXXV. Quaest. I. Can. 1.

PHILO the Jew employs the same Reason, where he speaks of the Marriage of Brothers and Sisters. Where is the Necessity, says he, of restraining mutual Friendships and Intermixtures of People, and confining to the narrow Bounds of one Family a Communication so considerable and beneficial, which is capable of being extended and diffused to Continents, Islands, and even through the whole World? For Affinities contracted with Strangers produce new Conjunctions, not inferior to those contracted by Blood. For which Reasons he (MOSES) prohibited many other Marriages between Relations. De Legib. Specialib. p. 780. St. CHRYSOSTOM reasons in the same Manner, Why do you streighten the Extent of Love? Why do you uselessly destroy the Foundation of Friendship, from which you might have Occasion to make another Friendship, by marrying a Wife out of another Family? On 1 Cor. xiii. 13. GROTIUS.

- [4] If the Deceased left a Brother, he was obliged to marry the Widow. Deut. xxv. 5. But in other Cases the Law forbids marrying a Brother-in-Law. Levit. xviii. 16.
- [5] See DEMOSTHENES's Orat. ad Leochar. as also the Rhetorician CURIUS FORTUNATIUS, (Art. Rhet. Schol. Lib. I. p. 49 inter Antiq. Rhet. Latin. Edit. Paris. 1599.) and DONATUS, on TERENCE, Phormio, Act. I. Scen. II. (v. 75. and Adelph. Act. IV. Scen. V. ver. 17, 18.) GROTIUS.
- [6] See our Author's Note on MATT. i. 16. and SAMUEL PETIT. Leg. Attic. Lib. VI. Tit. I.
- [7] The Question turns on Inheritance of Lands, and the nearest Relation was obliged to marry such Heiresses. See Numb. xxxvi. 8.
- [8] See PUFENDORF, B. VI. Chap. I. § 32. Note 2.
- [9] DIGEST. Lib. XXIII. Tit. II. De Ritu Nuptiarum, Leg. XIV. § 3. PHILO the Jew reasons very well on this Subject, when he says, It is a most enormous Crime to defile a deceased Father's Bed, which ought to be kept untouched, as a Thing sacred: To pay no Respect to the Age and Name of a Mother: To be the Son and Husband of the same Woman, and the Father and Brother of her Children. De specialibus Legib. (p. 778.) GROTIUS.
- [10] See PLUTARCH, De Stoicorum repugnantiiis, p. 1044, 1045. Tom. II. Edit. Wech.
- [11] DIGEST. Lib. XXIII. Tit. II. De ritu Nuptiarum, Leg. LXVIII. See likewise Lib. XLVIII. Tit. V. Ad Leg. Jul. de Adult. &c. Leg. XXXVIII. § 2.
- [12] The Philosopher says he is sensible, that Those who offend against this Law, violate many others. Memorabil. Socrat. Lib. IV. Cap. IV. § 20.
- [13] PHILO observes, that GOD punished them for this Crime with perpetual Wars, and the horrible Spectacle of Brothers killing one another. (De special. Leg. p. 779. Edit. Paris.) St. JEROME attributes the same Crime to the Medes, Indians, and Ethiopians. Lib. II. advers. Jovinian. (p. 75. Tom. II. Edit. Basil.) In the Andromache of EURIPIDES, Hermione speaks of this Custom as generally established among the Barbarians; and adds, that They spare not the Blood of Persons the most dear to them, no Law prohibiting any of those Acts, (ver. 173, &c.) GROTIUS.
- As to the Persians, among whom the Magi, in particular, approved of and practised this Kind of Incest, See DIOGENES LAERTIUS, Prooemium, § 7. Edit. Amst. with the Notes of his Interpreters: As also QUINTUS CURTIUS, Lib. VIII. Cap. II. Num. 19. and the Note of PITISCUS on that Place; who mentions a great Number of Authors speaking on the same Subject.
- [14] MICHAEL EPHEMUS, in Ethic. Nicom. V. 10.
- [15] Here our Author mistakes one Pythagorean for another. This was the Saying of Hipparchus, as recorded by STOBÆUS, in his Opuscul. Mytholog. Physic. Ethic. Amstel. 1688. p. 670.
- [16] Pharsal. Lib. VIII. ver. 402, &c.
- [17] Ibid. ver. 409, 410.
- [18] Memorab. Socrat. Lib. IV. Cap. IV. § 22.

[19] After having debauched innumerable Virgins, and abused Matrons, has Jupiter conceived an infamous Passion, even for his own Mother? &c. Adv. Gentes, Lib. V. p. 161, 162. Edit. Salmas. 1651.

[20] PLINY speaks of a Horse, which, being made to leap its Mother, ran away affrighted as soon as he knew what he had done; and of another which in the same Case fell on the Groom; from which the Historian concludes, that Even Beasts have some Knowledge of the Degrees of Kindred. Hist. Nat. Lib. VIII. Cap. XLII. We find something of the same Nature in VARRO, De Re Rust. Lib. II. Cap. VII. in ANTIGONUS CARYSTIUS, De mirabil. (Cap. LIX.) and in ARISTOTLE's Treatise, which bears the same Title, (p. 1150. Tom. I. Edit. Paris.) GROTIUS.
But see SELDEN on this Question, De Jure Nat. & Gent. juxta discipl. Ebraeorum, Lib. I. Cap. V. p. 68. Edit. Argentor.

[21] Ver. 914, 915.

[1] But the critical and well grounded Remark, made by our Author in the following Paragraph, destroys the whole Force of the Consequence here drawn. For if it be once acknowledged, that some of the Things prohibited in this Chapter of Leviticus, were not Sins in the Canaanites, tho' the general Term all is used, when the Question turns on such or such a Degree of Consanguinity or Affinity, if we see nothing in it that renders it unlawful by the Law of Nature, we may reasonably doubt whether it be not one of those which ought to be excepted; so that it cannot thence be inferred, that it was forbidden by a divine, positive, and universal Law; the Publication of such a Law is in itself very difficult, not to say impossible to prove. For an uncertain Tradition doth not to me seem sufficient for obliging Men to receive a Thing, as having the Force of Law. I should rather say, that the Vices of the Canaanites, for which MOSES declares GOD would punish them, did not consist so much in incestuous Marriages, as in an unbridled Debauchery, which made them transgress almost every Law of Marriage, and put them on satisfying their carnal Desires with the first Persons they met, such as commonly are those with whom one has some Relation or Affinity, and with whom, on that Account, one converses most. Thus the incestuous Corinthian had his Father's Wife, 1 Cor. v. 1. not that he was married to his Mother-in-Law, which the Laws probably did not allow, but because he lived with her as if she had been his Wife, either after his Father's Death, or after she had been divorced. Besides, it is possible that the Canaanites might think, no Matter on what Grounds, that Marriage, in most of the Degrees here mentioned, was unlawful, or even prohibited by their Laws; and this was sufficient to render them culpable, and deserving of the Chastisements of the Divine Vengeance, even tho' it be supposed, that some of those Degrees have nothing in themselves which makes Marriage unlawful according to the Law of Nature alone.

[2] TERTULLIAN supposes it, when he says, I do not maintain, that, according to the Law of the Creator, a Man is not allowed to have his Father's Wife. Let him in this Case follow the religious Discipline of all Nations. Adv. Marcion. Lib. V. (Cap. VII.) GROTIUS.

The Law of Charondas here mentioned, as the learned GRONOVIVS justly observes, did not forbid a Man to marry his Mother-in-Law; but second Marriages, as appears from DIODORUS SICULUS, Lib. XII. Cap. XII. p. 296. Edit. H. Steph. It may be added, that our Author himself, in his Excerpta ex Tragoed. & Comoed. Graecis. p. 918, has given a good Version of the Law in Question, expressed in Verse by an antient Poet unknown,

Ὅ παισὶν αὐτοῦ μητρῦιάν ἐπεισάγων,

Μήτ' εὐδοκιμείσθω, μήτε μετεχέτω λόγου

Παρθ' τοῖς πολίταις — — —

*Natis Novercam si quis induxit suis,
Expers honorum vivat atque in glorius
In Civitate — — —*

Let the Man who sets a Mother-in-Law over his Children, live without Honour and inglorious among his fellow Citizens. The following Lines contain the Reason of this Censure; on which see PUFENDORF's Reflection, B. VI. Chap. I. § 7. as also, for the Manner of reading the Passage, Dr. BENTLEY's Dissertation on PHALARIS's Epistles, p. 374, 375. I have found what gave Occasion to this Mistake, STOBÆUS thus expresses the Law of Charondas, in Prose, Ὁ μητρῦδ' ἐπιγαμῶν, μὴ εὐδόξειτω· ἀλλ' ὀνειδιζέσθω, ὥστερ' αἴτιος ὢν οἱ κείαις διαστάσεως. Serm. XLIV. The first Words literally signify, A Man who marries a Mother-in-Law. Whereupon our Author, probably deceived by his Memory, which did not retain the Sequel of the Discourse, imagined the Greek Writer was speaking of a Man who marries his Mother-in-Law; whereas the Sense is, He who marries a Woman, who thus becomes a Mother-in-Law to his Children by his first Wife; as Alestes expresses himself in EURIPIDES,

Καὶ μὴ πατήρης τοῖς δὲ μητρῦδ' τέκνοις

Alcest. ver. 305.

Our Author here quotes LYSIAS instead of ANTIGONUS, who has those very Words, in Orat. I. p. 235. Edit. Wech. 1619.

[3] PHILO the Jew says on this Occasion, Tho' the Parts are divided, they retain the Right of Fraternity, and are joined by Relation as a natural Tie. GROTIUS.

The Passage stands thus in the Original, Ἀδελφὰ δὲ, εἰ καὶ διαίρετα τὰ μέρη γεγόνασιν, ἀλλ' ὅσ'ν ἁρμόζονται τῆ φύσει καὶ συγγενείῳ μῦ. (De special. Legib. p. 780.) I have translated it Word for Word after our Author; but it is easy to perceive that his Version is not exact. Nor do I think GELENIUS had rendered it justly, Germani autem, quamvis Membra disjuncta sunt, natura tamen ac cognatione coaptantur. PHILO is there speaking of the Prohibition of marrying two Sisters, either at the same Time or successively, but both alive together. On which Occasion that Author sets forth the Inconveniencies of the Jealousy and Enmity such a Marriage would occasion between the two Sisters. It would be, says he, as if the Limbs of our Body were torn off and divided; for, adds he, tho' the Persons who have a Relation of Brotherhood subsisting between them, are really separated Limbs, they are still united by Nature and Kindred. This I take to be the Sense of the Passage; which, when thus explained, is not much to the Purpose.

[4] The People of Peru and Mexico abstained from the Marriage of Relations thus far. GROTIUS.

Our Author probably had read this in the Travels of JOHN DE LERY, Chap. XVII.

[5] But this Tradition of Precepts delivered to Adam or Noah is very uncertain, as I have already observed elsewhere.

[6] For neither do we any where find the Law, by Vertue of which Judah would have had Thamar burnt. Gen. xxxviii. 24. Thus Judith says the Shechemites were justly slain for ravishing a Virgin, Chap. ix. 2. and Jacob cursed Reuben for the Incest he had committed. GROTIUS.

The Law against Adulteresses, like several others, were founded only on the Customs of the Eastern Nations in those Times. The Slaughter made by the Sons of Jacob among the Shechemites, was by no Means a commendable Action; as our Author observes in a Note on the Passage here quoted from the apocryphal Book. See Mr. LE CLERC on the Chapter of Genesis, where this History is recorded. And the Sons of Jacob did not proceed thus by Vertue of a Law against Ravishers of a Virgin, but merely out of a Spirit of Revenge, which made them join Perfidiousness to the Action. As to Reuben, see Gen. xxxv. 22. xlix. 4.

[7] Cap. VII.

[8] It is said the Aegyptians, contrary to the common Custom of all Nations, made a Law that Brothers and Sisters should marry, in Imitation of Isis. Lib. I. Cap. XXVII. p. 16. Edit. H. Steph.

[9] This Passage is found in a Fragment preserved by St. AUGUSTIN, De Civ. Dei. Lib. VI. Cap. X.

[10] PLATO adds, καὶ αἰσχρῶν αἰσχιστά, And the most detestable of all Things. De Legib. Lib. VIII. p. 838. Tom. II. Edit. H. Steph. See my tenth Note on PUFENDORF, B. I. Chap. II. § 6.

[11] See the Chaldee Paraphrast on the Text. The Lacedemonians and Athenians made a bad Distinction in this Case, and that in several Manners. GROTIUS.

See SELDEN on this Subject, in De Jure Nat. & Gent. &c. Lib. V. Cap. XI. p. 627, 628. Edit. Argentor. and PUFENDORF, B. VI. Chap. I. § 34. Note 1, 2. as also SPANHEIM'S Commentary on the Works of JULIAN, p. 89, &c. and my fourth Note on the following Paragraph.

[1] Our Author's Meaning is, that since the Law is thus particular, as to the several Sorts of Sisters with whom it forbids Marriage, this is a Proof that in those Places where it doth not thus specify such Degrees as have something near those here mentioned, we are not, merely on Account of an Analogy, to extend it to what is not expressed. In Reality, as most of the Things in Question are in themselves in different, by the Consession of the most rigid Doctors, the Number of the Degrees expressly prohibited, is so large, that Care should be taken not to multiply them by Conjectures, which are often very slender, which would be laying an unreasonable Restraint on the natural Liberty of Men.

[2] The Jewish Historian is of Opinion, that Sarah was thus related to Abraham, (Antiq. Jud. Lib. I. Cap. XII.) The same Author gives us an Instance of such a Marriage since the Law of MOSES, in the Person of Herod, who married his Niece Mariamne, and promised his Daughter to his Brother Pheroras. See Antiq. Jud. Lib. XIV. and XVI. Andromeda had been promised to Phineus, her Uncle. OVID, Metamorph. Lib. V. (ver. 10.) Such Marriages were prohibited among the Romans, before the Reign of Claudius. That Emperor allowed of them; Nerva renewed the Prohibition; and Heraclius removed it again. GROTIUS.

Sarah was not Abraham's Niece, but his Sister by the same Father. This is evident from the Patriarch's own Words, Genesis xx. 12. on which see Mr. LE CLERC. In Suetonius's Life of Claudius, Cap. XXVI. And Tacitus, Annal. Lib. XII. Cap. V. VI. VII. we find what induced the Emperor Claudius to get a Law passed for allowing a Man to marry his Niece; that is, his Brother's Daughter, for the Permission extended no farther, nor did it take Place in the Provinces of the Roman Empire; as Mr. NOODT proves in his Observ. Lib. II. Cap. V. tho' Mr. REYNOLD, Professor at Frankfort on the Oder, has undertaken to refute him on this Subject, in his Varia. Jur. Civil. Cap. XXII. Nerva, who, according to XIPHILIN, (p. 241. Edit. Steph.) by a Law forbid marrying a Niece, ἀδελφίδην, meant only a Sister's Daughter by that Term; as has been shewn by CUJAS, Observ. XIII. 16. and several other learned Interpreters after him. I do not find that Heraclius made any Law about this Matter. That Emperor indeed married Martina, his Brother's Daughter, for his second Wife; as we are assured by ZONORAS, in his Life, Tom. III. CEDRENIUS, p. 335, 354. Edit. Basil. 1566. PAUL DIAC. Hist. Lib. XVIII. p. 551, &c. Edit. Basil. 1569. and others.

The Translator of these Notes begs Leave to make a short Observation on the learned Mr. BARBEYRAC's Assertion, viz. that Sarah was Abraham's Sister by the same Father; which he thinks evident from the very Words of that Patriarch here referred to. As to the Expression itself, She is the Daughter of my Father, but not the Daughter of my Mother, it is not necessary it should be taken literally, according to our own Way of speaking; nothing being more common in the Scripture than to call any near Relation Sister; a Grandson or Grand-daughter, Son or Daughter; and a Grandfather, Father. Add to this, that we no where read, that Terah, Abraham's Father, left any Female Issue. JOSEPHUS expressly tells us, that Haran had three Children, Lot, Sarah, and Milcha, Antiq. Lib. I. Cap. VII. toward the End. And in the Beginning of Chap. VIII. he calls Lot the Brother of Abraham's Wife, but makes no Mention of Iscah, one of Haran's Daughters, mentioned Gen. xi. 29. whence several antient Christian Writers have concluded the same Person meant under the two Names of Iscah and Sarah.

[3] Annal. Lib. XII. Cap. VI. Num. 4.

[4] I find nothing on the Subject in that Orator. It is very probable our Author has put one Name instead of another; for we have a very plain Example of this Kind in DEMOSTHENES's Oration against Leochares, where it is related that Midylides proposed marrying his Daughter Clitomache to his Brother Archiades, who declined the Offer, because he was not disposed to marry. p. 671. Edit. Basil. 1572: which evidently supposes such Matches allowable at that Time. The same Orator elsewhere speaks of one who married his Sister's Daughter. Orat. in Neaeran. p. 517. Nor are we to be surprized, that this Degree was not prohibited at Athens, where a Man was allowed to marry his Father's Sister. See POTTER. Archeol. Graec. Lib. IV. Cap. XI. where he likewise observes, that at Lacedemon Marriages with collateral Relations, in the second Degree, were in Use; on which he produces the Example of Anaxandrides, who married his Sister's Daughter, as HERODOTUS relates, Lib. V. Cap. XXXIX.

[5] He says, that Lysias married the Daughter of his Brother Branchylus. X. Orator. Vit. p. 836. Tom. II. Edit. Wech.

[6] In the Latin Version we read a Cousin-German (Consobrina) instead of a Niece. Can. XVIII. but the Greek has ἀδελφίδην, a Sister's Daughter.

[7] The Generality of the Jewish Doctors understood them thus. See SELDEN, De Jure Nat. & Gent. juxta Hebr. Lib. V. Cap. XI.

[8] De Civit. Dei. Lib. XV. Cap. XVI. The Poet AESCHYLUS, speaking of the Danaids, calls Marriages between Cousin-Germans, Unlawful Conjunctions, by which the Race is defiled. (Supplic. p. 309, 315. Edit. H. Steph.) But the Scholiast adds, (in his Observations on the former of those Passages) that they were unlawful, because the Fathers of the Virgins were alive; as if they would have been lawful after their Death, by Vertue of the Law concerning sole Heiresses. LIVY makes Spurius Ligustinus, a Roman Citizen, say, He had married his Father's Brother's Daughter. (Lib. XLII. Cap. XXXIV. Num. 3.) See also PLAUTUS, Paenul. (Act. V. Scen. III. ver. 37.) GROTIUS.

[9] This we learn from AURELIUS VICTOR, who tells us, that Prince had so great a Regard for Modesty and Chastity, that he prohibited the Marriages of Cousin-Germans, on the same Foot with those of Sisters. (De Vit. & Morib. Imp. Rom. Cap. XLVIII. Num. 10. Edit. Pitisc.) LIBANIUS also mentions this Law. Orat. de Angariis. We have in the Theodosian Code, a like Law, made by Arcadius and Honorius, Lib. III. Tit. XII. De Incest. Nupt. Leg. III. It is well known, however, that the Emperor granted a Dispensation for such Marriages; as appears from another Law in the same Code, Lib. III. Tit. X. Si Nuptiae in Rescripto petantur, Leg. unic. The Kings of the Goths reserved to themselves the Right of dispensing in such a Degree as we see in CASSIODORUS, who gives the Form of the Dispensation, Var. Lib. VII. Ep. XLVL. GROTIUS.

In the Justinian Code we find a Law made by Arcadius and Honorius, which revokes the Prohibition of Marriages between Cousin-Germans, which had been confirmed by those Emperors in the first Year of their Reign, Lib. V. Tit. IV. De Nuptiis. Leg. XIX. See THEODORE DE MARCILLY, on the Institutes, Lib. I. Tit. X. § 4. and that excellent Interpreter of the Theodosian Code, JAMES GODEFROY, on the Laws quoted by our Author.

[10] The Council of AGDE, after an Enumeration of prohibited Marriages, and, among others, that of a Man with his Brother's Widow, adds, Which we at present prohibit, in such a Manner as not to dissolve those already contracted. This Decision is inserted in the Canon Law, Caus. XXXV. Quaest II. III. Can. VIII. Thus the Lawyer PAUL observes, that Tho' the Law forbids Contracts of Matrimony without the Consent of the Father, such Contracts, when made, are not dissolved. Recept. Sentent. Lib. II. Tit. XIX. § 2. Except it may be said, that the last Words are an Addition of Anianus. TERTULLIAN, speaking of Marriages contracted, with Persons, not Christians, says, The LORD rather requires that such Marriages should not be contracted, than that they should be dissolved. Lib. II. ad Uxorem. (Cap. II. See § 16. of this Chapter). GROTIUS.

In Regard to Marriages contracted without the Consent of the Fathers, see my fourth Note on B. I. Chap. III. § 4.

[11] In the first Edition we have the Addition of those Words, And even tho' it doth, the Nullity regards only the Acts of such as are subject to the Law, that it may lay a Constraint on them; for the Power of annulling is a Sort of Constraint. As the Paragraph ended with these Words, it is very probable that the Printers having copied the Examples of the two preceding Periods, which are an Addition that the Author had undoubtedly written in the Margin, passed on to the following Paragraph.

[12] Because the Canons decree the same Thing in Regard to two Sisters, as they do in Regard to two Brothers. Lex Longob. Lib. II. Cap. VIII. 13. GROTIUS.

[1] See PUFENDORF, B. VI. Chap. I. § the last; and a Dissertation by Mr. THOMASIVS, De Concubinato, printed at Hall in 1713.

[2] Contubernium. (See also B. I. Chap III. § 4.) The Cohabitation of Slaves was however called a Marriage in Greece, at Carthage, and in Apulia. See PLAUTUS, in the Prologue to the Casina. It is allowed the same Appellation in the Laws of the Lombards, Lib. II. Tit. XII. 10, and XIII. 3 as also in the Salic Law, Tit. XIV. § 11. But among the Jews such Marriages were not good and valid, but when the Master consented to them; as is observed by the Rabbies, on Exodus xxi. where they are mentioned. The same Regulation obtained among the Greek Christians, as it appears from St. BASIL's Canons. We see also in CASSIORE, that those who were desirous of marrying a Woman of a Condition inferior to themselves, commonly asked the Prince's Leave for so doing. Var. Lib. VII. Cap. XL. GROTIUS.

[3] In the Comedy of the Birds, where Pisthaterus calls Hercules a Bastard (νόθοος) because he was born of a foreign Woman ver. 1649, 1650.

[4] He produces the Law made by Pericles, the Athenian General, by which All such as were not born of a Father and Mother, both Citizens, should be excluded from the Government of the Common wealth: And adds, that Pericles himself suffered by this Law, for, his two legitimate Sons being dead, he had only Bastards remaining. Var. Hist. Lib. VI. Cap. X.

[5] On Aeneid VII. 284.

- [6] Cap. XVII. This is inserted in the Canon Law, Distinct XXXIV. Cap. IV. And the Council, from which it is quoted, was held in the Year CCCC. See the third and last Memoir in Favour of the legitimated Princes of France, in Tome IV. of The General Collection of Pieces relating to the Affair of the legitimate and legitimated Princes. p. 30, &c. where it is shewn that it was only before the fifth Century, that the Word Concubine was sometimes taken for a Woman with whom a Man might live with Security of Conscience, tho' he was not solemnly married to her; and thus their Children were not civilly legitimate.
- [7] St. AUGUSTIN makes it a Doubt, whether a Concubine, if she has promised to know no other Man, and is dismissed by the Person to whom she was subject, ought not to be admitted to Baptism. De Fide & Operib. (Cap. XIX.) The same Father elsewhere proposes this Question, Whether, when a Man and a Woman have carnal Conversation together, not being Husband and Wife, and this without any Design of having Children; but only for satisfying their Desires, after a mutual Engagement not to take the same Liberty with others, this Contract may not be called Matrimony? To which he replies, that It may be termed Marriage, without any Absurdity, if they have a greed to remain in that State till the Death of one of the Parties; and if, tho' they did not enter into it for the Sake of propagating their Species, they have neither avoided it, nor by any evil Artifice hindered the Birth of such Propagation. De Bono Conjugali. Cap. V. For this Reason, in the Capitularies of the Kings of France it is said, that A married Man may not have a Concubine, lest his Love for the Concubine draw his Affections from his Wife. Lib. VII. Cap. CCLV. GROTIUS.
- [8] Code, Lib. V. Tit. XXVII De natural. Liberis, Leg. III. The Lawyer PAUL says the whole Difference between a lawful Wife and a Concubine, consists in the Degree of Affection; and therefore, A Man is not allowed to have a Wife and a Concubine at the same Time. Recept. Sent. Lib. II. Tit. XX. § 1. See Mr. SCHULTING; and CUJAS, on the Title of the Code, De Concubinis, v. 26. with Mr. FABROT's Notes.
- [9] The Person to whom she was Concubine, might accuse her by the Right of a Stranger, not by that of a Husband. Digest. Lib. XLVIII. Tit. V. Ad Leg. Jul. de Adulteriis, &c. Leg. XIII. See the President BRISSON's Treatise, Ad Leg. Jul. de Adult. p. 232, 233. Edit. Antwerp. 1585. The Law was the same in Regard to a Foreigner married to a Roman Citizen; as appears from a Fragment of PAPIAN, Collat. Leg. Mos. & Rom. Tit. IV. § 5. See Mr. SCHULTING on this Question.
- [1] Institut. Tit. I. § 1. The Valerian Law forbid the Execution, or Whipping of such as appealed to the People; but decreed no other Penalty for those who violated that Law, than that of declaring them guilty of a bad Action. LIVY is of Opinion, that Sentiments of Honour and Probity had in those Days so strong an Influence on the Minds of Men, that a bare Declaration of that Nature seemed sufficient for preventing the Violation of the Law. (Lib. X. Cap. IX. Num. 5, 6.) The Furian Law prohibited the receiving of any Legacy or Gift on the Account of Death, exceeding a certain Sum (about 200 Crowns) plus quam mille Assium, some Persons excepted; and whoever took above that Value, was fined four Times the said Sum. ULPIAN, as above quoted, § 2. MACROBIUS defines an imperfect Law, that which orders no Penalty for the Transgressors. In Somn. Scip. (Lib. II. Cap. XVII.) By a Rescript of the Emperor MARCUS ANTONINUS, it is declared, that if an Heir hinders the Person named to that Purpose by the Testator, from Burying the Deceased, he doth ill; but then no Penalty was decreed against him. (Digest. Lib. XI. Tit. VII. De Religiosis & Sumptibus funerum, Leg. XIV. § 14) GROTIUS.
See PUFENDORF, B. I. Chap. VI § 14. with the Notes; as also FRIDER BRUMMERI, Comment. ad Leg. Cinciam. Cap. III.

- [2] Code, Lib. I. Tit. XIV. De Legibus, &c. Leg. V. Some Doctors are of Opinion, that the Rule is not without Exception, even since this Constitution of the Emperors. See VINNIUS, in his Selectae Juris Quaestiones, Lib. I. Cap. I. To whom Mr. SCHULTING likewise refers, in his Explication of the first Part of the Digest. Lib. I. Tit. III. § 8.
- [3] For this Reason Alcinous, King of the Pheacians, being made Arbitrator between the Inhabitants of Colchis, and the Argonauts, determined that If Medea had lain with Jason, she should not be restored to her Father; but if she was still a Virgin, she should be sent back to him. APOLLODORUS, Bibliothec. (Lib. I. Cap. IX. § 25. Edit. Paris, Gal.) See also APOLLONIUS, in Argonaut, and his Scholiast. GROTIUS.
- [1] On this Question, see PUFENDORF, B. VII. Chap. II. § 15, &c. And our Author's Treatise, De Imperio summarum potestatum circa sacra, Cap. IV. § 6. As also BOECLER's Dissertation, De calculo Minervae Tom. I. p. 226. &c.
- [2] Thus, according to the Canon Law, if the Conclave is not unanimous, and two Parts agreeing in their Votes, the third will not agree with them, or presumes to name another Person: He, who shall be elected and received by two Thirds of the Cardinals, is, without any Exception, to be accounted Pope by the universal Church. Decretals, Lib. I. Tit. VI. De Electione & Electi Potestate. Cap. VI. GROTIUS.
- [3] Thus the Chaldee Paraphrast, and the Rabbies understand what is said, Exod. xxiii. 2, 3: [But consult Mr. LE CLERC on that Text.] See Digest. Lib. XLII. Tit. I. De re judicatâ, &c. Leg. XXXVI. and XXXIX. and what I shall say, B. III. Chap. XX. § 4. GROTIUS.
- [4] Lib. V. Cap. XXX. Edit. Oxon.
- [5] I do not find those Words in APPIAN's History; nor have I the Excerpta Legationum in my Hands, to see whether they are taken from that Collection.
- [6] Antiq. Rom. Lib. II. Cap. XIII. p. 85. Edit. Oxon. (87 Edit. Sylb.) and Lib. VII. Cap. XXXVI. p. 428. (445 Sylb.) It is just, says he in another Place, that each Man should propose what he thinks will be to the Advantage of the Publick; and then submit to what shall be resolved by a Plurality of Voices, Lib. XI. Cap. LVI. p. 695, 696. (731 Sylb.)
- [7] Politic. Lib. IV. Cap. VIII. p. 372. See also Lib. VI. Cap. II. p. 414. Edit. Paris.
- [8] Lib. X. Cap. VI. Num. 15.
- [9] (In Symmach. Lib. I. ver. 599, 600, 607, 608.) St. AMBROSE says the same in his Epistle against Symmachus. GROTIUS.
- [10] De Exped. Cyri. Lib. VI. Cap. I. § 11. Ed. Oxon.
- [1] This is decided by the Roman Law, in the following Words, If on a Division, the Number of Voices is equal, in Causes touching Liberty, (according to the Decree of the Emperor Pius ) the Decision is given in favour of Liberty; but in other Causes for the Defendant, which ought to take Place also in publick Judgments. Decret. Lib. XLII. Tit. I. De Re Judicatâ, &c. Leg. XXXVIII. SENECA says, One Judge condemns a Man, the other clears him; in a Division of Opinions, let that prevail which shews more Mercy. Controvers. (Lib. I. Controv. V.) A little after, he observes, that Power is not odious, when it becomes superior by Mercy. See what the Emperor JULIAN says in Commendation of Eusebia. (Orat. III. p. 115. Edit. Spanh.) Even among the Jews, a Criminal was not reckoned condemned, when the Number of Judges who declared him innocent, was less only by one Voice; as the Chaldee Paraphrast assures us, on Exod. xxiii. 2, 3. Rabbi MOSES DE KOTZKI says the same. Praecept. jubent. XCVIII. &vetant. CXCIV. GROTIUS.

ZIEGLER observes here, that this takes Place chiefly in criminal Cases, where the Court ought to incline to the more merciful Side; but that in civil Affairs, the President or Dean of the Assembly sometimes turns the Scales, which, he tells us, is the Practice in Portugal, and in the Senate of Piedmont. On this Occasion he quotes ANTHONY DE GAMMA, Decis. I. Num. 12. And ANTHONY TESAURO, Decis. I. Num. 13. I know that in the Canton of Berne in Swisserland, the Magistrates have by this Means prevented this Inconveniency of Equality of Votes in all Sorts of Causes.

[2] See on this Subject BOECLER's Dissertation already quoted, and the learned GRONOVIVS's Oration on the Royal Law, p. 41. &c. of the French Translation, published in the second Edition of Mr. NOODT's Discourses On the Power of Sovereigns, &c. in 1714.

[3] In the Electra, Castor and Pollux speak thus, This shall be a Law for the future, that the Defendant be discharged when the Judges are equally divided in their Opinions. (ver. 1267, 1268). See also his Iphigenia, (ver. 1470). GROTIUS.

To which join what SPANHEIM says on the Frogs of ARISTOPHANES, ver. 697.

[4] Problem. Sect. XXIX. Num. 13. p. 813. Tom. II. Edit. Paris.

[1] For which Reason, in the Roman Senate, when any one had given his Vote, so as to include several Things, he was ordered to divide his Opinion, as we are informed by ASCONIUS, the Grammarian. In Orat. Cic. pro Milone. (Cap. VI.) We have an Instance of this Manner of proceeding in one of CICERO's Epistles. In the Affair of King Ptolomey, the House was divided, Bibulus proposed naming three Embassadors for conducting that Prince into his Dominions. Hortensius was of Opinion that Lentulus should perform this, but without an Army. Volcatius was for giving that Commission to Pompey. Whereupon it was required, that the Members should vote separately on the two Branches of Bibulus's Opinion. He pretended that, according to the Sibylline Verses, the King ought not to be re-established with an Army; this passed the more easily, because there was no Possibility of resisting the Motion; but in Regard to the three Embassadors, great Numbers voted against him. Ad Familiar. Lib. 1. Ep. II. SENECA applies this Custom to philosophical Opinions, which one approves of only in part. I am of Opinion, says he, that what is practised in the Senate, ought to be done in Philosophy. When any Man has delivered his Sentiments, part of which I like, I order the Opinion to be divided, and then follow what I approve of. Epist. XXI. I also have a Right to deliver my Opinion, I will therefore follow one, and order another to divide his Opinion. De Vitâ Beatâ, Cap. III. See likewise PLINY the younger, Lib. VIII. Epist. XIV. (Num. 15. Edit. Cellar.) GROTIUS.

[2] A celebrated Lawyer of Friesland does not agree with our Author in this Point. He requires that Regard be had to the Intention of the Opinions, rather than to the Nature of the Things declared. On this Foot, says he, those who absolve, would chuse rather to join those who are for banishing the Criminal, how innocent soever they themselves may believe him, than to suffer Sentence of Death to pass on him; and in Case of a Doubt, we ought always to incline to the most merciful Side. ULRIC HUBER, De Jure Civitatis, Lib. III. Sect. II. Cap. VI. Num. 5, 6. See the Paraemiae Juris Germ. by the late Mr. HERTIUS, Lib. III. Cap. VIII. § 3. & ult. As also the late Mr. COCEIUS's Dissertation, De eo quod justum est circa numerum suffragiorum. Sect. III.

[3] Lib. VIII. Epist. XIV. Num. 13, 14.

[4] Except. Leg. CXXIX. p. 1331. Edit. Amst. See FULVIUS URSINUS's Note on the Place.

[1] The Case is not exactly the same, as is evident; but it may serve for a Comparison.

[2] The Case is thus decided in the Roman Law, If the whole Number is reduced to one Person, it is rather allowed that he may act alone; since the Right of all devolves to one Man, and the Name of the whole Body remains. DIGEST. Lib. III. Tit. IV. Quod cujusque universit. nomine, &c. Leg. VII. § 2. See WESEMBEC on the Passage; and Lib. II. Tit. XIV. De Pactis, Leg. X. ZASIUS in Paratit. DIGEST. De Pactis. BARTOL. in Leg. I. § 3. De Albo Scribendo. BOER, Decis. I. Num. 4. ANTHONY FABER, Cod. Sab. Lib. I. Tit. III. Defin. 40. REINKING, Lib. I. Cl. V. Cap. VIII. But in this, as in the Rule concerning the major Part, the Laws often make an Exception, and require two Thirds should be present. Leg. nulli. 3. DIGEST. Tit. Quod cujusque universit. nom. Leg. nominat. XLVI. C. De Decurionibus. By the Canon Law the absent may depute some of those present to act for them. Decret. in VI. Lib. I. Tit. VI. De Electione, &c. Cap. XLVI. GROTIUS.

[1] Concerning the Right of Precedency, see M. ANTONY NATTA, Consil. DC. Num. 22. and Consil. DCLXXVIII. Num. 31. MARTIN WACHER, Consil. Caesar. in Controversia Saxonied. GROTIUS.

See a Treatise written by JAMES GODEFROY, De Jure Praecedentiae, second Edition, with large Additions, printed at Geneva, in 1664. PUFENDORF has since treated this Subject at large, B. VIII. Chap. IV. § 15. &c.

[2] Ethic. Nicom. Lib. VIII. Cap. XII. pag. 111.

[3] Code, Lib. XII. Tit. III. De Consulibus, &c. Leg. I. See also Tit. VIII. Ut Dignitatum ordo servetur, Leg. II. Tit. XLIV. De Tironibus, Leg. III. and Digest. Lib. L. Tit. III. De Albo Scribendo, and Tit. VI. De Jure immunitatis, Leg. V. GROTIUS.

[4] See JOHN FICE, *Cons. Latino. LXXVII. Num. 16. AFFLICTUS, Decis Neapolit. I. Num. 8. BARTOL. in Leg. I. DIGEST. De Albo Scrib. INNOCENTIUS, in C. Tua. De Majoritate & Obedientiâ. ANTHONY TESSAURUS I. Quaest. for. XLVIII. Num. 5. TIBERIUS DECIANUS, Resp. XIX. Num. 183, &c. INNOCENTIUS BUTR. FELIN, in C. Statuimus, Tit. De Majoritate, &c. BALDUS, in Decernimus, in 2. Notabili. C. De sacro sanctis Eccles. But above all consult AENEAS SYLVIUS, in his History of the Council of Basil. GROTIUS.*

[1] The Laws quoted by our Author in the Margin, do not speak of the Rank of Persons, nor of the Weight of their Opinions; but only of the Share each Man ought to have in the Thing to which they have a Right in common.

[2] Geograph. Lib. XIII. p. 936. Edit. Amst. (631, Paris.) The Author, or the Printers, had put Libyca instead of Cibyra, as it is in STRABO,  $\text{Κίβυρα}$ ; which Fault appears in all the Editions of this Work, published since the Addition of these Examples, which were not in the first, till mine, which was published at the Beginning of 1720.

[3] Lib. XIV. p. 980. Edit. Amst. (665, Paris.)

[4] Thus in the Treaty of Smalcald, the Elector of Saxony had two Votes. GROTIUS.

This Regulation was made in 1535, when the League was renewed for ten Years; and each of the Confederates had a Right of Voting on that Occasion, in Proportion to his Dignity and Power. See the History of the XVth Age, by the late Mr. PERIZONIUS, p. 247. where, as all through that Piece, it is to be wished he had quoted his Vouchers; tho' I do not doubt of his Fidelity and Exactness in general. I find nothing of this in SLEIDAN, History, Lib. IX. toward the End; where he speaks of the Renewing of the League.

[5] Politic. Lib. III. Cap. IX. p. 348.

[1] See B. I. Chap. I. § 14.

[2] Ὅτι δὲ νόμοι ἀγορεύουσι περὶ ἀπάντων. Lib. V. Cap. III. p. 59. All Editions before mine had ἀπαγορεύουσι, which makes a different Sense from what our Author himself gives in his Translation of the Words. Besides, the Passage does not perhaps signify precisely what he finds in it. See Mr. MURET's Commentary on it, in p. 370, &c. of a Collection, printed at Ingolstadt, in 1602.

[1] On this Question see PUFENDORF, B. VIII. Chap. XI. § 2, &c.

[2] See the Treaties of the Swiss Cantons, in SIMLER, De Repub. Helvet. (Lib I. p. 203. Edit. Elziv. 1627.) and in other Authors. SERVIUS, his Additions from the Manuscript of the Abby of Fuld, says, It was customary among the Antients, for Persons who entered into a new Family or Nation, to renounce that which they left, before they could be received into the other. On Aeneid. II. (v. 156.) MARIANA's History affords us some Instances of Persons who have declared they have disengaged themselves from the Obedience they had promised to a King. The last Example of this Kind, which is very remarkable, may be found in B. XXVIII. Chap. XIII. GROTIUS.

[3] The Law runs thus, Municipes sunt liberti & in eo loco, ubi ipsi domicilium suâ voluntate tulerunt; nec aliquod ex hoc origini patroni faciunt praejudicium, & utrobique muneribus astringuntur. Digest. Lib. L. Tit. I. Ad municipalem, & de Incolis, Leg. XXII. § 2. Where it speaks of a Freedman, who was reckoned to belong to the Place from whence his Patron or Master came, that if he settled elsewhere, he was obliged to bear Offices, both in the Place he had quitted, and where he then lived. This was a general Rule for all the Citizens of municipal Cities, (Municipia). See Code, Lib. X. Tit. XXXVIII. De Municipibus & Originariis, with CUJAS's Notes; and SPANHEIM's Orbis Romanus, Exercit. I. Cap. V. and VI.

[4] For thus the Quantity of the Contributions remained always the same; and the Inhabitants of each Place (Municipii) were not more oppressed than before.

[5] The War between the Romans and Persians, (in the Time of the Emperor Justin) was occasioned by the King of the Lazians, (named Tzathius) who had revolted from the Persians to the Romans; so that the former complained, that the Emperor drew away their Subjects, and made them his own. ZONORAS, Tom. III. in Justino Thrace. GROTIUS.

It is evident the Case is different, that here mentioned can hardly ever happen but when the Government is tyrannical, or when a large Number of People cannot subsist in the Country; as when Manufacturers, for Example, or other Workmen, have no Means left for making or vending their Goods. If the Government is tyrannical, the Sovereign is obliged to change his Conduct; and no Citizen has engaged to live always under Tyranny. If the People who go out in large Companies are forced to it by Want, this is also a reasonable Exception from the most express and formal Engagement. The natural Obligation of preserving one's Self takes Place of all Contracts; and whoever submits to a Government, does it only for his own Good and Advantage.

[6] Digest. Lib. XLIX. Tit. XV. De Capt. & Postilimin. Leg. XII. § 9. See SPANHEIM's Orbis Romanus, Exercit. I. Cap. V.

[7] Cap. XIII.

[8] Digest. Lib. XVII. Tit. II. Pro Socio, Leg. LXV. § 1.

[1] See PUFENDORF, B. VIII. Chap. XI. § 6, 7.

[2] HERACLIDES, ver. 186, &c.

[3] (Orat. De Bigis, p. 349. Edit. H. Steph.) NICETAS says, It is no Wonder if a Person who finds his own Countrymen his Enemies, applies to a publick Enemy for Friendship and Protection. Hist. in rebus Isaaci Angeli. (Cap. X.) GROTIUS.

[1] Adrogatio, quâ quis se, &c. Thus the Words stood in all the Editions before mine. I have given them thus, Adrogatio, quâ quis sui juris se, &c. and it is evident that the Author, or rather the Printer, had omitted the two Words here inserted. The Matter is too clear, and too well known, to leave any Doubt concerning the Author's Meaning; and in the following Period, Pater autem, &c. he manifestly opposes the Adoption of Son under his Father's Power, to that of a Person, who is his own Master. See the Institutes, Lib. I. Tit. XI.

[1] De morib. Germ. Cap. XXIV. Num. 3.

[2] This was formerly prohibited in Aegypt. It was allowed at Athens till Solon's Time, who by one of his Laws abolished the Practice of engaging the Body; that is, Liberty, for a Debt. PLUTARCH, in Solon, (p. 86. Edit. Wech.) The Petilian Law, among the Romans, contained the same Prohibition. GROTIUS.

The Aegyptian Law was made by King Bocchoris, and allowed the Creditors to seize only the Goods of their Debtors. DIODORUS SICULUS, who relates the Fact, Biblioth. Hist. Lib. I. Cap. LXXIX. p. 59. Edit. H. Steph. adds, that Solon imitated that Law. As to the Petilian Law, see VARRO, De Ling. Lat. Lib. VI. p. 82. Edit. H. Steph. and LIVY, Lib. VIII. Cap. XXVIII. as also what is said on PUFENDORF, B. III. Chap. VII. § 3. Note 7. of the second Edition.

[3] On this Subject see PUFENDORF, B. VI. Chap. III.

[4] These Words may be found in ATHENAEUS, Lib. VI. Cap. XII. p. 247. but our Author has put ἐπὶ σπείροις, instead of Ἐπισπίτοις. It is surprising that our Author, who quotes this Passage, taken from the Dedalus of Eubulus, should forget it in his Excerpta ex Trag. & Com. Graecis, where we have not so much as the Name of that Comedy.

The Passage of EUBULUS here quoted, is in STOBÆUS, Serm. LXII.

[5] In one of PLAUTUS's Comedies, a Slave says, he chooses to continue in that State, Because, says he, were I free I should live at my own Expence, now I live at yours. Casin. Act. II. Scen. IV. v. 14. Melissus of Spoletto, the Grammarian, would not accept of his Freedom. (SÜETONIUS, Illustr. Gramm. Cap. XXI.) GROTIUS.

[6] Deipnosoph. Lib. VI. Cap. XVIII. p. 263. Ed. Ludg. 1657.

[7] This Fact is related immediately after the Words of POSIDONIUS, produced in the foregoing Note. But STRABO tells us, that the Mariandyni were reduced to Slavery by the Milesians, who were in Possession of Heraclea. Geograph. Lib. XII. p. 817. Edit. Amst. (542, Paris.)

[1] De Benef. Lib. III. Cap. XVIII.

[2] Ibid. Cap. XXII. See B. III. Chap. XIV. of this Treatise.

[3] The Passage here referred to runs thus, Solon made a Law for the Athenians, concerning such Actions as were not to fall under the Cognizance of a Court of Judicature; according to which he allowed each Man to put his own Child to Death. But, as it has been observed, DIONYSIUS of Halicarnassus says expressly, that Among the Grecians, a Father might turn an undutiful Child out of his House, and disinherit him, but could do nothing farther. Antiq. Rom. Lib. II. Cap. XXVI. p. 93. Edit. Oxon. (98. Sylb.) He had been speaking of Solon, Pittacus, and Charondas. MEURSIUS, however, in his Themid.

Attic. Lib. I. Cap. II. produces a Passage of SOPATER, an antient Rhetorician, from whence it appears, that even Mothers had a Power over the Life of their Children; but neither that learned Man, nor FABRICIUS, who quotes him, take any Notice of the quite contrary Authority of an Historian so famous and judicious as the Grecian Author of the Roman Antiquities.

[4] I do not know whence our Author takes these Words, or whether they belong to the Rhetorician, or to the Philosopher of that Name.

[1] Code, Lib. III. Tit. XXXII. De rei vindicatione, Leg. VII. See also Lib. VII. Tit. XVI. De liberali Caussa, Leg. XLII. Consult the famous Mr. SCHULTING, on ULPIAN, Tit. X. § 8. p. 580. of his Jurisprudentia Ante-Justiniana.

[2] See Chap. VIII. of this Book, § 18. PLINY says, that among the Pigeons, the Male and the Female love their Young equally. Hist. Nat. Lib. X. Cap. XXXIV. GROTIUS.

[3] SENECA has observed, that Children belong equally to both Father and Mother, who when they have two Children, are not said each to have one, but each two. De Benefic. Lib. VII. Cap. XII. In the Laws of the Wisigoths, this Question is asked, If a Son is produced by the Concurrence of both Parents, why should he share the Condition of his Mother only, since he could not have existed without a Father? From which it is concluded, that according to the Law of Nature, Children born of two Slaves, belonging to different Masters, are to be divided equally between them both, Lib. X. Tit. I. 17. The Children of two Sclavonians followed their Father; as appears from the Speculum Saxonicum, III. 73. The same Thing was practised in some Parts of Italy. See the Decretals, Lib. IV. Tit. IX. De Conjug. Servorum. Cap. III. Among the Lombards and Saxons the Children shared the Fate of that Parent whose Condition was lowest, Spec. Saxon. I. 16. This Regulation took Place also among the Wisigoths in Spain, in ISIDORE's Time; as appears from the Canon Law, Caus. XXXII. Quest. IV. Can. XV. The Laws of the Wisigoths formally declare, that a Child born of a free Father and a Mother who is a Slave, thereby became a Slave. Lib. III. Tit. II. 3. Lib. IV. Tit. V. 7. Lib. IX. Tit. I. 16. Those who were born of two Slaves served the Masters of both their Parents equally. If there was but one Son, he belong'd to the Father's Master, on paying the Mother's Master half his Value. In Regard to those who were termed Originarii, the Father's Master had two Thirds; and the Mother's Master the other; according to the Edict of King Theodorick, in CASSIODORE, C. 67. In England a Person is either free or a Villain, (Francus aut Villanus) according to the Condition of his Father. LITTLETON, De Villanagio. See also the Book De laudibus Legum Angliae. These Laws differ from the Roman Civil Law; but THOMAS of Aquino owns they are not repugnant to the Law of Nature, (Supplement. Quaest. LII. Art. IV. in Conclus.) Even the Roman Laws were not always conformable to their Principle; for one of them declares, that whether the Father or the Mother of a Child were Foreigners, the Child was so too. ULPIAN, Tit. V. De his qui in potestate sunt. §8. GROTIUS.

The Sclavonians (Slavi) mentioned by our Author at the Beginning of this Note, are the Slaves of that Nation, who becoming very numerous by the long Wars with Germany, gave Name to all in general, who were reduced to Slavery. See a Dissertation by the late Mr. HERTIUS, De Hom. Propr. Tom. II. Comm. & Opusc. § 5. p. 161, 162. We have but little Reason to doubt that the French Word Esclave, [and so of the English Word Slave] is hence derived; as has been observed by some Etymologists. As to the Originarii, who are likewise called Adscriptitii: See JAMES GODEFROY's excellent Comment on the Theodosian Code, Lib. V. Tit. IX. p. 451, &c. Tome I. as also Mr. SCHULTING's Jurisprud. Ante-Justin. p. 380.

[4] This was established by CHARLES the Bald, Cap. XXXIV. Edict. Pist. GROTIUS.

- [5] Add here what I have said in a Note on PUFENDORF's Duties of a Man and a Citizen, B. II. Chap. IV. § 6. of the third and fourth Edition.
- [6] We have several Maxims in Scripture, which seem general, and are really so, if we consider the Terms only: but which however admit of Exceptions, which easily appear from the Nature of the Thing, and the Circumstances. Sometimes these Maxims are general only as they regard what commonly takes Place. This is the Meaning of our Author, who answers the Objection more at large in the Place quoted in the Margin.
- [1] Among the Romans tho' a Slave received his Liberty, he was still obliged to respect his Patron, (for so they called the Person who had been his Master) and the Patron could demand several Services of him, such as attending him, taking the Care of his Affairs, &c. If the Freedman failed in his Duty, and became guilty of Ingratitude to a certain Degree, he might again become a Slave to his former Master. If he died without Children, the Patron inherited his Goods; half of which the Freedman was obliged to leave him by Will. See Digest. Lib. XXXVII. Tit. XIV. De Jure Patronatus, Lib. XXXVIII. Tit. I. De oper. Libertorum, Tit. II. De bonis Libertorum.
- [2] Statu liberi; that is such as received their Liberty by Will, but on certain Conditions, and after a fixed Time; or Slaves free in Hope. The former is the Definition of the Term given by the Roman Law. Digest. Lib. XL. Tit. VI. De Statu liber. Leg. I. See ULPIAN's Fragments, Tit. II. with the Notes of Mr. SCHULTING, and others, which he has collected in his Jurisprud. Ante-Justin. p. 571.
- [3] Nexi. Persons who voluntarily made themselves Slaves to their Creditor till they could discharge the Debt. Addicti. Those who were obliged so to do by the Judge's Sentence. VARRO, De Ling. Lat. Lib. VI. p. 82. See SALMASIUS, De Modo Usurarum, Cap. XVIII. QUINTILIAN, Lib. VII. Cap. III. p. 620, 621. Edit. Burman.
- [4] Adscripti, or Adscriptii Glebae. Husbandmen, who belonged to the Lands given them, [and changed Masters with the said Lands]. The Grecians called them ὁμόδουλοι τῶν ἄγρῶν, as appears from a Passage of SOZOMEN, Hist. Eccles. Lib. IX. Cap. ult. where he applies that Term to Calemerus. Men in that State went with the Lands which they cultivated; for the Proprietor might alienate them when he alienated his Lands. But their State was not so hard as that of Slaves. See CUJAS on the Code, Lib. XI. Tit. XLVIII. De Agricolis, censitis & colonis; as also JAMES GODEFROY's Commentary on the Place in the Theodosian Code, quoted in Note 3. of the foregoing Paragraph.
- [5] Penestae. ATHENAEUS gives the following Account of their Origin from ARCHEMACHUS, an antient Historian. "A Colony of Boeotians coming into Thessaly, some of them returned into their own Country, while the rest, liking their Situation, engaged to serve the Inhabitants, and cultivate their Lands, on Condition that the Thessalians should neither drive them out of the Country nor kill them." Deipnosoph. Lib. VI. Cap. XVIII. p. 264. [That Writer says they were formerly called Μένεσται from μένω, to remain or stay; but afterwards Πενέσται]. JULIUS POLLUX ranks the Penestae with the Ilotae among the Lacedemonians; and says they were a middle State, between Freeman and Slaves, Lib. III. § 83. Edit. Amstel. DIONYSIUS of Halicarnassus compares them to the Clientes of the old Romans. But there was a wide Difference between them, as H. STEVENS proves in his Schediasm. Lib. IV. Cap. XIV. XV. XVI. where he likewise treats of the Etymology of the Word Πενέσται.
- [6] Quos manus mortuas vocant. Persons who could not dispose of their Goods by Will, without the Consent of their Patron, nor marry out of his Lands. When they died without legitimate Issue, the Patron became Heir to all their Goods, or at least to those of a certain Kind. They were called Manus mortuae, because on the Death of the Head of a Family subject to that Law, the Patron seized on the most valuable Piece of Goods he found in the House; and if there were none, the right Hand of the Deceased was cut off and presented to him. Mag. Chron. Belg. p. 153. at the Year 1123. BODIN I. De Repub. V. p. 61, 63. DES. HERALD, Rer. quotid. Lib I. Cap. X. Num. 13. p. 81.

[7] Among whom such as the English call Apprentices come nearest to the State of Slavery, during their Apprenticeship. GROTIUS. See THOMAS SMITH, De Repub. Anglic. Lib. III. Cap. X.

[8] That is, as they belong equally to the Father and Mother they ought likewise to partake equally of the Condition of both; and consequently be obliged to serve for a Time only, or in a Manner which softens the Rigour of their Fate.

[1] LIVY, Lib. I. Cap. XXXVIII. Num. 2.

[2] In his Amphitryon, where he puts these Words into Sofia's Mouth. Act. I. Scen. I. ver. 102, 103.

[3] Xerxes and Darius made this Demand on the Grecians; which QUINTUS CURTIUS calls a Piece of Insolence, Lib. III. Cap. X. See the Commentators on that Place.

[1] Thus when Ulysses came into Aegypt, some of his Companions plundering the Inhabitants, great Numbers of them were killed, and others made Slaves, as we read in HOMER, Odys. Lib. XIV. (ver. 271, 272). APOLLODORUS tells us, that Jupiter was on the Point of throwing Apollo into Tartarus for killing the Cyclops; but Latona interceding in his Favour, he only sentenced him to a Year's Slavery. Biblioth. Lib. III. (Cap. X. § 3. Edit. Paris. Gal.) GROTIUS.

[2] This appears from a Passage of CICERO, quoted by our Author in the Margin, When the People, says he, sell the Man who declined the Service, they do not take away his Liberty, but judge him not free who would not purchase his Liberty by exposing himself to Dangers. When they sell a Man, who either gives no Account of his Estate, or gives a false one, they judge, that as he who is really a Slave is excused from the Cess, so he who would not submit to it when he was free, renounces his own Liberty. Orat. pro A. Caecina, Cap. XXXIV. But the Lawyers speak thus on the Subject: For formerly such as did not appear when called on to inlist themselves, were reduced to Slavery, as Persons who had forfeited their Liberty: DIGEST. Lib. XLIX. Tit. XVI. De re militari, Leg. IV. § 10. See DUAREN, Disput. annivers. Lib. I. Cap. IV.

[3] Incensi. The Lawyers speak of them. See ULPIAN, Tit. XI. § 11. Servius Tullius, one of the antient Kings of Rome made a Law, that whoever did not give in a faithful Account of the Value of his Estate, should forfeit it, be whipt, and sold. DIONYSIUS HALICARNASSENSIS, Antiq. Rom. Lib. IV. Cap. XV. p. 212. Edit. Oxon. (221, Sylb.) LIVY speaks of this Law in the following Passage, which I shall set down, because I am of Opinion there is a Fault in the Text, Censu perfecto, quem maturaverat METU Legis de Incensis latae, cum vinculorum minis mortisque, &c. Lib. I. Cap. XLIV. Num. 1. I think it should be read metus Legis. The Assessment was not hastened by the King; but the Fear of incurring the Penalty made every one hasten to give in his Name, and Value of his Estate. This little Alteration makes the Expression at least more natural.

[4] In Lycia Thieves also were condemned to Slavery, as we learn from a Fragment of NICHOLAS of Damascus. (Excerpt. Pieresc. p. 517.) Among the Wisigoths the same Penalty was inflicted for several other Crimes, as appears from the Collection of their Laws. GROTIUS.

[5] See TACITUS, Annal. Lib. XII. Cap. LIII. SÜETONIUS, in Vespas. Cap. XI. and the Passage of ULPIAN, referred to in Note 3.

[6] See some Examples of this Kind, Chap. XIII. of this Book, § 4. with the eighth Note.

[7] Noxa caput sequitur. Crimes are personal. Thus our Author understands these Words, which frequently occur in the Roman Law, as in PAUL's Receptae Sententiae, Lib. II. Tit. XXXI. § 8. in the Digest. Lib. XIII. Tit. VII. Commodati, vel contrà, Leg. XXI. § 1. and in the Code, Lib. III. Tit. XLI. De noxalib. Action. Leg. I. But in a Sense somewhat different: For the Lawyers mean that the Action which might be brought for repairing the Damage done by a Slave, (Actio Noxalis) follows the Person of the Slave; so that if he was alienated after the Fault was committed, the Action lay against the new Master; but if the Slave was made free, he himself was liable to Prosecution. Thus the Rule is elsewhere explained. Digest. Lib. IX. Tit. IV. De Noxalib. action. Leg. XX. Institut. Lib. IV. Tit. VIII. § 5. See also Digest. Lib. IV. Tit. V. De Capite minutis, Leg. VII. § 1. and Lib. XLIV. Tit. VII. De Obligat. & Action. Leg. XIV. Code, Lib. IV. Tit. XIV. An Servus ex suo facto, post manumissionem, teneatur? Leg. IV. So that the Law here speaks neither of a Punishment, nor of the Right of perpetuating it in the Persons of the Criminal's Descendants.

[1] See Chap. III. of this Book, § 1.

[2] On this Question consult PUFENDORF, B. IV. Chap. IX.

[3] That is, who are of an Age sufficient for managing their own Affairs.

[4] Rhetoric, Lib. I. Cap. V. p. 523. Edit. Paris.

[5] The Right of Property is one Thing, and the actual Use of that Right another. The latter indeed doth not appear before the Delivery; but the Right itself is not therefore less real, and independent of the physical Power of exercising it. There is no more Necessity of being put into Possession of a Thing, in Order to be its real Proprietor, than of always keeping Possession of one's Goods, in Order not to lose the Right of Property. The Law of Nature is extremely clear in this Point; and it is owing to a Prejudice, taken from the Roman Law, which some Doctors still maintain, that the Delivery is made necessary, even according to the Law of Nature, for transferring Property. The ablest Commentators, however, are now agreed, that this is a Refinement of the antient Lawyers; for whom on other Accounts they have a great Respect. See what the famous Mr. SCHULTING says, in his Notes on the Jurisprud. Ante-Justin. p. 473.

[6] As, for Example, according to the Saxon Law. See HERTIUS, Dissert. de Conventionib. domini translativis. § 15. in Tom. III. of his Opusc. & Commentat. p. 77. and the Differentiae Juris Communis & Saxon. by Mr. MENKENIUS, at the End of the third Volume of HUBER's Praelectiones Juris Civilis, p. 8. Edit. Lips. 1707.

[7] Thus, according to the Roman Law, all Donations, above a certain Sum, were to be registered. See Instit. Lib. II. Tit. VII. De Donationibus, § 2. and the Commentators on that Place.

[8] It is a Maxim of CASSIODORE, that The Alienation of Goods requires an entire Freedom of Judgment. Var. Lib. II. Epist. XI. GROTIUS.

These Words contain the Reason why King Theodoric annulled Alienations made by a Woman, who leading a debauched Life, had left her Husband. See Chap. XI. of this Book, § 5.

- [1] For which Reason Presents may be sent to the absent by Messengers, as SERVIUS observes, on those Words of VIRGIL, Quae mittit dona. Aeneid. IX. (v. 361). GROTIUS.
- [1] See PUFENDORF on this Subject, B. VIII. Chap. V. § 9, &c.
- [2] See what I have said on B. I. Chap. III. § 11. Note 4. and § 12. Note 20.
- [3] See BALDUS and OLDRADUS, in Cap. Intellecto, &c. De Jure jurando. The same BALDUS, Cons. CCCXXVII. Num. 7. Cardinal THUSCUS, P. I. Concl. XL. Num. 1. and Conclus. DCXCIV. We have Instances of such an Alienation in FRANCIS HARAEUS, Annal. Ducum Brabant. & utriusq; Belgii, Tom. II. at the Year 1526. And in GUICCIARDINI, Lib. XVI. GROTIUS.
- [1] This is the Opinion of GAILIUS, De Pace publicâ, Cap. XV. Num. 14. See DE SERRES, Inventaire de l' Histoire de France, in the Life of Charles the Wise. [In Regard to some Towns and Countries which that Prince had granted to the English, by the Treaty of Bretigny, p. 194. Edit. Paris. in Folio, 1627.] See the same Historian, in the Life of Francis I. where he is speaking of the Dutchy of Burgundy, [which the King, being Prisoner, had promised to deliver up to the Emperor, p. 565.] GROTIUS.
- [2] That is, which is to last for ever, as far as in them lies, unless all concerned consent to some Separation.
- [3] That is, Towns, Provinces, in a Word, all the particular Bodies of which the general Body of the State is composed.
- [4] The learned GRONOVIVS pretends, that the Conclusion to be drawn from thence is directly contrary from what our Author infers. For, says he, since the Parts of a State may subsist, when separated from that Body, less Difficulty is to be made of cutting them off, than the Limbs of the human Body, which perish the Moment they are separated from it. This would be good Reasoning, if the Manner in which the Parts of a State depend on the whole Body, was the same with that in which our Limbs depend on our Body. Those Limbs are made for the Body, and their Interest can never be divided from that of the Body: But the several Parts of a Kingdom are not made for the whole Body of the State, they are connected with it only for their own Good, and by the Effect of their own Will. Beside the common Interest of the whole Body they have a particular Interest; and if the latter is to be sacrificed to the former, this is not to be done at all Times, or beyond the Engagements which they have contracted voluntarily. But no Part of the State can be supposed to have consented that the others should have a Right to make it change its Master against its Will. This is not one of those Things which is decided by a Plurality of Voices, as HERTIUS pretends, who founds an Objection on it against our Author, in his Treatise De Feudis Oblatis, Part II. § 28. Tom. II. Comment. & Opusc. p. 543, 544. For the Right of a Plurality of Votes doth not go so far as to separate those from the Body who have not broken through their Engagements and violated the Laws of Society.
- [1] See Chap. XXIV. of this Book, § 6. On this Principle the Lacedemonians formerly declared Anaxilaus innocent, who had surrendered Byzantium, being forced to it by Famine. XENOPHON, Hist. Graec. Lib. I. (Cap. III. § 12. Edit. Oxon.) The Emperor Anastasius even thanked the Governor of Martyropolis in Mesopotamia, for surrendering that Town to the Persians, when he was no longer able to defend it. PROCOPIUS, who relates this in his Treatise on Justinian's Buildings, (Lib. III. Cap. II.) elsewhere observes, that Valour and Famine cannot dwell together; nor will Nature bear, that the same Persons should want Food and act bravely. Gothic. Lib. IV. (Cap. XXIII. Hist. Miscell.) And in a Letter written by Cephaes to the Emperor Alexius, concerning the Siege of Larissa, that Commander declares his Resolution of submitting to Necessity, and the irresistible Force of Nature, in surrendering the Garrison to the Enemy, who not only besieged, but evidently starved it. ANN. COMMEN. Lib. V. (Cap. IV.) GROTIUS.

[2] De Civit. Dei, Lib. XVIII. Cap. II.

[3] HERODOTUS, Lib. VII. Cap. 132.

[1] The Body of the State has indeed no Power so to alienate one of its Parts, as to oblige it, against its Will, to acknowledge the new Master, into whose Hands they would deliver it, and give him a Right over it, without any other Title. But, this notwithstanding, the Body of the State may abandon one of its Parts, when in evident Danger of perishing by continuing united to it. The Right ought certainly to be equal on both Sides; and the Body of the State may, without Doubt, consult its own Preservation as well as that Part. It is sufficient that no direct Force be employed for putting it under another Government, and that it be allowed a Right of defending itself, if it can: In a Word, that it no longer protects it, which is all that can be reasonably required by him who has reduced the Body to so said an Extremity. Thus, in this Case, the Body of the State does not alienate the Part in Question; but only renounces a Society, the Engagements of which are at an End, by Vertue of the tacit Exceptions made by Cases of Necessity. It is in vain for our Author to pretend, that when a Part of the State divides itself from the Body, being forced by Necessity so to do, it makes Use of that Right of preserving itself which it had before the Establishment of Society; whereas the Case is not the same in Regard to the Body. This is founded on a subtile Reason, from which a false Consequence is drawn, viz. that the Body being formed only by the Establishment of Society, it had no Right before it was a Body, and consequently, had not that of preserving itself. But, tho' a moral Body has no Right precisely as a Body, before it is formed, it still has a Right to preserve itself, so far as each of the Members that compose it has such a Right. The single Persons, who enter into a Civil Society, having both a Right and a Will to preserve themselves, which they cannot do without the Preservation of the Body; they are and ought to be supposed to communicate that Right to the Body itself. The Body therefore may as lawfully divide itself, in the Manner aforesaid, from any one of its Parts, when its own Preservation requires it; as that Part might divide itself from the Body in the like Case. And it may so much the more lawfully do so, as the Part is commonly but little considerable in Comparison of the Rest of the Body. Add to this, that, according to our Author's Principle, the Part itself in Question would have no Right to separate itself from the Body of the State, even when in the last Necessity. For, in short, the Question does not turn on a bare private Person, or a Master of a Family; but on a City, or a Province, that is on a Body, which is indeed a Member of a larger Body; but at the same Time as real a moral Body, as the whole Body of the State, and consequently, had no Right, as a Body, before it was formed. After all, in the Case of Necessity here supposed, and which I own to be the only one that authorizes the Body of the State to abandon any one of its Parts; in that Case, I say, the Body would in vain endeavour to preserve and defend such a Part, being not in a Condition of preserving and defending itself. It is therefore a Misfortune, under which the unhappy Part must console itself, if it finds no Way of remedying it; and it would be highly unreasonable to expect, that the Body of the State should uselessly sacrifice itself for the Sake of such a Part. Our Author's Opinion being thus rectified, will be sheltered from the Criticism of some of his Commentators, who offer several poor Reasons for confuting it, and perplex Things according to their usual Custom.

[2] As the Objection is subtile, and not very solid, so the Answer is obscure and unsatisfactory. The Sovereignty is indeed seated in the Body of the State; but it doth not thence follow, that the Body of the State may alienate any one of its Parts against its Will. Two different Things are here confounded, the Sovereignty, and the Members of the State or of Civil Society. The Sovereignty is still Sovereignty, tho' the Number of the Members of the State decreases; as it is not the more Sovereignty merely because that Number increases. On the contrary, part of the Sovereignty may be laid down, without any Increase or Decrease of the Number of the Members of the State. Thus all that ought to be inferred from the Sovereignty's residing in the Body of the State, is, that the Body of the State may alienate the Sovereignty, or some one of its Parts; and even in that Case, there is a Necessity of the Consent of all the Members of the State, or of all the small Bodies, which compose that great Body. But in Order to know whether the Body of the State has a Right to cut off any one of its Members, and give it to another Master, we are to enquire whether there is Reason to believe, that each Member designed in this Point to subject itself to the Will of the whole Body, which is not the Case. Even the most absolute Sovereignty does not, in its own Nature, include a Power of making the Subjects acknowledge another Master against their Will; as we have observed on B. I. Chap. III. § 11. Note 4. In answer to the Objection before us therefore, it is not necessary to say, with our Author, that the Sovereignty is indivisible, and resides equally in the Members of the Body of the State, because the Question in Hand does not regard the Extent and Exercise of the Sovereignty. The very Comparison he employs, taken from that Maxim of the old Philosophy, The Soul is intire in the Body, and intire in every Part, might enable a Disputant to draw a contrary Consequence from his Principle: For the Soul is not less a Soul, tho' a Member of the Body be cut off, and it may command such a Separation, when the Good of the Body requires it.

[3] This is another subtle Answer, founded on false Ideas of the Nature and Origin of the Right of Property. While the primitive Community of Goods subsisted, if any Man who had taken Possession of a Piece of Land, had pretended, on quitting it, to convey it to another, that he might be Master of it after him; the Person to whom it was thus transferred did thereby acquire a Right, equivalent to what we call Alienation. For he who was first in Possession of the Piece of Land, had a Right to keep it as long as he pleased, and it was in his Power to dispossess himself of it, in favour of whom he thought proper. When he actually dispossessed himself of it, he thereby gave up his Right to the other, who might like wise keep it as long as he pleased. But whatever Idea is entertained of Alienation of Goods, it is out of the present Question, and our Author ought to have remembered what he had said before, B. I. Chap. III. § 12. that when a whole People is alienated, the Persons themselves are not alienated, but only the Right of governing them. And after all, it has, in my Opinion, ever been a Maxim of the Law of Nature, That every one may transfer to another, all the Right which in its own Nature may pass from one Man to another.

[1] For the same Reason the People have annulled a Discharge of Homage, granted by their King, by his own bare Authority, to a Vassal of the Kingdom. See CROMER. Hist. Polon. Lib. XXV. GROTIUS.

[2] Thus in Germany, in the Case of Alienations, the Consent of the Electors is looked on as the Consent of all the States, according to Custom, and the Agreements made on that Article. GROTIUS.

The Authors who have treated of the publick Law of Germany, are not agreed that the Consent of the Electors is sufficient for making the Alienation of some Part of the Lands of the Empire valid, whether such Alienation be made in Favour of a Foreigner, or some other Member of the Empire. See BOECLER's Note on this Paragraph, p. 220, &c. and the late Mr. HERTIUS's Dissertation De Superioritate Territor. § 91, 92, 93. Tom. II. Comment. & Opusc. p. 363, 364. as also the Juris Publici Prudentia, by the late Mr. COCCEIUS, Cap. XIV. § 9, &c.

[1] Minores Functiones Civiles. In the Summary of this Paragraph, the Author styles them Jurisdictiones minores; by which Words he means the Employments, Governments, and in general, all the civil Rights and Powers which have any Relation to the Government; or such as not being to be exercised without publick Authority, ought to be conferred by the Sovereign; so that they are exercised under his Name, however they are possessed.

[2] This Maxim is not universally true; and our Author has, with Reason, been blamed on this Score, who leaves Room for Criticism by too loose and indeterminate Expressions. An Usufructuary, (a Tenant) to whom he compares the Kings under Consideration, has only a temporary Right; and yet the Disposals by him made of the Income of the Estate which he enjoyed, subsist after the End of the Term for which he was Tenant. Laws made by an English Parliament, do not lose their Force as soon as the Parliament is dissolved, whether a new one be called or not. Our Author himself does not pretend that a King can revoke all the Acts of his Predecessors; as appears from Chap. XIV. of this Book, § 11, &c. The Principles he there lays down, will help us to discover what is his Opinion in this Place. When a King bestows any one of the Rights or Powers in Question, this is not a Contract made between one private Man and another, but a Favour granted by him as Head of the State. In order therefore to determine how far this Favour may be extended, we must examine the Extent of the Power of him who grants it. But it does not follow merely from the People's conferring the Sovereignty on any one, that they invest him with a Power of conferring a Lordship, an Office, or any other Thing of that Nature, for ever, and much less under an hereditary Title: For this may be contrary to the Good of the State; especially when the Right or Power granted is considerable. Princes themselves have sometimes found by Experience how prejudicial such Sort of Concessions have been to them; because those who have been favoured with them, have in Process of Time made themselves so great, that they have entirely shaken off the Yoke, and set up for Sovereigns. So that, unless the People either expressly or tacitly, consent to the Perpetuation or Alienation of the Rights or Powers in Question, they of themselves expire at the Death of the King who gave them; and his Successor is not bound to confirm them any farther than he pleases.

[3] Thus Darius gave Syloson the City and Island of Samos. GROTIUS.

This Example is not entirely just. Darius only drove out Meandrius, who had seized on the Government, and thus facilitated Syloson's Way to the Throne, of which his Brother Polycrates had taken Possession. The Story, with all its Circumstances, may be read in HERODOTUS, Lib. III. Cap. CXXXIX. &c. It would have been more to the Purpose to have related what CORNELIUS NEPOS says, viz. that Darius gave the Heads of some Cities in Ionia and Aeolis the perpetual Command of each respective City. Vita Miltiad. Cap. III. Num. I. See also the Life of Themistocles, Cap. X. Num. 3.

[1] See PUFENDORF, B. VIII. Chap. V. § 8, 11.

[2] The ancient Grecians gave the Name of Τέμενος, to a Portion of the publick Lands assigned to Kings. We have Instances of this in HOMER, in Relation to Bellerophon, King of Lycia, Iliad. Lib. VI. (v. 194.) In Regard to Meleager, ibid. Lib. IX. (v. 573, &c.) And in Regard to Glaucus the Lycian, Lib. XII. (v. 313, &c.) GROTIUS.

We have a memorable Passage of the Grammarian SERVIUS, on that Verse of VIRGIL,

Insuper his, campi quod Rex habet ipse Latinus.

Aeneid. IX. v. 274.

It was customary, says that Commentator, to give some Portion of the publick Lands to valiant Men, or Kings, as a Mark of Honour, as was done in Favour of Tarquinius Superbus, in the Campus Martius. Which Space HOMER calls Τέμενος. According to the Laws of Lycurgus, a King of Lacedemonia was allowed Such a Portion of the best Lands as was necessary for supporting him handsomely, without making him too rich. As we learn from XENOPHON, De Repub. Laced. Cap. XV. § 3. Edit. Oxon.

[3] Therefore they cannot alienate it, without the Consent of the States of the Kingdom. See an Instance of this in Mr. DE THOU, Hist. Lib. LXIII. at the Year 1577. GROTIUS.

[1] Digest. Lib. XX. Tit. I. De pignoribus & hypothec. Leg. XIII. § 2.

[1] On this Question see PUFENDORF, B. IV. Chap. X. with the Notes.

[2] Vit. Solon. p. 90. Tom. I. Edit. Wech.

[3] Declam. CCCVIII.

[4] SOPHOCLES has given us the Will of Hercules. Trachin. ver. 1164, &c. That of Alcestis appears in EURIPIDES, (Alcest. v. 282, &c.) We read in HOMER, that Telemachus made a Donation, in Case of his Death, which is a Sort of Will. Odyss. Lib. XVII. (ver. 79, &c.) In the same Poet are some Examples of a Declaration of a last Will in Relation to certain Things to be done; as PLUTARCH shews from the Words of Andromache and Penelope. We have already produced other Instances of Wills made by the Antients, B. I. Chap. III. § 12. in the Text and in the Notes. The Practice of making Wills among the Hebrews, appears from Deut. xxi. 16. and Eccl. xxxiii. 25. GROTIUS.

The Wills of Hercules and Alcestis contain no Disposals of Goods, but only Directions for doing certain Things. We find in EURIPIDES'S Alcestis, a Sort of Donation in Case of Death, made not by Alcestis herself, but by Hercules, ver. 1020, &c. Our Author has produced this Example in his Florum sparsio ad Justinian. p. 36. Edit. Amst. and this probably gave Occasion to the Mistake, which made him confound the Persons in this Place. PLUTARCH'S Reflection occurs in the Treatise on HOMER'S Poetry, by some attributed to DIONYSIUS of Halicarnassus. He there says, that The Poet knew it was customary for Persons going to War, or being in Danger, to recommend certain Things to their Relations. p. 74. Edit. Barnes. The Words of Andromache, from which he infers this, are in Iliad XXIV. v. 744, 745. Those of Penelope, in Odyss. XVIII. v. 264, &c.

[5] See Chap. XV. of this Book, § 5.

[6] It has not been quite abolished. See BODIN, Of the Commonwealth, B. I. Chap. VI.

[1] See Chap. II. of this Book, § 1.

[2] I have produced several Examples of this Kind in my Discourse On the Permission of the Laws, &c. printed in 1715.

[3] As formerly in England, Britany, and Sicily. A Constitution of the Emperor Frederick supposes this practised in several Countries; for it orders, that Both the Ships driven on any Coast, and the Goods found in them, should be kept entire for the Proprietors, &c. notwithstanding the Custom of some Places to the contrary. Except they be Pirates, Enemies to the Empire or Christianity. Code, Lib. VI. Tit. II. De Furtis, Authent. post. Leg. XVIII. SOPATER and SYRIANUS, in Hermogen. (Ἐἰς στάσεις, p. 107. Edit. Venet. 1509.) mention such a Law as established among the antient Grecians. Christian, King of Denmark, said, that by the Abolition of the Law for confiscating the Goods taken up after a Wreck, he lost an hundred thousand Crowns a Year. Notice is taken of this bad Custom, in the Revelations of Bridget Queen of Sweden, Lib. VIII. Cap. VI. and in the Speculum

Saxonicum, II. 29. where the Author treats of Denmark. See also the Decretals, Lib. V. Tit. XVII. De Raptorib. &c. Cap. III. CRANTZIUS, Vandalic. XIII. 40. XIV. 1. CROMER, Polonic. Lib. XXII. (p. 509. Edit. Basil. 1555.) GROTIUS.

See PUFENDORF, B. IV. Chap. XIII. § 4. and my first Note on that Paragraph, in the second Edition. Tho' this barbarous Custom is at present insisted on one Way or other in but too many Places; it must be acknowledged, that some Governments have had serious Thoughts of moderating or abolishing it. I could give the Example of the Republick of Venice, of which I have an authentick Proof in my Hands. It is a Law made by the Council of the Pregadi, in 1583, which, under severe Penalties, forbids the taking of any of the Goods belonging to such as are Shipwrecked; and regulates Things with all the Precautions necessary for putting the Masters of such Goods in a Way of recovering them easily. I find this Law in a curious Manuscript of Instructions, given, about that Time, by the Senate to a Governor sent by that Body into the Island of Cephalonia; a Manuscript, for which I am beholden to the Liberality of Mr. BOURGUET, a worthy and learned Gentleman, who resided at Venice many Years.

[4] Ver. 456.

[5] Code, Lib. XI. Tit. V. De Naufrag. Leg. I. See also Digest. Lib. XLVII. Tit. IX. De incendio, ruinâ, naufragio &c. Leg. VII. NICETAS CHONIATES, in his History of the Emperor Andronicus, calls this a most unreasonable Custom, ἔθος ἀλόγώτατον. (Lib. II. Cap. III.) See likewise CASSIODORE, Var. IV. 7. I cannot imagine how it came into BODIN'S Head to defend such a Practice. But the same Author blames Papinian for chusing to die rather than injure his Conscience. GROTIUS.

The Place where BODIN blames Papinian, the Lawyer, is in B. III. Chap. IV. of his Republick, p. 458, 459. Lat. Edit. Francof. 1622. and says, He shewed more Courage than Wisdom. See Mr. OTTO'S Papinian, Chap. XVI. § 5, 6. As to the Apology he is accused of making for the Law, which confiscates the Goods of Persons ship wracked, the Commentators charge our Author with accusing him wrongfully; for he expressly calls that Practice, A Barbarity and Cruelty both to fellow Citizens and Strangers. B. I. Chap. X. p. 267. in the same Latin Edition; for those Words are not in the French.

[1] Expletione juris. I could not find a Term more proper for expressing our Author's Thought, than that of Compensation. I am sensible that in the Law stile it is taken in a Sense somewhat different. See PUFENDORF, B. V. Chap. XI. § 5, 6. But it is still allowable to fix a more general Idea to the Word, when the Necessity of making one's Self understood requires it. Our Author himself, in his third Note expresses himself thus, In compensationem operae, viz.

[2] The Definition in the Original runs thus, Quoties id quod meum nondum est, sed mihi dari debet, aut loco rei meae aut mihi debita, &c. Mr. BARBEYRAC, in his Latin Edition of this Work, published in 1720, omits the Words here expressed in Roman Characters. In a Note on the Place, which he has enlarged in his French Translation, he very judiciously observes, that these Words are a manifest Redundancy, and no better than an Explication or anticipated Repetition of mihi debita. As the Author was far from being fond of Superfluities, the Commentator supposes he at first wrote Quoties loco illius quod meum est, vel quod meum nondum est, sed mihi dari debet, &c. but finding the same might be said thus in fewer Words, Quoties loco rei meae, aut mihi debita, &c. changed the Expression, but forgot to efface something of what he had before written. Those who are acquainted with his Stile, says Mr. BARBEYRAC, and understand what Criticism is, will easily perceive the Truth of what I advance.

[3] See B. III. Chap. VII. § 6. Thus St. IRENAEUS justifies the Conduct of the Israelites, who took the Gold and Silver Vessels of the Aegyptians, in Compensation for what was due to them for their Work. For, says he, the Aegyptians were indebted to the Israelites, not only for their Goods but also for their Lives. TERTULLIAN, Adv. Marcion. Lib. II. (Chap. XX.) has the same Thought. The Aegyptians, says that Father, redemand their Gold and Silver Vessels. The Hebrews, on the other Hand, urge their Demand, alledging their Right to Wages for their Service and Work, &c. He afterwards shews, that what the Israelites took was very much short of their Due. GROTIUS.

[4] See PUFENDORF, B. V. Chap. XIII. § 10 and last.

Instead of Hesionneus, Ἡσιοννεύς, read Eioneus, Ἐιονεύς; an Emendation long since made by MEZIRIAC, in his learned Commentary on OVID's Epistles, Tom. I. p. 151. Edit. 1716. and received by MUNCHER on HYGIN, Fabul. CLV. p. 227.

[5] If by Vertue of a Bargain I owe you any Thing, and do not deliver it to you, but you take Possession of it, you are a Thief. In like Manner, if I sell you Goods, but do not deliver them, and you take Possession of them without my Consent, you do not possess them as a Buyer, but are a Thief. Digest Lib. XLI. Tit. II. De adquir. vel amittendâ possessione, Leg. V.

[6] When MARCIAN said, I have committed no Violence, CAESAR (DIVUS MARCUS) replied, Do you imagine Violence is employed only when Men are wounded! He also is guilty of using Violence, who demands what he thinks his Due by any but legal Means. Digest. Lib. XLVIII. Tit. VII. Ad Leg. Jul. de vi privatâ, Leg. VII. See also Lib. XLVII. Tit. VIII. De vi bonor. rapt. Leg. II. § 18.

[7] If it shall be proved to me, that a Man rashly takes or possesses any Thing belonging to his Debtor, or Money due from him, which is not willingly delivered, and claims it as his own, he shall have no Right to the Debt. Digest. Lib. IV. Tit. II. Quod metus causa, &c. Leg. XIII.

[8] The Author supposes, without Doubt, that the Person on whom the Demand is made, is, or ought to be convinced, that he owes what is demanded. For if he might be ignorant of the Debt, as if he was Heir to a Person who had borrowed something, the Creditor ought to blame himself only, for not taking a Note of Hand, or his Misfortune in losing it. We must here likewise suppose a Case, where the Creditor, without wronging any one, finds Means of getting what is due to him; so that, if he cannot prove the Debt, neither can the Debtor prove what he has done towards paying himself; for otherwise it would be entirely useless to take this Expedient, since the Judge would oblige the Restitution of what was taken. What I have here said is sufficient for answering the Criticism of the Commentators on this Place, and particularly the pretended Contradiction which one of them finds between what our Author says here, and what he lays down, Chap. XXIII. of this Book, § 11.

[1] See PUFENDORF, B. IV. Chap. XI.

[2] PAUL, the Lawyer, says, that A Feoffment of Trust may be granted (by a Codicil) to the Successors of Persons dying intestate; because the Master of the Family is supposed willing that they should succeed to the Inheritance which falls to them by Law. Digest. Lib. XXIX. Tit. VII. De jure Codicill. Leg. VIII. § 1. GROTIUS.

[3] Epist. Lib. IV. Ep. X. See also Lib. II. Ep. XVI. GROTIUS.

That Author speaks of what an Heir ought to do, when there is Reason for thinking the Deceased had an Intention of doing certain Things, tho' there be not sufficient legal Proofs of it, or tho' his Dispositions may be annulled by the Law. This therefore is a particular Case, or rather a Sort of Case of Conscience, on which the Reader may consult PUFENDORF, B. IV. Chap. X. § 7, 8. together with Note 2. on § 8. second Edition. Whereas the Business here is to lay down a general Rule for knowing to whom the Goods of a Person ought to belong, who has not disposed of them by Will, and whose private Intention is supposed not to be known.

[a] Franc. Piscin. De Stat. exc. Fem. n. 133. Mench. in Auth. Novissima, Cod. de inoff. Test. n. 296. Tell. Fernand. in l. 10. Taurin. Q. 4.

[1] In my Opinion, we are here to distinguish between the Time, during which Children are not in a Condition of providing for their own Subsistence, and that, in which they are able to make such Provision. In Regard to the former, Fathers and Mothers are strictly obliged to allow or leave their Children what is necessary for their Support; this is a necessary Consequence of the Obligation, under which they lie of doing all in their Power for preserving the Life which they have given their Children. But as soon as the Children are able to provide themselves with Necessaries, and much more when they already have acquired them, the Law of Nature alone does not impose an indispensable Obligation on Parents to leave them their Estates, either in the whole or in part. They cannot indeed find nearer Relations to make their Heirs; and therefore, when they have no considerable Reason for thinking it would be better to leave them to others, they would do ill to prefer any one to their own Blood. But even in this Case, Children would have no Cause to complain of any Wrong, properly so called; and still less, when the Father or Mother had good Reasons for disposing of some Part of their Estate in Favour of Persons more worthy, or such as had more Need of it.

[2] These Words are taken from a Discourse, which he supposes the Censors might make to such as they sentenced to pay a Fine for having lived to old Age unmarried. The Words immediately preceding those here quoted, are, Nature has prescribed you a Law for getting Children, as well as for being born yourselves, Lib. II. Chap. IX. Num. 1. so that the Sentence taken together, speaks directly of marrying, of which the Obligation of maintaining Children is a Consequence.

[3] Tom. II. p. 497. Edit. Wech. where he observes, that this is the Reason why Children have so little Gratitude to their Parents for what they leave them, and shew so little Concern for honouring and serving them.

[4] The Emperor JULIAN says, It is just [or rather a received Custom, νόμιμον] that Children should inherit their Father's Estates. In Caesarib. (p. 334. Edit. Spanheim.) Nor are Daughters to be excluded; and it appears from the Book of JOB, that according to the Custom of the most remote Antiquity, they had a Share in the Inheritance of their Parents, after the Sons. On this Principle of Equity St. AUGUSTIN would not have the Church receive the Goods of such as disinherited their Children. His Words on that Subject may be seen in the Canon Law, Caus. XIII. Quaest. II. (Can. VIII.) and Caus. XVII, Quest. IV. (Can. XLIII.) The first Passage is taken from B. II. De Vita Clericorum; and the second from his fifty-second Discourse, Ad Fratres in Eremo, if the Piece last mentioned is really St. AUGUSTIN's. PROCOPIUS observes, that The Laws, tho' in other Respects different in different Nations, agree in this, both among the Romans and Barbarians, that Children are the proper Masters of what is left by a Father. Persic. Lib. I. Cap. XI. GROTIUS.

[5] Androm. ver. 418.

PLINY, speaking of Swallows, says, They feed their young ones by Turns, with the greatest Equity. Nat. Hist. Lib. X. Cap. XXXIII. GROTIUS.

[6] Institut. Lib. I. Tit. II. De Jure Naturae, &c. See also Digest. Lib. I. Tit. I. De Just. & Jure, Leg. I. § 3.

- [7] Code, Lib. V. Tit. XIII. De rei uxoriae actione, &c. Leg. unic. § 5.
- [8] Code, Lib. VI. Tit. XLI. De bonis, quae liberis. &c. Leg. VIII. § 5. DIODORUS SICULUS, (Lib. II. Cap. L. p. 94. Edit. H. Steph.) QUINTILIAN, (Instit. Orat. Lib. VII. Cap. I. p. 591. Edit. Burm.) GROTIUS.
The Passage of SALLUST appears in a Fragment containing the Letter from Mithridates to Arsaces, King of Pontus; where he speaks of the Will by which Attalus had made the Roman People his Heirs. Fragm. Lib. IV. Cap. II. Edit. Wass.
- [9] Digest. Lib. XXV. Tit. III. De agnoscend. & alend. liberis, Leg. V. § 4.
- [10] Children born of an adulterous or incestuous Commerce; for such were not called natural Children. See Novel. LXXXIX. Quibus modis naturales, &c. Cap. XV.
- [11] Our Author, deceived without Doubt by his Memory, makes a wrong Application of this Law of Solon, concerning natural Children. That celebrated Legislator, according to HERACLIDES of Pontus, as quoted by PLUTARCH, ordered, not that a Father should not be obliged to support such Children; but that they should not be obliged to support their Fathers. The Reason given for this Law is, because those Fathers had no other View than that of gratifying their own Passion, and instead of expecting any grateful Return from their Children, they gave them a Sort of Right to resent the Ignominy of their Birth. Vit. Solon. Tom. I. p. 90. Edit. Wech. As to the Business of Fathers in Regard to their natural Children, tho' the latter were not Heirs to the Goods of their Fathers, unless they had been legitimated, yet they received a certain Portion of the Inheritance, which was termed the Bastard's Part, Νοθεῖα, and which was fixed at a thousand Drachms, or ten Minae, that is about a hundred Crowns, a pretty considerable Sum for those Times. See ARISTOPHANES, in his Birds, ver. 1655, &c. HARPOCRATION, on the Word Νοθεῖα: And MEURSIUS, in his Themis Attica, Lib. II. Cap. XII.
- [b] Decretal. Lib. 4. Tit. 7. De eo qui duxit in Matrimonium quam polluit per Adulterium. Cap. 5. in fin.
- [12] See the Law quoted in Note 8. on this Paragraph; and Law V. § 1, 5. of the Title of the Digest. cited in the Note immediately following this.
- [13] It is evident, that a Daughter's Children are not a Burthen to their Grandfather, but to their own Father, unless the Father is either dead or in Want. Digest. Lib. XXV. Tit. III. De agnoscend. & alendis liberis, &c. Leg. VIII.
- [1] Ἀντιπελαργεῖν. See [a Passage of PHILO, quoted in the Preliminary Discourse, § 7. Note I. and] what LEO AFRICANUS observes on a Bird of Africa, called Nestus, Lib. IX. (toward the End). GROTIUS.
- [2] DIOGENES LAERTIUS quotes and commends this Law, Lib. I. § 55. See also the Fragments of MENANDER, collected by Mr. LE CLERC, p. 278.
- [3] In Abdicat. Tom. I. p. 721. Edit. Amst.
- [4] Ethic. Nicom. Lib. VIII. Cap. XIV. p. 112. Edit. Paris.
- [5] Digest. Lib. XLVIII. Tit. XX. De bonis damnatorum, Leg. VII.
- [6] Ibid. Lib. XXXVIII. Tit. VI. Si Tabulae Testamenti, &c. Leg. VII. § 1. PHILO the Jew says, that Since it is a Law of Nature that Children should succeed to the Inheritance of their Parents, and not Parents to that of their Children, MOSES has said nothing of this latter Case, as being ominous, and against the Wishes of Parents. De Vit. Mosis. Lib. III. (p. 689.) SOCRATES observes, that A Man (when he marries) thinks of providing what will be necessary for the Subsistence of his future Children, and that as plentifully as is in his Power. XENOPHON, Memorabil. Lib. II. (Cap. II. § 5.) GROTIUS.

[7] Lib. V. Cap. IX. Num. 2.

[1] JUSTINIAN pronounces this, just and equitable, aequum. Institut. Lib. III. Tit. I. De haereditatibus, quae ab intestato deferuntur, § 6. It is a Maxim among the Jewish Doctors, that Children succeed, even in the Grave; and, that Our Children's Children are as our own Children. Rabbi JOSEPH, the Son of Jacchi, mentions this Right as natural, in his Comment on DANIEL, Chap. V. ver. 2. EGINHART speaking of Charlemagne, who observed it religiously, in Regard of his Grand-Children, considers his Conduct as the Effect of his paternal Tenderness. De Vita Caroli Magni. (Cap. XIX Edit. Schminck.) And MICHAEL ATTALIATA says, that Each of the Descendents takes the Place of his Father. GROTIUS.

[2] Digest. Lib. I. Tit. VI. De his qui sui, vel alieni juris sunt. Leg. VII.

[*] Lib. XXVII. Tit. I. De excusationibus tutorum, Leg. II. § 7.

[**] Novell. CXXVII. Princip. GROTIUS.

[***] ISAEUS. Our Author had read the Words of the Greek Orator too hastily, and without due Attention to the Sequel of the Discourse. The Passage occurs, p. 467. Edit. Wech. 1619. Ὁ γὰρ νόμος οὐκ ἐστὶ ἐπανιέναι, ἐὰν μὴ ἴδιον καταλίπῃ γνήσιον. He is there speaking of an Article of one of Solon's Laws, by which an adopted Child could not return to his own Family, and become Heir to his natural Father, except he himself had left a legitimate Child, who might remain in the Family of his adopted Father. This Law may be seen at Length in DEMOSTHENES, in the Close of his Oration against Leochares. The same Expression occurs in the same Oration, p. 673. Edit. Basil. 1572. where it is explained by ἐπανιέναι ἐπὶ τὴν πατρῴαν οὐσίαν. Return to inherit his Father's Substance. And ISAEUS himself elsewhere terms this, ἐπανελθεῖν εἰς τὸν πατρῴον οἶκον. Returning to his Father's Family. Orat. IX. De haereditate Aristarchi, p. 553. See also HARPOCRATION, under the Words ὅτι οἱ παῖδες ποιητοὶ, &c. The Passage therefore is intirely foreign to the Purpose.

[3] PHILO, Ad Cajum. p. 996. Edit. Paris.

[4] Thus in the Division of Peloponnesus among the Heraclidae, Procles, and Eurysthenes, as representing their Father Aristodemus, drew Lots for one Portion only, against Temenes and Ctesiphon, who each drew one; as we learn from APOLLODORE, Biblioth. Lib. II. (Cap. VIII. § 4. Edit. Th. Gal.) PAUSANIAS, Messeniac. (Chap. III. p. 113. Edit. Wech.) STRABO, Lib. VIII. (p. 560. Edit. Amst. 364 Paris.) GROTIUS.

[5] The Descendents of Ephraim and Manasseh, Joseph's Sons, did not succeed only by Right of Representation; for on that Foot they ought to have had among them but one Portion, equal to that of each of their Uncles. But Jacob had adopted them, as our Author himself observes, Note 3. on § 8. See Numbers xxvi. and JOSHUA xvii.

[6] Orat. adversus Macartatum. p. 661.

[1] Ἀποκήρυξις. ARISTOTLE calls this ἀπέπασθαι, and ἀποστῆναι. Ethic. Nicom. Lib. VIII. Cap. XVI. and ult. where he says, It perhaps never happens that a Father renounces his Son, unless the Son be extremely wicked.

[2] See a Treatise intituled Baba Kama, Cap. IX. § 10. and § 25. of this Chapter. GROTIUS.

[1] Odyss. Lib. I. ver. 215, 216.

[2] EUSTATHIUS ON HOMER, p. 1412. Edit. Rom.

Αὐτὸν γὰρ οὐδεὶς οἶδε τοῦ πότη' ἐγένετο,

Ἄλλ' ὑπονοοῦμεν πάντες, ἢ πιστεύομεν.

No Man knows of what Father he is born, but we all suppose, or believe, in this Case. The first Verse, as here produced by our Author, speaks a different Sense, No Man knows how he was begotten, or born. But he translates it according to the true Reading, both here and in his Excerpta è vet. Trag. & Com. where he quotes it right. He there observes, that the Passage is quoted in the other Manner by CLEMENT of Alexandria; but with this Difference, that that Father reads ἐγένετο, and not ἐγένετο.

[*] In STOBÆI Florilegio. Tit. LXXVI.

[3] Or a Grandson adopted, as was done by the Patriarch Jacob, in Relation to his Grandsons Ephraim and Manasseh. GROTIUS.
See Genesis xlvi. 5. and Mr. LE CLERC on the Place.

[4] Ex Andromed. Fragm. Barnes. v. 12, &c.

[5] Code, Lib. V. Tit. XXVII. De naturalib. liberis. Leg. VI.

[6] Per Curiae oblationem. By the Word Curia was understood the Court or Council of municipal Towns; that is, such as had received the Privilege of Roman Citizenship. The Members of that Body were termed Curiales or Decuriones. But tho' the Employment was very honourable, most Men avoided it, because it was become very burthensome. The Curiales, or Decuriones, were charged with all the publick Affairs, and that frequently at their own Peril, and the Hazard of their Fortunes, while they were forbidden to meddle with several Things which would have brought them some Profit. For this Reason the Christians, among other Persecutions, were sometimes sentenced by cruel Emperors, to enter into these Bodies, as appears from CASSIODORE's Tripart. Hist. Lib. I. Cap. IX. Lib. VI. Cap. VII. and Lib. VII. Cap. ult. as then in Process of Time almost every one strove to be excused from that Office, or quit it at any Rate, there was a Necessity of granting such Privileges as in some Manner should counter balance the Burthen annexed to it. For this Reason therefore Theodosius the Great allowed a Father to legitimate his natural Sons, by offering them to be Curiales; and even a natural Daughter, by marrying her to one of that Council. Code, Lib. VII. Tit. XXVII. De naturalibus Liberis, &c. Leg. III. See also the Institutes, Lib. I. Tit. X. De Nuptiis. § 13. and BRISSON's Selectae Antiq. Lib. III. Cap. XIII. as likewise GODEFROY, on the Theodosian Code, XII. 1.

[7] This was formerly the Case of all the Children but the eldest, in the Country of Mexico. GROTIUS.
See FRANCIS LOPEZ DE GOMARA's Gen. Hist. of the West Indies, B. II. Chap. LXXVI.

[8] Matrimonium ad Morgangabicam; or, as the Writers on Fiefs call it, ad Morgenaticam, Lib. II. Tit. XXIX. This Word comes from the German Morgen-Gab, which signifies a Morning Present. The Person who marries a Woman in the Manner here specified; or, as the Germans express it, with the left Hand, the Day after his Wedding makes her a Present, which consists in the Assignment of a certain moderate Portion of his Goods, to her and her future Children after his Death, on which Condition they have no further Pretensions. GREGORY of Tours calls this Matutinale Donum, Lib. IX. 19. as GRONOVIIUS observes, who likewise refers us to LINDENBROG's Glossary on the Codex Legum Antiquarum. See CUJAS, Lib. IV. De Feud. Tit. XXXII. (Edit. vulg. II. 29.) and Mr. HERTIUS's Dissertation, De specialib. Rom. Germ. Rebus pub. &c. Sect. II. § 5. p. 104,

&c. Tom. II. Comment. & Opuscul. &c. The Reader may likewise consult a Dissertation written by the late Mr. COCCEJUS, De Lege Morganaticâ, printed at Francfort on the Oder, in 1695, where he pretends that it is the same as the Salic Law; and as that Law allowed of the Marriages here mentioned, they were therefore termed Matrimonia ad morganaticam; or ex Lege morganaticâ.

[9] Both that of the Father and Mother: For on the Death of either of them, the Children inherit his or her real Estate, as if they died intestate; and the same Sort of Estate in Possession of the Survivor belongs to them, so that he or she cannot alienate them, but is obliged to preserve them entire, in Order to leave them to those Children of the first Marriage, who are from that Time reckoned Proprietors of them. We have a Treatise on this Subject, intitled Tractatus de Jure Devolutionis, written by PETER STOCKMAN, Counsellor in the Court of Brabant, and Master of Requests to the King of Spain, in whose Favour he published it in 1667.

[10] The antient Burgundians had a Law like this, by which it was ordered, that If a Father has divided his Estate with his Children, and marries again, the Children of the second Venter shall partake only of the Portion which the Father reserved for himself. Lib. I. Tit. I. Num. 2. GROTIUS.

[1] This Form may be seen in the Lawyer PAUL's Collection of Receptae Sententiae. It runs thus, Seeing that you squander away your Father's patrimonial Estate, and are bringing your Children to Poverty, I (the Praetor) therefore deprive you of the Administration of such Estate, Lib. III. Tit. IV. De Testamentis, § 7. See Mr. SCHULTING's excellent Notes on the Place.

[2] The Hebrews distinguish those two Sorts of Estates: They called that which descended from Father to Son מורשה and that which was lately acquired נהלה. See a like Distinction in the Burgundian Laws. Lib. I. Tit. I. Num. I. GROTIUS.

[3] De Legib. Lib. XI. Tom. II. p. 923. Edit. Steph.

[4] Ibid.

[5] SENECA speaks thus on the Subject, When we are at the Close of Life, when we make our Wills, do we not then distribute those Benefits which will be of no further Use to us? What Time do we not employ in considering with ourselves how much, and to whom, we are to give? What signifies it to whom we give, since we can receive no Return? However, we never give with more Deliberation and Precaution; we never rack our Thoughts more, than when, laying aside all Considerations of our own Interest, we have nothing in View but how to do what is honest and decent. De Benef. Lib. IV. Cap. XI.

[6] These Words are not a Decision but a Question. The Philosopher places it in the Rank of problematical Questions, Ἀπορίαν δ' ἔχει καὶ τοιάδε, &c. And if he doth afterwards decide it, it is with some Restriction, adding, that this most commonly takes Place, ἐπιπολύ; in short, caeteris paribus, all Things else being equal. Ethic. Nicom. Lib. IX. Cap. II.

[7] De Offic. Lib. I. Cap. XV.

[8] Offic. Lib. I. Cap. XXXI.

[9] In his funeral Oration on those who had been killed in a War, where the Athenians had sent Succours to the Corinthians against the Lacedemonians. Cap. XX.

[10] Thus in PROCOPIUS, a Man in his last Moments says to another, The Good you do to my Children is done to me. Persic. Lib. I. (Cap. IV.) See an Example of this Kind in what the Emperor Theodosius did in Favour of Valentinian the Younger, acknowledging, in his Person, the Obligations he had to his Father; as we learn from ZOSIMUS, Lib. IV. By the Laws of MOSES, the Uncle inherited after the Brothers, as being a nearer Relation to the first Possessor of the Estate than the Nephews. Numb. xxvii. 10. GROTIUS.

The Emperor Gratian, to whom Theodosius had great Obligations, and who raised him to the Imperial Throne, was not Valentinian's Father, but his Brother, as is well known. Besides ZOSIMUS is so far from saying what our Author attributes to him, that he tells us, that when Valentinian fled into the Dominions of Theodosius, and sent Ambassadors to desire his Assistance against Maximus; Theodosius, contrary to the Advice of his whole Council, would not, on that Account, engage in a War, into which he was at last brought only by his violent Passion for the Princess Galla, Daughter to the Empress Justina, and Sister to Valentinian. See Chap. XLIII. and XLIV. of B. IV. of that Historian. Edit. Cellar.

[a] Novel. 84. De cons. & uter. frat. Code, Lib. 6. Tit. 57. De Legit. hered. Leg. 13. § 1. and Tit. 59. Comm. de Success. Leg. 11. Tit. 61. De bonis quae liberis &c. Leg. 3.

[11] Ethic. Nicom. Lib. VIII. Cap. XIV. p. 112.

[12] Lib. V. Cap. V. princip.

[13] There is a Mistake in this Quotation; but it doth not lie where the learned GRONOVIVS supposes, who observes, that the Passage of JUSTIN, which he imagines our Author had in View, (Lib. XXXIV. Cap. III.) speaks of the Prerogative of an elder Brother. Our Author has quoted one Writer for another. He puts Lib. X. in his Margin; and the Reflection in Question is in QUINTUS CURTIUS, Lib. X. where he makes a Person of the lowest Rank say, that those who would not acknowledge Arideus, Brother to Alexander the Great, for his Successor, unjustly deprived him of a Crown which was his Due by the common Law of Nations. Cap. VII. Num. 2.

[14] Ethic. Nicom. Lib. VIII. Cap. XIV. p. 112.

[1] De Legibus, Lib. XI. p. 923. Tom. II. Edit. Steph.

[2] See Deuter. xv. 11. xxiii. 7. Prov. xi. 17. SERVIUS treats of this upon that Passage of the sixth Aeneid.

Nec Partem posuere suis. (ver. 611).
Who dare not give, and ev'n refuse to lend
To their poor Kindred.

DRYDEN.

HIEROCLES, Ἡ δε τῶν ἀγγιστέων, &c. The Respect that is due to Relations, must be in Proportion to the Proximity of Blood and Nature, that so, after our Parents, each of our Kindred may receive so much Regard from us, as their Nearness to them gives them a Title to. [In Aurea Carmina, ver. 4. p. 46, 48. Edit. Needham.] And POSSIDIUS of St. AUSTIN, He saw it was just and reasonable that the Children, or Parents, or Relations of the Deceased, should rather possess them. He means the Estates he is discoursing of there. (Cap. XXIV.) GROTIUS.

[3] Orat. III. Seu de Nicostrati haeredit. p. 413. in fin. Edit. Wech. Tl̄ ὄν, &c. Ibid. p. 417. init.

[4] Page 611.

[5] De Offic. Lib. I. Cap. XVI.

[6] Ibid. Cap. XVII.

[7] Vit. Agricol. Cap. XXXI. Num. 1.

[8] De Offic. Lib. I. Cap. XVII.

[9] De finib. honor. & mal. Lib. III. Cap. XX.

[10] De Offic. Lib. I. Cap. XIV.

[11] De Offic. Lib. I. Cap. XXX. This is taken from Isa. lviii. 7. You have some other such Expressions in St. CHRYSOSTOM, upon 1 Cor. iv. 7. and St. AUGUSTIN, De Doctrina Christ. B. II. 12. GROTIUS.

[12] Declam. CCCVIII. init.

[1] The antient Germans knew nothing of any such Representation, not even among their Children. Childebert was the first who introduced this Right into France by a particular Edict; and Otho, Son of Henry, brought it up in the Parts on the other Side the Rhine, as is attested by WITHEKIND, B. II. See the Lombard Law, B. II. Tit. XIV. 18. And the old Scots Right of Succession regarded only the Nearness of the Degree. See PONTAN, Danic. VII. where he relates, that it was so declared by the King of England, who was made Umpire in this Affair. GROTIUS.

[2] Formerly this Rule took Place in some of these Provinces, according to the Law of Zeland, otherwise called Jus Scabinicum; and on the contrary, in others, the old Law of the Frieslanders was followed, (Jus Aesdomicum, or Asingicum) which required a Regard only to the Nearness of Blood. See VINNIUS on the Institutes, Lib. III. Tit. V.

[3] See Deut. xxi. 17. Gen. xlix. 3. and Mr. LE CLERC on the Text.

[4] We have Reason to believe, that the Deceased designed the Succession to his Estate should be regulated by the Laws of the Country, as what commonly seem to every one most reasonable; and if he had an Intention of disposing of it otherwise, he might have done it by Will.

[5] The late Mr. HERTIUS, in his Dissertation, De collisione Legum, Sect. IV. § 33. p. 196, 197. Tom. I. of his Comment. & Opuscul. undertakes to confute our Author's Opinion by two Reasons. First, Because the Manner of possessing or acquiring the Sovereignty does not depend on the sovereign Power, in non-patrimonial Kingdoms, as our Author himself maintains, § 28. Num. 1. Secondly, Because the Case is not the same in Regard to the Sovereignty; as to other Things regulated by Laws or Customs, it is of a much superior Order, according to our Author himself, Chap. IV. of this Book, § 12. The first of these Reasons is inconclusive; for our Author certainly here speaks of patrimonial Kingdoms, in which he supposes the King has a Power of alienating the Crown, and consequently, disposing of the Succession as he pleases; whereas in § 28. he treats of Kingdoms originally established by the free Consent of the People. But the second Reason is good; and there is still less Reason to suppose that Sovereigns had an Intention to regulate the Succession by the Civil Laws, or Customs of the Country, when those Laws and Customs are very extraordinary, and very different from the common Manner of succeeding in most States. For there is much more Room for presuming they designed to follow such Customs as are most generally received, in Regard to the Succession to the Crown. See Introductio ad Jus Publicum universale, by Mr. BOHMER, Part. Spec. Lib. III. Cap. IV. § 19. with the Note. Concerning the Matter of Succession to the Crown in general, consult

- [1] In Asia the Brothers reigned jointly, only one had the Prerogative of wearing the Crown. POLYBIUS, Exc. legation. XCIII. And in LIVY, and the same POLYBIUS, you will find that Egypt was divided between the two Brothers the Ptolomies. Attilas's Sons desired that the Nations might be parted among them in just and equal Shares. JORNANDES, De Rebus Gotthic. GREGOR. B. VII. speaking of Irene the Wife of Andronicus Palaeologus τὸ δε καίνωτορον, &c. What is still more strange, is, that she would not that one only should reign, according to the antient Custom of the Eastern Roman Emperors; but as it was the Western Practice, would have their Cities and Countries shared amongst her Sons, that each of them might have a separate and independent Government to himself, as if they had been so many distinct Crowns derived to them as their proper and paternal Inheritance, in the same Manner as ordinary Persons come to their private Estates and Possessions, and so to descend to their Children and Successors after them. For she herself being of Western Extraction, had a Mind to bring up here that new and unprecedented Custom she had received from thence. GROTIUS.
- [2] Of Alexander and Laodice, see POLYBIUS, Exc. legat. CXL. Of Auletas's Daughter. STRABO, XVII. ARRIAN (ἐναβάσει) relates, that several Women reigned in Asia after Semiramis. So Nitocris in Babylon, Artemisia at Halicarnassus, Tomyris among the Scythians. And SERVIUS upon the first Aeneid. (ad ver. 654) says, Because Women governed before. And upon the ninth Aeneid, ad v. 596, he says, that this was a Custom among the Rutuli. GROTIUS.
- [3] Pharsal. Lib. X. ver. 91, 92.
- [4] Vit. Agricol. Cap. XVI. Num. 1.
- [5] Our Author, in his Margin, quotes PAUSANIAS, Lib. I. but gives a wrong Account of the Fact. Molossus was not Pyrrhus's Bastard; but the eldest of three Sons which Pyrrhus had by Andromache, Hector's Widow. The two others were Pielus and Pergamus. SERVIUS tells us, that Pyrrhus considered Andromache, tho' his Captive, as a lawful Wife, so that his Children by her had a Right of succeeding to the Crown. On Aeneid. Lib. III. v. 297. PAUSANIAS doth not say, that Pyrrhus appointed Molossus to succeed him, on Default of legitimate Children; but that Helenus, the Son of Priam, who married Andromache after the Death of Pyrrhus, succeeded him, and left the Crown to Molossus. Cap. XI. p. 10. Edit. Wech. SERVIUS indeed doth, in the Place above cited, make Helenus reign either after Molossus, or in his Name, as his Guardian; for the Terms are not very clear, Inde factum est ut teneret Helenus regnum privigni, qui successerat patri; à quo Molossia dicta est pars Epiri, &c.
- [6] Among the Tartars natural and legitimate Sons are upon an equal Foot. But HERODOTUS (Lib. III. Cap. II.) says of the Persians, Νόθον οὐ σφι νόμος ἐστι βασιλεῦσαι γνησίου πατρύοντος, They never let a natural Son have the Crown, if there is a legitimate one in the Way. Two Vandals reigned in Spain, Gontharis, who was legitimate, and Zigerich, the base-born Son of Godigisclus, as PROCOPIUS reports; according to the old Custom of the Northern Nations, testified by ADAM BREMEN. Hist. Eccles. Cap. CVI. HELMOLD, Slavic. Lib. I. Cap. LI. and LII. And Michael, a natural Son, the lawful Issue failing, succeeded Michael, Prince of Thessaly, GREGORY, B. II. And he also was succeeded in part by his natural Son, GREGORY, B. IV. See SERVIUS upon the third Aeneid, about Molossus, Pyrrhus's bastard Son. GROTIUS.
- [a] Cassiod. In Chron. Paul. Diac. De gest Langobard. Lib. VI.

[7] Which (Paphlagonia) came into his Father's Hands, not by Force or Conquest, but by Adoption, and on the Demise of Domestick Princes. JUSTIN, Lib. XXXVIII. Cap. V. Num. 4.

[1] Concerning the Swedes, see BRIGITT, IV. 3. the Danes, SAXO, XII. and XIII. APPIAN, Mithridatic. Δικαιοῦντα τῆν πρεσβύτερον ἄρχειν, Thinking it just that the Elder should enjoy the Crown. NICETAS CHONIATES, in his Life of John Comnenus, Ἡ φύσις τοῦ πρῶτοτόκου, &c. Nature, following her own Order, uses to give the chiefest Honour in Favour of the First-born. But GOD does not think fit, in the greatest Prerogatives, always to observe this Rule. And in his Life of Manuel, speaking of Isaacius, ἄπο γενέσεως εἰς τῆν διαδοχὴν τῆς βασιλείας καλούμενος, Called by Birth-Right to the Succession of the Crown. And Antipater, in JOSEPHUS, said, that The Kingdom was Hyrcanus's, as being eldest. See LEUNCLAVIUS, Turcic. XVI. GROTIUS.

[2] Lib. VII. Cap. II.

[3] Lib. XXI. Cap. XXXI. Num. 6.

[4] JUSTIN, Lib. II. Cap. X. Num. 2.

[5] Lib. XXXIV. Cap. III. Num. 7.

[6] Lib. XL. Cap. XI. Num. 7.

[a] JUSTIN, Lib. XVI. Cap. II. Num. 7.

[7] See PUFENDORF, B. VII. Chap. VII. § 11.

[1] Dardanus and Jasius sat jointly on the Throne of Troy. SERVIUS upon this Passage of the third Aeneid: Sociique Penates. In Crete, Minos, and Rhadamanthus; JULIAN against the Christians. At Alba, Numitor, and Amulius, as says the Writer Of the Lives of illustrious Men. For others relate, that Numitor had the Money, and Amulius the Crown: Of this Number is PLUTARCH: In the same Manner as some have reported, that the Kingdom of Thebes fell to Eteocles's Share; and to Polynices, in the Lieu of that, Hermione's Necklace. Thus in Norway, one has the Crown and another the Shipping, and the Advantage arising from Sea Expeditions. GROTIUS.

What our Author says of Eteocles and Polynices is probably taken from the Scholiast on EURIPIDES, who relates it on the Authority of HELLANICUS. Hellanicus, says he, tells us that Polynices, according to Agreement, gave up the Kingdom to Eteocles, and that Eteocles gave him his Choice whether he would accept of the Kingdom, or take part of the Effects, and live in another City: That Polynices took Harmonia's (not Hermione's) Necklace and Gown, and retired to Argos. In Phaeniss. ver. 71. Concerning that Necklace, see APOLLODORUS, Biblioth. Lib. III. Cap. IV. § 2. And STATIUS, Thebaid. Lib. II. v. 265, &c. I know not who these Norwegian Princes, mentioned by our Author, are; but I find in an anonymous and compendious History of the Kings of Denmark, that Olaus I. having two Sons, Harold and Frotho, left the Empire of the Sea to the former, and the Kingdom to the latter. Descript. Daniae. p. 177. apud. Elziv. 1629.

[2] EURIPIDES, Hercul. furen. (ver. 29, 30.)

Τῷ λευκοπόλῳ πρὶν τυρανῆσαι χθονὸς,

Ἀμφίων ἦδ' ἔ Ζῆθον ἐκγόνῳ Δίος

Before Amphion and Zethus, Jove's great Off-spring rul'd.

See also APOLLODORUS, Biblioth. Lib. III. Cap. V. § 5.

[3] The Division of the antient Kingdom of Athens regarded only the Lands, and not the Jurisdiction, which remained entire in the Hands of one, as our Author himself has already said, Chap. III. of this Book, § 4. Note 5. where I have quoted the very Words of APOLLODORUS, from whence he takes this Fact. As to the Division between Camirus, Jalysus, and Lindus, he undoubtedly alledges that Example from PINDAR, Olymp. VII. v. 135, &c.

[4] The antient Authors are not agreed in this: Most of them make the Sons of Perseus reign successively, not at Argos but at Mycenae. Nothing is more uncertain or confused in general, than the Succession and Chronology of the Kings of that Time, the History of which is very much mixed with Fables.

[1] Cap. VII. Num. 15.

[1] LIVY, Lib. XXXIX. Cap. LIII. Num. 3.

[2] Ep. Phaedrae ad Hippolyt. v. 121, 122.

[a] Hor. Lib. IV. Od. IV. ver. 40, &c.

[1] See NICETAS CHONIATES, in his Life of Manuel, B. IV. GROTIUS.

Cap. IV. where Andronicus says, that if the Emperor Manuel Commenus should have Sons, the Oath which obliged his Subjects to acknowledge his Daughter Mary, as Empress after his Demise, would be null, and of no Effect.

[2] Mr. THOMASIVS, in his Notes on HUBER, De Jure Civitatis, Lib. I. Sect. VII. Cap. VII. § 10. p. 281. maintains, that this Reason proves Women ought to be entirely excluded the Succession to the Crown; unless they are admitted to it by Custom, or an express Clause in the Act which regulates the Succession.

[1] HOMER, speaking of the Crown of Crete, Iliad XIII. ver. 354, 355.

Ἦ μὰν δ' ἀμφοτέροισιν ἕον γένος, ἦδ' ἕα πάτερη.

Ἄλλὰ Ζεὺς πρότερος γεγόνει καὶ πλείονα ἦδη.

*Our Family's the same, our Country too,
But Jove's the elder, and therefore sure must know, Much more than I can.*

Where HOMER very likely, as indeed he usually does, assigns the Reason why the elder are preferred to the Throne, a Reason that generally holds good, and that is sufficient in such Cases as these, Τοῦ νόμου τῷ πρεσβυτέρῳ τῶν βασιλέως παίδων διδόντος τῆν τῶν ἄλων ἡγεμονίαν, The Law giving the entire Sovereignty to the elder of the King's Sons, says ZOSIMUS, B. II. talking of a Law of the Persians. Periander succeeded his Father in the Kingdom of Corinth, Κατὰ πρεσβεῖον, by the Right of Eldership. So NICOLAUS DAMASCENUS informs us, in the Collections we have by the Favour of that excellent Man NICOLAUS PEIRESIUS. GROTIUS.

Mr. THOMASIVS makes Use of another Method for proving the Elder ought to succeed. It is the Will of the People, says he, that the Kingdom should be indivisible, and at the same Time successive. Now, supposing the deceased King leaves more than one Son, if the younger attempts to succeed him, to the Prejudice of the elder; either he will pretend to make himself Master of the Crown by Right of prior Occupancy, in which he would be manifestly in the wrong, because the Crown is not one of those Things which belong to nobody; or he will make Use of this Pretence, that he is better qualified than his Brother for governing the State; and then it is his Business to prove the Assertion. But who shall be judge in this Case? Shall Foreigners? This would expose the State to great Troubles, and other fatal Inconveniencies. Shall the People? The Kingdom would then cease to be successive, and become elective. Not. in HUBER, De Jure Civitatis, Lib. I. Sect. VII. Cap. VII. Num. 11. p. 281.

[2] Cyropaed. Lib. VIII. Cap. VII. § 3. p. 543. Edit. Oxon.

[3] For the younger will, some Years hence, be as old as the eldest is at present; and consequently, may then have as much Understanding and Conduct.

[4] Lib. VII. Cap. LXI.

[5] JUSTIN, Lib. I. Cap. IV. Num. 7. Lib. iv.

[6] Cyropaed. Lib. VIII. Cap. V. § 9.

[7] See EURIPIDES, in his Ione, (v. 72, 73, 578). GROTIUS.

[8] And had Orestes died without Issue, Electra had succeeded him in the same Kingdom of Argos, as we learn from EURIPIDES's Taurica Iphigenia, (v. 681,682,695.) So the Crown of Calydon came to Andraemon, Oeneus's Son-in-Law, Asterius's Crown to his Son-in-Law Minos, as APOLLODORUS tells us, and subjoins this Reason for it, because there was no male Issue. GROTIUS.

Our Author says the Kingdom of Thebes fell to Antigone, the Daughter of Oedipus; but it is not certain whether he means, that that Princess actually inherited the Crown, or only, that it of Right devolved to her. The former is not agreeable to antient History; for we know that Creon seized on the Kingdom after the Death of Eteocles, and the Exile of Oedipus. The latter may be grounded on the Words of EURIPIDES where the Poet introduces Creon saying to Oedipus, after the Death of Eteocles and Polynices, that Eteocles had given him the Sovereignty of that Country, as a Portion with Antigone, who was to marry Hemon, the Son of Creon. Phaeniss. v. 1580, &c. See also v. 764, &c. I know not in Vertue of what Creon himself took Possession of the Government, which on that Foot ought rather to have belonged to his Son, who was certainly then at Age. As for the rest, I have one general Observation to make on the Examples here and elsewhere alledged by our Author, and taken from fabulous History, viz. that they make as much to his Purpose as those taken from true History: For, beside that the antient Fables are only so many Histories mingled with fabulous Circumstances, and consequently, the Facts quoted from them may be true; yet, even supposing them false, it may still be concluded that they are conformable to the Notions and Practice of those Times; which is sufficient in Regard to the Application made of them by our Author.

[1] Innocent the Third was of Opinion, that the Succession to such a Crown might be lost by him who did not take Care to execute the last Will of the Deceased. C. licet. de voto. GROTIUS.

The Author might very well have spared this Decision, which goes farther than he pretends; as appears from the Subject there considered, and from the very Words of the Pope. They are addressed to Andrew II. King of Hungary, who refused to go in the Crusade to the Holy Land, in Performance of a Vow made by his Father, the Execution of which he enjoined him at his Death. But without enquiring in this Place, whether the Pope had thus a Right to dispose of Crowns by his own Authority, under such a Pretext; and whether a Prince, on failing to execute the last Will of the Deceased, forfeits his Right to the Succession, when the Deceased has not appointed him Heir on that Condition, which doth not appear in this Case. Without making these Enquiries, I say, it is sufficient to observe, that the Succession in Question depending on the Will of the People, and not at all on that of the King, as our Author supposes; a Neglect in the Execution of the last Orders of the Deceased, can never prejudice the lawful Successor, but in what relates to the private Estate, of which he had the full and entire Disposal.

[2] Most Fiefs pass only to the Males, the Females have no Share in them, though they may be equally Heirs to all the other Goods of their common Father. When the Vassal dies without Issue, or leaves only Daughters, the Fief passes to the collateral paternal Relations; tho' they have no Right of inheriting the other Goods; provided they be in the Line of Descendants from him who had the first Investiture. And according to the Feodal Law, a Son indeed ought necessarily either to refuse or accept of both the Inheritances; but the collateral Relation, (adgnatus) who succeeds on the Default of Issue, may retain the Fief, and refuse the Inheritance of the other Goods, Lib. II. Tit. XLV. An adgnatus, vel Filius possit retinere Feudum, repudiata hereditate. (IV. 54. Edit. Cujac.) See CUJAS on that Title; as also GIPHANIUS, Antinom. Jur. Feud. Disp. V. Num. 46, &c. TREUTLER, Vol. II. Disp. XII. Thes. IV. ANTHONY CONTIUS, Method. de Feudis, Cap. VIII. § 7, &c. COVARRUVIAS, Var. Resol. Lib. II. Cap. XVIII. Num. 4, &c.

[3] Concerning the Nature and Origin of the Right to a Lease, see PUFENDORF, B. IV. Chap. IX. § 3. As this Right is founded on a private Agreement made between the Proprietor of the Lands and the Lessee; when the Lessee has taken them, for himself and his Children, they succeed by Vertue of the Agreement, not as Heirs to their Father. So that they may keep the Succession, even tho' they decline the Inheritance of the other Goods. This is the Case in Question, and the Foundation of the Decision of those whose Opinion our Author follows, as GAILLUS, Observ. Lib. II. Cap. XXVIII. Num. 17. But the contrary Opinion seems better grounded, according to the Principles of the Civil Law, as ANTHONY FAURE proves, De Error. Pragmaticorum. Decad. XXIII. Err. 10. In which he is followed even by BACHOVIUS, (Not. & Animadv. in TREUTLER, Vol. II. Disp. XII. Thes. IV.) who on all other Occasions inveighs against him with the utmost Fury; but he takes Care not to quote him here. Were we to judge of the Matter by the Law of Nature alone, it is certain, that the Proprietor treated only with the first Purchaser of the Lease, and that he had no Thoughts of granting the Lessee's Children a Right independent of that of the Deceased. The Clause, For him and his Children, is inserted in the Contract in Favour of the Proprietor, that, the Children dying, the Estate may return to him; whereas otherwise it would pass to the collateral Relations, and even to other Heirs, according to the Practice and Custom of granting Leases. But, as such Persons would have no Right but as Heirs, so the Children can only in that Quality pretend to any Thing by Vertue of the said Clause, which makes no Alteration in the Essence of the Contract. And this is likewise conformable to the Proprietor's Intention, who designed that the Estate should return to him as soon as possible. But if the Lessee had intended to get the Lease for his Children, whether his Heirs or not, he ought to have seen the Clause so worded; otherwise there is Room to believe that he submitted to the Sense required by the Nature of the Thing.

[4] The Patron, or former Master of a freed Man, might give one of his Children in particular the Right of Patronage, which otherwise was divided among them all. This was called Adsignatio Liberti. But he, who thus became sole Heir of the Right of Patronage, could not confer it on another; and if he died without Children, this Right reverted to the Patron's other Children. Tho' a Son was disinherited by his Father, this did not hinder the Father from assigning him the Right of Patronage, and even, tho' this was done after such Assignment, the Donation was not always thereby annulled. Digest. Lib. XXXVIII. Tit. IV. De adsignandis libertis, Leg. VIII. and Leg. I. § 6, 7. See the Interpreters on the Institutes, Lib. III. Tit. IX. whence it appears, that the Right of Patronage was considered as distinct from the Inheritance of the other Goods. The same may be said of Ecclesiastical Patronages, which resemble those of the Roman Law only in Name.

[5] Jus praecipui, as it is termed by the Lawyers, and antient Latin Authors. See BRISSON'S Law Dictionary. It is when one of the Coheirs has a Legacy, which he may take before the Division of the Estate. According to the Roman Law, such a Coheir may renounce his Share in the Inheritance, without quitting his Preciput. Digest. Lib. XXX. De Legatis & Fidei commissis. I. Leg. XVII. § 2. and Leg. LXXXVII. See CUJAS on this Law, in PAPINIAN. p. 481, &c. Tom. IV. Opp. Edit. Fabrott. and a Dissertation by the late Mr. HERTIUS, De Praelegatis, § 15. p. 321, &c. Tom. II. of his Comment. & Opusc.

[6] See my fourth Note on PUFENDORF, B. VII. Chap. VII. § 12.

[7] Our Author cannot here speak of the Ascendants of the Deceased, as may at first Sight be imagined; for the Succession to a Kingdom doth not ascend, like private Inheritances. But he is talking of Brothers, in whose Person the Deceased is supposed to testify his Gratitude to their common Father, as has been said, § 9. Num. 3. It must be acknowledged, however, not only that the Expression is obscure, but that even the natural Order of the Words is reversed in the Original, where ob acceptum beneficium are placed before ob caritatem; for the Succession founded on a Duty of Gratitude usually takes Place only on Default of Children, who are the first Object of natural Affection.

N.B. Here Mr. BARBEYRAC adds, that his Version may remedy this Want of Exactness, Et [ut] Regni Possessor, &c. Comme aussi pour avoir lieu de se promettre que le Prince regnant auroit plus de soin de son Royaume, & le defendroit avec plus d'Ardeur, dans l'Esperance de le laisser aux Personnes qui lui sont les plus chères, ou par la Tendresse naturelle, qu'il a pour elles, ou par un Motif de Reconnoissance. Which may be thus englished, As also that they may have Room to promise themselves, that the Prince on the Throne will be more careful of his Kingdom, and defend it with more Vigour, in Hopes of leaving it to Persons who are most dear to him, either by natural Affection, or on a Motive of Gratitude.

[1] Allodium. This Word signifies an Estate possessed without acknowledging any Lord, to whom the Proprietor owes any Service, Rent, &c. or to whom the Estate ought to revert in certain Cases. In a Word, Allodium is opposed to Feudum. See Mr. THOMASII'S Selecta capita Historiae Juris Feudalis, §4, &c.

[2] An Infeoffment doth not in itself imply a Change in the Order of Succession. It is sufficient that the succeeding Kings pay Homage to the Prince to whom the Kingdom is become feudatary; and that the Crown falls to him in Case of Felony, or on Default of Heirs. Persons who enter into burthensome Engagements, like this, are, and ought to be, supposed to subject themselves as little as is possible; and it is incumbent on the other Party to see every Thing clearly expressed, which doth not necessarily follow from the Nature of the Thing itself; of which Sort is the Order of Succession, which may, and really doth, vary, according to the Difference of Places, or the Contracts between the Lord and the Vassal who received the first Investiture.

[1] That is, even when the Kingdom ceases to be a Fief. For here again no Necessity appears of altering the Succession. This would only serve to create Confusion, and occasion Quarrels. Besides, we ought here to suppose, that when the Kingdom was delivered from the Infeoffment, the People made no Regulation concerning the Order of the future Succession; for in that Case they must abide by the new Regulation, and the Question is superfluous. Now by leaving the Kingdom hereditary, and making no Regulation concerning the Order of the Succession, they have tacitly approved of that which took Place before; because some one is necessary. In a Word, the Order once established ought to subsist, except it be manifestly changed by those whose Business it is to do it; and consequently, in Case of a Doubt, the Presumption is in favour of the old Manner of succeeding, whatever it be.

[1] See Cardinal TUSCHUS, Pract. Concl. LXXXVIII. Verb. Regni Successio. WILLIAM DE MONTFERRAT, De Succession. Reg. His Book is in the Ocean. Juris. PEREGRINUS, De Jure Fisci, Lib. I. Tit. XI. Num. 44. and Lib. V. Tit. I. Num. 109. See Instances of such a Succession in the Kingdom of Norway, in that learned and most exact Author JOHN PONTAN, Hist. Danic. IX. Consuet. Norman de Propinquier. Haered. JOHN SERRAN. in Lodov. Gross. super, contr. BONON. ARGENTRAEUS, Hist. Brit. Lib. VI. Cap. IV. “In Successions, the Children of the eldest Son, whether Males or Females; and in Case these eldest die without Issue of their own Bodies begotten, then the Issue of the next elder do in a Succession to Fees, by Right of Primogeniture, represent the Persons of their Fathers, and come to such Rights of Succession and Primogeniture, in the same Manner as their Fathers would do, were they living, by excluding their Uncles both by the Father and Mother’s Side, according to a general and known Custom observed, as well in Successions by the Right Line, as by the Collateral: And from the aforesaid Use and Custom, a Daughter succeeds in Fees, whether Dutchies, Earldoms, Peerages, or Baronies, how great and noble soever; and this is what was practised too in Artois, Champagne, Thoulouse, and Bretagne.” Such an Order of Succession was prescribed the Marquisate of Mantua, by the Emperor Sigismund, Anno 1432, and by the Emperor Charles V. and Philip II. in their respective Kingdoms and Principalities, Anno 1554 and 1594. GROTIUS.

[2] For the Right of Representation, properly so called, can only make the Grandson, for Example, be considered as being in the same Degree with the Uncle, so that then the Age gives the Preference. Whereas in the lineal Succession under Consideration, the Deceased is supposed to have already excluded his Brother by Right of Eldership, and thus to have transferred the Crown to his Descendants. See § 30.

[3] As it is in Legacies, Quorum dies cessit, non venit. GROTIUS.

By these Legacies the Roman Law understands such as, tho’ due, are not to be paid but at the End of a certain Time; this takes Place when the Thing is bequeathed either purely and simply, or within a Time fixed; for then the Right being already acquired, passes to the Heir; whereas, when the Legacy is conditional, as before the Accomplishment of the Condition, Dies Legati non cedit, if the Legateedies, he transfers nothing to his Heirs. Digest. Lib. XXXVI. Tit. II. Quando dies Legatorum vel Fidei commissorum cedat, Leg. V. Princ. & § 2. See likewise ULPIAN, Tit. XXIV. § 31. with Mr. SCHULTING’s Notes. In Regard to the Difference between Legacies left on Condition, and conditional Stipulations, see CUJAS on Law LVII. of the Title of the Digest. De verborum obligationibus, p. 1233, 1234. Tom. I. and Observ. XIV. 32. XVIII. 1. as also Mr. JOSEPH AVERANI’s Interpretationes Juris Civil. Lib. II. Cap. XVI.

[a] Covar. T. 2. Pract. Qu. Cap. 38. Num. 5. Molin. De primogen. Hisp. Cap. 8.

[4] See Chap. IV. of this Book, § 10. Note 8.

[5] That is, in the publick Bodies or Councils, where the Places are hereditary; as in England, where the Peers, who compose the upper House of Parliament, transmit their Right of Sitting there, with their Dignity, to their male Children.

[1] An antient Testimony of the French Custom you have in Agathias, B. XI. And after Solomon, the Succession of David’s Family was the same. See 2 Chron. xxiii. 3. GROTIUS. After Solomon, we find Abijam succeeding Rehoboam, though not the eldest of his Sons.

- [2] As in the Province of Narbonne. See SERRANUS in his Life of Charles VI. 'Twas by such a Law I presume that The ulerick dying without Issue, his Sister's Son Athalarick succeeded him. And I am apt to think, that this did formerly obtain in Arragon. GROTIUS.
- [1] In Aethiopia formerly Sisters Sons succeeded their Princes, as NICOLAUS DAMASCENUS reports. BEDA observes, that the same was customary with the Picts, and that the Relations by the Woman's Side did always succeed. And TACITUS speaking of the Germans, Sisters Sons had the same Regard from their Uncle, as they had from their own Father. And some look upon this to be a more sacred and stricter Tye of Blood. OSORIUS and several others inform us that 'tis so among some of the Indian People. GROTIUS.
- [2] This by Gizerich's Will prevail'd in Africa. PROCOPIUS, Vandal I. Χρόνον δε ὀλίγον Γίξε Πύχος, &c. A little while after, Gizerich, pretty much advanced in Years, died leaving a Will behind him, in which among other things, he charged the Vandals to take Care that the Crown of the Vandals should always go to him, who being in the Male Line nearest related to him the said Gizerich, was also the eldest of all the rest in the same Degree. JORNANDES: Gizerich reigning a long time, just before his Death, called his Sons about him and enjoined them not to quarrel about the Crown, but that each should in his Turn and Degree succeed the other, that is, the eldest Son should be succeeded by him who is the next elder, and then he who is next to him should be his Successor. VICTOR UTICENS. Lib. XI. To whom of all the Grand-sons, as being the eldest of them, the Crown, according to King Gizerich's Constitution, did principally belong. Here, it is he, who first obtain'd the Kingdom, and not he who last filled the Throne, that is all along regarded. Now it is a Question whether Gizerich took this way of Succession from Africa itself; where we told you in the Text, that it was in force, or whether from some of our Northern People. For among the Lombards, though King Vaaces had left Sons behind him, yet none of them was to succeed him, but Risulphus his Nephew; as is testify'd by PROCOPIUS, Goth. III. And NICETAS CHONIATES de Reb. MANUEL, Lib. IV. says that when Jatra was dead, not his Children but his Brother, had a Right to the Crown of Hungary. I do not know whether the Method of Succession used by the Patzinacitae, and obscurely proposed by CONSTANTINE PORPHYROGEN. de Administrat. Imperii, Cap. XXXVII. may be referred hither too. CRANTZIUS, Danic. IV. and Suedic. V. reports, that the same was observed in Denmark. So Iulus, immediately descended of Ascanius, Aeneas's eldest Son, did not succeed Aeneas in Alba, but Sylvius another of Aeneas's Sons. GROTIUS.
- The Fact last mentioned is recorded by DIONYSIUS of Halicarnassus, who says, The People decided in Favour of Silvius, chiefly because his Mother (Lavinia, Aeneas's second Wife) was Heiress to the Kingdom, Antiq. Roman. Lib. I. Cap. LXX. p. 55, 56. Edit. Oxon. See also the Treatise, De Origine Gentis Romanae, ascribed to AURELIUS VICTOR, Cap. XVII. In another Part of this Note, where our Author speaks of the Succession to the Kingdom of Hungary, he has written Jatra instead of Geiza or Geicza; for the Historian there quoted means him. Besides, the Example is not quite to the Purpose; it being well known that the Kingdom of Hungary is not Successive, but Elective.
- [3] That Author says, That in Arabia Felix, Brothers are preferred to Children on account of their Age; and that those of the (Royal) Race reign and are invested with the other publick Offices. Geograph. Lib. XVI. p. 1129. Edit. Amst. (783. Paris.)
- [4] See M. DE THOU, Lib. LXVII. Tom. II. p. 199. Edit. Francof. It is the Country of Prekop or Krim, in the lesser Tartary.

[5] LIVIUS, of Masinissa: Whilst he was engaged in War for the Carthaginians in Spain, his Father dies. (his Name was Gala ) The Crown went to Oesalces, the King's Brother, 'tis the Custom in Numidia. See MARIANA, Lib. XXIX. who says the same of Mauritania. From hence among the Saracens, who were come from Africa into Spain, Brothers were preferred to Sons till Abderamen's Time, RODERICUS TOLET. Hist. Arab. Cap. VI. THUANUS, Hist. Lib. LXV. in Ann. 1578. speaking of Hamet. He was by his Father's Will called in his Turn after his Brothers to the Crown, their Children being quite excluded. And I observe from the Histories of those Places, that this kind of Succession prevailed in the Kingdoms of Mexico and Peru. GROTIUS.

As to what concerns Mexico, see LOPEZ DE GOMARA, Gen. History of the West Indies, B. II. Chap. LXXXVI. and B. III. Chap. XXII. The same Author speaks of Peru, B. V. Chap. LXXXVII. as doth GRACILLASSO DE LAVEGA, B. IV. Chap. X.

[6] That is, if the Deceased leaves several Children, or several Relations in the same Degree, the Feoffment of Trust ought to pass from one to the other, and not to the Children of him who had it first.

[7] According to the Law, quoted by our Author in the Margin, in the Affair of a Feoffment of Trust, left to a Family, those who are named (by the Testator) may be admitted to demand it: Or after the Death of all such Persons, those who bore the Name of the Testator at the Time of his Decease; allowing always the Preference to the nearest Relations, unless the Testator has expressly extended his Will to those in a more remote Degree. Digest. De Legatis & Fidei, Com. II. Lib. XXXI. Leg. XXXII. § 6. See CUJAS on this Law, Recit. in Digest. Tom. VIII. Opp. Edit. Fabrott. p. 1206, 1207, and ANTHONY FAURE, De Errorib. Pragmatic, Decad. LVI. Err. VII.

[1] It is of such a Kingdom we are to understand what BALDUS says, Procem. Decretal. Gregor. That a King may chuse which of his Children he pleases for a Successor. We have also an Instance of this Kind in the History of Mexico. GROTIUS.

[2] That is, in Regard to the Power of alienating, for in other Respects there is a wide Difference. A Kingdom, how Patrimonial soever, is still a State, that is a Society of Men subject to one and the same Government, for their own Advantage: The King therefore cannot absolutely dispose of the Kingdom, at Pleasure, so as to ruin the People, or make them fall into the Hands of one, from whom they may have Reason to fear ill Treatment; which is not even allowable, according to the Law of Nature, to a Master in Regard to his Slave.

[3] He had defiled Bilhah, his Father's Concubine. See Gen. xxxv. 22. xlix. 4.

[4] This was not the Cause of Adonijah's Exclusion from the Crown. Before he attempted to ascend the Throne, David had promised Bathsheba on Oath, to chuse her Son Solomon for his Successor; as it appears from 1 Kings i. 17. and GOD himself had already declared his Will in that Particular, 2 Chron. xxii. 9, 10, 11. Besides, we find in the whole Sacred History that the Kings named their Successors during their own Life, or even invested them with the Royal Dignity, with very little Regard to the Order of their Birth. And our Author, in a Note on this Place, observes that the Kingdom of David was as it were Patrimonial, not by Right of War, but by Virtue of a Donation from GOD himself.

[5] The Commentators have Reason to disapprove of this Opinion. However the Son may have behaved himself, it would be hard to look on him as deprived of his Right to the Crown, when his Father has not expressly disinherited him. Eventhough it does not appear that his Father has pardon'd him, that alone does not ground a sufficient Presumption of disinheriting him. It was in the Father's Power to punish his Son in another Manner; and, while the thing remains doubtful, paternal Tenderness ought always to incline Conjecture toward the more favourable Side. Our Author, in the Margin, quotes two Laws of the Digest, which speaks of Cases very different from this. The first supposes a Man, Who, two Years before his Death, dismisses two of his Freed-Men, discontinues their usual Maintenance, and afterwards makes a Will, in which he orders his Heir to allow all his freed Men, both those whom he before had, and those whom he from that Time gives their Liberty, a certain monthly Allowance. Whereupon it is enquired, whether a Feoffment in Trust is due to the two Persons before specified. To which it is answer'd, that they have no Claim unless they can plainly prove the Patron had changed his Mind in their Favour, at the Time of making the said Will. Lib. XXXI. De Legat. & Fidei Com. II. Leg. LXXXVIII. § 11. In the other Law, we have this Case and Question proposed. A Woman left her Son in Law a certain Sum by Will. After which the Son in Law accuses the Testatrix of engaging Men to kill her Husband, the Legatee's Father. She died before the Judges gave their Opinion, who pronounced her innocent. But while the Cause was depending, she made a Codicil, in which she did not revoke the Legacy left to her Son in Law. It is enquired, if her Heirs are obliged to pay that Legacy? SCAEVOLA, the Lawyer, answers in the Negative. Lib. XXXIV. Tit. IV. De adimendis vel transferendis legatis. Leg. XXXI. § 2. Here OBRECHT says, that the Consequence drawn from this tacit Revocation of the Legacy, in the Cases last mentioned, to the tacit disinheriting, supposed in that of a Son, whom it doth not appear that the King, his Father, has pardoned the Crime committed against him, is not just; because the Legacy is a mere Gift. Whereas, by the Civil Law, Children have some Right to the Goods of their Fathers, even during the Life of their Fathers. But something more precise must be added, for shewing the Difference of the Cases in Question. I say therefore, that the Patron, by dismissing the two freed Men, and discontinuing their Maintenance, plainly expressed his Disposition of leaving them nothing for their Maintenance, and excluding them from the Number of those, whom he design'd an Allowance. See CUJAS, Recit. in Digest. Tom. VII. p. 1366. and in Resp. Scaevolae, Tom. V. Part II. p. 150, 151. So that, while no Proof of the Change of his Mind appears, what he has done in their Regard is in its self sufficient for founding a Presumption, that, how general soever the Expressions of his Will are, they are by no Means included in it. Whereas the King, as our Author supposes, has done nothing of this Nature; he has only testified his being angry with his Son: And it does not follow from that alone, that he had an Intention to disinherit him, especially in Regard to his Succession to the Crown. As to the Mother-in-Law, the Legacy she had left to her Son-in-Law, became null of its self, from the Moment such a heinous Accusation was brought; and that by Vertue of a Presumption, authorised by the Laws; which suppose a Testator must necessarily change his Mind in Regard to the Legatee, when some Cause of great Enmity arises, after the Will is made. Digest. Lib. XXXIV. Tit. IV. De adim. vel transfer. legatis, &c. Leg. III. §. 11. This Presumption is grounded on what usually happens; for there are few, who in such a Case, would not revoke a Legacy bequeathed to one, who shews himself so unworthy of their Liberality. So that, though no express Revocation appears, there is Reason to believe that the Testator either had not an Opportunity of making it, that he did not think of it, or thought it would be understood of Course. But the Case is not the same with a Father in Regard to disinheriting. How much soever he may be incensed against his Son, he does not commonly proceed to that Extremity without great Difficulty. Thus the bare Want of an evident Reconciliation, or Pardon, does not imply a tacit disinheriting. Here an express Declaration is necessary. On this Principle, the Roman Laws require that a Father, who designs to disinherit his Son, should expressly declare such his Intention. Institut. Lib. II. Tit. XII. De exhaeredatione liberorum.

[6] So that, he can neither dispose of by Will, nor leave the Crown to an adopted Child. See MARIANA. Hist. Lib. XI. (Cap. XX.) concerning the Kingdom of Naples. GROTIUS.

- [7] Mr. VITRIARIUS, Inst. Jur. Nat. & Gent. Lib. II. Cap. VII. Num. 58. makes a Restriction in this Case, after other Authors, viz. When the Publick good requires it; as when the King's Son is engaged in a Conspiracy to the Prejudice of the State; in which Case it is easily presumed that the People consent to his being excluded from the Succession.
- [1] On Condition he does not take this Step at an unseasonable Time, as when the Kingdom would fall into the Hands of a Minor, especially if it is threatened with a War, &c. This is the judicious Remark of Mr. VITRIARIUS, ibid. Num. 59. which likewise he makes after others.
- [2] The Right comes originally from the Will of the People; and the present People are, and ought to be reckon'd the same as those, who formerly regulated the Order of the Succession. The publick Interest requires that such Renunciations should be valid; and that the Persons interested should not attempt to annul them. For at some Times, and in some Circumstances they are necessary for the Good of the State; so that if those with whom one has to do, are of Opinion that the Renunciation will be afterwards disregarded, they will not sit down contented with that alone.
- Besides, this must unavoidably give Birth to bloody Wars, to which it is not probable the People would expose themselves, for preserving a Right of Succession in Favour of Princes, not yet born. Farther, the Necessity of Contracts between different Nations, none of which is obliged to conform to the Civil or Publick Law of the others, seems to require that, in certain Cases, even Princes already born should lose the Right of succeeding, by the Renunciation of their Father. See a Book intituled, Entretiens, dans lesquels on traite des Entreprises de l'Espagne, &c. Printed at the Hague in 1719.
- [1] In Regard to the Kingdom of France, see M. DE THOU, Hist. Lib. CV. at the Year 1593. See also GUICCIARDINI. GROTIUS.
- [2] That is, he cannot impose a Necessity on his Successor to follow his Orders, and confirm what he has done, in Regard to Things in which no Man has acquired a real and perpetual Right. For the learned GRONOVIVS trifles here, when he pretends that our Author allows the Successor a Power of maintaining no Alliance, no Treaty, no Contract, in which his Predecessor engaged. The contrary evidently appears from what he says, Chap. XIV. of this Book, § 12, 13.
- [3] But as PUFENDORF observes, B. VII. Chap. VII. § 15. The Business of a Dispute concerning the Succession to the Kingdom does not belong to those Things which depend on this Jurisdiction, which the People has transferred on the King. I heartily agree with Mr. BOHMER (Introduct. ad jus Public. Univers. Part. Spec. Lib. III. Cap. IV. § 20.) who maintains that the People have a Right to pronounce absolutely in such Contests. It is supposed, says he, that neither of the Pretenders is in actual Possession of the Crown. Now on that Foot, neither of them is yet Sovereign: They only both aspire at becoming such. So that the People actually depend on neither of them; but then return by Accident and Interim to an Independence, till the Affairs are decided; and consequently may, during that Time, judge definitively. Besides, this Dispute is to be decided on the Presumptions that may be form'd concerning the Will of the People, who originally established the Order of the Succession. But who can judge better of that than the People themselves? For, as our Author acknowledges, the People who now live are reckon'd the same as those who lived formerly. But if we will not stand by the Decision of the People, or of those who represent them, as the States or Grandees of the Kingdom; the Difference can be ended only by Force and Arms; which is very contrary to the Good of Civil Society. As for the rest, the People, when they pronounce on such Disputes, do not arrogate to themselves the Right of Election, which they have renounced by establishing an Order of Succession: They only determine which of the two Pretenders of the Royal Family has the better Right. Sometimes the People have even expressly reserved to themselves a Right of judging in such Cases, by a fundamental Law, which then removes all Doubt on the Subject. This is the Sentiment of the Author just quoted. He adds, however, that, if either of the Pretenders has seized on the Crown, and forced them to take the Oath of Allegiance; the People have no longer a Right of judging, because they then depend on the Possessor of the Crown. But I can never come into this Way of thinking; for if the People have a Right of judging, nothing but their Judgment can authorize the Possession of either Pretender: Otherwise that Right would be very useless. And a forced Consent cannot be considered as the Judgment of the People. Besides, in Order to make the bare taking Possession an apparent Title in this Case, there ought at least to be very specious and almost equal Reasons on both Sides; which does not often happen. The Right of one of the Pretenders may easily be pretty clear; if therefore the other, whose Pretensions are grounded only on frivolous Reasons, finds Means to form a Party in his Favour, and seize on the Crown; why should it not be in the People's Power, if they have an Opportunity, to dispossess the Usurper, after they have deliberately examined and discovered the Right of the other Pretender? In fine, as to the Substance of the Question, I think the Author ought to have decided it as we do, for the same Reason which he elsewhere gives why the People should have the Regency of the Kingdom in the Interim, while their King is detain'd a Prisoner. See B. III. Chap. XX. § 3. Num. 2.

[4] Either in a General Assembly of the States of a Kingdom, as is practised in England and Scotland. See CAMDEN on the Years 1571, 1572. or by Deputies, as was done in the Kingdom of Arragon, according to MARIANA, Hist. Lib. XX. GROTIUS.

[5] The Latin Translator hath Regnum populi arbitrio permisit. And I find that the learned Mr. BOVIN, in a Dissertation written professedly for examining what pass'd on Occasion of that Election, has not even suspected any Fault in the common Version; for thus he expresses the Sense of the Greek Historian in French. Comme Euphaes ne laissoit point d'enfans, il choisit pour son Successeur celui qui seroit élu par le Peuple Messenin. [As Euphaes left no Children, he appointed the Person, whom the Messenians should chuse, for his Successor.] Dissert. sur un Fragment de DIODORE de Sicile, p. 138. Tom. III. of the Memoires de Literature de l'Academie Royale des Belles Lettres, Edit. Amst. But I am much mistaken if the Greek does not give us a very different Idea. The Words are these: Ἐυφᾶει δὲ οὐκ ὄντων παιδίων, τὸν αἰρεθέντα ὑπὸ τοῦ Δήμου κατελείπετο ἔχειν τὴν ἀρχήν. That is: As Euphaes had not Children, it was the People's Business to chuse him a Successor. Lib. IV. Cap. X. It is evident from the Sequel of the Discourse, that the Historian speaks of what pass'd after the Demise of Euphaes. Besides, the very Construction of the Words will not allow of our Author's Translation. The Mistake arises from not observing this Way of speaking: κατελείπετο τὸν αἰρεθέντα, &c. ἔχειν τὴν ἀρχήν: Reliquum erat, ut electus à Populo haberet Imperium. [It remain'd that the Person chosen by the People should have the Crown.] CICERO and CAESAR have said Relinquitur, ut, &c. in the same Sense, as might be shewn, if we were disposed to criticize, and the Fault was not plain enough. It must be said then that King Euphaes did not leave the Choice of a Successor to the Messenians; but that the People made use of their Right in this Case. Thus the Example is nothing to the Purpose.

[6] Our Author here follows PLUTARCH, whom he quotes in the Margin, De Amore fraterno, p. 488. Tom. II. Edit. Wech. But JUSTIN, whom he likewise quotes, says that Xerxes and Artimenes (for so Artabazanes is called by others) referred the Decision of the Matter to their Uncle Artaphernes. Lib. II. Cap. II. Num. 9. And, as the learned GRONOVIVS observes, according to HERODOTUS, Lib. VII. Cap. II. Darius himself determined the Dispute between his Children: So that here are several Variations, which will not allow us to lay any Stress on this Example.

[1] The Question may be understood of the Children of a King, who was the first of his Family that was chosen to reign in a State, where the Crown is successive; or of the Children of a Prince of the Royal Family, born before he actually ascended the Throne in the Order of Succession. Our Author certainly speaks of both Cases; at least his Decision is just in both; and the former admits of less Difficulty, than the latter. For when the People give the Crown to a Prince, and his Descendants, if at that Time he has Children, they without doubt are consider'd as his first Successors, and not those who may be born after, but whose Birth is uncertain. So that, unless there is an express Clause in the fundamental Law of the Succession, importing that it belongs to the future Children of the Prince elected; they can have no Right to the Crown, but after the others. See HUBER, De jure Civit. Lib. I. Sect. VII. Chap. VII. § 24. &c.

[2] Who was afterwards called Artaxerxes Mnemon. See PLUTARCH, Vit. Artax. (p. 1012. Tom. I.) GROTIUS.

[3] Herod the Great, their Father, having obtain'd the Emperor Augustus's Permission for naming which of his Sons he pleased, for Successor, or even for dividing the Kingdom of Judea among them; declared that, after his Demise, the Crown should devolve first to Antipater, his eldest Son, who was born when he was a private Man: Then to Alexander and Aristobulus, his Sons by Mariamne, born after his Accession to the Throne. This is the Account given by JOSEPHUS, Antiq. Jud. Lib. XVII. Cap. VI. and VII.

[4] See FLAVIUS BLONDUS, Hist. Decad. II. Lib. VI. and MICHAEL RITIUS, de reb. Hungar. Lib. II. as quoted by HOTMAN, Geissa, or Geicza, of whom I have already spoken, Note 2. on § 24. was the second of that Name. He acceded to the Throne in 1141. on the Demise of Bela II. his Father, surnamed the Blind.

[5] See SIGEBERT (in Chron.) and the Notes of HENRY MEIBOMIUS on the third Book of WITTIKIND's Annals. In the Turkish Empire, Bajazet and Gémes disputed the Succession, the former was the Elder; but Gémes was born in his Father's Reign. Bajazet carried his Point. MARIANA, Hist. Lib. XXIV. Constantine Ducas left the Empire to his three Sons, two of whom, Michaël and Andronicus, were born of Eudisia before he was Emperor; and Constantine, the third, was born in the Purple, πορφυρογέννητος. [For which Reason he invested him with the most splendid Marks of the Imperial Dignity.] ZONARAS (Tom. III. in Vit. Constant. Duc.) See CORSET, De Prole Regal. Part III. Quaest. XXVI. GROTIUS.

To the Examples given in this Paragraph, our Author might have added a Decision of the Roman Law, which, though it has no Relation to the Succession of Princes, may yet serve to illustrate the Matter, because it regards a publick Dignity. The Words are these: We ought to receive the Son of a Senator, whether natural or adopted.—Nor is any Difference to be made, whether he was born after his Father was invested with the senatorial Dignity, or before. Digest. Lib. I. Tit. IX. De Senatorib. Leg. V. See also PAUL's Receptae Sententiae, Lib. I. Tit. II. Ad Municipal. § 6. and Mr. SCHULTING on the Place, p. 215. As likewise his Enarratio, Part. I. Digest. on Tit. II. De Senatorib. § 4. Where he quotes JAMES GODEFROY, on the Theodosian Code, Lib. VI. Tit. II. p. 9. Tom. II. To which may be added DUAREN. Disp. Annivers. Lib. II. Cap. XXII.

[1] This Example was employ'd by Demaratus, when banished the Kingdom of Sparta, as a Hint for Darius in the Dispute with Artabazanes about the Succession to the Crown of Persia. Lib. VII. Cap. III. See Note (7) on the following Paragraph. But I am surprized that this considerable Circumstance of the Order of Succession to the Throne of Lacedemonia is entirely omitted by NICOLAS CRAGIUS, De Republ. Laced. Lib. II. Cap. II. And by UBBO EMMIUS, who has treated on that Subject after him. Vet. Graec. Tom. III. p. 118. &c.

- [2] JOHN GALEATI had been in Possession of the Dutchy of Milan; but Lewis Sforza pretended that his Brother had not thereby any Right to it to his Prejudice; and therefore seiz'd on the Government, tho' his Brother had left a Son. But he alledged other Pretexts for the Support of his Claim. See GUICCIARDINI, Lib. I. Fol. 17. Ver. Tom. I. of the old French Translation, by JEROM CHOMEDEY, printed at Geneva in 1593. And PAULUS JOVIUS, Lib. II. Fol. 37. Ver. Tom. I. Strasbourg Edit. 1556.
- [3] Xerxes himself associated Artaxerxes Longimanus to the Kingdom, not Darius or Hystaspes, who were both elder than the other, but born before their Father's Accession to the Throne. [See PETAU, De Doctrinâ temp. Lib. X. Cap. XXV. And Rationar. Part II. Lib. III. Cap. X.] But perhaps the Succession to the Crown of Persia really depended on the Suffrages of the People, yet so that they were obliged to bestow it on one of the Royal Family. For AMM. MARCELLIN. says this Regulation took Place in Regard to the Arsacides, a Parthian Family, the Persians being for sometime subject to that People. Lib. XXIII. (Cap. VI. p. 397. Edit. Vales. Gron.) ZONARAS in Justin says the same of the Persian Kings, who succeeded the Parthians. GROTIUS.
- [4] HERODOTUS gives it as his Opinion, that Tho' Darius had not declared for Xerxes, he would have reigned; because Atossa was in Condition of doing what she pleased. Lib. VII. Cap. III.
- [1] About the Year 942, a great Dispute arose on this Question in Germany. The Emperor Otho I assembled the States of the Empire, in Order to decide it. As they could come to no Agreement, the Decision was put on the Issue of a Duel. The Conqueror was he who maintained that the Right of Representation took Place, and therefore the Nephews ought to divide the Succession equally with their Uncle. WITTIKIND, Hist. Lib. II. SIGEBERT, Chronic. Otho I. at the Year 942, as quoted by HOTOMAN, in the Place specified in the Margin.
- [2] See REGIN. CHOPPIN, De Dominio, Lib. II. THOMAS GRAMMATICUS, Decis. Neapol. I. JOANNES LE CIRIER, De Primogenit. in Ocean. Juris. (Tom. X.) MARIANA, Hist. Lib. XX. XXVI. CROMER, Hist. Polon. Lib. XXX. GROTIUS.
- [a] Wittik. Sax. Hist. 2. Molin. de prim. Lib. 3. Cap. 8.
- [3] See § 11. Note 1. For which Reason formerly in the Palatinate, Rupert the younger Brother was preferred to another of the same Name, descended of an elder Brother. See REINKING, Lib. I. Class IV. Cap. XVII. Num. 35. GROTIUS.
- [4] See Chap. XVI. of this Book, § 10, 12. But this Distinction is of no Use here; and our Author's Explanation is very well grounded, independently of any Support from the Right of Representation, considered in itself. For wherever that Right is established by the Laws of the Country, the Person who represents his Father is the nearest Relation; because, by Vertue of the Law, he is reckoned the same Person as his Father, so that as his Father, if alive, would have been the nearest Relation, he is so too.
- [5] I own, they are not in the same Degree, if we consider natural Proximity; for the Grandson is one Degree farther removed from the deceased King than the younger Son. But by Vertue of the Right of Representation, authorised by the Laws, the Grandson, who represents his Father, is thereby reckoned the same Person, as is before observed; and thus he is in the same Degree with his Uncle.
- [b] Procop. Bell. Va. Lib. 1. Cap. 7, 8.

[6] It was Honoric, (or Heuneric) Son of Genzon, who was preferred to Gondamond. See the Notes on § 24. on Occasion of such an Order of Succession. GROTIUS.

In the Text Henricus is put instead of Honoricus, or Heunericus; which was certainly a Fault in the Impression. But our Author makes more than one Mistake in this Place. First, Honoric, or Heuneric, was Gonzon's younger Brother, not his Son, and died before him. Secondly, Gondamond, on the contrary, was Gonzon's Son. Thirdly, It ought therefore to have been said, conformably to the Truth of History, and to make the Example to the Purpose, that Honoric, Gizeric's younger Son, was preferred to Gondamond, the Son of Genzon his elder Brother. BODIN, De Repub. Lib. VI. Cap. V. p. 1145, is also mistaken in making Honoric, Grandson to Gizeric, where he treats on this Subject. Our Author seems to have had him in View; for that Writer, like him, is wrong in quoting PROCOPIUS, Lib. II. Bell. Vandal.

[c] Con. Vicerius, Vit. Hen. VII.

[d] Aym. Lib. 3. Cap. 62.

[e] Plut. Lyc. Just. Lib. 3. Cap. 2.

[7] The learned GRONOVIVS says, that this Preference was not made in Consequence of any fundamental Law relating to the Succession, but because the Lacedemonians finding Cleonymus a Man of too violent a Temper, and inclined to Tyranny, would not allow him to reign; by Way of Revenge, he engaged Pyrrhus to declare War with them. PLUTARCH indeed seems to insinuate this, in the Life of Pyrrhus, p. 400. Tom. I. Edit. Wech. But PAUSANIAS, in the Place mentioned by our Author in the Margin, tells us in plain Terms, that, on the contrary, Cleonymus was excluded, and Areus promoted to the Throne, because it was his Right in the Order of Succession. And that, according to the Laws, the Son of an elder Brother deceased succeeded, preferably to his Uncle, appears from what PLUTARCH himself says, in the Passage quoted by our Author, viz. that Lycurgus, who had it in his Power to appropriate the Crown to himself, declared it belonged to his Nephew Charilas. GRONOVIVS farther accuses our Author of contradicting what he himself had said in the preceding Paragraph, concerning the Preference made by the Lacedemonians, according to their Laws, in Favour of a younger Brother, born after his Father's Accession to the Throne; which does not agree with a lineal agnatic Succession, such as GROTIUS supposes was established in Lacedemonia. But this only proves, that our Author designs to speak here of an irregular lineal Succession; as he insinuates both in this and the foregoing Paragraph.

[8] See DE SERRES, Invent. de l'Hist. de France, in the History of Charles V. surnamed The Wise. And MARIANA, Hist. Lib. XVIII. where he says that Edward's Sons did not dispute the Crown with their Nephews. The same Writer having in B. XIV. treated of the Contest between Sanchez, Son of Alphonso, King of Castile and Leon, and his Grandson, tells us, that the States decided in Favour of the former; we do not know, says he, whether this was done unjustly or not. GROTIUS.

Our Author in the Text puts John instead of Richard; for the Historians by him quoted speak of the latter. See DE SERRES, p. 196. John is the Name of one of Richard's Uncles; and the other was called Edmond, and not Hemon. See POLYDORE VIRGIL, Hist. Ang. Lib. XX. and the Extract of The publick Acts of England, in the Bibliotheque Choisie, Tom. XXVI. p. 1, &c.

[1] See DE SERRES, Invent. de l'Hist. de France, in the Life of Philip Augustus, where he speaks of the Dispute between John and Artus, concerning the Succession to the Crown of England, (p. 118.) The same Historian gives an Account of a like Decision in Favour of the lineal Succession, in Regard to the Dutchy of Bretagne. Vies de Philippe de Valois,

[2] Novel. CXVIII. Cap. III.

[3] According to the old Roman Law, Nephews succeeded only when there was no Brother nor Sister of the Deceased remaining. See Code, De legitim. haeredib. Leg. III. and Leg. XIV. § 1.

[1] For the Uncle of the Deceased was already excluded by the Proximity of the Line of the Deceased, in which the Deceased's Nephew is, in Case of a lineal Succession. And he is excluded by the Proximity of the Degree, if the Succession is hereditary, and the Right of Representation takes Place: For then the Nephew is reckoned in the same Degree with the Deceased.

[a] Dig. Lib. 26. Tit. 3. De legit. Tutor. Leg. 3. § 5.

[1] MARIANA, Hist. Hisp. Lib. XXVI. decides, that this ought to take Place in Portugal. He tells us however, that contrary to this Maxim, Emanuel was preferred to the Emperor Maximilian, by the People's Favour. The same Historian says, Lib. XII. that if, in the Kingdom of Castile, Ferdinand, the Son of Berengere, younger Sister to King Henry deceased, was preferred to Blanche, the said King's elder Sister; it was done out of Hatred to France, because Blanche was married to a French Prince.

[1] ILLESCAS, Hist. Pontif. Lib. VI. Cap. XIX. Afflict. Cap. I. Col. V. De Natura succed. Aguirr. Apolog. Num. 82.

[2] In that Country, according to MARIANA, it was formerly thought that a Brother ought to succeed, to the Exclusion of the Daughter of the deceased King. They afterwards stuck so close to the lineal Succession, that a Sister's Son was preferred to those who descended from the Brother, but in a more remote Degree. Hist. Lib. XV. 13. XIX. 21. XX. 2, 8. The same Historian, speaking of Alphonso, says, He ordered that his Grandsons should succeed to the Kingdom of Arragon, preferably to the Sons of Ferdinand; and that even his Grandsons by his Daughter should be preferred to the Daughters of Ferdinand in Case of a Failure of male Heirs. Lib. XXIV. Thus, he adds, the Right of the Crown is frequently altered, according to the Fancy of Kings. See the same Writer, XXVII. 3. GROTIUS.

[1] That is, to that arbitrary Law, established by a tacit Consent of Nations, which our Author supposes, without any Foundation. See B. I. Chap. 1. § 14. Note 3. But, as has been observed, the Roman Lawyers understand no more by the Law of Nations, than what the modern Interpreters call Jus Naturale secundarium. See what I have said on PUFENDORF, B. II. Chap. III. § 23. Note 3. of the second Edition; and Mr. NOODT's Commentary on the first Part of the Digest. p. 6, &c. It appears from the very Title, which contains the Subjects which our Author proposes to handle, that this was the Notion of the antient Lawyers. For we acquire the Dominion of some Things by the Law of Nature, which as we said is called the Law of Nations; and of some by the Civil Law. Institut. De Divisione rerum, &c. Lib. II. Tit. I. § 11. So that our Author's Criticism is just, only as it shews that certain Decisions of the Roman Lawyers are not founded on the true Principles of the Right of Nature common to all Nations; tho' they give them as such.

[2] Nations agree, tho' we know not certainly whence this Agreement arises, about other Customs, which have no Relation to Law. PLINY gives us several Instances of this Sort; as that the Bodies of Children who had no Teeth should not be burnt, [at the Time when it was the general Custom of paying the last Duties to the Dead in this Manner]. Hist. Nat. Lib. VII. Cap. XVI. that the Ionian Characters should be used in Writing. Ibid. Cap.

LVII. He speaks also of the Use of Barbers, as of a Thing in which the Nations agreed. Cap. LIX. of the Distinction of the Hours. Cap. LX. of the religious Respect paid to the Knees of a Person, Lib. XI. Cap. XLV. and the Custom of adoring Lightening with Clapping of the Hands, or a certain Motion of the Tongue, Lib. XXVIII. Cap. XLV. GROTIUS.

[3] The original Words are, Neque enim pertinet ad mutuum Gentium inter se Societatem. The Author expresses himself in Terms still more clear and strong, at the Close of the Chapter, Ab his (Juribus) quae Societatis humanae vinculum continent. I make this Observation to shew that his Ideas of the Nature of his Law of Nations, are not very clear, nor very certain. He defines it an arbitrary Law; but what is necessary for maintaining Society among all Nations, is not an arbitrary Thing; they are indispensibly obliged to observe it, by Vertue of the Law of Nature, whether they are willing or not.

[4] Wild Beasts, Birds, and Fishes; that is, all Animals which are produced in the Sea, in the Air, and on the Earth, as soon as they are caught by any one, immediately begin to be his by the Law of Nations. For what before was no Man's Property, is granted to the Occupant by natural Reason. Instit. Lib. II. Tit. I. De divisione rerum, &c. § 12. We may here observe, that Jus gentium, and Naturalis Ratio, are the same Thing, according to the Roman Lawyers.

[1] Digest. Lib. XLI. Tit. II. De adquir. vel amittenda possessione. Leg. III. § 14. Quae in Sylvis circumseptis vagantur. But we ought to read, in Sylvis non circumseptis; which makes a Sense directly contrary to what is commonly found in the Words, and such a one as is agreeable to our Author's Opinion. See Note I. on PUFENDORF, B. IV. Chap. IV. § 11.

[1] Institut. Lib. II. Tit. II. De divisione rerum, § 12. See PUFENDORF, B. IV. Chap. VI. § 12. and the Notes on that Place.

[2] See what I have said on PUFENDORF, in the Chapter last quoted, § 1. Note 1. It must be observed, with OBRECHT, that the Roman Lawyers admitted of the Presumption on which our Author grounds this tacit abandoning of a wild Beast. This appears from the last Words of the Paragraph of the Institutes, referred to in the foregoing Note, It is presumed to recover its natural Liberty, when either it is out of your Sight; or, tho' still in your View, cannot be pursued without Difficulty. But I do not find they say any Thing (as they ought to do in Order to reason conclusively) concerning the Exception of a stronger Presumption, founded on Marks set on a wild Beast, from which there is Reason to conclude, that the Proprietor hopes to be able to recover his Beast, after it has made its Escape. And in Reality this is not impossible, especially when the wild Beast is grown a little tame. So that it is a vain Pretence of ZIEGLER; that from the single Consideration of the Beast being wild, it is supposed that the Proprietor, who cannot be unacquainted with the Nature of the Animal, designs to keep the Property of it only as long as he has Possession of it.

[3] Digest. Lib. XLI. Tit. II. De adquir. vel amitt. possess. Leg. XIII.

[4] Which the Grecians call Γνωρίσματα, and the Latins, Crepundia. The former of these Words occurs in DONATUS, the Grammarian, who speaks of the Marks or Tokens with which Children were exposed. Monumenta sunt quae Graeci dicunt. Γνωρίσματα, καὶ σπάργανα. On TERENCE's Eunuch, Act. IV. Scen. VI. (ver. 15.) APULEIUS uses the Word Crepundia in the same Sense. Apolog. (p. 64. Edit. Pricaei.) GROTIUS.

[5] See the Notes on PUFENDORF, B. IV. Chap. VI. § 2, 9, 10.

[6] HARMENOPULUS says, that he who has wounded a Beast does not become Master of it till he catches it. Lib. II. Tit. I. (Num. 26. Edit. Gothofr.) GROTIUS.

[7] The Question was proposed, whether a wild Beast, which is so wounded that it may be taken, is immediately understood to be our Property? Trebatius declared in the Affirmative.—Most were of Opinion that it did not become our Property till we took it; because several Accidents may prevent our taking it, which is true. Digest. Lib. XLI. Tit. I. De acquir. rerum Dominio. Leg. V. § 1.

[8] In PETRONIUS ARBITER we have this Expression, Vides, quod aliis Leporem excitavi? Do you observe that I have started a Hare for the Use of others? (Cap. CXXXI.) OVID alludes to this proverbial Way of speaking (in De Art. amat. Lib. III. ver. 660, 661.)

*Credula si fueras, aliae tua gaudia carpent,
Et lepus hic aliis exagitatis erit.*

By the Laws of the Lombards, whoever killed, or found a Beast which had been wounded by another, had a Claim to a Shoulder and seven Ribs of it; the Remainder belonged to the Person who had wounded it, provided it was not more than twenty-four Hours since the Wound was received, (Lib. I. Tit. XXII. Leg. IV. VI.) GROTIUS.

[9] Metamorph. Lib. V. ver. 320. But the Poet is there speaking of a different Thing, as I have observed on PUFENDORF, B. IV. Chap. VI. § 8. Note 1.

[1] That is, not that they be always our own Property; for we may make use of such as we borrow, with the Proprietor's Consent; but that there is no Impediment to our using them where they are placed. Consequently, the Place must either belong to the Person who would hunt in it, or it must be publick; or, if it be an Estate belonging to another, it is necessary that the Proprietor should consent to the Action.

[2] See Digest. Lib. XLI. Tit. I. De acquir. rerum Dom. Leg. LV. and Note 2. on PUFENDORF, B. IV. Chap. VI. § 9.

[a] Host. & alii in C. Non est: De decimis. Jason, cons. 119.

[1] See what JOHN of Salisbury says in his Policrat. (Lib. I. Cap. IV.) concerning the Abuses of this Law. GROTIUS.

[2] See PUFENDORF, B. IV. Chap. VI. § 5, 6, 7.

[3] The Person mentioned by STRABO, as quoted by our Author in the Margin, was not an Intendant of the old Kings of Aegypt, but an Intendant of the Roman Emperors, established after that Country was reduced to the Form of a Province. The Geographer calls that Office, ἴδιος λόγος, and CASAUBON judiciously observes, he was the same as the Digest. calls Procurator Caesaris, or Rationalis. See that learned Man's Commentary on LAMPRIIDIUS, Alex. Sever. Cap. XLV. and on CAPITOLINUS, Maximin. duob. Cap. XIV. What led our Author into this Mistake was, that it is said a little lower, that These Magistrates were the same, even under the Kings. But he did not observe, that this relates only to the Magistrates of the Country, Τῶν δ' ἐπιχωρίων ἄρχοντων, spoken of just before, who are clearly distinguished from the Officers established by the Roman Emperor. The Passage in Question stands thus, There is another Officer, called ἴδιος λόγος, whose Business it was to demand such Things as had no Master, and consequently ought to fall to Caesar. Lib. XVII. p. 1148. Edit. Amst. (797. Paris.) So that when Aegypt was governed by its own Laws, the Kings might not have had the same Right over Things which had no Master, as the Roman Emperors since had.

- [b] Covar. in C. peccatum. part 2. § 8.
- [1] In Portugal the Whales that come ashore belong to the King. GEORG. DE GABEDO, Decis. Lusitan. Part II. Decad. XLVIII. GROTIUS.
- [2] The Author makes an Island of this Macedonian City, which lies near the Sea, toward the Gulf of Strymon. The Fact is related by PLUTARCH, Quaest. Graec. XXIX. p. 298. Tom. II.
- [1] See PUFENDORF, B. IV. Chap. VI. § 13.
- [2] The People of Biblos had a Law, forbidding the carrying off what had not been put in the Place where it was found. APOLLONIUS of Tyana approved of this Maxim, as we are told by PHILOSTRATUS, in the Life of that Philosopher. GROTIUS.
The Law mentioned by our Author belonged to the Stagirites. See AELIAN, Var. Hist. Lib. III. Cap. XLVI. The same Author relates indeed, that the People of Byblos, a City of Phenicia, followed this Maxim in Practice, Lib. IV. Cap. I. p. 302. Edit. Perizon. But says nothing of a Law among them for it. As to what is observed in Regard to APOLLONIUS, I do not know that PHILOSTRATUS says any more than what will be presently mentioned in Note 4, and which relates to a very particular Case.
- [3] De Legib. Lib. XI. p. 913, 914. Edit. H. Steph.
- [4] The Question turns on a Dispute between a Seller and a Buyer, who had found a Treasure in the Field he had purchased. The Philosopher on that Occasion says, that The Characters of the two contending Parties were to be examined; and declares it his Opinion, that The Gods would not have permitted the Seller to dispossess himself of the Land, or have given the Treasure into the Hands of the Purchaser, had not the latter been a Man of better Morals than the former. Vit. Apoll. Tyan. Lib. II. Cap. XXXIX. Edit. Olear. To which the Author adds, that his Decision was received, and the Treasure disposed of accordingly. A Decision which shews that Philosopher's theological Notions were not more just than those he entertained in Regard to the Law of Nature.
- [5] This seems to have been practised at Rome, in PLAUTUS's Time; who in one of his Comedies makes Callicles say, that He bought a House in which he knew there was a Treasure, with a View of delivering it safe to his Friend, who had deposited it there, being sensible It would be judged to belong to the Purchaser of the House. (Trinum. Act. I. Scen. II. ver. 141, &c.) See also Act. V. Scen. II. ver. 22. GROTIUS.
- [6] This is not certain. See my second Note on PUFENDORF, B. V. Chap. III. § 3.
- [7] See the Institutes, Lib. II. Tit. II. De rer. Divisione, &c. § 39. And the Commentators on the Place; as also JAMES GODEFROY on the Theodosian Code, Lib. X. Tit. XVIII. De Thesauris, Tom. III. p. 485, &c.
- [8] See what TACITUS relates, Annal. Lib. XVI. (Cap. I. &c.) concerning the Treasures said to be found in Africa, which Nero devoured in Imagination, on the false News he had received of that Affair. See likewise PHILOSTRATUS, where he speaks of Atticus the Rhetorician. Vit. Sophist. (Lib. II. Cap. I. § 2. Edit. Olear.) GROTIUS.
- [9] See the Speculum Saxonicum, Cap. XXXV. Constitut. Sicul. Frideric. Lib. I. Tit. LVIII. and CIII. The same was practised among the Goths. King Theoderick says, in CASSIADORE, that It cannot be called Covetousness to take what no Proprietor complains he has lost. Var. Lib. IV. Cap. XXXIV. The same Prince elsewhere gives the following Directions to his Officers, Let those deposited Moneys, which by Length of Time have lost their competent Masters, be, by your Care and Diligence, thrown into our Treasuries; as we permit all our Subjects to remain in quiet Possession of what is their own, they ought cheerfully to leave to us what is no Man's Property. For he sustains no Damage by not possessing what is lost, who doth not lose his own Goods. Lib. VI. Cap. VIII. GROTIUS.

[1] See BARTOL. in Tract. Tyberiad. BAPTIST AYMUS, De Alluvionum jure. CONNANUS, Com. Jur. Civ. Lib. III. Cap. V. JOHN BOREO, ANTHONY MARSA: JOHN GRYPHIANDER (De Insulis. Cap. XVIII.) And several others. GROTIUS.

[a] Dig. Lib. 41. Tit. I. De adquir. rer. Dom. Leg. 7.

[2] They hold that the Banks and the Rivers themselves are of publick Use; so that it is free for every one to land, to tie their Boats to the Trees that grow on the Banks, and unload there. But then they pretend, that The Property of such Banks belongs to the Owners of the adjacent Lands; and consequently the Trees growing on them, are likewise the Property of the same Persons. Institut. Lib. II. Tit. I. De divisione rerum, &c. §4.

[3] Ibid. § 23. The Roman Lawyers suppose that the People took Possession of the River only as such, and as necessary for publick Use. Digest. Lib. XLI. Tit. I. De adquir. rerum dominio, Leg. XXX. § I.

[4] Institut. as above quoted, § 22.

[b] Dig. ubi sup. § 5. & eod. Tit. Leg. 30. Leg. 38.

[5] See B. III. Chap. IX.

[6] Because at that Time, the Land was consider'd as having changed its Form, and being become the Bed or Channel of the River, ibid. § 23, 24. See Mr. NOODT's Probabilia Juris, Lib. I. Cap. I. and his Treatise, De usu fructu, Lib. II. Cap. XI. p. 631, &c.

[7] Footnote number missing from text; replaced from Latin edition. See a Passage of CASSIUS, in AGGENUS URBICUS (Comment. in Frontin.) and in BOETIUS. (De Geometr. Lib. II.) GROTIUS.

The Passage, to which our Author refers, is in CASSIUS LONGINUS a famous Lawyer, whose Opinion concerning Alluvions pass'd into a Law. The Question was proposed on Occasion of the frequent Inundations of the Po, and the Disputes occasioned by them among the Proprietors of the adjacent Lands; which he solved in this Manner, on a Supposition that the imperceptible swelling of the Side of a River is frequently occasioned by the Negligence of the Proprietors of the Lands on the other Side; whereas when the Water overflows on a sudden, such Inundations are the Effect of a Violence, which they could not prevent, p. 56, 57. Auct. Rei Agrar. Edit. Goes. See also SICULUS FLACCUS, De conditionib. Agrar. p. 13.

[1] See my first Note on PUFENDORF, B. IV. Chap. VII. § 12. And that whole Paragraph.

[2] De Benefic. Lib. VII. Cap. IV.

[3] De Offic. Lib. I. Cap. VII.

[4] Orat. Rhodia.

[5] Per vices ( & non per vices). The Emendation here proposed by our Author, had been made by CURTIUS PICHENA, and receiv'd by others. The learned GRONOVIVS does not think it necessary. But this Piece of Criticism is of small Importance in Regard to the Application of the Passage to the Question in Hand. The Words here quoted are in the Treatise, De morib. German. Cap. XXVI. Num. 2.

[6] This is practised in France. See the Book intituled, Sanction des Eaux, & Forests. B. II. Chap. I. GROTIUS.

[7] Our Author here, in the Margin, quotes some Laws of the Digest, which he thinks founded on his Principles, and consequently not conformable to the Principles of the Roman Lawyers. In one of them it is said: If what is form'd in, or built on a publick Place, belongs to the Publick; an Island, form'd in a publick River, ought in like manner to belong to the Publick. Lib. XLI. Tit. I. De adquir. rerum dominio. Leg. LXV. § 4. In § 1. PAUL, the Lawyer, maintains that even the Banks of an Island, belonging to a particular Person, are publick; in the same Manner as the Sea Shore and the Banks of a River, which border on Lands on the Continent. In the other Law, it is determined that the new Channel, made by a River, (in Lands belonging to particular Persons) thereby becomes publick; it being impossible that a Bed made by a publick River should not belong to the Publick. Lib. XLIII. Tit. XII. De Fluminib. &c. Leg. I. § 7. Mr. VAN DE WATER, in his Observat. Jur. Rom. Lib. I. Cap. VII. finding the Law, first mentioned in this Note, ascribed to LABEO, makes it appear, in my Opinion, that we ought to read PAULUS, and join the last Words of that Paragraph to the beginning of the preceding Paragraph; because otherwise those two Lawyers would reason in a Manner directly opposite to what they had both laid down. He is also of Opinion that PAUL's Observation is no more than a Confirmation of that made, § 3. and is to be understood only of floating Islands. But this does not appear so certain. For, First, On that Foot, the Observation would not be opposite to the preceding Decision, viz. If an Island form'd in a River is any Man's private Property, no Part of it belongs to the Publick; which relates to a particular Case; whereas the Objection is general. Secondly, there is no Insinuation, that the Lawyer speaks only of floating Islands; the very Terms clearly express all Sorts of Islands form'd in a publick River. And the preceding Paragraph, with which probably this is connected, speaks of an Island fixt to the Bottom of the Bed of the River. Thirdly, The Lawyer's Comparison with Buildings raised in a publick Place, shews that the Islands, of which he speaks, are not of the floating Kind; for Buildings are not raised in the Air. Fourthly, The Argument seems to require that we here understand all Sorts of Islands, form'd in a publick River. It comes to this. Whatever is found in a publick Place, whether it is naturally formed, or is raised there, as a Building, ought, according to Law, to be of the same Nature with the Place itself: But the Islands in a publick River, of what Sort soever they be, are formed in a publick Place: Therefore they ought also to belong to the Publick, and not to particular Persons, in Possession of the adjacent Lands. This is an Objection made by PAUL against LABEO's Opinion, or rather against the received Opinion of the antient Lawyers; and when consider'd in itself, according to the Principles of the Law of Nature, it was well grounded. But as the Lawyer's Intention was to bring an Argument Ad hominem, in that Respect it may be looked on as one of those Cavils, which he is accused of using frequently, when he undertakes to censure LABEO. The major, or first Proposition of this Syllogism, is not generally true, as it ought to be, according to the Principles of the antient Lawyers. For Things, which are formed naturally (innata) in a publick Place were indeed consider'd as publick; such as Trees, Plants, Minerals, &c. but not Buildings, the Use of which was not publick. Whence it appears how much they are mistaken, who, with ACCURSIUS and CUJAS, are of Opinion that Islands are here called Publick, only in Regard to the Use of them, while the Property is supposed to remain in the Hands of private Persons; for on that Foot, the Conclusion would be different from the Premises. It is more for the Honour of PAUL to say he reason'd on a Principle partly false; and the Compilers of the Roman Law ought not to have forgot to add the Answer, which might easily have been made. For, as Mr. VAN DE WATER justly maintains, according to the receiv'd Notions of the Roman Lawyers, the Bed of a publick River, consider'd in itself, is reckon'd part of the Banks; so that as soon as the River leaves it, and it thus ceases to be necessary for publick Use, the Masters of the adjacent Lands, to whom the Banks belong, only enter into Possession of their own. Hence it follows that the Islands also, which are form'd in the Bed of the River, belong to them; for then the Case is the same in Regard to those Islands, as if the River had left its Bed, and only the Use of the Banks in publick, in the same manner as it is in Regard to those which touch the Lands bordering on the River. Whence it appears farther that in the Paragraph under Consideration, the Lawyer cannot speak of the Use only of an Island lately form'd in a River, because both his Argument and his Words relate to the whole Island, and not a Part of it, or the Banks which alone were of publick Use.

[8] Digest. Lib. XLI. Tit. I. De adquir. rerum. domin. Leg. LXV. § 2. The Exception made by the Roman Lawyers of this Sort of Islands, separated from the Bed of the River, confirms what was said in the foregoing Note.

[9] We have a Description of those floating Islands in SENECA, Nat. Quaest. Lib. III. Cap. XXV. PLINY, Hist. Nat. Lib. II. Cap. XCV. MACROBIUS Saturnal. Lib. I. Cap. VII. PLINY the younger, Epist. Lib. VIII. Cap. XX. gives an agreeable Description of such Islands in the Lake of Vadimon in Tuscany, as CHIFFLET does of those in Flanders, in a Book which deserves to be read. GROTIUS.

[10] See Note 7 on this Paragraph.

[11] Digest. Lib. XLIII. Tit. XII. De Fluminibus, &c. Leg. I. § 6. See also Lib. XLI. Tit. I. De adquir. Rei domin. Leg. XVI. And what Mr. VANDER GOES says on that Law, in his Notes on the Auctores Rei Agrariae, p. 197.

[12] See Chap. III. of this Book, where the Nature of such Lands and others is explain'd.

[13] When the Romans distributed any Lands to a Colony, or Number of People, if there was a River, it sometimes made Part of the Extent assigned to such and such Persons: Sometimes the River was reckoned among those Pieces that remain'd, after the Lands had been measured and divided into Acres, and was then said to be subsecivus; and sometimes it was expresly reserved to the Roman People; as we learn from SICULUS FLACCUS, De conditione agror. (p. 18, 19. Edit. Goes.) See the excellent Remarks of SALMASIUS concerning these Subseciva, in his Exercit. in Solinum. [To which add those of Mr. VANDER GOES, in his Antiquitates Agrariae, where he has examined these Things better.] Concerning Rivers and Additions made by them in general consult ROSENTHAL. De Jure Feudorum, Cap. V. Coroll. XXIII. SIXTINUS, De Regalibus, Lib. II. Cap. III. CAEPOLLA, De Servitutib. rusticor. praedior. Cap. XXXI. &c. GROTIUS.

[1] Nor do the Roman Lawyers make the Change of Lands overflowed, and the Difference of the Inundation consist in this; for they acknowledge that tho' the Earth which covers a Farm be removed, and other Earth laid on it, it does not thereby cease to be the Property of its old Master. Digest. Lib. VII. Tit. IV. Quibus modis usus fructus, &c. Leg. XXIX. § 2. But they reason on this Principle, that the River having left its former Bed, has open'd itself another in the Lands overflowed, which thus become the Channel of the River; whereas, when the River remaining in its Bed, only overflows its Banks, the Bed being still the same, the Lands covered with the Water, are also reckoned to remain the same. See § 8. Note 6. And the following Note.

[2] This is founded on the Principle mentioned in the foregoing Note. See Digest. Lib. XLI. Tit. I. De adquir. rerum dominio. Leg. XII. Lib. XXXIX. Tit. III. De aqua, & aquae pluviae arcendae, Leg. XXIV. § 3. See also Lib. XVIII. Tit. I. De contrah. emptione, Leg. LXIX.

[3] Digest. Lib. XLI. Tit. I. De adquir. rerum dominio. Leg. XXX. § 3. This is to be understood also, according to the Hypothesis mentioned, Note 1. on this Paragraph.

[4] CASSIODORUS says that the Measurers of Lands, like a great River, take from one, and give to another. (Var. Lib. III. Cap. LII.) GROTIUS.

[5] STRABO, Geograph. Lib. XVII. p. 1136. Edit. Amst. (787. Paris.)

[6] There is nothing in this contrary to the Principles of the Roman Lawyers, as OBRECHT very well observes; for they reason thus: A Bank is thus justly defined, whatever bounds, or keeps in a River, and stops the natural Impetuosity of its Course. But when a River swells for a Time by the fall of Rain, by the flowing in of the Sea, or any other Means, it does not change its Banks: No Man ever said that the Nile, which overflows the Country of Egypt, thereby changes or enlarges its Banks; for when that River returns to its former Measure the Banks are to be repaired and secured. Digest. Lib. XLIII. Tit. XII. De Fluminib. &c. Leg. I. § 5.

[7] Digest. Lib. L. Tit. XVII. De Divers. regul. Juris, Leg. XI.

[a] L. si ager. 23. D quibus modis ususfr. amitt.

[1] Dig. Lib. XLI. Tit. I. De adquir. rerum dom. Leg. VII. § 1.

[2] The Roman Lawyers say that when the Force of a Stream carries a Piece of Land from one Field, and lays it on another, it still belongs to the Master of the Field, from which it was taken; unless it remains so long on the other that the Trees, which it brought with it, have taken root, in which Case it is acquired to the Proprietor of the Field, where it is fix'd, Digest. Lib. XLI. Tit. I. De adquir. rer. dominio. Leg. VII. § 2. And elsewhere: What is carried away by the Force of Rivers may be claimed at Law. Lib. XII. Tit. I. De rebus creditis, si certum petatur, &c. Leg. IV. § 2.

Our Author quotes these two Laws in his Margin. In Regard to the latter, in which there is some Difficulty in Relation to the Roman Laws, see CUJAS, Recit. in Digest. Tom. VII. Opp. Edit. Fabrott. p. 674. And ANTHONY FAURE, Rational. Tom. III. p. 12, 13.

[1] See an Account of such Lands, Chap. III. § 16. Note 4, 5.

[2] Our Author here says, certâ mensurâ terminati, instead of comprehensi, as he expresses himself a little before and elsewhere; which however amounts to the same; for Lands inclosed in a certain Measure, are bounded by that Measure. So that Mr. VANDER GOES had no Reason for accusing him of distinguishing a fourth Sort of Lands, Not. in Auct. Rei Agrar. p. 196. The same Critic Reproaches him with advancing, contrary to the Opinion of FLORENTIN the Lawyer, in Law XVI. of the Title, De adquir. rerum domin. that in Case of Alluvions the Lands inclosed in a certain Measure, have no more Right than limited Lands. But our Author does not here speak of what took Place at that Time; he only says what ought to take Place in a conclusive Way of reasoning; as Mr. GOES himself owns, in the preceding Page; where he observes that, if the Emperor Antoninus Pius had been to give Decision expressly in Regard to Lands given in gross, and enclosed by a certain Measure, he would undoubtedly have pronounced in the same Manner as he did in Regard to limited Lands.

[3] Digest. Lib. XIX. Tit. I. De actionib. empti & venditi. Leg. XIII. § 14. This Law, which our Author quotes in the Margin, proves indirectly what he infers from it. The Case is this: A Man sells a Piece of Land for a certain Sum of Money, assuring the Purchaser that it contains a hundred Acres; on which the latter depends, as on a Clause of the Contract. The Land, however, is but ninety Acres; but before the Extent of it is measured, the neighbouring River, by retiring from it, makes an Addition of ten Acres; and thus the whole Number of Acres is complete. It is asked whether the Seller is thereby excused from indemnifying the Buyer, on the Account of giving a false Account of the Extent of the Land sold; an Indemnification, which, according to the old Roman Laws, arose to twice as much as was to be abated of the Price, in Proportion to what the Buyer says less than is found. (See the Receptae Sententiae of JULIUS PAULUS, Lib. I. Tit. XIX. § 1. and Lib. II. Tit. XVII. § 4.) But JUSTINIAN reduced it to the same Sum, as is concluded from Law II. of the Title, De actionib. Empti & Venditi. The Difficulty is founded on this, that, though the Purchaser has a hundred Acres, according to the Terms of the Contract, the ten, which make the Number complete, accrue to him, according to the Principles of the Roman Law. (Digest. Lib. XVIII. Tit. VI. De pericul. & commod. rei venditae. Leg. VII.) Which, as appears, supposes that though a certain Measure was stipulated, this Limitation makes no Alteration in the Right of Alluvion; because the Land was not sold at so much an Acre, but in gross, on Condition, however, that it contain'd no less than a hundred Acres. Whereupon the Lawyer distinguishes whether the Seller sincerely believed his Land contain'd a hundred Acres, or whether, knowing it did not, he design'd to deceive the Purchaser. But this is nothing to our Purpose. See CUJAS, Recit. in Digest. Tom. VI. Opp. p. 813. As also ANTHONY FAURE, Rational, Tom. V. p. 485.

[1] The Difference, which our Author has not expressed, consists in this, that the Islands, according to him, belong to the People in Possession of the River; whereas the Case is not the same in Regard to the Alluvions. See Paragraphs 9, 11, 12.

[2] This Practice is derived from a very antient Custom among the Germanic Nations. PAUL WARNEFRID, speaking of Autharis, King of the Lombards, tells us, that Prince, being on Horseback, pass'd on to a Pillar in the Sea, and touching it with the Point of his Sword, said: Here shall be the Bounds of the Country of the Lombards. SAXO, the Grammarian, Lib. X. and other Authors, give us a Story of the like Nature concerning Otho the Emperor, who threw a Lance into the Sea, to mark the Boundaries of the Empire, in the Baltic Gulph. GROTIUS. Saxo, the Grammarian, does not say that Otho threw a Lance into the Sea, with a Design of marking the Boundaries of the Empire in the Baltick Gulph, but of leaving a Monument of his Expedition. See p. 164. of that Historian, Edit. Francof. 1576.

[1] Digest. Lib. VII. Tit. I. De usu fructu, &c. Leg. IX. § 4.

[1] This is indeed one of their Maxims, Digest. Lib. L. Tit. XVII. De diversis Regulis Juris. Leg. X. But they here reason on other Principles; as is evident from what was said, § 8. Note 3. § 9. Note 7. § 10. Note 1. So that our Author confounds the antient Lawyers with the modern Interpreters, who advance this Reason.

[2] On the Supposition that the River belongs to the People, the Proprietors, who have acquired the Lands adjacent to the River, may justly apprehend they may receive Damage by Inundations, without Hope of being indemnified by the Alluvions; besides, they themselves may often be faulty in this Case, not having been careful to keep up the Banks of the River.

[3] The Roman Lawyers elsewhere reason on this Principle. See Code, Lib. IV. Tit. XXIV. De pigneratitiâ actione. Leg. V. VI. VIII. IX. and Tit. LXV. De locato & conducto. Leg. XII.

[4] See § 9. Note. 11.

[5] Pharsal. Lib. VI. ver. 277, 278.

- [1] Digest. Lib. XLI. Tit. I. De adquir. rerum Domin. Leg. XXXVIII. On this Law see HUGH DONELL. Comment. Jur. Civil. Lib. IV. Cap. XXVIII. JOHN GRYPHIANDER, De Insulis, Cap. XXXVII. § 37. &c. REINH. BACHOVIVS, in Treutler, Vol. II. Disp. XX. Thes. V. Lit. F. p. M. 104.
- [1] Institut. Lib. II. Tit. I. De divis. rerum, &c. § 19. See Chap. V. of this Book, § 29. Note 1. and PUFENDORF, B. IV. Chap. VII. § 4.
- [2] Charles the Bald follows their Decision, Cap. XXXI. Edit. Pistens. GROTIUS.
- [3] (Conjugial. Praecept. p. 146. Tom. II. Edit. Wech.) See a Passage in GALEN very much to the Purpose, Lib. II. De Semine. St. CHRYSOSTOM says, The Child is formed by the Mixture of both Seeds. In Cap. V. Ephes. GROTIUS.
- [4] The late Mr. COCCEJUS, in a Dissertation, De Jure Seminis, Sect. I. § 10. says, it is quite the contrary, and that according to the Laws of the antient Francs and Lombards, as well as according to the Roman Law, the Fruit followed the Venter. For this he quotes Lib. II. Leg. LONGOBARD. C. 14. Specul. SUEVIC. Part. I. C. 61, 62. Edict. THEODORICI, Reg. C. 65, 66. But there is something after the last Quotation, from which our Author might have inferred, that those antient People did not always follow the Principle of the Roman Lawyers: For Theodorick there orders, that the Master of one of those Slaves which were called Originarii, or Adscriptitii, should have two Thirds of the Slaves born to that Slave by a Woman of the same Condition; and in that Case the Mother's Master had much the smaller Share, viz. one Third, Cap. LXVII. In the Dissertation before quoted, our Author is opposed on the Substance of the Question; but with Reasons not always very solid.
- [1] Institut. Lib. II. Tit. I. De adquir. rer. dom. § 25.
- [2] What the Roman Lawyers call an Accessory, (Accessio) was not precisely the most valuable Thing, but what is considered as the Basis, whether the Accessory is worth more or less than the Principal, for they formally acknowledge that Purple, for Example, is the Accessory to a Garment on which it is worked, tho' the more valuable; and that a Jewel also is the Accessory to a Gold or Silver Vessel, in which it is set. Digest. Lib. XLI. Tit. I. De adquir. rerum dom. Leg. XXVI. § 1. Lib. XXXIV. Tit. II. De Auro, Argento, Mundo, &c. Leg. XIX. § 12. Lib. VI. Tit. I. De rei vindicatione, Leg. XXIII. § 2, 3, 4. And Institut. Lib. II. Tit. I. De divisione rerum, &c. § 26. See the Notes of THEODORE MARCILLY, and JANUS A COSTA, on this last Paragraph. However, the Decisions of the Roman Lawyers do not seem to have been sufficiently clear and distinct on this Question; as Mr. THOMASIVS shews in his Dissertation, De pretio adfectionis in res fungibiles non cadente, Cap. III. And we are not to be surprized at it; for Questions of this Kind ought not to be decided by physical, or metaphysical Ideas, nor even by the Design, Use, or Value of Things, mingled together; but by other Principles, concerning which see what I have said in the Notes of the second Edition of PUFENDORF, B. IV. Chap. VII. Of the Law of Nature and Nations; and particularly those on the Abridgment of The Duties of a Man and a Citizen, B. I. Chap. XII. § 7. Note 4. of the third and fourth Edition, where this Subject is treated with much more Exactness.
- [3] Institut. Lib. II. Tit. I. De divisione rerum, &c. § 27. See, on this Paragraph, the Florum sparsio in Jus Justinianum, by our Author, p. 28, &c. Edit. Amst.
- [4] The famous Mr. SCHULTING approves of our Author's Opinion, and explains it in the following Manner. Considering the Law of Nature alone, says he, if another Man's Goods, to which a new Form is given, thereby become worse, there seems to be no substantial Reason why the Proprietor should therefore lose his Right of Property; he only acquires a Right of demanding Satisfaction for the Damage, if done with a bad Intention, or by some Fault of the Author of such a Form, as undoubtedly is supposed. And if the Thing is not rendered less valuable than it was before, it does not appear why in that Case it ought to change its Master. Farther, tho' it is made more valuable, this is not sufficient for depriving the Proprietor of his Right of Property, if he did not consent to this Melioration. All that can be said in that Case is, that the Person who has contributed toward raising the Value of the Thing, ought on that Account to have a larger Share in the Work, or Composition resulting from the Matter and the Form, Not. in CAJ. Instit. Lib. II. Tit. I. § 5. p. 82, 83. Jurisprud. Ante Justin. Very well; but the Question is, who ought to have the Thing, when they either will not or cannot possess it in common. Some, as OBRECHT, even say, that the Rules laid down by the antient Lawyers are made for that Case only. But they are mistaken. The Lawyers admitted of no Community in what is called Specificatio, as Mr. SCHULTING acknowledges; nor in most of the other Questions relating to Acquisition by accessory Right. They held that the Property passed of Right to one or the other, by Vertue of certain Things on which they ground their Rules; and the Community which they formally establish in Case of a Mixture of Matters belonging to different Persons, makes an Exception, that evidently shews there was none in other Cases, according to their Principles.

[5] Digest. Lib. X. Tit. IV. Ad exhibendum, Leg. IX. § 3.

[1] The Author in his Margin quotes the following Law, If any one shall make Wine with my Grapes, Oil with my Olives, or Garments with my Wool, knowing they are not his own, he shall be compelled by an Action to produce the said Wine, &c. because what is made out of our Goods belongs to us. Digest. Lib. X. Tit. IV. Ad exhibendum, Leg. XII. § 3. From which it is inferred, that the Author of the new Form is obliged to restore purely and simply what he has made of a Matter belonging to another, without any Right of demanding any Thing for his Labour of the Proprietor of such Matter; so that in this Case the Form follows the Matter, on Account of the bad Intention of the former; whereas, when the Person has acted bonâ fide, the Matter follows the Form. But the Majority of the Interpreters of the Roman Law are now of Opinion, that the Badness of the Intention doth not hinder the Work from remaining in the Hands of the Author of the Form; the whole Difference, according to them, is, that then the Master of the Matter has a Right to demand a larger Reparation of Damages, and may even indict the other of Theft; which in this Case would end in obliging the Offender to pay double the Value of the Matter. The Truth is, that, as the antient Lawyers were not agreed on this whole Question, and the Notions of each different Party were not well connected, very plain Traces of them are extant in the Compilation of TRIBONIAN; and some modern Doctors ingenuously own it. We find the following Decision in the Institutes, If any Man builds a House on another Man's Ground with his own Materials, the House becomes the Property of the Master of the Ground. In this Case the Master of the Materials loses his Property, because they are supposed to be voluntarily alienated, if he knew he built on another Man's Land; and therefore, tho' the House be demolished he cannot claim the Materials. Lib. II. Tit. I. De divisione rerum, &c. § 30. See Digest. Lib. XLI. Tit. I. De adquir. rerum dominio, Leg. VII. § 12. If the Badness of Intention deprives such a Man of his own Goods, which he has mixed with those of another, why should he, who has only contributed his Labour, thereby acquire another Man's Goods, which he attempted to appropriate to himself unjustly? It is to no Purpose to say, that the Proprietor of the Matter may indemnify himself by the Actions which the Law allows him; for if we consider the Simplicity of the Law of Nature, which the Lawyers professed to follow in this Affair, such a Proprietor ought, at least, to be allowed the Choice of either retaking his Goods, which he cannot lawfully lose by another Man's unjust Act, or quitting them, and demanding the Value with Damages and Interest. See MURET, MARCILLY, and JANUS A COSTA, on the Paragraph of the Institutes last quoted, and those which precede it; as also the late Mr.

[2] But, as PUFENDORF observes, (B. IV. Chap. VII. § 10.) it is not properly a Punishment or Penalty, to be deprived of all Profit resulting from an Act of Injustice. Besides, he who takes another Man's Goods, knowing them to be such, has then deliberately subjected himself to the Loss both of his Labour, and all he may have added of his own. The Roman Lawyers reason very well on this Principle, when they say, that He who gathers another Man's Olives, Corn, or Grapes, when ripe, is not indeed obliged to make the Proprietor of them Satisfaction, because no Damage is done; nor can he demand any Thing for the Expence he has been at, because, by gathering what he had no Right to gather, he is supposed to have given the Charges of Gathering. Digest. Lib. IX. Tit. I. Ad Leg. Aquil. Leg. XXVII. § 25.

[1] That is, he, to whom the smaller of two Things joined together belongs, is commonly forced to submit to the Master of the larger; either because the latter is stronger, or because the former is not in a Condition of paying him the Value of his Part; because it would not be very advantageous to him, or because he cannot make the same Use of his Goods, as he might otherwise have done.

[2] Digest. Lib. VI. Tit. I. De Rei vindicatione, Leg. V. § 1. Some Expositors, as JANUS A COSTA, (in Institut. De divisione rerum, &c. § 26.) tell us, that in those Days Workmen were unacquainted with the Art of separating those two Metals; especially considering the Aqua Regia was not then invented. Another Law which belongs to CALLISTRATUS, is unseasonably alledged against this; for that Lawyer speaks only of Silver mix'd with Brass. Digest. Lib. XLI. Tit. I. De acquir. rerum dominio. Leg. XII. Now the Secret of separating Silver from Brass might be known, when that of separating Gold was not; which Metal, as appears from the Experience of later Ages, cannot be dissolved but by Aqua Regia. So that there is no Necessity of entering into the Opinion of some modern Expositors, who pretend that ULPIAN only meant, that Gold cannot be separated from Brass without destroying the Brass.

[3] Dicit enim (Cassius) si statuæ suæ ferruminationi junctum brachium sit, unitate majoris partis consumi: & quod semel alienum (factum) sit, etiamsi inde abruptum sit, redire ad priorem dominum non posse. Non idem in eo, quod adplumbatum sit; quia ferruminatione per eandem materiam facit confusionem: plumbatura non idem efficit. Digest. Lib. VI. Tit. I. De rei vindicatione, Leg. XXIII. § 5. The Lawyer here distinguishes two Sorts of Solder; one made with a Matter of the same Kind as the two Bodies solder'd together: The other of a Matter of a different Nature. He calls the former Ferruminatione, the latter Plumbatura. See on this Point the Opuscula de Latinitate Juris consultorum veterum, published in 1711, by Mr. DUKER, p. 238. &c. According to him the first Sort of Solder confounds the two Bodies solder'd together, so that the whole by accessory Right belongs to the Proprietor of the larger or more considerable Part, even tho' it should afterwards be separated from the less: As if an Arm solder'd to a Statue, be broken off. But if the two Parts were equal, so that one could not be consider'd as an Accessory to the other; then neither of the Proprietors had a Right to appropriate the Whole to himself, but each remain'd Master of his own Part. This Decision is made in the Digest. Lib. XLI. Tit. I. De acquir. rerum dominio, Leg. XXVII. § 2. But when two Pieces of Silver, for Example, are solder'd together with Lead, or two Pieces of different Metals are solder'd together, which was term'd Plumbatura; the Laws held that in the Case there was no Mixture; and that therefore the two Bodies thus solder'd together still belong'd each to its own Master, whether one was more or less considerable than the other. We see no solid Foundation for this Distinction; for two Pieces of Silver solder'd together with Silver remain as really distinct one from the other, as if they were solder'd with Lead, or a Piece of Iron was solder'd to a Piece of Silver.

[4] Digest. Lib. XLI. Tit. I. De adquir. rerum domin. Leg IV. § 1, 2. See what I have said on PUFENDORF, B. IV. Chap. VII. § 7. Note (1).

[1] Institut. Lib. II. Tit. I. De divis. rer. &c. § 33. See the Chapter of PUFENDORF last quoted, § 5. with the Notes.

[2] Cod. Lib. III. Tit. XXXII. De rei vindicat. Leg. XI. See also the Titles of the Institutes so often quoted, § 31.

[3] Dig. Lib. XLI. Tit. I. De adquir. rer. domin. Leg. LX.

[1] Institut. Lib. II. Tit. I. De rerum divis. &c. § 35. See Mr. NOODT, Probabil. Juris. Lib. I. Cap. VII.

[2] But see what I have said on PUFENDORF, B. IV. Chap. XIII. § 3. Note 1. of the second Edition.

[3] On this Question see the Speculum Saxonicum, II. 26.

[1] I think not: Such a Possessor, barely by laying out his Money on the Improvement of what he knew was not his own, subjects himself to lose what he has so expended. Besides, the Security of the Proprietors, and consequently the Design of Property and the Interest of human Society ingeneral, require that no other Person should, by his own Authority, and without the Proprietor's Permission, detain his Goods from him, or dispose of them even tho' in such a Manner, as to improve them. Hence it follows that the unjust Detainer ought to have no Right to demand any thing for his Expences, as he can alledge no plausible Reason for justifying his Pretensions. So that nothing but a Motive of pure Generosity can engage the true Proprietor to make him the least Satisfaction. If the Proprietor gains by the Matter, the Possessor deserved to lose; and this Gain may be consider'd as a just Indemnification for his being for some Time deprived of the Possession of his Goods by the Injustice of the Detainer. See § 20. Note 2.

[2] Dig. Lib. V. Tit. III. De Hered. petitione. Leg. XXXVIII.

[1] Those Things likewise, which become ours by the Delivery, are acquired by the Law of Nations; for nothing is so conformable to natural Equity, as that the Will of the Master, designing to transfer his Property to another, should be ratified. Digest. Lib. XLI. Tit. I. De adquir. rerum Dominio. Leg. IX. § 3. where we may observe that the Law of Nations, spoken of by the Roman Lawyers, is no other than the Law of Nature. Thus in the Institutes, De rerum divisione, § 40. we read. We likewise acquire Things by Delivery, by the Law of Nature. But, beside this Delivery there must be a lawful Title, which implies a real Alienation, of which the Act of Delivery is at the bottom only a Sign. For the bare Delivery never transfers the Dominion; which is done only when preceded by Sale or some just Cause. Digest. as above quoted, Leg. XXXI. See on this Subject PUFENDORF, B. IV. Chap. IX. § 5. &c.

[2] It is not indeed requir'd. By the Laws of the Wisgoths a thing was looked on as delivered, when the Donee had in his Hands the Deed of Donation. Lib. V. Tit. II. Cap. VI. Among the antient Romans, the Goods called Res Mancipi, were fully and absolutely alienated, by the Formality of putting a piece of Money in the Scales (per aes & libram). See VARRO, De Ling. Lat. Lib. VI. (p. 82. Ed. III H. Steph.) FESTUS POMPEIUS, in the Word Rodus: ULPIAN Instit. Tit. XIX. BOETHIUS, Ad Top. Cicer. GROTIUS.

What the antient Romans called Res Mancipi, were Estates in Lands, Houses, and all other Possessions situated in Italy, or in some privileged Place of their Provinces, with the Rights of Servitude annexed to them; as also Slaves, and Beasts of Burthen. Every thing else was Res non Mancipi; though Pearls perhaps were excepted. The Res Mancipi, which they consider'd as most useful and most considerable, could not be alienated with a full Effect of Right but among Roman Citizens, and with the Formality of the Scales; they were in a Manner subject to the Slavery of the Roman Citizens, who alone, according to the Laws, could acquire the entire and secure Property of them; whence they received their Name, as some learned Men pretend. Whereas the Res non Mancipi, in Regard to which the Formalities here mentioned, were not observed, were transferred indifferently to Citizens and Foreigners; but so that the Acquisition of them had not so much Force and Extent as that of Res Mancipi. See Vindiciae pro recepta de Mutui alienatione sententiâ, by the late Mr. VANDER GOES, printed at Leyden in 1646, p. 61, &c. where he confutes several Opinions of the famous SALMASIUS on this Subject; as also Mr. SCHULTING, on the Title of ULPIAN, quoted by our Author; but more particularly the illustrious Mr. BYNKERSHOEK, who has lately published a Treatise on this Subject, in his Opuscula varii Argumenti, printed in 1719, but who seems not to have seen, or neglected to consult, the Book last mentioned; at least I do not find he any where quotes it. To this may be added, that the Right acquired over the Res Municipi, regularly received, was called Dominium Quiritarium, or Juris Quiritum, or Legitimum & Civile; and that acquired over Res non Mancipi, and even over Res Mancipi, when the requisite Formalities were not observed at receiving them, was term'd Dominium Bonitarium, or Naturale, or Juris Gentium. The Word dare, to give, was commonly used for transferring the former; and that of tradere, to deliver, for transferring the latter; though both were performed by the same corporal Act, in Regard to the Thing alienated, and the whole Difference consisted in the Formalities to be observed for acquiring that full Right of Civil Property over the Res Mancipi. See the Probabilia Juris, by Mr. NOODT, Lib. II. Cap. XII. And hence it is that the Roman Lawyers say that if we consider the Law of Nature alone, the bare Delivery (Traditio) is sufficient for transferring the Property. This Distinction of Res Mancipi, and non Mancipi was abolished by the Emperor Justinian, as appears from the Code, Lib. VII. Tit. XXV. De nudo jure Quiritum tollendo.

[3] This is a Constitution of Theodosius the Younger; on which see JAMES GODEFROY, in Cod. Theodos. Lib. VIII. Tit. XII. Leg. IX. Tom. II. p. 621.

[4] Dig. Lib. XLI. Tit. I. De adquir. rer. dom. Leg. XXI. § 1.

[5] This is the Decision of such antient Lawyers as were of Opinion that corporal Possession is absolutely necessary, according to the Law of Nature, for acquiring Property. See Mr. NOODT's Probabilia Juris, Lib. II. Cap. VI. Num. 5.

[6] Institut. Lib. II. Tit. I. De rerum divisione, &c. § 46.

[7] All the Rights of Inheritance are acquired the Moment the Heir acts as such, though he is not yet in Possession of the Goods, and though he is not consider'd as a Possessor in Regard to the Effects of Right resulting from the Possession. See, on the Law here quoted by our Author, the great CUIJAS, Recit. in Digest. Tom. VIII. Opp. p. 307, 308.

[8] Because the Things bequeathed pass directly from the Person who bequeathed them, to the Person to whom they are bequeathed. Digest. Lib. XLVII. Tit. II. De Furtis. Leg. LXIV. Hence it is that, if the Legatee dies, provided it be after the Death of the Testator, the Legacies pass to his Heirs, as if he had actually received them, Digest. Lib. XXXVI. Tit. II. Quando dies Legat. vel Fideic. cedat. Leg. V. princ. & §1.

[9] If therefore an Inheritance, a Legacy or Fief of Trust be left to the afore-mentioned, or a Donation or Sale has been made of whatever Things moveable, immoveable, or that move themselves, or shall be left or given for the Redemption of Captives; let the Claim of such Things be almost perpetual, and extend to a hundred Years. Cod. Lib. I. Tit. II. De Sacrosanctis Ecclesiis, &c. Leg. XXIII. In this Law, referred to by our Author in his Margin, it is evident that the Emperor lays down the same Rule in Regard to Sales, against the Regulations of the Civil Law. Some Doctors, however, as WISSENBACH, in Cod. p. 7. and in Institut. Diss. X. § 36. are of Opinion that JUSTINIAN grants only a personal Action for demanding such Things, and not a real Action, or a Right of recovering them, in whatever Hands they are lodged. But, to make this out, they are obliged to give an improper Sense to the Word vindicatio (Claim) and restrain the Generality of the following Terms: In all these Cases we grant not only personal Actions, but even an Action for the Thing and the Pledge, &c. which is not to be done without very strong Reasons, and here are none such. On the contrary I see a considerable one against taking that Liberty. The Constitution in Question is a Law made at the Request of the Ecclesiastics of Emesa, or Emisa, a City of Syria, who obtain'd it of Justinian by Surprize, as SUIDAS observes, and as the Emperor himself acknowledged by correcting the Term of the Prescription, which he reduced to forty Years instead of a Hundred. Novell. IX. and CXI. See my fifth Note on PUFENDORF, B. IV. Chap. XII. § 2. the Inference is easily made. A Privilege thus granted, is not given by Halves, it is pushed as far as possible.

[10] If you make it appear, as you affirm, that the Donation was by you made to your Granddaughter, on Condition that she should allow you a certain subsistence, you may have a good Claim in this Case, that is, an Action by which she shall be obliged to restore your former Property. Cod. Lib. VIII. Tit. LV. De donat. &c. Leg. I. The Case set forth in this Law, quoted by our Author, stands thus. A Man gives a Person a Piece of Land, for Example, on Condition that he shall furnish him what is necessary for his Support. The Donee doth not discharge that Obligation: The Donor may then not only revoke the Donation, by bringing certain personal Actions, allowed by the Roman Law; but also redemand the Land, as having then recovered the Property of it, though not in Possession of it, because he had alienated it on that Condition. So that it is a singular Case, in which some Emperors had made an Exception to the Regulations, in Favour of such as had a Right to a Support and Maintenance, as we find others of the like Nature on other Occasions. See CUJAS Recit. in Codic. Tom. IX. Opp. p. 1401.

[11] In a Partnership, all the Goods which belong to the Partners immediately become common; because, tho' no particular Delivery intervenes, a tacit one is supposed. Dig. Lib. XVII. Tit. II. pro socio, Leg. I. § 1. and Leg. II.

[1] But, in my Opinion, the same way of reasoning ought to be employed here, as was before used against our Author's Opinion, on Chap. II. of this Book, § 22.

[1] That is, so that the Right is extinct. For in all Cases, where the Thing itself over which we have such a Right, is not destroyed, it may hereafter belong to some other Person; but then this will not be by a Continuation of the same Right, but by Vertue of a new Title.

[2] See PUFENDORF, B. IV. Chap. VI. § 14. B. VI. Chap. III. § 11. and B. VIII. Chap. XI. § 1.

[3] By the Roman Law, all the Goods of Persons dying intestate, and who had no legal Heir, belonged to the Treasury; and consequently Slaves, who were reckoned among Goods. Code, Lib. X. De bonis vacantibus, &c. Leg. I. See also the Digest. Lib. XLIX. Tit. XIV. De jure Fisci, Leg. I. § 2. and CUJAS, on the Code, Lib. VI. Tit. LI. De Caducis tollendis, with FABROT's Notes; as also those of Mr. SCHULTING, on ULPIAN. Tit. XXVIII. § 7 p. 673. But if the Master abandoned his Slave, he belonged to the first Occupant, according to the general Rule concerning Things abandoned. See Digest. Lib. XLI. Tit. VII. Pro Derelicto, Leg. I. and Leg. ult. Unless the Master thus deprived himself of his Right, by in human Avarice, because his Slave was afflicted with violent Sickness; for then such a Slave was set at Liberty. Digest. Lib. XL. Tit. VIII. Que sine manumissione, &c. I know not why one of our Author's Commentators asserts that this Right of taking Possession of a Slave thus abandon'd, was abrogated by Novel. XXII. Cap. XII. For JUSTINIAN in that Place only confirms the Law before quoted, by ordering that if a Master abandons his sick Slave of either Sex, his or her Marriage with a free Person should be reputed valid, by Vertue of the Freedom acquired by such a Slave, according to the Title of the Digest. Pro Derelicto, to which we are referred; and thus JULIAN understands it in his Abridgment. See Novel. CLIII. Cap. I. The Expressions of that here produced are indeed perplexed; as they are through the whole Compilation; but it will appear on a proper Attention, that the Emperor only distinguishes two Manners of abandoning a sick Slave; one by turning him out of the House; the other by taking no Care of him, though he is kept.

[4] Even though the Goods fall to the Sovereign, for the Sovereign becomes Master of them by Right of first Occupancy. The whole Difference is, that no other Person can then make Use of that Right.

[1] As that of Denmark was formerly, CRANTZIUS, Vand. VIII. 23. That of Rugenlandt, CRANTZIUS, Vand. VIII. 12. That of the Pelasgi and the Thessalians, Gregor. Lib. VII. That of the Usanchanidae, in Persia, Leunclav. XVI. Add to these Leo, Lib. II. of the Africans of Tarodent; and if you please, ERNEST COTHMAN, Cons. XLI. Num. I, &c.

[1] States, says he, being immortal, feel the Effects of human and divine Vengeance. Orat. de Pace. p. 183. Ed. H. Steph.

[2] At the close of his Letter in Favour of those of Argos, p. 411. Edit. Spanheim.

[3] SENECA, Epist. CII. Some Bodies are continual, or all of a Piece, as a Man: Some are compounded, as a Ship or an House, and indeed all such Things as have different Parts joined and united: Some consist of Members that are always separate and disjoined, as an Army, a People, a Senate. This is taken out of ACHILLES STATIUS, whose Words on Aratus are these, from that CONON, who was the Inventor of Berenice's Hair, a Constellation at the Tail of Leo: παρετήρησε δε Κόνων, &c. CONON, the Mathematician, observed, that Such Things are called Bodies, as are joined and kept entire, ὑπὸ μιᾶς ἐξέξεως, by one Constitution, as Stone or Wood. Now this ἐξίς is that Spirit (or Principle of Union) which holds the Body together: That such Things are said to be compacted, as are not thus fastened by any natural Cohesion, as a Ship, or an House, for the one consists of several Planks, and the other of several Stones; that other Things, such as a Chorus, are stiled διεστῶτα, distant and separate. And of these last also, there are two different Sorts; for some are made up of Bodies, the Quality and Number of which are fixed and settled, as is a Chorus; others consist of undetermined Bodies, as a Crowd, or a People. It is plain, that from hence are borrowed what POMPONIUS has, L. rerum de Usurp. & Usucap. And what PAULUS says, Statuam uno Spiritu contineri, that an Image is held together by one Spirit, or is all of one Piece, L. in rem. § item. Where he also makes the same Distinction of the different Sorts of Bodies. Some others too have used these Expressions, PHILO, De Mundo, ἐξίς ἐστὶ πνεῦμα ἀνάστρεφον ἐφ' ἑαυτῷ, Constitution is a Spirit circulating in itself, &c. And again, ἐξίς ἐστὶ πνευματικὸς τονὸς, δεσμὸς οὐκ ἄρρηκτος, ἀλλὰ μόνον δυσδιάλυτος. Constitution is a spiritual Contexture, a Tie not altogether in capable of being broken, but not to be broken without Difficulty. See also BOETHIUS, 1 Arithmet. and pray observe, that when we speak of a Constitution, or a Spirit, in Relation to a People, we don't take the Word in its Strictness, as CONON did, but analogically, by Way of Comparison and Similitude, as we do indeed when we call the People a Body. ALFENUS terms this Spirit the Form of a Thing, in L. proponebatur, D. de judiciis. GROTIUS.

Most of the Remarks, here made by our Author, were before made by CUJAS, Observat.

Lib. XV. Cap. XXXIII. To which may be added SEXTUS EMPIRICUS, Adversus Mathem. Lib. VII. § 102. and Lib. IX. § 78. with the Notes of Mr. FABRICIUS.

[4] Ἐξίς μία. Our Author doth not tell us where this occurs. I am much mistaken if he had not a Passage of the Treatise De animae procreat. p. 1025. Tom. II. Edit. Wech. in View; where we read μορφῆ instead of Ἐξίς.

[5] See the Law quoted in Note 3.

[6] Ἡ πολιτεία βίος πολέως, Government is the Life of the State. ARISTOTLE, Polit. IV. 11. GROTIUS.

[7] De Clement. Lib. I. Cap. IV.

[8] ALFENUS, in the above cited Place, gives you an Instance in a Ship. And so does ULPIAN, in L. quid tamen, D. quibus modis usus fructus amittatur. They say that the Ship is the same, tho' it has been refitted in all its Parts, provided the Repairs were done at several and distant Times; but the Case is quite otherwise, if it be pulled all to Pieces, and so rebuilt. L. qui res, § aream, D. de Solutionibus. PLUTARCH in Theseus, τὸ δε πλοῖον ἐν, &c. The Vessel with thirty Oars, in which he (Theseus) with some young Gentlemen, had made a Voyage, and returned in Safety, the Athenians preserved even to Demetrius Phalereus's Days, by taking out the old decayed Wood, and refitting it with such as was strong and new; insomuch that this Ship became a Precedent to Philosophers, when they were canvassing whether a Thing enlarged and repaired was still the same, some declaring that it was, others that it was not. In this Case, so controverted by Philosophers, the Civilians have very judiciously preferred the affirmative Side. And TERTULLIAN, who perfectly understood the Law, in his Book, De resurrectione Carnis, We have often seen a Ship torn by a Storm, or rotten with Worms, by having all its Parts refitted and mended, still the same as it was before, and even boasting on Account of its new Repairs. But you must suppose, that the Keel or Bottom remains intire, which indeed the Word Resoluta in PAULUS's Expression does imply, L. inter stipulantem. § Sacram. D. de verb. oblig. And this is confirmed by what precedes in TERTULLIAN, and by what follows in PAULUS. PHILO, De Mundo, οὐ γὰρ δῆπουθεν, &c. Not that whose Parts do by Degrees perish and decay, it itself perishable; but that whose Parts do all at one and the same Instant perish and drop to Pieces. GROTIUS.

[9] See the Law quoted in the Close of Note 3. on this Paragraph.

[10] And Epicharmus, in DIOGENES LAERTIUS. GROTIUS.
See DIOGENES LAERTIUS, Lib. III. § 11. Ed. Amst.

[11] See MENAGE, on DIOGENES LAERTIUS, Lib. IX. § 8.

[12] Ἐξίς σώματος συνεκτικῆ. See the Passage at length in Note 3. on this Paragraph.

[13] Πνευματικὸν συνέχον, says our Author. But I find in the Jewish Doctors two Treatises of the Incorruptibility of the World, only this Expression, Ἐξίς πνευματικῆ, which comes to the same. See p. 953, and 1165. Edit. Paris.

[14] JULIAN, Misopog. says the contrary of these very Athenians. GROTIUS.

The Work, here quoted by our Author, is against the People of Antioch; and contains nothing like this concerning the Athenians. I imagine he was thinking of what that Emperor says in his Letter to the Athenians; p. 268. 269. Edit. Spanheim.

- [1] SERVIUS in Fulden. Excerpt. ad I. Aeneid. An Army is overthrown two Ways, either by an utter Slaughter, or by being intirely dispersed and routed. GROTIUS.
The learned GRONOVIVS here quotes a Passage of STRABO, where it is said that a People becomes extinct in two Manners: Either when the Persons, who composed that Body, fail, and the Country remains intirely desart; and when the Name and Body of the People subsists no longer. Lib. IX. p. 664. Edit. Amst. (434. Paris.)
- [2] Myus in VITRUVIUS, Helice and Buris in PAUSANIAS, STRABO, SENECA, Nat. Quaest. Lib. V. Cap. XXIII. XXXII. and in Antholog. GROTIUS.
- [a] Epist. XCI. Lib. XVII. Rer. gest. Diod. XVI.
- [3] That is inherit the Goods and Rights of all the private Persons who are lost. See PUFENDORF, B. VII. Chap. XII. § 8.
- [4] The Author in his Margin quotes two Laws, the former of which expressly decides that if a Body is reduced to one Person, that Person preserves the Name and Right of the whole Body. Dig. Lib. III. Tit. IV. Quod cujusque Universitatis, &c. Leg. VII. § 2. The other Law is not much to the Purpose, the Case is this. A Slave, who belonged to several Masters, being taken Prisoner of War, is redeemed by one, who thereby has a Right to keep him, till his former Masters reimburse the Expence of the Ransom. See B. III. Chap. IX. § 13. Num. 6. If the Reimbursement is made in the Name of all those, to whom the Slave belonged in common, they from that Moment recover him in common. But if in the Name of one, or some of them only, then he or each of them recovers not only the Share he had before the Slave was made Prisoner, but also, in Regard to the other Shares, succeeds to the Right of him who delivers the ransomed Slave; that is, as ANTHONY FAURE explains it, Jurisprud. Popinian. Tit. XI. Princip. VIII. Illat. XIV. till the rest have paid their Part of the Ransom, the Slave remains as it were a Pledge in the Hands of him or them, who have paid the Money. This is the whole Purport of the Law in Question, or rather of the Paragraph, the Sense of which, sufficiently clear from the rest of the Law, was perhaps misunderstood by our Author, Lib. XLIX. Tit. XV. De Captivis & postlimin. &c. Leg. XII. § 13.
- [1] PHILO, in his aforesaid Treatise, De Mundo, Τὸ μὲν ἐκ διεστηκότων, &c. Bodies composed of distinct and distant Members, such as Flocks, Herds, Chorus's, Armies, as well as those that are made up of compacted Parts, are dissolved by Division and Separation. See what is said above about a Ship. GROTIUS.
- [1] See DIODORE, of Sicily, Lib. XI. Cap. LXV.
- [2] This is related by the same Author, Lib. XVI. Cap. LIV. p. 538. Edit. H. Steph.
- [3] See the same Writer, Lib. XVII. Cap. XIV. p. 569. and ARRIAN, Lib. I. Cap. IX. &c.
- [4] We have this Fact from AULUS GELLIUS, Lib. X. Cap. III.
- [5] See FESTUS upon the word Praefectura. VELLEIUS, Lib. II. Their Rights were restored them about 152 Years after Capua, in the Punick War, had been reduced by the Romans into the Form of a Prefecture, or Government. Add to this the Examples produced in the Text and Notes, at B. I. Chap. I. § 8. GROTIUS.
- [6] Severus gave to the Alexandrians, who had lived under the Conduct of a Judge, called Juridicus, without any publick Council, the Liberty of chusing a Senate of their own. GROTIUS.
This last Fact is disputed by the learned REINESIUS, Not. ad Inscript. XXVI. Class. 2.

- [7] See XIPHILINUS, in his Life of Severus. HERODIAN, Lib. III. And to these sub join what is below in this, B. II. Chap. XXI. § 8. GROTIUS.
- [8] See ZONARAS. GROTIUS.
- [a] Theod. V. Hist. Ecc. Zon. in Val. & Theo.
- [1] The Romans consented that the Carthaginians should build another City at some Distance from the Sea; but the latter chose rather to perish with their City; as it appears from the Historian, quoted by our Author in the Margin, and from APPIAN, in Libyc. Bello.
- [2] Footnote number not in text, replaced from Latin edition. As the Geloi transported to Phintias. DIODORUS SICULUS, in Frag. Peires. GROTIUS.
This Fact is not in the Excerpta, which Mr. PEIRESC published; but in the Fragments before published of B. XXII. of DIODORE of Sicily. The Circumstances of the Foundation of that City may be seen in Dr. BENTLEY's English Dissertation on Phalaris's Epistles, p. 91. &c.
- [1] See PUFENDORF, B. VIII. Chap. XII. § 1. &c.
- [2] A Dorico modo in Phrygium. From a Doric to a Phrygian Air. The Words of Aristotle are answerable to the Latin of our Author: Δόριος Φρύγιος. Politic. Lib. III. Cap. III. p. 341.
- [3] For in that Regard several Parts are distinguished, according to the different Generals, or subaltern Officers, who command.
- [4] The Camp was dispersed, and the Army drawn up in several Manners. See on this Subject JUSTUS LIPSIUS's Treatise, De Militâ Romanâ; and the fourth Volume of DOM. BERNARD DE MONTEFAUCON's Antiquity explain'd and illustrated with Figures.
- [5] Thus GIFANIUS translates ἕτερος λόγος, is another Question. But BOECLER, in his Dissertation De actis Civitatis. Tom. I. Dissert. p. 860. pretends, but without alledging any Reason, that the Words ought to be rendred, we shall speak of that elsewhere. But the Philosopher treats this Question in no other Part of his Works; and it is evident he would not undertake to decide it.
- [6] See PUFENDORF, B. VIII. Chap. XII. § 4.
- [7] There is no Mention of Rank in the Decree of the Amphictyons, preserved by DIODORE of Sicily. It is only said there that Philip was to have two Votes in the Assembly, as the Phocians had. Biblioth. Hist. Lib. XVI. Cap. LXI. p. 542. Edit. H. Steph.
- [1] As the Celtiberi, according to DIODORUS, were formed of the Celtae and the Iberi. See if you have an Opportunity, REINKING upon this Subject. Lib. I. Class. IV. Cap. XVII. Num. 95. and what is cited there. GROTIUS.
- [2] See BOECLER's Dissertation, already quoted, p. 882, 883. and PUFENDORF, B. VIII. Chap. XII. § 6.
- [1] See PUFENDORF, B. VIII. Chap. XI. § 6. Chap. XII. § 5. It is well known that the present Colonies always remain dependent Members of the State, from which they are sent.
- [2] But yet with all due Respect to the Mother States, of which Respect we discoursed, B. I. Chap. III. § 21. CURTIUS, Lib. IV. The Tyrians founded Carthage, and therefore were always honoured as their Parents. GROTIUS.
See PITISCUS's Note on this Passage.

- [3] The same Historian, speaking of the second Colony, sent by the Corinthians to Epidamnus, says, They ordered publick Notice to be given that such as were willing to go thither should enjoy the same Rights and Privileges as those who staid at home. Ibid. Cap. XXVII. Edit. Oxon.
- [1] Our Author has been very much criticized on this Article; and it must be confessed not without Reason; for several Objections may be formed against him. Some have even accused him without Ceremony and with some Sharpness, of having started and decided the Question in this Place only with a View of making his Court to the Pope, and the Prince of whose Dominions he composed and published his Book. I hope I may be allowed to pass a more favourable Judgment of him, and reject Suspicions so little suitable to the Character of this great Man. Waving all Interest of a Translator and Commentator, I am persuaded that my Author has sincerely and honestly followed the Consequences of certain Principles, false indeed, but specious, and which he permitted to dazzle him. Those who are most severe upon him, own that while he designs, according to them, to flatter the Pope, he says what cannot but offend him very much, viz. That he ought to be considered only as the first Citizen of Rome; a Notion far removed from his ambitious Pretensions, as GROTIUS certainly knew. He saw his Book in the Index Expurgatorius, some time after its Publication. But whatever becomes of this Question, though I disapprove of the too warm Zeal of his Commentators, and of some other Authors, who have censured him in some particular Works; I will not fail of doing Justice to the Reasons they have employed against him, and which I shall borrow from them in the following Notes; I shall however take the Liberty of augmenting them, turning them my own Way, and sometimes even of correcting them.
- [2] This Reason would prove only, that the Emperors of Germany, Successors to the Roman Emperors, had a larger Extent of Lands in old Germany under their Jurisdiction. But, as in Order to succeed to the Roman Empire, it would not have been necessary that they should possess all that had depended on it; for several Parts of it might have been taken away by several Revolutions that happen in States: So, on the other Hand, they might have extended their Jurisdiction over Countries, which had never been conquered by the Roman Arms, and of which they were Masters by Vertue of some other Title. Our Author therefore has good Reason for maintaining that there has been no real Substitution of the Empire of Germany to the antient Roman Empire; but for Proof of this, he ought to have said, which however he will not acknowledge, that when the Roman People submitted to Charlemagne, the first Emperor of Germany, they had long before lost the Rights of their antient Empire. This Argument was not confuted by the Commentators.
- [3] It is indeed the same, if considered simply as a Body of a City; but not in Regard to the Rights of its antient Empire, which have been long extinct. Thus when that fatal Period is found, we may grant our Author all he says of the Times before it, without any Advantage to his Cause.
- [4] Our Author has already said, B. I. Chap. III. § 10. That the Roman Empire was elective. And it is certain that, as the first Emperors insensibly seized on the Sovereign Authority, without the express Consent of the People; so neither was there any fixed and fundamental Law concerning the Order of the Succession. We find, however, that the Sons, either natural or adopted, commonly succeeded; tho' it must be confessed, this was not the Result of a free Election of the Body of the State. Since Augustus, they did not even pretend to consult the People or the Senate: All depended on the Will of the Armies, and consequently on the Law of the strongest. After the Death of Nero, as TACITUS observes, The Secret of State was discovered, that the Emperor might be chosen elsewhere than at Rome. Hist. Lib. I. Cap. IV. Num. 2. Not that the People had really deprived themselves of their Right in Favour of the Armies; but they made no more Use of it, than if they had had none; and if they approved of Elections in which they had no Share, it was because they could not do otherwise. Such is the inevitable Fate of all Monarchies, where a strong Army is always on Foot.

- [5] You have frequent Instances of Elections, either made or approved of by the Senate, in ADRIAN, PERTINAX, JULIAN, SEVERUS, MACRINUS, MAXIMUS, BALBINUS, AURELIANUS, TACITUS, FLORIANUS, PROBUS, in DION, SPARTIANUS, CAPITOLINUS, LAMPRIIDIUS, VOPISCUS. Before Aurelian, the Empire was six Months without a Prince, and the Soldiery did several Times intreat the Senate to chuse an Emperor. There is an eminent Letter of Albinus in CAPITOLINUS, concerning the Right and Prerogative of the Senate, and a Letter of the Senate in behalf of the Gordians. MACRINUS, in an Harangue of his to the Senate, The Soldiers have offered me the Empire; I accept, illustrious Fathers, the Charge of it, till I know your Pleasure, and if it be as agreeable to you as it is to the Gentlemen of the Army, I will retain the Government. The Emperor Tacitus, in VOPISCUS's Life of Probus, Me indeed, by the discreet Choice of the Army, has the Senate made their Prince. And Probus, in the same VOPISCUS, The last Year, most illustrious Fathers, by a just Prerogative, did your Goodness give the World a Prince, one of your own Order, who are the Princes of the World, always have been, and always will be so, in your latest posterity. And Majorinus in his Address to the Senate, mentioned in the Novellae, You must acknowledge, most illustrious Fathers, that I was created Emperor, as well by your free Choice, as by the Proclamation of an invincible Army. GROTIUS.

The learned GRONOVIVS, in a long Note on this Place, makes it appear from the Circumstances of the Creation of each particular Emperor, that not one of them was raised to the Empire by a free Election of the Senate, and that the Approbation of that Body always came after the Choice was made; so that all the fine Speeches of some Emperors here related, and others of the like Sort, are only so many empty Grimaces. In this I agree with him; but still it may thence be inferred, that the Emperors themselves acknowledged the Roman People had not divested themselves of the Right to chuse themselves a Master. Besides, the Commentator justly points out some Failures in Point of Exactness made by our Author in Regard to the Facts. First, The Interregnum, of which he speaks, did not happen till after Aurelian's Death, and before the Reign of Tacitus. See VOPISCUS, in Aureliano, Cap. XI. and in Tacito, Cap. II, III. And this Example is sufficient to shew how much the Soldiers were in Possession of the Election of the Emperor; for the Senate always sent them back the Ball; well knowing, says the Historian, that the Army did not willingly receive Emperors chosen by the Senate. Secondly, what our Author calls a Letter of Albinus, is a Speech made to the Army, Concio, in which he doth not acknowledge the present Right of the Senate. See Chap. XIII. of that Emperor's Life, written by CAPITOLINUS. The Letter of the Senate concerning the Gordians, quoted by CAPITOLINUS, in Maximum. duob. Cap. XV. only says that the Senate acknowledged the two Gordians, Father and Son, who had been proclaimed in Africa, as appears from the same Author, in Gordian. Cap. XI.

- [6] PUFENDORF, in a Dissertation, De Interregnis, which appears in the Collection of his Dissertationes Academicæ, § 17. explains this in the following Manner: That the Soldiers, being only Ministers of the State, could not lawfully appropriate to themselves the Right of disposing of the Government. The Maxim is true; but that is not our Author's Thought. He means, that as there were several Legions, and those Legions not being fixt and determined Bodies nor confin'd to any Time or Place; it could not be known what Legions had a Right to elect the Emperor, preferably to the others. In Reality it happened sometimes that an Army having proclaimed one in one Place, another was proclaimed in another Place.

- [7] Of Antoninus Caracalla. Digest. Lib. I. Tit. I. De Statu hominum, Leg. XVII. See the excellent Treatise of Baron SPANHEIM, intituled, Orbis Romanus.
- [8] The Colonies had indeed the same Privileges as the Roman Citizens, in what related to Marriages, Wills, Infranchisement and other private Affairs; but not a deliberative Voice in the publick Assemblies, nor a Right of standing for the Offices of the City of Rome. See the illustrious Author last quoted, Lib. I. Cap. IX.
- [9] Municipia. These were, properly speaking, Towns governed by their own Laws, and which had a deliberative Voice at Rome, as also a Right of standing for Offices, especially in the Army. Some however were deprived of the Privilege last mentioned. See the same Author, Cap. XIII.
- [10] Provinciae togatae. What the Romans called Toga, was, according to some, a round Garment closed on all Sides, and without Sleeves; which was worn so that, after having passed the Head, the right Arm was thrust out, and the other Side of the Garment lay on the left Shoulder. But the learned Father MONTFAUCON is of Opinion that it was open before. See Antiquity explained and illustrated by Figures, Tom. II. B. I. Chap. V. p. 16, 17. Whatever becomes of this Question, the Use of this Garment was so peculiar to the Romans, and they esteemed it so highly, that the bare Allowance of wearing it supposed a Grant of the Right of a Roman Citizen. For this Reason the Appellation of Gallia Togata was given to Gallia Cisalpina, and not, as GRONOVIVS says, to Gallia Narbonensis, which, on the contrary, was called Gallia Braccata, on the Account of a very different Dress. See once more SPANHEIM's Orbis Romanus, Exercit. II. Cap. VI. p. 239. and MONTFAUCON's large Collection, before quoted, at the End of the same Chapter.
- [11] Uti Jure Quiritum. This is not the same as Jus Latii, as Mr. SPANHEIM shews, Orb. Rom. Exercit. I. Cap. IX.
- [12] The Senate in Favour of Gordianus, in HERODIAN, exhorts the Provinces, Πείθεσθαι Ἰρωμαίοις ᾧν δημόσιον ἔνοθεν τὸ κράτος ἐστὶν αὐτάτε φίλα καὶ ὑπήκοα ἐκ πρῶτον, To obey the Romans, to whom the Empire had for so many Ages belonged, and to whom other Nations, by an antient Right, were in Subjection and Friendship. And in the same Author, Maximus, in his Speech to the Soldiery, Οὐ γὰρ ἕνος ἀνδρός, &c. For our Empire is not the Property of any one Man, but from long and distant Ages the common Possession of the Roman People; and the Fortune of the Empire resides in this City. We are only chosen to share with you the Care and Administration of the publick Concerns. CLAUDIAN, speaking of Rome.

Armorum legúmque parens quae fundit in omnes Imperium.

Founder of Arms and Laws, that over all Unbounded Sway extends.

GROTIUS.

- [13] There was more than a bare Change of Residence, it was manifestly a Communication of Rights. The Name of New Rome, given to the City of Constantinople, with all the Encomiums, and all the Privileges of the Old, particularly the Consulship divided between one Consul at Rome and one at Constantinople, sufficiently shew that the Source of the Empire was from that Time no longer at Rome. See the learned JAMES GODEFROY on the Theodosian Code, Tom. V. p. 222, 223. and SPANHEIM on JULIAN's first Speech, p. 75, 76. Our Author says that the Emperors were then elected at Constantinople by a Part of the Roman People. But was the Election made by Romans only, or by Persons commissioned by them? This was far from being the Case; for on the Division of the Empire into the Eastern and Western Empires after the Death of THEODOSIUS the Great, the Emperor who resided at Rome, was to be confirmed by that of Constantinople; without which his Authority was not considered as lawful and well established. See GRONOVIVS on this Place.

[14] In Eutrop. Lib. II. Ver. 135.

[15] ZONARAS says, that Rome had the Preference, because the Empire came from thence. AMMIANUS, Lib. XIV. talking of Rome, She is, however, in all Parts regarded as Queen and Mistress. CLAUDIAN, of Honorius residing at Ravenna:

*Quem, precor, ad finem Laribus sejuncta Potestas
Exsulat, Imperitemque suis à finibus errat?*

*How long shall Power thus be banish'd Home,
Pray tell me, how long shall sovereign Rule
Abroad thus wander, and fly its native Court?*

GROTIUS.

[16] For one of the Consuls was of the City of Rome, and he took Place of the other. PROCOPIUS, in his Secret History. GROTIUS.

Notwithstanding all those exterior Marks of Distinction, as to the Substance, the Source as well as the Seat of the Empire was in the East; and Constantinople enjoyed real Privileges. Such is the Policy of Princes, that they know how to feed with Smoke such as they deprive of their Rights; they make no Difficulty of leaving them the Names and empty Honours of what they formerly implied.

[17] Our Author makes a terrible Skip here. Had he forgot that about the Close of the fifth Century, in the Year 476. Odoacer, King of the Heruli, a People of Scythia, gave the finishing Bow to the Empire of the West by taking Rome, and making himself Master of Italy? And that the same Prince was vanquished and dispossessed, thirteen Years after by Theodoric II. King of the Goths, whose Successors reigned in Italy near a hundred Years? The Roman People therefore had been conquer'd as lawfully, as they themselves had conquered so many other Nations; so that they were no longer the same People, according to the Principles laid down by our Author, § 6. And after the Goths had been driven out of Italy by Justinian, Rome and the other Cities, which he took from them, became dependent on his Empire. The Roman People was then made tributary to the Emperor of Constantinople. They afterwards had Exarchs, or Governors, as a Province of the Eastern Empire, so that their antient Right had been long extinguished, when Charlemagne made War on the Lombards, who had driven out the Exarchs, and made themselves Masters of the greatest Part of Italy.

[18] Nero, in the fourteenth of TACITUS's Annals, accuses his Mother, for hoping to have a Share in the Empire, and to see the Praetorian Cohorts take an Oath to a Woman, a Thing that would disgrace both Senate and People. PRISCUS in Excerpt. Legat. Οὐ γὰρ θηλειᾶν, ἀλλ' ἀρρένων ἡ τῆς Ῥωμαϊκῆς βασιλείας ἀρχή, For the Sovereignty of the Roman Empire does not belong to Women but to Men. LAMPRIIDIUS, after the Death of Heliogabalus, It was particularly provided, that no Woman should ever enter the Senate, and that whoever should attempt to introduce one should be cursed to the Pit of Hell. TREBELLIVS POLLIO, in Herennianus. Zenobia usurping the Empire, kept the Government in her Hands much longer than a Woman ought to have done. GROTIUS.

[19] It was the Popes, who engaged the Cities of Italy to shake off the Yoke of the Emperor of the East, and the Reasons or Pretexts by them used, and which our Author leaves us to guess, were on one Hand, the Tyranny of the Exarchs of Ravenna: On the other, the Zeal, which the Emperor Leo shewed against Images; a Reason very proper for the irritating the ignorant and superstitious People, whose Credulity and Bigotry gave the Bishop of Rome an Opportunity of making himself a Temporal Prince by Degrees. His Spiritual Kingdom was already of a large Extent; and Pepin, Charlemagne's Father, very well understood how to make his Advantage of it; for by the Fear and with the Approbation of Pope Zachary, he got King Childeric, condemned to pass the Remainder of his Days in a Monastery, and engaged the Franks to acknowledge him for their King, as more worthy of the Crown, of which he before had the whole Authority under the Title of Maire of the Palace: In Return for these good Offices, Pepin, who besides was not insensible to the Desire of making Conquests in a Country so fine as Italy, easily came to a Resolution of marching to the Assistance of Pope Stephen, Zachary's Successor, in Order to free him from Aistulphus, King of the Lombards; and procured him the Exarchate of Ravenna, with a Sort of Temporal Power. See Note (8.) on B. I. Chap. III. § 13. Charlemagne inherited his Father's Sentiments in that Respect, when he had driven the Lombards out of Italy, and conquered the Kingdom by them established.

[20] This Concession being a gratuitous Supposition, as appears from the preceding Notes, the Revocation is so too.

[21] Our Author means the Coronation of Charlemagne by Leo III. who proclaimed him Emperor of the Romans. But he did not then begin to reign over the Romans. He was already in Possession of the Thing, and only acquired a dazzling Title, which represented the Dignity of the antient Emperors of Rome, with which however he was not invested in the same Manner, and with the same Extent. He was far from succeeding to all their Rights, those Rights were extinct, as well as the Rights of the People. The People were become dependent on the Emperors of Constantinople, as was before observed. Charlemagne himself acknowledged that Dependence, by his Transaction with the Empress Irene; a Transaction, which was ratified by Nicephorus, that Princess's Successor. See EGINHART, De vitâ Caroli Magni, Cap. XXVIII. with the Notes of the Commentators, which may be seen in Mr. SCHMINCKE's Edition; as also the Life of Charlemagne, by BOECLER, in Tom. II. of his Dissertations, p. 2111. &c. and in III. p. 21. &c. and PUFENDORF, De Origine Imperii Germanici, Cap. I. p. 50. &c. with the Notes in the late Mr. TITIVS's Edition.

[22] Supposing this true (for were not the Judges the first Person in the State, before the Institution of Kings?) it doth not thence follow that a Bishop ought to be the first Person of his City, or that the Ecclesiastical Order ought to hold the first Rank in a Civil Society. Under the Law, the High Priests had, beside the Rights relating to Religion, some Authority in Civil Affairs; it was a politick Establishment. But the Case is not the same under the Gospel; and if Ecclesiasticks have found Means to abuse the Simplicity of the People, for gratifying their own Ambition, it is contrary to the Rules of their Duty, and the Spirit of the Doctrine they preach.

[23] This is not agreed on; and it is much more probable that, as Charlemagne succeeded to the Rights of the Emperors of the East over Italy, he had also an hereditary Title to them. We find, at least, that Charlemagne and some of his Successors declared their Sons Emperors, without consulting either the Roman People or the Pope. See HERMANN. CONRING. De German. Imper. Rom. Cap. VII. § 21. &c. If in Process of Time, the Popes would pretend to crown whom they pleased, it was the Result of a Design they had long entertained, of making themselves Temporal Sovereigns both of Italy, and, if they could, of the whole Earth. But all this is nothing to the principal Question in Hand.

[24] See the Synod of Pont-yon among the Capitularies of Charles the Bald. And AEMILIUS, Lib. III. of Charles the Great. GROTIUS.

[25] They had Reason to make this Distinction; for they reigned over the Franks, and had conquered the Kingdom of the Lombards, before they acquired the Title of Emperors. But that Title gave them no Right over the antient Roman Empire: it was a Name not worth even the Sovereignty of Rome, and of the Cities of the Exarchate, since Charlemagne had had it before he was saluted Emperor.

[26] See WITHIKIND, Lib. I. and MEIBOMIUS's Observations there; and the Treaty of Charles and Henry, after the Capitularies of Charles the Bald, and the Remarks upon it of the judicious and learned JACOBUS SIRMUNDUS. WIBBO calls that Western Division of the Franks, the Latin, because the Roman Language was there in Use, as it is to this Day, for the People on the other Side the Rhine use the German Tongue. GROTIUS.

[27] This was observed by PRISCUS, in Excerpt. Legat. and by REGINON, ad Ann. DCCCXVI. Charlemagne in his Will, If the Son of any of these three Sons. GROTIUS.
See the Historical Preface to Father DANIEL's History of France, where he shews that, under the second Race of Kings the Crown was not hereditary. To which add what I have observed, Notes 4. and 5. on B. I. Chap. III. § 13.

[28] This is certainly Fact, and expressly attested by WIBBO, in his Life of Conradus Salicus. GROTIUS.

The Fact is very far from being certain; and this pretended Reserve is no where to be found. The particular Approbation of the Roman People might have been requisite for shewing that the Dignity of the Emperor of Rome was distinct from the Kingdom of Germany; and that is the Reason why the Emperor was crowned at Rome; a Coronation which was only a bare Ceremony, and no more gave the Pope a Right of approving or disapproving of the Election, than the Coronation performed at Aix la Chapelle or Francfort gave the Inhabitants of those Towns a Right of rejecting the Person named by the Electors. See HERMANN. CONRING. De Imper. Rom. German. Cap. VII. § 21. &c. and BOECLER, in the Life of Otho I. p. 221. &c. of Tom. II. of his Dissertations.

[29] Thus the Pope, in his Excommunication of the Emperor Henry IV. names the Kingdom of the Teutonics, and that of Italy, distinctly. See Otho's Privilege granted to Alderamus, published by MEIBOMIUS, after WITHIKIND's Saxonica; and CRANTZIUS Saxonic, V. in Otho's Oath, which GRATIAN has inserted in his sixty-third Distinction, I will in Rome make no Decree or Order about any Thing that belongs to you (the Pope) or the Romans, without your own Advice and Direction. GROTIUS.

Our Author here confounds what he had before distinguished, the Kingdom of Italy with the Roman Empire. The former belonged to Charlemagne, as he had taken it from the Lombards by Conquest, and independently on the Imperial Dignity, which he afterwards acquired. This has been substantially proved by the learned CONRINGIUS, in his Treatise De Germanorum Imperio Romano, which I have quoted, and which ought to be consulted on this whole Affair. Those who are desirous of seeing in a few Words, what best can be said on the Subject, may read a Dissertation by the late Mr. HERTIUS, De uno homine plures sustinente personas, Sect 1. § 1, 2, 3. p. 55. &c. of Tom. III. of his Comment. and Opuscula, &c.

[30] As King of Italy, all that had been the Kingdom of Lombardy belongs to him: As Roman Emperor, he has only the City of Rome, the Exarchate of Ravenna, and some few Towns more which lay out of the Lands of the Kingdom of the Lombards; which is but a small Matter.

[31] Not so, as appears from what has been said in the foregoing Notes.

[32] See Chap. XXII. of this Book, § 13.

[33] Just as in the German Empire, the Elector Palatine and the Elector of Saxony do, who are Vicars of the Empire, and have it parted betwixt them. See SERRANUS, in the Life of Lewis XII. GROTIUS.

The Comparison is not just. The two Electors, here mentioned, are incontestably in Possession of that Right by the Laws of the Empire; but the Pope has no Right to give the Investiture of the Fiefs of Italy, which are those in Question; since the Kingdom of Italy doth not at all depend on the Roman People, nor ever did since the Invasion of the Lombards.

[34] So during the Interregnum of Poland, the Archbishop of Gnesna, as Primate, supplies the King's Place, and sits on the regal Throne. PHILIP HONORIUS, In Dissert. de Reg. Pol. GROTIUS.

The Primate of Poland has that Right by the fundamental Laws of the State; but the Pope has no such Right, for the Reasons already alledged.

[35] Our Author's System being overthrown, this Consequence, and all others of the same Sort, fall of themselves.

[1] And consequently, the Right of the Deceased is not extinct; it is continued in the Person of the Heir to whom it devolves. It is a Maxim of the Roman Law, agreeable to the Principles of the Law of Nature, that An Inheritance is nothing but a Succession to the whole Right which the Deceased enjoyed. Digest. Lib. L. De diversis regulis Juris, Leg. LXII.

[1] On all this consult PUFENDORF, B. IV. Chap XIII. where he only explains, supplies, or corrects what our Author advances in this Chapter. I go still farther than he, in my Notes on the second Edition; where I resolve all the Questions here handled, by a Principle more simple, and, in my Opinion, much better grounded.

[2] Among the positive Commands of the Law given to the Hebrews, there is one that enjoins the restoring a Thing found to its Owner. It is in the seventy-fourth commanding Precept. This is founded as well upon a natural Equity, as upon a Passage in Deuteronomy xxii. 1. St. CHRYSOSTOM, 1 Cor. v. 8. Ταῦτα δε καὶ οἱ τῶν ἕξωθεν, &c. Even human Laws allow us to seize on our own where ever we find it, without pursuing the Thief or Robber. St. JEROME upon Leviticus, Many People think there is no Harm in keeping what they have found, tho' it belongs to some Body else, and cry, GOD gave it me, and to whom must I restore it? But let them understand, that it is a Crime very much like Theft, not to return what one has found. St. AUSTIN, in his eighteenth Sermon upon the Apostle's Words, If you have found any Thing, and not restored it, you have stole it. And a little afterwards, Whoever restores not what he has got of another Body's, would, if he had an Opportunity, rob him too. GRATIAN has put both these Passages together, in Caus. XIV. Quest. V. GROTIUS.

The Passage there quoted, and attributed to St. JEROME, belongs to ORIGEN, and is translated from his Hom. IV. on Leviticus vi. as is observed in PITHOU's Edition.

And the same St. AUSTIN, De Fide & Operibus, As by the Right of holding Estates, he who is in Possession of another Man's Lands, is very justly reputed the lawful and honest Proprietor, as long as he knows nothing of that Matter: But, when he is acquainted with it, and does not quit them, then is he looked upon as a pitiful tricking Fellow, and shall be justly termed a Rogue and a Villain. To this Purpose is a Law of the Wisigoths, Lib. IX. Tit. I. Cap. IX. But for some weighty Reasons the Civil Law does sometimes stretch and augment this Obligation, as the Burgundian Law, Lib. I. Tit. VI. in the Case of a Slave who runs away. Nerva ordered all those Goods to be restored which Domitian had unjustly taken from the right Owners, as we are told by XIPHILINUS. And Belisarius, in PROCOPIUS, Gotthic. II. Οὐμίαι δ' ἔγωγε τῆν, &c. For my Part I think, that he who sets upon him and robs him, and he who has got what is his Neighbour's, and refuses to give it him again, are all one. GROTIUS.

[3] That is, if he knows not the Master, or does not find Means to let him know he has his Goods, or convey them to him; the Obligation is then suspended.

[4] There is no Necessity of supposing an Agreement in this Case. See my first Note on PUFENDORF, B. IV. Chap. XIII. § 3.

[5] He who is in Possession of another Man's Goods, is obliged to restore them, purely because they are another Man's Goods. But he who has taken them, or retains them, knowing them to be such, renders himself, moreover, subject to Punishment.

[a] Plut. in Pelop.

[6] So thinks DIODORUS, Lib. XV. PLUTARCH, in his Life of Agesilaus, Τῆν πόλιν ἔπεισεν, &c. He persuaded the City to take upon them the Injustice, and so to detain Cadmea for themselves. You have such another Action of Bajazet, in Regard to Nicopolis, mentioned by LEUNCLAVIUS, Lib. VI. GROTIUS.

It appears from the Passage of DIODORE of Sicily, to which we are here referred, and that quoted from PLUTARCH, that those Authors argue on a Supposition that Phaebidas had acted of his own Head, or at least the Thebans had no Proof of the contrary. So that Mr. COCCEJUS, late Professor at Franckfort, on the Oder, in an academical Dissertation, De Testamentis Principum, Sect. II. § 14. charges our Author wrongfully with contradicting himself; because the Lacedemonians were as culpable as Phaebidas, who had acted only by their Order; so that, in condemning him, they only condemned themselves.

[7] He says they were punished by the very Persons on whom they had practised this Perfidy. Hist. Graec. Lib. V. Cap. IV. § 1. Edit. Oxon.

[8] Certain Persons brought a forged Will, attributed to L. Minutius, a Man of a good Estate, from Greece to Rome. To make it pass more easily, they put down M. Crassus, and Q. Hortensius, Coheirs with themselves, two very considerable Persons, of the same Age; who suspecting the Forgery, but being conscious of no Fault committed by themselves, did not refuse the Advantage arising from the Crimes of others. But is this sufficient for clearing them from the Imputation of Guilt? I think not. De Offic. Lib. III. Cap. XVIII. Here our Author seems to me to suppose that M. Crassus and Q. Hortensius at first believed the Will to be genuine, and that having afterwards suspected it to be forged, they however took the Advantage of it, under Pretence they had no Hand in the Forgery. Thus the Example may make to the Purpose; as it shews it is not sufficient to have at first acquired the Possession of another Man's Goods, bonâ fide, as these two Romans had done, by acting as Heirs to what they believed fell to them by Vertue of the Will; but that as they ought to have left it to the lawful Heirs, as soon as they perceived the Cheat; so every Possessor, bonâ fide, ought to restore what he has in his Hands, as soon as he knows the true Proprietor. So that our Author may thus be screened from the Criticism of PUFENDORF, in the Chapter quoted, answering to this, § 4.

[b] L. Bona fides. D. Deposit.

[9] See what I have said on PUFENDORF, ibid.

[c] L. rerum, D. de act. rer. amot.

[10] Condictio. This relates to the Subtilties of the Roman Bar: See the Dispute on this Law in Question, between ANTHONY FAURE, De Errorib. Pragmatic. Decad. LXXVIII. Err. IV. and REINH. BACHOVIVS, Chiliad. Errorum, or Exercitation. p. 53, 54.

[d] L. Falsus. D. de furtis.

[1] In my Notes on PUFENDORF, B. IV. Chap. XIII. § 3. 6. &c. I have examined our Author's Principles concerning this whole Matter; and shewn by Reasons, which tho' new, I think sufficiently solid, that the Possessor, bonâ fide, has as such, and while he remains such, the same Right as the unknown Proprietor. Hence arise Decisions widely different from these of our Author, in Regard to the Obligations of such a Possessor. Mr. THOMASIVS, who in the main is of the same Opinion with GROTIUS and PUFENDORF, owns in his Notes on HUBER, De Jure Civit. p. 535. That, when the Question is whether a Possessor, bonâ fide, is enriched by the Possession of the Thing itself, or by the Enjoyment of the Profits arising from it, it is an Enquiry subject to infinite Difficulties, and which it is almost impossible to satisfy.

[a] Cajet. ad Th. 2. 2. 62. Art. 6. L. Hem veniunt. D. de petit. Hered.

[b] De Off. 3. L. Jure Naturae. D. reg. Juris, & ibi Inter.

[2] CASSIODORE, XI. 16. We now-a-Days confess that it is something very shocking, for one to be enriched by another's Misfortune.

[3] But, not to extend it too far, it must be considered whether he who makes Profit at the Expence of another Man, had no Right to make such Profit. For if he had, it is evident it is so much the better for him, and so much the worse for the other.

[c] L. Si quis mancipiis. D. de Instit. act.

[4] See Note 2. on PUFENDORF, B. VI. Chap. II. § 8.

[5] He who of his own Head thus undertook the Defence of absent Persons, was obliged to give Security for the Payment of all Costs if he was cast. See Instit. Lib. IV. Tit. XI. De Satisfationibus, §5.

[6] See Digest. Lib. III. Tit. III. De Procuratoribus & Defensoribus.

[7] On Account of the Velleian senatus consultum, according to which a Woman could not enter into an Obligation for another, either mediately or immediately.

[8] See CUJAS in Papinian. Quaest. Tom. IV. Opp. p. 209. &c. and ANTHONY FAURE, Rational. Tom. IV. p. 326, 327.

[9] Actio utilis; an indirect Action. This is when the Case, for which an Action is granted in a Court of Judicature, not being included in the Sense of the Law, is deduced from it by a favourable Interpretation, suitable to the Rules of Equity, and consequently in an indirect Manner. Thus the Lawyers call the opposite Action direct, as arising from the Terms and strict Sense of the Law. See Institut. Lib. IV. Tit. III. De Lege Aquelia, § 16.

[10] He proposes a Case, where the Husband is insolvent, after a Divorce, so that the Wife, who would take Advantage of the Law, for revoking the Donation against the Prohibitions, cannot recover what she has given, but by taking Satisfaction one Way or other on the Thing bought with her Money. See CUJAS on this Law, Recit. in Paul. Quaest. Tom. V. Opp. p. 1088, 1089. and ANTHONY FAURE, Conject. Jur. Civil. Lib. V. Cap. IX. as also De Erroribus Pragmaticorum. Decad. LXXXI. Err. X. with the Criticism of BACHOVIVS, in his Chilias Errorum, &c. on this Place.

[11] According to which it is to be said, that if you should take away and spend the Money which that Slave had stolen from me, not knowing it to be stolen, but supposing it Part of the Peculium of such a Slave; I am allowed a personal Action against you on that Score, as having taken Possession of my Goods without a just Title. The Question here turns on a Slave which the former Master had sold with his peculium, and from whom the new Master, making Use of his Right, had afterwards taken the stolen Money, which he, bonâ fide, believed to be Part of the peculium acquired with the Slave. See on this Law CUJAS, in African. Tom. I. p. 1518. and ANTHONY FAURE, Rational. Tom. V. p. 512.

[12] See what I have said in my Treatise of Play, B. II. Chap. IV. § 21.

[13] Dig. Lib. XX. Tit. V. De distractione pignorum, &c. Leg. XII. § 1.

[14] This Reason doth not fall on what immediately goes before, but on the first Part of the Period. For the Question is not here about a Creditor, who, for the Interest of Money lent, receives the Rent of an Estate which the Debtor possessed, bonâ fide, as his own; as the learned GRONOVIVS explains it. The Lawyer is speaking of a Creditor, who having lost the Possession of the Estate engaged, which proves not to be the Property of the Debtor, demands it, and recovers it by Law, together with the Rents which the Possessor had received from it. So that our Author might have omitted this additional Reason, which is nothing to the principal Subject, for which he alledges the Decision in the preceding Note; or at least he ought not to have imitated the Inaccuracy of the Lawyer TRYPHONIVS, who has obscured the Sense, by placing his Thoughts in bad order. See Digest. Lib. XX. Tit. I. De Pignorib. & Hypothecis. Leg. XXI. § ult.

[15] That is, in Case the Creditor has given that Debtor Orders to lend it to a Third. See Digest. Lib. XII. Tit. I. De rebus creditis, &c. Leg. XXXII.

[1] Indeed, when the Question turns on a Thing bought, or acquired with any other burthensome Title, the Possessor, bonâ fide, will be so far from gaining, that he will lose by it; because the Profits he may have received will not commonly equal the Value of the Thing itself. But if he has received the Thing as a Present, and been in Possession of it some Time; he may be reckoned richer, in Regard of the Income, which he has enjoyed during that Time. So that this Distinction ought to be made, according to our Author's Principles; but, pursuant to mine, it is as unnecessary as subject to perplexing Discussions.

[1] According to the Roman Law, the Decisions of which are grounded on Principles the same with those of our Author, a Possessor, bonâ fide, lawfully appropriates to himself both the Profits arising from his own Industry, and such as are purely natural. This is agreeable to what I have laid down in my Notes on the Chapter of PUFENDORF, already quoted.

[1] He is not obliged to it; because, as Possessor, bonâ fide, he had, during that Time, the same Right as the real Proprietor; as the very End and Practice of Property require. See the Notes on PUFENDORF, who on this Occasion adds the following Restriction: Unless the Possessor, bonâ fide, cannot indemnify himself by a Remedy against him of whom he holds the Thing.

[2] Caligula made this Restitution either out of Caprice, or vain Ostentation, or for some other Reason of the same Kind. For after he had reinstated Antiochus, the Person here mentioned by the Historian, in the Possession of that Part of Syria, called Comagena, which Tiberius had reduced into the Form of a Province, he took it away again from Antiochus. See SPANHEIM's Orbis Romanus, p. 361. And the Acquisition was originally not more lawful than most of the Roman Conquests. So that the Question here is not concerning a Possessor, bonâ fide.

- [1] But that which he has disposed of, equally belonged to him, when he gave it away.
- [1] He is not obliged to restore either the Overplus in the first Case, or the full Price of what the Thing was sold for in the second; for the Reason already often alledged. Besides, our Author had in his Margin quoted a Law of the Digest, which decides that if the true Master of a Thing stolen, knowing the Thief has sold it, takes from him by Force the Money he received for it, he in his turn is guilty of Theft; because the Money produced by the Sale of a Thing is not the Thing it self, and therefore the Master of such a Thing cannot look on the Money as his own. Lib. XLVII. Tit. II. De Furtis, Leg. XLVIII. § 7. The Design of this Quotation is probably to shew that according to the Roman Lawyers, the Money, which the Possessor, bonâ fide, has got for another Man's Goods, which he has sold, is not the Thing it self, and therefore he is not obliged to restore it. For Want of observing this, PUFENDORF seems to censure our Author, in the Chapter so often quoted, § 11. Note 3. as if he intended to insinuate what is entirely contrary to his own Principles; as is evident from B. II. Chap. VII. § 2.
- [1] Yes, if he can have his Remedy against the Seller; but not otherwise, if we were to judge of the Matter by the Law of Nature alone. See Note 1. on § 13. of the Chapter in PUFENDORF, so often referred to.
- [2] In TERENCE's Self-Tormentor, Act. IV. Scen. IV. ver. 42, &c.

*Sed illud quod tibi
Dixi de Argento quod ista debet Bacchidi;
Id nunc, &c.*

But for the Money I told you, your Daughter owes to Bacchis, that must be paid down upon the Nail. Neither will you, I presume, shift it off by saying, What is it to me? Did she lend me the Money? Was it done by my Orders? What had she to do to pawn my Daughter without my Consent? As for that, Chremes, the old Saying is true, You may have much Law on your Side, and but little Equity. Where also see EUGRAFIUS. This Piece of Justice is approved too by the Rabbies, and by the Wisigoths, Lib. I. Tit. IX. Cap. IX. and Cap. XV. Alc. III. Praes. XXIX. Menoch. V. Praes. XXIX. Num. 26. Strach. Part. II. Num. 18. GROTIUS.

- [3] But if the honest Possessor has been at no Charge, if he has only paid what the Thing was worth; how is he entitled to profit by what the Proprietor would have been obliged to give for the Recovery of his Goods? If the Proprietor is become more rich by the Bargain, so much the better for him; the Possessor is not thereby more poor. Thus we see how disadvantageous the Condition of an honest Possessor would be, in Comparison of that of the Proprietor. And I will venture to say, that the Maxim under Consideration, how generally soever it may be received by the Lawyers and Moralists, will appear most shocking to Reason, if well considered; and that it will be sufficient to make one suspect the common Principles are not supported by solid Foundations. Accordingly we find that the Customs of several Nations form Exceptions to the Maxim of the Roman Law in several Cases; as in Regard to Things bought in a Fair established by publick Authority: Things pawned in the Hands of the Lombards: Old Cloaths bought of a Broker, &c. For if it appears that such Things are another Man's Property, the honest Possessor is not obliged to restore them to the true Master, but on receiving what they cost him. This our Author himself shews in his Introduction to the Law of Holland, written in Flemish, Lib. II. Part III. Num. 13. As doth also ZYPÆUS, Not. Jur. Belgic. Tit. De rei vindic. verbo Jure Dominus; as HUBER observes, Praelect. in Pandect. Tit. De adquir. rerum Dominio, Num. 2. See likewise VOET. in Tit. De rei vindic. Num. 1.

[4] Digest. Lib. XVIII. Tit. I. De contrahendâ emptione, Leg. XVI.

[5] Ibid. Leg. XXXIV. § 4.

[6] Spec. Saxon. I. 37. Landrecht, Tit. XV. GROTIUS.

[7] It is grounded on a most evident Maxim of natural Equity; viz. That he that doth another Service ought not to sustain any Damage from it. Now this would be the Case, if we refused to reimburse the Expences which a Man has made for our Use, at a Time when we could not attend our own Affairs. The Good of Society, and the Interest of each Member of it, require also that if during a Person's Absence, some Business of his is to be done, for which he has left no Orders, either general or particular, some Person should take Care of his Affairs. This the Roman Lawyers call a received Practice, (receptum) and add that, No one would undertake this, was he not to be allowed an Action for his Expences. Institut. Lib. III. Tit. XXVII. De obligatione, quasi ex contractu, § 1. So that unless he who has taken Care of the Affairs of a Person absent, did not plainly declare he designed to charge himself with them out of pure Liberality, and place the necessary Expences to his own Account, he is and ought to be supposed not to have given his Trouble for nothing.

[8] Digest. Lib. XI. Tit. VI. De religiosis, & sumptibus funerum, &c. Leg. XIV. § 13.

[9] This is said on Occasion of a Person, who being charged by the Will of the Deceased to bury him, acquits himself of his Commission, notwithstanding the Prohibitions of the Heir; and thus cannot have an Action against him, as for doing Business. But even according to the Maxims of the Roman Law, He who is at the Expences of a Funeral, is supposed to contract with the Deceased, and not with his Heirs. Ibid. Leg. I. So that the Debt is attached to the Goods left by the Deceased.

[10] Digest. Lib. III. Tit. V. De negotiis gestis. Leg. VI. § 3.

[11] Digest. Lib. XIV. Tit. II. De lege Rhodiâ, &c. Leg. I.

[1] True; but, as he is not obliged to lose his Money, according to my Principles, it is sufficient that he gives the right Owner Notice, and as far as in him lies, furnishes him with Means for recovering his Goods.

[1] St. CHRYSOSTOM, in the Place just mentioned. (§ 1. Note 2.) GROTIUS.

[1] See what I have said at large on PUFENDORF, B. III. Chap. VII. § 6. Note 2. of the second Edition.

[2] St. AUSTIN, in his fifty-fourth Epistle, makes a very excellent Distinction in this Affair. GROTIUS.

[a] See § 9. of the following Chapter, and Chap. XII. § 9, 10, 11.

[1] That is, if such Things fall into any one's Hands, and he has not consumed or expended them, he is not less obliged to restore them in Specie to their right Owner, than other Sorts of Things which in their own Nature do not admit of an Equivalent.

[1] See Chap. I. of this Book, § 2.

[2] Συνάλλαγμα, that is according to the Notion of the Roman Lawyers, whom that Author follows, an Engagement valid in Law. Now Engagements valid in Law were either Contracts, properly so called, which were distinguished by some particular Name, as Sale, Letting, Loan &c. or Agreements by Vertue of which there was somewhat in Fact, or actually given. Both of them are in general called not only Contracts, but also Affairs. (Negotia) Civil Affairs (Negotia Civilians) Civil Causes, &c. See Mr. NOODT's excellent Treatise, De Pactis & Transactionibus, Cap. IX.

- [3] Compare this with what I have said on PUFENDORF, B. III. Chap. V. § 9. Note 2. I have since seen a Dissertation of the late Mr. COCCEIUS, intituled, De Jure circa Actus imperfectos, printed at Francfort on the Oder, in 1699. in which he maintains, Sect. II. That even by the Law of Nature, a simple Agreement is not Obligatory. But for Proof of this Paradox, he makes use of very weak Reasons, which seem as void of Solidity as those of the French Lawyer, refuted by our Author. I say the same of the Explication given by the same COCCEIUS, in his Dissertation, De Jure paenitendi in Contractibus, of what the Roman Law understands by Συνάλλαγμα, Sect. II. § 6. On Occasion of which he accuses our Author, § 7. Of not knowing what he says on that Subject.
- [4] See PUFENDORF, B. III. Chap. V. § 9. &c. with the Notes.
- [5] The Passage shall be quoted in Chap. XVI. of this Book, Note 2.
- [6] That is if the Person, to whom the Promise was made, has entered on the Performance of what he engaged to do in View of our Promise.
- [7] The Laws are not, properly speaking, Covenants, though they are the Result of human Establishment, grounded on Covenants. See PUFENDORF, B. I. Chap. VI. §2.
- [8] This footnote and the next are reversed by mistake in the original text. Rhet. Lib. I. Cap. XV. p. 545. Tom. II. Edit. Paris. That Philosopher else where defines Law, An Agreement made according to the common Consent of the People. Rhet. ad Alex. Cap. I.
- [9] Orat. I. Adversus Aristogiton, p. 492. Edit. Basil. The Passage is quoted at Length in the Digest. Lib. I. Tit. III. De Legibus, &c. Leg II.
- [10] Insomuch that the Hebrews maintain that Silence, in an Affair that will not admit of a Delay, has the Force of a direct Engagement. BABA KAMA, Cap. X. § 4. GROTIUS. See on that Question the Commentary of CONSTANTINE the Emperor.
- [11] Institut. Lib. II. Tit. I. De divisione rerum, &c. § 40. These Words do not signify, as it may seem on first Sight, that a bare Declaration of a Will of alienating one's Goods, is sufficient for transferring the Property of them on the Person in whose Favour that Will has been sufficiently intimated. For, according to the Roman Lawyers, who on this Occasion pay but little Regard to the true Principles of the Law of Nature, the Translation of Property can be effected only by the actual Delivery of the Thing alienated. All that is here meant, is, when a Man delivers a Thing with a Design of transferring the Property of it, (not of lending or depositing it) this, according to the Law of Nature, which JUSTINIAN re-establishes in its whole Force, is sufficient for transferring a full Right of Property; whereas before his Time, none but what were called Res Mancipi, could be thus alienated. See Chap. VIII. of this Book, § 25. Note 2.
- [12] Digest. Lib. II. Tit. XIII. De Pactis, Leg. I.
- [13] This our Author calls Pecunia constituta, in the Language of the Roman Lawyers, who likewise expressed it by one single Word Constitutum, as appears from the Law itself, from whence this Maxim is taken. Digest. Lib. XIII. Tit. V. De Pecuniâ constitutâ, Leg. I.
- [14] Digest. Lib. L. Tit. XVII. De diversis regulis Juris, Leg. LXXXIV. § 1.
- [15] Condictio indebiti. See Digest. Lib. XII. Tit. VI.

[16] Thus, for Example, a Creditor could not demand the Interest of his Money, if the Debtor had obliged himself to pay Interest by a simple Agreement only, and without a Stipulation in Form. See § 4. of this Chapter, Note 5. But if the Debtor had paid the Interest thus promised, he had no Action at Law for recovering it, as not due, provided he gave the Money on the Foot of Interest; for otherwise, the Sum received by the Creditor was reckoned into the Principal. Digest. Lib. XLVI. Tit. III. De solutionibus & liberationibus. Leg. V. § 2.

[17] De Offic. Lib. I. Cap. VII.

[18] Lib. I. Od. XXIV. ver. 6, 7.

[19] De habitud. Doctrin. Platonic, Lib. II. p. 15. Edit. Elmenhorst.

[20] PLATO, De Republic. Lib. I. p. 331. Tom. II. Edit Steph.

[1] On this Distinction see PUFENDORF, B. III. Chap. V. § 5, &c. The late Mr. HERTIUS observes, that our Author borrowed it of DOMINIC DE SOTO, Lib. VII. De Justitiâ & Jure, Quaest. II. Art. I.

[2] That is, when we have not laid ourselves under a Necessity of not changing our Mind, and there is nothing without us, that imposes that Necessity on us. See PUFENDORF, B. I. Chap. VI. § 6.

[1] Pollicitatio. An imperfect Promise, according to Mr. BARBEYRAC'S Version; who adds, that he could not express it otherwise. It is, continues he, a Term borrowed from the Roman Law, by which is understood A Promise, or free Offer, made to a City, State, Community, or in short, to any Body of Men, on a just Account; as, for Example, in View of some Employment, either to be conferred, or actually conferred on him, or for repairing the Damage done by Fire, Earthquakes, or the Fall of Houses, Digest. Lib. L. Tit. XII. De Pollicitationibus, Leg. III. Leg. I. § 1. Leg. IV. See Mr. NOODT'S De Foenera & Usuris, Lib. III. Cap. VII, concerning the Difference between a Donation and this Kind of Promise; which is not altogether the same with the imperfect Promise mentioned by our Author. For in this the Promiser doth not intend to give any Right, properly so called, to the Person in whose Favour he lays himself under a Necessity of performing what he promises. But in the Pollicitatio, the Promiser has a real Intention of giving a full Right to the Body, to which the Promise is made. The whole Difference between the Pollicitatio, and what our Author in the next Paragraph calls a perfect Promise, is that by Vertue of the Decision of the Civil Laws, the former is in full Force, and irrevocable, the Moment it is made, whereas the latter may be revoked, before the Acceptance, whatever Intention the Promiser might have had of giving a full Right to demand the Performance of his Promise.

[2] That is, not a perfect strict Right, by Vertue of which a Man may be forced to do what he is obliged to; as appears from what our Author says in the Close of this Paragraph. The Maxim here laid down can be admitted in no other Sense; for as for the Rest, all Obligations to another, answer to some Right, either perfect or imperfect; and this is sufficiently shewn by the Example of Gratitude. See PUFENDORF, B. III. Chap. V. § 1. and what I have said on that Place, in a Note of the second Edition.

[1] So BALDUS, Lib. I. D. De pactis. GROTIUS.

[2] See PUFENDORF, B. II. Chap. III. § 5.

[3] Men do, as it were, enter into a Covenant with the Gods, by making their Vows to them.
Schol. Horat. GROTIUS.

It is the Scholiast CRUQUIUS who says this, in his Explanation of the Poet's Idea, who uses the Words Votis pacisci, Lib. III. Od. XXIX. ver. 59.

[4] From hence they are called the Bonds of our Credit. Donat. ad Eunuch. GROTIUS.

[5] These are the Words of Apollo to his Son Phaeton, when, after he had sworn by the River Styx to grant whatever he should ask, that head strong young Man For what the Lawyers say of desired the driving the Chariot of the Sun for one Day,

— — Temeraria, dixit,
Vox mea facta tuâ est.

Metamorph. Lib. II. ver. 50, 51.

Which signifies, The rash Request you have made shews that I promised too hastily. Here is nothing that comes near the Sense which our Author had in his Mind. But either his Memory failed him, or he was misled by some faulty Edition, and read,

— — Temerarie, dixit:
Vox mea facta tua est — —

[6] It is very judiciously observed by PAULUS, Sent. Lib. XI. Tit. XIV. If there be only a bare Promise to pay Interest, it signifies nothing, for among the Roman Citizens, a bare Promise bears no Action. GROTIUS.

A German Lawyer, in an Abridgment of our Author, has maintained, that the Reason why the Roman Lawyers say, a bare Promise doth not bear an Action at Law, is because there was no such Thing as a bare Promise; all Promises having a Relation to some Contract, or to some Agreement authorized by the Laws. KULPIS, Colleg. Grotian. Exercit. VI. Cap. II. § 1. in Not. OBRECHT, in his Notes, approves of this Thought; but it has been confuted by a Lawyer of the same Nation. See the Paraemiae Juris Germanici, by the late Mr. HERTIUS, Lib. I. Cap. VIII. § 2, 3. To which add what Mr. BYNCKERSHOEK says in his Dissertation, De Pactis Juris stricti contractibus in continenti adjectis, Cap. I.

[7] See Mr. NOODT's Treatise De Pactis & Transactionibus, Cap. X. In Order to enter better into our Author's Notions, it will be proper here to set down what we find delivered at large in one of his Letters, written for the Instruction of his Brother some Years before the Publication of the Work before us. "The Romans, says he, did not design to give all Promises made vivâ voce, such a Force of obliging, as that the Person to whom a Promise is made in that Manner, should always have a Right to demand the Performance of it; which is a natural Consequence of all Obligations merely natural. It is asked, whether Legislators really had such a Power, since JUSTINIAN himself acknowledges that the Principles of the Law of Nature are immutable? The Difficulty appears the more considerable, as the Maxims of the Law of Nature in Respect to Agreements and Promises are not reduced to a bare Permission; but imply a positive Order and a real Obligation. Now it may happen two Ways, that a human Legislator may permit a Thing seemingly contrary to the Law of Nature: Either by not acting at all; or by giving a Right to act. The Legislator doth not act at all, when he doth not punish, for Example, Lies, Fornication, and such other Crimes, contrary to the Law of Nature and the Law of GOD. He gives a Right to act, when, for Example, he authorises a Man to keep a Thing honestly acquired by Prescription. The Question is, which of the two takes Place in Promises, and Agreements made without a Stipulation in Form: Whether the Civil Law only hinders a Man from suing for what is due by Vertue of such Engagements, or whether it moreover gives a real Right to break through them? There are Difficulties on both Sides; but the latter may very well be maintained; because supposing the Civil Laws really authorize a Person to break his Word in the Case under Consideration, they yet do nothing contrary to the Law of Nature. For the Law of Nature doth not require purely and simply, that a Man should be obliged to stand to the Performance of all he has promised; but only on a Supposition that he has promised what he had a Power to promise; in the same Manner, as all Alienations are not valid by the Law of Nature, but only those whereby we alienate what we have a Power to alienate. In Reality, to be truly a Debtor, it is necessary that the Person had a Permission to contract the Debt: In Order to enter into an Obligation, the Person must be at Liberty to engage himself: To make an Alienation valid, a Man must have the full and whole Property of the Goods so disposed of. Now the Civil Laws, without clashing with the Law of Nature, and even in a Manner approved of and advised by that Law, may lay a Restraint on each Man's natural Power of entering into an Obligation, either to the Advantage of the Promiser, or for the publick Good. Thus a Vow made by a Daughter, without her Father's Consent, is by GOD himself declared null and void. Numb. xxx. 5. And natural Equity requires that some Sort of Restraint should be laid on the Force of a Consent given by Persons of weak Judgment and easily surprised; as is declared in the Roman Law, in Relation to the Guardianship of Minors. Digest. Lib. IV. Tit. IV. De Minoribus, &c. Leg. I. When therefore the Civil Laws declare a Promise or Agreement null, they order nothing contrary to the Law of Nature. For they do not dispense with a Person's performing what he had a Power to promise; they only take away that Power, and consequently prevent there being any Obligation even according to the Law of Nature; for a Person lies under no Obligation, when he has promised what he could not promise: So that the Law of Nature is not changed in such Cases; all the Change is in the Matter or in the Subject.—Though Persons at Age have commonly more Judgment than Minors; some People are very forward in promising. So that the Civil Laws cannot do better than prescribe certain Forms for obligatory Promises, to hinder too hasty Engagements, and in some Measure caution Men to think well of what they do. We see they proceed in the same Manner in Relation to Wills, in Order to prevent Surprizes, to which some Persons are exposed from the Practice of the crafty and artful, &c." Part II. Epist. XII.

Thus our Author. I grant that the Civil Laws may take away the Right of suing for the Performance of a Promise, which is valid by the Law of Nature, and thus annul the Obligation, as much as in them lies. But, in my Opinion, this doth not hinder such a Promise from being valid in itself, when the Promiser, being well assured it would not stand good in Law, did not decline making it; for he thereby renounced the Benefit of the Law. The Case is not the same in Regard to Wills. The lawful Heir has made no Renunciation; and besides, the Design of the Law, in requiring certain Formalities as essential for rendring a Will valid, is at least as much to restrain the Liberty of disposing of one's Goods by Will, as to prevent Frauds and Surprizes. The former is necessary for the Publick Good; so that it may be said, a Testator is really deprived of a Power to make his Will in any Manner but that prescribed by the Laws; and consequently that the lawful Heir has a full Right to set aside a Will defective in that Point. But I see no Reason, in which the Advantage of the Publick is concerned, that, in Matter of Promises, where there is no Defect according to the Law of Nature, can require the Laws should deprive the Promiser of a Power of making, and standing to them, whether he doth or doth not design to renounce the Benefit they afford him. Compare this with what I have said in my Discourse, On the Benefit of the Laws, p. 21. &c. Edit. Amst.

[8] That is, not ratified as the Law directs in such Cases. So in his nineteenth Epistle he makes this Distinction, Jam non promittunt de te sed spondent. They now do not promise but engage for you. A Stipulation and an Engagement is called by PAULUS, A Solemnity of Words, Lib. V. Sent. and by CAJUS Tit. De Obligationibus quae ex consensu fiunt.

GROTIUS.

I doubt whether SENECA speaks of any but the Roman Laws in the Passage here quoted. It is to be observed that for a long Time, every Promise made with Stipulation, though in Jest, was valid in Law, and produced its full Effect in the same Manner, as if it had been made seriously. See Mr. NOODT, Jul. Paul. Cap. XI. Hence it appears that our Author is not entirely in the Right, when he says that the Roman Laws considered the Formalities of Stipulations, as a certain Mark of a real Consent, given with Deliberation. For on that Foot, the Moment there were any clear Proofs of a serious Design of engaging one's self by a bare Agreement, the Presumption ceasing, the Engagement would have been valid in Law.

[9] That Philosopher says, It is safer to trust a Horse with his Bridle on his Neck than loose Words. DIOGEN. LAERT. Lib. V. § 39. But our Author here had his Eye on STOBÆUS, Serm. XXIV. Where there is an Extract taken probably from THEOPHRASTUS, Treatise of Laws; as appears from the Title, under which STOBÆUS has placed that Extract.

[1] See PUFENDORF, B. III. Chap. VI. § 3. &c.

[2] Tho' a Person is not endowed with all possible Prudence, and Judgment; if he has Understanding enough to know what he does, and to determine with Deliberation; the Promises and Agreements made by him are valid, according to the Law of Nature, when there is no Error on the Promiser's Side, or no Fraud on the Side of the Person, to whom the Promise is made.

[3] See SELDEN, De Successionibus in Bona defunctorum, Cap. IX.

[4] See PUFENDORF, B. III. Chap. VI. § 4. Note 3.

[5] Judges are undoubtedly obliged to make this the Rule of their Sentences. But it does not follow that all Obligations contracted by a Minor, are void, so that, according to the Law of Nature and in Conscience, he is always excused standing to his Promise. See Note 5. on PUFENDORF, as last quoted.

[6] See Chap. XIV. of this Book, § 2. Num. 3, 4.

[1] See PUFENDORF, B. III. Chap. VI. § 6, &c.

[2] See an Instance in L. Mancipia, C. de Servis fugitivis, in GAILIUS, Lib. I. Obs. XI. Num. 7. and in MOLINÆUS, Ad Consuet. Paris. Tit. I. Sect. XIII. Gl. III. GROTIUS.

[3] See Chap. XVI. of this Book, § 8.

[4] SENECA, De Benefic. IV. Cap. XXXVI. He is a Madman that stands to a Mistake. GROTIUS.

[5] De Oratore, Lib. I. Cap. XXXVI. See PUFENDORF, B. III. Chap. VI. § 6. Note 5. in the second Edition.

[6] We must distinguish here between Promises of pure Generosity, and Agreements, where a Promise is made with a View to something promised by the other Party in his Turn. In the former, as they are a pure Effect of Liberality, the Promiser is responsible only for his Sincerity. As nothing but his own good Will engages him to promise; so nothing obliges him to examine all Things with the utmost Exactness. Acts of Kindness would certainly be too burthensome, were Men obliged to pay, as it were a Fine, whenever designing to do another a Favour, and thinking himself able to do it, he is disappointed of his Hopes. If therefore the Person, to whom the Promise was made, has depended on it, as on a Thing, which could not fail; it is his Fault and not ours; as well as when a Man has not expressed himself with sufficient Clearness. For it was his Business to call for an Explanation of what lay open to some Ambiguity; when this is not done, it is presumed that we thought ourselves sufficiently understood. But in Regard to Agreements, where both Parties have an Interest, a Man may be answerable for his Negligence in not examining the Thing in which a Mistake lies, and not expressing himself in a sufficient Manner. This is to be judged of according to the Circumstances, whereby it is the Business sometimes of one of the Parties, and sometimes of the other to speak with the utmost Exactness, or examine every Thing.

[7] Concerning the Effect of Fraud in Promises, and Agreements, see the Text and the Notes on PUFENDORF, B. III. Chap. VI. § 8. To which add the notes on the Abridgment of The Duties of a Man and a Citizen, B. I. Chap. IX. § 13. Second Edition.

[1] See PUFENDORF, B. III. Chap. VI. § 9. &c.

[2] The Civil Laws, precisely speaking, never hinder a Man from obliging himself validly in Conscience, and according to the Law of Nature, when he had a serious Intention of so doing, and there are none of these Defects which naturally make the Obligation void. The vacating of the Contract, and the Restitution, which they grant, is but a Favour, which may be renounced; and a Man is supposed to renounce, whenever, being unacquainted with the Law, he made a serious Bargain concerning the Things for which that Favour is granted. So that, supposing Promises and Agreements made under the influence of Force really obligatory by the Law of Nature; the Civil Law, which declares such Engagements null and void, and relieve those who have contracted them, do not remove the Obligation in Conscience of standing to them.

[3] Ethic. Nicomach, Lib. III. Cap. I. p. 28. Tom. II. Edit. Paris.

[4] But, if the Promiser has really given his Consent, what signifies enquiring, whether the Fear be just or unjust? No Wrong is done to the Person who consents. Besides, this useless Circuit of our Author shews how far his Ideas are from being just. See what is said on PUFENDORF, as quoted in Note 1.

[5] In this Book, Chap. XVIII. Sect. XVIII. XIX. and B. III. Chap. XIX. Sect. II. GROTIUS.

[6] SENECA following Nature, Controv. Lib. IV. Contr. XXVI. delivers himself thus, What is transacted through Compulsion and Necessity may be repealed, if this Compulsion and Necessity was occasioned by the Party concerned in the Bargain: For it is nothing to me, says he, how you are imposed upon, if I don't impose upon you. It must be my Fault, if I am to suffer for it. Compare with this what you have lower, B. III. Chap. XIX. Sect. IV. GROTIUS.

Had our Author copied two or three Lines more out of SENECA's Declamations, he would have found the Answer, which follows immediately, and which may be seen in PUFENDORF, as last quoted, § 11. where he likewise considers how far Fear caused by a third Person, renders an Agreement null, by the Maxims of the Law of Nature alone. What is to be said on that Question in my Opinion amounts to this: If it is with Design of doing the Person forced a Service, that we treat with him on a Thing, which he would not agree to without Violence, the Obligation is entirely valid, without Dispute. But if we had our own Interest in View, and not the Advantage of the other contracting Party, we must distinguish. Either the Fear which engages him to treat, is known to us, or not. If not, the Agreement is entirely valid; for we are not obliged to guess. But if we very well see that Fear is the direct and only Motive, which engages the other to treat with us; we then ought not to depend on such an Engagement; the Principle of it ought, at least, to have the same Effect, as the Mistake; and we may here apply what the Roman Lawyers say, tho' in a different Sense: Metushabet in se Ignorantiam. Fear implies Ignorance. If we designed that the Exception of Fear should not take Place, we ought to make the Person, with whom we treat, expressly renounce it, because we are well assured he promised against his Will. In that Case it is an Act of Generosity to provide the Person forced with Means for relieving himself by an involuntary Engagement.

But it would be hard and unjust to take Advantage of such an Engagement. We ought, at least, to leave the Person forced the Liberty of ratifying or not ratifying his Promise, when the Fear ceases.

[7] What our Author would have his Readers remember and apply in this Place, is what he has said in the foregoing Paragraph, Num. 2. So that his Opinion is, that in order lawfully to require the Person to whom we have made a Promise, should release us from the Promise, which was valid, tho' forced; or to excuse our selves from standing to such a Promise, as being really null, by Vertue of the Civil Laws, which deprive it of the Force it would otherwise have had; the Fear must be real, and not a bare Panic Fear. So that though a Person, by the Influence of Fear, is determined to enter into an Engagement, which he would not have contracted without it; if however, he had no Reason to fear, either on the Part of him with whom he treats, or of a third Person, so much the worse for him. The Fact, supposed by the Law, has no Place here, and consequently the Favour of the Law ceases. This I take to be our Author's Meaning, though he has not sufficiently explained himself. As to the Thing itself, in my Opinion, the Whole depends on knowing whether the other contracting Party knew that the Person thus determined to treat against his Will was influenced by a Panic Fear, or not. For if he knew it, he ought not to take Advantage of it; and in that Case, the Consent requisite in Agreements, is not thereby less destitute of the Liberty requisite, so far as he is concerned.

[1] See PUFENDORF, B. III. Chap. VII.

[2] This is related by PLUTARCH, Apophthegm Laconic. p. 208. Tom. II. Edit. Wech.

[3] Consult PUFENDORF, B. III. Chap. VIII. § 4.

[4] It is certain that, commonly speaking, such Promises are suspected of betraying such Sentiments as are contrary to what married Persons ought to entertain one for another, and therefore may easily imply something dishonest? But still we may conceive Cases, where they may be made without any Violation of Conjugal Fidelity. Mr. THOMASIUS produces two, in his Remarks on HUBER, De Jure Civitatis, Lib. II. Sect. VI. Chap. III. § 13. Let us suppose, says he, that in the Time of a Plague, two married Friends agree, with the Consent of their Wives, that if one of the Husbands and one of the Wives die, the two Survivors shall marry. Again, let us suppose a virtuous Woman married to a debauched Husband, who takes no Care of her and her Children, but squanders away his Money: A prudent Friend to whom she has communicated her Grievs, promises to serve her with his Advice, and all in his Power; and farther, engages to marry her in case her Husband dies. There is nothing in all this but what is very innocent.

[1] Concerning the whole Affair of unlawful Promises and Agreements, see what I have said in a long Note in the second Edition of PUFENDORF, B. III. Chap. VII. § 6. Note 2. To which may be added two small Pieces, in which while I was applying my Principles to a considerable Example, I have taken Occasion to clear up this Question still more; a Question, in its self difficult, and which, in my Opinion had not been well handled. These Pieces may be seen in the Journal des Scavans: One in the Month of August, 1712. Edit. Paris. (October, Edit. Amst.) the other in the Month of December, 1713. (February and March, Edit. Amst.) Mr. GUNDLING, Professor at Hall in Saxony, has expressed his Dislike of my Notions, in his little Treatise of the Law of Nature, published under the Title of Via ad Veritatem. But as he has not undertaken to confute my Reasons, either on that Subject; or on some others, where he rejects my Opinion; I am not as yet obliged so much as to doubt of their Solidity.

[2] See Chap. V. of this Book, § 14. Num. 5. and § 16.

[3] That is, when a Person, who has a full Right to dispose of his Goods, is injudiciously liberal, and gives without Reason, Choice or Rule. The Author explains himself in his Treatise, De Imperio Summarum Potestatum circa Sacra, Cap. V. § 11. A private Man, says he, who has the full Disposal of his own Goods, has with a rash Liberality given his Estate to others. This is a vicious Action; but the Alienation is valid. ZIEGLER and TESMAR, two Commentators, have ventured to advance, one by Way of Doubt, and the other in the Form of an Assertion, that there is no moral Evil in such a Donation. It is diverting to see them instancing in pious Donations, and what the young Man in the Gospel ought to have done, whom our Lord commanded to sell all he had, and give the Money to the Poor. It might easily be made appear that pious Donations, with how good an Intention so ever made, may be and often have been faulty in several Respects.

[4] By the Law of Nature, I mean, which was the Rule that Men then lived by. C. Aquilius was of another Opinion from the Civil Law, as is testified by VALERIUS MAXIMUS, Lib. VIII. Cap. XI. Num. 2. GROTIUS.

The Fact mentioned by VALERIUS MAXIMUS was this. A Roman, named C. Visellius Varro, being dangerously ill, gave his Mistress a Bond for a considerable Sum; that after his Death she might oblige his Heirs to pay her that Money, which he would not give her openly by Way of Legacy. He recovered, and the interested Mistress undertook to sue him for that Sum promised in the Bond. Aquilius being Judge in this Cause, with the Concurrence of some of the most considerable Men of the City, who were his Assistants, dismissed her Plea. Whereupon the Historian observes, that could Aquilius have given Sentence against both the Parties, he would certainly have done it, and punished the Lover for his criminal Conversation with the Courtezan. But he contented himself with pronouncing on the Civil Part of the Cause, and rejecting an unreasonable Demand, and left the Punishment of the Defendant to the Criminal Judges. It is said before that as the Demand was shameful, so the Obligation was void. As to the Example of Thamar, see PUFENDORF, ubi supra, §8.

[5] Cap. XII. Sect. IX. X. XI. GROTIUS.

[1] See the Chapter in PUFENDORF, which I have quoted several Times, § 9.

[1] Here also consult PUFENDORF, B. III. Chap. VI. § 16.

[1] This Subject is treated by PUFENDORF, B. III. Chap. IX.

[2] See Chap. VI. of this Book, § 2. Note 1.

[3] SERVIUS, upon that Passage of the ninth Aeneid, — — Hospitio cum jungeret Absens.

And absent joined in hospital Ties.

DRYD.

says, this was done by People sent by each Party for that Purpose. GROTIUS.

[4] See an Instance of this in MARIANA, XXVII. 18. another in GUICCIARDIN, Tom. I. GROTIUS.

[1] The former is called in the Original Actio exercitoria: The latter Actio institoria. See Digest. Lib. XIV. Tit. I. and III.

[2] That is, that when one has lent Money, for Example, to the Master, or Factors; the Action which the Creditor has on that Account is not so much a particular Sort of Action, as an Action for Money lent to a Person borrowing in another Man's Name. And hence it is that a Man had also a personal Action directly, on the Account of a Loan, against the Master of the Vessel, or the trading Master. Institut. Lib. IV. Tit. VI. Quod cum eo contractum, &c. § 8. See HUBERT GIPHANIUS, and THEODORE MARCILLY on this Paragraph.

[3] Digest. Lib. XIV. Tit. I. De exercitoriâ Actione, Leg. I. § 25. and Leg. II.

[4] If we consider the Partners one with Regard to the other, natural Equity certainly requires that each should be responsible for his own Part only. But he who is supposed to have contracted with them by Means of the Master, is naturally supposed to have contracted, not with this or that Partner in particular, but with all the Partners in general, or with the Company. So that he may sue which of them he pleases, because they are all obliged in solido one for the other. The Master, with whom the Contract is made, represents all the Partners in general: He is not more Agent for one than for another, and it is on that Foot that the Contract is made with him.

[5] But, as the Commentators observe, it will be said on the other Hand, that few People would contract with the Master, if they knew they could come on the Partners only for each Man's Part; for, beside the Danger of some of them proving insolvent, it would be very troublesome to have as many Law-Suits as there are Persons, who sometimes live in different Places. So that this Inconveniency counterbalances the other. And where would be the Advantage of not discouraging such as send Ships to Sea, if those, with whom the Master may have to do, in the Navigation and Trade, with which he is charged, are discouraged from contracting with him? The Truth is, that the Civil Laws may in this Case make such Regulations as are judged proper; and that Men are supposed to engage on the Foot of such Regulations.

[1] See PUFENDORF, B. III. Chap. VI. § 15. According to the Roman Law, He who writes to an absent Slave, that he may have his Liberty, doth not intend immediately to quit the Possession of his Slave; but rather to fix his Will in that regard to the Time that the Slave receives his Letter. Digest. Lib. XLI. Tit. II. De acquirenda vel amittenda Possessione, Leg. XXXVIII.

[2] TERTULLIAN, speaking like a Man who was perfectly acquainted with the Laws, says, in his Book De Jejuniiis, A Vow, when GOD has accepted it, is for the future as obliging as a Law. GROTIUS.

Our Author, who frequently quotes DONATUS, as well as other Latin Grammarians, might have told his Readers what that Commentator on TERENCE says on Occasion of a promised Portion: Ch. Her Portion, Pamphilius, is ten Talents. Pam. I accept of it. Had he not said, I accept of it, it would not have been a Portion; for a Donation is confirmed by the Acceptance. What is not accepted of doth not seem given. On the Andria, Act V. Scen. IV. Ver. 48. CICERO observes that neither the Delivery nor Donation can be conceived without Acceptance. Topic. Cap. VIII.

[3] See Chap. VI. of this Book, § 2.

[4] That if a Promise is freely made, the Thing may be claimed as a Debt. Digest. Lib. L. Tit. XII. De Pollicitat. Leg. III. See what has been said, Note 1. on § 3. PUFENDORF, in the Place by me quoted, gives a different Answer to the Objection taken from this Law. But the Matter is of small Importance, because we are speaking of the Civil Law, which may give certain Acts a Force that they would not have had by the Law of Nature; as it may take from others that which they might have naturally.

[5] See such another Law of the Wisigoths, Lib. V. Tit. II. Cap. VI. GROTIUS.

[1] This is likewise PUFENDORF's Opinion, B. III. Chap. VI. § 15. In which our two Authors follow the Decision of a celebrated Scholastic, LESSIUS, De Justitiâ & Jure, Lib. II. Cap. XVIII. Dub. VI. whose Words Mr. VANDER MUELEN here quotes, and at the same Time approves of the Thought. I am of Opinion, however, that the Question ought to be decided in a quite contrary Manner. As Men are more easily induced to promise, when it is done for their own Interest, and in View of some other Thing they demand in their Turn; they are and commonly may be supposed to will the Effect of such a Promise, from which some Advantage will accrue to us or ours, more invariably than that of gratuitous Promises. The late Mr. HUBER, De Jure Civit. Lib. II. Sect. VI. Cap. III. § 9. maintains, but without offering any Reason for it, that, unless the Promiser has expressly declared he meant the Promise should not have its full Force, till he knew it was accepted; it is never necessary he should know it, and the Acceptance is sufficient, whether the Question turns on gratuitous Promises, or on Agreements, in which both Parties are interested. Mr. THOMASIIUS, on the contrary, in his Notes on that Author, p. 514. maintains that the Knowledge of the Acceptance is always necessary; because as the Promise remains suspended, till the Person, to whom it is made, becomes acquainted with it, the same ought to be said of the Acceptance. Suppose, says he, that the Person, to whom the Promise is made, is present, and that he accepts of the Thing either only within himself, or by whispering to a third Person; such a Promise will not be binding. But the Consequence doth not hold good from the Necessity of Acceptance to the Necessity of knowing that Acceptance. The Acceptance is absolutely necessary, for forming an Unity of the two Wills, from which the full and entire Obligation results. But the Moment the two Wills are thus united, tho' that which is determined has as yet no Knowledge of the Determination of the other; nothing essential to the Obligation is wanting, unless there be an express or tacit Condition, which makes the entire Accomplishment of it depend on the Knowledge of the Acceptance. If the Effect of the Promise in this Case remains suspended till the Acceptance, it is by a necessary Consequence of the Person's Absence, and not because the Promiser designed to reserve to himself a sufficient Time for retracting. He may indeed retract, because something may happen, that obliges him to change his Mind. But, in Order to prove that the Knowledge of the Acceptance is always necessary for laying him under a Necessity of persisting in his Will, we must always have Reason to believe that, if the Person to whom the Promise is made had been present, he would not have promised so as to engage himself on the Spot, supposing the Thing had been also accepted immediately; whereas, the Presumption will rather be on the other Side, at least in such Agreements, where both Parties have an Interest. If it was always necessary that a formal Acceptance of a Promise should be known, it would follow, contrary to what Mr. THOMASIIUS himself acknowledges (Jurisp. divin. Lib. II. Cap. VII. § 14.) after our Author, that even when the Promise was made pursuant to the Request of him to whom it is made, it would be invalid, except the Petitioner was apprized of the good Will of the Promiser. The anticipated Acceptance of the Petitioner has, in my Opinion, no more Force than the Offers of the Person who of his own Accord promises absolutely, and on no other Condition than that of Acceptance. He, who made the Request, may as well change his Mind before he knows it is granted, as he who made the Offer, before he was acquainted with the Acceptance. As to the Instance, alledged by Mr. THOMASIIUS, I own it seems to me but little to the Purpose.

In the Circumstances there supposed, an Act of the Will, which either is not expressed by any exterior Sign, or manifested only by a Declaration unknown to the Promiser, can by no Means be considered as a real Acceptance. When a Man being present doth not clearly signify his Disposition of accepting the Proffer to the Person who makes it, he seems to despise it; at least he is to be supposed unwilling to come to a Resolution of accepting it; whatever Declaration he may make of his Intentions to any but the Promiser. Generally speaking, all those who knowing of a Promise, and having it in their Power to notify their Acceptance to the Promiser, do not do it, thereby leave him full Liberty of retracting. But the Case is different in Regard to the Absent, especially if the Distance of Place is considerable. The Absence itself makes it impossible for them to accept of the Promise as soon as it is made. From all which I conclude, that if we judge of the Matter by the Law of Nature alone, and independently of particular Proofs of a contrary Intention in the Promiser, every absolute Promise is complete on his Part, the Moment he is seriously determined to make it, and notify it in any Manner to the Person, in whose Favour it is made; so that, unless he revokes it in Time, that is, not only before it is accepted, but even before the Person to whom it is made is apprized of the Revocation; the Acceptance makes the Promise irrevocable; provided the Person to whom it was made, accepted it immediately, and without Delay; for if he has taken Time to deliberate, he has thereby given the Promiser Time to retract.

[1] In Reality, a Man may promise irrevocably, even before the Acceptance. But in Order to this he must clearly declare that from that Moment he confers a full Right on the Person in whose Favour he obliges himself, and reserves to himself no Liberty of retracting; provided always that, if he doth not accept of the Promise, when duly notified to him, the Promiser re-enters on his whole Right. Confer this Paragraph and those which follow with what PUFENDORF says, B. III. Chap. IX. § 3. &c.

[2] And therefore, to avoid all Dispute, it was usually said, To him and his Heirs. SERVIUS upon the ninth Aeneid, ver. 302. See too the Wisigothic Law, Lib. V. Tit. II. Cap. VI. GROTIUS.

[3] Digest. Lib. L. Tit. XVII. De diversis Regulis Juris, Leg. CXCI. on which see JAMES GODEFROY'S Comment.

[1] It must here be supposed that the Person, to whom the Promise was made, was himself acquainted with the Revocation, by some other Means, before he accepted of it. Otherwise, if the Revocation comes too late, the Promiser will suffer.

[2] Provided, however, that the Revocation of the Commission was not sufficiently known some other Way by him to whom the Agent has since promised in the Name of the Person who entrusted him with it.

[3] See the Book De Tenuris Angliae, Cap. VII. GROTIUS.

[4] For, though a Testator may revoke the Legacy, yet till he has actually so done, all is done that was necessary on his Side; and if he dies, nothing more is requisite for giving a Right to the Legatee, who accepts of it.

[5] It must here be supposed that the Person commissioned to make the Donation, was acquainted with the Donor's Death; for if he knows nothing of it, and the Donee accepts of it, though the Donor was not alive at the Time of Acceptance, it is entirely the same as if he was not yet dead. He had invested his Agent with full Power, and thus divested himself, as much as in him lay, of all Right to the Thing to be given, unless he recalled the Commission in Time, before it was executed. Had he intended the Donation should be valid only in Case it was accepted before his Death, it was his Business to insert that Clause in the Commission. Unless that be done, the Donee, who could neither accept sooner, nor guess the Donor would die, ought to be considered as if, the Donation being made to him by the Donor in Person, he had accepted of it; and that the rather, because commonly there is very good Reason to believe the Donor would not have failed giving, even though he thought he should die.

- [6] On this Foundation it is decided by a Law quoted by our Author in his Margin, that if a Father having permitted his Son to set one of his Slaves free, dies intestate, and the Son not knowing of his Father's Death, hath since made Use of the Power he gave him, the Act stands good in Favour of the said Slave, because it doth not appear his Master changed his Mind. Digest. Lib. XL. Tit. II. De manumiss. vindic. Leg. IV. This Regulation was made in Favour of Liberty; as many others, in which for the same Reason the Rigour of the Law was relaxed. See CUJAS on the said Law, Recit. in Salv. Julian, Tom. VI. Opp. p. 317.
- [7] It happens that the same Question is answered differently by different Persons. As when it was asked whether an Action upon the Order lies against the Heir. M. Drusus, the City Pretor, gave it in the Affirmative. And S. Julius in the Negative. Lib. II. Cap. XIII. Where the Enquiry turned on a Commission executed after the Decease of the Person who gave it. See what I have said on PUFENDORF, B. III. Chap. IX. § 4. Note 3.
- [1] Consult the Chapter of PUFENDORF last quoted, § 5.
- [2] See Institut. Lib. III. Tit. XX. De inutil. stipul. § 19.
- [3] Our Author, without doubt, supposes the Order shewn to the Person who promises. So that this was an unnecessary Addition made by the late Mr. HUBER (De Jure Civit. Lib. II. Sect. VI. Cap. III. Num. 18.) as if our Author never thought of it.
- [4] No Man can stipulate for another, except a Slave for his Master, and a Son for his Father. Digest. Lib. XLV. Tit. I. De verborum obligationibus, Leg. XXXVIII. § 17. Whatever Stipulation is made by a Person under another's Power, is accounted the Act of the latter, as truly as if made by himself. Ibid. Leg. XLV. But a Father, on the other Hand, could not stipulate for his Son, nor a Master for his Slave. See Mr. NOODT's excellent Treatise, De Pactis & Transactionibus, Cap. XXIV.
- [5] The Author here puts a Case, somewhat difficult to conceive, viz. Of an Acceptance, which however gives the Person accepting no Right. Such an Acceptance having no Effect in Relation to the Force of the Promise, and leaving the Promiser at full Liberty to revoke it without invading any Man's Right; it cannot, in my Opinion, be termed an Acceptance, unless in a very improper Sense. The pretended Acceptor is in Reality no more than a bare Witness of the good Dispositions which the other shews in Favour of the third Person. Our Author seems to consider him as a Sort of Security for the Continuance and Execution of those good Dispositions. But neither is this Notion more just. The Character and Use of a Security supposes an antecedent Obligation, which gives a third Person some true and perfect Right: But in the Case before us the Person to whom another designs to oblige himself to do what has been mentioned, has acquired no Right. From which I conclude, it is only one of those half Promises, spoken of by our Author, § 111. to which he gives the Name of Pollicitatio. The whole Difference is, that he there talks of a Declaration made to the very Person, in whose Favour another obliges himself to persist in the Will of doing such or such a Thing; whereas here the Declaration is made to a third Person, without the Orders or even the Privity of the Person interested in the Affair. And the former Declaration has this Advantage over the latter, that if the Promiser will afterwards confer a true Right on him in whose Favour he had declared his Will, and thus change the imperfect Promise into a perfect one; the Person last mentioned from that Moment acquires a full Right over the Thing promised: No other Acceptance is necessary than that already made by the Person concerned. Whereas, in the other Case, the third Person having had no Commission for accepting, and the Promise not regarding him; it can have no Effect till after the Acceptance of him in whose Favour another signified his Will of doing something.

[1] A perfect Donation admits of no Conditions after it is made. Code, Lib. VIII. Tit. LVI. De Donationibus quae sub modo, Leg. IV. OBRECHT observes on this Place that our Author's Maxim takes Place only in new Conditions added by the Will of one of the Parties contracting. But our Author had no Design of denying that; which he supposed as incontestable. For who can doubt whether, if the two Parties are agreed, some new Condition may not be added, even after Acceptation, burthensome either to both, or one only? It is then a Sort of new Bargain, or at least an Amendment of the former Engagement.

[1] See PUFENDORF, B. III. Chap. VI. § 14.

[2] All unjust Fear annuls a Promise, by the Law of Nature, as well as by the Civil Law. See what I have said on § 7.

[1] Quae causam expressam non habent. Tho' a Man doth not express his Motive for promising, it doth not follow that he had none. He may have several private Reasons, which he doth not think proper to declare. There is always Room for presuming either that the Promiser proposes some Advantage to himself, or that he promises with a View of doing the Person, in whose Favour he engages himself, a Pleasure, and thus having the Pleasure to oblige him. Even supposing he doth not well know why he promises, it is sufficient that he resolves to promise with an entire Freedom, and that there is no Crime in the Promise. The Will doth all in this Case, as well as in Alienations. A Man is not less Master of his own Actions, than of his own Goods; so that if he is willing to lay himself under a Necessity of doing something in Favour of another, that is sufficient for giving the other a full Right to demand the Effect of such an Engagement. This I take to be our Author's Meaning. But I do not see where lies the Difference, which he here supposes, between the Rules of the Civil Law, and the Maxims of the Law of Nature. For, in the Stipulations, it was not at all necessary that the Promiser should express the Reason why he promised. He was asked, Do you promise? He answered, I do promise. That was sufficient. On the contrary, an Agreement without Stipulation, was not therefore more valid, tho' he said, for Example, I will give you this or that, in Order that you do such or such a Thing for me.

[1] See PUFENDORF, B. III. Chap. VII. § 10

[2] Compare here what is below, B. III. Chap. XX. § 30. GROTIUS.

[1] By single Acts, (Actus simplices) our Author means such as tend to one single Advantage, either of the Person in whose Favour it is done, or of the Person acting; whereas compound Acts (Actus compositi) include several Views of different Advantages.

[1] ARISTOTLE comprehends all those under the Title δόσεως, Of Giving, these, πῶσεως, Of Selling. GROTIUS.

Our Author undoubtedly had his Eye on that Passage of the Treatise of Rhetoric, where the Philosopher defines Property to be the Power of alienating; and by Alienation he understands giving or selling, Lib. I Cap. V. p. 523. Tom. II. Ed. Paris. So that it is plain he is not there treating of all Contracts. Those by which we dispose of our own Actions are not included; nor even several of those by which we dispose of our Goods, without alienating them.

[2] The Person whom we have thus served, in a Manner merely gratuitous, is obliged to no more than a grateful Acknowledgment, from which no perfect and strict Right arises. What the Roman Lawyers call Management, or Administration of Affairs, belongs to the other Class of gratuitous Acts, that is, to such as are attended with a mutual Obligation. For he who transacts another Man's Affairs without his Privity, pretends only to give his Trouble for nothing; so that he lays an Obligation on the other to reimburse all the Expences he has been at in the faithful Management of his Affairs.

- [3] For the Promise is sometimes purely and simply gratuitous; as when a Man promises another to give him, or do something in his Favour, without his entering into any perfect and strict Obligation on his Side, on Account of the Present or Favour promised. Sometimes also the Promise, tho' gratuitous in the main, implies something which has or may have Consequences, in Regard to which the Liberality ceases: As when we promise a Man to execute a Commission for him; for in that Case, we usually oblige ourselves only to give our Labour for nothing, and expect a Reimbursement of the necessary Expences. See § 13.
- [1] Digest. Lib. XIX. Tit. V. De praescriptis verbis. Leg. V. where we have a fourth Class, Do, ut facias. I give you this, that you may do that; but it is the same at the Bottom with Facio, ut des. See Mr. NOODT's Treatise, De Pactis & Transactionibus, Cap. IX. p. 677. Col. 2. PUFENDORF, however, pretends to find some Difference between them, B. IV. Chap. II. § 9. They are both right, according to the different Manner of considering the Question. It is more to the present Purpose to observe, that, as the Lawyer PAULUS really designed the Do, ut facias, as a fourth Class, different in some Respects from the other three, the Sense given by our Author to this whole Division, is much more general than that in which the Antients understood it. For, as he himself immediately after insinuates, the Contract of Sale, for Example, and that of Letting, are not comprehended in it, tho' the former belongs to Do, ut des; the latter to Facio, ut des, taking the Terms in the full Extent of their natural Signification. Our Author himself (Num. 5. of this Paragraph) ranks the Contract of Letting, or Hiring, under the Class of Do, ut des; which is not conformable to the Notions of the Roman Lawyers; as appears from the very Law already quoted, which places it under Do, ut facias.
- [2] The Distinction of nominate and innominate Contracts doth not occur in so many Words in the Roman Law; but we there find that of Contractus certi, and incerti, certain and uncertain Contracts, which better expresses the Reason alledged by our Author for that Distinction. Digest. Lib. XII. Tit. I. De rebus creditis, &c. Leg. IX. See Mr. NOODT, De Pactis & Transactionibus, Cap. IX. and PUFENDORF, in the Chapter lately quoted, § 7.
- [3] See VASQUES, Lib. Controv. Cap. X. at the End. GROTIUS.
- [4] Digest. Lib. XIX. Tit. V. De praescriptionibus, Leg. II. III.
- [5] Among the Hebrews no Sale was looked upon to be compleat, unless there was either a real or imaginary Delivery of the Thing purchased. GROTIUS.
See SELDEN, De Jure Nat. & Gent. secundum Hebraeor. Disciplinam. Lib. VI. Cap. V.
- [6] Thus, for Example, when the Bargain was fixed and concluded, the Sale could not be broken without the Consent of both Parties, even tho' the Thing sold was not delivered, nor the Money paid down. Cod. Lib. IV. Tit. XLIV. Quando liceat ab emtione discedere. Leg. I. See also Tit. X. De obligat. & actionibus, Leg. V. & Dig. Lib. II. Tit. XIV. De pactis, Leg. LVIII. Lib. XVIII. Tit. I. De contrahendâ emtione, Leg. VI. § ult.
- [7] A Man might redemand what he had given for procuring a Slave his Freedom, if he retracted before the other Party had performed what he had engaged to do. Digest. Lib. XII. Tit. IV. De Conditione, causâ datâ, causâ non secutâ, Leg. III. § 2. See Law V. of the same Title; and on it ANTHONY FAURE, Rational, p. 249, &c. 264, &c. as also Mr. NOODT's Probabilia Juris, Lib. IV. Cap. V.

[8] The late Mr. COCCEIUS, in an academical Discourse, De Jure poenitendi in Contractibus, Sect. IV. maintains, that in this Case there is not only a bare Impunity in the Civil Courts, but that even the Law of Nature authorises the Liberty of retracting, as settled by the Roman Law, in Contracts without a Name. He undertakes to prove his Assertion by two Reasons. First, Because the Contract, according to him, is imperfect, on the Part of him who has given something, as he did not give it absolutely, but in Order that the Person to whom he gave it, should, in Return, do such or such a Thing in his Favour; so that, while the Person receiving has performed nothing, something is wanting for compleating the Contract. But this only proves, that if the Condition on which the Person gave it is not complied with either by the Fault of the Person receiving, or some unforeseen Accident, which has rendred the Execution impossible, he may then oblige the Receiver to restore what was not given so as to be irrevocable. Secondly, says Mr. COCCEIUS, The Receiver has by the very Act of Receiving, laid himself under some Obligation to him, who gave only on Condition that he should do such or such a Thing; so that the Contract is perfect on his Part, and thus the other has a Right to demand the Performance of it. Whereas the Giver obliged himself to nothing, unless the Receiver actually performs what he promised. But this is plainly begging the Question, and laying down a Principle contrary to the Equality which ought to be observed in Contracts like those under Consideration, where each of the Parties has his own Advantage in View, and consequently designs, at the same Time that he lays an Obligation on himself, to acquire a Right of demanding something in his Turn, which the other may not refuse at Pleasure. Thus, unless the Contract is made only for the Interest of the Giver, that something may be done for him; it is a visible Inequality, and such as is incompatible with the plain and equitable Rules of the Law of Nature, that he who has received a Thing, with Design to keep it, on Condition he performs what he has engaged, should not oblige him who gave it under that Condition, to leave it in his Hands, when he is ready to fulfil the Condition; and that the other, on the contrary, should be at Liberty, either to force him to stand to his Engagement, and even to demand Damages and Interest, if it be his own Fault that he cannot perform his Obligations; or to retract and recover what he gave, or the Value of it, even tho' the Receiver is both willing and able to do what he promised; as is ordered by the Roman Law, which Mr. COCCEIUS attempts to reconcile with the Law of Nature.

[9] This is plain from those Verses of HOMER, cited Lib. I. D. De contrahenda emptione. TACITUS talking of the Germans, says, The more inland People follow the good old Custom of bartering one Commodity for another. De Morib. German. Cap. V. Num. 6. SERVIUS, at the fourth Eclogue upon the Passage,

Mutabis Merces. Ver. 39.

— — For foreign Ware.

DRYD.

Assigns this Reason for the Expression; Because the Antients used to chop one Ware for another. And upon that of the third Georg. ver. 307. where he construes Vellera mutantur, the Fleeces are changed, Ingenti Pretio comparentur, are sold at a great Rate. For formerly every Commodity was purchased by Exchange: And this CAJUS has confirmed by an Example in HOMER. PLINY, B. XXXIII. Ch. I. How much happier was the Age, when one Thing was exchanged for another, as HOMER thought was the Practice in the Trojan Days. And in B. VI. Chap. XXII. speaking of the Seres, What Goods they have to dispose of, they lay down on the other Side the River, near what they have Occasion to purchase, to be taken away by these, if they are satisfied with the Exchange. MELA, of the same People, The Seres are between, a People of the strictest Honesty in Dealing, which they manage, tho' absent, by leaving their Commodities behind them. And AMMIANUS of them too, Lib. XXIII. When Strangers are come over the River to buy Thread, or any other Goods, the Prices of the Things offered to Sale, are concluded on by the Eye only, without any Talk at all about them. MELA, Lib. II. Cap. I. of the Tartars, They trade by giving one Ware for another. See BUSBEQUIUS, of the Inhabitants of Mengrelia, Epist. Exot. III. and OLAUS MAGNUS, of the Laplanners, Lib. IV. Cap. V. GROTIUS. See PUFENDORF, B. V. Chap. V. § 1.

[10] See PROCOPIUS upon this Subject, in his Secret History, Chap. XXV. In Italy they brought Species formerly from Sclavonia instead of Goods, PLINY, B. XXXIII. Chap. III. GROTIUS. See BARNABY BRISSON, Select. Antiq. Juris Civil. Lib. I. Cap. VIII. and Mr. NOODT, Probab. Juris, Lib. IV. Cap. IV.

[11] Consult PUFENDORF, B. IV. Chap. VIII. § 7.

[12] See PUFENDORF, B. V. Chap. VII.

[1] That is, such Acts as unite the Interests of the Contractors.

[1] On this Doctrine see PUFENDORF, B. V. Chap. II. § 10. where he corrects our Author's Notions, in Regard to some of the following Instances.

[2] It is rather a single Contract of Sale, as was determined by the old Lawyers, against the Opinion of CASSIUS. Institut. Lib. III. Tit. XXV. § 4. According to the same Authority, there is a Mixture of the two Contracts only, when we find the Gold, and agree with the Artist for his Labour.

[3] See Note 3. on PUFENDORF, B. V. Chap. VII. § 12.

[1] Nor is there any real Mixture in this Case. See PUFENDORF, B. V. Chap. II. § 10.

[1] LABEO's Definition of a Contract is, A mutual or reciprocal Obligation, which the Grecians call Συνάλλαγμα; such as Buying, Selling, Hiring, Letting, Partnership. Digest. Lib. L. Tit. XVI. De verborum significatione, Leg. XIX. Our Author quoted this Law. PUFENDORF defines a Contract in a different Manner, B. V. Chap. II. But in Reality it is arbitrary; and it is sufficient to express clearly the Idea we fix to Terms, the Signification of which is not well settled. The Commentators on the Roman Law are very much divided on the Definition of a Contract; and I do not know whether the antient Lawyers were better agreed on the Matter or not. See BACHOVIUS, in his Commentary on the first Part of the Digest. p. 565, 566.

[1] On this see PUFENDORF, B. V. Chap. III.

[1] See the Scholiast upon that Passage of HORACE, Lib. II. Sat. III. 285.
Mentem nisi, &c.

*Now he that sold him, might have safely sworn,
He's found both Wind and Limb as e'er was born;
But cheated, if he swore him sound in Soul.*

CREECH.

GROTIUS. See the Chapter of PUFENDORF last referred to, § 2. Note. 2. 2d Edit.

[2] I have explained this in Note 1 on the same Chapter of PUFENDORF, § 3.

[3] CICERO, De Offic. Lib. III. Cap. XII. But the Philosopher is in the Main of the same Opinion with our Author; he proposes no Objection, but only answers those who pretend a Man ought to discover even accidental Circumstances, which do not at all concern the Substance of the Obligation.

- [4] VALERIUS MAXIMUS, Lib. VIII. Cap. XI. 1. An honest Seller must neither augment the Buyer's Hopes of Advantage, nor disguise and conceal from him the Knowledge of the Faults and Inconveniencies that accompany the Purchase. The Author is speaking there of an House which the Augurs had ordered to be pulled down, which Circumstance the Person who was to dispose of it had never acquainted the Purchaser with. GROTIUS.
- [5] De Offic. Lib. III. Cap. X. On this Passage see Mr. NOODT, De formâ emendandi doli mali, Cap. XIII.
- [6] Institut. Divin. Lib. V. Cap. XVII. Num. 32 Edit. Cellar.
- [7] De Offic. Lib. III. Cap. XII.
- [8] Ibid. Cap. XIII.
- [9] Cap. XVI. See Note 4. on this Paragraph.
- [10] CICERO, ibid. Cap. XVI. See what I have said on PUFENDORF, B. V. Chap. III. § 5. Note 1. second Edition.
- [11] THEODERIC's Edict, Cap. CXLI. GROTIUS.
- [12] The Philosopher says, If a Man sells a Slave who has been guilty of Murther, known to both the Buyer and Seller, the latter is not obliged to take his Slave again. p.916. Tom. II. Edit. Steph. On the same Principle he had a little before said, that If a Physician, or a Master of Exercise, buys a Slave, afflicted with the Stone, &c. or any other obstinate Distemper of Body or Mind, the Sale is good and valid, as if an express Declaration of his Distemper had been made; because that it is presumed from the Purchaser's Profession, that he ought to know such Defects.
- [1] Hist. Graec. Lib. III. Cap. II. § 22. Edit. Oxon.
- [a] B. III. Chap. XIX. § 2.
- [1] See PUFENDORF, B. V. Chap. III. § 7, 8.
- [2] It is to be observed, in short, that the Execution of a Commission, unless it be done gratis, receives another Name. For when a Reward is agreed on, it begins to be Letting and Hiring. And, generally speaking, in those Cases, where a Contract is made, in Regard to a Commission, or something deposited without promise of Reward; in the same Cases, if a Reward intervenes, it is understood to be a Contract of Letting and Hiring. Institut. Lib. III. Tit. XXVI. De Mandato, § 13. See also Digest. Lib. XVI. Tit. III. Depositi vel contra. Leg. I. § 9.
- [3] Our Author doth not tell us from what Part of St. CHRYSOSTOM's Works he took this Passage.
- [4] The Historian says, that Hermias practised this Maxim, among other Occasions, in Regard to an ignorant Person, who offered to sell him a Book under its Value. Cod. CCXLII. p. 1044. Edit. Rothom. 1533.
- [5] See MOSES DE KOTZI LXXXII. Prac. Juben. GROTIUS.
- [1] Cod. Lib. IV. Tit. XLIV. De rescindendâ venditione, Leg. II. See what has been observed on this famous Constitution of the Emperor Dioclesian, in a long Note on the second Edition of PUFENDORF, B. V. Chap. III. § 9. Note 1.

- [2] De Offic. Lib. III. Cap. XVII.
- [3] If there is a real Damage, the Civil Laws, what good Reason so ever they may have for not allowing an Action for redressing this Inequality, leave the natural Obligation subsisting in its full Force.
- [1] Concerning what relates to this Contract in general, see PUFENDORF, B. V. Chap. IV. § 2, 3, 4. with the Notes in the second Edition.
- [2] Consult the same Author in the same Chapter, § 6. with the Notes in the second Edition.
- [a] See Lex Wisigoth, Lib. V. Tit. V. Cap. I. II. III.
- [3] See the same Place, § 7.
- [4] PUFENDORF treats of this Contract also in general, B. V. Chap. X. § 13, &c.
- [5] See the same Author, Chap. VI. of the Book already often quoted, § 2.
- [6] The Conformity is not compleat. For, to say nothing of Losses sustained in the Execution of a Commission, on which Article our Author doth not explain himself, so as to enable us to judge certainly whether his Notions were different from those of the Roman Lawyers: he doth not entirely agree with them about Things lent for Use. For, according to the Roman Law, if the Thing lent was lost by Accident, without any Fault in the Borrower, the Owner suffered, whether the Thing might or might not have been preserved in his Hands. See my eighth Note on PUFENDORF, B. V. Chap. IV § 6. second Edition. The Roman Laws, which answer to our Author's Decisions in these Cases, may be seen in the other Passages, quoted from that Book.
- [7] This agrees with a Passage in Exodus, Chap. XXII. 7, 10, 11, 12, 13. MOSES DE KOTZI, LXXXVIII. and LXXXIX. Praecep. Juben. GROTIUS.
- [8] De Benefic. Lib. VII. Cap. XIX. The Words of SENECA are, Non tutelam, illi, sed fidem debeo. The Philosopher is there speaking of the Obligation of restoring what we owe a Man, even tho' he is at that Time disposed to waste it; for, says he, I am obliged to keep my Word, (Fidem debeo) but not to preserve the Thing restored, (non Tutelam). So that, tho' these Words may bear an Allusion to the several Degrees of Care and Exactness to be observed, according to the Nature of the Contracts, the Question is very different in the Main. Perhaps SENECA here alludes to the Obligations of Guardianship; as if he had said, I am not my Creditor's Guardian; I am obliged only to restore him his Goods, it is his Business to take Care of them.
- [1] Ethic. Nicomach. Lib. V. Cap. VIII. p. 65. Tom. II. Edit. Paris.
- [2] On this whole Question consult PUFENDORF, B. V. Chap. I. with the Notes.
- [3] And the same Author, in his thirty-seventh Book, treating of Jewels, It is People's Pride and Curiosity, and especially the Extravagance of Princes, that determines the Value of these Things. And in his thirty-second Book, The Indians set as great a Price on our Coral, as we do on their Pearls; for these Things depend altogether on People's Fancies. And St. AUSTIN, De Civit. Dei, Lib. XI. Cap. XVI. And pray where is the Strangeness of all this, when you find that so unaccountable are those Men's Notions, tho' they are in their own Natures of so much Excellence and Dignity, that they shall frequently give more for a Horse than a Man Slave, and for a Jewel than a Woman Slave? The Notions of Reason are here very different from those of Necessity and Pleasure. Reason considers a Thing according to its intrinsick Value; but Necessity, according as there is real Occasion for it. Reason seeks for what may appear true to the Mind; but Pleasure for that which may gratify the Senses of the Body. GROTIUS.

- [4] For, adds he, it is hard to fix the Value of Things, till the Extent of our Passions is regulated. In Verrem. Lib. IV. Cap. VII.
- [5] Digest. Lib. XXXV. Tit. II. Ad Legem Falcid. PLINY says, Lib. XVIII. Cap. XXXI. An honest prudent Man, who has a Family to maintain, makes Use of the Provisions Price for my Trouble; that every Year furnishes him with. GROTIUS.
- [6] Digest. Lib. IX. Tit. II. Ad Legem Aquil. Leg. XXXIII.
- [7] Nor does St. AUSTIN disapprove of this, upon Psal. lxx. But, says the Person you are dealing with; I bring my Goods a great Way, I only desire a living Price for my Trouble; and the Labourer is surely worthy of his Hire. Friend, we are not talking about your Trade and Business, but about your Lying and Perjury in it. GROTIUS.
- [1] Concerning this Contract, see PUFENDORF, B. V. Chap. V. § 2.
- [2] De Benefic. V. 10. GROTIUS.
- [3] As this stands in the Original, it is urged by our Author as a Proof of what he had just advanced in Relation to a Contract of Sale, Nam et ita fit in permutatione. This I take to be his Meaning; on which the Commentators are silent. If, according to the Law of Nature, the Property may be transferred the Moment the Contract is made, by which one Thing is given for another, tho' neither of the contracting Parties delivers what he deprives himself of; or tho' only one of them immediately gives the other Possession of the Thing exchanged; why may not the Translation of Property be likewise made without Delivery, when we give a Thing for Money? There is no more Difficulty in the latter Case than in the former. However, as those who are prejudiced in Favour of the Roman Law, the Notions of which are not more agreeable to the Simplicity of the Law of Nature, in Regard to Exchange, may also dispute what our Author takes for granted, concerning that Contract, which is of the greatest Antiquity, the Whole amounts at last to what has been said, Cap. VI. § 1. in the Text and Notes.
- [4] Praestando ut habere liceat. According to the old Roman Law, when a Thing was sold purely and simply, the Seller only engaged so to deliver it into the Hands of the Buyer, that it might be reckoned among his Goods, according to the Law of Nations, (which was termed Dominium Bonitarium) and that he should not be molested in the Possession of it, or be indemnified, on legal Proof of such Molestation. But all this did not render the Buyer the real Proprietor, according to the Civil Law, till the Form of Prescription expired; he had not yet the Dominium Quiritium; the Property was not transferred on him omni modo, nor quoquo modo, it was only a Sort of Possession. This therefore was barely called, to deliver, (tradere) whereas the Word to give (dare) was used for expressing a Translation of the full and whole Property, which was performed with certain Formalities. (Mancipatione, vel cessione in jure) See Chap. VIII. of this Book, § 25. Note 2. But, unless it was expressly agreed to put the Buyer in Possession of the Thing bought on that Foot, he could demand the Possession only in the other Manner. See Mr. NOODT's Probabilia Juris, Lib. II. Cap. XII.
- [5] See PUFENDORF, B. V. Chap. V. § 3. where he makes a proper Reply to what is alledged for salving the Want of Connexion in the Principles of the Roman Law; or at least the Manner in which they are usually explained. The Seller, we are told, is considered as indebted for a Thing in Kind; and therefore is not answerable for Accidents, by which the Thing may be lost, without any Fault in him. Mr. THOMASIVS, however, (in his Notes on HUBER, De Jure Civitatis, Lib. II. Sect. VI. Cap. IV. p. 523.) not only approves of this Reason, but even maintains, that it holds good, according to the Law of Nature, when the Goods are not yet paid for, and the Seller doth not sell them on Trust. He is of Opinion, that in this Case the Property should be considered as remaining in the Seller, and that this always holds good, even according to the Law of Nature, unless it was expressly agreed, that the Property should be transferred to the Buyer, the Moment the Contract was made, and before the Delivery of the Thing sold. To support this Assertion, he observes, that by the Nature of the Contract of Sale, the Seller is not obliged to deliver the Goods till he is paid, (this probably was meant by those Words Ad Dominium transferendum, taking Dominium for Possession, not for Property; which would be begging the Question) unless he gives Credit. But I think it does not thence follow, that the Right of Property remains in the Seller. The Right, and the Enjoyment of the Right, are two different Things; as are the Contract, and its Execution. Nothing more is requisite for transferring the Right but the Will of the Proprietor; and that Will, if we judge by the Simplicity of the Law of Nature, has its full Effect, the Moment the Contract of Sale is made, unless it be otherwise agreed. But the Enjoyment of the Right, which relates to the Execution of the Contract, may be suspended till the Buyer has paid down the Money agreed on, tho' he will not thereby be less the Proprietor of the Thing sold. The Seller is not obliged to dispossess himself of his Goods till the Buyer has paid for them; because, as he gives no Credit, he tacitly reserves to himself a Right of breaking the Contract, if the Buyer does not first perform his Engagements; nor does he intend to expose himself to the Danger either of not being paid, or, at least, not without much Difficulty, or not recovering his Goods safe and sound, which he sold only on Condition, that the Sale should be null and void, on Default of Payment. Now either the Time of Payment, which ought to precede the Delivery of the Thing sold, is fixed or not. In the former Case it is plain, that the Moment the Term expires, the Right of Property reverts to the Seller: In the latter, the Buyer is obliged to take away the Goods without Delay, because, otherwise, the Seller might lose an Opportunity of disposing of them to the same Advantage. This, I think, ought to hold good, according to the Law of Nature. But at the same Time it must be owned, that, commonly speaking, when the Sale is made in the Manner here specified, it is not so much a Contract of Sale, properly so called, as an Agreement which obliges the Parties to make such a Contract at a certain or uncertain Time. So that it is no Wonder if the Seller remains Proprietor of the Thing sold, and consequently, if Accidents and Casualties fall on him. The Effect of such an Agreement is, that the future Seller engages first, not to make a Contract of Sale with another, in Regard to the Thing bargained for, before the Term, either limited or not; and in the second Place, to give it at the Price agreed on, when the Contract of Sale shall be completed, by the Performance of the Obligations on both Sides. There may be an Agreement to sell, which may have some Effect, even without fixing any Price, as I have shewn in my third Note on PUFENDORF, as before quoted. Much more then may there be an Agreement to sell at a certain Price. And this seems to have been our Author's Notion; at least it ought to have been so, in my Opinion, when he was arguing on the Principles of the Law of Nature only.

[6] Tit. De Legibus, Serm. XLIV. GROTIUS.

[7] Our Author here supposes two Sales, by one of which the Right of Property was transferred, the Moment the Contract was made and concluded; which, according to him, is the most simple and natural Way of Buying and Selling: In the other it is agreed, that the Property should still remain some Time in the Seller. But he does not distinguish which is prior or posterior in Date; nor does he speak of the Case in which the two Sales were made on the same Foot; which PUFENDORF supposes, as above quoted, § 5. who on this Occasion accuses him wrongfully; imagining that the whole Difference is, that one of the Sales was accompanied by a Delivery; and following ZIEGLER in this Point, tho' he does not name him, who endeavours to make GROTIUS contradict himself. But our Author says, By Delivery, or otherwise. So that, according to him, it is possible there may be no Delivery; nor can it take Place here, when the other Buyer has without it acquired the Property, the Moment the Bargain was made; because the Delivery implying a present Translation of the Property, there would be a Translation of Property on both Sides, which would make Things so far equal. However, I do not approve of our Author's Way of reasoning on the Substance of the Question. For tho' a present Translation of Property is in itself more considerable than a bare Promise of transferring the Property; yet the Promise, according to the Principles laid down in the preceding Chapter, ought, in its own Nature, to have sufficient Force to hinder the Promiser from knowingly and willingly doing any Thing that shall stand good, which may put him out of a Condition of performing it. So that the Moment a Man has promised to transfer the Property of a Thing to another, he thereby deprives himself of the Power of actually transferring that Property elsewhere, till a Term, whether fixed or not, which is either expressly or tacitly agreed on. In Reality, according to the Law of Nature alone, while there is no Delivery, the first in Date has the better Right, on what Foot soever the Sale was made. But when the Thing sold has been actually delivered, the Person to whom it was delivered is not obliged to restore it, whether he was prior or posterior in Date, provided he knew nothing of Sale made to the other. That the first in Date has the better Right, when there is no Delivery, appears from the Reason already alledged, and taken from the very Nature of Promises; even tho' there was a present Translation of Property in Favour of the last in Date, if that Translation was not accompanied with an actual Delivery, the Buyer might think it possible, that the Performance of the Contract might be hindered by several Accidents, of which Number is another Man's prior Right. The Thing is then in Nature: It has not been in the Seller's Power to dispose of it; so that the first Buyer, or the Person who has the first Right to it, may assert that Right, and the other ought to rest satisfied with demanding Damages and Interest of the Seller, who has amused him with a fallacious Contract. This takes Place particularly when it depended solely on the last Buyer to put himself in Possession of the Thing the Moment the Contract was made and settled. But when the Thing sold has been actually delivered to one of the Buyers, even to the last in Date, it is no longer in Nature, but ought to be considered as lost. The Person to whom it was delivered is not in Fault, if it was, as it were, mortgaged to another, because we suppose he knew nothing of the Matter. By what Title shall that other, with whom he had nothing to do, require the Delivery of a Thing which he has justly acquired? As, while the Thing is not yet delivered, the first in Date may come upon the Seller, who has it still in his Hands, because he neither could nor was obliged to foresee, that the Seller would promise it to another; so likewise, when the Seller has actually deprived himself of it, pursuant to a posterior Engagement, the Person to whom it was delivered is not obliged to enquire, while he has no Reason for Suspicion, whether the Seller has transferred his Right to another. The Necessity of Civil Commerce equally requires both; so that in both Cases it is a Misfortune to the Person who depended on having the Thing sold, if he is disappointed, either by the Discovery of a prior Right, or by a Discovery of the Delivery of the Thing, which puts the Seller out of a Condition to give the Possession of it.

[1] Concerning this Question, see PUFENDORF, B. V. Chap. V. § 7.

[2] Every Body knows Thales's Story of the Olives. Pythocles's Invention of buying up the Tyrian Lead for the Advantage of the Athenians, is in ARISTOTLE, Oeconomic. II. See PLINY, VIII. 37. of the Monopoly of the Skins of Hedge-Hogs. And PROCOPIUS, of the Ingrossing all the Silks, in his Hist. Arcan. Chap. XXV. GROTIUS.

Thales, foreseeing there would be great Plenty of Oil, farmed all the Olive Trees in the Country. This is related by several Authors, but with some Difference in the Circumstances. See ARISTOTLE, Politic. Lib. I. Cap. XI. and on that Place HUBERT GIPHANIUS, in whose Version it is the seventh Charter; as also DIOGENES LAERTIUS, Lib. I. § 26. with his Commentators.

[3] Lib. XVII. See too CASSIODORE II. 4. and 26. GROTIUS.

Neither this nor the foregoing Example is well applied, as PUFENDORF observes, in the Chapter above quoted, Note 2. It appears from the Passage of STRABO, that if the City of Alexandria was in Possession of almost all the Trade to the Indies and Ethiopia, it was owing only to the Advantage of its Situation, not to any particular Privilege granted them by the Romans. The Passages of CASSIODORE, referred to by our Author, are better applied.

[4] It is a just and prudent Law, C. De Monopol. And there is a very notable Passage in LYSIAS against the Corn-Factors, who advanced the Price of their Grain, by raising false Rumors. Add to these CASSIODORE, IX. 5. and C. quicumque, Caus. XIV. Quaest. IV. GROTIUS.

[5] There is no Offence against the Rules of Charity in this Case, but when the Things in Question are absolutely necessary for the Support of Life, as Corn.

[1] Not so much from the Substance as the Value, Lib. I. D. De contrah. emtione. We must not regard the Matter here, but the Worth of it, L. Si is cui, § 1. De solutionibus. GROTIUS.

[2] Because we may give Silver Money, for Money of Gold.

[3] Because we may give Crowns for Pistoles, or Half-Crowns for Crowns; or Copper-Money for Crowns, &c. in Proportion to the respective Value of each Species.

[4] Because we may give Money for Corn, Wine, &c. and that by paying more or less, according as the Things bought are more or less scarce in Comparison with Money. See PUFENDORF, B. V. Chap. I. § 15, 16.

[5] That is, if a Man borrows a Sum of Money, for Example, and, at the Time we are to pay it, Money, or other Things, are more plentiful, and consequently, Money is of more or less Value than it was when he borrowed it; the Creditor cannot demand more Pieces than he lent, nor the Debtor pretend to pay fewer than he borrowed. The Reason is, because the Case, which frequently happens, might as well turn to the Advantage of either of the contracting Parties, as to his Loss. So that they are and ought to be supposed to have tacitly consented, that it should be so much the better for him that should gain, and so much the worse for him who should lose by the Difference. There is a Hazard in such Agreements. The same is to be said, when a Thing or the Value of that Thing, is to be given at a certain Time, or in a certain Place. The Commentators very much enlarge here on the Change of the intrinsick or extrinsick Value of the Species. But this is a different Question, of which it doth not appear that our Author thought, and concerning which PUFENDORF may be consulted, B. V. Chap. VI. § 6, 7.

[6] Its Value is publick and perpetual, D. Lib. I. D. De contr. emt. GROTIUS.

[1] Concerning this Contract, see PUFENDORF, B. V. Chap. VI. with the Notes.

[2] Digest. Lib. XIX. Tit. II. Locati, conducti, Leg. II.

[3] That is, a Thing sold, but not delivered. See above, § 15. and my first Note on PUFENDORF, B. V. Chap. VI. § 2.

[4] Provided such Accidents do not entirely take away the Use of the Thing; as is the Case, when a Farm yields no Profit, or so little, that it is hardly any Thing in Comparison of the Labour and Charge employed in the Culture, and in Proportion to the Largeness of the Farm hired. The only View in hiring a Thing is to draw some Advantage from it; so that here the Case is the same as if the Thing hired had perished, or the Tenant was turned out.

[5] It is here supposed, that the Owner, or Landlord, had no Reason to think the first Tenant would be unwilling he should let the Thing to another, so long as he is not in a Capacity of enjoying it himself. Such an Impediment might also happen, as would dissolve the Contract, by Vertue of a tacit Exception, founded on a reasonable Presumption of the Tenant's Intention.

[1] This requires some Restriction. See what is said on the Question, § 4. of PUFENDORF's Chapter, quoted in the foregoing Paragraph.

[1] Concerning this see PUFENDORF, B. V. Chap. VII. § 8, &c.

[a] In Cap. 25. Matt. qu. 171. & 172.

[2] For these two Loans (the Commodatum and the Mutuum) are very much alike, as Locatio and Foeneratio are, the one Letting out of Goods, the other of Money; in L. Unica, C. Theod. quod jussuest: There is, pecuniam commodat. JUSTINIAN has made it in his Edition, mutuam dat. And HORACE calls nummos foenore sumtos, Money taken up at Interest, conductos, Money hired, Lib. I. Sat. II. where the Scholiast has Merces, for Usura. GROTIUS.

See Mr. NOODT's excellent Treatise, De Foenore, & Usuris, Lib. I. Cap. VI. In Regard to the Terms Mutuum and Commodatum, they are sometimes confounded one with the other by antient Authors; of which we have a considerable Number of Examples in FABROT's Notes on CUJAS, Paratit. C. De Commodato, p. 125. To which may be added JAMES GODEFROY, on the Title of the Code, quoted by our Author, Tom. I. p. 228.

[3] Nor ought Money ever to be idle and unprofitable, L. quid ergo, § Usuras, D. de contrar. & util. act. tutelae, L. Debitor. D. de Usuris. GROTIUS.

[4] Our Author proposes and answers this Objection more at Length, in the following Manner, in a Note on LUKE vi. 35. "It is objected by some, that in the Loan of a Thing consumable, the Lender transfers his Property to the Borrower: Now, say they, the Profits arising from a Thing ought to belong to the Proprietor. But this is a Refinement of Speech, which has no Foundation in natural Equity. For, in Regard to Things that may be returned in Specie, as Money, Corn, Wine, &c. the Right a Man has to demand an Equivalent of the same Sort, stands for Property. Now it is universally agreed, that a Person to whom a Thing is restored in a short Time, receives more than he to whom it is restored after a longer Time, on Account of the Advantages attending the natural Possession. (Ἡ φυσικῆ κατοχή.) And this holds good in a Loan of Things consumable, as well as in that of Things not consumable, if we consider the Nature of Things in themselves, and not the Subtlety of Terms. The Delay of Payment is undoubtedly susceptible of Estimation; and consequently, some Stipulation may be made in Consideration of such Delay. If, on lending a Man a hundred Crowns, I agree with him, that he in his Turn shall lend me the same Sum another Time, which is a real Exchange; how will it be proved, that there is more Injustice in such an Agreement, than when I lend a Neighbour some Oxen for Ploughing his Ground, on Condition that he shall lend me his in his Turn? Now this Obligation of Lending in his Turn, is, like all other Things, susceptible of Estimation by Money; (and, consequently, a Man may be released from it on Payment of a certain Sum in its Place). Besides, Nature dictates to us this Maxim, that we are not obliged to serve another, when we cannot do it without Damage to ourselves. Now, he who deprives himself of his Money for some Time, to pleasure another, might have laid it out on some Piece of Land, or on a House, and received Profits arising from them during that Time. It may be said, those Profits would have been uncertain. But even that Uncertainty has its Value, and is frequently sold, as every Thing else which is subject to Hazard. Besides, if a Person to whom the Use and Profits of a Sum of Money are bequeathed without the Property, is supposed to become richer by such a Legacy; it appears, that such Use is susceptible of Estimation; and consequently, the same may be said of the Use of a Sum lent for a Year. I perceive, that most of those, who condemn an Agreement for any Interest for Money lent, do not however disapprove of demanding some Interest for Delay of Payment; whereby they allow of agreeing that if the Borrower doth not pay at the Time appointed, he shall give so much for the Interest of the Money lent. Now is not this admitting the Substance of the Thing, and disputing merely about Words? For, according to this Opinion, we may bargain thus, If you do not pay me in three Days, you shall give me so much more. But, if the three Days, or some other fixed Time is not mentioned, the Agreement shall be unlawful. Is not this a mere Quibble, without any Foundation in the Nature of Things? Let us therefore conclude; that, without Prejudice to the Law of Nature, every one who deprives himself of the Use of his Money, to oblige another, may bargain beforehand, that the Borrower shall give something in Return for that Service.”

[5] Digest. Lib. VII. Tit. V. De Ususfructu rerum, quae, &c. Leg. I. II.

[6] For by Ususfructus we understand, a Right of enjoying a Thing belonging to another, and the Profits arising from it, without touching the Substance, or disposing of it. Digest. Lib. VII. Tit. L. De Ususfructu, &c. Leg. I. Whereas, when a Sum of Money is bequeathed to any one for his Use, the said Use consists in the Consumption. See Mr. NOODT’s Treatise De Usafructu, Lib. I. Cap. II. and XX. XXI.

[7] Cum debitor. D. in quibus causis pignus. L. ea pactione. C. de Usuris. GROTIUS. Concerning the Antichresis, see PUFENDORF, B. V. Chap. X. § 14.

[8] Mr. NOODT has examined these Passages of the Authors here quoted, and some other in his Treatise De Foenore & Usuris, Lib. I. Cap. IV. VII. VIII. IX.

[9] As APPIAN, in Civil. (p. 382. Edit. H. Steph.) GROTIUS.

[10] Our Author changed his Opinion since he wrote this, as appears both from his Introduction to the Law of Holland; his 953d Letter written to SALMASIUS; and his long Note on St. LUKE, of which I have already given a Part. He confutes himself in the following Manner, “The Law in Deuteronomy xxiii. 19, 20. stands thus; Thou shalt not lend upon Usury to thy Brother; Usury of Money, Usury of Victuals, Usury of any Thing that is lent upon Usury. Unto a Stranger thou mayest lend upon Usury; but unto thy Brother thou shalt not lend upon Usury. Those who maintain, that all Lending on Usury is contrary to the Law of Nature, pretend that the Permission here granted in Regard to Strangers is a bare Permission of Fact, not of Right, that is, a bare Impunity. But the Words do not admit of this Explication; and the People for whom the Law was made, never understood it thus; as appears from the Testimonies of JOSEPHUS and PHILO, with whom all the Rabbins agree in this Point. The former of those Authors says, It is not lawful to lend upon Usury to any Hebrew, either Eatables or Drinkables; for it is not just to raise a Revenue at the Expence of their Countrymen. But we must assist them in their Necessities, and consider their Gratitude as Gain, as also the Reward which GOD will bestow on such as do good. (Antiq. Jud. Lib. IV. Cap. VIII.) PHILO observes, that in the Law under Consideration, the Term Brother is not confined to one born of the same Parents, but extends to all Countrymen, or Persons of the same Nation, (De Caritate, p. 701. Edit. Paris.) And a little lower he adds, that If a Man is not disposed to give, he ought at least to lend freely, and without Interest; for, says he, by this Means the Poor will not be reduced to the utmost Misery, by being obliged to pay more than they received; and the Creditors will receive no Damage, since they will receive their Due, together with the Reputation of Goodness, Generosity, Greatness of Soul, and Commendation. (p. 702.) CLEMENT of Alexandria has imitated and explained this Passage, Stromat. Lib. II. (Cap. XVIII. p. 473. Edit. Potter.) Hence it appears sufficiently, that the Law in Deuteronomy, under Consideration, has been considered as containing only a Duty of one fellow Citizen to another; which is clearly insinuated in Leviticus xxv. 36. where we find this Reason given for the Prohibition of Lending on Interest, That thy Brother may live with thee. For which Reason, when the Royal Psalmist, and the Prophet EZEKIEL, praise such as forbear this Practice, they are to be understood as speaking only of those to whom it was forbidden by the Law. St. AMBROSE, and some others after him, are of Opinion, that by the Term Strangers, of whom Interest might be taken, are meant those of the seven Nations, on whom the Israelites might lawfully make War. We are not to be surprized, says that Father, if it was allowed to lend in this Manner to Persons, who might be killed with Impunity. (De Tobia, Cap. XV.) But this Explication doth not agree with the Terms of the Law; for when it speaks of Strangers, in Opposition to Brethren, or those of the same Nation, it is certain the Words ought to be understood of all other Nations without Exception. To this it may be added, that it was not consistent with the Gravity of the Legislator, to make a Law for allowing to lend on Interest to Persons who were to be destroyed. The Reason then of the Difference here made is this, GOD required the Israelites should observe among themselves, not only the Duties common to all Men, and which relate to such Things as others might in Rigour demand; but likewise several Duties of Charity and Friendship peculiar to themselves; as appears from the Laws concerning Slaves, Servant's Wages, the Permission of Gleaning in another Man's Field, and several others of the like Nature. Besides, the chief Income of the Hebrews arose from Cattle and Husbandry, as JOSEPHUS observes, Lib. I. Adv. Apion. Whereas most of the neighbouring Nations enriched themselves by Trade; as the Sidonians, the Tyrrians, those who lived near the Red Sea, and the Aegyptians. So that there was a very good Reason why the Law should allow the taking of some Interest for Money lent to such Strangers, tho' it forbid the Israelites that Practice, who were for the most Part Shepherds or Husbandmen. But this Law of MOSES being founded on the particular State of the People of Israel, and being imposed on them alone, obliges others only as it may insinuate some Conformity to natural Equity. As to the Gospel, our Saviour JESUS CHRIST having laid down no particular Precept concerning the Matter in Question, we are to draw Consequences from the general Precepts of his Doctrine, for knowing what he allows or prescribes in this Case, &c. — Among the old Canons of the Church we find no one that Excommunicates all in general who lend on Interest, as was practised in the following Ages. It is forbidden only to such as had some considerable Employment in the Church; to such as were called ὄτι ἐν κληρονομίᾳ, in the forty-third of the Canons ascribed to the Apostles, in the fourth of the Council of Laodicea; the seventeenth of the Council of Nice; the fifth and sixteenth of the Council of Africa. And the Reason why such Sort of Men were forbid to do it, is, in my Opinion, because it was thought they ought to be free from even every Suspicion of Avarice. The Fathers of the African Council give us to understand as much, when they say, that What is blameable in the Laity, ought to be much more condemned in the Clergy. Can. V. The same Council, when it forbids Bishops, Priests, and Deacons to lend on Usury, likewise forbids them to undertake any Procuration, or plead for another; for which Prohibition this Reason is assigned, that it doth not become Ecclesiasticks to meddle with secular Affairs. [See above, B. I. Chap. II. § 10. Num. 8.] HAMENOPULUS alledges the same Reason, after having quoted the Canons above-mentioned. [Promptuar. Lib. III. Tit. VII. § 28.] The Emperor Leo, as the same Lawyer observes, was the first that imagining no Sort of Usury was allowed to Christians, forbid it to all in general. Before that Time, even Churches borrowed Money at four per Cent. &c." Thus far our Author. To which if we add the Reflections of Mr.

NOODT, who has exhausted this Subject, in his Treatise De Foenore & Usuris, Lib. I. Cap. X. XI. we shall receive full Satisfaction, in Regard to the Objections which the Partizans of the contrary Opinion pretend to bring from Scripture.

[11] The Hebrews are of Opinion, that by the Word  $\Psi\upsilon\chi$ , is meant Usury for Money; but that  $\pi\alpha\sigma\iota\sigma\iota\sigma\iota$  signifies Usury for any Thing whatever. St. JEROME, upon the eighteenth of EZEKIEL, They think indeed that Usury consists only in the Interest of Money: Which the Divine Scriptures providing against, do in every Thing prohibit an immoderate Advantage, and oblige you to take no more on any Account than you have given. GROTIUS. Concerning the Signification of those Hebrew Words, see SALMASIUS, De Usuris, Cap. XX. p. 611, &c. and De modo Usurarum, Cap. VIII. p. 318, &c. as also Mr. LE CLERC's Commentary on Leviticus xxv. 36.

[12] And in the cxiith, A good Man is merciful and lendeth. GROTIUS.

[13] ARNOBIUS, in his fourth Book, says, that Christians generously impart what they have, and that to all Mankind, with as much Freedom as if they were their nearest Relations. And in another Place, They who love all Men as their Brothers. GROTIUS.

Christian Charity certainly requires we should lend without Interest, when it can be done without incommoding ourselves, to Persons in low Circumstances, who want Money for their Subsistence. But it by no Means requires we should make no Advantage of Money lent to such as improve and gain by it, and that often much more than the common Interest.

[14] Epitom. Institut. Cap. IV. Num. 12. Edit. Celler.

[15] St. CYPRIAN, De lapsis, reckons amongst several grievous Sins, the lending Money on Interest. St. CHRYSOSTOM, De Jejunio, V. Ἐὺν νηστεύσης, βλέπε, &c. If you fast, pray see that you do not put your Money out to Interest. Do you fast? Cancel the Obligations of your violent and unjust Contracts. And the same Author upon the last Chapter of the first of Corinthians, says, that Money gained by Usury, and given in Charity and Alms, is no more acceptable to GOD, than if it was so much from the Stews, the Price of Lewdness and Prostitution. St. AUSTIN, Epist. LIV. What shall I say of Usury, which even the Laws, and our Judges allow of? Is he more barbarous who cheats and robs the Rich, than he who with his Exaction murders the Poor? MAXIMUS, Homil. III. De Quadragesima, You will come to Church, Brother, as you ought to do, if that wretched Usury does not hamper and intangle you in her deadly Snares. To these add St. BASIL, upon our LORD's Sermon on the Mount, and what GRATIAN has collected from the Councils and Fathers, Caus. XIV. Quaest. III. and IV. GROTIUS.

As the Practice of lending Money on Interest has been but too much abused, how innocent soever it may be in itself, and when reduced to just Bounds; we are not to be surprized, that the Zeal of the Doctors of the Church, joined to their Want of sufficient Knowledge in such Sort of Things, has betrayed them into an extravagant Opinion in this Point. If they sometimes offer Reasons that are a little plausible, it is easy to discover the Weakness of them. This Mr. NOODT has done to a Demonstration, in his Treatise De Usuris & Foenore, Lib. I. Cap. IV. VII. VIII. IX. He likewise shews in Chap. XII. that the Interpreters of the Canon Law approve of certain Things, which imply real Usury. Father CEILLIER ought to have confuted this; and if ever I undertake to answer him in Form, it will be easy for me to shew, that, as he understands nothing of the Law of Nature, he is not more happy than the antient Fathers, in explaining the Holy Scripture by the Rules of Judicious Criticism.

[16] SÜETONIUS in Augusto, Cap. XXXIX.

[1] And if we would speak as the Roman Lawyers do, we should say, that Extortion indeed is an odious Name, but Usury is not so. Usury is imposed, not because the Lender desires to make a Penny of you, but because you, who borrow, defer your Payment. L. cum quidam. D. de Usuris. And CUJAS, in Paratit. de nautico foenore. Extortion is what is demanded over and above the Principal, merely for Advantage sake; Usury is what is given more than the Principal, that the Creditor may not be a Loser. But because several have abused the Name of Usury, this too is now usually taken in a bad Sense, and the Word Interest is substituted in the Room of it, in a good Sense. GROTIUS.

What the oldest Latin Authors called Foenus, from an old Word which signifies to produce, meaning the Fruit or Profit arising from Money lent, is in the Main the same Thing that has been since termed Usura, a Word which implies, that this Profit is made on the Account of the Use of Money lent. Mr. NOODT proves this at large, and solidly, in his Treatise De Foenore & Usuris, Lib. I. Cap. I, II. where he likewise shews the different Senses given by Custom to those two Words. The Roman Law, here quoted by our Author, doth not relate to all Kinds of Interest allowed by the Laws, but only such as has Place in Cases like that there mentioned.

[2] This is admitting the Thing as to the Substance, tho' under another Name; as PUFENDORF observes, B. V. Chap. VII. § 11. see likewise Mr. NOODT, De Foenore & Usuris, Lib. 1. Cap. XII.

[3] PROCOPIUS, Goth. III. (Cap. XL.) speaking in the Praise of Germanus, Justinian's Relation, Χρῆματα τοῖς δεομένοις, &c. He lent great Sums to all who had Occasion for Money, and never took of them any Interest that could be truly called so. GROTIUS.

[1] So it is in the Empire. GROTIUS.

[2] And therefore JUSTINIAN looked upon it to be his Duty to regulate the Interest that was permitted before his Time, and to reduce it to a juster Rate. Novel. 32, 33, 34. GROTIUS.

[1] See PUFENDORF, B. V. Chap. IX. § 8. where he treats of other hazardous Contracts; see also a Dissertation of the late Mr. HERTIUS, in his Paroemiae Juris Germanici, Lib. I. Cap. XLIII. p. 460, &c. Tom. III. of his Comment. & Opuscula, &c. in which he handles the principal Questions relating to the Contract of Insurance.

[2] Suetonius, in his Life of Claudius, said, that he took that Hazard upon himself. So CICERO took Security for the publick Money, that the People might run no Hazard in the Carriage of it. Epist. XII. 17. GROTIUS.

In what Suetonius says of Claudius, there is more than a Contract of Insurance; for the Emperor took the Hazard on himself, without any Consideration, with a View of favouring the Trade of the Merchants, who freighted Ships in the Winter Time, for bringing Provisions to Rome. We have an Instance of the same Kind in LIVY, Lib. XXIII. Cap. XLIX. As to CICERO, it is probable he only gave Sums of Money to Bankers, who entered into an Engagement to return it at Rome, as PAULUS MANUCIUS explains that Passage. At least the Terms of the Epistle may be so understood; so that he may there speak of a very different Sort of Contract.

[1] An Instance of Partnership you have in the Dolphins, observed by PLINY, Lib. IX. Cap. VIII. and in the Nacre, and another Shell-Fish called Pinnother, IX. 40. And this CICERO mentioned too. De finibus, (Lib. III. Cap. XIX.) GROTIUS.

On this Contract see PUFENDORF, B. V. Chap. VIII.

[2] Ethic. Nicom. Lib. VIII. Cap. XVI. p. 115.

[3] Par pari datum hostimentum est, opera pro pecuniâ. This is in PLAUTUS, Asinar. Act. 1. Scen. III. v. 20. The Poet is there speaking, not of a Contract of Partnership, or that of a trading Company, but of a Contract for doing something for another, on the Consideration of something to be given.

[4] Digest. Lib. XVII. Tit. II. Pro Socio, Leg. XXIX. But it is more probable, that the Lawyers here meant a simple, not a proportionable Equality. They considered a Contract of Partnership as a Kind of Fraternity, (ibid. Leg. LXIII.) and, consequently, of Friendship, which threw all in common, without enquiring whether one of the Partners had contributed more than another, unless it was otherwise agreed. See Mr. SCHULTING on the Institutions of CAJUS, Lib. II. Tit. IX. § 16. Not. 98. p. 171. of his Jurisprudentia Anti-Justiniana.

[1] Among the marginal References in the Original, which were transposed, and improperly placed, there are two which ought to be produced here. The first is to LIVY, Lib. XXXIX. as it stands in all the Editions before mine. But we find nothing like it in that Book; and I believe our Author had his Eye upon what that Historian relates in the Close of Book XXIII. of three Companies of Partizans, who, in a pressing Necessity of the Commonwealth, undertook to go to Spain with Provisions, at their own Expence, for the Army of the Scipio's. These Partizans, among other Terms, required that the Publick should make good their Loss, in Case any of their Ships were taken by the Enemy, or were lost in a Storm. If our Author designed to refer this to a Mixture of the Contract of Partnership, and the Contract of Insurance, of which he speaks in the foregoing Paragraph, the Example would be nothing to the Purpose. For the Agreement made by the Roman People with the Partizans, was a Farm, with a Mixture of a Contract of Insurance, there was no Partnership. The other marginal Reference is to ARISTOTLE, who speaks of an Alliance between the antient Tuscans and the Carthaginians, by Vertue of which they were obliged to defend each other, particularly in their trading Voyages, Politic. Lib. III. Cap. IX. p. 348. Tom. II. Edit. Paris. The Philosopher elsewhere calls such Alliances, Συμπλοικὰ φιλία. Ethic. Nicom. Lib. VIII. Cap. XIV.

[2] See something like this in L. Wisigoth, Lib. V. Cap. V. GROTIUS.

[1] That is, before Law II. of the Title of the Code, De rescindenda Venditione; concerning which see Note 1. on PUFENDORF, B. V. Chap. III. § 9.

[2] Concerning this Question, see PUFENDORF, as last quoted, § 10, 11. with the Notes.

[3] Digest. Lib. IV. Tit. IV. De minoribus, &c. Leg. XVI. § 4. See also Lib. XIX. Tit. II. Locati, Conducti, Leg. XXII. § 3.

[4] So GELLIUS, Lib. IX. Cap. X. speaking of the conjugal Act; A Thing by the Law of Nature to be done in private. GROTIUS.

The Word Naturaliter, in the Law under Consideration, has a very different Sense from what our Author gives it, as I have shewn on the Place of PUFENDORF, above quoted, so that I shall not here enquire whether the Passages produced by our Author, and others, are well applied or not, even supposing the Sense which they would fix to them. I shall only observe, that as our Author has not specified any one Greek Writer, who uses the Word πεφυσιώμενα to express the Strength of habitual Virtues and Vices, I at first doubted whether the Word was in Use. Besides, that it is not to be met with in our best Lexicons, as that of ROBERT CONSTANTINE, and STEPHANUS's Thesaurus, I found that SYLBURGE, an able Grecian, censures ANTESIGNANUS for explaining φυσιώμενος, in naturam versus. Not in Grammatic. CLENARDUS and ANTESIGNANUS, p. 564. Edit. Hanov. 1602. According to him it should be φυσιούμενος, which comes, not from φύσις, natura, but from φύσα, flatus, or follis; for which Interpretation he quotes HESYCHIUS. But I have since seen a Passage of CLEMENT of Alexandria, which probably gave our Author Occasion to make this grammatical Remark, which he repeats in his Notes on the Book of Wisdom xiii. 1. It is where that Father is speaking of a Gnostick, who he says by Practice acquired a Virtue which became natural to him. Τῶ ἄρα ἀναπόβλητον τὴν ἀρετὴν ἀσκήσει γνωστικῆ πεποιμένῳ φυσιοῦται ἡ ἔξις. Strom. Lib. VII. Cap. VII. p. 859. Edit Potter.

[5] Digest. Lib. L. Tit. XVII. De diversis regulis Juris, Leg. VII. He is there speaking of a Case, in which a Testator had disposed only of Part of his Estate, as when, naming an Heir he had assigned him only half, or a fourth Part of the Inheritance; or, when appointing several Heirs, he had assigned each of them his Share distinctly, in such a Manner that all the Shares together fall short of the Total of his Estate. According to the Roman Law, the Remainder, not mentioned by the Testator, accrued to the Heir, or Heirs, in the same Manner as if he had formerly given it them. It was laid down as a Principle, that one and the same Person could not design to make a Will, and yet let a Part of his Estate to be enjoyed by the lawful Heirs, as if he had made no Will. Mr. BYNKERSHOEK is of Opinion that the Reason of this Decision is, because, by the Laws of the XII. Tables, all the Goods of a Person either fell to his Relations, if he died intestate, or belonged to him whom the Testator had, in his Life-Time, declared his Heir with certain Formalities. (Mancipatione familiae per aes & libram.) See that great Lawyer's Observat. Juris Romani, Lib. II. Cap. III. However, when I consider well the Words of the Law in Question, I think it is plain enough that POMPONIUS designed to say there is a real Contradiction in supposing one and the same Person to die intestate, and yet have made a Will, Jus nostrum non patitur eundem in paganis & testato & intestato discedere; earumque rerum naturaliter inter se pugna est. It is not at all probable, as JAMES GODEFROY observes in his Comment on this Rule, that naturaliter here signifies, According to the Custom received by the Roman Law. That is sufficiently expressed in the first Words of the Rule, and it is impossible to make Choice of Terms more strong, for expressing a Contradiction founded on the Nature of Things. I easily conceive that the Notions of a false Philosophy might hinder that Lawyer from comprehending, that it is indeed a Contradiction that a Man should make a Will, and not make a Will in Regard to the same Goods; but he may dispose of certain Goods by Will, and let others fall to his lawful Heirs as if he died intestate. The Question is, whether there be naturally Room for presuming that is the Reason why the Testator disposed only of Part of his Estate, or whether it was through mere Forgetfulness, that the Remainder was not mentioned. We can hardly form a Judgment of this but by Circumstances. However this may be, the Maxim of the Roman Law did not take Place, in Relation to Wills made by military Men. On which Occasion the learned GODEFROY shews, that such Wills were excepted only in what concerned the Disposal of Goods acquired in the War, or on Account of the War, for thus, with great Appearance of Reason, he understands those Words, eundem in paganis, that is, bonis. There was also some Exception in Regard to the Estates of Persons who did not bear Arms. See the following Note of the Author.

[6] Nay, and often too in the Wills of those who are not military Men, where any Dispute arises about an inofficious Will, a Will which entirely leaves out, or very slightly provides for, those who ought chiefly to be considered, L. Mater. L. Nam etsi. L. circa. D. De inoff. Testament. As also L. cum duobus, C. de inoff. test. as before. GROTIUS. On this Exception consult CUIJAS, in Papinian. p. 378, 379. Tom. IV. Opp. and ANTHONY FAURE, Ration. Tom. II. p. 180, 188, 197, &c.

[7] DIOCLESIAN and MAXIMIAN, Cod. Lib. IV. Tit. XLIV. De rescindendâ Venditione, Leg. VIII.

[8] FESTUS; Haglers (Cociones) seem to be called so (à Cunctatione) from their Tediousness and Hagling, because they are a long Time bargaining before they come to a Conclusion in the Price; and therefore the first Syllable was formerly writ with the Letter V.

QUINTILIAN, Declam. pro Civibus; Diu cocionatus est, He was a great While haggling about it. GROTIUS.

See the Note of GRONOVIVS on that Verse of PLAUTUS,

Vetus est, nihili cocio est; scis cujus? Non dico amplius.

Asinar. Act. I. Scen. III. ver. 51. and Mr. BURMAN'S Note on the Passage of QUINTILIAN, quoted by our Author.

[9] De Benefic. Lib. VI. Cap. XV.

[10] Paraphrasing on Ethic. Nicom. Lib. V. Cap. V.

[11] This is an Extract from the Bibliotheca of PHOTIUS, already quoted at the End of § 11. of this Chapter, and from the same Page 1044.

[12] So ANDRONICUS RHODIUS on Nicomach. V. Cap. V. in the End, Τούτων γὰρ ἕδειαν νόμος, For the Law has granted an Impunity in such Cases. GROTIUS.

[1] The Subject of this Chapter is handled by PUFENDORF, B. IV. Chap. II.

[2] This is a Fragment of the Tragedy here specified. It is preserved by STOBÆUS. The Original, of which our Author has only given us the Translation, stands thus,

Ἵρκου δὲ προστεθέντος ἐπιμελεστέρα
Ψυχὴ κατέστη· Δισσὰ γὰρ φυλάσσεται,
Φιλῶν τε μέμψιν, καὶ εἰς Θεοῦς ἀμαρτάνειν.

Florileg. Tit. XXVII.

[3] De Offic. Lib. III. Cap. XXXI.

[4]

θ' ὅς δὲ πλεῖστον ἐπιχθονίους ἀνθρώπους
Πημαίνει, ὅτε κέν τις ἐκῶν ἐπίορκον ὁμόσῃ.

Theogon. v. 231, 232.

[5] See SERVIUS, in Excerpt. Fuldens. upon I Aeneid. GROTIUS.

I do not find any Remark to this Purpose in SERVIUS'S Commentary on the two first Books of the Aeneid, to which only PETER DANIEL made Additions from the Manuscript in Question. VIRGIL himself says, in his Georgics, that the Romans were sufficiently punished for the Perjuries of the Trojan Nation, from which they claimed their Descent, and alludes to the fabulous Account of Laomedon's Treachery in his Dealings with Apollo and Neptune.

— — *Satis jam pridem sanguine nostro
Laomedontæe luimus perjuriam Trojæ.*

Lib. I. v. 501, 502.

On which the antient Commentator says not one Word. So that our Author may have confounded the Comment with the Text.

[6]

Ἄλλ' ἄρκου παῖς ἐστὶν ἀνόνημος, οὐδ' ἐπὶ χεῖρες
Ἦουδε πόδες· Κραίνος δὲ μετέρχεται εἰσοχε πᾶσαν
Συμμάρφας ἀλέσσι γενεῖν, καὶ οἶκον ἅπαντα.

Lib. VI. Cap. LXXXVI.

[7] See ZECHARIAH V. 1, 2, 3. and St. CHRYSOSTOM, De Statuis XV. interpreting that Passage. GROTIUS.

[8] Sat. XIII. v. 208.

[9] De Offic. Lib. III. Cap. XXIX.

[1] There is such another Story in the Metamorphoses of ANTONIUS LIBERALIS, about Ctesylla and Hermochare. GROTIUS.

[2] In the very same Place,

*Consilium prudensque Animi Sententia jurat,
Et nisi Judicii vincula nulla valent.*

*Oaths must from Wisdom and from Thought result,
And if the Judgment's wanting, no Ways bind.*

And immediately after,

*Sed si nil dedimus praeter sine pectore Vocem, Verba suis frustra viribus orba tenes.
Non ego juravi: legi jurantia Verba, &c.*

*If all we said was only empty Sound,
Nor was our Heart concerned, in vain you think
That by our Words we're tied: I did not swear,*

But read the Form the sacred Oath contains.

GROTIUS.

[3]

γλώσσ' ὁμωμόχ', ἣ δὲ φρήν ἀνόμητος.

Ver. 612.

[4] Because Hippolytus thought the Nurse intended that some honest Action was to be concealed, he did not imagine that she meant Adultery and Incest. GROTIUS.

[1] De Offic. Lib. III. Cap. XXIX.

[2] Odyss. Lib. V. v. 188.

[3] St. AUSTIN, Epist. CCXXIV. speaking of a Prisoner of War, who going upon his Parole out of the Carthaginian Camp, returned thither again immediately, and then went to Rome: Those who removed him from the Senate, did not so much regard what he intended when he swore, as what they, to whom he took the Oath, expected from him. See also what follows there. Look for what is very excellently said upon this Subject in the Council of Trosli, Concil. Tom. III. Edit. Sirmond. And in HINCMARUS's little Treatise De divortio Lotharii & Tethbergae, upon Interrog. VI. where, agreeably to his Opinion, it is very justly said of GOD,

*Qui non ut juras, sed ut is jurasse putavit
Cui juras, audit: Sic es utrique reus.*

*Who does not mind what you do really swear,
But what the Person whom your Oath concerns
Did think you swore; so are you bound to both.*

In the Profession which the Jews in Spain make with an Oath, If you don't do it with the same Intention as I declare to you, your Words were heard and understood by us to mean. GROTIUS.

[4] Quod enim ita juratum est, ut mens (deferentis) conciperet fieri oportere, id servandum est. De Offic. Lib. III. Cap. XXIX. But CICERO there speaks of the Intention of the Person swearing, not of the Manner how the Terms of the Oath are understood by the Person who requires or administers the Oath. The Word deferentis, which was in the common Editions in our Author's Time, is not in the Manuscripts, nor in the best printed Copies. See my second Note on PUFENDORF, B. IV. Chap. II. § 15.

[5] Hist. Lib. IV. Cap. XLI. Num. 2.

[6] Epist. CCXXIV.

[7] Lib. XI. De summo bono, Cap. XXXI. 1. It is quoted, Caus. XXII. Quaest. V. C. quacumque. GROTIUS.

[8] DONATUS upon that Passage in the Fair Andrian,

*Quia si forte opus ad herum jure jurandum mihi,
Non apposuisse ut liquido possim. (IV. 3, 12.)*

Because if my Master puts me to swear whether I laid it there or no, I may do it with a safe Conscience. Liquido, that is, purè & manifestè, openly and plainly. NICETAS, in his Life of Alexius, blaming Andronicus Comnenus's Deceit, says, Χρεῶν μὴ ὑπονοθεύειν, &c. We ought not to adulterate our Words, by giving them another Turn, but to speak them freely in the Acceptation such Expressions bear. And the same Author, in another Place, speaking of Alexius, who caught at Words contrary to their Design and Meaning, Τοῖς ἔγμασι τούτοις ἐγκαθίσας, ὥς ἂν μυῖται τῷ μῶλωπι, Sticking on what was said, as Flies upon a Sore. The Court of Arcadius did very heinously offend against this Rule, which made a Person who had come to Constantinople, to be murdered at Chalcedon, tho' they had upon their Oaths promised him Safety. ZOZIMUS, Cap. V. Add to this what is below, Chap. XVI. § 2. GROTIUS.

Concerning this Manner of Speaking, liquido jurare, see DUAREN's Disput. annivers. Lib. I. Cap. II. Our Author, deceived by his Memory, ascribes to the Emperor Alexius, what NICETAS says of Andronicus Comnenus, who afterwards succeeded that Prince; and thinking at that Time to make himself Master of the Empire, endeavoured to elude the Force of the Oath of Allegiance which he had taken to the Emperor Manuel and his Son. In Alex. Lib. I. Cap. III. The other Passage here quoted, and this, are one and the same, tho' our Author has made two different Stories of them. The Transcribers, or Printers, have added a Fault of their own in the last Instance. The Edition of 1642 read Zozomenus, which has been since changed for Sozomenus; the Corrector thinking, no Doubt, he had thus mended a manifest Fault in the Impression. But the Fact is related by Zozimus, Lib. V. Cap. XVIII. Edit. Cellar. The Historian is there speaking of the Favourite Eutropius, as remarkable for his tragical End as for his surprizing Promotion.

[9] APPIAN, De Bell. Civil. Lib. I. p. 626. Edit. Toll. (368. H. Steph.)

[10] The Respect due to GOD certainly requires we should, as much as possible, avoid leaving any Thing to be understood in our Oaths; that other Men may have no Pretext for suspecting we are not very scrupulous in an Act of Religion like this. But, as our Author himself allows of certain Conditions, manifestly implied in the Nature of the Thing, Num. 5. there may be others, which, tho' not so clearly connected with the Thing to which one swears, as considered in itself, shall be such, that there may be very good Reason to believe, that the Case in Question did not come into the Person's Mind who swore, and that if he had thought of it he would not have sworn, why then should not such an Oath be void of itself, as well as a Promise made without an Oath? Our Author in this Place, and all along, reasons on a false Supposition, viz. that an Oath contains two distinct Obligations; and in some Measure changes the Nature of the Acts to which it is added; a Supposition destroyed in the Chapter of PUFENDORF already quoted, which answers to this.

[11] Our Author thus explains himself on this Passage, in his Annotations, "We say improperly a Person deceives (ψεύδεται) when another mistakes, for Want of understanding of what is said. Thus the Prophet Ezekiel deceived Zedekiah, when he told him he should not see Babylon. The King imagined he should never be carried Prisoner to that City; but he was carried thither blind; and thus did not see Babylon, which was the Prophet's Meaning."

[12] See Jonah iv. 2. The Council of Toledo VIII. Cap. II. For to swear, in GOD, is upon no Account whatever to alter what he himself has decreed; but to repent, is to change what he has ordained, whenever he pleases. GRATIAN has put this in Caus. XXII. Quaest. IV. But pray explain it as in our Text. GROTIUS.

[13] See SENECA, Natur. Quaest. XI. 37. GROTIUS.

[14] Add JOB xli. 1. HOSEA ix. 2. GROTIUS.

[1] As Hippolytus, whom we spoke of just now; upon that of SOPHOCLES in Oedipus Coloneus,

Ἄπᾶτα δ' ἄπᾶταις
Ἐτέραις ἑτέροι παρ᾽αβαλλόμενα
Πόνον οὐ χάριν ἀντίδοσιν ἔχει.

(Ver. 216, &c.)

*One Imposition upon another
Is not with Thanks but with Ruin paid.*

The Scholiast delivers himself thus, καὶ αὐτοὶ οὐ νομίζουσι, And they think themselves no Ways to blame for receiving him, and promising him Safety, since they did not know before that he laboured under any domestick Guilt. And to this Purpose is that Passage,

Ἢ γλῶσσά ὁμόμοχ', ἣ δε φρῆν ἀνόμοτος.

My Tongue 'twas swore, my Heart did nothing swear.

For he himself was deceived when he swore. GROTIUS.

In the third Verse here quoted from SOPHOCLES, the best Editions, as that of Stephens, read ὁ ντῖδωσιν ἔχειν. The Sense of the whole Passage I take to be this, He who exposes himself to the Danger of being fraudulently treated, by the Person whom he has treated in the same Manner, ought to expect to be repaid, not with Favours, but with Trouble and Mortification. But I leave this to the Judgment of the Learned.

[2] See PUFENDORF, § 7. of the Chapter already quoted, where he treats of an Oath.

[3] But see what I have said at large in Note 1 on the same Chapter.

[4] Yes, and if compared with the Reason subjoined to the Commaned of destroying them, Exod. xxiii. 33. Deut. vii. 4. For that Reason ceased in those who undertook to observe the Precepts of Noah's Sons, and pay Tribute. So MAIMONIDES and SAMSON MI-COSI, and MOSES DE KOTZI, in Praecep. juben. XV. and XVIII. are of Opinion. GROTIUS.

[5] And by an Instance in the Inhabitants of Gezer, in the History of JOSHUA xvi. 10. And that the Gergesenes, or Gezerites, remained till our Saviour's Days, appears from the Gospel, MATT. viii. 28. For these submitted at the very first, and therefore are not reckoned in the Catalogue of Enemies, Deut. xx. 17. Jos. ix. 1. GROTIUS.

No Reason is assigned why the Israelites did not drive out the Inhabitants of Gezer. Nor do we find any Account that the Gergesenes, or Gezerites, submitted at the very first. No Inference can be drawn from their being omitted in the Catalogue of Enemies; for we find such Omissions elsewhere; the sacred Historians sometimes speaking only of the most considerable of those Nations, under which the Rest were comprehended. See the late Mr. RELAND's Palaestina, Lib. I. Cap. XXVII.

[6] De Offic. III. Cap. X. GROTIUS.

[7] This Reason doth not hold good, for the Moment a Man is deceived in an Agreement, he is not guilty of Perfidiousness, if he doth not stand to what he had promised only on Supposition that he was not deceived.

[8] As were the Brutians formerly by the Romans. GELLIUS, X.3. FESTUS, in the Word Brutiani. GROTIUS.

[1] See what I have said on PUFENDORF, B. IV. Chap. II. § 13. Notes 1, 2, &c.

[2] JOSEPHUS says, (Antiq. Jud. Lib. V. Cap. II.) οὐτε προτοεπομένων, οὐτε κωλύόντων. Neither encouraging them to it, nor forbidding them. SENECA, Excerpt. VI. 2. He is obnoxious to the Law, who himself relieves an Exile; but not he who suffers him to be relieved. SYMMACHUS says, Why does he endeavour to scare a religious Mind with unjust and causeless Fears, because he asserts that you ought to make a Conscience of granting what you cannot take away again without rendering yourselves odious. (Lib. X. Epist. LIV.) GROTIUS.

The Words of SYMMACHUS are Part of a Petition to the Emperors Valentinian, Theodosius, and Arcadius, for obtaining Leave for the publick Exercise of Paganism, so that it is plain there is a Difference between the two Examples.

[3] Offic. Lib. III. Cap. XIV.

[4] LIVY, Lib. XXXIX. Cap. XXXVII Num. 21.

- [1] This Matter is handled very well by St. AMBROSE, De Offic. I. and some other Authors, from whom Passages are inserted in Caus. XXII. Quaest. IV. And to the same Purpose is the seventh Canon of the Council of Ilerda, in Concil. Gall. Tom. III. and many Things in HINCMAR'S Works. GROTIUS.
- [2] De specialibus Legibus. (p. 771. Edit. Paris.) GROTIUS.
- [3] He maintains, that Agamemnon ought not to have sacrificed Iphigenia, tho' he had made a Vow to sacrifice to Diana, the most beautiful Thing his Kingdom should produce that Year, and nothing exceeded his Daughter in Beauty. De Offic. Lib. IV. Cap. XXV.
- [4] It is in the Speech which that Historian makes Caius Claudius, Uncle to Appius, one of the Decemvirs, deliver in a full Senate. That Senator observes to the Decemvirs, that, supposing they were under a secret Obligation one to another, even by Oath, as perhaps they were, says he, not to resign their Office; they ought to consider, that such an Oath would be impious, as being contrary to the Liberty of the Citizens, and the Good of their Country; so that they would be so far from being guilty of Perjury, that they would do well in not standing to such an Engagement. For, he adds, the Gods are pleased with being called to witness just and honest Agreements, not such as are unjust and dishonest. Antiq. Rom. Lib. XI. Cap. XI. p. 662. Edit. Oxon.
- [5] Hercul. Oet. v. 480, 481.
- [6] Offic. Lib. I. Cap. I.
- [7] De bono Conjugali, Cap. IV. This is cited in the aforesaid Question. See too GALLIUS, De pace publica, Lib. I. Cap. IV. § 16. and the Story of Albinus, in PAUL WARNAFRED, Lib. XI. Cap. XXVI. GROTIUS.
- [1] See Note 1. on PUFENDORF, B. IV. Chap. II. § 10.
- [2] Such an Oath was that of Honorius, who swore that he would never make Peace with Alaric, as ZOSIMUS relates the Affair. See C. amongst several other Things in the above-mentioned Question, and the Council of Ilerda in Conc. Gall. Tom. III. Canon VII. and HINCMAR too in the aforesaid Treatise, at Interrog. XIV. L. De divortio, at Interrog. VI. and XIV. GROTIUS.
- [3] De specialib. Legib. p. 771.
- [4] See BABA KAMA, Cap. IX. § 10. and the learned CONSTANTINE'S Observations there. GROTIUS.
The Passage of Leviticus speaks of Oaths by which a Man rashly engages to do something in Favour of another, which it is not in his Power to promise, not of Oaths by which a Man swore not to do good to a Person. See Mr. LE CLERC'S Comment on the Text.
- [5] See this more at large in our Author's Notes on St. MATTHEW xv. 5. as also SELDEN, De Jure Nat. & Gent. secundum Hebraeos, Lib. VII. Cap. II.
- [1] He is obliged so to do as he would have been by a Promise made without an Oath. See Chap. XI. of this Book, § 8. Num. 4. Thus when the Patriarch Abraham sent his first Servant to Charan, making him swear he would fetch a Wife for his Son Isaac from that Country, who should be one of his own Kindred, he says, that if he found no one, who would come with him, he should be free from his Oath, Gen. xxiv. 8.

- [1] St. AMBROSE, to the Emperor Valentinian, What is Swearing but an Acknowledgment of his divine Power, whom you appeal to as a Witness of your Faith and Sincerity. See an excellent Form of Chaganus Avaror. in MENANDER's Excerpt. Legat. GROTIUS.
Some Doctors distinguish between taking GOD to witness and Swearing. See Mr. BOHMER's Jus Ecclesiasticum Protestantium, Lib. II. Tit. XXIV. § 3, &c. But they have not observed what our Author says here; which overthrows their whole System.
- [2] In their Treaty with the Albians, Lib. I. Cap. XXIV. Num. 8.
- [3] In the Promise made by Hannibal to his Soldiers, for encouraging them, Lib. XXI. Cap. XLV. Num. 8.
- [4] FESTUS, under the Word Lapis. POLYBIUS, Lib. III. Cap. XXV. p. 251. Edit. Amst.
- [1] De specialibus Legibus. GROTIUS.
- [2] EUSTATHIUS on Iliad. Lib. I. ver. 234.
- [3] APOLLONIUS, speaking of Socrates, in PHILOSTRATUS, VI. ἄμυνε τὰ ἄλλα οὐχ' ὡς θεοῦς, ὁλλ' ἵνα μὴ θεοῦς ἄγνυ. He swore by these Things, not as Gods, but that he might not swear by the Gods. GROTIUS.
- [4] In his Treatise De abstinentiâ Animal. where he says Rhadamanthus made a Law, ordering the Cretans to swear by Animals, Lib. III. p. 285, 286. Edit. Lugd. 1620. But the superstitious Philosopher attributes all this to the Respect which was paid, and which, according to him, ought to be paid to Animals; not to any Motive of reverencing the Divinity by swearing by other Things, to avoid using the Name of GOD too freely.
- [5] In the Comedy of the Birds; where, on the Authority of SOSICRATES, (not SOCRATES) an antient Writer of the History of Crete, he says, that Rhadamanthus, was the first who forbid swearing by the Gods; and ordered that his Subjects should swear by a Goose, a Dog, or a Ram, and such like Animals. On ver. 521.
- [6] Add 2 Kings iv. 30. Cant. ii. 7. GROTIUS.
- [7] OVID says this of Agamemnon, who swore he had taken no Liberties with Briseis, a young Captive whom he had taken from Achilles, Remed. Amoris. ver. 783, 784. This Oath is in HOMER, Iliad. XIX. ver. 258, &c. But Agamemnon there swears by Jupiter, the Earth, the Sun, and the Furies; not by his Scepter.
- [8] So does GRATIAN think, Caus. XXII. Quaest. I. GROTIUS.
- [9] For this he quotes THEOPHRASTUS, who, in his Treatise Of Laws, not now extant, said it was forbidden by the Tyrian Laws, to use the Forms of Oaths established in other Nations, and among others that called Corban. From which JOSEPHUS concludes that his Nation, and its Customs, were not unknown to other People, since that Sort of Oath was used only by the Jews, Lib. I. p. 1046, 1047.
- [10] But the Grammarians derive this from the Carians, a People of the Lesser Asia, whom HOMER calls Βαββαροφώνους, Iliad. II. v. 867. See ERASMUS's Adagia, under the Proverb Carica Musa. This Etymology is, at least, more plausible than that of our Author. The Grecians were not sufficiently acquainted with the Jews, to take from any Sort of Oath used by them, a Name to signify all the Eastern Nations. Besides, the Word Κάρβανοι, is found in AESCHYLUS, a Greek Author, who wrote long before the Vow called Corban was introduced; for we find no Mention of this Sort of Vow made in the sacred Writers. It is an Invention of later Ages, when the Doctors had several Ways corrupted the Doctrine of MOSES.

[11] In two different Places which GRONOVIVS quotes. One is in the Tragedy of Agamemnon, Σὺ δ' ἄντι φωνῆς φράζε καρβανφ χερί.

Ver. 1070. p. 208. Edit. H. Steph. The other in the Suppliants,

— — — Καρβάνα δ' ἀύδῶν

Ἐυαχοεῖς — — —

Ver. 124. p. 312. which the Scholiast explains thus, Νοεῖς καὶ τῆν βάρβαρον φωνήν. You understand that barbarous Word.

[12] I know not in what Part of EURIPIDES our Author found this Word. I doubt whether that Poet has used it at all. It does not appear in Mr. BARNES's Index, who, I think, would not have omitted a Word which occurs so seldom. Nor do I believe it is in SOPHOCLES. It is very possible that our Author, trusting to his Memory, has confounded what he had read in LYCOPHRON, from whom a Passage is quoted, where he uses that Word.

[13] Apolog. Cap. XXXII. XII.

[1] Wisdom, Chap. XIV. Οὐ γὰρ ἡ τῶν ὁμνυμένων δύναμις, ἀλλ' ἡ τῶν ἁμαρτανόντων δίκη ἐπεξέρχεται, ἡεὶ τῆν τῶν ἁδίκων παρὰβασιν. Which the Latin Translator turns thus, Non enim Juratorum virtus, sed Peccantium poena perambulat semper Injustorum praevaricationem. It is not the Power of them they swear by, but the Vengeance which constantly pursues Sinners, that always haunts and attends the Frauds and Collusion of the unjust and perjured. GROTIUS.

[2] Our Author, in a Note on the apocryphal Book last quoted, applies this to a Passage of SENECA, quoted Chap. XX. of this Book, § 51. Note 6.

[3] In his Commentary on the Title of the Digest. De Jurejurando. But ZIEGLER here justly observes that our Author has mistaken the Sense of that learned Lawyer, who only allows of tendering an Oath to a Turk, for Example, tho' it is well known he will swear by Mahomet. See DUAREN's first Treatise, De Jurejurando, Cap. XI. Tom. I. Opp. Edit. Lugd. 1579. p. 235, and the other Treatise on the same Subject, Cap. IV. Tom. II p. 11. As to the Question itself, consult what I have said on PUFENDORF, B. IV. Chap. II. § 4. Note 2. second Edition.

[4] Sermon XXVIII. De verbis Apostoli; it is quoted, C. Ecce dico, Caus. XXII. Quæst. V. GROTIUS.

[1] De Legis. Allegor. Lib. II. p. 99. Edit Paris.

[2] PROCOPIUS PERSIC. Ὅρκους ὁ τῶν ἐν ἀνθρώποις, &c. An Oath, which is looked upon by all Mankind to be the last and strongest Pledge of mutual Faith and Veracity. GROTIUS.

[3] Antiq. Rom. Lib. VI. Cap. LXXXIV. p. 319. Edit. Oxon. (406. Sylburg.)

[4] DIODORE of Sicily, Bibliothec. Lib. I. Cap. LXXVII. p. 49. Edit. H. Steph.

[5] The Passage of CHRYSIPPUS is preserved by STOBÆUS, Serm. XXVIII. p. 196. Edit. Genev. 1609. Our Author has quoted and explained it, in his Notes on St. MATTHEW v. 33. But this is at the Bottom no more than a Dispute about Words, of which Sort we have a great Deal in Stoick Philosophy.

- [6] This false Swearing is forbidden. Exod. xx. 11. And the Perjury, Levit. xix. 12. as the Hebrews assert, praecep. jubent. CCXL. GROTIUS.
- [1] St. AUSTIN, in his 224th and 225th Epistles, tells us, that an Oath, tho' we were drawn into it by Force, ought in Reverence to GOD to be kept. GROTIUS.
See PUFENDORF, B. IV. Chap. II. § 8. I might here add, that, if our Author's Hypothesis, in Regard to the double Obligation he conceives in Promises made with an Oath was well grounded, I do not see how he could say, as he does below, § 20. that a Superior has a Power to annul such Sort of Oaths. For, since the present Question is not concerning Things in themselves unlawful, I should think a Superior could not make void an Obligation contracted towards GOD, nor even hinder it being contracted, unless GOD had declared his Will to renounce his Right, if I may use the Expression.
- [2] See JEREMIAH xxxix. 5. EZEKIEL xvii. 12, 13, 15. GROTIUS.
- [3] This Example is of no Service toward establishing our Author's Hypothesis. For, first, according to his own Principles, every Treaty made with a Conqueror, even without an Oath, is valid by the Law of Nations, how unjust soever the Fear was by which the Person was obliged to make it. See B. III. Chap. XIX. § 11. So that the Oath which bound the Treaty between King Zedekiah and Nebuchadnezzar, would only have rendered the Violation of that Treaty more criminal. Secondly, Zedekiah probably designed to swear truly, and considered the Treaty as good and valid; as he would have done that which he might have extorted, by the Superiority of his Arms, from a People on whom he had no more Right to make War, than the King of Babylon had to fall on his Dominions. So that no Consequence can be drawn from thence, against such as have no Design of Swearing truly, and do not think themselves obliged to stand to an Agreement where Force is employed. Thirdly, GOD had declared to Zedekiah, by his Prophets, that he required that Prince should religiously stand to what he had promised the King of Babylon; against whom he could not rebel without the highest Imprudence.
- [4] That Tribune having accused Lucius Manlius of holding the Dictatorship beyond the Time prescribed by the Laws, the Dictator's Son, afterwards surnamed Torquatus, went to Pomponius, and finding him alone, swore he would kill him if he would not promise on Oath, not to molest his Father. Whereupon Pomponius desisted; to which the People consented, as soon as they knew his Reason. De Offic. Lib. III. Cap. XXXI. See LIVY, Lib. VII. Cap. V. and POLYBIUS, Lib. VI. Cap. LVI.
- [5] But our Author himself elsewhere maintains, that such Promises are valid in their own Nature, and independently of an Oath, B. III. Chap. XXIII. § 6.
- [6] Those ten Prisoners who returned to Hannibal's Camp for one Moment, under Pretence of having forgot something, thereby committed a Fraud, which would have rendered them guilty of a Violation of Fidelity, even though they had not sworn. See B. III. Chap. XXIII. § 13.
- [1] GREGORAS, εἰς θεὸν ἡ ἐπιπορκία τὸ τῆς περιφρονησεως ἀνατίθησιν ἔγκλημα. Perjury charges GOD with Negligence. GROTIUS.
- [2] De Offic. Lib. III. Cap. XXIX.
- [3] De Offic. Lib. III. Cap. VI.
- [4] De Bell. Civil. Lib. II. p. 838. Edit. Amst. (515. H. Steph.)
- [5] PLUTARCH, in his Lysander, ὁ ᾧρκῶ παραρκουόμενος, &c. He who deceives his Enemy by an Oath, confesses that he fears him, but despises GOD. GROTIUS.

- [6] It is called so only improperly. For there is in Reality a wide Difference between a Vow and an Oath. See PUFENDORF, B. IV. Chap. II. § 8. Votum fit Deo; Juramentum per Deum, says our Author himself, in his Notes on Numbers xxx. 3.
- [7] Digest. Lib. XVI. Tit. III. Depositi, &c. Leg. XXXI. § 1. And to an Usurper too, as the Prienenses did to Orofernes. POLYBIUS and DIODORUS SICULUS, in Excerpt. Peires. GROTIUS.
- [8] In that Case, and others of the same Kind, we do not deal with a Thief considered as such, and as using Extortion; but as with any other Person. We renounce our Right to taking an Advantage of the infamous Character of such a Contractor.
- [9] LESSIUS is quoted for this Opinion, Lib. II. De Justitiâ & Jure, Cap. XLII. Num. 27.
- [10] This is the Fact mentioned at the Close of the preceding Paragraph. LIVY gives us the following Account of it. One of them, (the Captives) returned home, imagining he had satisfied his Oath by returning privately. As soon as the Thing was known, it was laid before the Senate; who unanimously voted he should be seized, put under a Guard, and carried back to Hannibal. Lib. XXII. Cap. LXI. Num. 4. See AULUS GELLIUS, Noct. Attic. Lib. VII. Cap. XVIII.
- [1] In CICERO, De Offic. Lib. III. Cap. XXVIII.
- [2] C. pervenit. III. de jure jurando. Add L. lege fundo, in fine D. de lege commissoria. GROTIUS.
- [3] De Bell. Punic. Lib. VI. v. 63, 64.
- [4] This is grounded only on the false Supposition of two distinct Obligations in Promises made by an Oath. The Truth is, the Moment it appears there is a real Inequality, to which Consent was not given, the Oath falls of itself. See PUFENDORF, in the Chapter often quoted, § 11.
- [5] Psal. xv. 4. Our Author, in his Note on this Text, gives a different Explication of the Word, which he here renders Tho' it were to his own Detriment. Having observed, that the Vulgate Latin has followed the LXXII. Interpreters, who read as if the original Word had been עלרר, To his Neighbour, instead of להרע, he only says, others translate, He who hath sworn to afflict himself, (that is, has made a Vow to fast) and doth not fail to keep his Vow. But if we follow the common Translation, Tho' it were to his own Detriment, there is no Necessity of understanding this as spoken of Promises bound by an Oath, in which there is an Inequality sufficient of itself to render them null. It is well known that several Persons are tempted to break their Word, even tho' given under Oath, when they cannot keep it, without suffering some Inconvenience or Loss, which they did not foresee, tho' it be not such as forms a reasonable Exception to the Obligation contracted. He, who resists such a Temptation, may be justly called a good Man, such as the Psalmist describes.
- [1] See PUFENDORF, in the Chapter answering to this, § 17. with the Notes in the second Edition.
- [1] PLAUTUS, in his Ruden, I beg that you would discharge him from his Oath. (Act. V. Scen. III. v. 58, 59.) GROTIUS.
- [2] See to the same Purpose in L. Si duas, § Gentium, D. de excusat. tut. and in GAILLIUS, II. Obs. CXLIV. Num. 8. and de Arrestis, X. 9. and in AZORIUS's Moral Institutions, V. 22. Qu. 6. Part 1. GROTIUS.
- [3] De Bello Civil. Lib. II. Cap. XXXII.

[4] Ibid.

[1] That is, if a Person has only sworn not to do a certain Thing, as not to marry; or to give somewhat, without actually transferring his Right to it. See PUFENDORF, B. IV. Chap. II. § 11.

[2] As when we give or mortgage a Thing to a Person, which was before given, or mortgaged, to another, by an Act, accompanied with an Oath, Mr. VITRIARIUS, in his Institut. Juris Nat. & Gent. Lib. II. Cap. XIII. § 28. brings the Example of a Prince, who, making a Treaty of Alliance with another, has sworn to conclude no such Treaty with any Person whatever, and afterwards should enter into an Alliance with a third.

[1] St. AUGUSTIN, Epist. CCXL. and CCXLI. GROTIUS.

[2] De Benefic. Lib. IV. Cap. XXXV. On this Question see PUFENDORF's Law of Nature and Nations, B. IV. Chap. II. § 24. and what I have said on the Abridgment of The Duties of a Man and a Citizen, B. I. Chap. XI. § 6. Note 3. in the third and fourth Editions.

[3] SÜETONIUS, in his Tiberius, XXV. And so it was in Spain for a great While, as is observed by FERDINAND VASQUES, de Success. creat. Lib. II. Sect. 18. GROTIUS.

SÜETONIUS there speaks of a certain Roman Knight, who had sworn never to repudiate his Wife; but on his surprizing her in the Fact with her Son-in-Law, the Emperor discharged him from his Oath. In the same Manner the Emperors Antoninus and Verus dispensed with the Oath of a Man who had sworn never to accept of any publick Post, and was afterwards created Duumvir. Digest. Lib. L. Tit. I. Ad Municipalem, &c. Leg. ult. The Fact which relates to Spain, is not in the Section of VASQUEZ, quoted by our Author, tho' it treats of scarce any Thing but Cases where an Oath intervenes. I have in vain sought for it in several other Parts of that large Work, where he might have had Occasion to speak of absolving from Oaths. What farther inclines me to doubt whether there is any Thing like it, is, that the late Mr. HERTIUS, in a Note on PUFENDORF, B. IV. Chap. II. § ult. tells us, that the Kings of Spain, as well as those of France, do at this Day absolve their Subjects from Oaths, for just Reasons. He does not, indeed, produce any Vouchers for what he advances; and I have not Time at present to examine the Matter more particularly.

[4] See Note 3. on PUFENDORF, B. IV. Chap. II. § 24. It is on popish Principles that some Protestant Doctors, even at this Day, pretend, that if Princes have a Power to dispense with the Oaths of their Subjects, they have it not as Princes, but as invested with the Right of Bishops; as Mr. BOHMER observes, in his Jus Ecclesiasticum Protestantium, Lib. II. Tit. II. § 30. See also what he says, Tit. XXIV. § 23, &c. concerning other Things, in which the Protestants in this Case imprudently follow the Principles of the Canon Law.

[5] If he had acquired no Right, the Oath is void of itself; so that there is no Need of a Dispensation.

[6] A Criminal, for Example, is assured of something on Oath; a young Woman has promised to marry him. The Sovereign may deprive that Criminal of a Right of claiming such a Promise, tho' bound with an Oath.

[7] A Man, for Instance, has sworn to pay another in such a Time, a Sum that he owes him. It happens that the State has Occasion to employ the Debtor in the Wars, or some other Way; and that he could not be useful to the State, were he obliged to pay his Debt at the Time fixed. In such Case the State deprives the Creditor of his Right to demand the Payment.

[8] The Sovereign of him who has sworn, not being able directly to deprive the Person in whose Favour the Oath was taken, and who does not depend on him, of the Right he has thereby acquired, may, for good Reasons, discharge his own Subject from his Oath. And the other has no Reason to complain, when the Discharge is granted for just Reasons; because he knew, or ought to have known, that the Person who has sworn, could oblige himself only as far as his Sovereign should think proper, in such Things as are subject to his Direction. On the contrary, the Sovereign of him to whom the Oath was taken, cannot discharge him who took it, and whom we suppose not to depend on him. But he may deprive his own Subject of the Right which he had acquired by such an Oath; which, in the Main, comes to the same as if he who swore was discharged from his Oath.

[9] He has no Need of it; since the Oath is null of itself.

[10] This Reason is good, when there is nothing that can hinder a Man from contracting a real Obligation by Swearing. But when the Engagement is null, the Words of the Oath ought to have no Effect.

[11] See PUFENDORF, B. V. Chap. XI. § 6.

[12] Our Author here seems to follow the common Opinion, grounded on a Law of the Code, Lib. II. Tit. XXVIII. Si adversus venditionem, Leg. I. where the Emperor Alexander Severus refuses the Benefit of Restitution in Integre, to a Minor, engaged in the Army, on Account of the Oath by which he had confirmed a Sale, made to his own Prejudice. But that Law contains only a Rescript in Regard to a particular Case; nor doth it speak of all Sorts of Oaths, but of an Oath taken in Person (Juramentum corporaliter praestitum. See PUFENDORF, B. IV. Chap. II. § 16.) which was considered as having more Force than one taken by Writing or by Proxy, &c. There might likewise be some particular Circumstances in that Case, either in Regard to the Person pretending to be injured, or in Regard to the Injury itself which determined the Emperor to make the Oath stand good, without designing to establish a general Rule, contrary to the Civil Law, according to which an Oath has no more Force than a single Contract. But MARTIN, a scholastick Lawyer, mistaking the Sense of this Rescript, persuaded the Emperor Frederick II. to join to it a Constitution, which extended this Exception of an Oath to all Contracts in general, made by Minors, at the Age of Puberty, as Mr. SCHULTING very well observes, Enar. partisprimae Digest. in Tit. De Minoribus, &c. § 3. See also CUJAS, on the Title of the Code, under which this Rescript appears, and PUFENDORF, as above quoted, § 11. All this is derived from the Authority of the Canon Law, which, without having any Regard to the Civil Laws, by which an Act is declared null, teaches that the Oath joined to it, renders it valid, of what Nature soever it be. See Note 3. on PUFENDORF, B. IV. Chap. II. § 19. Second Edition, and Mr. BOHMER's Jus Ecclesiasticum, Lib. II. Tit. XXIV. § 23, &c.

[1] Rom. i. 9. ix. 1. 2 Cor. i. 23. xi. 31. Phil. i. 8. 1 Thess. ii. 5. 1 Tim. ii. 7. GROTIUS.

[2] VIRGIL, Eclog. VII. v. 70.

[3] Our Author has quoted this Example, either from AQUILA ROMANUS, an antient Rhetorician, who gives it in the very Words here set down, p. 19. Antiq. Rhet. Lat. Edit. Pithaei. or from MARTIANUS CAPELLA, p. 174.

[4] Words used in replying to a Stipulation. See Digest. Lib. XXXII. De Legatis & Fideicomm. III. Leg. XXXIX. § 1. and Lib. XLV. Tit. I. De verborum obligat. Leg. I. § 2.

[5] See BUXTORF's Florilegium Hebraicum, p. 329.

[6] You had better in this Passage of FESTUS write it οὐκί, as it is often in HOMER, for this comes nearer the Word Nauci. GROTIUS.

[7] De Decalogo. GROTIUS.

[8] De specialibus legibus. GROTIUS.

[9] Antiq. Jud. Lib. II. Cap. VII.

[10] For Hermippus, the Pythagorean, as ORIGEN against CELSUS (Lib. I.) asserts, said that Pythagoras's Philosophy was derived from the Jews. And both JOSEPHUS and JAMBlichus the Pythagorean have ascribed it to the Hebrews. GROTIUS.

The Passage of JOSEPHUS is in B. I. against Apion. But Mr. LE CLERC, with great Probability, conjectures, that HERMIPPUS wrote ἰδαίων, where we now read ἰουδαίων. See his Bibliothèque choisie, Tom. X. p. 162, &c. Our Author quotes JAMBlichus, but his Memory deceives him. He has confounded that Author, who says nothing like what he ascribes to him, with another Philosopher of the same Sect, whose Life of Pythagoras is printed in the same Volume; I mean PORPHYRY, who makes Pythagoras travel among the Jews, as well as the Aegyptians, Arabians, and Chaldeans, Num. 11. Edit. Kust. Whereas JAMBlichus speaks only of his going into Aegypt and Syria, Lib. I. Cap. III. IV.

[11] DIOGENES LAERTIUS, Lib. VIII. §22.

[12] PHILO, Ἦδη γὰρ ὅτε ὁμνῶς, &c. For he who is put to his Oath, is suspected of being false to his Word. (De Decalog.) In SOPHOCLES's Oedip. Colon. Oedipus has expressed himself thus,

Οὔτοι σ' ὑφ' ὄρκου γ' ὡς κακὸν πιστώσομαι

I won't require your Oath, as I would a Rascal's.

(ver. 642.)

Theseus replies,

Οὔκουν πέρα γ' ἂν οὐδὲν ἢ λόγῳ φέροις

Nor if you did, would you've more than my bare Word.

(ver. 643.)

M. ANTONIN, in his Description of a good Man; Μῆτε ὄρκου δέμμενος, One who has no Occasion to swear, (Lib. III. § 5.) St. CHRYSOSTOM, De Statuis. XV. Εἰ μὲν πιστεύεις, &c. If you believe that he is an honest Fellow, do not lay him under the Necessity of an Oath; and if you know he is a Rogue, do not force him to be perjured. GROTIUS.

[13] Footnote number missing in text, supplied from Latin edition. Lib. VII. Cap. VIII. Num. 28.

[14] DIOGENES LAERTIUS, Lib. I. § 60.

[15] Stromat. Lib. VII. Cap. VIII. p. 861. Edit. Potter.

[16] St. CHRYSOSTOM very well animadverts upon this, in his twelfth De Statuis, Ὅτι κῆν μὴ συναρπασθεῖς μηδὲ ἄκων, &c. Tho' you did it without Compulsion, Passion, or Inconsiderateness, yet sometimes from the very Nature of the Thing will you be forced, with your Consent and Knowledge, to forswear yourself. And presently after, Σφαλέρῳ μὲν οὖν, &c. It is dangerous for a Man even to swear to what relates to himself. For we are often in Circumstances, wherein we are forced to do what we would not, or unable to do what we would. GROTIUS.

- [1] This is mentioned by EUSTATHIUS, upon the 24th Odyss. ARISTOPHANES's Scholiast, ad Nubes, (v. 81.) CRANTZIUS, Saxon. XI. 27. In C. Ad Aures de his quae vi metúsve causâ aequantur Juramentum & Fides interposita. GROTIUS.
- [2] Footnote number missing in text, supplied from Latin edition. DIODORUS SICULUS, Biblioth. Histor. Lib. XVI. Cap. XLIII. p. 533. Edit. H. Steph. As to the Persians, see the President BRISSON, De Regno Persico, p. 107, &c. and Lib. II. p. 270. Edit. Sylburg. Another still more remarkable Passage might have been quoted from the Scholiast on ARISTOPHANES. The Poet, in his Acharnenses, v. 307. makes the Chorus say, that the Lacedemonians keep neither Altars, Faith, nor Oath sacred. Whereupon the Scholiast says, that Treaties and Alliances were made in three different Manners; by Words, by Actions, and by the Hands. By Words, As when the Parties were sworn. By Actions, When Sacrifices were offered. By the Hands, when the Contractors joined their right Hands, which was called Giving their Faith. After which he quotes a Passage from HOMER, (Iliad. Lib. II. v. 341.) Nothing is more common among the Antients than the Custom under Consideration; and several modern Writers have quoted great Numbers of Passages on the Subject. Among others, see EVERHARD FEITHIUS, Antiq. Homeric. Lib. IV. Cap. XVII. MARTIN KEMPIUS, De Osculis, Dissert. XVII. § 2. with our Author's Notes on ZACHARY xiv. 13. TOBIT vii. 16.
- [3] Thus in Holland, where there are Mennonites, who, misunderstanding some Passages of the New Testament, think the Use of an Oath absolutely prohibited by the Gospel, the Magistrates require of that Sect only a bare Affirmation, which in Regard of them is as Binding as an Oath, and subjects them to the Penalties inflicted for Perjury, if they lie or falsify their Faith. See Mr. HUBER's Praelect. Jur. Civil. Tom. II. in Tit. De Jurejurando, p. 335. Edit. Thomas.
- [4] ISOCRATES speaking of Evagoras, King of Salamis, Ὀμοίως τὰς, &c. He kept his Word and Promise as religiously as his Oaths. SYMMACHUS, X.19. Nothing is more to be depended on, than the Promises of Princes. And NICETAS of Alexius, Brother of Isaac, Lib. III. βασιλεῦσι παρὰ πᾶν, &c. Kings ought above any other Consideration to have the greatest Regard to the punctual Discharge of their Oaths. CICERO, for Cornelius Balbus, They say at Athens, that when one of their People, who was a Man of known Probity, had given in his publick Evidence, and (as it is a Custom among the Greeks ) was coming to the Altar to confirm it upon his Oath, all the Judges unanimously cried out, that he should not swear. GROTIUS.
- [5] This is related by PLUTARCH, Eumenes, being solicited to abandon Perdiccas, replied he would sooner lose his Life than violate his Promise to that General. Vit. Eumen. Tom. I. p. 585. Edit. Wech.
- [6] Lib. III. ver. 510, &c. where the Poet puts these Words in the Mouth of Frederick Barbarossa.
- [7] Politic. Lib. III. Cap. XIV. p. 357. Tom. II. Edit. Paris.
- [1] BODIN's Words, which our Author has not quoted very exactly, are these "But is not the Prince subject to the Laws of the Land, which he has sworn to observe? We must distinguish. If the Prince takes an Oath to himself, to observe his own Laws, he is not obliged by those Laws, nor by the Oath taken to himself; for even the Subject is not bound by the Oath he takes in these Contracts, from which the Law allows him to depart, tho' they are honest and reasonable. If a Sovereign Prince promises another to observe the Laws made by him or his Predecessors, he is obliged to observe them, if the Interest of the Prince, to whom the Promise is made, be concerned, even though he took no Oath. But if the Prince, to whom the Promise is made, has no Interest in the Affair, neither the Promise nor the Oath can bind the Person promising. The same may be said, when a Promise is made to a Subject by a Sovereign Prince, even before his Election; for in that Case there is no Difference, as several imagine. Not that the Prince is obliged by his own Laws, or those of his Predecessors, but only by the just Agreements and Promises, by him made either with or without an Oath, in the same manner as a private Person would be. And for the same Reasons that a private Person may be released from an unjust and unreasonable Promise, or one that proves too burthensome to him; or in Case he has been circumvented by Fraud, Mistake, Force, or a just Fear, so as to sustain a very considerable Damage; for the same Reasons, a Prince may insist on Restitution in whatever affects the Diminution of his Dignity, if he is a Sovereign Prince. And thus our Maxim holds good, that the Prince is not subject to his own Laws, nor to these of his Predecessors, but only obliged by his just and reasonable Agreements, in which the Subjects in general or in particular are interested. Several Persons mistake in this Case, by confounding the Laws with the Contracts of Princes, which they call Laws, &c.” Hence it is evident that this learned Politician doth not suppose that the Restitution in Integrum, which he grants to a Prince, acting either as a Sovereign, or as a private Person, is founded on the Civil Laws. He certainly draws it from natural Equity; and herein he is Right, whatever our Author may say, who has been justly censured on that Score by his Commentators. See ZIEGLER, on this Place; and PUFENDORF, B. VIII. Chap. X. § 2, &c. BODIN had also good Reason for considering the Oath as having no proper Force to oblige, independently of the Quality of the Act, to which it is added; on which Point our Author has been sufficiently confuted, as I have observed on the preceding Chapter.

[2] That is, if the Community or Body of the State, as such, doth something contrary to the Laws, it has made, if, for Example, they treat in a Manner not conformable to those Laws, the Engagement would not be less valid; because by establishing such Laws as the Rule of Contracts between private Persons, they did not tie up their own Hands. See Chap. IV. of this Book, § 12. Num. 1.

[3] It doth in some Respects only, as in Regard to the Time, Manner, and Extent of such Restitution; and thus it may take Place, without supposing a Superior who grants it.

[4] Or if the Contract has been duly authorized by his Guardians, acting honestly. But otherwise all the Difference between a King in his Minority, and private Persons of the same Age, is that the Time of his Minority is commonly shorter. See the Passage of PUFENDORF, quoted in Note 1. and the late Mr. HERTIUS’S Dissertation, De Tutelâ Regiâ, Sect. II. § 12. p. 478, Tom. I. Commentat. & Opuscul.

[1] Those, with whom a King treats, may, and commonly do know how far his Power extends in that Respect, by Virtue of the Fundamental Laws of the State. So that in this Case, it is their own Fault if they are not assured of the Consent of the People.

[2] It is imagined our Author here had his Eye on Philip II. King of Spain, who, in 1596, abolished all the Debts contracted in his Name, and seized on all the Assignments, which had been given to his Creditors. But the same Prince, two Years after, recalled his Ordinance, and restored his Creditors to their full Right. “By the new Agreement made with them he declared and openly confessed that the aforesaid Merchants and Traders had dealt fairly and honestly with him, and laid the whole Fault on himself and his own extreme Necessity.” These are the very Words of EMANUEL DE METEREN, in his History of the Low Countries, B. XVIII. at the End. See the following Book, Fol. 417. of the old French Translation, published at the Hague in 1618.

[3] Footnote number missing in text, supplied from French edition. In Case of a Doubt, it ought to be presumed that the King, who treats as a private Person, doth it on the Foot of the Laws in Being. For, since he himself made, or at least, tacitly confirmed those Laws, he thereby acknowledged them to be just, and advantageous to the State. So that, it is his Duty to maintain them by his own Example; and he may consequently be judged to design to act by them himself, whenever he doth not very clearly testify his Intention of making Use of his Right, as Sovereign, and setting himself above the Laws, which derive their Authority from him.

[4] It is certain it cannot, properly speaking, be said that any one punishes or constrains himself; and if that Expression is sometimes used, it is one of those figurative Ways of speaking which are authorized by Practice in all Languages. Even tho' Punishment did not require two distinct Persons, it cannot easily be presumed that any Man would inflict it on himself. However, as the Laws which annul any Act by Way of Punishment of the Contractor, commonly suppose some Knavery, or some other culpable Disposition in that Contractor, and the Publick suffers some Detriment by the Thing itself; why should the Prince, who enjoys the Benefit of the Laws, made in Favour of the Contractor, be allowed to violate those made for punishing the Contractor, that is to set the bad Example of doing Things contrary to Justice or Publick Good? If therefore any one has, in the King's Name or by his Authority, entered into a Contract liable to be made void for the Reason last mentioned, or if he himself has so done knowingly and willingly; ought he not, in the former Case, to disclaim those who have acted as by his Order, and retract what he has done in the latter? Thus the Law will take Place in Regard to him, without prejudicing his Independence, and without any other Inconvenience. The Act, by which he submits to it, will not be a Punishment, properly so called, much less a Constraint. It will be only a Declaration by which he voluntarily retracts what he had done without considering well on it. He will thereby only discharge his Duty, in the same Manner as when he stands to an Engagement, into which he entered as a Private Person, conformably to the Laws in Being; tho' no Man can force him to it.

[1] See the foregoing Chapter, § 19.

[2] Consequenter; that is, so as to annul, by an Effect of his Will, an Oath, which would otherwise have been good and valid. See the foregoing Chapter, § 20. Mr. VITRIARIUS, in his Institut. Jur. Nat. & Gent. Lib. II. Cap. XIV. Num. 8. says, that a King may likewise make void his Oath by a posterior Act, when there is just Cause for so doing. But this just Cause is such only because it was tacitly included in the Oath, as a Condition for rendring it invalid. See § 12. Num. 3. of this Chapter.

[3] This is a false Supposition, which we have rejected several Times.

[1] EMPHYTEUSIS. The Interpreters of the Roman Law are not agreed that it is essential to this Contract, that the Grant should be made in Writing; and it is very probable that those who deny it are in the Right. At least this is not practised at present in several Nations, as our Author himself tells us in Regard to his own Country, in his Introduction to the Law of Holland, written in Flemish, B. II. Chap. XL. See CUJAS, on the Title of the Code, De Jure Emphyteutico, with FABROT's Notes, Tom. II. Opp. p. 165. and Recit. in Cod. Tit. De Pactis, Tom. IX. p. 101. As also VINNIUS on the Institutes, Lib. III. Tit. XXV. De Locatione & Conductione, § 3. and Mr. COCCEIUS's Jus controversum Civile, Tom. I. p. 443, 444.

[2] That is, without a Stipulation in Form.

[1] Concerning this Distinction, see what PUFENDORF says, B. III. Chap. IV. §5.

- [2] Code, Lib. VI. Tit. L. Ad Legem Falcidiam, Leg. I. That Law, to which our Author refers, speaks of an Heir, who being well assured that three Fourths of the Estate will not discharge the Legacies, and that he might retrench from them as much as would make up the fourth Part which is his Due, yet pays the entire Legacies; and is thereby supposed to renounce his Right, and make the Legatees a Present of what might lawfully be detained. See CUJAS. Tom. X. Opp. p. 536, 537, and ANTHONY FAURE's Rational. Tom. III. p. 328, &c. So that it contains nothing relating to what the Roman Lawyers call Condictio indebiti, or a Demand of what is not due; for that Action takes Place only when a Man has by Mistake paid what he thought he owed. But the Case, which our Author means, is commonly found in Law IX. of the same Title of the Code; though the Lawyer last quoted pretends that Law speaks of the Trebellianic fourth Part; not to mention the celebrated Question concerning Error of the Fact; which will ever be a Problem in the Civil Law.
- [3] Digest. Lib. XII. Tit. VI. De Conditione indebiti, Leg. XIX. That Law has chiefly in View the Case of a Son, who, becoming his own Master, has paid what he borrowed, while under another's Power, which he might have refused by Vertue of the Macedonian Senatus consultum. This appears from Law XL. of the same Title. But that there never is a natural Obligation, properly so called, as our Author supposes, if the Example be to the Purpose, is not true. See what I have said on PUFENDORF, B. III. Chap. VI. § 4. Note 5. But if, with GRONOVIVS, we here apply the Case of an Out-law, or Criminal, whose Goods have been confiscated, the same Distinction must be employed, which I have made in Regard to a Depositum, placed in the Hands of such a Person, in my Comment. on PUFENDORF, B. IV. Chap. XIII. § 4. Note 5. the Second Edition.
- [4] Digest. Lib. V. Tit. III. De hereditatis petitione, Leg. XXV. § 11. It cannot be certainly inferred from this Law, which our Author quotes after others, that, according to the Roman Laws, the Duty of Gratitude is one of those natural Obligations which hinder a Man from redemanding a Thing given by Mistake, as if really due. As to the Question in general, on which the Doctors are divided, the contrary Opinion to that here espoused by our Author seems best supported. See HUGH DONEL, Comment. Jur. Civil. Leg. XII. Cap. II.
- [5] Concerning the Signification of the word ἡδὴ. See Mr. LE CLERC's Commentary on Genesis xxi. 23.
- [6] To this belongs what is done upon no other View or Account, but only the mere Exercise of our Liberality and Munificence, as the Law expresses it, 1. D. de donationibus, ἡδὴ ἡσότης ἐκ πηγῆς πλουσίας ἀπορέει τῆς ἡμερότητος, Generosity flows from the rich Fountain of Good Nature. PLUTARCH in his Cato Major. GROTIUS.
- [7] For the Sense of those three Greek Words, consult our Author and Dr. HAMMOND on the Passage of the Evangelist. Our Author lets us know in this Place that he takes the Gospel of St. MATTHEW as we now have it, to be a Translation. He was of Opinion, as appears from the Notes on the New Testament, that the Evangelist wrote in Hebrew, or the Language then spoken at Jerusalem; in which he is joined by a great Number of Authors, whose Reasons may be seen in Mr. DUPIN's Preliminary Dissertation on the Bible, Tom. II. p. 23, &c. Edit. Holland. Dr. MILL likewise undertakes to shew the same in his Prolegomena to the New Testament. But it is highly probable that the pretended Original Hebrew, so often mentioned by the antient Fathers, who were but indifferent Critics, is a mere Chimera. See Mr. LE CLERC's Dissertation De Auctoribus Evangeliorum, and his Evangelical Harmony, § 1. with his Preface to the Gospel of St. MATTHEW, in his Translation of the New Testament, printed at Berlin.

- [1] See PUFENDORF, B. VIII. Chap. V. § 7.
- [1] See below, B. III. Chap. XX. § 9.
- [2] For Foreigners, while they live in the Country, are to be considered as Subjects of the State. See Chap. II. of this Book, § 5. and Chap. XI. § 5.
- [3] Some maintain the contrary; and that, because, as our Author himself has said Chap. II. of this Book, § 10 it is lawful, in Case of Necessity, to seize and make use of the Property of Foreigners. But then it is done by Vertue of the general Right, which Necessity gives to all Men; not by Vertue of the Sovereign Dominion, which supposes the Person thus distressed a Subject. I find Mr. VANDER MUELEN confutes the learned GRONOVIVS on this Head.
- [1] As, if by Vertue of a Treaty of Commerce, the Subjects are obliged to deliver certain Goods or Commodities at a certain Price to the Subjects of another Nation, with which the King makes this Treaty.
- [1] See the Authors quoted by REINKINGIUS, Lib. I. Clas. III. Chap. X. GROTIUS.
- [2] See PUFENDORF, B. VIII. Chap. X. § 8. and what our Author has said, Chap. VII. § 19. of this Book.
- [3] See Chap. XXI. of this Book, § 19.
- [1] See AYMONIUS published by Freber, p. 373. GROTIUS.
- [2] Thus Solomon was not obliged by the Promise which David had made to Shimei. GROTIUS. See 1 Kings ii. 9. and what PUFENDORF says, B. IV. Chap. II. § 13.
- [3] See several Things to this Purpose, C. I. De solutionibus. It comes nearer to the Matter in Hand, what is mentioned, C. ABB. de Sententiis & re judicata; where there are these remarkable Words, When both the Donation of the above said Grandfather, and the Acquisition of the abovementioned Places were made in the Name of the Kingdom. See too TREUTL. Part I. Disp. VI. Thes. VII. Syr. de pace religionis, Concl. XIX. GROTIUS.
- [1] Agreeable to this is what CAMDEN has, Part IV. of his Queen Elizabeth, in the Year 1595. and what CROMERUS has about the Debts of George King of Bohemia, imprudently undertaken by WLADISLAUS, Lib. XXVII. GROTIUS.
- [2] Digest. Lib. II. Tit. XIV. De Pactis, Leg. XIV.
- [3] Code, Lib. II. Tit. IV. De Transactionibus, Leg. XII. See Mr. NOODT's Treatise De Pactis & Transact. Cap. XXVI. and Mr. SCHULTING, on the Title De Pactis, § 25.
- [4] As the Law of Cabades King of Persia in PROCOPIUS and AGATHIAS. The Subject of this Law is applied to Alienations by Petrus the Ambassador of Justin the Second to Chosroes, speaking of some Things which Justinian seemed to have promised the Saracens, οὐ γὰρ ἐνός ἀνδρὸς, &c. For no State, I think ought ever to be condemned for the Practice of one Man; no, nor on the Account of some insignificant Law, tho' it were the King himself who abetted that Practice, and enacted that Law. GROTIUS.
- I have given a great Number of Instances of unjust and unreasonable Laws in my two Discourses, one on the Permission of the Laws, the other on the Benefit of the Laws, which are added to the fourth Edition of the Duties of a Man and a Citizen. The Words of the Imperial Ambassador here quoted may be seen in the Embassies of MENANDER the Protector, Cap. XII. of those of Justin, Justinian, and Tiberius. But it is John, and not Peter who speaks there. Our Author has confounded the Names; the Greek Writer had, a little before John's Discourse, mentioned Peter, who had been sent Ambassador to the same Chosroes some Time before.

[5] SIDONIUS, Lib. V. Epist. XVII. Whatever a Prince has engaged for, his State is always to discharge. See St. AMBROSE in his Praises of Theodosius; SYMMACHUS, Lib. IV. Epist. VII. and XIX. Lib. V. XXXVII. Conc. Tolet. V. Cap. VI. C. Caeterum de donationibus. CORIPPUS, Lib. II. says, that Justinian's Debts, who had left a great deal of Money unsatisfied behind him, were paid by Justin, who succeeded him in the Empire. GROTIUS.

[6] The Story is in SUETONIUS, Chap. VIII. in XIPHILINUS out of Dion, and in VICTOR. You have something like it, C. Justitiae Caus. XXV. Quaest. I. GAIL. Obs. II. 60. 15. See also RADEVICUS's History. GUNTERUS LIGURINUS, Lib. V.

*Neve secuturi factum subvertere Reges
Aut revocare queant, &c.*

*Nor can the following Kings subvert the Deed,
Or e'er reverse it, he has left the Duke all safe
Sign'd with the Royal Seal.*

And Lib. VIII.

*Tanta tamen clari fuit indulgentia Regis,
Ut quicumque bona, &c.*

*So Great the Indulgence of this famous Prince.
That whoe'er Possess'd the Grants of former Kings,
Did still enjoy them, could they fairly prove
By authentick Writings the Goodness of their Claims.*

GROTIUS.

[7] Lib. X. Epist. LXVIII. GROTIUS.

[8] MARIANA XXIV. 16. quotes this and applies it to the extravagant Magnificence of Frederic King of Naples. Galba resumed Nero's Grants, even those that were purchased, leaving them only a Tenth, TACITUS, Hist. I. and PLUTARCH. And Pertinax deprived the freed Men, of what under the Pretence of Sale, they had been enriched with in Commodus's Reign. Thus Basil the Macedonian Emperor revoked what the Emperor Michael had given away. ZONORAS speaking of him, ἐψηφίστο παρὰ πάντων, It was universally agreed on, that they who had received Money without just Reasons should refund, some all, some half. See the same Author in his Isaacius Comnenus of Grants made by Lewis XI. See SERRANUS in Charles VIII. of some of his Grants made even to Churches, and yet resumed; see PHILIP COMINAEUS, Lib. IX. MARIANA, Lib. X. Cap. XVI. of some Grants repealed, which Ramirus King of Arragon had made. Of Grants of Isabella reversed even by her self, XXVII. 11. CROMERUS of the Will of Casimir King of Poland, partly allowed, and partly disapproved, 12. GROTIUS.

[9] C. Suggestum est de decimis. You have an Instance of it in the Acts of Alfonsus and Sanctius in MARIANA, Lib. XII. Cap. ultimo: In CAMDEN in the aforesaid Year 1595. and 1597. in Controv. Hansiatic. GROTIUS.

[10] You have several Things relating to this Affair in Conc. Gall. Tom. III. GROTIUS.

[1] See those cited by REINKINGIUS, Lib. II. Clas. II. Cap. VIII, Num. 26. GROTIUS.
See likewise PUFENDORF, B. VIII. Chap. X. § ult.

[2] See AFFLICT. Dec. CXXVIII. Num. 10. GROTIUS.

[1] Consult PUFENDORF, B. VIII. Chap. XII. § 3.

[1] Digest. Lib. II. Tit. XIV. De Pactis, Leg. V. See Mr. NOODT's Treatise De Pactis & Transactionibus, Cap. VII. where he explains this Division; as also Mr. SCHULTING on the Title De Pactis, §2.

[1] See the Close of this Chapter, where you have a short Explication of what is meant by those Sort of publick Conventions, or Agreements.

[1] 'Tis where he is speaking of the shameful Accommodation, made by the two Consuls with the Samnites, after the Action at Caudi or Caudium. We likewise see there what Remarks our Author makes a little lower on the Circumstances, which accompanied Treaties made by Order of the People. See SIGONIUS, De antiquo Jure Italiae, Lib. I. Cap. I.

[2] Pater patratus. He was one of the Feciales or Heralds, who took the Oath in the Name of the People. LIVY, Lib. I. Cap. XXIV. Num. 6. See below, B. III. Chap. III. § 7.

[3] Bell. Jugurth. Cap. XLIII. Edit. Wass.

[4] Lib. XXIV. Cap. VI. Num. 7.

[5] Contr. IV. 29. GROTIUS.

See on this the Note of the learned JOHN SCHULTING, Father to the famous Lawyer, whom I have quoted several Times, and who is now Professor at Leyden.

[6] See what is below, B. III. Chap. II. § 11, &c. SERVIUS upon that Passage of the Second Aeneid.

*But you, O Troy, preserve the Faith you gave,
If I to save my self, your Empire save.*

DRYD.

Because what the King promises, the State does seem to promise. And where Aeneas going to fight a Duel, first enters into a League with Latinus, he does not, says he, bring in Turnus Swearing, because when the King is present, he has no Power to do it. GROTIUS.

[7] This was not the Reason, on which the Romans went. The Fact was as follows. The Gauls after a complete Victory gained over the Romans near the River Allia, marched to Rome, and easily made themselves Master of the whole City, except the Capitol; whither the Senate and such young Men as were able to bear Arms, had retired. The Gauls could not carry that Fortress by Storm; but at last the Want of Provisions obliged the Besieged to capitulate. They agreed to give the Gauls a certain Quantity of Gold; on which Condition they promised to draw off their Forces. During the Siege, the Romans, who had rallied at Veii, after their Defeat in the Battle of the Allia, had created Camillius Dictator, with the Approbation of the Senate, then shut up in the Capitol, into which Place a young Man, named Pontius Cominius, found Means to enter privately, and get off without being discovered. As they were on the Point of weighing the Gold, promised to the Gauls, the Dictator came up, with his Army, and seized it, telling them he was ready to give them Battle. It was to no Purpose that the Gauls replied, they demanded only what was their Due by Vertue of the Treaty. Camillius answered that, as he was invested with Sovereign Authority, in Quality of Dictator, no Person had a Power to make such a Treaty without his Orders. LIVY, Lib. V. Cap. XLIX. Num. 2. See also PLUTARCH, in Camillus, Tom. I. p. 143. Edit. Wech. But BUDAËUS, in his Specimen Jurisprud. Historicae, § 86. p. 855, &c. of the Selecta Juris Nat. & Gent. maintains that this was manifest Perfidiousness. Those who were in the Capitol, says he, at that Time represented the Roman People; and Camillus in this Case was to be considered only as a private Citizen. Even supposing the Besieged could not treat validly, as they believed they could, they would still have been faulty in this Point. To which we may add that the Gauls were not obliged to know, or enquire, whether Camillus had been made Dictator. Nor could they know whether the greater or the smaller Number of the Romans was assembled in the Capitol; and in the Senate they saw the most illustrious Part of the Citizens. That Victory, says STEPHEN PASQUIER, (B. IX. Lett. X.) can never be related but to the Shame and Confusion of the Romans. Camillus himself, as the learned GRONOVIVS observes on this Place, did not proceed on this Reason, since he would not accept of the Dictatorship till he was authorized by an Order from the Senate. I am much mistaken if our Author was not thinking of what was said on another Occasion, against passing certain Laws proposed. LIVY, Lib. VI. Cap. XXXVI. Num. 9.

[8] Noct. Attic. Lib. XIII. Cap. XV. from MESSALA, De minoribus Magistratibus. But here is an extraordinary Case; and besides, the People are here supposed to be assembled in two different Parts of Rome; when this Regulation was made, there was no Thought of the People being assembled out of the City. So that the Passage, instead of savouring our Author's Way of Reasoning, makes against him: For all the People at Rome had treated with the Gauls.

[9] In the eleventh Chapter and twenty second Section of this Book. GROTIUS.

[10] Digest. Lib. XLV. Tit. I. De verborum obligatione, Leg. XXXVIII. See PUFENDORF, B. III. Chap. VII. § 10.

[11] This holds good in Regard to the Proxy of a Plaintiff, when the Commission doth not appear clearly, for such a Proxy is obliged to give Security for the Ratification of what he has done. Institut. Lib. IV. Tit. XI. De satis dationibus. Digest. Lib. XLVI. Tit. VIII. Ratam rem habere, & de ratihabitione. Leg. XIII. See Mr. NOODT on the Title of the Digest, De Procuratationibus, &c. p. 130. and Mr. SCHULTING on the same, § 7.

[1] Lib. XXXIV. Add DIODORUS SICULUS, Exc. Leg. IV. GROTIUS.

[1] See PUFENDORF, B. VIII. Chap. X. &c.

[2] See the Law quoted in the Preliminary Discourse, § 14.

[3] CAESAR speaking of the Germans; Robberies that are committed without the Bounds of each respective State have no Manner of Disreputation in them. (De Bello. Gall. Lib. VI. Cap. XXIII.) This is confirmed by TACITUS in his Account of the Customs of Germany, and by SAXO, Lib. XIV. and in several other Places. The same is reported of the Tyrrenians by SERVIUS, upon the eighth and tenth Aeneid, and of other Nations upon the first Aeneid; and of the Portuguese by DIODORUS SICULUS, (Lib. V. Cap. XXXIV.) with whom agrees PLUTARCH in his Marius; τὸ ληστεύειν οὐπω τότε τῶν ἰβήρων οὐχὶ κάλλιστον ἴγουμενών, the Spaniards even to that Day looked upon Robbery as a very honourable Employment. Just so the Jews deny that there is any Satisfaction to be made to an injured Person, if he is neither a Jew nor a Confederate of the Jews. GROTIUS.

Our Author probably, takes the Fact last mentioned from BABA KAMA, with the Comment of the Emperor CONSTANTINE, Cap. I. § 2. p. 13. We meet with a great Number of Instances of these barbarous Notions and Practices, in a Dissertation of JAMES THOMASIVS, intituled Historia Latrocinii gentis in gentem, Tom. VII. Observat. Hallens.

[4] Odysss. III. Where the Scholiast says, οὐκ ἔνδοξον ἦν παρὰ τοῖς παλαιοῖς τὸ ληστεύειν, ἀλλ' ἔνδοξον, Robbing was formerly so far from being Infamous, that it was counted Reputable and for a Man's Honour, (on ver. 71.) GROTIUS.

[5] Lib. I. (Cap. V. Edit. Oxon.) Where he subjoins οὐκ ἔχοντός πω αἰσχύνην τούτου τοῦ ἔργου, φέροντος δε τι καὶ δόξης μᾶλλον, This was an Affair that instead of being scandalous, rather carried a Reputation with it. GROTIUS.

[6] Digest. Lib. XLVII. Tit. XXII. De Collegiis & Corporibus, Leg. IV. The learned SALMASIUS finding here οἰχόμενοι, has corrected it, as it stands in the Text of our Author. But his Conjecture is too bold, and by no Means necessary; as is made appear by Mr. DE BYNKERSHOEK, in his Observ. Jur. Lib. I. Cap. XVI. Where he likewise explains and corrects some other Words in this Law, in a Manner different from the best Interpreters.

[7] Lib. XLIII. Cap. III. num. 1.

[8] Digest. Lib. XLIX. Tit. XV. De Captivis & Postlimin. &c. Leg. V. § 2.

[9] Lib. I. Cap. XL. Edit. Oxon.

[10] Bell. Jugurth. Cap. XXII. Edit. Wass.

[11] War, says the Philosopher, is in its own Nature a gainful and enriching Employment. Hunting is a Branch of it; which is employed against wild Beasts, and such Men, as being born Slaves will not submit to be what they are by Nature. Politic. Lib. I. Cap. VIII. See also PLUTARCH, De fortunâ vel Virtute Alexand. p. 329. Tom. II. Edit. Wech. and STRABO's Geography, Lib. I. p. 116. Edit. Amstel.

[12] This has been observed by CICERO, among others, which he proves from the Laws of the Twelve Tables, De Officiis, Lib. I. Cap. XII. See the Commentators on that Place.

[13] Lib. XLI. Cap. XXIV. (XXIX. 15, 16. Edit. Cleric.)

[14] There is, says the Orator, a wide Difference between a Peace (εἰρήνη) and Treaties (σπονδαί). The former is made, on equal Conditions, between two People, who lay down their Arms: By the latter the Conqueror imposes Laws on the vanquished, p. 271. Edit. Wechel. Such as Demolition of their Walls, the surrender of their Ships, and recalling their Exiles; as ANTIPHO observes, in the Words immediately following. So that the Difference between those Terms doth not consist precisely in what our Author says; the Distinction relates rather to the publick Agreements mentioned in the following Paragraph.

[1] So PLINY says, that the Parthians lived with the Scythians upon one and the same Foot. And POMPEY in LUCAN speaking of the same Nation of the Parthians says:

— — Solus
Ex aequo me Parthus adit.

With me
The Parthian only comes upon the Square.

GROTIUS.

[2] This Passage certainly belongs to ISOCRATES, tho' PUFENDORF, who quotes it, has not observed the Mistake. The Words are these: Those, who would preserve their Liberty, ought to avoid Treaties of Injunction (or Treaties forced on them) as approaching to Slavery. In Archidam, p. 126. Edit. H. Steph. Our Author had read, in the Oration here quoted, what DEMOSTHENES says, that the Rhodians, instead of making, as they might have done, an Alliance on equal Terms with the Athenians; who, however, were more powerful than they; chose rather to fall into Slavery, by admitting into their Fortresses Barbarians, who were Slaves; that is Mausolus, King of Caria, Vassal to the King of Persia; which Mausolus assisted the Chiefs of the Rhodians in seizing the Government, and thus in some Manner reigned at Rhodes; as did his Widow Artemisia, after his Demise, supported by those Oppressors of the Publick Liberty, who were her Creatures, p. 79. Edit. Basil. 1572.

[3] POLYBIUS, Lib. III. Cap. XXII, Edit. Amstel.

[4] The Antients termed it ὁμαχμίαν, An Union of Spears. ZOSIMUS, Lib. V. (Cap. XLII. and Lib. IV. Cap. LVI. Edit. Cellar.) GROTIUS.

[5] Thus THUCYDIDES tells us, the Athenians made such a defensive Alliance (ἐπιμαχίαν) with those of Corcyra, (Corfu) Lib. I. Cap. XLIV. It appears from what goes before, that the Term ἐπιμαχία is opposed to Συμμαχία, in the Sense given by our Author. See the Scholiast on this Place.

[6] Lib. VII. Cap. II. p. 703. Edit. Amst.

[7] PLUTARCH, in Vit. Demetrii, Tom. I. p. 899.

[8] See an Instance of this in PROCOPIUS, Pers. I. (Cap. II.) GROTIUS.

This is allowed, unless the contrary is expressly stipulated. See below, Chap. XXII. of this Book, §5. Num. 2.

[9] We have, in TESMAR's Notes on this Place, some Instances from THUCYDIDES, M. DE THOU, CAMDEN, BUCHANAN, and others.

[1] This was one of the Conditions imposed on them by Scipio, as LIVY informs us, Lib. XXX. Cap. XXXVII. Num. 4. See also DION CASSIUS, Excerpt. Legat. XVI. POLYBIUS, Hist. Excerpt. Lib. XV. Cap. XVII. Our Author, however, doth not express himself exactly in this Place, when he gives us this Clause, as being of the second League between the Romans and Carthaginians. He means the Treaty made after the second Punick War, as he himself speaks in the following Chapter, § 14. where he likewise mentions this burthensome Condition. For there had been several other Treaties between the Romans and Carthaginians, before this; as may be seen in POLYBIUS, Hist. Lib. III. Cap. XXII. &c.

[2] This must have been taken from the Excerpta Legationum, collected by FULVIUS URSINUS; for I find it not either in The History of the Punick Wars, nor in the Excerpta, collected by Mr. DE PEIRESC, and published by HENRY DE VALOIS.

[3] Thus the Samnites, being subdued by Lucius Papirius the Dictator, sued for a Peace, which was granted, on Condition of Cloathing the Roman Army once; and paying them for the Service of one Year. LIVY, Lib. VIII. Cap. XXXVI. Num. II. The learned GRONOVIVS, from whom I have taken this Example, gives us some others.

[4] Thus King Antiochus, being conquered by Scipio Africanus, bound himself by a Treaty of Peace, not to enter Europe, and to quit all that Part of Asia, which lies on this Side of Mount Taurus. LIVY, Lib. XXXVII. Cap. XLVI. Num. 14. See the Treaty made between the Romans and Carthaginians, after the Sicilian War, in POLYBIUS, Lib. III. Cap. XXVII.

[5] This Stipulation was made by the Romans, in the Treaties of Peace, already mentioned, with King Antiochus and the Carthaginians, but in such a Manner that the burthensome Condition was attended with something permanent; for they obliged the Vanquished to keep no Elephants for the Use of War. LIVY, Lib. XXX. Chap. XXXVII. Num. 3. and Lib. XXXVIII. Cap. XXXVIII. Num. 8.

[1] VIZ. ANTONINUS, CAJETANUS, TOLETUS, MOLINA, VALDESIUS, MALDERUS. GROTIUS.

[a] Gen. xxxi. 44.

[b] — — xxi. 27, 28, 29.

[c] Deut. xxiii. 7.

[d] — — vii. 1, &c.

[e] — — xxv. 17, &c.

[f] 2 Sam. v. 11.

[g] 1 Kings v. 12.

[h] Lev. xix. 18. Deut. xxii. 1.

[i] John iv. 9. Acts x. 28. xi. 3.

[k] John iv. 7.

[l] 1 Sam. xxvii. &c.

[1] Antiq. Jud. Lib. VIII. Cap. II.

[m] Judges xi. 16.

[n] 2 Sam. x.

[2] He also made a League with Eshcol and Aner, (Gen. xiv. 13.) As David did with Achis and Naashan; Solomon with the Aegyptians; Asa with Benhadad. GROTIUS.

[o] Gen. xiv.

[3] You have Commendations of them in the Chaldee Targum, in the Books of the Maccabees, and in the Epistle to the Hebrews. Several Christian Emperors and Kings, following them as their Precedent, entered into Treaties and Alliances, either with those who were no Christians at all, or at least not very sound ones; as Constantine with the Goths and Vandals; Justinian with the Lombards; Theodosius, Honorius, Leo, Heraclius, Basil, Isaacius Angelus, Palaeologus, with the Saracens, Alani, Gepidae, Franks, Suevi, and Vandals; Alfonsus Hispalensis, Ramirus, Alfonsus Castus, Sanctius Castellae, Ferdinand the holy, Kings of Spain with the Moors; so Peter King of Leon; the wise Alfinus, King of Castile; Rodolphus Habsburgenses with the Tartars. Consult JOHANNES DE CARTHAGENA, Lib. III. Cap. I. De jure belli Romani Pontificis, Cap. I. and Pope Julius the second made Use of Turkish Troops. GROTIUS.

[p] 1 Mac. viii. and xii.

[4] JOSEPHUS, Ἡτιβ̄το τῆς πρ̄ς ἄχαβον συμμαχίας ἀνθρ̄ωπον ἀσεβ̄ῆ και, πονηρ̄όν, He blamed him for entering into a League with Ahab, an irreligious and wicked Man. GROTIUS.

[q] 2 Chron. xix. 2.

[5] GRATIAN returned this Answer to his Uncle Valens, who desired his Assistance against the Scythians, ὅς οὐ δεῖ τῷ ἐχθρῷ τοῦ συμμαχεῖν, One ought not to engage in any Treaty with a Man who is an Enemy to GOD. GROTIUS.

[r] — — xx. 37.

[s] — — xx. 37.

[6] Add Joshua's Example, Chap. xxii. GROTIUS.

[t] 2 Chron. xvi. 2, 7.

[u] — — xvi. 12.

[w] 2 Sam. xxiv.

[x] 2 Kings xx. 13.

[y] Is. xxxi. 1.

[z] 1 Kings iii. 1.

[aa] Deut. xxviii. 7.

[bb] Prov. i. 15. xiii. 20. xxii. 24. xxiv. 1.

[a] Matt. v. 45.

[1] Adversus Marcionem, Lib. IV. Cap. XVI.

[2] Lib. VII. Cap. III.

[3] Offic. Lib. I. Cap. XXX.

[4] Ethic. Nicom. Lib. IV. Cap. XII. p. 54. Tom. II. Edit. Paris.

[b] 2 Thess. iii. 15.

[c] 2 Cor. vi. 14, 15, 16.

[d] 2 Cor. x. 21.

[e] Acts xxv. 11. xxii. and xxiii.

[1] See Phartazas's Speech to the Lazi in AGATHIAS, Lib. III. and SAXO, Lib. IX. in the Words of Lewis the French King to Harold. It is impossible that there can be any real Friendship and Agreement between Persons of a different Persuasion in sacred Matters; and therefore whoever addresses himself to another for his Assistance, should be sure, in the first Place, to take Care that he is of the same Religion; for they whom different Forms of Worship, and different Notions of GOD, have set at a Distance from each other, can never perform great Exploits together. GROTIUS.

[2] ATHENAEUS has preserved this Fragment, which evidently regards a Difference in Religion, as appears from the following Verses. Dipnosophist. Lib. VII. Cap. XIII. p. 299, 300. Edit. Casaubon, 1657.

[3] FRODOARD, or FLODOARD, Hist. Eccles. Remensis, Lib. IV. Cap. VI.

- [4] We have an Instance in MANCAFA, in NICETAS's Account of the Affairs of Isaac Angelus, Lib. XI. where the Piety of Emanuel Duke of Savoy is highly applauded, who, when he could have recovered Cyprus, by the Assistance of the Turks, scorned the Proffer. GROTIUS.
- [5] That Historian says, that after the Battle of the Granicus, Alexander sent the Grecians he took in Darius's Service, in Chains to Macedonia, with Orders to make them work like Slaves, "Because, adds he, being Grecians, they had born Arms for the Barbarians, against Greece." De Exped. Alexandri, Lib. I. Cap. XVII. Edit. Gronov. Our Author, tho' he quotes the Original, doth not give the Words exactly. See what the same Historian says in the Close of his first Book.
- [1] Our Author supposes, without Doubt, that this Enemy of Christianity has taken Arms unjustly against some Christian Power. He could not be of Opinion, that the Interest of Religion ought to be made an Exception to the general Rule, which he lays down for all Sorts of War. He likewise supposes this Enemy not only to be a Turk, a Pagan, or of some other Religion different from Christianity; but also, that he has plainly shewn his Design on all Christians, as such, and only wants an Opportunity of oppressing them all Manner of Ways. Otherwise it would not be the common Cause of all Christians; as he considers it a little lower. See SILHON's Reflections, in his Minister of State, Part II, Book I. Discourse IV. Besides, it has been justly observed, that, according to the present Dispositions of Christian Princes, such an Alliance would not be of great Service. See a Dissertation by Mr. BUDEUS, De ratione statûs circa Foedera, printed at Hall, 1696.
- [2] Upon this Subject see MARIANA, Lib. XXX. PARUTA, Lib. IV. BIZAR, VII. and XII. GROTIUS.
- [3] Our Author, as GRONOVIVS observes, means Frederick III. The learned Commentator refers us to a Dissertation, written by BOECLER, De Passagiis, to be found in Tom. I. of a Collection published some Years ago. But, tho' that Emperor had the Thing very much at Heart, and was very pressing with the Pope to engage the other Powers init; nothing was concluded, much less executed. See NAUCLERUS's Chronicle, Tom. II. p. 482, 491, 504. Edit. Colon. 1564.
- [1] See PUFENDORF, B. VIII. Chap. IX. § 5.
- [2] See below, B. II. Chap. XXV. § 4. And in the Form of the Oath of Fealty it is said, If I shall understand that you have a Mind to make an offensive War upon just Grounds, and I shall be either generally, or particularly, required thereunto, I will, to my utmost, give you my Assistance. GROTIUS.
- [3] In the Oration quoted by our Author, DEMOSTHENES undertakes to persuade the Athenians to assist the Megalopolitans, a People of Arcadia, against the Lacedemonians. As if no one doubted that, if once the Lacedemonians made themselves Masters of Megalopolis, they would fall on Messena, the Orator remonstrates to the Athenians, that it was their Business to send speedy Relief to the Messenians, their Allies, against those other Allies, both by Vertue of their solemn Treaties, and for their own Interest. Mr. THOMASIVS, in a Dissertation, De sponsione Romanorum Caudinâ, (which is the sixth of those printed at Leipsick) § 22. &c. maintains, that all Treaties of Alliance, by which a real Confederacy is contracted, but particularly those made for War, of themselves imply this tacit Condition, that no Succours are to be sent to any one, not even to another Ally, against the Power with which the Contract is made. The Reason is, that the War breaking, or at least very much disturbing the Union of the Allies for a certain End, it implies a Contradiction, according to our able Lawyer, that one should engage to take Arms against an Ally, even tho' done with a Design of succouring another Ally in a just Cause. And as it may be objected, that every one is bound, by the Law of Nature, to defend those who are insulted, or unjustly attacked, if it is in his Power, Mr. THOMASIVS answers, that this is no more than an imperfect Obligation, or a Duty of Humanity, which ought to give Place to express and formal Engagements. But it only follows from the Reason alledged, that there are some Cases in which an Alliance is broken, or in great Danger of being so; and that the Case in Question is one of that Sort. Whoever treats for an Alliance, and has, or may have other Allies, is, and ought to be supposed, tacitly to agree, that the Power with which he treats will have a Regard for those who are, or shall be, united to him by the like Ties; and be far from thinking of hurting them. Every one's Interest requires this, as well as his Duty, and the Sentiments he is supposed to entertain. So that assisting an Ally, in a just War, against another Ally, is no more than making Use of a Right included in the Alliance with both; and this Right can cease only by an express Renunciation, such as our Author mentions immediately after, a Renunciation, which is just and reasonable only so far as the Interest of him who makes it, requires he should take Care of himself, preferably to others. Mr. BUDEUS, who declares for the Opinion here opposed, in his Dissertation intituled Jurisprudentiae Historicae Specimen, § 92. seems not intirely consistent with himself, or with what he says in the foregoing Paragraph.

[4] POLYBIUS, Lib. VII. Cap. II. p. 702. Edit. Amstel.

[5] The Orator doth not go on the Supposition of the War being unjust on both Sides: His Reason is this, "Not that we decline doing Service to either; but are unwilling to hurt either." The Tendency of the whole Discourse is to shew, that there was not more Reason for succouring the Lacedemonians than the Thebans; because the Athenians had not received more Good or Harm from one than from the other; and that, moreover, it was their Interest to let them fight. So that the Question here turns on what Prudence demanded, not on the justice or Injustice of the War.

[6] By Personal Creditors are meant those whose Right extends to the Person of the Debtor; and is not confined to such and such mortgaged Goods, in Opposition to such Creditors as have a Pledge or a Mortgage. Personal Creditors are in the Roman Law called Chirographarii, because they commonly have some Bond, or Note of Hand, for Security of the Debt. And when there are several such Creditors, if the Debtor's Estate is not sufficient to satisfy them all, each has his Share assigned, in Proportion to the Largeness of the Debt, without any Regard to the Time when it was contracted: Whereas Creditors on Mortgage are not only preferred to all personal Creditors; unless these latter have some particular Privilege; but he whose Mortgage is of the oldest Date, takes Place of the Rest; so that if nothing remains, the posterior Creditor loses all. Even in the Case of privileged personal Creditors, if the Privilege is of the same Nature, no Regard is paid to Priority or Posteriority of Time. Digest. Lib. XLII. Tit. V. De rebus auctoritate judicis possidendis. Leg. XXXII. Code, Lib. VIII. Tit. XVIII. Qui potiores in Pignore habeantur, Leg. VIII.

[7] See Lib. IV. Cap. XXXI. De Feudis. GROTIUS.

Our Author here quotes the Feodal Law, according to CUJAS's Edition. In the common Edition the Passage occurs in B. II. Tit. XXVIII. where it is said, that A Vassal ought to assist his Lord against all others, and even against his own Brother, and Son; but not against one who has been his Lord longer; for he is to be preferred to all others. This Decision is founded on the same Principle which our Author lays down for a Preference between two Allies; a Principle manifestly reasonable. See PUFENDORF, B. III. Chap. VII. § 11.

[8] Not the Acarnanians, but the Etolians, make this Reflection by the Mouth of Chlaeneas, their Ambassador, who speaking against the Acarnanians, remonstrates to the Lacedemonians, that by joining the Etolians, they would do nothing to the Prejudice of a more antient Alliance. Lib. IX. Cap. XXV. p. 784, 785. Edit. Amsted.

[9] Χρῆ φίλοις κατ' ἐχθρῶν συμμαχεῖν, οὐ κατὰ φίλων, Friends ought to join their Forces against Enemies, and not against Friends, says Ptolomy to the Athenians, in APPIAN, Excerpt. legat. GROTIUS.

The Passage quoted in this Note, has no Relation to the Case under Consideration; but to that spoken of in Note 3. and may help to confirm the Opinion there examined.

[10] See RADEVICUS, I.7. GROTIUS.

[11] By an Edict of Theodorick, Cap. CXXXVIII. GROTIUS.

[12] Lib. VI. Cap. X. Num. 4. This Case is not entirely to the Purpose. The Nepesines having asked Assistance of the Romans, their Allies, and receiving none, were obliged to surrender to the Etrurians; after which they would not revolt from the Obedience promised to the Conqueror, who had made himself Master of the Town. In Order to propose a Question agreeable to the Subject before us, the Question should have been, whether the Etrurians would have thought themselves obliged to assist the Nepesines, after their Surrender, preferably to some other Ally, with whom they had before treated on an equal Foot?

[1] See PUFENDORF, B. VII. Chap. IX. § 11.

[2] Thus, for Example, if one Ally has agreed to give another a certain Sum yearly, and the Payment of the same Sum is made the Year after the Expiration of the Term of the Alliance, the Alliance is renewed for that Year. On the same Principle the Roman Lawyers have decided, that if a Man, who had lent Money for a certain Time, and pays the Interest due on such Money, after the Time is expired, and the Creditor receives it; the latter is supposed to prolong the Term of Payment for that Time. Digest. Lib. II. Tit. XIV. De Pactis, Leg. LVII.

[1] See PUFENDORF, B. III. Chap. VIII. § 8. and what our Author says, B. III. Chap. XX. § 35. as also a Dissertation by Mr. BUDEUS, De contraventionibus Foederum, Cap. III. § 14.

[2] Lib. I. Cap. LXXI. Edit. Oxon. See likewise Cap. CXXIII.

[3] Lib. IV. Cap. XXIII.

[1] See PUFENDORF, B. IV. Chap. IX. § 12, 13.

[2] See above, § 3. Num. 6. Note. 11.

[3] LIVY, Lib. IX. Cap. IX. Num. 16, 17.

[4] Ibid. Num. 4, 7.

[5] THOMASIVS, in his Dissertation De Sponsione Romanorum Caudinâ, § 84, &c. confutes our Author's Opinion. I own, says he, that the Samnites acted imprudently; as appears from the Reflections made by Herennius Pontius, their General's Father, LIVY, Lib. IX. Cap. III. Num. 5, &c. and those of Osilius Calavius, ibid. Cap. VII. Num. 3, &c. and from what LIVY himself says, ibid. Cap. XII. But it doth not thence follow, that the Romans were blameless. He, who knowing a Man to be a bad Debtor, lends him Money, without requiring a Pledge or Security, certainly acts imprudently. But the Debtor who refuses Payment, is not less guilty of Dishonesty. The Roman Army, which was shut up in the Defiles of Caudium, made the greatest Part of the People, as Lucius Lentulus, the first Lieutenant General said, Cap. IV. Num. 13, 14. Even though no Presumption could be framed, that the Rest of the Romans who were at Rome, would not consent to the Treaty made by the Consuls, who commanded the Army, might not the Army have obliged themselves validly, in the Extremity to which it was reduced? And ought not the whole Body to have ratified a Treaty made by the Majority, for the Preservation of that Majority? (See what our Author says, § 3. of this Chapter, Num. 2.) One single Town, which makes but a very small Part of a large State, may surrender, and submit to the Power of a victorious Enemy, when nothing but certain Ruin is before them. (See Chap. VI. of this Book, § 5.) Why could not the Roman Army, which was the greatest Part of the Romans, in a like Case, engage themselves not to take Arms any more against the Enemy; especially since it was not thereby cut off from the Body of the State, and might be useful to it in all other Respects, without a Violation of the Treaty? But, even tho' the Roman People were not directly obliged by the Treaty made with the Samnites, they were engaged indirectly; which our Author cannot deny, without destroying a Principle which he himself lays down, B. III. Chap. XXII. § 3. The Romans having reaped a considerable Advantage from the Treaty in Question, by the Preservation of their Army, ought to have renounced that Advantage, if they were not disposed to stand to it, and have sent back their Troops to the Defiles of Caudium, and left them to the Discretion of the Samnites, as the General of that People very justly observed, Cap. XI. Num. 4. LIVY, who makes Pontius reason in this Manner, expresses a Doubt concerning the Conduct of the Romans on that Occasion. He says, that when the Samnites sent back the Authors of the Treaty, whom the Romans offered to deliver up to them, the Promise of those Authors was disengaged, and perhaps, adds the Historian, the publick Faith. Ibid. Num. 13.

[6] Lib. II. Cap. I.

[7] The Numantines thought it equitable, that if the Engagement was not approved of, the Army which was set at Liberty upon that Engagement, should be delivered up to them. GROTIUS.

Our Author, probably, had his Eye upon that Passage of OROSIUS, Is the Justice of the Numantines to be commended? The Senate itself did tacitly approve of it, when the Numantines sent Embassadors to them, requiring either that the Peace should be preserved inviolable, or that all who had been allowed their Lives, should be sent back. Hist. Lib. V. Cap. V. Besides, Mr. THOMASIUS has written a Dissertation, De Sponsione Romanorum Numantinâ, which is the fourteenth of the same Collection, where he reasons on the same Principles. See also Mr. BUDEUS's Jurisprud. Histor. Specim. § 71.

[8] The Speech of Lentulus, in Chap. IV. of Book IX. of LIVY, shews plainly, that the Agreement was made in the Name, and by the Order of the whole Army. That Lieutenant-General speaks in their Name. They were present; their bare Silence ought to be considered as a real Approbation of all that was done.

[9] It appears from the Title of this Treaty, that it was made by Hannibal, in Conjunction with his Officers, the Senators of Carthage, who were with him, and all the Soldiers. See POLYBIUS, Lib. VII. Cap. II. p. 699. Edit. Amstel.

[10] These were two Consuls, two Quaestors, four Prefects, and twelve Tribunes, as APPIAN relates it. These were all by the Treaty of Caudium surrendered; but by the Treaty of Numantia, only one Consul; the Rest were spared on the Account of Tiberias Gracchus, as PLUTARCH says in the Lives of the Gracchi. GROTIUS.

[11] Pontius the Son, in APPIAN, τῶν τε ἰππέων, &c. I will pick out some of the Principal of the Cavalry for Hostages of these Articles, till the whole Body of the People ratify and confirm them. The Portuguese, in a like Affair, judged it sufficient that the Hostages were left to the Discretion of him who had them in his Custody. MARIANA XXI. 12. If they accept of those who are delivered up to them, they are looked upon to remit the Penalty.

POLYBIUS, Excerpt. CXXII. GROTIUS.

The Passage of POLYBIUS here referred to, speaks of the Roman Senate, who would not receive the Murderer, and the other Accomplices in the Assassination of one of their Embassadors; because, says the Historian, they were resolved to reserve to themselves the Right of revenging such an Action when they judged proper; whereas, had they punished the others, it might have been thought they had been satisfied, p. 1324. Edit. Amst. See below, B. III. Chap. XXIV. § 7. Note 1. And as to what regards Hostages, Chap. XX. of the same Book, § 58.

[12] It appears evidently, that, on the contrary, “the Consuls declined treating, because they had no Commission from the People.” LIVY, Lib. IX. Cap. V. Num. 1.

[13] LIVY, Lib. IX. Cap. V. Num. 5.

[14] See Chap. XXI. of this Book, § 11.

[15] DIODORUS SICULUS, in Excerpt. Peires. VALERIUS MAXIMUS, IV. Cap. VIII. GROTIUS.

It is not DIODORUS of Sicily that speaks of this Action of Fabius, in the Excerpta of Mr. DE PEIRESC, but DION CASSIUS, to be seen p. 597 of that Collection.

[16] DION, Excerpt. legat. V. GROTIUS.

[1] Disertè. That is, when the Sovereign doth not expressly ratify the Treaty made in his Name, without his Order. In Reality, when we speak of Ratification, in a Case like this, we certainly mean an express Ratification; and that the rather, because a short Time is usually fixed for the Ratification; so that, in the Interval, it is impossible to have a Conjecture strong enough drawn from Silence. Besides, by annexing the Condition of Ratification, a Doubt was implied, whether the sovereign Power would think proper to ratify the Treaty. Whereas, when a Treaty has been made purely and simply, the Party seems to have supposed, either that he had a Power to treat, or could easily obtain a Ratification; and the Treaty is confined to no Term.

[2] For Lutatius had inserted this Clause, that the Agreement should be good and valid, only in Case it was approved of by the Roman People. LIVY, Lib. XXI. Cap. XIX. Num. 3. See also POLYBIUS, Lib. III. Cap. XXI.

[3] See likewise POLYBIUS, Lib. I. Cap. LXII. LXIII.

[4] LIVY, Lib. XXI. Cap. XIX. Num. 3.

[5] That is, should not pass over it, in Order to make War. POLYBIUS, Lib. III. Cap. XXIX.

[6] These are treated of in Chap. XXII. and XXIII. of the third Book. Mr. THOMASIUS, in his Dissertation De Sponsione Romanorum Caudinâ, § 47. criticises this Division of our Author as unexact; for, says he, these Agreements made by Generals, or Soldiers, concerning their private Affairs, are therefore private, not publick Agreements. But our Author places them among publick ones, because, tho' they most commonly relate only to the private Concerns of the Generals, Officers, or Soldiers, they make them as publick Persons, and on Account of the War, which is a publick Affair. Add to this, that several Questions arise here, which have some Relation to publick Agreements; as will appear from the Chapters already referred to.

[1] De Offic. Lib. I. Cap. XIII. These Words probably are not CICERO's Words; for neither they, nor some that go before them, are to be found in most Manuscripts, nor in the oldest printed Editions.

- [2] Neither this Passage, nor the Sequel of the Oration from which it is taken, contains any Thing that gives Reason to think the Orator speaks of the Manner of explaining Agreements. He supposes the Sense of them clear, and on that Foot considers the Obligation of standing to them, as acknowledged by all Nations.
- [3] Lib. I. Cap. XXIV. Num. 7.
- [4] The Hebrews, upon the thirtieth of Numbers, observe, that Vows are to be interpreted as they are commonly taken. GROTIUS.
- [5] PUFENDORF has treated on this subject, B. V. Chap. XII. where he only explains and ratifies our Author's Thoughts; and the Notes are of Use in correcting them both.
- [1] It is very well remarked by PROCOPIUS, Vandal. I. where he treats of the Word Confederates, that Τοῦ ἁπλοῦς προσηγορίας, &c. Time does not mind to keep up the same Denominations that were at first imposed; but even Things themselves are turned and altered just as People please, without any Regard to what they were formerly called. GROTIUS.
- [2] POLYBIUS, Lib. XII. just as the Boeotians, who promising to restore a City, did restore it, not standing, but ruined and demolished. THUCYDIDES, V. And as Sultan Mahomet, who having taken Euboea, cut a Person asunder in the Middle, whose Head he had promised should be safe. GROTIUS.
- [3] See, for Example, Lib. II. Cap. VI. and Lib. VII. Cap. XXXIV.
- [4] De Offic. Lib. III. Cap. XXXII.
- [1] St. AUGUSTIN, in Rhetoric. As Artizans and Mathematicians, as well as Philosophers, give Names to several new Things; we must understand these Names, not so much from the vulgar Acceptation of the Words, as in Regard to the Nature and Circumstance of the Precept. GROTIUS.
- [2] CICERO, De Inventione, Lib. I. Cap. VIII. and Lib. II. Cap. XVII. where it is termed Constitutio definitiva. QUINTILIAN, Institut. Orat. Lib. VII. Cap. III. calls it Finitio.
- [3] Paradox VI.
- [4] Our Author certainly had his Eye on that Passage of B. III. Chap. LXXII. where the Historian says, that the compleat Roman Army, when the two Consuls were obliged to join their Troops, was composed of 16000 Roman Foot, and 20000 Foot of the Allies. But besides those they had Horse, as appears from what follows. See CASAUBON's Note on Lib. I. Cap. XVI. p. 21.
- [5] Digest. Lib. III. Tit. II. De his qui notantur Infamiâ. Leg. II. § 1. See Mr. NOODT's commentary on that Title, p. 114.
- [6] De re militari, Lib. III. Cap. I.
- [7] In the first Edition of this Work the Author quotes Lib. XXV. the Passage occurs Cap. VI. Num. 14. But the Remains of the Army, after the Defeat at Cannae, consisted only of 4000 Men, both Horse and Foot; as the same Historian had said, Lib. XXII. Cap. LIV. Num. 1.
- [8] SERVIUS, upon the first Aeneid, Arces, (Forts) are so called from arceo, to repel, because an Enemy is repulsed from thence, that is, hindered and kept back. GROTIUS.

[1] See HERMOGENES, Partit. Orat. Sect. IV. and XIV. QUINTILIAN, Instit. Orat. Lib. VII. Cap. IX. and the Author of the Rhetoric, addressed to Herennius, Lib. I. Cap. XII.

[2] See HERMOGENES, Partit. Orat. Sect. XII. QUINTILIAN, Instit. Orat. Lib. VII. Cap. VII.

[3] See HERMOGENES, Partit. Orat. Sect. XI. CICERO, De Inventione, Lib. II. Cap. XLII. and the Author of the Rhetoric, addressed to Herennius, Lib. I. Cap. XI. as also QUINTILIAN, Instit. Orat. Lib. VII. Cap. VI.

[1] TERTULLIAN, De pudicitia. An Expression (Sermo) must be understood according to the Nature of the Subject spoken of. He has the same in his Book De Resurrectione Carnis. GROTIUS.

These Words are in Cap. XXXVII. of the Treatise last mentioned, with this Difference, that our Author reads Sermo, instead of Sensus. But, in the Book De Pudicitia, Cap. VIII. &c. TERTULLIAN only applies this Rule to some Passages of Scripture.

[2] See an Example of a Quibble made in such a Case, in the Chapter of PUFENDORF, which answers to this, § 7.

[3] Our Author had here quoted in his Margin, a Law which says, that “If, by Reason of a barren Year, a Proprietor of a Farm abate some Part of his Rent, making Use of the Word Donation, it is a Sort of Forbearance, and not properly a Donation.” Digest. Lib. XIX. Tit. II. Locati Conducti, Leg. XV. § 5. The Lawyer’s Meaning is, that tho’ the Proprietor has abated some Part of his Rent, on the Account here specified; if the following Years prove plentiful, he has still a Right to demand that whole Year’s Rent, as is evident from the Words immediately preceding. The Declaration which he made, of being willing to abate of the Rent, was not according to the Roman Lawyers, an absolute Cession, or a pure and simple Donation, but a Sort of Forbearance; by which he consents not to exact the Whole or Part of the Rent of that bad Year; in Case that the uncertain Income of other Years is not sufficient to indemnify the Farmer for the Loss he has sustained. So that the Word Give ought thus to be understood, agreeably to the Nature of the Thing, and the Intention of the Person speaking. See CUJAS, Observat. Lib. XX. Cap. IV. and ANTHONY FAURE, Rational. Tom. V. p. 560, 561. But, to judge of the Matter by the Law of Nature alone, this Decision is not sufficiently grounded, for forming a general Rule, which admits of no Exception. On the contrary, I should think that if a Proprietor abates his Tenant some Part of his Rent, in Consideration of the Barrenness of the present Year, without adding any Thing insinuating that this is done only conditionally, he is not supposed to have reserved to himself any Right of demanding what he has abated, how great Plenty soever the following Years may produce. It is an Act of Generosity, and ought naturally to be understood thus; because the Reserve in Question makes a great Diminution in the Value of it. The Farmer therefore has no Reason to suppose it implied; it was the Landlord’s Business to explain himself. This is more particularly reasonable, when he made Use of the Word Giving. If the Roman Lawyers have given a different Decision of the Case, they have proceeded on refined Principles, which they have confounded with the Maxims of natural Equity, and the Rules of a good Interpretation. Besides, the Barrenness here mentioned, ought, in my Opinion, to be understood according to the Distinction which I have made, Chap. XII. § 18. Note 4.

[4] See THUCYDIDES, Lib. II. Cap. V. VI. Edit. Oxon.

[5] The Fact is related by FRONTIN; as I find it also quoted in OBRECHT’s Notes. Stratagemat. Lib. IV. Cap. VII. num. 17.

- [6] See DIODORUS of Sicily, Lib. XVII. Cap. LXXXIV. POLYAENUS, Stratag. Lib. IV. Cap. III. num. 20. and PLUTARCH, Vit. Alex. all which Authors the learned GRONOVIVS quotes in this place.
- [7] VALERIUS MAXIMUS ascribes this to Q. Fabius Labeo, Lib. VII. Cap. III. § 4. But, as it has been already observed, LIVY, Lib. XXXVIII. Cap. XXXIX. relates the Thing in a different Manner.
- [1] These are the very Terms of a Law, quoted by our Author in his Margin. Digest. Lib. I. Tit. III. De Legibus, &c. Leg. XIX. See Mr. NOODT's Commentary on the first Part of the Digest, p. 23. col. 1.
- [2] Our Author here mistakes the Person. Brasidas was General of the Lacedemonians; nor doth he say this to the Boeotians. They are the Words of a Herald at Arms, sent to them by the Athenians, who had promised to quit their Territories. See THUCYD. Lib. IV. Cap. XCVIII. Edit. Oxon.
- [1] Our Author's Expression is, Conjuncta sunt aut origine aut etiam loco.
- [2] St. AUSTIN against Adimantius, Chap. XIV. excellently well observes, that they pick and cull out little scraps of Scripture to impose upon the Ignorant, without taking together what goes before, and what follows, which would let them into the Meaning and Design of the Writer. GROTIUS.
- [3] Iliad. Lib. III. ver. 92, 93.
- [4] Agamemnon explains this of killing his Man, ver. 281. thus Priam understands it, ver. 309.
- [5] Symposiac. Quaest. Lib. IX. Quest. XIII. p. 743. Edit. Wech.
- [1] CICERO in the behalf of A. Caecina: There is no great Difference in the Reason of the Thing, but only in the Manner of it, whether I am dispossessed by your Agent, he who is the stated and universal Agent of every Body, who is out of Italy and Abroad on the Government's Account, a Sort of Lord and Master, that is, one who manages and acts uncontrolably in Right of some other; or by your Tenant, or Neighbour, or Client, or Freeman, or any other Person whatever, who has done me this Injury and Disservice by your Order, and in your Name. GROTIUS.
See the Notes of FRANCIS HOTOMAN.
- [2] Our Author seems to have had in View a scholastic Lawyer of Middlebourg, whom he frequently quotes in this Chapter. It is NICHOLAS EVERHARD, who expressly says, The Reason of the Law and the Intention of the Law, seem to be the same, p. 382. But, immediately after, he says, The Intention of the Law is gathered from the Reason of the Law.
- [3] And consequently what agrees with one, may not agree with another; and, on the contrary, what seems to clash with one may be conformable to another.
- [4] See what I have said above, on Chap. XI. of this Book, § 21. Note 1.
- [5] Digest, Lib. XXXIX. Tit. L. De Donationibus, Leg. I. § 1. The Words are these: But when we say that, if the Bridegroom make a Present to the Bride, with this Intention, that, a Marriage ensuing, it may be taken away, it may be demanded; we say nothing contrary to what is before advanced: But we grant such a Donation was made between those Persons, as may become void conditionally. This Instance seems misplaced; for it relates to tacit Exceptions implied in a Promise, in Consequence of the manifest Intention of the Promiser; not to the Explanation of the Words of the Promise. Here the Sense is perfectly clear, and no Ambiguity in the Word Donation. But the Donation is void, because it was made only on Supposition of a Marriage, which doth not ensue.

[1] See the Chapter of PUFENDORF, which answers to this, § 11. Notes 1, 2. and for the following Example, Note 3.

[2] Deportati. Such as were banished for Life into an Island, so that they forfeited all the Rights of a Citizen, and their Estates were confiscated. In other Respects, they enjoyed their Freedom, and all the Advantages allowed by the Law of Nature and Nations. This was termed minor or media capitis diminutio. Much more were those who lost their Liberty and were condemned to work in the Mines or Quarries (which was called Maxima capitis diminutio) considered as dead. See Digest, Lib. XVII. Tit. II. Pro socio, Leg. LXIII. § 10. as also Lib. XXXVII. Tit. IV. De bonorum possessione contra tabulas, Leg. I. § 8.

[3] See GUICCIARDINI, Lib. XVI. where there is a Discourse about some Agreements of Charles V. relating to the Dutchy of Milan. GROTIUS.

The Passage runs thus. “For the Agreement and Promise of protecting and defending Francis Sforza in the Dutchy of Milan, did not deprive the Emperor of a Power of proceeding against him, as against his Vassal, and declaring the Fief confiscated for the Crime with which he stood charged; viz. having conspired against his Majesty. And Mr. de Bourbon, named to that Dutchy, in Case of his Death, succeeded him on his being deposed, because the Laws speak of natural Death and civil Death, and reckon he dies of the latter, who is condemned for such a Crime.” P. 341. Edit. Genev. 1645.

[1] I do not retract what I have advanced, either after others, or of my own Head, in the Notes on § 12, &c. of the Chapter in PUFENDORF, which answers to this, concerning the Want of Solidity and Usefulness in the Distinction here made by our Author. In Order to clear him however of some Part of the Criticism there made, I must say, that he doth not seem to have applied his Distinction equally to Promises and to Laws, as the other Writer, who borrowed it of him, doth. He does indeed, in this Chapter, sometimes produce Instances taken from the Laws; but this is done but seldom; and not so as to give us Reason to suppose he pretends that all the Rules he lays down may be applied to the Explication of the Laws; since his main Design is only to shew the Manner of interpreting Agreements and Promises; in short, all voluntary Engagements. As to the Substance of the Question, I shall at present only add some Reflections, occasioned by what I have lately observed in a new Edition of the Abridgment of PUFENDORF, De Officio Hominis & Civis, printed at Glasgow in 1718. under the Direction of Mr. CARMICHAEL, Professor of Philosophy in that University. That able Man, who has added a Volume of Notes and Supplements, larger than that of the Text, says, in his Remarks on B. I. Chap. XVII. That the Distinction of Favourable and Odious, which I have rejected after others, is founded in the very Nature of Things; some of them being more desirable than others; or rather, Things having different Faces, so that according as they are viewed, some of them ought to be considered as Objects of our Desires, and others as Objects of our Aversion. This, says he, is dictated by common Sense; so that it is in vain to seek for fixed Definitions of the Favourable and the Odious. It is not less certain, that this Distinction ought to be allowed some Weight in the Explication of a doubtful Speech; so that, as far as the Use of Terms and other Circumstances permit, it is conjectured that the Intention of the Person speaking was such or such, according as the Question turns on something favourable or odious. To this I answer, First, That not one of those, who have rejected the Distinction under Consideration, ever thought of denying that some Things are more desirable than others; but the Question is, whether that Quality can be of service here for settling sure Rules of Interpretation. Now I am not yet convinced that it can. Secondly, One and the same Thing may, indeed, be considered as Favourable or Odious in that Sense, according to the Disposition of the Person, whose Words are to be explained. Let us, for Example, suppose a Donation, which, according to the Principles of the Partisans of the Distinction before us, belongs to the Class of odious Things. I say, if we consider it as an Act burthensome to one of the Parties only, it will be a Thing but little desirable, or even such as many are averse to. But if you view it as an Effect of good Will or Friendship, which it must be acknowledged is sometimes the Motive for giving; in this Regard it will be a very desirable Thing; Here will be Room for presuming that the more the Donor bestows, the more he is pleased; so that the Signification of the Terms is to be extended by this latter Reason, and contracted by the former. But how shall this be reconciled? Thirdly, It is owned that there often is a Mixture of the favourable and the odious; which renders the Application of the Distinction still more impracticable. Fourthly, No Notice is taken of the Reasons I have employed for shewing that in all the Examples produced, the Interpretation may be made without the Assistance of this Distinction; which therefore is entirely useless, even though it had a clear and fixt Foundation. I hope then that it will not be taken amiss, if I leave it here, till it is so established that we may know how to make Use of it.

[2] Quae communem spectant utilitatem. The Terms are ambiguous, and may signify the common Advantage of the Parties. But it appears from the two Instances, alledged by our Author immediately after, and from some which occur elsewhere (B. III. Chap. XX. § 21.) that he designed to speak of the Advantage of human Society in general.

[3] That is, something burthensome to which a Man has subjected himself, in Case that certain Things are done or not done; as when he engages to pay a Sum of Money, or to demand no Part of what he otherwise had a Right to, &c.

[1] See PUFENDORF, B. V. Chap. II. § 8.

[2] The Author designs to speak of what he before called, Jura multis populis seorsim communia. Laws common to several Nations separately. I believe his Meaning here is this. If two Persons of different Nations treat together concerning Things, in Regard to which the Civil Laws of the two Countries are the same; and the Agreement is made either by Letters, or in a Place which has no Proprietor, (for when the Affair is concluded in the Country of either of the contracting Parties; we are to judge of the Affair by the Civil Laws of that Country, tho' they differ from those of the other, as has been said above, Chap. XI. of this Book. § 5. num. 2, 3.) In that Case I say, each of the Parties is and ought to be supposed to follow the common Custom of the two Countries; unless they have expressly declared they would treat on a different Foot.

[1] That is what he before called Things of a mixt or middle Nature, which have something of the Favourable and something of the Odious, but so that the former is predominant. It would be very difficult to specify and compare the different Degrees of each; from which single Consideration we may infer how useless this Distinction would be, even supposing it founded in the Nature of Things.

[2] See Note 3. on § 13. of the Chapter in PUFENDORF, which I have already quoted several Times.

[3] Consult Note 5. on the same Place.

[4] See an Instance of this in L. cum virum. C. de Fidei commissis. GROTIUS.

The Reader may also consult HUBERT GIPHANIUS, concerning the Case mentioned in this Law, and others of the like Nature, in Cod. Tit. Familiae eriscundae, p. 194, &c. as likewise Mr. HERTIUS's Dissertation, De Praelegatis, § 18. p. 325, 326. Tom. III. Comment. & Opusc. &c.

[5] See Note 7. on § 13. of the Chapter in PUFENDORF, which answers to this.

[1] See PUFENDORF, B. VIII. Chap. IX. § 10.

[2] POLYBIUS, Lib. III. Chap. XXVII.

[3] Lib. XXI. Cap. XIX. num. 4, 5.

[4] Which Clause was added in the Peloponnesian Treaty of Peace made between the Lacedemonians and the Athenians, THUC. Lib. V. GROTIUS.

The Clause here meant by our Author relates to some Towns, given up by the Lacedemonians to the Athenians, in Vertue of a Treaty, which the latter were obliged to leave in quiet Possession of their Liberty, on the Consideration of a Tribute to be paid as before. It was stipulated that those Towns should be allied to neither of those People; but if the Athenians could engage them to enter voluntarily into their Alliance, they were allowed to do it. Cap. XVIII. Edit. Oxon.

[5] But, says Mr. BUDDIUS, in his Jurisprud. Histor Specimen, § 100. It was on the other Hand, a favourable Matter to the Romans and to the Saguntines, that the Town should be preserved, or that after it was demolished, Precautions might be taken against what the Roman Commonwealth had to fear on that Account. For my Part, without any Regard to the uncertain Distinction of the Favourable and the Odious, I say, no Presumption is hastily to be formed of a Sense, tending to justify any Thing, from which the Violation of a Treaty may ensue; but then, as there is no Room for thinking that the Parties desired the Treaty should hold good, whatever might happen, it should be considered whether, by following a certain Sense, some Reason may not be found why they probably would not rather chuse that the League should be broken, or be in danger of being so, than be secured from a Rupture by the Favour of another Sense. But whoever enters into an Alliance, knows, without Doubt, that it may easily become as advantageous, or more advantageous, and sometimes even necessary, to ally himself with others, without any Prejudice to the Engagement, by which he has deprived himself of a Power to do or not do certain Things. So that he is supposed to reserve to himself a Liberty of making such Alliances, provided he has not expressly renounced that Liberty; and consequently, there is good Reason to believe that when it is reciprocally stipulated, that neither of the two Nations shall molest the Allies of the other, each of the contracting Parties understands that Clause of its future Allies, as well as of the present. See what I have said on the preceding Chapter, § 13. Note 3.

[6] No such Thing. But as the Carthaginians might, without breaking through their Engagements, take Satisfaction for the Injury done them by some of the Allies of the Romans, and even of those who were so at the Time of the Treaty; the Romans, on the other Hand, might without any Violation of the Alliance, undertake the Defence of their new Allies, when they thought them unjustly attacked. So that the whole Question will be whether the War was just or not. The Carthaginians, by attacking Saguntum, violated the Article of the Treaty under Consideration, supposing that Town had done them no Injury. But if, on the contrary, it had given them just Reason for a War, the Infraction of the Treaty lay on the Side of the Romans, who protected it.

[7] The Romans to the Samnites who had a mind to invade the Sidicines, and asked the Romans leave to do it, made this Answer, There was nothing stipulated that could hinder the Samnites from the Privilege of making Peace or War. LIVY, Lib. VIII. And so it is a Clause in the Treaty with Antiochus, If any of the Roman Allies shall take upon them to attack Antiochus, let him be at Liberty to repel the Violence; provided that he does not by the Right of War seize upon any of their Cities, nor contract any Alliance with them, Livy XXXVIII. POLYBIUS in exc. legat. XXXV. GROTIUS.

The Sidicines were in no Manner allied to the Roman People, as is observed by the Samnites in the Close of the preceding Chapter. As to the Clause of the Treaty with Antiochus, it relates only to the Right of Self-Defence, which ought to be supposed tacitly excepted in all Agreements.

[8] POLYBIUS, Lib. III. Cap. XXV.

[9] PROCOPIUS, Persic. II. ἔφασκε τε ὡς ἄυτος οὐ λύει, &c. He asserted that he had no Ways infringed any Articles that were between the Persians and the Romans, because neither of them had inserted him in them. GROTIUS.

[10] It seems to me to have been an Infraction of the Treaty. See what I have said in Notes 5 and 6. on this Paragraph.

[11] Lib. III. Cap. XXVI.

[12] Lib. I. Cap. XXXV. Edit. Oxon.

[13] Thus after the Times mentioned there, the Corcyreans decreed, Ἀθηναίους μὲν, &c. That they would indeed, according to their Agreement, assist the Athenians with their Troops, and yet still be Friends to the Peloponnesians. GROTIUS.

[14] Lib. III. Cap. VII. num. 14, 15.

[1] That he (Philip) should not wage War out of the Territories of Macedonia, without the Consent of the Senate. LIVY, Lib. XXXIII. Cap. XXX. num. 6. See also Lib. XLII. Cap. XXV.

[2] Or rather, because the Right of Self-Defence is a Natural Right, of which no Man can be supposed to divest himself by any Agreement.

[1] DIODORUS SICULUS, in his 27th excerpt. legat. relates this Matter thus, νόμους, χώρᾶν, ἱερὰ, τὰφους, ἐλευθερίαν, that their Laws, their Country, their Religion, their Sepulchres, and their Liberty, should be continued to them. GROTIUS.

[2] When we speak of a City, tho' it is considered as a Body of People, we always suppose the Place and Buildings as the Habitation of that People. This is the natural Sense which immediately offers itself to every one, and from which we therefore ought never to depart, without an express Declaration, or plain Reasons, taken from such Circumstances as necessarily oblige us to confine ourselves to the idea of a Multitude of Persons united by the Bonds of civil Society, but considered as having no fixt Dwellings. But this cannot be the Case here; whatever Mr. COCCEIUS may say, in his Autonomia Juris Gentium, Cap. XV. § 14, 15. All he there advances may be reduced to this: That the Carthaginians were become dependent on the Romans, having preserved no more than the Liberty of governing themselves by their own Laws; and that a People may remain entirely free, tho' they have no City, as a Family tho' in Possession of no House. But all this doth not destroy our Author's Reasons, much less the Reflection I have just now made, which is drawn from the ordinary Use of Terms. For how dependent soever the Carthaginians might be, the Question here is, whether, without any Prejudice to Honesty, the Treaty can be so explained as to understand by Carthage, the Carthaginians, independently of the City, in which they were settled. Now, can it be said that, if at the Time of the Treaty, it had been asked what was meant by the Word Carthage, the two Parties would have agreed on that Sense of it? A Man must be very obstinate, who pretends to justify a Perfidy so manifest, as that of the Romans in the Case before us. And yet the Author, who approves of it, makes no Difficulty of representing the contrary Opinion of GROTIUS and PUFENDORF, as the Result of great Ignorance of the Law of Nations; tho' in this, as well as other Places, he himself offers only frivolous Reasons, and most commonly censures our Author without understanding him.

[3] De Bell. Punic. p. 79. Edit. Amst. (48. H. Steph.)

[1] On this Question, see PUFENDORF, Lib. VIII. Cap. IX. § 6, &c.

[2] See Chap. IX. of this Book, § 3.

[3] The footnote is wrongly numbered “2” in the original. Digest. Lib. II. Tit. XIV. De Pactis, Leg. VII. § 8. The Roman Lawyers require that, in Cases of Doubt, a Presumption be made that the Agreement is real, and not barely personal. See Mr. NOODT’s excellent treatise, De Pactis & Transact. Cap. IV. and Mr. SCHULTING, on the title De Pactis, § 15.

[4] LIVY, Lib. XLII. ’Tis presumed that a Regard is had to the Prudence and Honesty of the Person one is treating with. See PARUTA, Lib. V. and VII. GROTIUS.

[5] LIVY, Lib. XLII. Cap. XXV. num. 10.

[6] As this Distinction is not very certain, it is better to say, with Mr. THOMASIIUS, (Jurisprud. Divin. Lib. III. Cap. VIII. § 27.) That, in Case of a Doubt, all publick Treaties made with a King are to be considered as real; because, in Case of a Doubt, a King is supposed to act as Head of the State, and for the good of the State.

[7] Digest. Lib. XVII. Tit. II. Pro Socio, Leg. LII. § 9.

[8] See DIONYSIUS HALICARNASSENSIS, Lib. III. GROTIUS.

[9] The same Author in his third Book mentions The Apulians and the Latins; and in his fourth, Turnus Herdonius, and the Latins. AMMIANUS, Lib. XXVI. Sapor King of Persia seized upon Armenia, endeavouring, but unjustly, by Force of Arms, to bring it again under his Jurisdiction; pretending, that after the Decease of Jovian, who was the Person he had concluded the League and Peace with, nothing ought to hinder him from recovering what he could prove belonged to his Ancestors. See such another Instance of Justinian’s Treaty with the Saracens in MENANDER PROTECTOR. Add to this what the Switzers plead after the Death of Henry III. in THUANUS, Lib. CLVII. Anno MDLXXXIX. See also a remarkable Passage in CAMDEN at the Year MDLXXII. where he speaks of the antient League of the French with the Scots. GROTIUS.

[10] Lib. I. Cap. VII. num. 2. Where the Historian tells us those Cities thought their State or Condition changed and therefore revolted from Cyrus. BOECLER, in a Corollary, at the End of his Dissertation intituled Miles Captivus, Tom. I. Dissert. p. 990. conjectures that by the Tributary Cities, here mentioned, we are to understand conquered Cities, reduced under the Dominion of the Conqueror; which is sometimes the Meaning of that Term; and thus the Question is easily decided. But on that Foot one would think there would have been no Pretext for withdrawing themselves from Cyrus’s Government; at least the Pretext would have been very trifling. Besides, supposing the Word Tributariae, when alone, sometimes implies a true and perfect Submission; of which however no Example is produced; it is more natural in this Place to take it in its ordinary Signification, and according to the Practice of the antient Eastern Kings, who frequently were satisfied with demanding some Tribute of the conquered Cities and Nations, and left them in Possession of the other Branches of their Liberty.

[11] See PUFENDORF, B. IV. Chap. II. § 17. with the Notes.

[12] Lib. III. Cap. XX. num. 5.

[1] So Valens would not allow of the Gothick King's Excuse, who said that he had sent some Auxiliary Troops to Procopius who had usurped the imperial Dignity. AMMIANUS in his twenty seventh Book calls it a very trifling Excuse. You have the same Story in the Greek Writers, but under the Name of Scythians, for so they called the Goths. So that Justinian denied that he should break the Articles of Alliance made with Gizerick, if he took up Arms against Gelimer, who had deprived Ilderich the rightful King, both of his Crown and his Liberty. See Cardinal TUSCHUS, pp. upon the Word Tyrannus. Concl. CCCVI. Num 6. CACHERANUS, Decis. LXXIX. Num. 35. GROTIUS.

The Excuse, made by the King of the Goths, was not grounded on their Obligation of sending Succour to the Possessor of the Empire, whether lawfully so or not, by Vertue of their Alliances: He produced a Letter from Procopius, to whom he was made to believe the Empire belonged, by Vertue of his Relation to Constantine. AMM. MARCELLIN, Lib. XXVII. Cap. V. Justinian's Declaration, in Regard to Gelimer, King of the Vandals, may be found in a second Letter which he wrote to that Prince, as produced by Procopius, De Bell. Vandalic. Lib. I. Cap. IX.

[2] LIVY, Lib. XXXIV. Cap. XXXII. num. 1. BOECLER, in his dissertation De Actis Civitatis, Tom. I. p. 870, 871. charges our Author with Want of Exactness in this Place, as this was only a Pretext made Use of by the Romans, who had treated with Nabis, as a lawful King. But our Author says nothing tending to approve of the Application of the Maxim to the present Case. It is sufficient for his Purpose that the Person, whose Words he produces, supposes this Maxim as true in itself.

[1] See the Chapter in PUFENDORF, which answers to this, § 14.

[2] See ALBERICK DE ROSATO, De Statutis qu. 106, 107. GROTIUS.

[3] Properly speaking, the Business is not here to explain the Word First, or enquire whether it may be applied to one or more. In Affairs of this Sort, it is commonly supposed that only one Person outruns the rest: it being very uncommon for several to reach the Goal at the same Time. So that it may be said in general, that when a Reward is proposed for the Man, who shall do such or such a Thing first, only one Person is thought of who shall be before the rest: The Competition of two or more, who may be equally first in Regard to the rest, is out of the Question. So that the whole Business is to know what would probably have been the Will of the Person, who gives the Prize, had he thought of this Case. In Order to this, it is to be considered whether the Thing in Question can be repeated or not, at the same Time. If it can, as in the Case of running to a certain Place, even tho' no mention had been made of several Races one after another, it is highly reasonable to believe that the Person, who proposed the Prize for the Race; designed that, if two reached the Place appointed at the same Time, they should start again. This is an almost certain Method for satisfying his Intention: as it is a hundred to one that this Case will not happen twice together. Rewards being most honourable, when fewer deserve them, it is to be presumed that, when a Man, considering a Thing as difficult, designed to reward the Person, who should first perform it, he intended that the Recompence proposed, should, if possible, fall to one Person. And that the rather, as when two Persons reach the Goal at the same Time, this Action renders their Skill or Agility some what doubtful, and gives Reason to suspect one of them has not exerted himself to the utmost of his Power. But, when the Thing, for which the Recompence is to be bestowed, cannot be repeated at the same Time, as in the Case of scaling the Walls of a Town besieged, it should be considered whether the Prize can conveniently be multiplied, or not. If it can be done without laying too heavy a Burthen on the Person who promised it, as when the Prize is a Crown of small Value, or other Things of the like Nature, which are looked on as bare Marks of Honour; there is very good Reason to presume that the Promiser would easily have consented to that Multiplication. But if the Prize cannot be thus conveniently multiplied, the Enquiry should be, whether it is such as may be divided or possessed jointly, or whether it is indivisible. In the former Case, it is presumed that the Intention was that the Competitors should share the Prize equally, as they have equally deserved it. In the latter it was certainly designed that they should then take the only Method left on such Occasions; which is to cast Lots for the Prize, or leave the whole to one of the Parties, on Consideration of some Satisfaction to be made to his Competitor. So that without having Recourse to the Distinction of favourable and odious, the Case before us, and others of the same Sort, may be decided by reasonable Presumptions of the Donor's Intention. PUFENDORF, in the Chapter which answers to this, has handled the Question some what differently from our Author; but not with all the Distinctions, and on the Foundation I have here employed.

[4] “Scipio, having praised Lelius, called him to the Assembly and declared, he was very well satisfied that Q. Trebellius, and Sext. Digitius had scaled the Walls together; and that he presented them both with Mural Crowns, in Consideration of their Bravery.” LIVY, Lib. XXVI. Cap. XLVIII. Num. 13. This Fact is also related by ZONARAS, who took it from DION. CASSIUS, Excerpt. Peiresc. p. 602. where the learned DE VALOIS has added what was wanting in the Fragments of the Original Author, from the more perfect Text of the Copist.

[5] I know not whence this Fact of Caesar is taken. As to JULIAN, I believe our Author had his Eye on a Passage of AMMIAN MARCELLINUS, which doth not precisely speak of the same Sort of Crowns, nor doth it take notice of any Dispute concerning the disposal of the Prize. The Historian tells us that, after a Battle with the Persians near the Town of Ctesiphon, the Emperor, calling several by their Names, whom he observed to signalize themselves in that Action, gave them Naval, Civic, and Castrensian Crowns, Lib. XXIV. Cap. VI. p. 443. Edit. Vales. Gron. Our Author was induced to suppose the Case here the same as that which happened under Scipio, because the Corona Navalis, and the Corona Castrensis were usually given, the former to him, who first boarded the Enemy; the latter to him who first entered the Enemy's Camp; as may be seen in JUSTUS LIPSIUS, De Militiâ Rom. Lib. V. Dialog. LVII. and CHARLES PASCAL, De Coronis, Lib. VII. Cap. III. &c.

[1] SENECA in his excerpt. controv. VI. 3. has very well observed, that a Circumscription always fobs a Piece of Roguery upon you under the Appearance of Law; what you can discover is lawful; what lies concealed is designed to trick you. QUINTILIAN, Controv. CCCXLIII. For we never run to this Law, (Circumscription he means) but when a just Right is shuffled out by some Knavery or other: You have a Precedent in PLINY's Natural History, Lib. XVIII. Because by the Law of Licinius Stolo only 500 Acres were allowed to any Man; and he himself was condemned upon his own Law, when he thought by the little shift of putting in his Son for a Share, to get more into his Hands. There is the same Story in VALERIUS MAXIMUS, VIII. Chap. VI. 3. See another Instance in TACITUS, Annal. XV. of some pretended Adoptions. Another you have in EMANUEL COMNENUS's Novel, in the Jus Graeco-Romanum. GROTIUS.

[2] Fuscus Arellius in SENECA's tenth Contro. Lib. XI. For it was, no doubt, the Intention of their Oaths, that they should not whilst living be separated, when they so particularly took care, that even Death should not divide them. GROTIUS.

[3] De inventione II. GROTIUS.

[4] I am satisfied our Author here confounds the Case under Consideration with one directly contrary to it, related by CICERO and VALERIUS MAXIMUS, which has been mentioned, Chap. XI. of this Book, § 6. Num. 2. See also QUINTILIAN, Instit. Orat. Lib. VII. Cap. VI. I know no Place in VALERIUS MAXIMUS, where that Writer speaks of the Will made in Favour of Curius. Nor doth any Thing of this Kind occur, where it ought to be looked for, De ratis Testamentis & insperatis, Lib. VII. Cap. VIII. but in the preceding Chapter, Num. 1. we meet with a Will made by that Father, who believing his Son killed in the War, had appointed other Heirs.

[5] So PHILO in his treatise De Specialibus legibus, that Adultery is committed with a Woman, who is only betrothed to some Body else, and for this Reason; ἀλί γὰρ ὁ μολογίαι τοῖς γάμοις ἰσοδυναμοῦσι, because a Contract is as binding as a Marriage. So in the Mosaick Law under the Name of an Ox every tame Animal is meant; and under the Title of a Pit any Hole or Ditch, Exod. xxi. 28. 35. CHASSANÆUS, Catalog. Glor. Mundi, Part. V. Consid. XLIX. GROTIUS.

Criminal Conversation with a Woman promised to another, is considered and punished as Adultery, by the Law of Moses; Deut. xxii. 23, 24. The Roman Laws have followed the same Notion. The Emperors SEVERUS and ANTONINUS answered that the same is to be done in Case of the Violation of a Woman betrothed, as in Adultery, because neither any Matrimony whatever, nor the Hope of Matrimony is to be violated. Digest. Lib. XLVIII. Tit. V. Ad Leg. Jul. de Adulter. coercend. Leg. XIII. § 3. See Collatio Mosaicarum & Romanarum Legum, Tit. IV. § 6. with Mr. DE PITHOU's Note.

[6] In this Quotation, from Declam. CCCL. our Author reads, Si inciderit in Latrones; if a Man fall among Thieves, Mr. BARBEYRAC quotes this Passage according to OBRECHT's Edition, which reads Latrinas. He prefers this reading, because falling among Thieves, does not express a Manner of taking a Man's Life away different from the Idea conveyed by the Word Caedes.

[7] Our Author misapplies this Passage for Want of understanding it right. But we are not to be surprized that the Latin Translator, well known to be none of the most exact, has not expressed the Meaning of it better. The Case is this. The Laws of Athens allowed a Man to dispose of his Estate by Will, as he pleased, if he left no legitimate Male Issue; but with this Restriction, that if he left legitimate Daughters, he could give his Estate only to those who should marry them. Therefore says the Orator, a Father can neither adopt a Man nor leave him his Estate, without giving him his Daughter at the same Time; and consequently if Pyrrhus, having, as is pretended, a legitimate Daughter, had adopted Endius, without marrying his Daughter to him at the same Time, such Adoption would be null, according to the Laws. So that the Argument is not founded on a Necessity of stretching the Law beyond the Sense of the Terms; but on what is clearly implied by the very Sense of those Terms. For they suppose the legitimate Daughters to be natural Heiresses, on Default of Male Issue; except the Father had named a Man for his Heir on Condition he should marry one of his Daughters. Whence it plainly follows, that the Father could adopt no one, without at the same Time giving him one of his Daughters; since the Adoption of a Son implied a Right of Inheritance, exclusive of all other Persons. In this Passage the Words ἐπὶ ταύταις are rendered in illarum arbitrio, at their (the Daughters) Disposal. And ἄνευ τῶν θυγατέρων, Insciis filiabus, non consultis, without the Knowledge and Consent of his Daughters. This false Sense is followed by our Author. But what immediately follows is sufficient for discovering the Mistake. For the Orator adds, Ἐὶ δὲ τῆν θυγατέρα ἐδίδου, but if he has given his Daughter in Marriage, i.e. with his Estate. The late Mr. PERIZONIUS, who, as I have observed since I wrote this Note, occasionally quotes the Passages of Isaeus, in his Dissertationum Trias, Dissert. II. p. 129. has given the true Sense of it in a Manner worthy of his Erudition, but without correcting the Translator's Mistake, to whom he elsewhere does Justice in general in that Volume, Dissert. I. p. 60, &c.

[1] See PUFENDORF, B. V. Chap. IV. § 5.

[2] QUINTILIAN, Controv. CLVII. Servants do some Things more freely upon a Principle of Honesty and Goodness; and even the Slaves we buy think it some times an Argument of their Fidelity, not to obey us. You have an Instance of this Kind in excerpt. legat. in that Part, which treats how Embassies are to be managed; and in what John, one of the Justinian Captains, did contrary to Belisarius's Orders, Gothic. II. and IV. GROTIUS.

The Passage of PROCOPIUS here referred to by our Author, is in the Miscellaneous History, Chap. XXII. which speaks indeed of the same John; but he exceeds the Orders of Justinian, not those of Belisarius.

[3] Digest. Lib. XVII. Tit. I. Mandati vel contra, Leg. LXII. § 1. See, on this Law ANTHONY FAURE's Rationalia, Tom. V. p. 133.

[4] Lib. I. Cap. XIII.

[1] This Distinction has been criticised; as I have observed on the Chapter of PUFENDORF, which answers to this, § 19. Note 2. But I am now of Opinion that the Author may be justified, by shewing his true Meaning, which I think is this. There are some Cases, which there is good Reason to believe the Person who speaks either did, or at least might foresee them; and yet that he never intended they should be included in the general Terms of the Promise; tho' he has not expressly excepted them, because he supposed such an Exception clear in itself. This is what he calls an original Defect of the Will. There are other Cases, which could not be foreseen, but are such as if they could have come into the Mind of him, who speaks, he would have excepted them. This is the Accident inconsistent with his Design.

[2] We have an Instance of this in a Roman Law, which forbids Patrons, or Masters to make their freed Men swear, they will not marry or beget Children. But, it is added, This is to be understood only of such as are capable of having Children; so that if a Master shall require such an Oath of his freed Man, who is an Eunuch; he shall not be punished by this Law. Digest. XXXVII. Tit. XIV. Leg. VI. § 2. GROTIUS.

[1] See CICERO, De Inventione, Lib. II. Cap. XLII. and MARIUS VICTORINUS, in Rhetoric. Ciceron. II. p. 221, 222. Antiq. Rhetor. Edit. Pithaei, Paris 1599.

[1] SENECA IV. Controv. XXVII. In the Law, you say, there is nothing excepted. But however many Things which are not expressly excepted, are yet evidently implied to be so; the Letter indeed is narrow, but the Meaning extensive; and some Things are so very plain, as to want no Exception at all. GROTIUS.

[2] Declam. CCCXV.

[3] This Law has been already quoted, Chap. X. of this Book, § 1. Num. 5. Note 9.

[1] See ROSENTHALIUS, De feudis, Cap. V. Concl. LXXXVI. Num. 2. HEIG. Illustrium XVIII. Num. 16. Part I. COTHMAN, Cons. XI. 32. Clar. § Feudum XXIX. 2. ANDREW KNICH, De vestitis pactis XI. Cap. V. Num. 20. HEN. BOCER, De collectis. GROTIUS.

[2] De Offic. Lib. I. Cap. X.

[3] See CHARLES MOLINAEUS, Consuet. Parisiens. Tit. 1. § 2. gl. 4. Num. 3. FERD. VASQUEZ, De Succession. Creat. L. N. § 18. Num. 80. ANTON. FABER, Rer. in Sabaud. judicat. Lib. IV. Tit. XXX. ZASIVS, in L. Stipulatio hoc modo, Num. 3. De Verb. Obligat. Add. C. quemadmodum de jurejurando, and ALCIAT, C. cum contingat, intitled as before. GROTIUS.

[4] De Officiis, Lib. I. Cap. X.

[5] De Benef. Lib. IV. Cap. XXXV. Here is something else of the same Author's in his thirty ninth Chapter of his fourth Book De beneficiis, *I will go sup with him, tho' the Weather be cold, because I have promised it, but not if it snows. I will go to a Wedding tho' my Stomach be a little out of order, because I have promised; but not if I have a Fever upon me. I will be Bail for you, because I have promised you, but not if you bid me be Security for I don't know what, or would bring me in Debt to the Government. There is always, I say, a tacit Exception in all these Cases, I will do such and such a Thing, if I can, if I ought, if Affairs are so and so. Put Matters into the same Posture when you claim my Promise, as they were in when I made it. There is no Fickleness in my falling off, if any Thing new and unexpected has happened. Why are you surprized that I should alter my Resolutions, when the Conditions of my Promise are altered? Make every Thing the same it was before, and I am still the same. We engage to appear in Court on a certain Day: And yet all those who do not appear are not liable to the Penalty. There are some invincible Obstacles that excuse a Non-performance. The English often made use of this Evasion, (see CAMBDEN, Ann. 1595.) both in their Disputes with the Dutch and the Hanse Towns. GROTIUS.*

[1] I find in HERMOGENES, κατὰ περιστάσιν μάχη. Partit. Sect. IV. p. 16. Edit. Genev. 1614. QUINTILIAN calls this, Collisio casu & eventu. Instit. Orat. Lib. VII. Cap. VII. as the learned GRONOVIVS observes on this place.

[1] De inventione, Lib. XI. and MARIUS VICTORINUS there. GROTIUS.

[2] QUINTILIAN, Declam. CCCLXXIV. The Law which forbids is always more powerful than that which permits. DONATUS upon Phormio, Act I. Scen. II. He says very well, commands; for that Law which does only permit a Thing has less Force with it, than that which commands. See CICERO, Verrin. XI. and what CONNANUS has, Lib. I. Cap. IX. GROTIUS.

I have observed in my first Note on § 23. of the Chapter in PUFENDORF which answers to this, that we are here to suppose the permission general, and the prohibitions or orders particular. Mr. CARMICHAEL mentioned in Note 1. on § X. of this Chapter, admits of the Restriction, Whenever the Matter of the Permission or Prohibition is proposed under the same Terms, and so that the Generality or Particularity lies on the Side of the Persons to whom the Thing is permitted or prohibited; or when the whole Matter of the Permission is implied in the Terms of the Law prohibiting, so that the Permission would have no Effect, if it did not derogate from it. But, it is added, that If the Permission is only accidentally opposite to the Law prohibiting, we are always to presume that he who permits, does it, as GROTIUS speaks, on Supposition, that there is nothing, beside the Thing in Question, which hinders making an Advantage of the Permission. Till then, it is said, the Rule takes Place. But, First, This Presumption may be opposed by another Presumption as well grounded, viz. That he, who gives a general Permission, and at the same Time knows and ought to know that certain Things are prohibited, which may by accident relate to the Matter of the Permission, has by so doing taken away the Prohibitions relating to the Case, in which they may be opposite to the Permission. Secondly, I should be glad to see it made appear by proper Examples, how the Preference of the Law prohibiting to that which permits, follows from the very Nature of the Permission and Prohibitions, independently of Generality or Particularity. The only one I find urged by those who have undertaken to explain the Rule under Consideration is this: Every Roman Citizen is allowed to have a Concubine. Another Law says, No Soldier shall have a Woman with him in the Camp. It is said, the Law last quoted ought to restrain the first, because it prohibits, whereas the other only permits. But this is not the true Reason. When the Law allows a Man to have a Concubine, the Permission implies no more than a Liberty of living with a Concubine, as if she was a lawful Wife, without incurring any Penalty: It says nothing relating to the Place where the Commerce may be carried on. So that, when another Law forbids a Soldier having any Woman, and consequently any Concubine, with him in the Camp; this Prohibition is not, properly speaking, in itself an Exception to the Permission of keeping a Concubine. The Permission remains the same, in the Sense of the Law which grants it.

[3] See the Commentators, and particularly JAMES GODEFROY, on this Rule of the Law: Through the whole Law what is particular takes place of what is general; and that is most regarded, which relates to Particulars. Digest. Lib. L. Tit. XVI. De diversis Regulis Juris, Leg. LXXX.

[4] The Reason is, because when we impose a Penalty, we thereby justify a stronger Desire of obliging the Person, on whom we impose it, to do or forbear certain Things, than when we impose none; for in the first Case, in Order to gain our End, we employ a most efficacious Method which we neglect in the other. PUFENDORF answers our Author in this Place without Reason, in the last Paragraph of the Chapter so often quoted in this.

[5] This Rule is out of its Place. It relates to Cases where there is an absolute and perpetual Contradiction between two Agreements or two Laws, so that one of them must necessarily remain without Force. The Words of CICERO are, Deinde, utra Lex posteriùs lata sit, nam postrema quaeque gravissima est. We are to consider which of the two Laws was made last, for the last is always of most Authority. The Reason of this is given by our Author himself, § 4. Num. 2. But when the Opposition lies only in certain Cases, so that neither of the two Agreements or Laws, though incompatible for a Time, loses any Thing of its Force; the Priority or Posteriority of Time is out of the Question and of no Service for determining which of the two ought to take Place, because there is then no Change of Will. We are to proceed on other Tokens which express a greater Degree of Will; and on that Foot it may easily happen that the Law or Agreement first dated will take Place.

[6] ACONTIUS in Ovid.

*The Father promis'd, and the Daughter swore
He unto Men, and she to Heaven appeal'd:
This the Name of perjur'd, that of Liar dreads,
And do you doubt which is the juster Fear?*

GROTIUS.

[7] This is grounded on a false Supposition; as has been already observed on PUFENDORF.

[1] Appian. Bell. Mithridat. p. 360. Edit. Amst. (214. H. Steph.) See PUFENDORF, B. III. Chap. VI. § 16. and B. V. Chap. II. § 6.

[2] L. in re, and L. si res gesta. D. de fide instrumentorum, L. pactum quod bona fide, C. de pactis. So BARTOLUS, JOHANNES FABER and SALICETUS, whose Opinion prevailed in Court against Baldus and Castrensis, expound, C. de fide Instrumentorum, the Law of Contract. MYNSINGERUS, Decad. X. Cons. XCI. NEOSTAD, De pact. antenuptial. Observ. XVIII. And therefore what Ligniacus produces out of GUICCIARDIN, rer. Italic. Lib. XI. about an Instrument signed by the King, but not yet sealed by him, nor with the Secretary's Hand to it, carries no great Authority with it, nor is the Matter of Fact sufficiently proved. GROTIUS.

[3] LIVY, Lib. XXXIV. Cap. XXXV. Num. 3.

[1] The Question is there decided in Favour of the Person who makes the Offer. Sympos. Lib. IX. Quaest. XIII.

[1] The Word Fault is here taken in a general Sense, which comprehends both Dishonesty and Imprudence.

[2] That is, not only on the Account of a certain Relation, which a Man has to others, or some particular Employment, but also by Vertue of every Engagement he enters into of his own Accord.

[3] Called by the Greeks, ἀμελίου δίκη, An Action of Neglect. See in Decretal. Tit. De injuria & damno dato, and D. ad L. Aquilam & Vicinas rubricas. GROTIUS.

It is in Hesychius that we find Ἀμελίου δίκη explained by ζημίου δίκη. See the Index to the Treasury of the Greek Language, by H. STEPHENS.

[1] So VARRO, Lib. V. Damnum from demptio an Abatement, when there is less made of a Thing than it stood one in. Others rather approve of its Derivation from the Greek δαπάνη an Expence, and will have it to be first Dapnum, afterwards Damnum, as ὕπνος Sopnus, Somnus. Nor is it any Absurdity to deduce it from the Greek δάμνω, which signifies βιάζω to offer Violence, or from ζημία damia, damnum, as regia, regnum. GROTIUS.

The first of these Etymologies is that given by the Lawyers. DAMNUM & DAMNATIO, ab ademptione & quasi diminutione Patrimonii, dicta sunt. Digest. Lib. XXXIX. Tit. II. De damno infecto, &c. Leg. III.

[2] See B. I. Chap. I. § 6.

[3] Thus, by the Roman Law, a Guardian is responsible, not only for Dishonesty, or gross Negligence, but also for what is termed a slight Fault, levis Culpa, that is, if he doth not do what a Master of a Family of moderate Prudence would have done. Cod. Lib. V. Tit. L. I. Arbitrium Tutelae. Leg. VII.

[4] And consequently they may require Amends for the Damage done by the Magistrate by Want of Exactness in the Exercise of his Trust. Our Author here probably had his Eye on the Subsidiary Action allowed by the Roman Law to an Orphan against the Magistrates of the Town, who either had not assigned him a Guardian, when required so to do; or had not taken due Care, in the Choice, or required good Security. See the Title De Magistratibus conveniendis, Digest. Lib. XXVII. Tit. VIII. and Code, Lib. V. Tit. LXXV. But, commonly speaking, private Persons are obliged to bear the Loss, which happens by an Effect of the Negligence or even bad Conduct of the Magistrate, without having any Remedy at Law against the Magistrate, especially one of a very exalted Station. Not that, according to the inviolable Rules of natural Equity, any Magistrate is in Conscience excused making all Reparation in his Power for the Damage he has done private Persons, by a considerable Failure in the Execution of his Office, whatever Impunity the Laws may allow him in that Case. The Whole of the Matter is, that Magistrates being Men, we ought to make some Allowances on that Consideration; and consequently we are supposed to have before-hand cleared them of what happens by the Effect of a small Remissness, or such Negligence as human Frailty cannot always avoid, especially if, when they were guilty of it, there was no probable Reason for apprehending very bad Consequences, or at least that they were near.

[1] Ethic. Nicom. Lib. V. Cap. IV.

[2] Orat. pro Cn. Plancio, Cap. IV.

[3] Ibid.

[1] Here the Author had in his Margin quoted a Law, which says, that if on making an Inventory of an Inheritance, it appears that the Deceased stood engaged to perform something under a Condition not performed at the Time of his Death, we are to place among his Debts, not all that he might one Day be obliged to pay, but the Value of the Expectation of the Performance of the Condition, which ought to determine the Quantity of that conditional Debt, which is as yet uncertain. Digest. Lib. XXXV. Tit. II. Ad. Leg. Falcid. Leg. LXXIII. § 2. See on this Law CUJAS, Recitat. in Paul ad Edictum, Tom. V. Opp. p. 826, 827. Edit. Fabrott.

[1] In the Original we find aut qui alio modo in ipso crimine participat. I believe, says Mr. BARBEYRAC, that the Author designed to write alio simili modo, tho' all the Editions of this Work read as before. For he doth not pretend that these of the inferior Class have no Share in the Crime. The contrary appears from what he says in the tenth Paragraph. And in Reality, without supposing that, by Vertue of what will they become answerable for the Damage? He therefore designed to place in the first Class all such as have, by the prejudicial Action committed by another, an Influence like that of these whom he has mentioned. But he ought to have been more exact. See what I have said on this Subject in my Notes on the Duties of a Man and a Citizen, B. I. Chap. I. § 27. third and fourth Editions.

[1] That is, in such a Manner, that the Advice, Commendation or Flattery contribute something toward the determining him who commits the prejudicial Action.

[2] Totilas in his Oration to the Goths in PROCOPIUS, Gothic. III. ὁ γὰρ ἐπαινέσας, &c. For he who praises the Person who does it, is himself, to be accounted the Author of the Fact. And ULPIAN, Lib. I. C. de servo corrupto. Tho' he would certainly have run away, or stolen something of himself; yet if upon discovering his Intentions to another, that other shall commend his Design, he is bound to make Satisfaction; for we ought not by our Commendations to encourage another to do Mischief. GROTIUS.

See what I have said on this Law in the Chapter of PUFENDORF which answers to this, § 4. Note 2. As for the Passage of PROCOPIUS, the King of the Goths there speaks of a good Action; but the Application may still be just, as the Thought is grounded on the same Principle.

[3] AMMIANUS in his twenty seventh Book applies this Saying to Probus the Prefect. And by the Lombard Law, Lib. IV. Tit. IV. even the Adviser is a Party concerned in making up the Matter. See Rom. i. at the end, and the antient Doctors on that Place. GROTIUS.

[1] NICETAS CHONIATES. in his Michael Comnenus, ὁ ἐμπρησμός, &c. He is not only to be accounted an Incendiary, who sets Fire to his Neighbour's House, but he also, who could have extinguished it, and would not. GROTIUS.

Our Author observed here, what he had repeated in his Notes on Rom. i. 32. that he who doth not hinder another from doing a bad Action, when he ought, is by the Chaldee Paraphrast called רצד, Levit. xx. 3. A Word which signifies confirming others in Evil. And the Rabbins think Persons of that Character mentioned Levit. xxvi. 21.

[1] From certain particular Relations, by Vertue of which a Man is obliged to prevent the Evil others may do; and much more so not to engage them to do it. Of this Sort are all such as have any Authority over others, or are concerned in directing them.

[1] Lex Longobard, Lib. I. Tit. IX. 5. GROTIUS.

[2] See this explained on the Chapter of PUFENDORF, on the Subject, § 5.

[1] See AQUINAS, prim. secund. quaest. XX. Art. V. and L. si servus servum, § si quis insulam, D. ad L. Aquiliam. GROTIUS.

[2] There is a Law which orders, that whoever shall fire a House, and the Fire takes a neighbouring House, is obliged to indemnify, not only the Proprietor of the first House, but also the Owner of the neighbouring House, and the Tenants of both, whose Goods are burnt. Digest. Lib. IX. Tit. II. Ad Leg. Aquiliam, Leg. XXVII. § 8.

[3] Excerpt. V. 5. GROTIUS.

[4] STRABO, Geograph. Lib. XII. p. 813. Edit. Amst. (539. Edit. Paris.)

[1] L. ult. D. de his qui eff. vel. des. The same was observed among the Hebrews. BABA KAMA, Cap. VIII. § 1. and among the English and Danes; see a Treaty of theirs in the learned PONTANUS's Discourse of the Sea. GROTIUS.

The Treaty here referred to by our Author, contains nothing concerning the Case of Mutilation. I find only a Clause, which says, that if an Englishman kills a Norwegian, or a Norwegian an Englishman, each King engages, that the Heirs of the Deceased shall receive all just Satisfaction, and the Murderer shall pay them a Fine. This is in p. 143. Lib. II. Cap. XXI. of the Book quoted by our Author, which was printed at Hardervic, in 1637, under the Title of ISACII PONTANI, Discussiones Historicae; quibus praecipere quatenus & quodnam Mare liberum vel non liberum clausumque accipiendum dispicitur, &c. The Fine, there mentioned, is, perhaps, the Were-gild, or Wergeld, of the antient Saxons; on which see a Dissertation by the late Mr. HERTIUS, De Haerede occisi vindice, § 8. p. 305. Tom. III. Comment. & Opuscul.

[2] See the Law quoted in the preceding Note; and what is said on PUFENDORF's Chapter that answers to this, § 8. Note 2.

[1] See the Chapter of PUFENDORF so often quoted, § 11.

[1] No Doubt he is bound to do this; but tho' he should refuse to do it, the Promise would not therefore be more valid. The Author here reasons on a false Principle, as we have observed on Chap. XI. of this Book, § 7. where we refer to the Treatise of PUFENDORF, where he is confuted.

[2] That is, they are obliged to return the Money if he who gave it demands it.

[1] That is, if he has not freely consented, as he ought to do, by Vertue of the Right which the Person had to oblige him to it. See PUFENDORF, B. III. Chap. VI. § 11.

[2] The Author means, that a Constraint which a Man had a Right to employ on another, doth not hinder his Consent, tho' forced, from passing for a free one; because he has given Occasion to the Constraint, by a voluntary Refusal. But his Thought is expressed in such a Manner as may lead the Reader into a Mistake; and I find that Mr. VITRIARIUS, in his Abridgment of our Author, published with the Title of Institutiones Juris Naturae & Gentium, Lib. II. Cap. XVII. § 14. explains this Passage, as if our Author designed to speak of an express or tacit Renunciation of the Right of requiring that no Injury be done us. Whereas he is only talking of the Validity of Agreements, or Promises, extorted by a just Constraint; as is evident from the Connection of this with the preceding Paragraph. Our Author's Maxim, according to the Turn given it, better agrees with, and is by the Moralists actually applied to what Men do, in a Situation where they have not the free Use of Reason, but so as that they have voluntarily put themselves in that Situation. It is sufficient that we say, that in the Case before us, when a Man is reduced to the Necessity of employing Constraint, for obtaining a Thing which he had a strict Right to demand of us, such forced Consent is to be reckoned voluntary, because it ought to have been so.

This Constraint has not the Mark which gives it a Power of making Engagements void; I mean Injustice in him who uses Violence or Menaces. But if he who is constrained voluntarily submitted to the Direction or Authority of the Person whom he obliges to constrain him, the free Determination which preceded the Refusal, in Consequence of which the Consent was extorted, still farther removes all that is odious, and contrary to Liberty in the Constraint. In short, he who then consented against his Will, has no more Reason to complain and retract, than a bad Paymaster would have, who is sentenced by the Court, or forced by Arms, to satisfy his Creditor, or promise to do it at a certain Time.

[1] De Offic. Lib. III. Cap. XXIX.

[2] See that Historian, Lib. III. Cap. XIII. &c.

[1] See Chap. XXI. of this Book, § 2, and B. III. Chap. XVII. § 2. Num. 6.

[2] These were some Merchants of Thessaly, who escaping from Prison, where they had been detained after they were stripped, cast the Inhabitants of Scyros before the Tribunal of the Amphictyons. PLUTARCH, in Vitâ Cimonis, Tom. I. p. 483. Edit. Wech.

[3] This, probably, was debated in the Assembly of the States of Holland and West-Friesland, when our Author was deputed thither, as Pensionary of Rotterdam.

[4] See too Constitut. Tom. III. Tit. II. in the Constitution of the Year 1543. Cap. XLIV. GROTIUS.

[1] See the Titles of the Digest. Si quadrupes pauperiem fecisse dicatur, Lib. IX. Tit. 1. & de noxalibus actionibus, Tit. IV. PUFENDORF doth not agree with our author in this. In the sixth Paragraph of the Chapter that answers to this, he maintains, that according to the Law of Nature alone, a Master is answerable for the Damage done, even without any Fault of his own, by his Slaves and Beasts. In Regard to Slaves, I was always of PUFENDORF's Opinion; but as to Damage done by a Beast, I was not entirely satisfied with his Reasons, tho' I have not yet testified my Dislike of them; for I still found some Perplexity from which I could not free myself, without allowing the Matter some Consideration when more at Leisure. I had some Years ago an Opportunity of doing this; and I am glad to do Justice to the Gentleman who gave it me. It is Mr. DANIEL PURY, of Neufchatel, who at an Age when it is sufficient Commendation, that a Man has tolerably retained the Lessons of his Masters, let the World see that he could take out of his own Stock. Among his Observationes Juridicae, which he published, and defended, at Basil, in 1714, for taking his Degree of Licentiate in Law, we have one (VII. de noxâ Bestiae) in which declaring for the Opinion of GROTIUS, he confutes what is urged in Favour of the contrary Opinion. He, however, confines himself to what regards the Damage done by a Beast, on a Supposition, that the Decision of this Question implies the Decision of that relating to Slaves. As it is said, that the Establishment of Property could not be formed, so as to deprive a man of a right to indemnify himself in some Manner, for the Mischief Beasts may do us; he answers, First, That all human Establishments being subject to some Inconveniencies, that in Question might follow from the Establishment of the Right of Property, and the Establishment itself remain useful; because the Inconveniency resulting from it is much less considerable than those prevented by it. Secondly, That all that can be inferred from the Reason alledged, is, that the Reparation of Damage done by a Beast, ought to be made out of what the Master of the Beast would not have had without it; that is, out of the Overplus of what it cost him, and what it would bring him if sold. As for the other Reason, That the Reparation of the Damage is a Title infinitely more favourable than the Acquisition of Gain; it is answered, that if this Maxim has any Meaning not evidently false; it signifies, that in an Equality of Right, or in a disputable Point, the Advantage is to be allowed, rather to the Party which would suffer Damage, than to him who would gain. Now, granting this, nothing but what has been said would follow in the Case before us. If, on one Hand, the Person who has received Damage from a Beast, may require any Reparation, supposing there is wherewithal to make it; on the other Hand, the Master of the Beast ought not to indemnify him so as to suffer Damage himself: For, both as he is Master, and as he was very far from having any Hand in the Mischief, he has the same Title, and a Title of a longer standing, with him whom the Beast has injured. But, adds he, the Maxim on which the Argument must be built in this Case is false. For when the Right is either fairly disputable, or equal on both Sides, the Rules of Justice evidently require, either that the Thing in dispute be divided, or that the Affair be decided by Lots. This is the Purport of the Observations made by the Author I have quoted. For my Part I am of Opinion, that the present Question, concerning Damage done by a Slave, ought to be decided in a different Manner from that concerning Damage done by a Beast. First, Then, in Regard to Damage caused by a Beast, I think it is evident, that, according to the Law of Nature alone, and independently of Civil Laws, he who has received Damage from a Beast belonging to another Man, can require no Satisfaction, when the Owner of the Beast doth not, by his Fault, contribute to the Damage done; that he cannot, I say, demand any Reparation, even out of the Profits arising to the Owner from the Possession of his Beast. A Beast, as it is an Animal void of Reason, can do no Damage, properly so called. When it is said, that in the State of Nature, he who has received any Damage from a Beast, might have taken his Satisfaction on the Beast; this is only a figurative Way of speaking, and not very exact, which must be laid aside when we would give just and philosophical Ideas. I should as soon say, that when a Tree falls on a Man in a Forest, and wounds him, he might have taken his Satisfaction for the Damage by Cutting the Tree, by Burning it, or making some other Use of it. But Secondly, The Case is not the same in Regard to a Slave. This Slave is a Man, and as such, capable of doing Damage, properly so called; and consequently, subject to the Law of Nature, which orders Satisfaction for the Damage. The Obligation of repairing a Damage is a general Obligation, from which no Man can be excused in what State soever. The Persons concerned may indeed renounce their Right of demanding Satisfaction; but then the Renunciation must be perfectly clear, and in Case of a Doubt, it is natural to presume, that as no one can, by his own Authority, free himself from the Obligation of repairing the Damage he has done; so no one easily excuses others that Obligation, in Regard to himself. So that the Exception of Cases, where a Damage is done to another, is, and ought to be, tacitly implied in all human Establishments, when it doth not appear that any Abatement is made of that Obligation. Now it cannot be shewn, that the Establishment of Property of Goods implies this Dispensation; and there is the less Reason to presume it, as Slaves would be encouraged, and in some Measure privileged, to insult Men, if the Master was not obliged, either to repair the Damage done by them, or deliver them up to the Person injured. A Master when he buys, or otherwise acquires the Property of a Slave, might therefore, and ought, to reckon, that his Right does not extend so far as to deprive those who may be insulted by the Slave, of the Satisfaction they might have taken on his Person, in the State of Nature, and which they have not renounced. It is his Business to consider whether he is willing to accept of the Advantage arising from the Slave's Service, together with the Burthens belonging to it. I could say much more in Confirmation of what I have here laid down; but what I have said is sufficient, especially in a Note, which is already long enough.

[1] See the Example of Vivian, in CASSIODORUS, IV. 41. who was touched with Remorse for, and repented of an unjust Accusation. GROTIUS.

[1] The Rights of Embassies are in some Manner grounded on the Law of Nature, which authorises all that is necessary for procuring or maintaining Peace and Friendship among Men. See PUFENDORF, B. II. Chap. III. § 23. As to such Rights as are not necessary for that End, if Embassadors can claim them, it is only because the Custom being introduced of allowing Embassadors to enjoy such Rights, whoever receives an Embassy, is, and may be, supposed to receive it on that Foot, unless he expressly declares he will not submit to the established Custom, as he is at full Liberty to dispense with it, when he excuses others on the same Score.

- [2] POMPONIUS, L. si quis. D. de legationibus, If any one shall strike an Ambassador, tho' sent from an Enemy, he is thought to violate thereby the Law of Nations, because Embassadors are accounted sacred. And for this Reason, if, whilst Embassadors of any Nation are resident with us, War be declared against their Principals, they still remain at Liberty. For this is agreeable to the Law of Nations. And therefore Quintus Mucius used to say, that he who struck an Ambassador, ought to be delivered up to the Enemy that employed him. By the Julian Law against publick Violence, not only those who insult an Ambassador, but such as insult any of his Retinue, are declared liable to the Penalty. As ULPIAN replies in L. lege Julia, D. ad legem Juliam de vi publica. JOSEPHUS, Antiq. Hist. Lib. XV. mightily cries up the sacred Privileges of Embassadors, who, he says, are honoured with the same Name as the Angels and Messengers of GOD. VARRO, Lib. III. De Lingua Latina, The Persons of Embassadors are sacred. CICERO, Verr. III. The Rights of Embassadors are secured both by a divine and human Guard, and the very Name ought to be so sacred and venerable, as to be safe and inviolable, not only amongst Allies, but amidst the Arms of contending Foes. The Author of Pelopidas's Life, When he thought himself secured by the Rights of Embassy, which every Nation used to regard with the profoundest Reverence. DIODORUS SICULUS, (in Excerpt. Peires. N. 248.) calls this, τῶν πρεσβευτῶν ασυλίας, A Privilege of Security, that the Sacredness of Embassadors intitles them to. In STATIUS,

*An Ambassador,
Whene'er he will, returns in Safety.*

Thebaid. Lib. II. (v. 373, 374.)

And again,

*Embassador is a Name,
By ev'ry Age in Veneration had.*

Ibid. (v. 436).

St. CHRYSOSTOM, καὶ οὐδέ τινὲν κοινῶν, &c. Without any Manner of Regard to the common Law of Mankind, that never suffers an Ambassador to be insulted. SERVIUS, upon Aeneid X. ver. 101. By the Right of Nations screened from every Injury. Not to set down all the Passages to this Purpose, see LIVY, of the Laurentes. DION CHRYSOSTOM, De lege & consuetudine. VELLEIUS PATERCULUS, init. Lib. II. MENANDER PROTECTOR. FELIX's Epistle to Zeno, in Append. Cod. Theod. by SIRMUNDUS. Totilas, in PROCOPIUS, Goth. III. Πᾶσι μὲν, &c. To speak in general, it is an established Custom, even with all the Barbarians in the World, to reverence the Character of Embassadors. The same has SCAFFNABURGENSIS related of the barbarous and uncivilized People. AIMONIUS attributes these Expressions to King Clodovaeus, And lastly, by the united Force of divine and human Laws, which ordain, that those who are commissioned the Mediators and Composers of Hostilities, shall themselves be free from Hurt and Molestation. For in War and Arms it is an Embassy alone that can sollicit Peace; and the Person employed in that friendly Service is no longer an Enemy. See also RADEVICUS, in Append. See CROMERUS of the Polanders, Lib. XX. LEUNCLAVIUS of the Turks, Lib. VIII. MARIANA of the Moors, Lib. XII. GROTIUS. What our Author here quotes from VARRO is not in that Writer. The bare Manner of quoting him makes one immediately suspect some Mistake; for what is now extant of the Piece De Lingua Latina, begins with the fourth Book. I am satisfied I have discovered the Origin of this false Quotation, and it will hence appear, that the greatest Men sometimes quote on the Credit of others. DENIS GODFREY, in a Note on the Digest. Lib. L. Tit. VII. De Legationibus, Leg. XVII. copying what CUJAS has said in his Observations, Lib. XI. Cap. V. takes the Words of that famous Lawyer for a Passage from the Roman Author. CUJAS there observes, that the Priests called Feciales, took Cognizance of such Cases as related to the Violation of the Rights of Embassadors; and refers to VARRO, Lib. III. De vitâ populi Romani. After which he adds, Nor is this to be wondered at; since, as we have said, the Bodies of Embassadors are sacred. The Transcriber took these for the very Words of the Latin Author; and in Order to correct his Original, quotes the third Book of VARRO's Work now extant; not knowing that the Passage in View belongs to a Work that is lost; of which NONNIUS MARCELLUS has preserved this Fragment, under the Word Feciales. They (the Romans) ordered, that if any Violation was offered to the Embassadors of any Nation, the Offenders, tho' of the Nobility, should be delivered up to the State thus injured; and twenty Feciales were appointed for taking Cognizance of, and judging in such Matters. p. 529. Edit. Mercer. Our Author, who had read GODFREY's Note, was the more easily induced to trust him, as he might have remembered to have read the like Words elsewhere. For ASCONIUS, a Commentator on CICERO, writing on those Words of the Orator, For the Character of an Ambassador ought to be such, that he may be safe; not only among Allies, but even among the Arms of the Enemy; says, The Orator added the last Words invidiously, when speaking of Magistrates. For, continues he, the Persons of Embassadors are preserved inviolable by the Law of Nations, in making Treaties, or regulating the Terms of Peace and War. In Verrem. I. Cap. XXXIII. GODFREY, quoting the Passage of CICERO, gives it thus, Ought not Embassadors to be safe among Enemies? Our Author cites it exactly in the same Manner below, § 6. which leaves no Room for doubting what gave Occasion to the Mistake under Consideration.

[3] Ἐργον ἄσεβες, A wicked irreligious Thing, says PLUTARCH, in his Life of Aemilius, relating what Gentius had done. JOSEPHUS, Antiq. Hist. Lib. XV. Τοῦτο τὸ ὄνομα, &c. This awful Name is able to reconcile one Enemy to another. And therefore what can be a greater Act of Impiety than to murder Embassadors, who are interceding only for what is just and reasonable? GROTIUS.

[1] Lib. I. Cap. XXXII. Num. 6.

[2] Lib. VI. Cap. XVII. Num. 8.

[3] Orat. Philip. V. Cap. X. See BOECLER's Note on VELLEIUS PATERCULUS, Lib. II. Cap. VII.

[4] Aeneid. Lib. VII. ver. 369, 370.

[5] CROMERUS XXX. GROTIUS.

[6] As the Carthaginians, mentioned Chap. XV. § 7. Num. 5. To this Article are referred feudatary Princes, as those of Germany are in Regard to the Emperor.

[7] To this may be added, a remarkable Instance which our Author himself has given in his Letters, I. Part. Epist. 364. viz. that of the Chancellor Oxienstiern, who, tho' a Subject, after the Death of Gustavus, received so great a Power from the States of Sweden, that he was authorized to send Embassies as he thought proper, for making War and Peace, &c. As the Case was extraordinary, our Author, in the Letter now quoted, among other Instances, produces that of Embassadors, who being sent from Flanders by the Archduke, by Vertue of a Power received from Madrid, were received in France and England, as Embassadors of the King of Spain. See what he says further in that Letter, where he tells the Chancellor how he answers the Objections proposed to him on that Occasion, when he was sent to Paris, with the Character of Ambassador from the Crown of Sweden.

[8] This Question is useless, in Regard to the Conqueror; who will be far from even enquiring whether he ought to receive Ambassadors from him whom he has deprived of his Kingdom. But as a Conqueror, who had entered into the War for some Reasons manifestly unjust, doth not by his Victory acquire a true Right over the conquered Kingdom, till the lawful Sovereign renounces all his Pretensions in some Manner or other, the other Powers, as long as they can do it without some great Inconveniency, ought still to acknowledge him for the true King, who really is so; and consequently are obliged to receive his Ambassadors, and allow them all their Rights and Privileges. In that Case the Conqueror is to them the same as the Usurper, mentioned by our Author, Chap. XVI. § 17. The Difference he makes between them is grounded only on the Effects which he improperly ascribes to his pretended Law of Nations, as we shall shew in the proper Place.

[9] We have this Fact from LIVY, Lib. XLIV. Cap. XLV. Num. 1. and Cap. XLVI. Num. 1. But says GRONOVIVS, the Roman General did not detain the Heralds of Perseus, because that Prince being deprived of his Kingdom, had then no Right to send Ambassadors; it was because, thinking him self in a Condition of really depriving him of his Kingdom, he would not hearken to any Proposals of Peace; and because those Ambassadors came without Leave, which it was customary to ask. See LIVY, Lib. XXXII. Cap. XI. and Lib. XXXVII. Cap. XLV. So that no Injury was done them. Paulus Aemilius contented himself with returning Perseus no Answer by their Mouth. I find, however, that Perseus sending afterwards three Ambassadors with Letters, Paulus Aemilius sent them back without any Reply, because Perseus still took the Title of King, Lib. XLV. Cap. IV. Whence it follows, that he must not have considered the Ambassadors of that Prince as invested with the Privileges they might have before enjoyed, but looked on their Persons as sacred and inviolable only as far as he pleased.

[10] See JOHANNES MARIANA, Lib. XXII. 8. about the Ambassadors of the City of Toledo to the King; and CRANTZIUS, about the People of Flanders. Saxon. XII. 33. GROTIUS.

[11] And Magentius, in ZOSIMUS, Lib. II. Μαγνέντιος δε, &c. Magentius was a pretty While considering with himself, whether he should dismiss Philip without giving him an Answer, or detain him, contrary to the Privilege of Ambassadors. This Philip was come from Constantius. GROTIUS.

The Thing did not actually happen, but all Things seemed disposed for the Fact. See the Historian, Hist. Lib. III. Cap. LXXX. Num. 4. Edit. Rycq. The Passage quoted from ZOSIMUS, is Lib. II. Cap. XLVII. Num. 3. p. 217. Edit. Cellar.

[12] Annal. Lib. III. Cap. LXXIII. Num. 2.

[13] De Bell. Civil. Lib. III. Cap. XIX. Num. 2. See the Notes of CELLARIUS on the Place.

[1] DONATUS, on the Prologue to Hecyra, To be admitted to Audience is a Right the Law of Nations has given Ambassadors. GROTIUS.

The other Right is mentioned immediately after, and I am surprized that our Author has not taken Notice of it. It is not allowable to offer Violence to an Ambassador; therefore, for his own Security, he calls himself, not the Speaker of a Prologue, but an Ambassador.

[2] Lib. XXI. Chap. X. Num. 6.

- [3] We are farther to observe, with THOMASIVS, that even when there is an Obligation of admitting Embassadors, it is a bare Duty of Humanity; so that the Refusal alone can never be considered as a real Injustice. See that Author's Institut. Juris prudentiae Divinae, Lib. III. Cap. IX. Num. 15, &c. as also his Notes on HUBER, De Jure Civitatis, Lib. III. Sect. IV. Cap. II. § 10. where he quotes a Treatise which he much values, but which I have not seen, published under a feigned Name, and entitled JUSTINI PRESBEUTA, Discursus de Jure Legationis Statuum Imperii, Eleutheropol. 1700.
- [4] See CAMDEN in the Year MDLXXI. The fourth Question proposed there. GROTIUS.
- [5] Pericles was of Opinion, that no Herald or Embassador should be received from the Lacedemonians, while they remained in Arms. THUCYDIDES, Lib. III. Cap. XII. Edit. Oxon. The Lacedemonians had refused to make up the Quarrel in an amicable Manner; as appears from the Conclusion of B. I. and the Athenians still continued to offer them that Way, for they told Melesippus, that when the Lacedemonians had laid down their Arms, and were returned to their own Country, they might then send them Embassadors, who should be well received. It was evidently their Resolution to come to a War; and Melesippus was considered as one sent only in the Character of a Spy; for which Reason he was conducted out of the Country, by Persons who had Orders to see he spoke to nobody in his Journey. See an Example of the like Sort in APPIAN, Bell. Mithr. p. 311. Edit. Amst. (181. Edit. H. Steph.) and in ARISTIDES, the Rhetorician, Orat. Panathen. Thom. I. p. 250. Edit. P. Steph. Our Author means, that in Circumstances like that, there is good Reason for refusing Audience to the Embassadors of a Power, which has taken up Arms. He had no Design of laying it down as a general Rule, that Embassadors from an armed Enemy may always be refused, as ZIEGLER and others ridiculously understand him. He was not apt to fall into such a gross Self-Contradiction.
- [6] See SERVIUS upon the eighth Aeneid, concerning this Custom of the Romans. GROTIUS.
Our Author here means the Custom of enquiring whence the Embassadors came, and what was their Business, before they received them. The following Passage is what he had in View; at least I know no other that can be meant. ILLE INTRA TECTA VOCARI IMPERAT. He (King Latinus) acted differently from the Roman Custom. For if News was brought of the Arrival of some unknown Embassadors, first Enquiry was made into their Business, after which the inferior Magistrates went out to them; and lastly, the Senate informed themselves of their Demands without the Walls of the City; and thus, if it appeared proper, they were admitted. On Verse 168.
- [7] LIVY, Lib. XLI. Cap. XXIX. Num. 20.
- [8] PROCOPIUS, Gothic. Lib. III. Cap. XXXVII.
- [9] Idem. Lib. II. Cap. XIX. Where, however, another Reason is alledged.
- [10] The People through whose Country they passed, would not suffer them to enter their Towns; and some, looking on the Places through which they passed, as defiled, made great Purifications. This is what the Historian says, without mentioning the Reception they met with from the States to which they were sent. Lib. IV. Cap. XX. p. 402. and Chap. XXI. p. 404, 405. Edit. Amst.
- [11] Lysimachus gave him Audience; but bid him Take Care he came not a second Time. To which the Philosopher answered, that He would not, unless Ptolomy sent him. This Account we find in DIOGENES LAERTIUS, Lib. II. § 182. Edit. Amst.
- [12] So Andrew Burgus Caesar's Ambassador, was denied Admittance into Spain, MARIANA, Lib. XXIX. There is another Instance of this in CROMERUS, Lib. XX. GROTIUS.

[13] In the Retreat of the ten thousand Greeks, of which XENOPHON has left us the History, the Generals resolved that they would receive no Heralds while they were in an Enemy's Country. They were moved to this Resolution, by their having found, that, under Pretence of Embassies, Spies had been sent among them, who corrupted the Soldiers, and caused several of them to revolt. De Expedit. Cyri, Lib. III. Cap. III. § 4. Edit. Oxon.

[14] LIVY, Lib. XXXVII. Cap. XLIX. Num. 3.

[15] Idem. Lib. XLII. Cap. XXXVI. Num. 5, 6. This and the foregoing Instance relate rather to the Manner of receiving an Embassy, than the Reasons for refusing it.

[16] The Emperor Charles V. commanded the Embassadors of France, Venice, and Florence, sent to declare War against him, to be conducted to a Place thirty Miles distant from his Court. GUICCIARDINI, Lib. XVIII. BELLAJUS, Lib. III. GROTIUS.

The Fact mentioned in the Text of our Author, is recorded by SALLUST, Bell. Jugurth. Cap. XXX. Edit. Wass. The Example produced in the Note is not to the Purpose. The Question there turns on Embassadors, who were actually with Charles V. whom he put under an Arrest, till he had Advice, that his Embassadors in England and France were safe.

[17] See Mr. THOMASIIUS's Jurisprud. Divina, Lib. III. Cap. IX. § 25, &c.

[1] MENANDER PROTECTOR, speaking of the Emperor Justin the Second, ὁ δὲ παρὰ τὸν κοινὸν τῶν πρεσβυτέρων θεσμὸν εἶχεν ἐν δεσμοῖς, But he, contrary to the common Rights of Ambassadors, put them in Chains. See ERN. COTHM. Resp. XXXII. Num. 29, &c. Vol. V. GROTIUS.

On the contrary, Bajanus, King of the Avari, imprisoned the Embassadors of Justin II. as the Greek Author relates the Matter, Excerpt. Legat. Just. Justinian. & Tiber. Cap. IX. where we find the Words quoted by our Author.

[2] In Reality, if the Consent of Nations was the only sure Foundation of the Rights of Embassadors, it would be hard to prove the Maxim in Question, and shew how far it extends. But our Author had not sufficiently consulted the Principles of the Law of Nature, which would have furnished him with clear and certain Reasons. See what Mr. THOMASIIUS says on the Subject; who, in my Opinion, has treated it better than any one, in his Juris prudentia Divina, Lib. III. Cap. IX. § 36, &c. He first distinguishes between Embassadors, who have done nothing amiss, from those who have behaved themselves ill; and then such as are sent by one Power to another, with which it is at Peace, from those who come from an Enemy, First then, there is no Difficulty in Regard to Embassadors, who coming to a State with which their Master is at Peace, have injured no Man. The most common and most evident Maxims of the Law of Nature require they should be perfectly secure; so that, if such an Ambassador be insulted or affronted in any Manner whatsoever, his Master has a just Reason for declaring War. The holy King David furnishes us with an Instance of this Kind. 2 SAMUEL Cap. X. As to Embassadors who come from an Enemy, and who have done nothing amiss, there Security depends entirely on the Laws of Humanity, before they are admitted as Embassadors. For an Enemy, as such, has a Right to annoy his Enemy. So that, independently of Agreements or Treaties, by which a Prince or State becomes in some Sort a Friend for a Time, they can be obliged to spare the Ambassador of an Enemy only by Vertue of the Sentiments of Humanity, which we ought always to retain, and which oblige us to have a Regard for whatever tends to the Preservation of Peace. When therefore some Act of Hostility is committed on an Ambassador sent by an Enemy, before he is admitted as such, no fresh Cause of a War is given; only that, which the Enemy before had, is thereby confirmed, supposing the War just and lawful. I make this Supposition, because if the War was unjust, that is, if he who sent the Ambassador had really injured him to whom he sent him, and thus given him Reason for taking Arms against him; the Acts of Hostility committed by the latter on the Ambassador of the former, do not make the Right change Sides; unless the Aggressor sent his Ambassador to offer his Enemy a reasonable Satisfaction; for then this ought to be considered as a Case of Necessity, which carries an imperfect Obligation with it. But when an Enemy's Ambassador is once admitted, the Power thus admitting him does thereby manifestly engage itself, tho' usually in a tacit Manner, to give and procure him entire Security, while he behaves himself well. So that if this Engagement is broke through, a just Cause of War is given, or at least the Right is transferred to the other Side; because all Agreements give a perfect Right. Nor are Heralds, who are sent to declare War, to be excepted in this Case, provided they do it in an inoffensive Manner. For, according to the Custom of civilized Nations, this Declaration implies a tacit Protestation that we design to use the Way of Arms in a Manner conformable to right Reason, and with an Intent to procure a good Peace. So much for innocent Ambassadors. But Secondly, in Regard to such as have rendered themselves culpable in any Manner, they have committed the Fault either of their own Head, or by their Master's Order. If the former, they forfeit their Right to Security, when the Crime is evident and heinous. For no Ambassador whatever can enjoy more Privilege than his Master would have had in the same Case; and such a Crime would not be pardoned in the Master. By heinous Crimes we are to understand such as tend either to disturb the Government, to take away the Lives of the Subjects of the Prince to whom the Ambassador is sent, or to do them some considerable Prejudice in their Honour and Estates; particularly if the Persons thus injured are dear to the Prince. When the Crime directly affects the State, or him who is at the Head of it; whether the Ambassador has actually used Violence or not, that is, whether he has excited the Subjects to Sedition, has himself conspired against the Government, or favoured the Plot; or whether he has taken Arms with the Rebels or the Enemy, or engaged his Retinue so to do; Revenge may be taken on him, even by killing him, not as a Subject, but as an Enemy. For his Master himself would have no Room to expect better Treatment. If he makes his Escape, his Master is obliged to give him up, on Demand. But, if the Crime, how manifest and heinous soever it may be, affects only a private Man, the Ambassador ought not, on that Account alone, to be considered as an Enemy to the Prince or State; but as, if his Master had been guilty of any Crime of the same Nature, Satisfaction ought to be demanded of him, and Arms are not to be taken against him till he had refused it; the same Reason of Equity requires that the Prince, at whose Court the Ambassador commits such a Crime, should send him back to his Master, desiring him either to give up the Offender or punish him. For to detain him in Prison, till his Master shall either recal him in order to punish him, or declare that he abandons him, would be to testify a Diffidence of the Master's Justice, and in some Sort affront him, because the Ambassador still represents him. Besides, when a Man has no Right to punish another, he has, commonly speaking, no Right to seize his Person. The Case is different when the Crime is committed by his Master's Order; for then it would be imprudent to send the Ambassador back; because there would be good Reason to believe that the Prince who commanded the Commission of the Crime will be far from either surrendering or punishing the Offender. The Person of the Ambassador therefore may be secured till the Master shall repair the Injury done both by the Ambassador and himself. As to those who do not represent the Prince's Person, such as bare Messengers, Trumpets, &c. they may be killed on the Spot, if they come to abuse a Prince by Order of their Master. Nothing is more absurd than what some maintain, viz. that all the Ills done by Ambassadors by Order of their Master ought to be charged on their Master only. Were it so, Ambassadors would have more Privilege in the Country of another Prince than their Master himself, should he appear there. And, on the other hand, the Sovereign of the Country would have less Power in his own Dominions, than a Master of a Family has in his own House.

[3] Lib. II. Cap. IV. Num. 7.

[4] I think this Passage supposes the contrary. The Historian had said that the Conspirators being committed to Prison, there was some Debate whether the Embassadors should be treated in the same Manner. Now, would this have been a Question, if it had been a settled Maxim that an Ambassador is screened by his Character, tho' he commits Acts of Hostility? The very Words quoted by our Author insinuate that the Law of Nations doth not extend so far as to impose an Obligation of sparing an Ambassador, who commits Acts of Hostility; as if the Historian had said, tho' it was evident that the Conduct of the Embassadors was such as authorised their being treated as Enemies, yet the Romans were pleased to allow them the Privilege which they would otherwise have enjoyed by the Law of Nations, but of which they had rendered themselves unworthy. So that here is an Exception to the Rule, which declares Embassadors forfeit their Rights the Moment they engage in any Plot, Treason, or such like Conspiracies. I had written this long before I read a Dissertation of the late Mr. COCCEIUS, De Legato Sancto, non impuni, published at Francfort on the Oder in 1691. where I had the Pleasure to see that celebrated Lawyer explain this Passage and that of Sallust almost in the same Manner. Sect. III. § 2, &c.

[5] Bell. Jugurth. Cap. XXXIX. Edit. Wass. (XXXIV. Vulg.) This Passage likewise is misapplied by our Author; the true Sense of it is given by the Commentators. The Historian means tho', in strict Justice, Bomilcar might have been put to Death, according to the Law of Nations, on Account of Massiva's Assassination, without being allowed Time to plead his own Cause; yet in order to use him with Tenderness (ex aequo bonoque fit reus, &c.) he was allowed that Favour, which brought him off, as appears by the Sequel of his Story. Thus those Words, Comes ejus, qui Romam fide publicâ venerat, an Assistant in the Embassy sent to Rome, are so far from signifying that, because he was in the Retinue of a Person who came with a safe Conduct, nothing could be done to him by the Law of Nations; that, on the contrary, they insinuate, that, having committed so heinous a Crime, he had thereby rendered himself the more worthy of speedy Punishment as he came under the Protection of the publick Faith. Consult Mr. COCCEIUS, as quoted in the foregoing Note. Thus the two Passages, quoted by our Author, rather prove the contrary of what he concludes from them; tho' his Application of them is approved of by WICQUEFORT, in his Embassador, B. I. Chap. XXVII. Tom. I. p. 821, 822. Edit. Hague 1681. In Reality, on examining all that the Antients have said concerning the Security of Embassadors, it will appear that this Security relates chiefly, if not solely, to those who do not misbehave themselves, and consists only in this, that the Right of War cannot be employed against them, or any other Method be taken with them, which would otherwise justify falling on the Subjects of the Power, from whom they are sent.

[6] True. But this is not to be extended beyond what the Design and Custom of Embassies require. Now in Order to this, it is sufficient, that we cannot consider an Ambassador as having forfeited his Privileges for all Sorts of Crimes, but only for such as are incontestable and heinous.

[7] The Question does not here turn on the Advantage that may result from the Punishment, when the Crime is once committed, but on what is necessary to be done for preventing the Commission of it. The Security of Embassadors ought so to be understood, that it implies nothing contrary to the Security of the Powers to whom they are sent, and who neither would nor ought to receive them on other Terms. Now who does not see that Embassadors would be less bold in attempting any Thing against the Sovereign or Members of a foreign State, if they were apprehensive that, in Case of Treason, or any considerable Misdemeanour, the Sovereign of the Country might do himself Justice, than if they have nothing to fear but Correction from their Master, which they may easily avoid, either because they are often secure of his Connivance or tacit Approbation, or because they hope to find Means, to retire elsewhere before he can be apprised of their Crimes.

[8] It is a Matter of Prudence to consider whether there is Room to believe the Ambassador's Master will approve of his Conduct or not. But, in Regard to the Right, the Uncertainty in this Case privileges a Prince to punish a Crime, for which he is not assured of having Satisfaction any other Way, and which might be capable of engaging him in a War, if he was obliged to wait till he knew what the Master of the Ambassador would do in the Affair. Our Author doth not however here advise undertaking a War on the Prince, for revenging his not punishing his Minister; as COCCEIUS understands him in the Dissertation above quoted, Cap. III. § 8. He only means, in Answer to the Objection before us, that, even supposing the Prince might punish the Ambassador (which he denies) a War will not always be avoided by that Means; because the Ambassador's Master may approve of his Conduct, even tho' the Offender is punished. Now, in that Case, either he would endeavour to do himself Justice for such Punishment, as an Outrage committed on the Person who represented him; or there would be just Reason for taking his Approbation as an Affront, and consequently for declaring War against him on that Account, if it be otherwise judged convenient to undertake it; which our Author without Doubt supposes. On that Foot then his Answer is not amiss. But it must be allowed that the Objection, and consequently the Answer, are nothing to the Purpose; for the Reason given in the preceding Note.

[9] This Inconveniency would be to be feared, if a Right was given, to the Power to whom an Ambassador is sent, of punishing the least Fault, and without distinguishing the Cases, mentioned Note 2. But even supposing the worst, the Inconveniency will be at least counterpoised by the Dangers to which a State would be exposed, if the Ministers of foreign Powers might always flatter themselves with the Hope of not being punished by the Sovereign at whose Court they reside. Here a strict Regard is to be had to what is required by the Security and Interest both of him who sends, and of him who receives Ambassadors. The Design and Effect of Embassies equally demand this Attention.

[10] Orat. Philipp. VIII. Cap. VIII.

[11] This holds good while the Ambassadors have done nothing by which they forfeit the Right of Security and Independence, which the Design of their Employ requires. Mr. COCCEIUS in his Dissertation more than once quoted, Sect. II. maintains, however, that all Ambassadors are subject to the civil and criminal Jurisdiction of the foreign Power, in whose Country they exercise the Function of their Character. But he reasons either on Prejudices taken from what the Roman Law ordains in Regard to another Sort of publick Ministers, sent to their own Sovereign; or on Principles which do not destroy the Foundation of the Right in Question, viz. That, as a Prince will be far from purposely subjecting himself to the Jurisdiction of another, neither can it be grounded that he would subject himself to it in the Person of his Ambassador, who represents him. See PUFENDORF, B. VIII. Chap. IV. § 21. and Chap. XI. § 3.

[12] Stephen, King of Poland, did so to the Muscovites, THUANUS, Lib. LXXIII. Anno MDLXXXI. And Elizabeth to the Scot and Spaniard. You have both these Instances in CAMBDEN at the Year MDLXXI. and LXXXIV. GROTIUS.

[13] In all Probability our Author has here copied ALBERIC GENTILIS, who relates this Fact in his Treatise De Legationibus, Lib. II. Cap. XXI. But I find nothing like it in POLYBIUS, not even in the Fragments collected from all Parts with extraordinary Diligence, tho' GENTILIS on this Occasion says Ut in selectis habet POLYBIUS.

- [14] He was afterwards thrown down from a Rock together with all the Hostages that were retaken. See LIVY, Lib. XXV. Cap. VII.
- [15] So Charles V. commanded the Ambassador of the Duke of Milan, as his Subject, not to stir from his Court. GUICCIARDIN, Lib. XVIII. GROTIUS.
- [16] DION in excerpt. legat. ὅτι νεανίσκοι τινῶν, &c. When certain young Gentlemen of the Carthaginians were come Ambassadors to Rome, and there acted some unbecoming Things; they were remitted to Carthage. The Carthaginians delivered them up. But the Romans inflicted no Punishment on them: They were dismissed. GROTIUS.
- [17] The Gauls had not those Ambassadors in their Power, so that they were not in a Condition to do themselves Justice. LIVY, Lib. V. Cap. XXXVI. Num. 8.
- [18] It appears, from what has been said in the preceding Notes, that it is not requisite to wait for the last Extremity in this Case.
- [19] Mr. COCCEIUS, in the Dissertation so often quoted, makes his Advantage of this against our Author, as if he had thereby acknowledged that an Ambassador is subject to the Jurisdiction of the Power, to whom he is sent. For, says he, to arrest and examine a Man are juridical Acts of a Judge in Regard to one under his Jurisdiction. But the Consequence is far from being just; for the Detention and Interrogatories, which, out of the Case of extreme Necessity here supposed, may be considered as Acts of Jurisdiction, are here only a Means absolutely necessary, for Security against the evil Designs of the Ambassador. A just Self-Defence authorises us to do all that, without which we cannot shelter ourselves from Danger. And the Prince, who orders an Ambassador guilty of Treason to be arrested, no more exercises an Act of Jurisdiction by so doing, than a private Man, who kills an unjust Aggressor, in Defence of his own Life, exercises the Power of Life and Death.
- [20] Pelopidas was imprisoned by Alexander Pheraeus, because when he was Ambassador he excited the Thessalians to assert their Liberty. PLUTARCH and the Latin Writer of Pelopidas's Life. GROTIUS.
Pelopidas was not Ambassador to Alexander, but to the Thessalians. So that this relates to another Question.
- [21] See SERRANUS in Henry IV. GROTIUS.
Our Author probably means to speak of the Letters and Papers belonging to the Secretary of the Spanish Ambassador, who was put under an Arrest with Mairargues, when the treasonable Designs of the Person last mentioned were discovered. But the Life of Henry IV. here quoted was not written by Mr. DE SERRES (SERRANUS) as every one knows; since his History comes down no lower than Charles VII. It is the Work of his Commentator Monliard. Our Author probably had read the Latin Translation of that Work, printed at Francfort in 1627. in which the Whole passes without Distinction under the Name of JOHN DE SERRES, tho' the History is continued to the Year 1625. The Fact, here mentioned, may be seen p. 844. of that Book.
- [22] See the Passage quoted Note 17. of this Paragraph.
- [23] This Objection is made by the Chorus in our Editions; and I know not by Vertue of what Authority it is attributed to the Herald, both here and in his Excerpta ex Tragoed, & Com. Graec. p. 317.

[24] And in this Sense must we take what Theodahatus the Goth says to Justinian's Ambassadors in PROCOPIUS, Gothic. I. σεμνὸν μὲν τὸ χρῑμα, &c. All the World look upon the Character of Ambassadors to be in every respect Sacred and Honourable, which Honour they may justly claim as long as by their good Behaviour they maintain the Dignity of their Employment. But Men generally agree, that it is lawful to kill an Ambassador, if he affronts or is injurious to the Prince he is sent to, or if he attempts another Man's Bed. But here, when the Ambassadors had proved that it was scarce possible to suspect them of Adultery, since they never stirred abroad without a Guard, they very prudently subjoin, τοὺς λόγους δὲ ᾧσους, &c. As for what the Ambassador speaks, if it be nothing but what he has received from his Principal, tho' the Message be not altogether so grateful as it ought, he is no ways culpable, but he who employed him must bear the blame; for the Ambassador does in this Case only discharge the Commission he was entrusted with. See CAMDEN too in the aforesaid Passage of the Year MDLXXI. GROTIUS.

The Maxim here laid down by the King of the Goths, if considered in itself is evidently contrary to our Author's Notions, and agreeable to the Principles we have laid down in the foregoing Notes. It is another Question, whether it was well applied in the Case then in Hand. The contrary appears from the Sequel of the History. As to the second Case, relating to the Excuse made by the Ambassadors, the Reason by them alledged is to be understood with some Restriction. If an Ambassador has received Orders to make some Proposal or Declaration, which he very well knows must be disagreeable to the Power, to whom he is sent, and which he sees implies, either in itself or in that Power's Way of thinking some Injustice, or even something abusive, provided he deliver his Commission in a civil Manner, he ought to be considered only as an Instrument, and is only to be dismissed, without the least Violence; particularly, if he expresses some Concern at being charged with so odious a Commission. But if he himself insults the Power, to whom he is sent, with Words or otherwise, it would be to no Purpose for him to pretend, he does it by his Master's Orders; that Excuse will only more strongly authorize that Power to call him to an Account for it, because, as he had acted by Order, there would be no Room to hope for any Satisfaction from his Master.

[25] That Author says that the Herald attempted to force from the very Altar some Heraclides who had fled to Athens; and that the same Athenians, who put him to Death, made publick Mourning for him. De Vit. Sophist. Lib. II. in Herod. Cap. V. p. 550, 551. Edit. Olear.

[26] His Words are these: "If a Father plunders Temples, or makes an Attempt on the publick Treasury, shall his Son impeach him to the Magistrates? That indeed would be a Crime; he ought rather to appear in his Father's Defence, if he is accused. But ought not one's Country to be considered preferably to all other Duties and Obligations? Most certainly; but it is an Advantage to our Country that Children should be dutiful to their Parents. If the Father endeavours to seize on the Government, or betray his Country, shall his Son be silent? He shall entreat his Father to desist; if Intreaties have no Effect on him, he shall represent to him the Enormity of his Crime and even employ Menaces. At last; if the Ruin of his Country is concerned in the Affair, he shall prefer the Safety of his Country to his Father's Life." De Offic. Lib. III. Cap. XXIII.

[1] The Passage has been already quoted Note 14. on the third Paragraph.

[2] On the contrary, it appears that the Veians made that Compliment to the Ambassadors from Rome; as the learned GRONOVIVS has observed. See LIVY, Lib. IV. Cap. LVIII. Num. 6, 7. And, to shew that this is a real Mistake of the Author, and not a bare Fault in the Writing, I shall here add that, in the first Editions we read only, & olim Veientibus edictum, &c. that published in 1632. reads, & olim à Romanis Veientibus edictum, &c.

because our Author afterwards added another Example: & Romanis à Samnitibus, si quod, &c. The first Addition would have been unnecessary, if he had not all along thought that the brutish Answer was made by the Romans. So that he never perceived his Mistake, as appears from another in the Close of the seventh Paragraph: For telling the same Story of two Things which happened at different Times, he, in the first Edition, ascribed to Scipio alone what he relates on the Credit of LIVY and VALERIUS MAXIMUS. But he afterwards distinguished the Facts and Persons, as they appear in the two Authors quoted. This Remark is of some Use for justifying the Liberty and the Care I have taken to correct such Inaccuracies in several Places, into which our Author has fallen in this and the following Chapter more frequently than in any other of the whole Work.

[3] LIVY, Lib. X. Cap. XII. Num. 2.

[4] The Sicilians in Alliance with the Athenians seized upon the Embassadors of Syracuse which were sent to some other States; THUCYDIDES, Lib. VII. So too the Argives seized the Embassadors sent by a few factious People from Athens, and brought them to Argos. Id. THUCYD. Lib. VIII. And the Epirots intercepted the Aetolian Embassadors going to Rome, and extorted from them a Ransom: One of them only was, at the Request of the Romans, set at Liberty without paying any Thing, POLYB. excerpt. legat. Num. 27. See the Opinions of PARUTA, Lib. XI. and of BEZAR, Lib. XXI. about the French Embassadors to the Turk, whom the Spaniards took upon the Po, and murdered. And CRANTZIUS, Saxon XII. about the Embassadors of the States of Flanders to the French King, whom Maximilian apprehended. Belisarius's good Nature and Clemency are mightily applauded for sparing Gelimer's Embassadors who had been sent into Spain, and were returned to Carthage which was then under the Roman Jurisdiction. PROCOPIUS, Vandal I. GROTIUS. The Second of these Instances is not related with the utmost Exactness. They were the Parilians, or Men of a certain Ship of the State, who being employed in transporting those Embassadors, delivered them up to those of Argos.

[5] These Embassadors did not pass through the Territories of the Athenians; they were betrayed and put under an Arrest in Thrace, and from thence conducted to Athens. See THUCYDIDES, Lib. II. Cap. LXVII.

[6] It was not known whither those Embassadors were going. The Historian only says, that they were put under a strong Guard, to be used as Guides. De Expedit. Cyri. Lib. VI. Cap. III. § 7.

[7] They were with Darius before the Battle, and were taken in that Battle. Alexander released them. See ARRIAN, De Expedit. Alexandri, Lib. II. Cap. XV.

[8] See APPIAN. Excerpt. legat. Num. 19. GROTIUS.

[9] Those Embassadors were sent to the Latins themselves, in order to engage them in an Alliance against the Romans, and the Latins conducted them to Rome in Chains. This Account is given us by DIONYSIUS HALICARNASSENSIS, from whom our Author without doubt took this Instance. Antiq. Roman. Lib. VI. Cap. XXV. p. 346. Edit. Oxon. (p. 361. Edit. Sylb.)

[10] It is quite another Thing, if any one shall, out of his own Territories, contrive to surprize the Embassadors of another State; for this would be a direct Breach of the Law of Nations. And this Affair is contained in the Thessalians Speech against Philip in LIVY. GROTIUS.

[11] Lib. XXXIX. Cap. IV. Num. 1, 2.

- [1] See some Passages just now cited at § 1. And DONATUS upon that of the Eunuch, Convenire & Colloqui, go and have a little Chat. This is to be understood, as if he had said, Good Mr. Soldier, by your Favour permit me to do what any Enemy, even in the height of War and Hostilities, is allowed. GROTIUS.
- [2] Our Author probably had in View the Passage where the Historian, speaking of the God Mercury, says the Antients attributed to him the Invention of Embassies, and Treaties made between Enemies, as well as the Caduceus, by Vertue of which those who go to treat with the Enemy are allowed to return in Safety. Biblioth Histor. Lib. V. Cap. LXXV. p. 235, 236. Edit. H. Steph.
- [3] HERODOTUS, Lib. VII. Cap. CXXXVII.
- [4] Digest. Lib. L. Tit. VII. De Legationibus, Leg. XVII.
- [5] Annal. Lib. I. Cap. XLII. Num. 3.
- [6] The Passage is quoted above, in what I have added on Note 2. on the first Paragraph.
- [7] De Irâ, Lib. III. Cap. II.
- [8] Lib. IV. Cap. XVII. Num. 4.
- [9] Idem, Lib. XXIV. Cap. XXXIII. Num. 2, 3.
- [10] Lib. IV. Cap. II. Num. 15.
- [11] This Remark is made by PHILO the Jew, De Legat. ad Caium, p. 1006. Edit. Paris.
- [1] DIODORUS SICULUS, in Excerpt. Peiresc. Σκιπίων, οὐκ, ἔφη, δεῖν πράττειν ὃ τοῖς κατὰ χηδονίοις ἐγκαλοῦσιν, Scipio said they ought not to do that themselves which they condemned the Carthaginians for: And accordingly the Romans, tho' they knew what the Carthaginians had done, let them go. See APPIANUS. And Constantius dismissed Titian sent to him from Magentius, tho' Magentius had detained Philip sent from Constantius. ZOZIMUS, Lib. II. See also some Stories in CROMER, Lib. XIX. and XXI. and PARUTA about the Embassadors of Venice stopt in their Journey to France, Lib. VII. GROTIUS.
- [2] Lib. XXX. Cap. XXV. Num. 10.
- [3] Lib. VI. Cap. VI. Num. 2.
- [1] LIVY, Lib. I. Cap. XXIV. Num. 5.
- [2] Digest. Lib. XLVIII. Tit. VI. Ad Leg. Jul. de vi publicâ. Leg. VII.
- [3] See FRAXINUS CANAEUS's Epistles, p. 75. and 279. GROTIUS.
- [4] SERRANUS in Henry IV. GROTIUS.
In the same Place, which I have quoted in Note 20. on Paragraph 4. which, however, doth not belong to that Author, but to his Continuator.
- [5] This Instance is both ill related and misapplied. The Achaians, not being satisfied with the Proposals made to them by the Embassadors sent from Rome, to put an End to the Difference between them and the Spartans, arrested all at Corinth, whom they suspected to be Spartans, and even went to the House of Orestes, one of the Embassadors, to take by Force those who had retired thither. The Embassadors complained of this Treatment, as an Attempt by which the Achaians made a Rupture with the Romans. We have this Account from PAUSANIAS, Lib. VII. Cap. XIV. p. 219. Edit. Graec. Wech. 1583. So that this relates to the Right of Refuge, spoken of at the End of this Paragraph.

[6] In this Case there is commonly a Distinction of Crimes made. See PARUTA, Lib. X. where the King of France very much resenting something of this Nature, is entirely satisfied. See the same Author, Lib. IX. GROTIUS.

[7] On this Subject see an excellent Dissertation by Mr. THOMASIIUS, De Jure Azyli Legatorum aedibus competente, which is the Sixteenth of those printed at Leipsic.

[1] That is, an Ambassador's Goods may be seized, wherever they are found, and the Right of Reprisal may be used, of which our Author treats B. III. Chap. II.

[1] That Author speaks of the Indians, in STOBÆUS, Florileg. Serm. XLIV.

[2] De beneficiis III. 15. GROTIUS.

[3] This HERODOTUS in his Clio has called τὸ ὀφείλειν χρέος. GROTIUS.

[4] Lib. XV. p. 1085. Edit. Amst. (709. Paris.)

[5] S. De legibus. GROTIUS.

[6] Ethic. Nicom. Lib. VIII. Cap. XV.

[7] Ibid. Lib. IX. Cap. I.

[8] What our Author observes here in regard to the Persians, on the Testimony of HERODOTUS and APPIAN of Alexandria, is nothing to the Purpose. They speak of Persons who run in Debt; but do not in the least insinuate that the Persians had no Action at Law to oblige Payment.

[1] The Romans did upon this Account make War upon the Senones; APPIAN. Excerpt. legat. IV. and X. upon the Illyrians and the Genoese; POLYBIUS, Excerpt. legat. CXXV. and CXXXIV. upon the Issians; DION. Excerpt. legat. XII. upon the Corinthians; LIVY, Lib. III. upon the Tarentines; DIONYSIUS HALICARN. Excerpt. legat. IV. You have several Examples of the French and Germans in AIMONIUS, Lib. III. Cap. LXI. and LXVIII. and in WITHIKIND, Lib. II. GROTIUS.

In the Instance here produced from DION CASSIUS, our Author has changed the Persons. The Issians were only the Occasion of the War, which the Romans declared against Teuta Queen of Illyrium, on her abusing and even putting to Death the Embassadors sent to her from Rome, to intercede in Favour of the Island of Issos. The Fact is related at large in POLYBIUS, tho' with some Difference of Circumstances. Hist. Lib. II. Cap. VIII. &c.

[2] See Chryst. ad Stagir. Lib. III. GROTIUS.

[3] See his Oration, Pro Lege Maniliâ, Cap. V.

[1] The Right of Burial is indeed founded on the Law of Nature. See what is said on PUFENDORF, B. II. Chap. III. § 23. Note 9. second Edition.

[2] Orat. De Consuetudine.

[3] He places this Duty in the same Rank with those of giving Alms, and raising a Person who has fallen, Lib. I. Controv. I. p. 85. Edit. Gron. major.

- [4] The Author, probably, had his Eye on the Passage of this Author, which shall be quoted Note 29. on this Paragraph. I know not any Place where PHILO formally calls the Custom of burying the Dead, a Law of Nature.
- [5] I find this, where, speaking of the Siege of Jerusalem, he says, that the Jews, as if they had agreed to trample on the Laws of their Country, and those of Nature and common Humanity, and the Respect due to the Deity, let the Bodies of the Dead rot above Ground. Bell. Jud. Lib. V. Cap. II.
- [6] The Passages, quoted by our Author, for the most Part, shew that it was mentioned as the Law of Nature, properly so called.
- [7] See Chap. XII. of this Book, § 26. and B. III. Chap. VII. § 5. Num. 2.
- [8] Var. Hist. Lib. XII. Cap. LXIV. p. 755. Edit. Periz.
- [9] Idem. Lib. XIII. Cap. XXX.
- [10] It is called so by the Chorus, speaking of the Burial which Creon refused those who had been slain in a Battle between him and Adrastus, near Thebes. Supplic. v. 378.
- [11] Speaking of the same Story with EURIPIDES, he says, that the Athenians espoused the Cause of the Argians, looking on the Violation of a Law common to all Mankind, as an Injury to themselves. Orat. XIII. Tom. I. p. 202. Edit. P. Steph.
- [12] Pharsal. Lib. VII. v. 799, &c.
- [13] Thebaid. Lib. XII. v. 642. where he immediately after speaks of Nature, which ought, in Conjunction with the Gods, to favour an Attempt tending to avenge its Rights. For the Case is the same here as in the Passages quoted Notes 10 and 11, v. 644, &c.
- [14] It is where he speaks of the Manner how Tiberius treated those who were charged with being in Sejanus's Party. After having put them to Death he forbid their being buried. Annal. Lib. VI. Cap. XIX. Num. 3, 4.
- [15] The Orator says this also, on Occasion of the War between the Athenians and Thebans, because the latter refused Burial to the Slain of Adrastus's Army. Orat. XXXI. Cap. II.
- [16] The Poet speaks of Gildon, who added this Act of Barbarity to what he had been guilty of, in killing the Sons of his Brother Masceres. Bell. Gildon. v. 395, &c. Concerning the succinct and elegant Phrases here employed, Exuere hominem, fratrem, &c. see the learned and judicious Observations of the late Mr. CUPER, Lib. I. Cap. VIII. He there quotes the Words, without mentioning the Poet's Name, and seems to suppose them spoken of Creon. Whence it appears, that he mistook this for a Passage in STATIUS. He had in his Memory confounded these Words of CLAUDIAN with those of the Thebais of STATIUS, Lib. XII. ver. 165, 166. Or, perhaps, he had lately read the Chapter in ALBERIC GENTILIS on this Subject, where that Lawyer having quoted the Passage of STATIUS, adds, And another Latin Poet, speaking of another Creon, says, he divested himself of the Man. De Jure Belli, Lib. II. Cap. XXIV. p. 456, 457. But, however that may be, I thought I might make this Remark, to shew, occasionally, that my Author is not the only great Man who is liable to Mistake, when he quotes by his Memory.
- [17] That Emperor doth not speak precisely of Refusal of Burial, but only of the Inconveniency attending the not allowing the Dead to be buried in Towns, as the Poor cannot be so soon carried out of Town, for Want of having left where withal to defray the Expences of a Funeral, and, consequently, must lie several Days above Ground. Novell. LIII.

[18] Epist. CCCCXCI.

[19] SOPHOCLES, in his Ajax, and in his Antigone he calls it Θεῶν νόμους. GROTIUS.

[20] Supplic. v. 563.

[21] PLUTARCH, in his Theseus, will have it, that they obtained the Privilege of Burying from the Thebans, by Contract, and not by Force of Arms. But PAUSANIAS, in his Attici, says, it was by Force of Arms. GROTIUS.

[22] Our Author here mistakes ISOCRATES's Thought. The Orator, to shew the Deference at that Time paid to the Athenians, says, that those who had the Command at Thebes, shewed more Regard for their Demands than for the Laws made by the Gods themselves, for the Burial of the Dead. p. 269. The Author, reading this Passage hastily, and without observing the Sequel, imagined the Words ὑπὸ τῆς πόλεως, referred to the City of Thebes, whereas it relates to Athens.

[23] He there speaks of a different War, viz. that with the Amazons, Tom. 1. p. 204. But as this Instance is produced after the other, and our Author met with κενταῖθα which insinuates, that the Thought of ARISTIDES belongs to both, he has referred it immediately to the former.

[24] Our Author, in his Margin, had quoted the Oration for Quintius; but I am well assured that there is no Passage in all that Oration, where the Word Humanitas is applied to the Right of Burial. I believe I have found the Occasion of the Mistake. Our Author, collecting Materials for this Chapter, made Use of Authorities which he found collected by other Writers. It is probable he had before him a long Note of PETER DANIEL, on a Passage of PETRONIUS, whom he quotes, § 2. where that Commentator explaining the Words tralatitia humanitas, produces a great Number of Passages, which mention some Duties of Humanity, not unlike that which regards the Burial of the Dead. He there sets down two from the Oration for Quintius, one from Chap. XVI. where it is said, that Good Men abate of their Right, even in Favour of Strangers and Enemies, on a Principle of Honour and Humanity. I find this quoted by PETER DE FAURE, in his Semestria, Lib. II. Cap. I. p. 11. almost with the same View. The second is taken from Chap. XXXI. where the Orator speaks almost to the same Purpose. Here our Author has confounded in his Memory, these Passages, with those relating to Burial. My Conjecture will be confirmed by another Inadvertency of the like Nature, which I shall observe in Note 27. on this Paragraph, and which flows from the same Source. Our Author may have been led into this Mistake by a Reflection we meet with in the Oration immediately following that for Quintius. I shall the more willingly set it down here, as it is remarkable; and I am surprized it was forgot in this Chapter, where it would have been natural to insert it. CICERO, speaking of Parricides, says, "Our Ancestors did not judge proper to expose the Bodies of those Wretches to wild Beasts, lest such Food might encrease their Ferocity; nor to throw them naked into the River, lest they should defile that Element which serves to purify other Things. They left such Criminals the Use of nothing common to Mankind. For what is so common as Air to the Living, Earth to the Dead, the Sea to those who sail on it, the Shore to those who are thrown on it." Orat. pro S. Roscio Amerin. Cap. XXVI. The Punishment of Parricides was to be sown up in a Leather Sack, and thrown into the Sea.

[25] Who has this Expression too, Lib. VI. Cap. XII. That last and greatest Act of Piety, to bury Strangers, and the Poor. GROTIUS.

- [26] Lib. V. Cap. I. which is entitled De Humanitate & Clementiâ, where several Instances are produced of Persons who have buried their Enemies; some of those are afterwards quoted by our Author.
- [27] Here we have the other Mistake, which will confirm what I have said in Note 24. Our Author had here quoted, in his Margin, QUINTILIAN, Lib. XII. Cap. ult. Institut. Orat. But that Chapter contains nothing relating to Burial. But he had seen the following Passage, thus quoted, both in PETER DE FAURE, Semestria, Lib. II. Cap. I. and in the Comment on PETRONIUS above-mentioned. “As a Father of Eloquence he formed them; and as an experienced Sailor will instruct the Mariners, concerning Shores and Ports, tell them the Signs of an approaching Storm, and how to work the Ship in a fair or contrary Wind, not only on a Motive of Humanity, but even out of Love for the Employment.” Lib. XII. Cap. XI. Among other Passages of the Declamations of QUINTILIAN the Father, he had also read one, where the Words Compassion and Religion are used, and that in Relation to Burial. Hence it is easy to conclude, that he has, by Mistake, quoted the Oratorical Institutions of the Son, instead of the Declamations of the Father or Grandfather.
- [28] De Beneficiis, Lib. V. Cap. XX.
- [29] It is where he introduces the Patriarch Jacob making great Complaint of the false News told him by his Sons, concerning Joseph’s Death. The afflicted Father bewails nothing so much as his Want of Burial; and addressing himself to his dear Son, he says to him, among other Things. Had it been absolutely necessary for thee to die a violent Death, it would have been less Trouble to me to have heard thou fell by a Man’s Hand; for tho’ the Murderer had been inhuman enough to leave thy Body unburied, Perhaps some Traveller seeing thy Corps, and touched with Compassion for human Nature, would have taken Care of, and buried it. Lib. de Joseph. p. 530. Edit. Paris.
- [30] The Passage is quoted, Note 14.
- [31] “It is therefore to be enquired and considered with what View the Charges (of the Funeral) were defrayed. Whether the Person who took Care of it did it as a Duty to the Deceased, or his Heir, or on a Motive of bare Humanity; whether he followed the Dictates of Mercy, or Piety, or Affection. The Design of shewing such Mercy may be also distinguished; for the Person may have been merciful and pious, only that the Corps might not lie unburied, not with a View of doing this Act at his own Expence,” &c. Digest. Lib. XI. Tit. VII. De religiosis & sumptib. funer. Leg. XIV. § 7.
- [32] “The Heir is rather to be commended than condemned, who doth not obey the Testator’s Will, by throwing his Body into the Sea; but, being mindful of the Condition of human Nature, buries it.” Digest. Lib. XXVIII. Tit. VIII. De condition. Institutionum, Leg. XXVII.
- [33] That Historian doth not speak precisely of Burial, but of Antoninus’s Goodness, who ordered the Bodies of even the lowest Rank of Men to be buried at the publick Expence; whereas that Compliment was usually paid to Persons of Distinction only. Vit. Anton. Cap. XIII.
- [34] Supplic. v. 379, 526, 530. See likewise SOPHOCLES, Ajax, v. 1352.
- [35] “In what does Justice consist more, than in doing that for Strangers out of Humanity, which we perform for our own Relations out of Affection; which is much more certain and just, as it is not done for a Man who is sensible of nothing, but to GOD alone, in whose Presence a just Action is a most acceptable Sacrifice.” Inst. Div. Lib. VI. Cap. XII. Num. 31.

[36] Opus Benignum, an Act of Kindness. Cathemerin. Hymn X. v. 61, &c. Edit. Cellar.

[37] Lib. VI.

[38] Theb. Lib. XII. v. 165, 166.

[39] Vita Caracallae, Cap. IV.

[40] He is there speaking of the Treatment given to the Body of Alexander, King of Epirus, which being cut in two, part of it was sent to Consentia, &c. Lib. VIII. Cap. XXIV. Num. 14, 15.

[41] The same Author, in his 24th Iliad, says, that Jupiter, and the Gods, were angry with Achilles, for not using Hector's Body so handsomely as he ought. GROTIUS.

[42] "Some indeed have thought the Burial of the Dead superfluous, and said, there is no Harm in letting the Body lie neglected and unburied. But the impious Wisdom of such Men is repugnant both to the common Sense of Mankind, and the Voice of GOD, which conspire in commanding that Action." Instit. Divin. Lib. VI. Cap. XII. Num. 27.

[43] Thebaid. Lib. III. v. 97, 98.

[1] "The Manner of Burying the Dead, used by Cyrus, in XENOPHON, seems to me the most antient. The Body is returned to the Earth, and being so placed, is lodged in its Mother's Bosom." De Legibus, Lib. II. Cap. XXII.

[2] Hist. Natur. VII. 54. where there is also this Passage, By Burying is meant any Kind of privately disposing of the Body; but by Interment, when it is laid in the Ground. GROTIUS. See, concerning the Signification of the Word Sepelire, the fine Observations of the late Mr. CUPER, Lib. I. Cap. VII.

[3] Our Author here only gives us a Latin Version of his own, without telling us where he finds this Passage of the antient Poet. It may be seen in STOBÆUS, and is Part of a large Fragment, in which MOSCHION describes the savage Life of the first Men, and the Manner how Mankind by Degrees became civilized. The Original stands thus,

Κἀκτοῦδε τοῦς, θανόντας ἄριζε νόμος
Τύμβοις καλύπτειν κάπιμοιρᾶσθαι κόνιν,
Νεκροῦς ἀθάπτους μηδ' ἐν ὀφθάλοις ἐᾶν,
Τῆς πρόσθε θοίνης μνημόνευμα δυσσεβές

Eclog. Tit. XI.

[4] JOB x. 9. And PHILO against FLACCUS, Ἄνθρώποις ἢ φύσις, &c. Nature has ordained the Earth as Man's proper Place, not only while he lives, but also when he is dead, that she who receives us at our coming into the World, may receive us too at our going out. But as there is no laudable Action done by Man, of which GOD has not imprinted some Similitude in some other Sort of Animal, so does it likewise happen in this very Affair. PLINY reports of Pismires, Lib. XI. 30. That they only, besides Men, of any Creature, bury one another. And yet he himself, speaking of the Dolphins, says, Lib. IX. 8. That they are seen carrying away their Dead, for Fear some Sea Monster should tear it in Pieces. And VIRGIL, of the Bees, has this remarkable Observation. Georg. Lib. IV. ver. 255, 256.

*And Crowds of Dead, that never must return
To their loved Hives in decent Pomp are born:
Their Friends attend the Hearse, the next Relations mourn.*

DRYD.

SERVIUS says, With all the Solemnity of a Funeral. GROTIUS.

[5] Tuscul. Quaest. Lib. III. Cap. XXV. The Original of this Fragment is preserved by PLUTARCH, Consul. ad Apol. 110, 111.

[6] Supplic. v. 531, &c.

[7] Lib. V. v. 1260.

[8] Hist. Natur. Lib. II. Cap. LXIII.

[9] It ought to be proved, both that the Custom of Burying is as antient as the first Parents of Mankind, and that Men had then a Notion of a Resurrection. The History of those old Times is too concise to allow us to advance any Thing certain on those Heads.

[10] Our Author, trusting his Memory, has altered PLINY's Sense. The Passage is Lib. VII. Cap. LV. where, having treated all that was usually said of Hell, and the State of Souls in another Life, as childish Fables, he adds, "Of the same Sort is Democritus's idle Assurance, that the Bodies of Men would be preserved and live again; but he himself never returned into the World." So that PLINY is not here speaking of Burial, of which he had treated in the preceding Chapter, but only of some Notion of a Resurrection of Bodies, which the Philosopher had framed to himself. On this see Mr. LE CLERC's Philological Index to STANLEY's History of the Oriental Philosophy, at the Word Resurrection. Our Author had read, or remembered this Passage, as if it had run thus, Concerning the Preservation of Bodies, on the Account of a Promise of Resurrection. But had he consulted the Original, he would soon have seen it was impossible to find that Sense there.

[11] Cathemerin. Hymn X. ver. 53, &c. Edit. Cellar.

[12] Declam. VI. See the Prophecy about Jeroboam's Posterity, for the Punishment of his Sins, 1 Kings xiv. 11. And TERTULLIAN, on the Resurrection. HOMER, in his third Odyss.

Τῶν κέ οἱ οὐδέ τι θανάοντι, &c.

*When dead, not a few Ashes would they give Nor one small Turf to screen th'unhappy Corps;
But all exposed to Dogs, and Fowl, a Prey
They left it.*

He speaks of Aegysthus, whom as an Adulterer, and the Usurper of the Crown, the Argives had thrown out unburied, but whose Remains were afterwards interred by the more compassionate Orestes, as you will hear by and by. Menelaus, in SOPHOCLES, of Ajax, Ἄλλ' ἀμφὶ χλωρῶν, &c.

*But let his Carcase
Rot on these yellow Sands, and feed the Fowl
Which haunt the Beech, or swim the liquid Deep.*

But this too Ulysses, a Precedent of singular Prudence, does forbid there. And Sophocles in his Antigone, to her great Praise, says, Ἦτις τῆν ἀυτάδελφον, &c.

*Nor would she let her murther'd Brother lye
Unburied, a Prey to voracious Dogs Or Birds.*

APPIAN, Civil. I. of some People slain by Marius's Order, Ταφήν τε οὐδενί, &c. Nor was any one permitted to give any of the Persons killed, common Burial, but such Men as these were left to the mangling Mercy of Birds and Dogs. AMMIANUS MARCELLINUS, at the Beginning of his eighth Book, speaking of Julian, And for Fear that the ravenous Fowl should devour the Bodies of the Slain, he commanded them all without Distinction to be put into the Ground. GROTIUS.

In the Passage here quoted from HOMER, the Poet is not speaking of what actually happened, but of what Menelaus would have done, had he been at Argos. This is evident from the Sequel of the Discourse. As to the Question itself, it is, perhaps, most natural to say, that the Custom of interring Bodies, which is the most antient, was introduced for avoiding the Nuisance of bad Smells, exhaling from them, especially in hot Countries, which were first peopled. To this other Notions may afterwards have been added, which differed according to Times and Places. The Reason, mentioned by our Author, has not made an Impression on all Nations; for we see the Hyrceanians gave human Bodies to be devoured by Dogs, which they kept for that Use. And the Magi, a famous Set of Philosophers in the East, did not bury their Dead, till they were torn by Dogs and Birds. See HERODOTUS, Lib. I. Cap. CXL. CICERO, Tuscul. Quaest. Lib. I. Cap. XLV. with DAVIES's NOTES. SEXTUS EMPIRICUS, Pyrrhon. hypotyp. Lib. III. Cap. XXIV. § 227, with those of Mr. FABRICIUS. To which may be added, a Piece in the Hist. Critiq. Tom. XII. Art. X.

[13] De Invent. Lib. I. Cap. LV.

[14] Aeneid, Lib. X. v. 557, &c.

[15] Lib. VI. Cap. XII. Num. 30.

[16] Lib. De Tobia, Cap. I.

[17] Upon the same Account AGATHIAS says, it is a Custom, Τὰ ἀισχυνητῶν τῶν ὠδίνων ἐπακαλύπτειν, To cover and hide what comes from a Woman in Labour. Thus does it appear, both at our Birth and our Death, how very nothing we are by Nature. To denote which the Jewish Doctors said, that all People, both of the highest and lowest Condition, when born or deceased, must be wrapped up alike. GROTIUS.

[18] SERVIUS, upon the eleventh Aeneid. For Sepulture is a Benefit that all Mankind is intitled to. GROTIUS.

[19] De Benefic. Lib. V. Cap. XX.

[20] Declamat. VI. Cap. III. Edit. Burman.

[21] Satyric. Cap. CXIV.

[22] This is not spoken by Ulysses, but by the Chorus. Ajax, v. 1110, 1111. Ulysses's Speech comes in Ver. 1349, &c.

[23] Aeneid, XI. (104).

[24] Neither these Words, nor the Verse quoted from VIRGIL, can be found through the whole Book of Rhetorick, written by an antient Author, and which has long passed for a Work of CICERO. I am confident I can here shew what gave Occasion to the Mistake, which is an indisputable Proof, that our Author sometimes falls into one, by quoting on the Credit of others. ALBERICUS GENTILIS, in his Treatise De Jure Belli, Lib. II. Cap. XXIV. p. 459, having produced several of the Authorities here employed, adds this Passage, as taken from the third Book of the Rhetorick addressed to Herennius, No Man ought to be angry with the Dead. Thus Ulysses, &c. and thus Aeneas, &c. For that which is the last, &c. and thus Apollo in Homer (Iliad) Lib. XXIV. against Achilles, &c. but there is not one single Verse of VIRGIL, in the whole four Books of the Rhetorick in Question; and that Lawyer elsewhere makes Use of this Reason for proving, by the By, that the Work does not belong to CICERO, Which Author is not CICERO, says he, if he has any Thing from VIRGIL, p. 531. It is evident therefore, that our Author had no other Voucher for his Quotation than ALBERIC GENTILIS; but I know not whence the Person last mentioned had taken the Words he produces. I have looked for them to no Purpose in QUINTILIAN, and the Collection of the antient Latin Rhetoricians, published by PITHON, at Paris, in 1559.

[25] Thebaid. Lib. XII. v. 573, 574.

[26] Lib. II. contra Parm.

[1] De Bell. Punic. p. 105. Edit. Amst. (63 H. Steph.)

[2] That Author says, that “Men of Goodness and Humanity bury such of their Enemy as fall in Battle, even at their own Expence; and that those who extend their Enmity even to the Dead, make an Agreement with the Enemy, for allowing them to pay them the last Duties.” In Flac. p. 974.

[3] Annal. Lib. I. Cap. XXII. Num. 3.

[4] Orat. de Lege. See another Passage of that Orator, quoted § 1. Note 2.

[5] The Passage has been quoted in Note 12. on Paragraph 1.

[6] JOSEPHUS in legibus; Θαπτέσθωσαν δὲ καὶ οἱ πολέμοι, Let even your Enemies be buried. Agamemnon, in the seventh Iliad, buries the Trojans; Antigonus, in PLUTARCH, does the same to Pyrrhus. See that Author in his Life of Pyrrhus. GROTIUS. HOMER does not say that Agamemnon ordered the Slain of the Trojan Army to be buried; but only that a Truce was made that each might bury their own. See Ver. 396, &c.

[7] DIODOR. SICUL. Lib. XVII. Cap. XL.

[8] Hannibal ordered an Enquiry to be made for the Body of Flaminius, in order to bury it, but it was not found. LIVY, Lib. XXII. Cap. VII. Num. 5.

[9] LIVY says no more than that, “According to some Authors, the Body of that Roman Consul was sought for and buried.” Ibid. Cap. LII. Num. 6.

[10] Another uncertain Fact. “There are several Accounts, says LIVY of Gracchus’s Funeral. Some say he was buried by his own Countrymen in the Roman Camp: Others that Hannibal raised a funeral Pile for him at the Entrance of the Carthaginian Camp; which is the most common Report.” Lib. XXV. Cap. XVII. Num. 4.

[11] See PLUTARCH, in his Life, p. 316. Tom. I. Edit. Wech. CICERO like wise observes that “The cruellest of Enemies did not allow his dead Body to be deprived of the Honour of Burial.” De Senect. Cap. XX.

- [12] De Bello Punico. Lib. XV. Ver. 389, 390.
- [13] Our Author takes this from VALERIUS MAXIMUS, Lib. V. Cap. I. Num. 2.
- [14] See APPIAN of Alexander, p. 413. Edit. Amst. (250. H. Steph.)
- [15] As, for Example, after the Victory he obtained at Salamis, over Ptolomy. PLUTARCH, in his Life, p. 896.
- [16] See PLUTARCH in his Life, p. 917.
- [17] The Author takes this from DIODORUS of Sicily; at least I know of no other Historian, who has given us the Form of the Oath in Question. But he has given a wrong Turn to the Clause, which when rightly translated, is nothing to the Purpose. The Original stands thus: Ἀλλὰ τοὺς ἐν τῇ μάχῃ τελευτήσαντας τῶν συμμάχων πάντας θάψω καὶ κρῖ ατήσας τῶν πολέμων τῶν βαρβάρων οὐδεμίαν τῶν ἄγονισαμένων πόλεων ἢ νάστατον ποιήσω. That is, I will bury all those of the Allies, who shall fall in Battle; and when I have gained the Victory over the Barbarians, I will not sack any of the Towns taken. Biblioth. Histor. Lib. XI. Cap. XXIX. p. 258. Edit. H. Steph. This is a very different Sense, and contains nothing relating to the Burial of the Enemy. Our Author having either read this Passage in haste, or remembered it imperfectly, has curtailed it, and at the same Time altered the pointing, as if it had been, πάντας θάψω καὶ κρῖ ατήσας τῶν πολέμων τοὺς βαρβάρους. Here then is a very remarkable Instance of the Necessity of tracing the Sources of Quotations; and comparing the Passages cited with the Originals.
- [18] See below B. III. Chap. XX. § 45. GROTIUS.
See an Example of this in Note 21. on § 1. of this Chapter.
- [19] Lib. I. Cap. XXXII. p. 31. Edit. Wech.
- [20] See LEVITICUS, xxi. 1, &c.
- [21] SERVIUS observes the same out of the Roman Pontifical Law. GROTIUS.
In his Comment on the Sixth Book of the Aeneid, where he says, that, “Though the Pontiffs were not allowed even to see a dead Corpse, yet it had been a greater Fault in them to leave it unburied after they had seen it. The bare throwing some handfuls of Earth on the Body would have been a Sort of Burial.” On Ver. 176. See GUTHIER, De Jure Manium, Lib. II. Cap. VIII. In which Piece, however, this remarkable Passage of SERVIUS is not inserted.
- [22] “No one can complain that Captives are redeemed: No one can be displeased that the Temple of GOD is built: No one can be angry that Ground is allowed for burying the Remains of the Faithful: No one can grieve that the Dead are at rest by being interred. In these three Cases, the Vessels of the Church, even after they have been consecrated, may be broken, melted down and sold.” AMBROS. De Offic. Lib. II. Cap. XXVIII.
- [23] SERVIUS interprets this, the Fury of his Enemies, which would even after his Death desire to insult him. GROTIUS.
- [24] See the Passage quoted in Note 16. on Paragraph I.
- [25] Lib. V. Cap. XXIX. p. 213. Edit. H. Steph.
- [1] It is where he is speaking of the Cruelty of the Idumeans in the Slaughter they made among the Jews during the War. Bell. Jud. Lib. IV. Cap. XV.

- [2] HOMER says that Orestes having killed Aegysthus, his Mother's Gallant, made a funeral Entertainment at Argos, according to the Custom of those Times, for the Burial of his Mother and her Gallant; that is, he killed them both, tho' the Poet has avoided telling us so of the Mother, in express Terms, as the Scholiast observes Odys. Lib. III. Ver. 309, 310. PAUSANIAS tells us they were buried without the Town. Lib. II. Cap. XVI. p. 59. Edit. Wech.
- [3] Digest. Lib. XLVIII. Tit. XXIV. De Cadaveribus punitorum, Leg. I.
- [4] Ibid. Leg. III.
- [5] This Custom of the Romans is mentioned in Philo against Flaccus. GROTIUS.
- [6] This Josephus in his Account of the Death of Alexander King of the Jews, has termed ὁ ταφία, ὑβρίζειν τῶν νεκρῶν, to insult the Dead by Non-Interment. Add QUINTILIAN, Declam. IV. GROTIUS.
- [7] We learn this from HERODOTUS. See how he makes Pausanias answer Lampo, one of the considerable Men in the Island of Aegina: "Sir, I admire the Goodness of your Intentions, and the Concern you express for my Character; but must observe to You, You deviate from a right Way of thinking. Having first extolled me and my Country on the Account of our Actions, You reduce us very low when you endeavour to persuade me to use the Dead with Severity, and tell me that if I take that Liberty, which rather becomes Barbarians than Grecians, and with which we reproach them, my Reputation will become more considerable." Lib. IX. Cap. LXXVII.
- [8] Thebaid. Lib. XII. Ver. 780, 781.
- [1] It appears from JOSEPHUS that even such as had laid violent Hands on themselves remained unburied only till Sun-Set. De Bello Jud. Lib. III. Cap. XXV. As to HEGESIPPUS, quoted by our Author in his Margin, he is not speaking of the Jews, but of other Nations, "Some of which, as he observes, expose the Bodies of those who kill themselves, unburied; others cut off their right Hand!" The Practice last mentioned was established among the Athenians, as appears from our Author's Remark in the sixth Note on this Paragraph, where he quotes the same Passage of HEGESIPPUS.
- [2] Aul. Gell. Lib. XV. Cap. X. PLUTARCH, De Mulier. Virtut. Tom. II. p. 249.
- [3] SERVIUS upon the twelfth Aeneid: We must know indeed, that it was provided by the Pontifical Laws, that whoever hanged himself, should be cast out unburied. And therefore he very justly styles it, Informis Lethi, an ugly Death, as being the most infamous one in the World. Since there is nothing uglier than this Death, we must believe that the Poet spoke so in Relation to the Majesty of the Queen. But Cassius Hemina says, that Tarquinius Superbus, after he had forced the People to make Common-Sewers, and many of them had hanged themselves to avoid the Drudgery, ordered their Bodies to be affixed to a Cross. Then was it first reckoned Dishonourable for a Man to lay violent Hands upon himself. GROTIUS.
See JAMES GUTHIER's Treatise De Jure Manium, Lib. I. Cap. X. and the Observationes Juris Romani by Mr. DE BYNCKERSHOEK, Lib. IV. Cap. IV. where that great Lawyer alleges several Reason for shewing that, according to the Roman Law, Self Murder was punished only when it was attended by Damage to the Publick or to some private Person.
- [4] He doth not disapprove of the Punishment, but only banters those on whom it made an Impression; as if a Man could after Death be sensible of the ignominious Manner in which his Body was treated. Hist. Nat. Lib. XXXVI. Cap. XV.

- [5] See PLUTARCH, in the Lives of Agis and Cleomenes, p. 823. Tom. I. Edit. Wech. But as GRONOVIVS here observes, this was not done because he had killed himself; but because being incensed at his being detained as a Prisoner, he had raised a Sedition, and entered into a Conspiracy against Ptolomy Philopater.
- [6] At Athens in Aeschines's Days, if a Man had murdered himself, his Hand was buried separate from his Body. Aeschin. in Ctesiphon. Add to this, Hegesip. Lib. III. Cap. XVII. GROTIUS.
- [7] QUINTILIAN speaking of a Law which ordered that the Bodies of Tyrants should remain unburied, observes that that Sort of Punishment was thought necessary, because the Idea of it affects several more strongly than that of Punishments inflicted in their Life time. Declam. CCLXXIV. This is no chimerical Law; the Author of the Treatise on HOMER's Poetry, commonly ascribed to PLUTARCH, but by others thought to be the Work of DIONYSIVS of Halicarnassus, is good Security of its Reality. Quoting the Verses mentioned in Note 12. on Paragraph II, he says: "And when Aegysthus was killed he (the Poet) says he would not have been buried, had Menelaus been present; for such was the Law concerning Tyrants," p. 73. Edit. Barnes.
- [8] See my Preface on PUFENDORF, § 27. at the End, p. III. of the Second Edition.
- [9] On this Subject see PUFENDORF, B. II. Cap. IV. § 19.
- [10] PLUTARCH in his Life. And a great many Philosophers except the Stoicks. SENECA, Epist. LXX. You will meet too with several Men of eminent and professed Wisdom, who deny that one ought ever to offer Violence to his own Life, and who declare it as their Opinion that a Self-Murderer is guilty of an impious and wicked Action. That we ought to wait for that End, which Nature has designed us. PROCOPIUS, Gotthic. IV. Βίαιος καταστροφή, &c. It is an unprofitable, rash, and imprudent Thing for a Man to force his Way out of the World; and this Thoughtless Bravery of courting Death is looked upon by all Men of good Sense to have only usurped the Name of Courage. Nor is it altogether unworthy your Reflection, to consider whether in so doing, you do not act an ungrateful Part against GOD. GROTIUS.
- [11] STRABO, Geograph. Lib. XI.
- [12] This was no less the Opinion of the Arabians than of the Indians and Persians, as you may learn from JOB iii. 21. GROTIUS.
- [13] Lib. V. Cap. XII. Num. 11.
- [14] Our Author, in his Notes on the Gospels, adds that MARCUS ANTONIVS uses the Word Ἀπολειτουργεῖν to the same Purpose, which signifies to quit a Service or Employment. The Passage is Lib. X. § 22. on which see GATAKER's Comment. But as to the other Expression of the same Emperor, there quoted by our Author: Ἀπιθι οὖν ἔλεως καὶ γὰρ ὁ ἄπολύων, ἔλεως, I believe his Memory failed him. It is probable he had the following Words in his Mind: Ἀπιθι οὖν ἐκ τοῦ ζῆν ἐυμενῆς ἦ (as GATAKER rightly reads, instead of ἦ) καὶ ὁ ἐνεργῶν ἀποθνήσκει ἅμα ἔλεως τοῖς ἐνισταμένοις. That is, Depart therefore out of Life cheerfully, like a Man who has succeeded in his Designs, and be not uneasy at what Obstacles you have met with. Lib. VII. § 47. The learned and accurate English Commentator on MARCUS ANTONIVS quotes no Parallel Passage, for what our Author makes him say, and where the Word ἀπολύειν is used in the Sense here specified. We find only ἀπολυθῆναι τοῦ σώματος, to be dismissed or freed from the Body, Lib. XI. § 3. on which GATAKER, who quotes the Passage of St. LUKE, and two others, one from HERACLITUS, the other from CLEMENT of Alexandria, where ἀπόλυσις and ἀπολύεσθαι are used concerning Death, would not have forgot to express a Passage in his own Author. Nor does he quote it in his Dissertation De Novi Testamenti Stylo, Cap. VII. where he treats of this Way of speaking, and others of a like Nature on several considerable Authorities.

[15] That the Hebrews varied in their Judgments upon this Matter, is plain from JOSEPHUS, where he treats of the Death of Phasael and Herod's Intention to kill himself. And PHILLO introduces the Jews speaking thus to PETRONIUS; ἄνακερᾶσόμεθα τὸ ἴδιον αἷμα, &c. These Hands shall be imbrued in our own Blood, that will we mingle; then on the Dead let your Commands be laid; Heaven will forgive us, whilst we are divided betwixt Respect to the Emperor, and a Resolution of maintaining our sacred Laws. And this will be our Case, if despising this paltry Life not worth the keeping, we voluntarily quit it, and walk off with Unconcern. GROTIUS.

[16] An Expression used by the Stoics. See DIOGENES LAERTIUS, Lib. VII. § 130. with the Commentators.

[17] In his Discourse to those who were shut up with him in a Cave, and were inclined to kill themselves, that they might not fall into the Hands of the Romans. “If any one, says he, throws out of his own Body the Divine Depositum, do you imagine he will escape the Justice of an offended GOD? It is thought just to punish Slaves who run away, even from wicked Masters; and shall we not think ourselves guilty of Impiety if we run away from GOD, the best of Masters?” Bell. Jud. Lib. III. Cap. XXV.

[18] See EUSEBIUS, Eccles. Hist. Lib. VIII. Cap. XII. GROTIUS.

Those Persons ought to have considered that GOD was powerful enough to support them in the midst of the most cruel Torments; and that, even tho' he permitted them to sink under them, he was good enough to have Regard to the Frailty of human Nature, and pardon them a forced Abjuration, on sincere Repentance. So that this Reason did not Privilege them to think themselves exempted from the general Law. They committed a certain Sin, to avoid an uncertain one.

[19] CICERO in his Oration De Provinciis Consularibus, gives an Account of some Maids of Quality who threw themselves into Wells, and so by a voluntary Death, kept themselves from being ravished. Such another Story does St. JEROME against JOVINIAN relate of the Milesian Virgins; and there is an old Epigram to the same Purpose. ANTHOLOG. Lib. III. Tit. De juvenibus, beginning with ἀχόμεθ' ἑμὶ Μίλητε. And the Jews tell you of a Woman in a Ship importuned to Adultery, who when she had asked her Husband, whether Bodies that are drowned in the Sea, would rise again, and he had answered, that they would, threw herself into the Sea. We have many Instances of this Kind among Christian Women. As, the Women of Antioch under Dioclesian, Sophronia under Maxentius; see the Martyrologies, Zonaras, and Sextus Aurelius. PROCOPIUS, Perfic. II. adds other Women of Antioch under Chosroes. And St. AMBROSE commends the Virgins, who at the Expence of their Lives maintained their Honour. St. JEROME in his Commentaries at the End of the first Chapter of Jonah says, And therefore in Persecutions it is not lawful for me to kill my self, unless when my Chastity is in Danger without it. GROTIUS.

I know not whom our Author means here by SEXTUS AURELIUS. Neither SEXTUS AURELIUS VICTOR, or the Writer, who passes under his Name say any thing concerning Women, who dispatched themselves for the Preservation of their Chastity. He may perhaps have confounded that Abbreviator of the Roman History with another who lived long after him, and is sometimes joined to EUTROPIUS, AURELIUS VICTOR, and other such Abridgments, particularly in DENIS GODFREY's Collection, printed at LYONS in 1592. I speak of POMPONIUS LAETUS, who mentions the melancholy Expedient made Use of by Sophronia for avoiding the Brutality of the Tyrant Maxentius. As for the rest, EUSEBIUS also speaks of that tragical History, tho' he does not mention the Lady's Name, but only mentions her Husband's Dignity. Hist. Eccles. Lib. VIII. Cap. XIV. and in his Life of Constantine, Lib. I. Cap. XXXIV.

[20] To whom we may add St. CHRYSOSTOM, Gal. i. 4. and the third Council of Orleans: It is our Judgment that the Offerings for Persons deceased, tho' they were killed in the actual Commission of a Crime, ought to be accepted, unless they are proved to have laid violent Hands upon themselves. And yet this very St. AUSTIN, Lib. I. De civitat. Dei, Cap. XVI. says, But, however, if the Case be so, that they destroyed themselves, purely that they might not suffer any Indecency of this Nature; who of common Humanity could be so barbarous as not to pardon them? And the Capitulare Francicum, Lib. VI. 70. It has been debated and resolved in Relation to him who hangs or murders himself, that is, any one, compassionating his unhappy Circumstances, will on that Account give any Alms, he may, if he pleases do so, and sing Psalms for him: But as for them themselves let them be without either Offerings or Masses: For God's Judgments are unsearchable, and his Ways past finding out! See there too, vii. 443. GROTIUS.

[21] DIODOR. SICUL. Lib. XVI. Cap. XXV. p. 523. Edit. H. Steph.

[22] Orat. Rhodiac. Concerning sacrilegious Persons and Traitors, see MEURSIUS's Themis Attica, Lib. II. Cap. II.

[23] But when NICETAS has in his third Book of the Life of Alexius Isaacius's Brother, related the Death of Johannes Comnenus Crassus, who by Sedition had affected the Crown, he speaks of him in the following Manner; μετά δε τὸ σῶμα, &c. After his Body was removed thence, it was made the Food of Dogs and Birds; which was however looked upon by all the World as a Thing a little Brutish and Inhuman. GROTIUS.

Besides the Crimes mentioned by our Author, there were others for which Men were deprived of Burial. See POTTER's Archaeolog. Graec. Lib. IV. Cap. I.

[1] But we have also shewn on those Places, or at least referred to our Notes on PUFENDORF for Proofs, that our Author has no Reason to ground the Things there mentioned on the arbitrary Law of Nations.

[1] Almost this Whole Chapter should be compared with the third of the eighth Book of PUFENDORF, where the same Matter is treated of, and our Author's Thoughts frequently explained or corrected; tho' sometimes defended in the Notes.

[2] De exsilio, Tom. II. p. 601. Edit. Wech. The first Words of this Passage are taken Word for Word from PLATO, De Legib. Lib. IV. p. 716. Tom. II. Edit. Steph.

[3] St. IRENAEUS's Expositor in his third Book, Chap. XIV. has set down his Words thus: And GOD, as a very antient Report goes having the beginning and the Means of all Things at his Disposal, brings them to a just Perfection, visiting them according to their respective Nature, always attended with Justice ready to punish those who presume to deviate from the Law the ALMIGHTY has given. GROTIUS.

[4] Agreeable to this is that of Belisarius in PROCOPIUS's Vandal. I. Πρώτον δ' ἔν τούτῳ, &c. Let it be the first Maxim of Justice to punish Murderers. Add here AGATHIAS, Lib. V. where he speaks of Anatolius. GROTIUS.

In the Passage of AGATHIAS here specified I find nothing relating to the Subject. I only observe that a little after the Place quoted, the Historian produces a Thought of PLATO on the Advantage of Punishment in Regard to the Criminal.

[5] It is where he says “We ought to take particular Care not to offend; but when a Man has been guilty of some Crime, he ought immediately to hasten to Punishment as the Remedy for Vice,” p. 124. Edit. Needham. As that Commentator on PYTHAGORAS follows PLATO’s Notions, he uses the very Terms of the Philosopher, in Gorg. Tom. I. p. 478. In Relation to the Thing itself see PUFENDORF in the Chapter that answers to this, § 9. Note 2.

[6] De Irâ Dei. Cap. XVII. Num. 6: Edit. Cellar.

[7] Retract. Lib. I. Cap. IX. De Lib. Arbitrio, Lib. III. Cap. XVIII.

[a] See B. i. Ch. 1. § 8.

[b] Ibid.

[1] SENECA, De Ira II. 6. He would be unjust to bear one and the same Resentment, when the Crimes are unequal. TACITUS, Annal. III. Tho’ his Crimes are beyond Measure flagrant, yet the Prince’s Moderation, and yours and your Ancestors Examples, will qualify the Punishments. There is a Difference between what is only vain, and what is downright wicked; what is only ill said, and what is ill done: There may such a Way be found to punish him, as shall neither give us any Check or Reproach for our Clemency on the one hand nor our Severity on the other. AMMIANUS, Lib. XXVIII. Praying that their Punishment might not be greater than their Offence. The Scholiast upon HORACE, If great Punishments be laid out upon small Crimes, great Crimes must either remain unpunished, or some new Punishments must be invented for them. And Lex Wisigoth, Lib. XII. Tit. III. Cap. I. For some Laws, tho’ they take Notice of a great variety of Faults, are yet not so distinguishing in their Punishments of them, but several Crimes are obnoxious to one and the same Penalty only. Nor is the Punishment at all proportioned to the Trespass, since a greater or a less Crime ought not to be alike in their Sufferings: And especially when the LORD does in his Law expresly ordain, that the Number and Measure of Stripes shall be according to the Degree and Nature of the Offence. See below in this Chapter, § 28. and 32. and in B. III. Chap. XI. § 1. GROTIUS.

[2] Lib. I. Serm. III. Ver. 78, 79.

[3] Ibid. Ver. 117, 118.

[4] “It is highly requisite that the Laws should ordain Punishments in Proportion to the Offence, and by no Means inflict a Punishment much greater than what the Crime deserves.” NOVELL. CV.

[c] Ut supra.

[5] A poor Man, for Example, however deserving soever he may be of Alms, has not, strictly speaking, a Right to demand it, unless in Case of extreme Necessity. But when he has received a Piece of Money, it is entirely his own and according to the Laws of expletive Justice; so that if any one, or even the Person who gave it him, attempts to take it from him, he is guilty of Injustice properly so called.

[6] For no Man demands Punishment to be inflicted on himself; on the contrary, every one avoids it as much as is in his Power.

[7] Not so, says the learned GRONOVIVS. On the contrary, they consider the Criminal as a Debtor who is obliged to pay. For which Reason he who punishes, is said sumere, exigere, petere poenas, and the Person punished, dare, luere, pendere, solvere poenas. See our Author’s Note on Acts vii. 60. and some Passages by him quoted in the following Note. In Reality, this whole Dispute is intirely useless. It is sufficient that we own there is a natural Connection between the Crime and the Punishment, so that no Injustice is committed when a real Criminal is punished. Every one is at full Liberty to call this Act of Justice by what Name he pleases.

- [8] SERVIUS often makes this Remark: Upon the fourth Aeneid, for Instance, he says, For those who exceed the Measure of the Offence, do render themselves deserving of Punishment. And again, To condemn is to discharge a Man from his Debt: Hence the Expression of Damnabis tu quoque votis. And upon the tenth Aeneid, Luant peccata. Luant, that is, absolvant, Let them pay off their Crimes. And we say too, luo poenam, but Peccatum is much better here. For an Offence is discharged or paid off by its Punishment. For whoever stands obliged by his Crime, is, by his undergoing the Penalty, freed from the former Obligation. On the other Hand, Luo poenam is not to be understood as if the Penalty was paid. But however Custom and Authority have a Liberty to confound these Things, just as it is usual to put what precedes for what follows, or what follows for what precedes. And this is what you frequently meet with in the Language of the Sacred Writings. For, as TERTULLIAN, De Oratione, says, A Debt in the Scriptures is the Figure of a Transgression, because the Person transgressing is thereby indebted to Justice, and Justice demands a Satisfaction of him. St. CHRYSOSTOM, in his Oration De terrae motu, in Tom. V. talking of that rich Man who is opposed to Lazarus, and explaining the Word ἀπέλαβες, received, a Word used in that Passage of the Gospel, has the following Observation, Ἐχρεωστοῦντο αὐτῷ τιμωρία, ἐχρεωστοῦντο αὐτῷ ὁ δύναι. Punishments were owing him, Pains were owing him. And in his second De poenitentia, Τὰ ἁμαρτήματα εἰς ὀφειλήματα ἀναγράφεται, Sins are accounted Debts. St. AUSTIN, III. De libero Arbitrio, And therefore, if he does not render what he owes by living well, he shall render it by suffering the Pain which he deserves; because in both these there sounds something of the Word Debt. For it might also be expressed thus, If he does not by his Actions pay what he owes, he shall by his Sufferings pay for it. GROTIUS.
- [9] Thus, according to the Roman Law, the Seller, in Case of an Action of Recovery, is obliged to pay double the Sum he has received, if it appears that the Thing sold belonged to another, and the Purchaser is deprived of it by the true Owner; and this, tho' no such express Stipulation was made in the Contract. Digest. Lib. XXI. Tit. I. De Evictionibus & duplae Stipulation. Leg. II. See CUJAS on the same Title of the Code, Tom. IX. Opp. Edit. Fabrot. p. 1337, &c.
- [10] SEVERUS and ANTONINUS, in a Rescript to Asclepiades, concerning a Fine. Digest. Lib. XLIX. Tit. XIV. De Jure Fiscis, Leg. XXXIV.
- [11] PHILO, at the End of his first Book, De vita Mosis, Αὐτοὶ γὰρ τοὶ σπέυδοντες ἁμαρτάνειν, σπέυδετε καὶ πρὸς τιμωρίας, For while you make haste to Sin, you are hurrying to Punishment. GROTIUS.
- [12] Cod. Lib. IX. Tit. VIII. Ad Leg. Jul. Majest. Leg. VIII.
- [13] Annal. Lib. XII. Cap. LIII. Num. 1. The Words of TACITUS, as they stand in the common Editions, are, Inter quae refertur ad Patres de poenâ foeminarum, quae servis conjungerentur; statuiturque, ut ignaro Domino ad id prolapsa in servitute sui consensisset, & qui nati essent pro libertis haberentur. That is, The Senate was consulted, concerning the Punishment to be inflicted on Women who should lie with Slaves; and it was resolved, that, if this was done without the Knowledge of the Slave's Master, the Woman had consented to her own Slavery, and their Children should be accounted Freedmen. Our Author has followed this Reading; but the true one is certainly that of RYCQUIUS, Ut ignaro domino ad id prolapsa, in servitute; sine consensisset, pro liberta haberetur. That is, If it was done without the Knowledge of the Slave's Master, the Woman should become a Slave; but, if the Master consented to it, she should be considered as a Freedwoman. And thus the Passage is nothing to the present Purpose. See the Receptae Sententiae of JULIUS PAULUS, Lib. II. Tit. XXI. § 1. with CUJAS's Comment, and the Notes of Mr. SCHULTING.

- [1] See what I have said on the Chapter of PUFENDORF which answers to this, §4. Note 3.
- [2] TH. 2. 2. Qu. 64. Art. 1. & ibi CAJET. SO MOSES MAIMONIDES, upon Deut. xxxiii. GROTIUS.
- [3] In STOBÆUS, Florileg. Tit. XLVII.
- [4] De Repub. Lib. VII. Cap. XIV. p. 442. Tom. II. Edit. Paris.
- [5] This takes Place in the State of Nature, where all Men being equal, have an equal Right of punishing; and consequently, there is a Sort of Compensation, between two Persons equally guilty. But our Author certainly does not design to extend the Maxim so far as to deprive a Prince, or a Magistrate, of the Right to punish Crimes of which he knows himself guilty. In that Case it is not so much the Prince, or the Magistrate, that punishes as the Law, or the whole Body of the Society, which has invested those Persons with the Right of correcting and chastising, in their Name, those who shall do any Thing prejudicial to the publick Good.
- [6] I know not whence these Words are taken. Our Author does not so much as specify the Treatise, from which he quotes them, either here or in his Note on JOHN viii. where he has collected other Passages of the same Sort.
- [7] (De Ira, Lib. II. Cap. XXVIII.) Agreeable to this is a Passage of St. AMBROSE, in his twentieth Sermon upon the Psalm, Beati immaculati, at the Verse Miserationes tuae Domine, a Passage cited Caus. III. Quaest. VII. So that of CASSIODORE VI. 21. GROTIUS.
- [8] Apologia Davidis, Lib. II. Cap. I.
- [1] De Legib. Lib. XI. p. 934. Tom. II. Edit. H. Steph. See also B. IX. p. 854. and in his Protagoras, Tom. I. p. 324.
- [2] De Ira, Lib. I. Cap. XVI. and Lib. II. Cap. XXXI.
- [3] THUCYDIDES, Lib. III. Cap. XLIV. Edit. Oxon.
- [4] CASSIODORE, De amicitia, If by Accident one Hand hurts the other, that which is hurt does not strike again, nor endeavour to revenge it. GROTIUS.
- [5] Our Author, in his Margin, quotes the Gorgias; and certainly means to speak of a Passage in that Dialogue, where the Philosopher, having set down the several Ends of Punishments, as we shall see hereafter, says, he talks equally of human and divine Punishments; for, adds he, those who reap Advantage from the Chastisement, whether they are punished by the Gods or by Men, are such as commit Faults which are corrigible. Tom. I. p. 525.
- [6] Our Author's Meaning is, that some Things would be unjust between Man and Man, were they not done for some Reason, or with some View, distinct from the natural Tendency of the Action itself, which however GOD may do, merely out of his own good Pleasure, without any Violation of his Perfections. Thus, for Example, one Man may not take away the Life of another, purely and simply with the View of taking it away, but either in Defence of his own, when unjustly attacked, or in Order to exercise an Act of just and necessary Punishment. But GOD may, whenever he pleases, deprive whom he will of Life, without any other Reason than his own good Pleasure, and the Right he has over his Creatures. If the Person whom he deprives of Life is innocent, he exercises an Act of his sovereign and absolute Right on him; but if he has deserved Death, it is then an Act of absolute Right, and an Act of Punishment. Considering this as an Act of Punishment, no other Reason is necessary for ingaging GOD to punish. Even tho' the Punishment may have no Tendency either to correct the Criminal, to set an Example, to satisfy the Persons injured, or prevent the Damage that may accrue to others; it is not therefore less lawful. It is enough that the Person punished was guilty; and GOD has a Right to punish him, barely to make him suffer what he deserves. This is all our Author intended to say, who in the first Edition spoke in such a Manner as included but half the Thought which he afterwards expressed entire, Dei enim Actiones rectae esse possunt etiamsi finem nullum sibi proponant extra ipsas. I own he might have spoken a little more clearly; but I cannot, without Indignation, see some of his Commentators charge him with extending the sovereign Right of GOD so far, as to pretend he may punish the Innocent, and even condemn them to eternal Torments. Had those Gentlemen been Persons of the least Equity, and had they been pleased to observe what our Author says in the following Chapter, § 14. they would never have taxed him with so odious an Opinion.

[a] Prov. xiv. 4.

[7] Our Author, in one of his Letters, translates the Passage thus, GOD has so disposed all Things, that they answer one to the other, and the wicked Man for the Day of Adversity. Lett. XCI. Part I. That is, that GOD acts in such a Manner, by the Course of Nature, that the wicked Man is punished. In his Notes on the Old Testament, published long after the Date of this Letter, he translates it somewhat differently, GOD disposeth all Things for what is proper for each; even the wicked Man (is disposed) for the Day of Adversity.

[b] Deut. xxviii. 63. Isa. i. 24. Prov. i. 26.

[c] Thom. Summ. Theol. ii. 2 qu. 108. Sylvest. verb. vindicta.

[8] In the Gorgias, Tom. I. p. 468.

[9] In his second Book, De Ira, Chap. XXXII. and in B. I. Chap. XII. I will prosecute him, not through Resentment, but because it is what I ought to do. GROTIUS.

[10] Politic. Lib. VII. Cap. XIII. p. 440, 441.

[1] PUBLIUS SYRUS, v. 340.

[2] Orat. pro A. Cocinâ.

[3] Vita Arati, Tom. I. p. 1048. Edit. Wech.

[4] Hence that of HOMER, Χόλος δὲ μιν ἄγριος ἦρει, But him had savage Anger seized. (Iliad IV. v. 23.) And again,

Ἄγριον ἐν στήθεσσι, &c.

His haughty Breast with brutish Passion rag'd.

(Iliad IX. v. 625.)

And again,

Ἄλλ' Ἀχιλλεὺς δάμασον θυμὸν μέγαν.

But tame, Achilles, that great Spirit of yours.

- [5] Hence in HOMER, Σβέσσαι χόλον, To extinguish Wrath.
- [6] SENECA, De Ira, Lib. II. Cap. XXI. How foolish is it to be angry with what has neither deserved, nor feels our Passion. The Brasilians, a wild savage People, revenge themselves upon the Sword, as upon the Man. GROTIUS.
See the Voyages of JOHN DE LERY, p. 163.
- [7] See what SENECA has upon this Subject, Lib. I. Cap. V. De Ira. GROTIUS.
- [8] PLATO, Gorgia. See what THEODORET says, Lib. XX. Curation. GROTIUS.
- [a] Lib. De Ira, ii. 32.
- [9] Dissert. II. p. 24, 26. Edit. Davis.
- [10] This Sentence may be seen in STOBÆUS, Serm. XIX. De Patientia. Where the Compiler produces a pretty long Passage, from a Treatise of that Philosopher on the Question, Whether a Philosopher ought to go to Law with any one for Damage received.
- [11] PLUTARCH, in Vit. Dion. Tom. I. p. 979.
- [12] Sat. XIII. v. 180, &c.
- [13] SENECA, De Ira, Lib. I. Cap. XIII. But Children, old People, and Persons indisposed, are always very fretful; and indeed every Thing that is weak and out of Order, is naturally given to Complaints. GROTIUS.
- [14] TERENCE, in his Hecyra, How do Children bite and scratch for the smallest Trifles! And why? Marry because their Understandings are weak, and not able to direct them; and your Women truly are even as soon moved as Children. AMMIANUS MARCELLINUS, Lib. XXVI. speaks of Anger thus, The wise define it, the lasting Ulcer of the Mind, and sometimes a perpetual one, that usually arises from a Weakness of Mind, which they conclude with a great Deal of Probability from hence, because the infirm and the declining are more peevish than the sound and strong, Women than Men, antient People than young ones, and the unfortunate than the happy. GROTIUS.
- [15] Lib. VI. Cap. XVIII. Num. 22.
- [1] The whole Passage is as follows, “It is thought three Ends ought to be considered in the Punishment of Crimes. The first is what we call Νουθεσία, κολάσις, or παραινέσις, when the Punishment is inflicted with a View of chastising and amending, so that he who has chanced to offend, may be more careful and circumspect. The second, which those who are nice in the Distinction of Terms call τιμωρία, is when the Offender is to be punished for the Preservation of the Dignity and Authority of the Person offended, lest an Omission of such Punishment should injure his Honour, and expose him to Contempt. For which Reason it is supposed that Word is here used. The third End of Punishment is what the Greeks term παρ᾽δειγμα, when such an Act is necessary for the Sake of Example, that others may be deterred by the Fear of a known Punishment, from the Commission of the like Crimes, which it is proper should be publicly forbidden. For which Reason our Ancestors also used the Word Exempla, for the greatest and most severe Punishments.—These three Reasons for Punishing are laid down by several Philosophers, and, among others, by our Countryman TAURUS, in his first Commentary on PLATO’s Gorgias. But PLATO, in express Terms, distinguishes only two,” &c. AULUS GELLIUS, Noct. Attic. Lib. VI. Cap. XIV.

- [2] St. CHRYSOSTOM too, upon 1 Cor. xi. 32. lays down these three Νουθεσίαν, τιμωρίαν, κολάσιν, Reformation, Satisfaction, Example. GROTIUS.
- [3] The Passage from CLEMENT of Alexandria, runs thus, Τιμωρία δε ἐστὶν ἀνταπόδοσις κακοῦ, ἐπὶ τὸ τοῦ τιμωροῦντος σύμφερον ἀναπεμπομένη. Our Author, quoting it by Heart, had changed two Words. This is in his Pedagogue, Lib. I. Cap. VIII. p. 140. Edit. Oxon. Potter. We have almost the same Definition in his Stromata, Lib. VII. Cap. XVI. p. 895.
- [4] De serâ Numinis vindictâ, Tom. II. p. 548.
- [5] See Ethic. ad Nicomach. Lib. V. Cap. VII. VIII.
- [a] Rhet. 1. c. 10.
- [1] See the Passage quoted from AULUS GELLIUS, in Note 1. on the foregoing Paragraph.
- [2] We shall have Occasion to quote this Law in the following Chapter, § 12. Note 1.
- [3] De Legib. Lib. XI. p. 933. Tom. II. Edit. H. Steph.
- [4] See the Treatise De serâ Numinis vindictâ. Tom. II. p. 550, 559.
- [5] SENECA, De Ira, Lib. I. Cap. V. As we put the Staff of a Spear that is crooked into the Fire, and burn it, to make it streight, and cleave it, not to break it, but to open and extend it, so we correct great Vices by the Pain of Body and Mind. And in Lib. II. Cap. XXVII. Among these will come in good Magistrates, Parents, and Judges, whose Correction must be submitted to, as the Surgeon's Lancet, and the Physician's low Diet, and other Expedients, which are troublesome for the Present, but are very much for future Advantage. GROTIUS.
- [6] De Habitud. Doctrin. Platonic. p. 21. Edit. Elmenhorst.
- [7] Annal. Lib. III. Cap. LIV. Num. 2.
- [a] Thom. Summ. Theol. ii. 2. quaest. 33. art. 3.
- [8] Trinum. Act I. Scen. I. v. 1.
- [b] See Augustin Enchirid. c. 72.
- [9] The Emperors VALENTINIAN and VALENS use the following Words: "We allow the near Relations who are at Age the Power of correcting Minors, according to the Quality of the Offence; that so wholesome Correction at least may force those to lead a regular Life, on whom the exemplary Conduct of their Family have no Influence. Our Intention is not to extend the Power of punishing a Minor's Fault in infinitum; but let the Authority correct the young Man with the Right of a Father, and restrain him by private Animadversion. But if the Enormity of the Crime exceeds the Limits of domestick Correction, it is our Pleasure that the Offenders be submitted to the Cognizance of the Judges." Cod. Lib. IX. Tit. XV. De emendatione propinquorum.
- [10] De Cyri Expedit. Lib. V. Cap. VIII. § 8. Edit. Oxon.
- [11] Institut. Divin. Lib. VI. Cap. XIX. Num. 8. Edit. Cellar.
- [b] sic: c Mark xiv. 21.
- [12] De Irâ. Lib. I. Cap. V. See also Chap. XVI.

[13] Protreptic. Cap. II.

[14] His Words are these. “He (GOD) immediately takes off the incorrigible (Sinner) as a Person hurtful to others, but most hurtful to himself; whereas he allows those a Time for Conversion, who chance to offend rather out of Ignorance of Virtue than a Preference of Vice.” De serâ Numin. Vindictâ. P. 551. Tom. II. Edit. Wech.

[15] De serâ Num. Vind. p. 551.

[16] St. CHRYSOSTOM upon 2 Cor. xiii. 9. calls those who are guilty of this, τοὺς ἀνίατα νοσοῦντες, incurably sick. And JULIAN in his second Book of Constantius: διττῶν δε ὄντων, &c. There are two Sorts of Offenders, some are corrigible and give Hopes of Amendment, others who are irrecoverably wicked; for the latter the Laws have thought fit to make Death the Conclusion of their Evils, not so much for their own Benefit as that of others. GROTIUS.

[c] sic:<sup>d</sup> 1 John v. 16.

[1] There is some Resemblance of this to be found even among the Beasts. The Lion avenges himself of his Adulteress. PLINY’S Natur. Hist. VIII. 16. GROTIUS.

[2] These are the Words of Poppaea, whom Nero had married, in which she observes to that Emperor, “He ought either to take Octavia again willingly rather than by Compulsion, or consult his own Security by a just Severity to that Lady.” Annal. Lib. XIV. Cap. LXI. Num. 7.

[3] When, for Example, says the learned GRONOVIVS, the Offender is a Father, a Man not in his right Senses, or a Person, whom we ourselves have first injured, and received his Pardon. The first and last Instances are just; but nothing is more misapplied than the Second. For can a Man do an Injury, properly so called, when he is deprived of the Use of Reason?

[4] De Invent. Lib. II. Cap. XXII.

[5] Lib. XXXVIII. Cap. IV. Num. 2.

[a] Judges xv. 3.

[6] Romulus in PLUTARCH speaking of Tatius, murdered by the Laurentes, says, φόνον φόνῳ λελύσθαι, That Blood was expiated by Blood. And the same PLUTARCH of the Mantineses ill used by the Achaeans; καὶ ταῦτα μὲν ἔσχε τὸν τῆς ἀμύνης νόμον, such Treatment was entitled to a Revenge, Belisarius in PROCOPIUS, Vandal. I. Φύσει γὰρ, &c. For the injured Party is by Nature in a State of Enmity with those who offer the Violence. GROTIUS.

[b] — ver. II.

[7] Lib. III. Cap. LVI. Edit. Oxon.

[8] Bello Jugurth. Cap. XXV. Edit. Wass.

[9] Orat. Platon. II. pro Quatuorviris. Tom. III. p. 259. Edit. P. Steph.

[10] De Offic. Lib. I. Cap. 40. See too his Oration against Symmachus. See also JOSEPHUS, Antiq. Hist. XIII. 1. where he speaks of the Vengeance, that was taken on account of the Death of John, the Brother of Jonathan. GROTIUS.

[11] Epist. XXIX. So LIVY too in his first Book. When what the Laientes did was by the Law of Nations. GROTIUS.

[12] Hist. Lib. IV. Cap. XXXII. Num. 4.

[13] Lib. V. Ver. 1147, &c.

[14] P. 730. Edit. Basil 1572.

[15] Thus TYNDAREUS in Euripides's Orestes, argues against Orestes:

Πρὸς τὸν δ' ἀγὼν τις ἦκε τῆς σοφίας πέρι;
Εἰ τὰ καλὰ πᾶσι φάνερα, &c.

(V. 491, &c.)

*Are we come here to dispute his Wisdom?
If Right and Wrong to all Mankind are known.
What greater Fool than he, who ne'er consider'd
The Justice of the Action once, nor what
The Constitutions of Greece allow'd?
For, when Agamemnon his Life had lost
By my unhappy Daughter's Hands (a black
And barb'rous Deed, and what I can't approve)
He ought to've indited her of Murder,
And so her legally have ejected
His Father's House, and then had all the World
Pity'd his Affliction, his Prudence prais'd,
He kept the Laws, and still been pious thought.
But now into the same Misfortune he,
As his Mother was, is plung'd. He justly
Look'd on her as wicked; by killing her
Himself is yet more wicked far become.
Prithee, Menelaus, let me ask thee
This serious Question:
"Should a Wife her Husband stab, his Son stab her,
Him his Child stab, and so succeeding Blood
Be made to expiate foregoing Guilt;
Where would these horrid Ills e'er have an End?"*

Which last Expressions full of good Sense have afforded, both to Philisophers and Orators, a large Field of Discourse. MAXIMUS TYRIUS, in his Dissertation, Whether an Injury ought to be returned, delivers his Opinion thus: εἰ γὰρ ὁ ἀδικηθεὶς ἀμύνεται, &c. *If the injured Person may take his Revenge, the Evil will eternally pass from one to the other, and one Injustice succeed another: For if you grant him who has suffered the Injury, the Liberty of persecuting him who did it, then will it follow, that he who is thus persecuted, has also the Liberty of retaliating. For the Equity is the same on both Sides. Good GOD! what hast thou done, what Sort of Justice is this that must necessarily slow from Injustice? And how far will this Evil run, or where will it stop? And ARISTIDES in a Speech of his about Peace: τίς γὰρ τῶν ἐλλήνων, &c. Where will you have a Greek left, if on the Account of those who are Dead and gone before, those who come after were always to undergo the same Fate? The same ARISTIDES has something to the like Purpose in his second Leuctrica. GROTIUS.*

[16] Declam. XIII.

[17] Cod Lib. I. Tit. IX. De Judaeis & Coelicolis, Leg. XIV.

[18] CASSIODORUS, Lib. IV. Ep. X.

[19] VELLEIUS PATERCULUS, Lib. II. Cap. XLII. PLUTARCH in Caes. p. 708. Tom. II. Edit. Wech.

[20] See B. I. Cap. I. § 1. Note 1.

[21] STOB. Tit. De Legib. Does he mean the Umbrians in Italy? That this was a Custom among several of the Africans, is testified by LEO AFER, Lib. II. C. de Tefechis, and C. de Teijeuta, and in other Passages. GROTIUS.

See the Note of HENRY DE VALOIS on the Passage of NICHOLAS DAMASCENUS, p. 513. of his Peiresciana.

[22] King Theuderick in CASSIODORE III. 23. reproving his Goths, addresses himself to them thus: Break off this old abominable Custom: Pray let your Matters be disputed with Words and not with Swords. And in the 24th. What makes you run to Duelling? What Occasion has a Man for a Tongue, if his Arms are to plead his Cause? Amongst the Trachonitae in the East, νόμος πάντα τρόπον ἐπεξίεναι τοῦς τῶν οἰκείων φονεῖς. It is an established Rule to pursue by any Method a Revenge upon the Murderers of ones Family or Relations. GROTIUS.

I know not whence our Author takes the last Passage quoted in this Note. There is nothing on the Subject in the Fragments of NICOLAS of Damascus, not even in the Collection of those Fragments made by our Author himself and sent to the celebrated Mr. De Peiresc. See Letter CCLXIV. Part I. As to the two Passages of CASSIODORE, the Goths on the contrary, are there proposed as an Example, as being Strangers to the Custom in Question, ascribed to other Nations. Before the first of them we read, That you may shew the Justice of the Goths, while other Nations retain this perverse Custom. And after the latter, Imitate our Goths, who employ their Swords Abroad, but exercise Moderation at Home.

[23] Lib. II. Cap. CXVIII. Num. 1. Edit. Burman.

[c] Numb. xxxv. 19.

[24] SENECA, De Clementiâ, Lib. I. Cap. XX.

[25] Theoclymenus there says, that Having killed a Man in his own Country, he was obliged to fly for it; for as the Deceased had left a great Number of Relations, he was apprehensive of falling by the Hands of some of them, Ver. 272, &c.

[26] The Passage has been already quoted Chap. I. of this Book, § 2. Num. 7. where the Author explains it in a more general Sense.

[27] He is speaking of Wars between the different States of Greece. De Repub. Lib. V. p. 471. Tom. II. Edit. H. Steph.

[1] POLYBIUS saw some Lyons crucified for their ravenous Desire of devouring Men, that so the Rest thro' Fear of the like Punishment might be deterred from the like Barbarity. PLINY, Lib. VIII. Cap. XVI. GROTIUS.

[a] Cod. l. 9. tit. 17. Ad Leg. Jul. repet. leg. 1. Ibid. tit. 20. Ad Leg. Fabiam de plagiar. leg. 7.

[b] Orat. in Neaeram.

[2] The same Author in his Pelopid. ὁ γὰρ πρῶτος, &c. For it was, as indeed it is fit it should be, the Original and most antient Custom and what Nature Designs, that he who is capable of giving Assistance should be the Ruler of him who wants it. And in his Philopoemenes: τοῦς ἑαυτοῦ πολίτας, &c. Taking upon him the Command of some Troops, who never waited for the Formality of Law and Election, but voluntarily followed him, in Conformity to an universal Maxim of the Law of Nature, that the better Man should Rule. You have some other Passages like these at the End of the Life of T. Flaminius. The Author of the Causes of the Corruption of Eloquence talking of Orators, says; Nor were these, tho' mere private Persons, without Power, since both Senate and People were governed by their Advice and Authority. St. CHRYSOSTOM, 2 Cor. vii. 13. speaking of MOSES: καὶ πρὸ τῆς χειραγωγίας, &c. Even before he led them he was by his Merit their Leader. It was therefore very foolishly demanded by the Hebrews, who made thee a Ruler and a Judge over us? What doest thou say? Thou seest his Deeds, and doest thou raise a Controversy about a Title? As if a wounded Person seeing an excellent Surgeon come to his Assistance in order to perform a necessary Operation, should impertinently ask him, Who made you a Surgeon, or commissioned you to perform such an Operation? Why, it was my Art and your Distemper, Good Sir! Thus was it MOSES's Knowledge and Capacity that made him what he was. For Government is not only a Piece of Honour, but an Art, nay, and the sublimest Art. The same Writer is upon this very Subject at the End of the third Chapter to the Ephesians: ἡ ἀδίκια, ἡ σὴ ἄμότης, φήσιν, ἧσθη μὲ κατέστησεν ἄρχοντα καὶ δικαστήν, your Injustice, your Barbarity, says he, made me your Ruler and your Judge. GROTIUS.

[3] The Passage is not exactly quoted. It runs thus: The Law always bestows the first Dignity in the State on the Man who practises Justice, and knows what is advantageous to Society. Praecept. gerend. Reipub. Tom. II. p. 817. Where by the Word Law may be understood the general Law or Rule of Policy or Government. Besides, this Passage, and those produced by our Author in the following Notes, are so far from being to his Purpose, that they may insinuate something contrary to his Notions. Their Tendency is to prove that every Man has a natural Right of inflicting Punishment for the Advantage of others in general; because every Man has a Right to command such as are less knowing and wise than himself. Now this Doctrine does not agree with either what our Author maintains, Chap. XXII. of this Book, § 12. or with the Principle he has laid down above, that the Right of inflicting Punishment is not the natural Consequence of the Right of Superiority.

[4] Tuscul. Disput. Lib. IV. Cap. XXIII.

[5] Footnote number missing in text, supplied from Latin edition. Lib. IV. Od. IX.

[6] Apud. STOBÆUM, Serm. XLIV. See PLUTARCH, De solertiâ Animalium, Tom. II. p. 964. Edit. Wech.

[7] And some were afterwards observant of this primitive Custom, as DICAËARCHUS, and others whom St. JEROME cites as Evidences against JOVINIAN. GROTIUS.

[8] De Irâ, Lib. I. Cap. XVI.

[9] Καθάπερ οὖν ἔχεις, &c. As therefore we immediately kill Vipers and Scorpions, and other poisonous Creatures, before they either bite or wound us, or make any Attempt upon us, as soon as ever we spy them out, by a necessary Precaution, that we may not suffer by the Malignity that is in them; in like Manner is it fit that Men should be punished, who tho' they are tame and sociable by Nature, do yet degenerate into the savage Cruelty of Brutes, and think it both Pleasure and Profit to do all the Mischief they can. Philo de Special. Lib. XI. And Claudius Neapolitanus in PORPHYRY, Lib. I. De non Esu Animalium, οὐκ ἔστι γὰρ ἄστυς, &c. There is no one but will kill a Serpent if he can, lest himself, or some other Person, should unawares be bitten by him. See, if you are at Leisure, what follows there. And again, not a great Way further, ἔφιν καὶ σκορπίον, &c. We kill a Serpent or a Scorpion, tho' they do not assault us, that another Body may not be hurt by them; and this is a Piece of Revenge which we take in Justice to all Mankind. And PORPHYRY himself, Lib. XI. ὄσπερ γὰρ, &c. For as, tho' there be some Sort of Society between us and ill People, People who by their own Disposition and innate Wickedness, as if they were driven on by some impetuous Wind, are for injuring any one who comes in their Way, we yet think it convenient that all of them should be punished and taken off; so is it also proper to kill any irrational Creature, which is naturally injurious, and bent to hurt whatever goes near it. And this is what PYTHAGORAS means, in OVID's Metam. XV.

*Whate'er attempts our Life, without a Crime
May itself to Death be doom'd.*

GROTIUS.

[10] Apud STOBÆUM, Serm. XXXVIII.

[11] Deut. xiii. 9. Add to this a Passage of JOSEPHUS, XII. 8. MOSES MAIMONIDES, Ad XIII. Artic. and Director, Lib. III. Cap. XLI. GROTIUS.

This Law is ill explained by our Author. It supposes a legal Condemnation, and requires only that every Man should appear as an Accuser on such Occasions. See PUFENDORF in the Chapter which answers to this § 13. and Mr. LE CLERC's Commentary on the Pentateuch.

[12] See 1 Maccab. xi. 24. 26. GROTIUS.

[13] Numb. xxv. The Government of the Israelites was not formed at that Time. See Mr. LE CLERC on Ver. 7. of the Chapter here quoted. And a Dissertation of Mr. BUDDÆUS, De jure Zelotarum in gente Hebraeâ, § 34, &c.

[c] 1 Macc. ii. 24.

[d] Acts vii.

[e] — xxii. 13.

[14] Whose Opinion of this Matter is this, in his Book De Sacrificantibus, Κολαστέον ὄς δῆμον, &c. We ought to use him as a publick and common Enemy, without any Regard to his being related to us, and immediately to acquaint all, who have a Respect for Religion, with his Persuasions, that with the utmost Expedition they may run to the Punishment of the wicked Wretch, fully convinced that it is an Act of Piety to kill such a Fellow as this. And there is another Passage to this Purpose no less remarkable, about the End of his Treatise De Monarchia. GROTIUS.

[15] This Fact, as GRONOVIVS observes, is taken from ISOCRATES's Panath. Orat. But says the Critic, the Orator speaks of the Helotae, who were not Citizens, but little better than Slaves; he refers us to NICHOLAS CRAGIUS, De Repub. Laced. Lib. II. Cap. IV. That learned Dane (p. 132. Edit. Ludg. Batav. 1670.) only says that the Ephori exercised their Power chiefly on the Helotae; however he leaves the Words of ISOCRATES in their general Extent, and without the least Restriction. He only intimates that the Orator may have stretched a little too far. p. 130. On considering the Passage in itself, I think that the whole Context of the Oration shews that ISOCRATES by no Means confines himself to the Helotae, or publick Slaves. He is speaking of the Populace, or common People, in Opposition to the most considerable Persons among the Lacedemonians, πλῆθος δῆμος. He is speaking of free Men, but such as had been deprived of the Advantages which they ought to have enjoyed in that Quality: Ἀπάντων δ' ἄποστερησάντας αὐτοὺς, ὧν προσήκε μετέχειν, &c. He is speaking of Persons, whose Minds were become as servile, as if they had been real Slaves: Τὸν δὲ δῆμον περιόικους ποιήσασθαι, καταδουλωσαμένους αὐτῶν τὰς ψυχὰς, οὐδὲν ἦπτον, ἢ τὰς τῶν οἰκετῶν, &c. They were not therefore really Slaves. In the Passage last quoted, they are termed περιόικοι, Persons, who live near, that is, in the Neighbourhood of Lacedemon. But XENOPHON distinguishes these περιόικοι, from the Helotae, Hist. Graec. Lib. III. Cap. III. § 6. Edit. Oxon. In short the Orator is speaking of Persons, who were usually obliged to serve in the Army, as appears from what he says a little before the Passage in Question. Now it is well known that the Lacedemonians employed the Helotae in that Manner, only in the greatest Extremities, as after the Battle of Leuctra, or that of Plataeae. Our Commentator's Criticism therefore doth not seem well grounded. But he might have observed that the Ephori, being Magistrates, and invested with a very extensive Power, when they put a Man to Death without the Formality of a Trial, they might be supposed to act by publick Authority, on a Supposition that this Power was either expressly or tacitly included in the Right conferred on them by the Commonwealth. So that the Example is unreasonably alledged, for shewing that since the Establishment of Civil Courts of Judicature, private Persons have in certain Places, retained some Remains of the Right of punishing, which each Man enjoyed in the State of Nature.

[a] See B. i. Ch. 2. § 6. B. ii. Ch. 1. § 10.

[1] It is a Sin not to restrain the Vices of our Servants and Children, LACTANTIUS, De ira Dei, Cap. XVIII. where there are several more Things upon the same Subject. GROTIUS.

[2] An Eye for an Eye, which, if we may so say, is the Justice of the Unjust. St. AUSTIN in his Exposition of Psalm cviii. quoted, C. sed differentiae XXIII. Quaest. III. GROTIUS.

We are to distinguish, however, between the Letter of the Law, and the Spirit or Intention of the Legislator, as has been elsewhere observed.

[3] Against Marcion IV. And in his Book De Patientia, CHRIST superinducing Grace upon the Law, to enlarge and compleat it, gave his own Patience to its Assistance, because that alone was wanting to make up the Doctrine of Righteousness. And St. CHRYSOSTOM, upon Ephes. iv. 13. διὰ τοῦτο ὀφθαλμὸν, &c. For this Reason it is said, An Eye for an Eye, and a Tooth for a Tooth, to tie up the other's Hands, and not to stir up thine against him; not only to secure thy Eyes from Harm, but to preserve his too. But what I wanted to know is this, Why, since Revenge is allowed, are those blamed who have Recourse to it? And presently after, Συγγινώσκει ὁ Θεὸς, &c. GOD pardons those whom the sudden Sense of an Injury and Violence offered, may perhaps hurry on to require a present Satisfaction; and therefore he says, An Eye for an Eye. But elsewhere, The Ways of the Revengeful lead to Death. Now if where it is permitted to pull one Eye out for another, the Punishment of the Revengeful be such, how much greater shall it be to those who are expressly commanded to expose themselves to new Injuries? GROTIUS.

[4] This Passage of ZECHARIAH, on which TERTULLIAN grounds his Argument, is Chap. VII. Ver. 10. Let none of you imagine evil against his Brother in your Heart. I know no other Place where this is repeated, and spoken of our Neighbour, as that Father asserts. But the true Sense of the Passage is widely different from that here given. The Prophet means, as our Author himself observes in his Notes on the Old Testament, that we ought to be in such a Disposition as not to entertain even a Thought of injuring any Man. He is not here speaking of Revenge in particular.

[5] See ORIGEN against CELSUS. GROTIUS.

[6] De Offic. Lib. I. Cap. VII.

[7] Offic. Lib. I. Cap. XXVIII.

- [8] See MOSES MAIMONIDES, quoted by the learned CONSTANTINE in his Book De damno dato, Cap. VIII. § 7. GROTIUS.
- [9] In his Dialogue intituled Crito, “We maintain, says he, that it is a bad and shameful Thing to injure any Man, tho’ we may be Sufferers by the Forbearance, or might find our Account in the Action; as also to return Evil for Evil. K. P. We say— it is not lawful to return an Injury, as the Generality imagine; because it is by no Means allowable to do an Injury.”
- [10] Probably at the End of his second Dissertation; where however the Thought doth not seem exactly the same.
- [11] He is speaking of those who adhere to the Maxims of Philosophy. The Declaration here mentioned is in a pretty long Passage preserved by STOBÆUS, and taken from a Treatise written professedly on this Question.
- [12] JOSEPHUS doth not say what our Author ascribes to him. He only observes that the Law allowed the injured Person the Choice of Retaliation, or a Fine with Damages. Antiq. Jud. Lib. IV. Cap. VIII. So that, on the contrary, he supposes the Law of Retaliation sometimes put in Execution. It is very evident, however, that the true Sense of the Law was only that the Loss of an Eye, &c. was to be punished, according to the Enormity of the Fact. See my Observations on that Subject, in Note 15. on B. I. Chap. II.
- [13] Lex Wisigoth VI. 13. GROTIUS.
- [14] See CONSTANTINE on the Baba Kama, Cap. VIII. § 1. GROTIUS.
- [15] This is not the Remark of FAVORINUS, but of SEXTUS CAECILIUS, Noct. Attic. Lib. XX. Cap. I. p. 868. Edit. Jac. Gronov.
- [16] St. AUSTIN, Lib. II. De adulterinis Conjugiis. But if a Christian (which is certainly very true) may not kill his adulterous Wife, but only dismiss her. GROTIUS.
- [17] In Psalm. cxviii. Serm. VII. Cap. V. See HINC MARUS, De divortio ad Interrog. V. in fine. C. laicos. II. Quaest. IV. and PANORMITANUS there. GAIL, De pace publica, VIII. 3. Add C. accusasti de accusationibus, as it is in BROCARD. GROTIUS.
- [18] He says that “Since Murther is prohibited, a just Man is not allowed to give Evidence against any one in capital Cases; because there is no Difference between killing a Man with the Sword and with Words,” Lib. VI. Cap. XX. Num. 16. A Maxim, which taken thus generally, is certainly false.
- [19] He has this Expression too; Dial with TRYPHO, μηδὲ μὴ ἐὼν ἐμείβεσθαι, &c. Nor in the least willing to retaliate any one a Mischief as our new Legislator has enjoined us. Add to this what is below, § 15. GROTIUS.
- [b] B. i. Ch. 2. §7, 8.
- [20] JOSEPHUS mightily cries up the Pharisees Moderation in punishing. And from hence are there so many Exceptions in their Laws relating to publick Punishments; and that Maxim of theirs, that where there is a Necessity to inflict Death, it ought to be done in the tenderest Manner. This is in the THALMUD, Tit. Ketuboth. GROTIUS.
The Passage of JOSEPHUS, which our Author had in View, is where the Jewish Historian relates how Jonathan, a Sadducee made the Pharisees odious to Hyrchanus, by engaging him to ask them what Punishment was due to Eleazer for injurious Words uttered against the High-Priest. The Pharisees only condemned him to be whipt and put into Prison; being of Opinion that “Bare Affronts did not deserve Death, and being moreover naturally inclined to Moderation in Punishments.” Jud. Antiq. Lib. XIII. Cap. XVIII.

[2] St. AUSTIN, Quaest. Evang. Lib. I. Quaest. X. GROTIUS.

[1] In the Original we read Legem primaevam. In the first Edition it was contra Naturae Legem. This Alteration insinuates that GOD himself revealed the chief Rules of the Law of Nature to our first Parents, who transmitted them to their Descendants. The Author has in other Places made such Corrections, in Consequence of his Opinion, that Tradition has contributed most to the Knowledge of the Principles of the Religion, and Laws of Nature.

[2] St. CHRYSOSTOM says the same as well in his Oration, Ad patrem fidelem, as in his XI. De jejunio. GROTIUS.

[3] A Sinner ought, before he gets his Pardon, to lament and bewail himself. TERTULLIAN, De poenitentia. St. AMBROSE, upon Psalms xxxvii. St. CHRYSOSTOM, upon 1 Cor. Hom. XXVIII. and upon Matt. Hom. XLII. Add 2 Cor. vii. 9, 10. GROTIUS.

[4] St. JEROME, upon the first Chapter of NAHUM, which Passage is inserted Caus. XXIII. Quaest. V. AGATHIAS, Lib. V. out of PLATO. GROTIUS.

[1] St. JEROME, Ad Damasum, cited in C. Importuna de poenitentia, Dist. I. GROTIUS.

[2] Who has this Expression too in his Treatise De beneficiis VII. 20. Death to such Sort of People is the only Remedy, and it is best for him to go quite out of the Way, who is never likely to come to himself. And again, At the same Time I should do a Kindness to all Mankind, and to him, since to Persons of that Temper, Death alone is a Cure. GROTIUS.

[3] Apud STOBÆUM, Serm. XLVI. From the whole Passage it appears, that he makes Use of this Reason, to shew that Legislators, when they ordered Sentence of Death, had no Design of injuring the Criminal who should suffer; but, on the contrary, of thus procuring them the last Remedy against their Wickedness.

[a] B. i. Ch. 2. §7.

[b] Rom. xiii. 4.

[c] 1 Tim. ii. 1, &c.

[4] Yes, and of the Romans too, in most Cases; for none of them, after the Porcian Law was made, could ever be whipped, or put to Death, unless he were a Traitor, or condemned by the People themselves. GROTIUS.

Concerning the Porcian Law see LIVY, Lib. X. Cap. IX. But this Prohibition of Whipping or Executing a Roman Citizen, did not proceed from a Spirit of Clemency and Humanity: It was a Privilege, then considered as inseparable from Liberty, of which the Romans were extremely jealous; but in Process of Time, it gave Occasion to a Licentiousness, which they were obliged to curb by eluding the Law. See SIGONIUS, De antiquo jure Civium Roman. Lib. I. Cap. VI. and the Probabilia Juris, by Mr. NOODT, Lib. III. Cap. XII.

[d] Lib. 1. c. 65.

[5] Geogr. Lib. XI. p. 790. Edit. Amst. (520. Paris.) where he says, “They banished such as had been guilty of the greatest Crimes, together with their Children. Whereas, on the contrary, the Derbicians put Men to Death for small Crimes.”

[6] Institut. Orat. Lib. XII. Cap. I. p. 1055. Edit. Burman.

[7] See what is below in this Book, Chap. XXIV: § 11. See Isaac Angelus's Oath, in NICETAS, Lib. I. The same Author says, that not one was executed in Johannes Comnenus's Reign. See MALCHUS about ZENO, and St. AUGUSTIN's 158th and 159th Epistle to Marcellinus Comes, cited C. Circumcelliones, Caus. XXIII. Quaest. V. and in the following Chapters; and St. CHRYSOSTOM against the Jews, where he speaks of Cain's Punishment. GROTIUS.

[8] Chiefly into Work. St. AUGUSTIN, Epist. CLX. Let them have the Use of their Limbs, and let them be employed in some profitable Service. See also NECTARIUS's Letter to St. AUGUSTIN, it is the 201st. GROTIUS.

[1] We have here followed the Order of the Original. Mr. BARBEYRAC places this Paragraph immediately after the ninth: For which Transposition he gives the following Reasons, "In the Place where we find it, it interrupts the Discussion of the Questions, which relate to the inflicting of Punishments, in Regard to what a Christian's Duty allows; and I cannot but suspect that our Author, designing to add this Paragraph, after he had written the others, was not very careful where to place it, and did not afterwards perceive the Mistake; as was sometimes the Case, in Regard to the Additions he made to his printed Work. However this be, on a careful Enquiry into the Context of the Discourse, it will appear, that this Paragraph, which comes in naturally where I have inserted it, makes a disagreeable Interruption in the Place from whence I have removed it."

[2] Lib. VI. Cap. XIV.

[3] De Clement. Lib. I. Cap. XXII. These two Designs of Punishment are also laid down by PHILO, in Legatione, ὅτι καὶ ἡ κόλασις, &c. Because Punishment does often correct and amend even the Offenders; but if it does not do that, it will certainly have an Influence on the Standers by. For other's Smartings make many People better, out of a Fear and Apprehension of suffering so themselves. GROTIUS.

[4] De Ira, Lib. I. Cap. ult.

[5] Declam. CCLXXIV.

[1] See some Passages above, B. I. Chap. III. § 3. GROTIUS.

[2] In this very Chapter, Sect. VIII. GROTIUS.

[1] St. CHRYSOSTOM, De Poenitentia VIII. Καλὸν μὲν οὖν, &c. It is therefore a good Thing, as I told you, by a kind Composition of Matters, to prevent a Suit of Law, and thus to direct your Friend, to the very End that a Court intends. But if the Process be already entered, let it take its Course, only be sure never to begin one. GROTIUS.

[1] See SENECA, De Otio Sapientis, canvassing this Question, Whether a wise Man ought to take upon himself a publick Concern. GROTIUS.

[a] Matt. vi. 1.

[a] De Matrim. par. 2. c. 7. § 7. num. 20, &c.

[b] De ultim. fine Leg. Illat. 11.

[c] Contr. Illustr. 1. 4. c. 8.

[d] B. ii. Ch. 1. § 14.

[1] See St. AUSTIN, De Civitate Dei, cited C. quicumque, Caus. XXIII. Quaest. VIII. And C. inter with the following C. Caus. XXXIII. Quaest. II. GROTIUS.

The first Part of the Passage attributed to St. AUGUSTIN in the Canon, doth not belong to that Father but to St. JEROM, in Ezech. Cap. IX. The other Words may belong to some other Ecclesiastical Writer. At least I do not find them in the Treatise De Civit. Dei; tho' the same Thought is indeed expressed in a different Manner, Lib. I. Cap. XXI. "Those only excepted, whom a just Law in general, or GOD, the Fountain of Justice, in particular, orders to be killed, whoever lays violent Hands on himself, or on any other, is guilty of Murther."

[2] That is, and likewise Soldiers themselves; for the Law regards those also who are not such. The same Law supposes the Fact committed in the Night, and in the Fields. Cod. Lib. III. Tit. XXVII. Quando liceat, &c. Leg. I. See CUJAS and FABROT, on that Title.

[3] Ibid. Leg. II.

[4] (Apolog. II.) AGATHIAS, Lib. IV. Οὐ γὰρ στρατηγούεις, &c. A Resolution of wishing and doing well to the Publick, is not peculiar to Generals, or other great People; but every one who will, may, and ought to be concerned at the Calamities of the State, and do all he can to put Things in a better Posture. See above in this Chapter, Sect. IX. GROTIUS.

[5] Footnote number missing in text, supplied from Latin edition. Here the learned GRONOVIVS quotes a Law, produced by QUINTILIAN, which allows of killing an Exile, if found in the Country. Declam. CCCV. But, tho' we have the same Words in his CCLXVIII. Declamation, this may have been a spurious Law, as well as several other, invented by the antient Declaimers, for furnishing them with Matter. Be that as it will, our Author is here speaking of Persons put under the Ban of the Empire; whom he calls BANNITI. For, according to the Constitutions of the Empire, any one may with Impunity use such Exiles as he pleases, both in Regard to Estate and Life. See JAMES MENOCHIVS, De arbitrar. Judic. Lib. I. Quaest. XC. ANT. MATTHAEVS, De Criminib. Tit. V. Cap. II. BOECLER, Conductor. Carolin. Tom. II. Dissert. p. 74, 75. and the Jus publicum of Mr. COCCEIVS, Cap. XXXII. § 12, &c.

[6] QUINTILIAN, in his CCLXth Declamation, There are some Crimes against the State so notorious, that the bare Sight of them is enough to declare them capital. GROTIUS.

[a] B. 2. Chap. 4. § 3. Num. 2. and Chap. 6. § 1. num. 1.

[1] The Words are Cogitationis poenam nemo patitur; No Man suffers Punishment for his Thoughts. Digest. Lib. XLVIII. Tit. XIX. De Poenis. Leg. XVIII. Add to this, that, according to Mr. BYNKERSHOEK, Observat. Jur. Rom. Lib. III. Cap. X. the Roman Lawyers, speak there not of a bare Thought, of a loose Design, which terminates in no exterior Act, by which a Man is disposed to seek Means for executing his Design; but of a Design, the Execution of which has not been followed by the Effect. For such a Design, tho' accompanied by actual Attempts, was not punished by the Roman Law, unless in Case of some certain enormous Crimes, specified by the Laws, and excepted from the general Rule, in Favour of the Publick. See the Particulars and Proofs at large in the Treatise above quoted. On that Foot we are to consider the following Words of MAXIMVS of Tyre, either as not conformable to the Roman Law, or as unexact. "The Law, says he, punishes as Adulterers, Robbers, or Traitors, not only those who have actually committed the Facts, but such as designed to commit them, tho' they did not find Means for putting the Design in Execution." Dissert. II. p. 20. Edit. Cantab. Davis.

[2] So SAYRVS, Lib. III. THESAURI, Cap. VI. GROTIUS.

[1] Σύμφυτον εἶναι ἀνθρώποις τὸ ἀμαρτάνειν. These Words are in STOBAEVS, Serm. XLVI. De Magistratu, &c. Let us add the following from XENOPHON, a much more antient Philosopher. "I see no Man entirely exempt from Faults." Hist. Graec. Lib. VI. Cap. III. §

[2] Where he says, “There is an Evil born with us, and at the same Time acquired; viz. the Motion of free Will, in a Manner contrary to Nature.” p. 192. Edit. Needham.

[3] And in his first Book, De Ira, Cap. XIV. There is no Man living who can intirely justify himself. In his ninth Chapter he had said, Among many other Inconveniencies of Mortality, the Darkness of our Understanding is one, and not only the Necessity of erring, but the doating upon our Errors. Afterwards, Chap. XXVII. Who can declare himself free from the Breach of every Law? And in B. III. Chap. XX. We are all of us bad. In his Treatise De Clementia, I. 6. We are all faulty: Some more, some less: Some on purpose, others by Accident, or drawn away by another’s Wickedness: Some of us have been a little too weak in standing to our good Resolutions, and have lost our Integrity with Regret and Reluctance. Nor do we only for the present do amiss, but we shall always do so to the last Moment of our Lives. And if there be any one who has so well cleared his Conscience that nothing can any longer either disturb or deceive him, it is even by frequent Miscarriages that he arrives at this State of Innocence. PROCOPIUS, Gotthic. III. in a Speech of Belisarius, Τὸ μὲν οὐδὲν, &c. Not to sin at all is neither consistent with human Make, nor will the Nature of Things allow it. Add to this the Emperor Basil, Cap. L. GROTIUS.

I am very much mistaken, if instead of the Emperor Basil, our Author does not in the last Quotation mean MANUEL PALEOLOGUS, of whom, beside some Orations, we have some Precepts for the Education of a Prince, ὑποθήκαι βασιλικῆς ἀγωγῆς. In the first Chapter that Emperor says, “He who knows how to distinguish rightly the Ends, and what relates to them, particularly that most perfect End to which all Things move naturally, and which puts all Things in Motion; and is willing to do what he knows is best; will not sin in Deed, Word, or Thought, or any other Motion of the Soul.” But then he advances this only as a Supposition; “It being impossible, as he observes, for a Man to attain such a Degree of Knowledge without the Divine Assistance.” p. 76. Edit. Basil. 1578. This Work, which was published and translated by LEUNCLAVIUS, cannot be very common, since Mr. FABRICIUS makes no Mention of it in his Bibliotheca Graeca. The Reason of our Author’s Mistake is, that BASIL, the Macedonian, has written Precepts of Morality, addressed to his Son, Κεφάλαια παραινετικῶν, in sixty-six Chapters; whereas those of MANUEL employ a hundred.

[4] In his third Book, De Mose. To which may be added, ABENESDRAS upon JOB v. 7. and Rabbi ISRAEL, Cap. VIII. GROTIUS.

[5] The Passage is in the third Book, where the Historian adds, “There is no Law that can prevent Man’s committing Faults, either in a publick or private Capacity.” Cap. XLV. Edit. Oxon.

[6] Among others, LACTANTIUS, who says, “If GOD should punish every Man according to his Deserts, all Mankind would be destroyed; for no one is free from Sin. There are many Inducements to Sins, our Age, Wine, Poverty, Opportunities, and a Prospect of Reward.” De Ira Dei, Cap. XX. Num. 4. Edit. Cellar.

[7] De Ira, Lib. II. Cap. XXXI.

[8] Apud STOBÆUM. Serm. XLVI.

[9] And in his Fragments he says, Μὴ συκοφαντεῖν ἀνθρωπίνης φύσεως τὴν ἀσθένειαν, We must not disparage the Infirmary of human Nature. GROTIUS.

These Passages, especially that quoted in the Note, are not much to our Author’s Purpose, except it be on Account of the Expression, which may be applied to the Subject.

This will appear to any one that examines the Context in the Original.

[10] This Thought has been justly censured by PUFENDORF, B. I. Chap. V. § 8.

[11] In vita Solonis. p. 90. Tom. I. Edit. Wech.

[12] These Sins are not absolutely unavoidable. In Regard to Things, to which we are inclined by the Force of Constitution or Custom, the Use of our Liberty is indeed more difficult, but not entirely impossible. See PUFENDORF, B. I. Chap. IV. § 5, &c. to which several Reflections might be added.

[13] SENECA, De Ira, Lib. II. Cap. XVIII. It is the Mixture of the Elements that causes a Variety of Manners, and therefore some Peoples Tempers incline them more to this or that, according as one Element does predominate. In another Place he calls this, the Result of the Condition of our Birth, and the Complexion of our Bodies. Epist. XI. GROTIUS.

[14] See C. Inebriaverunt. Caus. XV. Quaest. I. GROTIUS.

[1] The same SENECA, De Beneficiis I. Cap. I. Ingratitude is a shameful Thing, only when we are at Liberty to return, or not return, a Kindness. SENECA the Father, Controv. V. 34. You tell me, that he ought not to do it; it is a Thing of immense Estimation, therefore there is no Punishment. St. AUGUSTIN, Lib. II. Cap. LXXXIII. contra Petilian. Thus then because there are Laws against you, you are not compelled by them to do Good, but you are forbidden to do any Hurt. GROTIUS.

The Passage here quoted from St. AUGUSTIN, where he is speaking of the Laws against the Donatists, has a Sense different from that in which our Author must have taken it, in Order to apply it in this Place.

[2] This is in B. V. Controv. XXIII. You have such another Expression in the fourth Book. Controv. XXV. There is a great Deal of Difference between Reproof and Punishment. Excerpt. Contr. VI. 8. For as PLUTARCH, in his Cimon says, some Things are Ἐλλείματα μᾶλλον ἀρετῆς τίνος ἢ κακίας πονηρέυματα, Rather the Defects of some Virtue than the Effects of Vice. GROTIUS.

[1] DIODORUS SICULUS, in his Fragments, argues very well against them that Συγγνώμη τιμωρίας ἀρετωτέρα, Pardon is better than Punishment. And St. CYPRIAN shall speak for Christians, in his fifty-second Epistle. The Philosophers and Stoicks are of another Opinion, who say that all Sins are alike, and that a wise Man must not easily be bent. But Christians and Philosophers do widely disagree. GROTIUS.

[1] JULIAN DE EUSEBIA, οὐδὲ γὰρ εἰ σφόδρα, &c. For tho' there are some who deserve ill Treatment and Correction, there is no Necessity that they should be quite destroyed. GROTIUS.

[a] Add Q. Fr. i. 11.

[2] The Passage is in his Treatise De Benefic. Lib. VI. Cap. VI. But the Author has followed the Generality of Editions in his Time, which read Sic beneficium superveniens injuriam adparere non patitur; whereas in the Manuscripts we read injuriam, as the Sense necessarily requires, according to the Remark of JUSTUS LIPSIUS, cotemporary with GROTIUS. So that the Philosopher's Meaning is, that an Injury done by one from whom we had before received some Favour, effaces the whole Merit of the Favour. Which has no Manner of Relation to the Question in Hand. See my Observations on PUFENDORF, B. VIII. Chap. III. § 16. Note 4. Besides, even allowing our Author's Reading the true one, the Passage would be nothing to his Purpose, for SENECA would then be speaking of a Service done after the Injury is received; whereas GROTIUS speaks of the Services that the Offender has already done before the Commission of the Crime, and even of his Ancestor's Services.

[b] Wisd. xli. 19.

[3] Apud STOBÆUM, Serm. XLVI. Tit. De Magistratu.

[4] Epist. ad Quintum Fratrem, Lib. I. Epist. II.

[5] Oratio ad Alexandrinos.

[1] JOSEPHUS, Πατροκτονία κοινὸν, &c. Parricide is a common Injury both against Nature and human Life, and whoever does not punish it, does himself sin against Nature. GROTIUS.

[2] De Clementia, Lib. II. Cap. VII.

[3] Ibid.

[4] Out of Use, as the Scholiast upon HORACE says. St. AUGUSTIN contra Academicos, It is absurd to keep a Stir and Wrangling about Words, when there remains no Dispute at all about Things. GROTIUS.

[5] Lib. II. Cap. XXVIII.

[6] Topic. Lib. I. Cap. XVII.

[1] Two Questions may be here started, which our Author himself proposes in his Sparsio florum ad Jus Justinianæum. Tit. De poenis, p. 213. Edit. Amst. First, Whether it be better to allow the Judge the Determination of Penalties for each Crime, or to regulate the Kind and Degrees of Punishment by express Laws? Our Author, without giving us his own Opinion, only observes that the former was at first practised among the Locrians; but that Zaleucus (not Seleucus) introduced the latter, as we learn from STRABO, Geogr. Lib. VI. For my Part, I think that in this Case, as in others, as little as possible ought to be left to the Judge's Discretion. The second Question is, whether a Judge, who is not himself a Sovereign, can inflict Penalties less than those established by the Laws? That is, not only in Cases where the Laws themselves allow him such a Liberty (for then the Difficulty vanishes) but in all Cases, without Exception. To this our Author replies, that such a discretionary Power is usually allowed to Judges of the first Rank, where he all edges the Example of the Romans, among whom the Senate might both augment and soften the Rigour of the Laws. On this Point see Mr. SCHULTING's Dissertation De recusatione Judicis, Cap. VII. § 3. This supposes what is true, that an inferior Judge cannot, as such, and without the Authority of the Sovereign, either increase or diminish the Punishment, when it is fixed by the Laws.

[2] See what is above in the Text and Notes, in this Book, Chap. IV. § 12. GROTIUS.

[a] See B. 1. C. 1. § 8.

[3] De Irâ Dei, Cap. XIX. Num. 9.

[4] SYMMACHUS, Lib. III. Epist. LXIII. For the Circumstances of Magistrates and Princes are quite different; the Judgment of the Magistrate is thought to be corrupted, if it be milder than the Laws direct: But it is in the Power of, and very becoming the Character of Godlike Princes to mitigate the Rigour of penal Laws. There is the same Distinction between a King and a Judge in THEMISTIUS, Oration V. GROTIUS.

Our Author doth not specify the Treatise of St. AUGUSTIN, from which he takes these Words. I am persuaded, however, that he quotes them from CUJAS, who, in his Observat. XX. XXXII. giving the Passage more at large, produces it as drawn from a Treatise De Fato; which doth not appear among that Father's Works. It is proper in this Place to observe how Authors copy one another, without speaking of it, and thus imprudently expose themselves to the Hazard of adopting and perpetuating the Mistakes of others; for I have found the Words in question, quoted in the same Manner, and under the same Name, by ARNISAEUS, De Republica, p. 271, 272. by DIONYS, GODEFROY, on the Justinian Code, Tit. De Poenis, Leg. XV. by JAMES GODEFROY, his Son, in Cod. Theodos. Tom. III. p. 307. by CYRIACUS LENTULUS, in August. p. 149. And I doubt not but many others have done the same, after some one of these Authors. It is very probable that CUJAS has either put one Author's Name for another, or without thinking on it, changed the Title of St. AUGUSTIN's Piece, from which he took the Passage. I find something like it in an Epistle, written by that Father, in the Name of his Clergy, in which exhorting the Donatists to a Conference with the Bishops of the predominant Party, he advises them to lay the Result of the Conference before the Emperor, that he might form a Judgment of the Merits of the Cause; because the ordinary Judges could only follow and execute the Laws already in being. Epist. LXVIII. As to the Passage of THEMISTIUS, here referred to, the Reader may see it at Length in PUFENDORF, B. VIII. Chap. III. § 17. Note 1.

[5] De Clementiâ, Lib. I. Cap. V.

[1] For Instance, if in a Country where Hunting is prohibited under very severe Penalties, and even under Pains of corporal Punishment, a hot-headed young Fellow, or one who has not, and at present cannot have any Thing else to eat, should kill a Hare in the Road. In some Countries a Man is condemned to be hanged for a very moderate Theft. If any one, being reduced to extreme Poverty without any Fault of his own, should steal such a Sum, it would be an Act of great Severity to put him to Death: Clemency would require, at least, that his Punishment should be changed, and the Rigour of the Sentence softened, without any Alteration in the Law itself. See PUFENDORF, in the Chapter that answers to this, § 17.

[1] See TIRAQUEAU, De Poenis temperandis, Caus. L. and COVARRUVIAS, Var. Resolut. II. 9. 5, 6.

[2] That is, in regard to the Person, who has acted against the Law, not in regard to every other Person who may violate the Law at the same Time.

[3] PUFENDORF, and other Writers after him understand by that Term the Authority and Will of the Legislator. But this is a Mistake. The general Reason is no more than the particular Reason of the Law, considered as always taking Place in general, tho' it ceases in certain Cases in regard to such or such a Person; as in the Case of sumptuary Laws, the general Reason subsists, as long as the Subject in general are not rich enough to support the Expences prohibited, without prejudice to their Circumstances; tho' some particular Persons may be so rich that the said Expences cannot do them the least Damage. However, in order to make the Application of this Instance just, it must be supposed that the Penalty annexed to the sumptuary Laws is corporal, or consists in something which strongly affects the Rich; for if, as is usually the Case, it be reduced to a Fine, as a Man of a very large Estate will suffer no more Damage from the Fine imposed by the Law, than from the prohibited Expences, it would, on the contrary, be a Reason for aggravating the Penalty in Relation to him, lest the Easiness of transgressing the Law should encourage him to give frequent Examples of such Transgression.

[4] GRATIANUS has collected and put together several useful Things upon this Subject, Caus. I. Quaest. VII. GROTIUS.

[5] Orat. XX. De Statuis. See the Story in ZONARAS. GROTIUS.

[1] Illustr. Contr. Lib. I. Cap. XXVI.

[2] Ibid. Cap. XLVI.

[1] The People of Milan argue very judiciously upon this Affair in a Speech of theirs related by GUICCIARDIN, Lib. XVII. Compare what we have said in this Chapter, § 11. and what we shall say in B. III. Chap. XI. § 1. GROTIUS.

[a] §2. n. 2.

[2] Epist. ad Brutum XV.

[3] Digest. Lib. XLVIII. Tit. XIX. De Poenis, Leg. XLI.

[1] CHRYSOSTOM X. De Statuis: οὐ γὰρ δὴ πᾶν, &c. For every Offence does not deserve the same Correction, but what might easily have been amended requires the greater Punishment. And in his second Oration entitl'd Cur obscurum sit vetus Testamentum, he proves from hence that a Slanderer is worse than a Whoremonger, Thief or Murderer. GROTIUS.

[a] Jam. i. 15.

[2] In his first Oration against Stephen, p. 616. Edit. Basil 1572.

[3] This is not exactly related. The Historian says on the contrary, that tho' the Acarnianians had been excusable, as well as any other People in the same Case, to have used Delays, and endeavoured to avoid War with the Aetolians, their Neighbours, from whom they had every Thing to fear; Nevertheless the Embassadors of the other States of Greece, their Allies, having addressed themselves first to them, they immediately confirmed the Resolution taken in the general Assembly, frankly and without Hesitation; and on this Occasion, as on all others, the Consideration of their Duty had more Weight with them than the fear of Danger, Lib. IV. Cap. XXX. p. 415. Edit. Amstel.

[4] (Ethic. Nicom. Lib. III. Cap. XV. init.) There is the same Thought in a fine Passage of the Emperor MARCUS ANTONINUS, Lib. II. [Sect. X. which may be found quoted in PUFENDORF'S Law of Nature and Nations, Lib. I. Chap. IV. Sect. VII. Note 7.] PLUTARCH in comparing Romulus with Theseus, in regard to the first's having killed his Brother, and the other his Son, concludes Theseus the most excusable, because urged to that excess of Rage by stronger Impulses, and such as few Persons are capable of resisting; namely Love, Jealousy, and Credulity in the false Reports of his Wife. Compar. Thes. & Rom. (p. 38. Vol. I. Edit. Wech.) GROTIUS.

In the Passage of PORPHYRY, which our Author calls insignis locus, the Philosopher says, that a Man, who for his own Preservation or that of his Children or Country, takes other People's Goods, ravages a Country or plunders a City, may plead in his excuse the Necessity that reduced him to it, but that he who should do the same Things, to enrich himself, or live in Luxury and Voluptuousness; in a Word to gratify irregular Desires of Things not necessary, is deemed unfit for Society, an intemperate and abandoned Wretch, p. 291, 292. Edit. Lugd. 1620. The Translator of my Edition, FRANCIS DE FOGEROLLES, pleasantly translates: Deinde perregionem & urbem incedens, &c. for, aut regionem vel urbem vastaret, &c. This I observe by the Way, as an Example of that Interpreter's Blunders, of which he has no small Number.

- [5] See the fine Comparison of SOLOMON between a Thief and an Adulterer, Proverbs vi. 30, &c. GROTIUS.
- [6] PHILO the Jew observes, that every Passion does indeed put the Soul out of its natural Situation, or transports a Man out of himself, and is a Kind of Disease, but that none of them is stronger and more dangerous, than Concupiscence; because it is the only one, that has its Source in our own Hearts and Wills, whereas the other Passions arise, as it were, from without, and in a manner make their Entrance in Spite of us. De Decalogo. (p. 764. Edit. Paris.) GROTIUS.
- [7] This is a Maxim of the Stoicks, who add, that he that has one Virtue has them all. DIOGEN. LAERT. Lib. VII. § 125.
- [8] SENECA, Epist. XVI. Our natural Wants have some Bounds to them, but those that result from a false Opinion are infinite. See St. CHRYSOSTOM, in Tract. Moral. ad Rom. vi. ad 2 Cor. xi. 12. ad Ephes. i. 14. GROTIUS.
- [b] 1 John ii. 16.
- [9] This Passage has been inserted above with several Things preceding it, Lib. I. Cap. II. § 8. Num. 9. Note 43. The Passage of LACTANTIUS is in Instit. Divin. Lib. VI. Cap. V. Num. 13.
- [1] There is a little Note here in the Original, that has a pleasant Mistake in the writing of it. It is: Vide locum insignem in Lucae verbis apud XIPHILINUM ex DIONE. This is in the Edition of 1642. the last before the Author's Death, to which that of 1646. which followed it, is conformable. In the later Editions, as it was not known what this Lucae meant, it was changed into Lucii; and because XIPHILINUS has abridged the Lives of the Emperors, the Word verbis has been changed into vita. The Corrector ought to have been so good as to inform us who this Lucius is, and in what Part of his Work the Abridger has writ his Life. Or rather, he ought to have left verbis, and found Words agreeable to the Subject, in the Discourse of Somebody, whose Name, by Mistake, might have been confounded with that of LUKE. I believe I have made this Discovery. MARCUS ANTONINUS, having received Advice of the Revolt of Cassius, makes a fine Harangue to his Soldiers, and tells them amongst other Things: "Is it not a very hard Fate to be obliged to maintain War upon War? Is it not strange to see one's self engaged in a Civil War? But is it not harder, and more strange, to find, that there is no longer any Fidelity in Man, and that he, whom I looked upon as my best Friend, rises up against me, and lays one under the Necessity, contrary to my Inclination, of taking Arms against him, without having ever done him the least Injustice, or failed in any Thing whatsoever in regard to him?" P. 277. Edit. H. Steph. He says afterwards that Cassius has violated the Laws of Friendship, p. 278. D. This squares perfectly well with our Author's View; which is to shew, that there are Circumstances, relating even to the Person of the Criminal, which make his Crime more odious. Hence it is not difficult to conceive how this Error in the Writing crept in. The Author, (or perhaps the Person, who copied his Notes, when he sent them to the Press) intending to say in Marci verbis, may have confounded the Name of one Evangelist with that of another. Those Names which were familiar to him, might easily come into his Thoughts in a mere Citation, writ in haste and without attending to Things themselves. This Observation will help to discover the Origin of some other Mistakes, which occur either in the Text or Notes of our Author. He might have added a Passage of ARISTIDES very applicable here, and is in a Discourse, which he sometimes cites in this Chapter: "No Man, says that Orator, suffers Injuries patiently; but the most sensible, and such as excite implacable Resentment, are those we receive from them who ought to be the farthest from committing them." Orat. Leuct. II. Tom. II. p. 144.

[2] The following Passage is cited by our Author in a Note, but without saying from whom: “To have been once ignorant of the Duties of Life, is the Effect of human Frailty: But to fall often into the same Faults is Madness. For the more Faults we commit, the more rigorously we deserve to be punished:” These Words are a Fragment of the twenty first Book of DIODORUS SICULUS, and are to be found in Num. 15. of the Collection made of those Fragments. QUINTILIAN has a Thought of the like Nature in Declam. CCCX. And in Declam. CCXLVIII. &c.

[3] If in the Course of the guilty Person’s past Life the Good outweighed the Evil, he was treated with Favour. This we have from HERODOTUS, Lib. I. Cap. CXXXVII.

[4] ASINIUS POLLIO said, That a Man is to be judged by the general Tenour of his Conduct and Inclinations. CICERO also maintains, That in all important and enormous Affairs, Judges are to consider the Will, the Intention, and the Deed of the Person accused, not from the Crime laid to his Charge, but from his Manners and general Conduct. Orat. pro P. Sylla. (Cap. XV.) GROTIUS.

Our Author does not say from whence he has taken this Fragment of ASINIUS POLLIO: I can find it neither in QUINTILIAN, nor elsewhere. But as to the Matter itself we may add to the Authorities alledged by our Author, and by PUFENDORF in the Chapter which answers to this, (§ 22.) CICERO, De inventione, Lib. II. Cap. XI. And APULEIUS, Apolog. Num. 891. Edit. Scip. Gentil.

[a] C. xviii. v. 24.

[5] One of the Lacedemonian Ephori says this in Relation to the Athenians, who boasted of their Promises against the Medes, Lib. I. Cap. LXXXVI. Edit. Oxon.

[6] Lib. III. Cap. LXVII.

[7] The twenty fifth Canon of the Council of Ancyra. St. CHRYSOSTOM upon 2 Cor. ii. ὅθεν μανθάνομεν, &c. From whence we learn that Penance ought to be determined and proportioned, not only according to the Nature of the Sins, but also according to the usual Inclinations and Carriage of the Persons sinning. And in his third Book De Sacerdotio: οὐ γὰρ ἔπιλαμβάν, &c. For we must not suit the Punishment to the Measure only of the Offences, but we must inquire too into the Disposition of the Offender. GROTIUS.

[b] Rom. vii. 13.

[8] De vera Relig. Cap. XXVI. St. CHRYSOSTOM comparing the Jews with the Greeks or Pagans, says with Reason, that the Jews are most criminal, because they have the Law of GOD: And adds, that he who has had most Instruction, deserves to be punished the most severely when he violates the Law. GROTIUS.

[9] Annal. Lib. III. Cap. LIV. Num. 4. This Passage is not to the Purpose. For the Historian is not there speaking of the Vertue of the Prohibition of a Law to render that more criminal, which is already bad in itself, but of the Effect that proceeds from Impunity, in regard to those, who venture to transgress notwithstanding the Prohibition.

[1] In Paraph. (Lib. VII. Cap. X. p. 444. Edit. Heins.) GROTIUS.

[2] Lust, says St. CHRYSOSTOM, requires to be satisfied by the Company, not of this or that particular Woman, but of any Woman what so ever. In Galat. TERTULLIAN observes, that the more difficult it is for unmarried Persons to preserve their Continency, the more excusable they appear when they fail in it. For, adds he, what is hard to perform, is easily excused. But the more easy it is for a Woman to marry lawfully, the more culpable she is in falling into a Sin which she might thereby have avoided: AD UXOR. Lib. I. (Cap. I. and III.) See the Passage of MARCUS ANTONINUS referred to a little above, in which that Emperor cites the Philosopher THEOPHRASTUS. GROTIUS.

[3] Cap. VII. p. 92. B. Tom. II. Edit. Paris.

[4] Cap. VI. p. 90.

[5] This Sentence, which our Author cites only in two Latin Verses of his own, is taken from STOBÆUS, and is in the Original thus,

Ὅταν ἐυπορθῶν τις ἀισχρῶς πράττη πραγματῶ τί τοῦτον ἀπορήσαντα πράξειν προσδοκῶς.

Florileg. Tit. II. De Malitia.

[6] “When you see (says St. CHRYSOSTOM) a rich Man unjust, avaricious, and griping, lament his Fate the more, because being rich he is guilty of such Crimes; for his Punishment will be so much the greater.” De provident. Lib. IV. GROTIUS.

[1] Or, as HARMENOPULUS expresses it ταυτοπάθεια, (Promptuar. Lib. I. Tit. II. § 34.) GROTIUS.

[a] Exod. xxii. 1, &c.

[2] An Allusion to this Restitution of Double is made in the Revelations xviii. 6. APOLLODORUS tells us, that the Minyans having unjustly extorted a Tribute from the Thebans, Hercules obliged them to return them double the Value of it. Bibliothec. Lib. II. (Cap. III. § 11. Edit. Th. Gal.) GROTIUS.

[b] (Offic. Lib. III. Cap. III.)

[c] (Tom. II. p. 133.)

[3]

*Scelera taxantur modo
Majore nostra — —*

This Passage, which is taken from the Hercules furiosus, Ver. 746. is wrong applied, as the learned GRONOVIVS observes. It should be read vestra according to the excellent Florence Manuscript, which he follows in his Edition. And the Sense of the Poet is, that Kings and Magistrates are more severely punished in the infernal Regions, than private Persons and common People.

[4] Lib. XV. p. 1036. Edit. Amst. Other Nations of the Indies punish Theft with Death, as NICOLAUS DAMASCENUS observes. GROTIUS.

What our Author says here, upon the Authority of NICOLAUS DAMASCENUS, is not to be found amongst any of the Fragments of that Author, which have been collected from all Parts, nor even amongst those that he himself collected to send to Mr. PEIRESC, and which may be seen in his Letters, Part I. Epist. CCLXIV.

[5] Lib. I. Cap. XXXIV. p. 166. Vol. II. Edit. Paris.

[d] Lib. II. De Special Legib. p. 789, &c.

[6] PLINY says of the Lion, that when he receives a Wound he observes with wonderful Sagacity the Person who gave it him, and singles him out amongst the greatest Crowd. But if the Person who aimed at him misses his Blow, he contents himself with throwing him down and dragging him along, but does not wound him. (Hist. Natur. Lib. VIII. Cap. XVI.) GROTIUS.

[e] Deut. xix, 19.

[7] This appears too by the Law concerning a Husband, who to get his Wife's Portion, had accused her falsely of not being a Virgin. Deuteron. xxii. 19. and also by another Law against him, who unjustly prosecutes a Person in order to possess himself of his Goods. GROTIUS.

The first of these Laws says, that the Husband shall not only keep his Wife without Power ever to repudiate her, but shall also pay a Fine of an hundred Shekels for the Benefit of her Father, that is to say, double the Portion, which the Husband gave in those Times to the Father of the Woman they married, as appears from Genesis xxix. 18. xxxiv. 12. and this Portion was generally settled at fifty Shekels, Exod. xxii. 17. So in the Case now before us, the Husband, who had endeavoured to dishonour his Wife by accusing her of Incontinency, was considered on the same Foot, as he who had actually deprived a Maid of her Honour by ravishing her, according to the Law in the same Chapter of Deuteronomy, ver. 28, 29. and his Punishment was still more rigorous, as he was obliged to pay double the Portion; whereas the other paid but fifty Shekels. In regard to the second Law, alledged here by our Author, for an Example, Exod. xxii. 9. it relates to a Trust: And ordains, that in case the Person, with whom any Thing is deposited, denies or retains it fraudulently, and is legally convicted thereof, he shall pay double to the Proprietor. On the contrary, if the Proprietor has accused him unjustly, he also shall be condemned to pay double the Value of the Thing deposited: Consequently, both the one and the other are punished, as if they had actually stolen the Thing deposited, as appears from Verse 7. of the same Chapter.

[8] Digest, Lib. XLVIII. Tit. VIII. Ad Leg. Cornel. de Sicariis, &c. Leg. I. Princ. §3. See the Observations of the illustrious Mr. BYNCKERSHOECK, Lib. I. Cap. X.

[9] De Legib. Special. Lib. II. p. 789.

[a] De repub. Lib. VI. Cap. ult.

[1] See the Chapter of PUFENDORF which answers to this, § 25.

[1] See the Rabbi MAIMONIDES, Director. Dubitant. II. 41. CICERO says, that those Crimes deserve the greatest Punishment, which are the most difficult to be guarded against. Orat. pro Sext. Rosc. Amerin. (Cap. XL.) GROTIUS.

[2] Lib. II. Chap. II. Num. 6.

[3] Num. 14. p. 814.

[4] At Athens, those who stole in Baths were punished with Death, if the Thing stolen were worth more than ten Drachmas, (that is, about two Crowns) as DEMOSTHENES informs us. Orat. Advers. Timocrat. See also Digest. Lib. XLVII. Tit. XVII. De furibus balneariis, Leg. I. GROTIUS.

The Law of Solon recited by DEMOSTHENES in the Place here referred to, is in p. 476. Edit. Basil 1572. That Law does not mention such as steal in Baths, but only those who robbed in the Gymnasia, or Places of Exercise, and in the Ports. The learned CASAUBON however in his Comment upon the Characters of THEOPHRASTUS, (Cap. VII. or Περί λογοποιίας, p. 81. Edit. Needh.) cites also this Law to prove the same Thing our Author finds in it:

Morte (says he) plectebantur apud Athenienses fures balnearii, si rei furtivae aestimatio erat, ὑπερ δέκα δραχμῶν, Ait Demosthenes contra Timocrat. ALCIAT. before him. Parerg. Lib. II. Cap. XXXVIII. and PETER VITTORIO, Var. Lect. Lib. VII. Cap. XVII. had insinuated the same Thing: The great CUJAS seems also to have been of the same Opinion. Not. in PAUL. Recept. Sentent. Lib. V. Tit. III. § 5. Nay further in the Collection of the Athenian Laws, compiled and digested by SAMUEL PETIT, Lib. VII. Tit. V. The Law in Question is recited with the Addition of some Words, which expressly mention those who steal in Baths: For after the Word ὑφέλοιτο, there is ἐκ τῶν βαλανείων. I have not the Comment of that learned Gentleman, to see from whence he has taken this Addition; but in the various Readings of the last Edition of DEMOSTHENES, published by WOLFIIUS, which is the most ample we have, I find nothing, that intimates that the Text is defective in this Place; and I am inclined to believe, that the Words ἐκ τῶν βαλανείων have been supplied by Conjecture, on the Passage of ARISTOTLE, cited in the preceding Note. However it be, it is probably upon the Authority of the learned Persons I have mentioned, that our Author gives us the Fact, as founded upon the Law of Solon: For in another Place, where he mentions it, he only quotes the Passage of ARISTOTLE. See the Florum Sparsio ad Jus Justinian. p. 189. Edit. Amstel. But unless there be some good Manuscript, or some other Passage of an antient Author, in which the Law of Solon is found, with the Supplement of the Words ἐκ βαλανείου, there is no Reason in my Opinion to thrust them in by Conjecture. The Law specifies the Places; but does not intimate that it intends all those in general, where there might be the same Facility to steal; we ought to keep to what it declares. It might afterwards have been extended to Thefts committed in Baths, and other publick Places; but that was either by Vertue of a new Law, or of a long Custom, which acquired the Force of a Law, and which gives no Authority for ascribing such general Views to Solon. As to the Fures balnearii amongst the Romans, they were commonly condemned to the Mines, or other Works for the Use of the Publick. But the Punishment was sometimes less and sometimes also extended even to Death. See CUJAS and Mr. SCHULTING upon the Passage in PAULUS the Civilian, to which I have referred above in this Note. Even in antient Times all Theft was punished with Death, if we may believe SERVIUS, from whom our Author cites these Words, in the Passage of his Florum Sparsio, &c. before referred to. Capitale enim crimen apud majores fuit [Furtum] ante poenam quadrupli. In Aen. VIII. 205.

[5] [Epist. Lib. IV. Ep. IX. Num. 17. Edit. Cellar.]

[6] Nonnunquam evenit, ut, &c. Digest. Lib. XLVIII. Tit. XIX. De Poenis. Leg. XVI. § 10. See the Variae Lectiones of WILLIAM DE RANCHIN, Lib. I. Cap. XI. where he had collected several Authorities upon this Head.

[a] Senec. De Clement. Lib. 1. Cap. 2. in fin.

[b] Ibid. Cap. 20.

[1] It is in B. I. where he says, that after the publick Sacrifices, at which the Kings of Egypt were always present, the Chief Priest recounted the King's Virtues, amongst which he included that, which consists in not punishing the Guilty so rigorously as they deserve, and on the contrary in rewarding the Good beyond their Merit. Bibliothec. Hist. Lib. I. Cap. LXX. p. 45. Edit. H. Steph. So that it was an Encomium given to all their Kings, in order to exhort them indirectly to deserve it; as the Historian observes a little lower.

[2] The Emperor Justin II. writing to the Huns, says, That it was the Custom of the Romans to punish Offenders less rigorously than their Crimes deserved. GROTIUS. I find this in the Extracts of Embassies made by MENANDER, Protector, Chap. XIV. amongst the Embassies taken from the History of the Emperors Justinian, Justin, and Tiberius. But the Passage is in an Answer of the Emperor Justin, by Word of Mouth, to the Embassadors of Bajan, Prince of the Avarians; and not in a Letter writ to that People, who were Part of the Huns.

[c] Cap. 24.

[3] This is what the Emperor Henry I. designed by the Symbol of a Pomgranate with the Motto Subacre, something sharp. King Theodorick said, that it was dangerous to punish, but always safe to forgive. Nam qui periculose justi sumus, sub securitate semper ignoscimus. CASSIODORE, Var. XI. 40. GROTIUS.

Our Author recites the Words of ISAEUS in Latin only, and I find nothing like them in the Writings of that antient Orator, which all turn upon Civil, and never upon criminal Affairs: But as I found the Passage cited in Greek by FRIDERICK LINDENBROG, as well as that of CAPITOLINUS and ISOCRATES, in a Note upon the Words of AMMIANUS MARCELLINUS (XXVIII. 1.) which have been quoted above, (§ 2. Note 2.) I suspected in my Latin Edition of this Work, that our Author in this Place cited upon the Credit of that Commentator who gives us the Passage of ISAEUS, without saying from whence he took it, in these Words; χρή τοῖς νόμοις μὲν τίθεσθαι σφοδρῶς πασιπῶς δὲ κολάζειν, ἢ ὧς ἐκεῖνοι κελεύουσι. Since that I have found it in STOBÆUS, Serm. XLVIII. De Regno Admonit: But neither is it mentioned there from whence it is taken. We must conclude therefore, that it is a Passage in some Oration, not now Extant.

[4] Orat. Ad Nicocl. p. 19. D. Edit. H. Steph.

[5] Sic tamen etiam ipsos criminum ultores, &c. (Epist. LIV.)

[6] Unde mihi sollicitudo maxima incussa est, &c. Ad Marcellin. Comit. Epist. CLIX. which Passage is cited in the Canon Law, Caus. XXIII. Quaest. V. Cap. I. See Macedonius's Letter to St. AUSTIN, and the answer of that Father, Epist. LIII. and LIV. The former demands, why it is the Duty of an Ecclesiastick to intercede for Criminals, as the Ecclesiastick believed it to be: Officium Sacerdotii vestri esse dicitis, intervenire pro reis. See what is said in regard to Theodosius the younger in the Extracts of JOHAN. ANTIOCHEN. taken from the Manuscript of Mr. DE PEIRESC (p. 850.) GROTIUS.

[1] Director Dubitant. Lib. III. Cap. XLI. See also the Decretals, Lib. V. Tit. XI. De Homicid. voluntar. vel casual. Cap. VI. GROTIUS.

[2] Sed haec quatuor considerata sunt septem modis: Causâ, personâ, loco, tempore, qualitate, quantitate, & eventu. Digest. Lib. XLVIII. Tit. XIX. De Poenis, Leg. XVI. §1.

[3] PHILO the Jew observes, that Circumstances render a Crime more or less enormous. For Example, says he, it is not the same Thing whether you strike your Father or a Stranger; whether you speak ill of a Magistrate or a private Person, or do an unlawful Thing in a profane or sacred Place, upon a Festival or another Day. Delegib. special. Lib. II. (p. 805.) The same Thing may be found in a Law of the Digest. Person a atrocior—nam populi Romani. [Our Author reads it thus, with Reason, instead of Praetor is, in which he follows CUJAS's Correction. Observ. IX. 16.] In conspectu an, &c. Digest, Lib. XLVII. Tit. X. De injuriis & famosis libellis, Leg. VII. § 8. GROTIUS.
See the Observations of Mr. BYNKERSHOEK, Lib. I. Cap. VIII.

[4] The more attentively a Man considers a bad Action which he designs to commit, the more ought he to be shocked at the Turpitude of it.

[5] The more violent the Desire is, the more eager we are, for Instance, to steal a large Sum of Money.

- [1] Noct. Attic. Lib. VII. Cap. III. p. 384. Edit. Gron. 1706.
- [2] Excerpt. Controv. IV. 7. This was not a general Rule. See above, § 18, Note 1.
- [3] De Ira, Lib. I. Cap. III. He says elsewhere, that a Highwayman is such, even before he robs and murders Travellers, because he intends to do so. Sic Latro est etiam antequam, &c. De Benefic. Lib. V. Cap. XIV. PHILO the Jew says, that not only those who kill are to be deemed Murderers, but even those who either openly or privily do all they can to deprive any one of Life, tho' they have not as yet executed their Design. De legib. special. Lib. II. (p. 790). GROTIUS.
- [4] Orat. pro Milon. (Cap. VII.) A Roman was accused and condemned, for having only promised a Lady Money, without having gratified his Desires with her. VALERIUS MAXIMUS says, on that Occasion, that it was not his Fact, but his Design, that was called in Question; and, that it was more disadvantageous to the Criminal, to have intended, than advantageous not to have committed, the Crime. Metellus quoque Celer stuprosae mentis acer punitor extitit, &c. (Lib. VI. Cap. I. Num. 8.) GROTIUS.
- [5] DIOGENES LAERTIUS, Lib. I. § 98.
- [6] Quodque belli parandi adversus Populum Romanum, &c. LIVY, Lib. XLII. Cap. XXX. Num. 11.
- [7] Neque moribus, neque legibus, ullius civitatis ita comparatum esse, &c. Lib. XLV. Cap. XXIV. Num. 3.
- [8] Est enim ulciscendi & puniendi modus, &c. De Offic. Lib. I. Cap. XI.
- [9] Extra judicium. Our Author means here the Law of Deuteronomy, in Regard to false Witnesses, xix. 19. which he has cited above, § 32. Num 2.
- [10] St. CHRYSOSTOM has several Things to this Purpose, upon Rom. iii. 13. and upon Chap. vii. GROTIUS.
- [1] And the Seas too, PHILO, De legat. Ἡρακλῆς ἐκάθηρε γῆς, &c. Hercules cleared both Sea and Land, undertaking Enterprizes necessary and advantageous to all the World, Enterprizes designed purely for the Destruction of every Thing that was hurtful and pernicious amongst Men and Beasts. GROTIUS.
- [a] De Benef. 1. 1. c. 13. See Isocr. Hel. Enc.
- [2] Orat. XXXI. seu Funebr. Cap. V.
- [3] Lib. IV. Cap. XVII. p. 157.
- [b] Lib. 5. c. 76. p. 236. Ed. H. Steph.
- [4] See PLUTARCH, in his Life. Tom. I. p. 4, 5.
- [5] (Ver. 339, 340.) When the Herald says there,

Ἡ πᾶσιν οὖν σ' ἔφυσεν ἄρκήσιεν πατήρ.

*Did you from your Father this Vigour gain,
Was't he who made you thus a Match for all?*

Theseus replies,

Ὅσοι γ' ὕβρισται· χρηστὰ δ' οὐ κολάζομεν.

For all who are injurious. But we ne'er Molest the Good.

PLUTARCH, in his Life, Ἀπήλλαττε τὴν Ἑλλάδα δεινῶν τυράννων, He delivered Greece from some terrible Tyrants. And again, Δὲν αὐτός, &c. Without being any ways injured himself, to vindicate others, and, for their Security, he employed his Arms against the Wicked. GROTIUS.

[c] Lib. 5. c. 3. n. 3. ext.

[6] PLUTARCH, De fortuna Alexander. Tom. II. p. 328.

[7] The same may be said of those who kill Strangers that come to dwell amongst them. This Example, which is in the first Edition, is restored by Mr. BARBEYRAC, having been left out in all the other Impressions. The Omission he thinks was occasioned by the Authorities added after each Example, which either caused the Author inadvertently to strike out the Words Hospites occidunt, or the Printer to skip over them through Mistake. Our Author, without Doubt, had in View what is related of the Scythians, who sacrificed Strangers, and eat them, making Cups afterwards of their Skulls. STRABO, Geograph. Lib. VII. p. 460. B. Edit. Amstel. (300. Edit. Paris.) See also LACTANTIUS, Inst. Divin. Lib. 1. Cap. XXI. where he speaks of the Taurians, a People of Scythia, beyond the Euxine Sea, amongst whom was a Law, that all Strangers who came into their Country, should be sacrificed to Diana. Eratlexapud Tauros, in humanam & feram gentem, uti Dianae hospites immolarentur. And OVID mentions this Practice as subsisting in his Time, Lib. IV. Trist. Eleg. IV. ver. 63, 64.

[8] Alexander the Great reclaimed the Scythians also from this Custom. GROTIUS. PLUTARCH, from whom our Author, no Doubt, takes this, says, that Alexander taught the Scythians to bury, and not to eat their Dead. De fortun. Alexand. p. 328. C. In Regard to the Thing itself, see what I have said on PUFENDORF. Law of Nature and Nations, B. VIII. Chap. VI. § 5. Note 5.

[9] See an Account in DIONYSIUS HALICARNASSENSIS, how Hercules abolished this, and many other in human Customs, making no Distinction in his Favours between Greeks and Barbarians. PLINY XXX. 1. crys up the no less Merit of the Romans, for the Good they did Mankind, It cannot be sufficiently expressed, says he, how much is owing to the Romans, for destroying those Monsters, who imagined it an Act of great Devotion to murder a Man, and thought it very much for their Health to eat him when they had done. Add to this what we shall say in this Chapter, Sect. XLVII. Num. 9. So Justinian commanded the Princes of the Abasgi, not to castrate their Subjects Children. PROCOPIUS mentions this Affair, Gothic. IV. and ZONARAS, in his Life of Leo Isaurus. And the Incha's, Kings of Peru, compelled by Force of Arms the neighbouring Nations, whom they could not reclaim by their Admonitions, to abstain from Incest, Sodomy, Eating of Man's Flesh, and such like abominable Practices, and by this Means obtained an Empire, of all we read of, excepting their Religion, the justest. GROTIUS.

Our Author, in the Text, gives us what he says of Hercules, upon the Authority of DIODORUS SICULUS, in whom we find nothing of it. He means DIONYSIUS HALICARNASSENSIS, as appears by this Note, which he added afterwards, without striking out the false Citation in the Text. But this other Historian is not more to the Purpose alledged, for he says directly the contrary of what he is called to attest. He tells us, that the Custom of offering up human Victims to Saturn, subsisted Even in his Time, amongst the Gauls, and other Western Nations. Antiquit. Roman. Lib. I. Cap. XXXVIII. p. 30. Edit. Oxon. Our Author therefore has confounded the Gauls with the antient Inhabitants of Italy, of whom it is said immediately after, that Hercules persuaded (not compelled) them to offer to Saturn, instead of human Victims, the Images of Men, which they were to throw into the Tyber. He might have remembered, that JULIUS CAESAR, in his Description of the Customs and Manners of the Gauls of his Time, expressly says, that when they were afflicted with any grievous Malady, or other Danger, they either offered up human Victims, or made Vows to do so, to their false Deities. Atqui ob eam causam, qui sunt adfecti gravioribus morbis, &c. Bell. Gall. Lib. VI. Cap. XVI. CICERO is also express upon that Head, in his Oration pro Fonteio, Cap. X. See HOTTOMAN and CIACCONIUS upon the Passage of CAESAR.

[d] This he says in Regard to the Maxims of judicial Astrology. De civit. Dei, l. 5. c. I.

[10] ARISTOTLE does not directly say the Persians, but the Barbarians in general; a Name which the Greeks gave to all other Nations. The Passage which our Author has in View, is in that Philosopher's Politicks, where he says, that War, which he considers as a Species of Hunting, is naturally just against those People who are naturally formed for obeying, or, as he terms it, naturally Slaves. Lib. I. Chap. VIII. p. 304. D. Vol. II. Edit. Paris. He had said before, after the Poets, that Slave and Barbarian were the same. Cap. II. p. 297. C.

[11] Τὸν δε πόλεμον ὑπελάμβανον, &c. That is, "The most necessary and just War, in the Opinion of our Ancestors, is first, that which all Men make upon wild Beasts; and next, that made by the Greeks upon the Barbarians, who are naturally our Enemies, and are perpetually laying Snares for our Ruin." Orat. Panathen. p. 460. We see from this, that our Author does not give us exactly the Sense of the Passage.

[12] See JOSEPHUS ACOSTA, De procuranda Indorum salute, Lib. XI. Cap. IV. GROTIUS.

[e] Ch 2. § 1. & § 5. n. 3.

[13] Etiam post susceptum bellum ex causâ non punitivâ. So it is in all the Editions before mine, in which I have thus restored the Text, Post JUSTE susceptum bellum. The Reasoning required the Addition of that Adverb, which had been manifestly omitted through the Fault of the Printers. The Author reasons upon the Supposition of the Opinion's being true that opposes his own; so that, on this Supposition, no War is to be undertaken on Purpose to punish him against whom we take Arms; and yet this is what the Expression of the Text, as it stands, supposes. Besides, there is more Reason to doubt the Right of Punishing, in a War undertaken for some Cause that has no Relation to Punishment, than in a War expressly commenced to punish him against whom we take Arms; and yet the Word our Author uses here, plainly supposes the contrary. In that Case it had been necessary to say, saltem, at least, and not etiam, even. In a Word, the Sense of this Passage appears to me inexplicable, without the Word I have added to it, and which might easily have been omitted, from the Resemblance of the initial Letters of the following Word susceptum. The Moment justè is added, there is no longer the least Difficulty, and the Force of the Reasoning is perceived. For, if the War be supposed to be unjustly undertaken, the Injustice of the Cause would make it less surprizing, that it should give no Right of punishing. For the Rest, we need not wonder that our Author did not observe this Omission in the new Editions he revised: We have seen before, Chap. XII. of this Book, § 10. an undoubted Omission, which is however in all the Editions; and it is remarkable, that the Word wanting there is the Adverb opposite to that wanting here, and of which the Letters are almost the same, I mean injustè.

[1] It is where, censuring the unbounded Ambition of Caesar and Pompey, he says, that if they had desired Trophies and Triumphs, they might have satiated themselves with them, by making War upon the Parthians and Germans, without mentioning the Scythians and Indians, who would have found them sufficient Employment. He adds, that they would have had a fine Pretext for attacking those Nations, namely, the Desire of civilizing them. Vit. Pompeij, Vol. I. p. 656. D. Edit. Wech.

[1] ASTERIUS, Bishop of Amasea, Οἱ τοῖς τοῦ βίου, &c. Those who regard only the Legislators of this Life leave the Liberty of Whoredom without a Punishment. Add to this a Passage of St. JEROME to Oceanus, cited by us at Chap. V. Sect. IX. GROTIUS.

[2] Usury considered in itself and kept within due Bounds, is very innocent, both by the Law of Nature, and by the Law of GOD. This our Author afterwards confessed, as we have observed before, in Chap. XII. of this Book, § 20.

[1] PHILO the Jew says, that Adultery is punished in all Countries; and that it is lawful even to kill on the Spot such as are taken in the Fact. In vit a Joseph. (p. 533. B. Edit. Paris.) ULPIAN the Lawyer describes Adultery as a Thing naturally dishonest, Ut puta furtum, Adulterium, natura turpe est. Digest. Lib. L. Tit. XVI. De verborum significat. Leg. XLII. And PAPIAN says, that neither Sex nor Age render Adultery excusable, Quum alias Adulterii crimen, &c. Lib. XLVIII. Tit. V. Ad Leg. Jul. de Adulter. Leg. XXXVIII. § 4. According to LACTANTIUS, Adultery is contrary to the common Right of all Nations. Item non Adulterare. Sed hoc praecepto, &c. Epitom. Institut. Divin. (Cap. V. Num. 15.) GROTIUS.

[a] Matt. x. 15. Luke xii 47, 48.

[2] St. JEROME observes, that in every Nation Men hold those Maxims to be the Law of Nature, in which they have been educated. Et in omni conversatione unaquaeque gens,— &c. Lib. II. Advers. Jovinian. (Vol. II. p. 75. B Edit. Basil.) GROTIUS.

[3] Ethic. Nicom. Lib. VII. (Cap. VI. p. 91. B.) GROTIUS.

I do not find the Passage, which our Author cites from PLUTARCH, without mentioning the Treatise from which he takes it.

[4] Quippe non delicta Regum illos, &c. JUSTIN, Lib. XXXVIII. Cap. VI. Num. 1.

[1] This Passage is in the Constitutions ascribed to St. CLEMENT. We find in St. CYPRIAN, that all Bishops are bound in Duty to watch for the Good of the whole Church, of which the Members are dispersed in different Countries, Omnes enim nos decet, &c. Epist. XXX. Edit. Pamel. (XXXVI. Fell.) That Father remarks elsewhere, There is but one Episcopacy, of which each Bishop holds his own respective Part entire, Episcopatus unus est, cujus a singulis in solidum pars tenetur. De unitat. Eccles. (p. 108.) There are many Instances to be found in his Works, of this universal Care of all the Churches, and especially in Letter LXVII. (LXVIII. Edit. Fell.) See also St. CHRYSOSTOM, in laudibus S. Eustathii. GROTIUS.

[2] TACITUS attributes this Expression to the Emperor Tiberius. Annal. Lib. I. Cap. LXXIII. Num. 4.

[3] Another Emperor, ALEXANDER SEVERUS, uses this Reason to justify the Impunity granted to Perjury by the Roman Law, Jurisjurandi contemta religio, satis Deum ultorem habet. Code, Lib. IV. Tit. I. De rebus creditis, &c. Leg. II.

[4] This is very conformable to the Doctrine of that Philosopher, and to the Maxims he lays down in several Places. But I find no where the very Words attributed to him by our Author, and which he gives us only in Latin, both here, and in his Treatise De imperio summarum Potestatum circa sacra, Cap. I. § 13. The learned BOECLER quotes them exactly in the same Manner, in his Dissertation intitled, Romasubseptem regibus, Vol. II. p. 485. But neither does he direct us to any Passage; which shews that he copied them here without any other Examination, as is often done by him and others.

- [5] Advers. Colot. p. 1125. E. Vol. II. Edit. Wech.
- [6] [De Monarchia, Lib. I. p. 818. B.] He observes elsewhere, that the Belief of one GOD is the most efficacious Cause of Concord, and the most in dissoluble Tie of Love and Unity amongst a People. De Fortitud. (p. 741. D. E.) JOSEPHUS says, that the best Means to unite Men, is to bring them into one and the same Opinion, concerning the Divinity, without differing in their Way of Life and Manners. Contra Apion, Lib. II. (p. 1072. F.) GROTIUS. The last Passage is not much to the Purpose, because the Question there is not concerning the Effects of Religion in general, but of Uniformity of Religion, as appears from only reading the Passage, and the Sequel of the Discourse. Our Author quotes a little lower in the Text, a Passage of a Pagan Philosopher, which is more applicable to the Subject, viz. what JAMBlichus says, after the Pythagoreans, that the Knowledge of the Gods, or Religion in general, is the highest Degree of Virtue, Wisdom, and Happiness. Protreptic. Cap. III. p. 7. Edit. Arcer.
- [7] SILIUS ITALICUS, De bello Punic. (Lib. IV. ver. 794, 795.) JOSEPHUS, enquiring into the Reasons why many antient States were very ill regulated, says, that it proceeded from their first Legislators having neither known the true Nature of GOD, nor given themselves the Trouble to make known what they might comprehend of it, and to frame their Laws by that Standard. Contra Apion. Lib. II. (p. 1078. E.) See there some excellent Thoughts that follow immediately after GROTIUS.
- [8] De Superstit. init. p. 164. E. Vol. II. Edit. Wech.
- [9] The Passage of this Philosopher, taken from his Book upon Law, is cited in the Digest, Lib. I. Tit. III. De legib. &c. Leg. II.
- [a] Pol. 1. 7. c. 3.
- [10] Jurisprudentia est divinarum atque humanarum rerum notitia, justique in justis scientia. Digest. Lib. I. Tit. I. De. Just. & Jure, Leg. X. § 2.
- [11] De creatione Magistrat. (p. 723. B.) JUSTIN MARTYR, exhorting the Emperors to have a due Regard for Religion, represents to them, that such a Regard is worthy of a Prince, See what is said by COVARRUVIAS, Relect. in Cap. Peccatum, Part. II. § 10. GROTIUS.
- [12] De Cyri Institution. Lib. VIII. Cap. I. § 9. Edit. Oxon.
- [13] De Natur. Deor. Lib. I. Cap. II.
- [14] De finib. bon. & mal. Lib. IV. Cap. V. PHILO the Jew says, that Piety and Humanity, or Justice, proceeds from the same Quality of Mind. De Abraham. GROTIUS.
- [15] He asserted, that there was nothing just by Nature, and that if Crimes were to be avoided, it was only because they were inevitably attended with the Fear of Punishment; upon which SENECA declares against him. Illic dissentiamus cum EPICURO, &c. Epist. XCVII. GROTIUS.
- [16] Lib. X. § 150, 151.
- [17] Politic. Lib. V. Cap. XI. p. 409. E.
- [b] Lib. 36. c. 2. n. 16.
- [c] Geogr. 1. 16. p. 1104. Ed. Amst. 761. Ed. Paris.

[d] Inst. Divin. 1. 5. c. 14. n. 12.

[e] De Ira Dei, c. 7. n. 23.

[18] Quia quod in Religionem divinam, &c. Cod. Lib. I. Tit. V. De Haereticis, &c. Leg. IV. But the bare Inscription of this Title shews, that ARCADIVS and HONORIUS extended their Maxim much farther than our Author designed to admit it; for what they called A Crime against Religion, consisted in not receiving all the Opinions of the Ecclesiasticks, who had got Possession of the Minds of those Princes.

[1] The Philosopher Antisthenes [and not Antiphanes, as our Author calls him in his Exposition of the Decalogue] said, as CLEMENS ALEXANDRINUS informs us, that the Divinity being invisible, and resembling nothing which is the Object of our Senses, it follows, that no one can know him by any Image. (Protreptic. Cap. VI. p. 61. Edit. Oxon.) Which Thought SENECA seems to have borrowed, Ipse, qui ea tractat, qui condidit, &c. Natur. Quaest. Lib. VII. Cap. XXX. PLUTARCH says, that it was injurious to the Divinity, to resemble him to Things below him; and besides, that he was to be conceived only by the Thought. Vit. Num. (p. 65. B.C. Vol. I. Edit. Wech.) See also DIONYSIUS HALICARNASSENSIS, upon Numa's Conduct, in Regard to the corporeal Representations of the Divinity. GROTIUS.

There is nothing upon this Head in DIONYSIUS HALICARNASSENSIS. Our Author, who refers us to him, as if it were in his Roman Antiquities, had the Fact from St. CYRIL, who might easily have taken one Author for another; for he, as well as PLUTARCH, makes it an Honour to the Pythagorean Philosophy, that Numa took Care to remove the Images from the Temples. Contra Julian. Lib. VI. p. 193. Edit. Spanheim. On the contrary, DIONYSIUS HALICARNASSENSIS endeavours to shew, Lib. II. Cap. LIX. that PYTHAGORAS lived four Generations after Numa, and that therefore the latter could not have learned the Philosophy of the other.

[2] In the Letter of Agrippa to the Emperor Caligula; and he speaks there of the Opinion which the Jews always had upon this Subject. (De legat. ad Cajum. p. 1032. E.) GROTIUS.

[a] In Fragm. (e lib. 40.)

[b] Dion Cassius observes the same Thing. 1. 36.

[c] Hist. 1. 5. c. 5. n. 8. See also Strabo, Geogr. 1. 16.

[3] The Author of the Answers to the orthodox Christians, at the sixty-ninth Question, ἵνα οὐ φησὶν φυλάχθῃ, &c. And therefore, that the Memory of the World's Creation might be preserved among Men, GOD, in Holy Writ, commanded a greater Honour to be paid to the seventh Number, than to any of the Rest. See also what goes before there. GROTIUS.

[4] Topic. Lib. I. Cap. XI. p. 187. E. Vol. I. Edit. Paris.

[5] Ibid. Lib. II. Cap. XI. p. 205, A.

[6] DIODORUS SICULUS says, that there is a natural Piety or Religion, φυσικῆ εὐλάβεια, Fragment. (E. Lib. XXIII. Eclog. XI.) The Emperor JULIAN asserts, that Every one knows, without being taught, that there is a Divinity; and adds, that he makes himself as perceptible to the Soul as the Light to the Eye. Ad Heraclium, (Orat. VII. p. 209. C. Edit. Spanheim.) PHILO the Jew reasons in this Manner, Chance produces no Work of Art; now nothing can be made with more Art than the World; it was therefore made by a most skilful and perfect Artist. Hence, adds he, we come to discover the Existence of GOD. De Monarchia, (p. 815. E.) TERTULLIAN says, that the internal Sense of a Divinity is natural to the Soul, Animae enim a primordio, conscientia DEI, dos est. Advers. Marcion. (Lib. I.

Cap. X.) He observes elsewhere, that GOD is first known by Nature, and then by Doctrine: We know him by Nature from his Works; by Doctrine from the Preaching of the Gospel, Lib. I. Adv. Marcion. (Cap. XVIII.) St. CYPRIAN maintains, that it is the Height of Wickedness not to acknowledge him, of whose Existence it is impossible to be ignorant. Atque haec est summa delicti, &c. De Idolorum vanitate, (Cap. V. Num. 9. Edit. Cellar.) GROTIUS.

All these Passages, we see, tend to prove, that the Consent of Mankind in acknowledging a Divinity, arises from the Conformity of that great Truth to the natural Light of Reason; whereas, in the Text, our Author considers that Consent as a Proof of an universal Tradition, come down to us from the first Men: He seems thereby to return to the alternative, laid down by him in the first Edition; for in that he expresses himself thus, Quae consensio — satis ostendit, aut lucem aliquam animis insitam, quae vi sua per animum feriat, aut traditionem a primis hominibus, &c. quorum utrumvis ad fidem faciendam satis est. However, in his Treatise upon The Truth of the Christian Religion, Lib. I. § 2. he does not ascribe the Consent in Question, to the Force of natural Lights, but advances another Alternative; namely, either a Revelation from GOD himself, or a Tradition come down from the first Men. Let us observe also, that St. CYPRIAN's Argument, which he cites here, is founded, as appears by what precedes, upon a poor Reason, I mean, upon those Expressions which dropt from the Pagans themselves, O Deus, si dederit, &c. See the Octavius of MINUCIUS FAELIX, Cap. XVIII. p. 90. Edit. Davis. with the Note of that judicious English Commentator. Besides, the Passage is ill applied here. For St. CYPRIAN's Design is to prove the Unity of the Godhead; whereas the present Question relates only to the Existence of a Divinity in general; at least, the Proof deduced from the Consent of Mankind, can be alledged no otherwise; for Mankind are far from being agreed in acknowledging one only Divinity.

[7] Ὑπόληψις ἐπίκτητος. Our Author does not say in what Discourse of that antient Orator this Passage is to be found. It is probably that which he cites below, in the next Paragraph, Num. 3. But I have not the Book at present, to look for the two Passages.

[8] In Amator. p. 756. B. Vol. II. Edit. Wech.

[9] De Coelo, Lib. I. Cap. III. p. 434. E. Vol. I. Edit. Paris.

[10] Lib. X. p. 887. Edit. Steph.

[1] Sunt enim Philosophi, &c. De Natur. Deorum. Lib. I. Cap. II.

[2] (Enchirid. Cap. XXVIII. init.) SENECA says, the Worship of the Gods consists first in the Belief of their Existence, then in the Acknowledgment of their Majesty and Goodness, without which there is no true Majesty. Primus est Deorum cultus, &c. Epist. XCV. GROTIUS.

[3] Var. Hist. Lib. II. Cap. XXXI.

[4] De communib. notit. adv. Stoic. (p. 1075. E. Vol. II. Edit. Wech.)

[a] De Ira Dei, c. 6. n. 2.

[5] SENECA, Epist. CXVII. That there are Gods; among other Arguments that might be urged to prove it, we from hence conclude, because that such an Opinion is implanted in all Mankind. Nor is there any Nation so abandoned, so uncivilized, as not to believe it. And in his fourth Book, De Beneficiis, Chap. IV. Nor could all the World have conspired in so much Madness, as to address Deities who can neither hear their Prayers, nor give them any Assistance. Add to this, PLATO, Protagor, and Lib. X. De legib. and some fine Passages in JAMBlichus, about the Beginning of his Treatise, concerning the Mysteries of the Aegyptian, where he says, It is as natural for Man to know there is a GOD, as it is for a Horse to neigh. GROTIUS.

[6] Veluti [Jus Gentium est] erga Deum religio, &c. Digest. Lib. I. De. Justit. & Jure, Leg. II. The Law of Nations is here understood to be that which the Light of Nature discovers, and which is therefore received by all Nations never so little civilized.

[7] XENOPHON, Memorab. Socrat. (Lib. IV. Cap. IV. § 19. Edit. Oxon.)

[8] Our Author here cites CICERO's first Book, De Natur. Deor. and his second, De inventione. The first Passage is, Quae est enim gens, aut quod genus hominum, quod non habeat sine doctrina anticipationem quamdam Deorum? Cap. XVI. As to the other Treatise, I find nothing in it that has any Relation to the Subject, except the Beginning of a Passage already quoted, § 8. Note 5. See also the Tusculan Questions, Lib. I. Cap. XIII.

[b] In conviv. c. 4. § 47.

[9] Therefore those only who dogmatize can be lawfully punished. See what I have said upon PUFENDORF's Law of Nature and Nations, B. III. Chap. IV. § 4. Note 1.

[10] Moxus the Lydian, having taken the City of Crambus by Siege, drowned all the Inhabitants, Οἶον ἄθεούς, As Athiests, because they neither acknowledged nor worshipped any GOD. NICOLAUS DAMASCENUS, in Excerpt. Peires. GROTIUS.

If a People, tho' Athiests, lived morally well, their Athiesm would be no Reason for extirpating them, whilst they did not endeavor to infect others with the bad Principles wherewith they are imbued. See above, Note 9.

[11] The Athenians expelled him their City; or, as others say, that Philosopher having fled for Fear of being punished, they set a Price upon his Head. See ARISTOPHANES's Comedy of the Birds, with the Note of the Greek Scholiast, and VALERIUS MAXIMUS, Lib. I. Cap. I. Num. 7. extern.

[12] See AELIAN, Var. Hist. IX. 12. and the Commentators upon that Place.

[13] HIMERIUS, Action. in Epicur. Our Author has taken this Passage from the Bibliotheque of PHOTIUS. Cod. CCXLIII. p. 1083. Edit. Rothom. 1653.

[1] The Passage of Deuteronomy does not speak of the Introduction of an idolatrous Worship, practised by all the Inhabitants, but of the Toleration of that Worship, practised by some particular Persons, who solicited others with Impunity. See Mr. LE CLERC upon that Place.

[2] PHILO, upon the Decalogue, speaking of such Persons, εἰσὶ δ' οἱ καὶ πρόσωπερ βάλλουσιν, &c. But there are some whose Impiety goes farther still, who do not so much as make an Equality between GOD and his Works, but give all the Honour to these alone; so far from letting him have a Share of it, that they do not vouchsafe that Universal Being a bare Memorial, these Wretches are unmindful of him whom alone they ought to remember, industriously contriving a voluntary Forgetfulness. So MAIMONIDES expounds the Passage in Deuteronomy, Direct. III. 41. GROTIUS.

Our Author, in his Notes upon the New Testament, explains the Passage in The Epistle to the Romans, in another Manner, viz. They have adored the Creature MORE than the Creator; which, say she, is the common Signification of the Preposition παρὰ, with an Accusative, when a Comparison is made; and he gives several Examples to prove it. As to the Passage of JOB, xxxi. 26, 27. it relates to the Fear of Chastisement from Heaven, and there is not the least Insinuation that Punishment was to be apprehended from Man: So that the Consequence deduced from it by our Author is not well founded.

- [3] AGRIPPA's Letter to the Emperor Caligula. De Legat. ad Cajum. p. 1031. B.
- [4] Quaest. Academic. Lib. IV. Cap. III.
- [5] Thus the Jews admitted into their Temple, the Sacrifices sent them by the Kings of Aegypt, and the Emperors Augustus and Tiberius, as PHILO (de Legat. ad Cajum. p. 1036. C.) and JOSEPHUS inform us. GROTIUS.
But did those Princes thereby acknowledge the GOD of the Jews, as highly exalted above other Gods? And would they not as readily have paid the same religious Homage to any other strange Divinity? The Truth is, that Idolatry, of whatsoever Nature it be, ought less to be punished than Atheism, so long as it does not lead to the Commission of real Crimes that are punishable before Men; and then it is not Idolatry, but the Crimes, which are punished.
- [6] If all such People acted in Consequence of their Idolatry; that is, if they proceeded to Things actually criminal, after the Example of the Objects of their Worship, they are punishable. But if they do not follow their Principles, as has often happened in the Pagan World, nothing obliges, or authorizes the punishing them.
- [7] Adferentes edictum [Darii] quo Poeni, &c. JUSTIN, Lib. XIX. (Cap. I. Num. 10.) This was Darius, the Son of Hystaspes, Father of Xerxes. See what has been said on this Head, § 41. GROTIUS.
- [8] He would not make Peace with the Carthaginians but upon this Condition. PLUTARCH, Apophthegm. Reg. & Imper. p. 175. A. Vol. II. Edit. Wech. See also De sera Numinis Vindicta. p. 552. Iphicrates is also said to have put a Stop to this barbarous Custom of sacrificing human Victims amongst the Carthaginians. See the Remark of ISAAC VOSSIUS, upon the Passage of JUSTIN cited in the foregoing Note. For the Rest, the Thing was the more abominable, as the People sacrificed their own Children, which the Canaanites also did, in Honour of Moloch. See a long Note of our Author upon Deuteronomy, xviii. 10. and Mr. LE CLERC upon Leviticus, xviii. 21.
- [9] He calls these People Bletonesians: A Name which I find no where else; nor do I know that any Geographer has used it, unless the Word be corrupted, διὰ τί τὸς καλουμένους βλετονησίους, &c. Quaest. Roman. LXXXIII. p. 283. E. Vol. II. If more Examples are required of Nations, antient and modern, amongst whom the abominable Custom of sacrificing human Victims is established, the Reader need only consult a Dissertation of GEORGE MOEBIUS, some Time since Professor of Theology at Leipsick, intitled De Sacrificiorum origine & materia, and printed in 1660. at the End of his Treatise De Oraculorum Ethnicorum origine, &c.
- [1] Besides the Prejudices of Education, and the Attachment of all People to the Principles of Religion they have once imbibed.
- [2] De Judaeis autem praecipit sancta Synodus nemini deinceps ad credendum vim inferri. Cui enim vult Deus, miseretur, & quem vult, indurat. In Jure Canonic. Distinct. XLV. Cap. V. JOSEPHUS says, that every one ought to serve GOD freely, according to the Light of his Conscience, and not to be compelled to believe such and such Things in Matters of Religion. GROTIUS.
The Jewish Historian says this, upon the Occasion of his Countrymen, who were for compelling some great Lords, Subjects of the King of Trachonitis, to be circumcised. Vit. Joseph. p. 1007. C.

- [3] Footnote number missing in text, supplied from Latin edition. SERVIUS the Grammarian has observed, that whenever the Reason of an Event does not appear, and no Judgment can be formed of it, it has been customary to say, It pleased the Gods. [VISUM SUPERIS] Ut ipse ait Neptunum, Junonem, Minervam, &c.—Quotiescunque autem ratio, vel iudicium non adparet, sic visum, interponitur: Ut HORATIUS, sic visum Veneri, &c. In Aeneid III. 2. DONATUS makes the same Remark, QUID SI HOC QUISPIAM VOLUIT DEUS, Pleraque repentinis impulsionebus nata mirisque proventibus, DEO adscribi solent. Ut, Descendo, ac ducente DEO, flammam inter & hostes Expedior. Et: Hinc me digressum vestris DEUS adpulet or is. Et SALLUSTIUS: Ut tanta repente mutatio non sine DEO videretur. In Eunuch. TERENT. Act. V. Scen. II. (v. 36.) The Rabbi ABARBANEL says the Word צַדִּיק is taken also in the same Sense. GROTIUS.
- [4] This Subject is treated by GREGORY NAZIANZEN, in his Oration, entitled, Cum assumptus est à Patre: And by BEDE, Lib. XXVI. ISIDORE, speaking of King Sisebutus, Who, in the Beginning of his Reign, attempting to bring over the Jews to the Christian Faith, had indeed a Zeal for GOD, but not according to Knowledge; for he compelled them by the Power of the Sword, when he ought to have won them by Reason and Argument. RODERICUS has transcribed this Passage in his History, II. 13. The later Kings of Spain, are, on this Account blamed, by OSORIOUS and MARIANA. See the latter, XXVI. 14. XXVII. 5. GROTIUS.
- [5] Lex Nova non se vindicat ultore gladio. I have already observed in a Note upon Vol. III. of TILLOTSON's Sermons, p. 13. that our Author, citing by Memory, had in View the following Words, Nam vetus Lex ultione gladii se vindicabat, & oculum pro oculo eruebat, & vindictam injuriae retribuebat. Nova autem Lex clementiam designabat. Advers. Judaeos, Cap. III.
- [6] Τὸ ἀντεξούσιον τῶν ἀνθρώπων, &c.
- [7] Epist. ad solitar. vit. agent. Vol. I. p. 855. A. Edit. Colon. seu Lips. 1686.
- [8] St. CYPRIAN, Epist. LV. Turning to his Apostles, he said, Will ye also go away? Observing the Method of the Law, which leaving every Man to his own Liberty, and at his own Disposal, gives him the Choice of Life and Death, and so makes himself the Author of his own Fate. GROTIUS.
- [9] Ἐρωτᾷ λέγων· Μὴ καὶ ὑμεῖς θέλετε ὑπάγειν, &c. Ad loc. JOANN.
- [10] St. CYPRIAN, De Idolorum vanitate, with an Eye to this Passage, says, But the Disciples, by the Advice and Order of their Lord and Master, dispersing themselves over the whole World, were to offer Men the saving Precepts of GOD, to bring them out of Darkness and Error to Light and Glory, and to hand the Blind and Ignorant to the Knowledge of the Truth. But lest this should be too slight a Proof of their Fidelity, and too nice and tender a confession of CHRIST, Tortures, Crosses, and a thousand other Punishments, tempt and try their Strength and Constancy. Cap. VII. Num. 6, 7. Edit. Celler. GROTIUS.
- [11] See the Letter of Theodahadus King of the Goths, to Justinian, in CASSIODORUS. Var. X. 26. GROTIUS.
- [1] Seque sacramento non in scelus aliquod, &c. Lib. X. Epist. XCVII. Num. 7. Edit. Celler.
- [2] He says this in Regard to George, Bishop of Alexandria, a turbulent Man, and a great Accuser, Profession is que suae oblitus, quae nihil nisi justum suadet & lene, ad delatorum ausa feralia desciscibat. (Lib. XXII. Cap. XI. p. 353. Edit. Vales. Gron.) The same Historian stiles Christianity, a plain and sincere Religion. Christianam Religionem absolutam & simplicem, anili superstitione confundens (Constantius, &c. Lib. XXI. Cap.

XVI. p. 318.) ZOSIMUS, another Heathen Writer, says, that the Christian Religion undertakes to deliver its Professors from all Manner of Vice and Impiety. (Lib. II. Cap. XXIX. Num. 7. Edit. Cellar.) The Pagans generally termed it, a harmless and inoffensive Sect. Secta nemini molesta. TERTULLIAN, Scorpiaco, (Cap. I.) JUSTIN MARTYR maintains, that of all Mankind the Christians contribute most to the Tranquillity of the Empire; because they teach, that whether Men do well or ill, they cannot conceal their Actions from the Sight of GOD; and that all Men are to expect either eternal Punishment, or eternal Happiness, according to their good or bad Behaviour in this World. Apolog. II. ARNOBIUS, speaking of the Assemblies of the Christians, says, that nothing was heard in them but what tended to inspire Humanity, Meekness, Modesty, Chastity, Liberality, Beneficence, and the Love of all Mankind. In quibus (conventiculis) aliud auditur nihil, &c. Advers. Gentes, Lib. IV. (p. 152, 153. Edit. Salmas. 1651.) GROTIUS.

[3] Bonus vir Cajus Sejus, tantum quod Christianus. TERTULLIAN. Apologetic. Cap. III. See also Ad Nationes, Lib. I. Cap. IV.

[4] Our Author might very appositely have quoted here this Passage of TERTULLIAN, Quum probi, quum boni coeunt, quum pii, quum casti congregantur, non est factio dicenda, sed Curia. Apologet. Cap. XXXIX. in fin.

[5] De Legat. ad Cajum. (p. 1035. E. Edit. Paris.) He shews elsewhere, how great a Difference there is between the Synagogues and the Mysteries of Paganism. Lib. De Sacrificat. (p. 856, & seq.) which Passage is well worth reading. See something of the same Kind in JOSEPHUS, contra Apion, Lib. II. GROTIUS.

[6] See ZONARAS, (in the Life of Constantine, Vol. III. init.) St. AUSTIN says, that if Maximian, Bishop of Vagiae in Africa, demanded Aid of a Christian Emperor, it was not so much to defend himself, as to defend the Church committed to his Care, against the Enemies of Christianity: Auxilium ergo petivit, &c. Ad Bonifac. Epist. L. These Words are inserted in the Canon Law, Caus. XXIII. Quaest III. Cap. II. GROTIUS.

[a] See Menander Protector.

[1] Many Books of different Authors composed towards the Close of the last, and in the present, Age, are to be seen upon Toleration; in which Persecutors are entirely overthrown, as well by direct Proofs of the greatest Evidence, as unanswerable Arguments. All the World know these Works, which were published in several Languages, especially French and English. To these may be added the Observations of MATTHIAS BERNEGGER, published at Strasburgh in 1669. Obs. XV.

[2] De Natur. Facult. Lib. I.

[3] St. CHRYSOSTOM also says, that there is nothing so difficult as to resolve to change, in Point of Religion. In I. ad Corinth. Hom. II. GROTIUS.

[4] Quandoquidem Haereticus est, ut mea fert opinio, &c. Cap. I. These Words are inserted in the Canon Law, Caus. XXIV. Quaest. III. (Cap. XXVIII.) He afterwards distinguishes between a Heretick, and a Person that suffers himself to be misled by the Arguments of a Heretick. Ille autem, qui hujus modi hominibus credit, homo est imaginatione quadam veritatis ac pietatis illusus. See the same Father's Letter, CLXII. cited in the following Canon. In JUSTINIAN'S Code Heresy is called A mad Obstinacy. Nullus Haereticis ministeriorum locus, nulla ad exercendam animi obstinatio is dementia pateat occasio. Lib. I. Tit. I. De summa Trinitat. &c. Leg. II. princ. GROTIUS.

But this Obstinacy is what Men can form no certain Judgment of, and those who are themselves in an Error, may look upon the Partisans of Truth as obstinate Persons; as the Authors I have mentioned in Note 1. of this Paragraph observe, and prove at large.

[5] The Author of the Answers to the Orthodox, Quest. IV. says,  $\Delta\hat{\eta}\lambda\omicron\iota\ \epsilon\acute{\iota}\sigma\iota\nu$ , &c. It is evident, that either the Ambition or Jealousy of the Broachers gave Birth to all the Heresies in the World. St. CHRYSOSTOM, upon Gal. v.  $\text{Ἡ γὰρ τῶν}$ , &c. For Ambition is the Mother of Heresy. GROTIUS.

[6] De Gubernat. Dei. Lib. V. p. 150, 151. Edit. Paris. 1645.

[7] AGATHIAS, in the first Book of his Histories, relating the ridiculous Superstitions of the Almaines, subjoins  $\text{Ἐλεῖσθαί μ᾽εν}$ , &c. But indeed whoever they are who offend against the Truth, they deserve rather our Pity than our Hatred, and are the more entitled to our Pardon: For they do not willingly deviate and stumble; but only when their Judgments are deceived in their Pursuit of Good, whatever they have once received, they are obstinately bent to retain. (Cap. V.) GROTIUS.

[8] This St. CHRYSOSTOM observes also. Can any one tell, says he, how the Person whom you conceive to be in an Error, will accuse or excuse himself, in the Day when GOD shall judge the Secrets of all Hearts: Upon which he adds, that The Judgments of GOD are unsearchable, and his Ways past finding out. Homil. contra Anathematizant. GROTIUS.

[9] Contra Epist. Manichaei, Quam vocant fundamenti, Cap. II. & III. p. 78, 79. Vol. VI. Edit. Basil. Fine Sayings, if this Father had not belied them by his Conduct! Consult Note 11. upon this Paragraph.

[10] It is with Reason we hate those People who were the first that introduced Persecution amongst Christians, and set so horrid an Example. See their Cruelties in EUSEBIUS, De Vit. Constantin. Lib. I. Cap. V. XXXVIII. SOCRATES, Hist. Eccles. Lib. IV. Cap. XXIX. PROCOPIUS, Vandalic. Lib. I. where he speaks of Honoric, (or Huneric, Cap. VIII.) and Gotthic. Lib. I. (Cap. XIII.) concerning Amalaric; as also in VICTOR, Uticens. St. EPIPHANIUS accuses the Demi-Arians of Persecuting those who profess and teach the Truth; and of endeavouring to convert them, not by Persuasion, but by Enmity, War, and the Sword; so that, adds he, they have not ruined one City or Country, but many. GREGORY, Bishop of Rome, says to the Bishop of Constantinople, speaking of such Persecutors, that the converting of People to the Faith by Stripes is a new and unheard of Method of preaching the Gospel. Nova & inaudita est ista praedicatio, quae verberibus exigit fidem. GROTIUS.

The Arians were, without Doubt, highly in the Wrong to persecute; but as we ought to do Justice to all the World, our Author should not have reproached them, as having been the first who dishonoured Christianity by a Conduct so opposite to the Gospel. The late Mr. BAYLE has very well observed, in his Philosophical Commentary, (Supplement, p. 364. 1 Edit.) and in his Historical and Critical Dictionary, at the Article of Arius, Notes A. G. that The Orthodox had been the Aggressors; for they had implored the secular Arm of Constantine against Arianism, before the Arians had proceeded to any violent Measures. See what follows. And EUSEBIUS, in the Life of Constantine, Lib. III. Cap. LXIV. & seq. SOCRATES, Hist. Eccl. Lib. I. Cap. IX. in Constantine's Letter to the Bishops and People. Our Author quotes this Life improperly, that has nothing in it of the Persecutions used by the Arians, against those of the opposite Party. He had probably in his Thoughts what SOZOMEN relates, Hist. Eccles. Lib. II. Cap. XXV. XXVIII. concerning the Degradation and Banishment of St. Athanasius. The Citation that follows is also faulty as to the Number of the Chapter, for it is in Chap. VI. XV. XVI. XVII. XVIII. and XIX. of B. IV. that SOCRATES speaks of the Violence and Cruelties, exercised by the Emperor Valens, at the Instigation of the Arians, against the Defenders of the Consubstantiality of the Word. For the Rest, our Author, in his Notes upon the Gospels, (in MATTHEW, xiii. 41. p. 257.)

expresses himself differently upon this Head. He contents himself with ascribing to the Arians the Introduction of corporal Punishments somewhat rigorous, from whence they afterwards proceeded, says he, to the shedding of the Blood of those who were not of the same Opinion with themselves, in Point of Religion. But he confesses, that Constantine, after having declared, in his first Edicts, that all Persons should enjoy Liberty of Conscience; decreed afterwards Penalties, which were most of them pecuniary, against such as had separated themselves from the Communion of The Great Church, that is to say, of the strongest Party; which he did, (adds our Author) either out of Policy, or at the Solicitation of the Bishops, who were willing to spare themselves the Trouble of disputing every Day with their Opponents. Seu quod imperio ita conducere arbitrareretur, seu quod Episcopi laborem quotidianae disputationis subterfugerent, &c.

[11] He adds, that it is the Property of Piety to use the Methods of Persuasion, not of Compulsion. Epist. ad Solitar. Vol. I. p. 855. A. One might take Advantage of so formal a Declaration of Saint ATHANASIUS: But the Truth is, that he, and several others of the Fathers, who have spoke the same Language, have often contradicted themselves in their Conduct, and even admitted or established Principles, in Consequence of which Persecution, on account of Religion, was only condemned by Halves; so loose and ill-digested were their Maxims. The great St. AUSTIN, in particular, has varied upon that Head, according to the Times, as our Author confesses in the same Place of his Notes upon the Gospel, which I have cited in the preceding Note. That Father, says he, long believed that those, who were called Hereticks, were not to be punished in any Manner whatsoever. But having many Combats afterwards to maintain against the Donatists, a pretty obstinate Sect, he changed his Sentiments, and approved of such Punishments as left the Criminal Time to repent; persisting otherwise to condemn capital Punishment, which he often opposed, in Regard to those People. See the Treatise of MARK ANTONY DE DOMINIS, De Repub. Eccles. Lib. VII. Cap. VIII. in which he has collected several other Passages of the Fathers upon this Subject.

[a] See St. Jerome upon it, as cited in Canon Law, caus. 63. qu. 4. cap. 13.

[12] Idacius & Ithacius. Sulpicius Severus observes, that they were very unwise to apply, as they did, immediately to the Civil Magistrates, in order to engage them to expel the Priscillianists out of the Cities. Tum vero Idacius, &c. (Hist. Sacr. Lib. II. Cap. XLVII. Num. 5. Edit. Vorst.) A little lower, speaking of the Council of Bourdeaux, in which the two Spanish Bishops before-mentioned, appeared as Accusers of the Priscillianists, that Historian says, that he would not blame their Zeal against the Heresy, if they had not acted with too much Heat, from the Desire of overcoming; and he equally condemns the Accusers and the Accused. Sequuti etiam accusatores, &c. (Cap. L. Num. 1, 2.) Martin, Bishop of Tours, spared no Pains to induce Idacius to desist from his Accusation; he begged the Emperor Maximus not to shed the Blood of those unhappy People; he represented to him, that it was sufficient, and more than sufficient, if, after having been declared Hereticks by the Sentence of the Bishops, they were excluded the Churches; that it was a new and unheard of Attempt, in Ecclesiastical Affairs, to have Recourse to the Civil Magistrate. Namque tum Martinus, &c. (Ibid. Num. 5.) GROTIUS.

[13] I find this Saying in the first Book De Republica, where that Philosopher speaks of those who, being ignorant of some Truth, are by that Ignorance generally led into some Error. p. 337. D. Vol. II. Edit. H. Steph. It is visibly from hence, that a Father of the Church has taken a Thought, quoted by our Author in the following Note.

[14] Error does not deserve the Name of Crime according to SENECA, THES. Quis nomen umquam sceleris errori dedit?

The same Philosopher says, No wise Man will hate those who are in an Error, for if he does he must hate himself. Non est autem prudentis, errantes odisse: Alioquin ipse sibi odio erit. De Ira, Lib. I. Cap. XIV. MARCUS ANTONINUS says, “Instruct those who err, if you can; if you cannot, remember that your good Nature was given you, that you might use it towards them, and that the Gods are indulgent to such Persons.” Lib. IX. (§ 11.) St. CHRYSOSTOM says, that the Ignorant are neither to be punished nor accused, but to be instructed in what they are ignorant of. In Eph. iv. 17. AMMIANUS MARCELLINUS praises the Moderation of the Emperor Valentinian, in not molesting any one upon Account of Religion, and in suffering every Body to serve GOD in Peace, according to the Lights of his own Conscience. Postremo hoc moderamine, &c. Lib. XXX. Cap. IX. GROTIUS.

[1] See some fine Passages upon this Subject, in B. V. and VI. of St. CYRIL, against the Emperor Julian. The Amphictyons, at the Persuasion of Solon, made War upon the Cirrhæans, for having entered by Force into the Temple of Delphos; as PLUTARCH informs us in the Life of Solon, (p. 83. Vol. I. Edit. Wech.) So those who set themselves up for Prophets, and are not such, may be justly punished. See AGATHIAS, Lib. V. (where he speaks of such People that rose up at Byzantium, Cap. III.) GROTIUS.

[a] Thucyd. 1. 1. c. 126. & seq. Ed. Oxon.

[b] Diod. Sicul. 1. 11. c. 60. & seq.

[2] Illum vindicem sacrilegii, &c. Lib. VIII. Cap. II. Num. 6.

[3] Quamdiu vasa fuerunt, &c. (Vol. V. p. 581. B. Edit. Basil.)

[4] Our Author does not say from whence he took this; and perhaps it is no where to be found, tho’ a learned German, CHRYSTOPHER ADAM RUPERT, advances the same Thing in his Observations upon VALERIUS MAXIMUS, Lib. I. Cap. I. p. 19. without Doubt upon our Author’s Authority. I very much suspect, that he has mistaken the Sense of the Father, or if that Father has said any Thing like it, he is not here entirely consistent in his Principles: For in his Treatise De Civitate Dei, Lib. V. Cap. XII. he proves at large, that the Divine Providence permitted the Empire of the Romans to increase, not on Account of their Attachment to their Religion, tho’ false; but because of their civil Virtues. See also Lib. IV. Cap. XII. I find in the Notes of TESMAR, a Passage of Lett. V. to Marcellinus, wherein that Compiler discovers the Thought ascribed by our Author to St. AUGUSTIN; but it is just the reverse, and I shall give the Passage, in order to prove at the same Time the Truth of my Observation, and the Want of Judgment which TESMAR shews in this Place, as he does every where else. Ut, quamdiu inde peregrinamur, feramus eos, si corrigere non valemus, qui, vitiis impunitis, volunt stare Rempublicam, quam primi Romani constituerunt, auxeruntque virtutibus: & si non habentes veram pietatem erga DEUM verum, quae illos etiam in aeternam civitatem posset salubri religione perducere, custodientes tamen quandam sui generis PROBITATEM, quae posset TERRENAE CIVITATI CONSTITUENDAE, AUGENDAE, CONSERVANDAEQUE sufficere. DEUS enim sic ostendit in opulentissimo & praeclaro Imperio Romanorum, QUANTUM VALERENT CIVILES, ETIAM SINE VERA RELIGIONE VIRTUTES, &c. This agrees very well with what the antient Doctor says in the Places of his other Work, which I have quoted.

[5] He speaks of Idolaters in general, Nam isti fragilium cultores—aliquid tamen sapientiae retinent, & HABERE VENIAM possunt, quia summum hominis officium, etsi non re ipsâ, tamen proposito tenent. Instit. Divin. Lib. II. Cap. III. Num. 14. Edit. Cellar.

[c] Chap. 13. § 12. of this Book.

- [6] Injuriam sacrilegus DEO, &c. De benefic. Lib. VII. Cap. VII. The Philosopher does not speak of those who affront false Divinities; but his Meaning is, as appears by the whole Series of the Discourse, that tho' by committing a Sacrilege, one does no Injury in Reality to the Divinity, whom he supposes a true GOD, because he is out of the Reach of all Harm; yet he who commits it deserves to be punished, because he believes he injures the Divinity, and others consider his Action on that Foot. Our Author, however, has since alledged this Passage, thus misapplied, in his Notes upon The Wisdom of SOLOMON, ver. 31. where, upon the Word Opinio, he says, adde, aut professio.
- [7] Et homicidii, veneficii, &c. Ibid. Lib. III. Cap. VI.
- [d] De legib. l. 10. n. 907, &c. tom. 2. Ed. Steph.
- [1] See PUFENDORF upon this Subject, Law of Nature and Nations, Lib. VIII. Cap. III. § 28. & seq. and Cap. VI. § 12.
- [2] TERTULLIAN, De Resurrectione Carnis, Chap. XVI. For they will say that their Assistants and Companions are at their Liberty, either of helping and associating with them or not, that it is at their own Choice, and in their own Power, either to be one or the other, being no less than other People endued with Freedom of Will; and that therefore, since they voluntarily concurred with them, they are as criminal as the Authors themselves. GROTIUS.
- [a] Chap. 17. of this Book.
- [3] At the Death of St. Stephen, tho' Saul kept only the Cloaths of those who stoned that holy Man, he stoned him by their Hands; as St. AUSTIN observes. Saulus manibus omnium lapidabat. Serm. V. De Sanctis. Cap. IV. See something like this, Serm. I. in idem Argument. Cap. III. and Serm. XIV. GROTIUS.
The Consent of Saul was not necessary; they would have stoned St. Stephen without him. So that this Example relates to another Class, or to the Case of those, who, I. concurring little or nothing to the actual Production of a Crime, are united in Will with those who commit it, and inclined to assist in it very much, if necessary.
- [4] As when a Man shakes Money out of one's Pocket, that another may seize it; or stops a Person, to give another Time to take something from him; or drives away Sheep or Oxen with a Piece of red Cloth; for Example, that they may fall into the Hands of a Thief; or places a Ladder against a Window; or breaks open a Door, or Window, for a Thief to enter; or lends him a Ladder to get up, or some Instrument of Iron to open with. These are the Examples mentioned in the Institutes; Interdum Furti tenetur, qui ipse furtum non fecit. Lib. IV. Tit. I. De obligationibus, quae ex delicto nascuntur. § 11. See the Edict of THEODORICK, Cap. CXX. GROTIUS.
- [5] Hieronym. super parabolis, Cap. XXIX. Vol. VII. p. 53. C. Edit. Froben. 1537. Not only the Thief, but the Person who, being privy to the Theft, conceals it from the Party robbed, is guilty. CHRYSOSTOM. De Statuis, Orat. XIV οὐ γὰρ οἱ ἐπιπροσώπτες, &c. Not only those who forswear themselves, but those who are acquainted with the Perjury, and conceal it, are criminal. GROTIUS.
- [6] See the Institutes, and Edict of THEODORICK, where cited Note 4. According to an antient Law of Athens, he who had advised a Crime was liable to the same Punishment as he that committed it. Καὶ οὗτος ὁ νόμος, &c. ANDOCID. (Orat. I. De Mysteriis, p. 219. Edit. Wech.) ARISTOTLE says, that without the Advice given, he that followed it would not have done the Fact. Rhetoric. Lib. I. Cap. VII. (p. 126. Edit. Victor. 527. Edit. Paris. Vol. II.) GROTIUS.

What is here quoted from ARISTOTLE, that Philosopher cites as from the Orator Leodamas, who grounds a Proof upon it, that he who gives bad Counsel is more criminal than he who follows it. Our Author, by Mistake, quoted here De Poetica, Cap. XVII. And it is necessary to remark further, that in the Passage of the Institutes to which he refers, the bare Advice is not considered as a Thing that renders a Person an Accomplice in Theft: The Emperor, on the contrary, intends, that he who only advises to rob, shall not be liable to any Prosecution, unless he has actually aided in the Robbery, in some Manner or other. Certe qui nullam opem ad furtum faciendum adhibuit, sed tantum consilium dedit, atque hortatus est ad furtum faciendum, non tenetur furti. This is clear, and I shall not enter into the Dispute of Interpreters upon the Sense of this Form, Ope consilio, or Ope aut consilio. A Dispute which arises from the Ambiguity of the Word Consilio, and the different Opinions of the Sects of antient Civilians upon this Subject.

[7] According to St. CHRYSOSTOM, he who praises a bad Action, is worse than him who commits it: In Cap. 1. Ad Roman. circa fin. By the Laws of the antient Lombards, he, who being present encourages a Person in doing ill, is deemed to commit the Crime himself, Lib. 1. Tit. IX. § 25. See the Passages cited hereafter from PHILO and JOSEPHUS in the Note upon § 17. GROTIUS.

See upon all this, PUFENDORF's Law of Nature and Nations, B. I. Chap. V. § ult. B. III. Chap. I. § 4. and the Notes upon the Abridgment of The Duty of a Man and a Citizen, B. I. Chap. I. § ult.

[8] CHRYSOSTOM I. Adversus Judaeos, Orat. I. ἄσπερ οὐρανός, &c. So then, not only those who commit a Robbery, but those who are impowered to prevent it, and do not prevent it, deserve Punishment, and that equally too: So likewise he, who hinders a Person's Cure, is as guilty, as if he himself had given him the Wound, says the same St. CHRYSOSTOM, upon 2 Cor. vii. GROTIUS.

[a] Quaest. in Levit. xxvi.

[b] Liv. Lib. 1. Cap. 24. n. 8.

[1] AMMIANUS MARCELLINUS relates, that the Embassadors of the Quadi, an antient People of Germany, used the common Excuse, that they had done nothing against the Romans by the publick Council of the Heads of the Nation, but that the Disorders had been committed by certain Robbers who were Foreigners. Docere jussi, quae ferebant, &c. Lib. XXX. (Cap. VI.) St. CHRYSOSTOM, speaking of those, who raised a Sedition in Antioch, in which the Statues of Theodosius the Emperor and of the Imperial Family had been thrown down; observes, that the Body of the City had no Share in those Disorders; but that the Authors of them were certain insolent and inconsiderate Strangers; from whence he concludes, that it would be unjust to ruin so great a City for the Folly of a small number of Persons, and to punish the innocent with the guilty. Orat. III. De Statuis. GROTIUS.

[c] Lib. 29. Cap. 17. n. 2.

[d] Lib. 35. Cap. 31. n. 14, 15.

[e] Idem, Lib. 45. Cap. 23. n. 7, 8.

[2] Nondum quae feceris, sed quae fieri passus sis, &c. (Cap. V.)

[3] Alienae igitur, inquires, culpa me reum facies? Prorsus alienae; si provideri potuit, ne existeret. (Epist. Ad Brut. IV.)

[f] Paraenet. Cap. 28.

- [g] Adversus Gentes. Lib. 4. p. 149 Edit. Lugd. 1651.
- [h] De Gubernat. Dei. Lib. 7. p. 266. Edit. Paris 1645.
- [4] Qui desinit obviare, quum potest, consentit. Our Author does not say from what Work of this Father he took these Words. I find them in the Canon Law, Caus. XXIII. Quaest. III. Can. XI. where they are cited as from the Comment of St. AUSTIN upon Psalm lxxxii.
- [5] Imperator noster cum patre, &c. Digest. Lib. LX. Tit. VIII. Qui sine manumissione ad libertatem perveniunt, Leg. VII.
- [6] Si servus, sciente domino, occidit, &c. Digest. Lib. IX. Tit. IV. De noxalib. Actionibus, Leg. II. Princip. See the Treatise of Mr. NOODT, Ad Leg. Aquil. Cap. X.
- [7] Si servus, sciente domino, alienum, &c. JUL. PAUL. Rec. Sentent. Lib. V. Tit. XXX. Ad Legem Fabiam, §2.
- [8] Scientiam heic pro patientia, &c. Digest. Lib. IX. Tit. I. Ad Leg. Aquil. Leg. XLV. Is autem accipitur, scire, qui scit, & potuit prohibere: Scientiam enim spectare debemus, quae habet & voluntatem, Lib. XLVII. Tit. VI. Si Familia Furtum fecisse dicatur, Leg. I. § 1. See also Lib. XLVII. Tit. VII. Arborum furtum caesarum, Leg. VII. § 5. and LEX WISIGOTHOR. Lib. VIII. Tit. IV. Cap. XI. XXVI. & alibi, Lib. IX. Tit. I. Cap. I. GROTIUS.
- [9] In delictis servorum scientia domini, &c. Digest. Lib. IX. Tit. IV. De noxalib act. Leg. IV. Princ. In this Law our Author follows the common reading in former Times, in the Words. Aut quid si contemnat dominium? Whereas the Florence Edition has: Aut qui condemnat Dominum; which makes a different Sense, and means that the Slave has caused his Master to be condemned to leave him his Liberty: For the Word condemnare is sometimes used in regard to those who obtain a Sentence in their Favour; as may be seen in the Examples alledged by the President BRISSON in his Law-Dictionary, and PETER DU FAUR, Semest. II. Lib. II. Cap. XXIII. p. m. 253, 354. I find however, that the great CUJAS, in his Commentary upon JULIUS PAULUS, Ad Edictum, p. 43. and ANTONY DU FAUR, Ration. Vol. II. p. 922. prefer also the same reading our Author has followed. For the rest, see the Treatise of Mr. NOODT upon the Foundation of the Decisions of the Roman Law in regard to Crimes committed by Slaves, Ad Legem Aquiliam, Cap. X.
- [10] Culpâ caret, qui scit, sed prohibere non potest. Digest. Lib. L. Tit. XVII. De diversis Reg. Juris, Leg. L. See also CIX. of the same Title, with the Commentary of PETER DU FAUR, from whom our Author seems to have taken the Laws, and most of the Passages cited by him in this Place.
- [11] This is determined in the Digest in regard to a Father, who suffers his Son to marry a Widow before the Time of her mourning be expired; or who permits his Son or Daughter to betroth themselves at the same Time to two different Persons in the Name of a third; or who suffers his Daughter, being become a Widow, to declare herself with Child, that she may be put in Possession of her deceased Husband's Estate: For in all these Cases the Father is branded with Infamy, as well as the Son or Daughter, if they were still under his Tuition. Et [infamiâ notatur]—[quae intra id tempus, quo elugere virum moris est, in matrimonium collocata est,] &c. Digest. Lib. III. Tit. II. De his, qui notantur infamiâ, Leg. I. Si quis alieno nomine sponsalia, &c. Ibid. Leg. XIII. § 1. Idque & in patre, &c. Leg. XIX. GROTIUS.
- [12] This is another Law cited by our Author in the Margin, which says, that when a Slave has committed some Offence merely of his own Head, and without his Master's Order, the latter is however obliged either to make good the Damage, or give up the Slave: Quod si servo suo non praeceperit, &c. Digest. Lib. XLVII. Tit. VII. § 5. But this took Place whether the Master had or had not any knowledge of the Slaves bad Design. So that the Case is not to the Purpose here. See what I have said before on this Head in the tenth Chapter of this Book, § 21.

[13] Oper. & Dier. Ver. 240, 241. Edit. Cler.

[14] PROCLUS, In laud. vers.

[15] Quidquid delirant Reges, plectuntur Achivi. HOR. Lib. I. Epist. II. Ver. 14.

[16] According to St. CYRIL in his fifth Book Adversus Julian. GROTIUS.

The Place which our Author means is in p. 175. Edit. Spanheim. But I do not find, that that Father gives such an Explication. He makes use of this Example only to retort upon Julian, the Apostate, the Reproach he had cast upon the true GOD, of being subject to great Wrath.

[17]

— — — Pallasne exurere classem
Argivûm, atque ipsos potuit submergere ponto
Unius ob noxam, & furias Ajacis Oilei.

VIRGIL. Aen. I. 39. & seq:

Naryciusque heros, a virgine, virgine raptâ,
Quam meruit solus, poenam digessit in omnes.

OVID. Metam. Lib. XIV. (Ver. 468.)

EURIPIDES in his Troades, introduces Neptune speaking thus, Ver. 69. & seq.

Οἶ δ' ἤνικ' Ἀΐας εἶλκε Κασσάνδραν βία,

I know it, when Ajax forc'd Cassandra.

And MINERVA replying,

Κ' οὐδέν γ' Ἀχαιῶν ἔπαθεν, οὐ δ' ἦκοῦς ὑπο.

— — — The Greeks Regardless saw his Crime
Nor made him suffer for it.

And upon the same Principle St. CHRYSOSTOM involves all the People of Antioch in the Guilt of the Sedition, wherein the Statues of the Emperor and the Imperial Family were thrown down, in his first Oration De Statuis: ἰδοὺ τὸ ἁμάρτημα, &c. Few were directly concerned in the Crime, but the Charge is common and universal. We are all upon their Accounts under sad Apprehensions, and expect ourselves every Moment to be punished for what they have dared to do: Whereas, had we expelled them the City, we might have prevented this, and had we managed the affected Part as we ought, we had not now been labouring under our present Fears. And then afterwards, δι' αὐτὸ οὖν, &c. For this very Reason, says he, shall you smart, shall you be severely punished, because you were not there, because you did not hinder them, because you did not restrain those furious Wretches, nor hazard yourselves for the Emperor's Honour. You had no Share in their Proceedings, you did not join them in their Audaciousness; I commend you for it, and take it kindly; but inasmuch as you did not hinder the Fact itself, you are deservedly prosecuted. GROTIUS.

[18] Post aliquot annos, &c. Lib. I. Cap. XIV. Num. 1, 2.

[19] Potestas quippe magna & potentissima, &c. De Gubernat. Dei, Lib. VII. p. 226. And PHILO in Flaccum, ὁ γὰρ ἐπιπλήττειν, &c. For he who has the Power of inflicting Punishments, might, if he pleased, have put a Stop to it altogether; and if he did not hinder it, it is plain that he both permits and approves it. DION in Galba, τοῖς μὲν γὰρ ἰδιώταις, &c. All that a private Person has to do, is to see that he does not himself offend; but Magistrates, and People in Government, are to take Care that others do not. In the fourth Chapter of the Synod of Pistes, inserted among the Capitularies of Charles the Bald, we have the following Sentence, He who neglects to reform what he might reform, does at the same Time give his Consent to the Fact; and therefore, no Doubt of it, makes himself an Accomplice in the Crime. See NICETAS CHONIATES, Lib. II. De Andronico. GROTIUS.

[20] Where he speaks of those who suffer their Allies to be enslaved by some other State, tho' in their Power to prevent it, Lib. I. Cap. LXIX. Edit. Oxon.

[21] The Author cites Lib. I. and VI. in the Margin. In the latter I find the Latins and Hernicians excuse themselves on that Account, because some of their Youth were gone to serve in the Army of the Volsci against the Romans: Responsum frequenti, &c. Cap. X. Num. 7. But I find nothing of this Kind that relates to the Veientes in the first Book, and I much doubt, whether that People, who to the Destruction of their City, were almost always Enemies to the Romans; ever thought of making them such an Excuse upon the Case in Question. Our Author has expressed himself ill in this Place, thro' his having read ALBERIC GENTILIS hastily, from whom he has taken these Examples and some others, alledged by him in this Chapter; as appears also from the Manner in which he quotes the Passages of LIVY: For that Civilian in Chap. XXI. B. I. of his Treatise, De Jure Belli, puts also in the Margin, LIV. Lib. I. VI. In the Passage of the first Book LIVY says, that the Romans being at War with the Sabines, and the latter endeavouring on all Sides to bring the neighbouring States into their Party; some Volunteers of the Veientes joined them: But that State gave no Aid to the Sabines, to avoid breaking the Truce: At which the Historian expresses Surprize; without doubt for the Reason I have mentioned: Publico auxilio nullo, &c. Cap. XXX. Num. 7. See the Note of Mr. LE CLERC, and the Animadversiones Historicae of the late Mr. PERIZONIUS, upon the Truce there spoken of, Cap. IV. p. 170, & seq.

[i] Polyb. Lib. 2. Cap. 8.

[k] Plut. in vit. Cimon. p. 483. C. Vol. 2.

[22] Orat. Rhodiac.

[23] Lib. IV. Cap. XXVII.

[a] Chap. 20. § 3.

[1] Actio popularis. A Phrase in the Roman Law, which thereby gives every particular Person Power to prosecute civilly, but not criminally, those who have committed certain Offences. See Digest. Lib. XLVII. Tit. XXIII. De Popularib. Action. And the Interpreters on that Place.

[1] For a Man's Case ought to be known, before he is delivered up. It is not reasonable, ὁ κριτοῦς ἐκδιδόναι, to give up Persons untried. PLUTARCH in his Romulus. And the King of Scotland, in CAMBDEN, at the Year MDLXXXV. tells Queen Elizabeth, That he would send Fernihurst and the Chancellor too into England, if by plain and legal Proofs they were found guilty of designedly breaking the Peace, or of having committed the Murder of Russel charged upon them. GROTIUS.

[2] Lucullus demanded Mithridates of Tigranes, and upon his not giving him up, made War against him. APPIAN in his Life of Mithridates, and PLUTARCH in his Lucullus. The Romans required of the Allobroges, to deliver up the Salgae, APPIAN, Excerpt. legat. XI. See PRISCUS, Exc. legat. XXI. of a certain Bishop, whom the Romans were for giving up to the Scythians. A Duke of Benevento was delivered up by a Gascoigne Prince to Ferdinand King of Castile. MARIANA XX. 1. GROTIUS.

[a] Pausanias. Lib. 4. Cap. 4.

[b] Strab. Geogr. Lib. 8. p. 556. Edit Amstel. p. 362. Edit. Paris. Casaub.

[c] Sueton in Jul. Caes. Cap. 24. See above Lib. 2. Cap. 3. § 5. n. 4.

[d] Plutarch in Camill. p. 136, 137. Appian Exc. Legat. 9. Lib. 5. 36.

[3] Our Author no doubt took this Fact from DIONYSIUS HALICARN. who says that the Hernicians refused to give up the Offenders, by Way of Reprizals, Antiq. Roman. Lib. VIII. Cap. LXIV. p. 510, 511. Edit. Oxon.

[e] Liv. xxxi. 11.

[4] It was before, not afterwards, that the Romans demanded Hannibal of the Carthaginians. LIVY, Lib. XXI. Cap. VI. and X. DIOD. SICULUS, Fragm. E, Lib. XXI. But it is true the Romans did afterwards demand Hannibal from Antiochus. Idem XXXVII. 45. This is GRONOVIVS'S Remark.

[5] It is in the Speech of Marius's Deputies. Bell. Jugurth. Cap. CIX. p. 504. Edit. Wass.

[f] Liv. xxxviii. 42.

[g] Valer. Max. vi. 6. Num. 5.

[h] Liv. Lib. 38. Cap. 31. Num. 2.

[6] DIOD. SIC. Lib. XVI. Cap. XCIII. p. 557. Edit. H. Steph.

[i] Plutarch. Narrat. amat. p. 774, 775. Vol. 2.

[7] Our Author cites no Authority here: But ALBERICUS GENTILIS, from whom, as I have already observed, he has borrowed this Example with some others, (Lib. I. Cap. XXI. p. 163.) refers us in the Margin to PAUSANIAS, Lib. VI. The Passage is towards the beginning: And all that the Historian says, is that a War arose between the Lacedemonians and the Eleans, because the Hellanodicae (or Judges at the Olympick Games) had caused a Lacedemonian named Lichas, to be scourged. Cap. II. p. 178. Edit. Graec. Wechel. So that our Author changes the Persons, and makes the Lacedemonians the Aggressors; whereas the Eleans were so: And he advances besides another Circumstance, of which there is nothing in PAUSANIAS, I mean, the refusal to deliver up or punish the Offenders. Nor is there any thing to be found of it either in XENOPHON, Hist. Graec. Lib. III. Cap. II. § 16. or in THUCYDIDES, Lib. V. Cap. L. where the same Fact is related. But our Author having read that Example in ALBERICUS GENTILIS, immediately after another taken also from PAUSANIAS, Lib. IV. Cap. IV. which he quotes himself above, and in which we see a War actually declared against the Messenians by the Lacedemonians, under Pretext, that the former would not deliver up a Messenian called Polychares, who killed as many Lacedemonians as came in his Way; our Author, I say, conceived from thence, that the same Thing was precisely the Subject of the following Example, which the Civilian, whom he used, expresses thus: Haec belli causa Eleos inter & Lacedaemonios: Quod Lacedaemonius vir ab Eleis habitus male.

[k] See the Treaty between England and Denmark, in Is. Pontanus de Mari.

[8] Transuentes agmine infesto, &c. Lib. VII. Cap. XX. Num. 6, 7.

[9] He represented to that Prince, as he had also done in the Assembly of the Amphictyons, that those who had plundered the Temple of Delphos in Person, or who had advised the plundering of it, ought to be punished, and not the Cities, of which they were Inhabitants, which had offered to deliver them up, in order to their being tried. Orat. de mala obita legatione, p. 262. B. Edit. Basil 1572.

[10] Bardas, surnamed the Cruel, having taken Refuge with Chosroez, King of Persia, the Emperor Basilius Porphyrogenetus sent to desire Chosroez, not to protect a Rebel, who had attempted to dethrone his lawful Sovereign; and to consider, that in doing so, he would set an Example, which might prove of ill Consequence to himself. ZONAR. Vol. III. in Basil. Porphyrogenetus. See what LAONICUS CHALCOCONDYLAS says of some Corsairs, to whom the Island of Lesbos had given Refuge. Hist. Turc. Lib. X. init. GROTIUS.

[11] See PUFENDORF upon this Question, Law of Nature and Nations, B. VIII. Chap. XI. § 9.

[12] Quem [deditum] hostes si non, &c. Digest. Lib. L. Tit. VII. De Legationib. Leg. VII.

[1] De Orator. Lib. 1. Cap. 40. and Lib. 2. Cap. 32. Topic. Chap. 8. Orat. pro Caecin. Chap. 34.

[13] Quo in genere etiam Mancini, &c. The Opinion of Brutus, which the Orator here embraces, was not followed in the Affair of Hostilius Mancinus; as it seems to be deduced from the last Law of the Title De Legationib. which will be cited in Note 16. See what I shall say there, and in B. III. Chap. IX. § 8.

[14] This is true generally speaking. But it may also happen, that the Giver up thereby deprives the Person given up of all his Rights: Which is to be judged of from the Circumstances. And such was the particular Case which gave Occasion to the Question, as we shall see upon the ninth Chapter of the following Book, § 8.

[15] As did the Roman Senate in regard to Marcus Clodius, whom, as our Author says, the Corsians, to whom he had been given up for having concluded a dishonourable Peace with them, would not receive; for he was executed in Prison at Rome. Marcum Clodium Senatus Corsis, &c. VALERIUS MAXIMUS, Lib. VI. Cap. III. Num. 3.

[16] An qui hostibus deditus, &c. Digest. Lib. XLIX. Tit. XV. De Captivis & Postlim. Leg. IV. This Law is not without its Difficulties. As the Question in the particular Case, of which the Civilian MODESTINUS speaks here, was to know, whether Hostilius Mancinus retained the Rights of a Roman Citizen by the Refusal of the Numantines to whom he had been delivered up: It seems at first, that instead of the Words nec a nobis receptus these should be read nec ab iis receptus; and the rather as the Error might easily have crept in. And indeed, I find that several celebrated Lawyers have so conjectured long since, as FRANCIS BAUDOIN in his Jurisprudentia Muciana, p. 48. ANTHONY FAURE, Jurisprud. Papinian. Tit. XI. Princip. VIII. Illat. I. p. 612. And JULIUS PACIUS in the Margin of his Edition of the Body of Law. Three Authors, who say nothing of their having borrowed this Correction from any Body else. I do not however believe it necessary, without the Authority of some good Manuscripts. For these Words, nec a nobis receptus, may very well be understood as if the Lawyer, at the same Time that he denies that the Person in Question becomes a Citizen again by the Right of Postliminy, insinuates, that he might become so by Rehabilitation, and a new Ordinance of the People. This took Place in the Affair of Mancinus: For a Law of the People was necessary to reinstate him in his former Condition, in Consequence of which he obtained the Dignity of Praetor, as we find in the last Law of the Title De Legationibus, cited before: De quo [Hostilio Mancino] &c. It appears from thence, that Scaevola's Opinion took Place in the Dispute under Consideration; as BAUDOUIN observes, (ubi supra, p. 47.) Mr. THOMASIUS, who pretends, that the Law in favour of Mancinus imported only a single Decision of the controverted Case, does not alledge sufficient Reasons for his Opinion. The very Office of Praetor, which Mancinus stood for a second Time, after having been Consul, supposes a Rehabilitation. See the Note of ANDREAS SCHOTUS, upon AURELIUS VICTOR, De Vir. illust. Cap. 59. Num. 4. So that our Author's Application of MODESTINUS's Words is not just.

[1] Κοινοὶ ἰκεσίας νόμοι, &c. as POLIBYUS and MALCHUS call them in the Excerpta Legationum, that is to say, the Laws generally received in Relation to Suppliants. GROTIUS.

[2] Οἱ γὰρ ἄττ' ἄρχῆς, &c. [Instead of ἀτυχημάτων the reading here should undoubtedly have been ἀδικημάτων as our Author and the Latin Translator have expressed it in their Version: And I have not the Edition of RHODOMANUS to see whether he has corrected this manifest Error, which HENRY STEPHENS has let pass.] Biblioth. Hist. Lib. XIII. Cap. XXIX. p. 345, 346. Edit. H. Steph.

[3] An antient Oracle delivers itself in the following Manner: (In regard to a young Man who in defending himself against a Robber had killed his Friend.)

Ἐκτεινας τὸν ἐταῖρον ἀμύνων· οὐ σ' ἐμίανεν
 Αἶμα. πέλεις δὲ χέρας καθαρώταρας ἢ πάρος ἦσθα,

*Endeav'ring to assist, you've kill'd your Friend,
 Not tainted with his Blood at all: Your Hands,
 Much cleaner than they were before.*

GROTIUS.

This Oracle is in AELIAN. Var. Histor. Lib. III. Cap. XLIV.

[a] Apud. Stob. T. 7.

[4] In Aphob. Orat. II. (sub fin. p. 556.) Which CICERO expresses in Latin: Eorum misereri oportere, qui propter fortunam, non propter malitiam, in miseriis sint. De Invent. Lib. II. (Cap. XXXVI.) GROTIUS.

[5] PHILO the Jew gives it for a Maxim, that Compassion is due only to the unfortunate, but that he who voluntarily does amiss, is not unfortunate, but unjust. De judice (p. 722. A.) The Emperor MARCUS ANTONINUS is for having the Disposition of Mind examined, to know whether Men act from Ignorance or Design; and for considering those Things that have a Connection with them. Lib. IX. § 22. Edit. Gataker. TOTILAS distinguishes between what is done thro' Ignorance or Forgetfulness, and what with premeditated Design. Gothic. Lib. III. Cap. IX. (in a Letter which he wrote to the Roman Senate.) GROTIUS.

This Antiphanes, whom our Author cites in this Place, is the Orator ANTIPHON, whose Name is twice misspelt in this Chapter, and that in all the Editions; for Example here in the Text, and at Paragraph XVI. See Oration XIV. and XV. p. 134. Edit. Wech. As to LYSIAS, I do not know where he says what our Author ascribes to him. But I happened to cast my Eye upon a Thought of this Orator very like that in the preceding Note. Οὐ γὰρ αἰδिकाίως ἀποθνήσκοντες, ἀλλ' οἱ ἀδίκως, ἄξιτοι εἰσιν ἐλεεῖσθαι. Contr. Andocid.

Orat. V. in fine. The last Words of this Passage of MARCUS ANTONINUS are misunderstood by our Author, & simul ea consideres, quae his cohaerent; for they signify that we ought to consider that other Man as our Relation; that is to say, by Nature, as GATAKER, and after him Monsieur and Madam DACIER translate it. The latter, by the Way, have committed a Fault in saying pour connoitre s'il agit par raison, to know whether he acted by Reason, instead of s'il agit, or s'il pêche par ignorance, ou volontairement; if he acted or offended thro' Ignorance or voluntarily.

[b] Deut. xix. 1, &c.

[c] Ibid. xxiii. 15.

[d] Exod. xxi. 14. 1 Kings ii. 29. 2 Kings xi. 13, &c.

[6] De legib. Specialib. p. 790. D. Edit. Paris.

[7] PLUTARCH, Quaest. Graec. XXXII. (p. 298. D. Edit. Wech. Vol. II.) K. Pepin received such as fled from the Tyranny in Neustria, and would not give them up. FREDEGAR. In rebus Pipini, Ad Ann. 688. The Emperor Lewis le Debonnaire gave Refuge also to those who fled to him from the Church of Rome, as appears from one of his Decrees made in the Year 817. and inserted in Vol. II. of the Gallican Councils. Charles the Bald acted in the same Manner with regard to those, who came over to him from his Brother Lewis. AYMONIUS, Lib. V. Cap. XXXIV. Constantine Monomachus machus refused to deliver up Cegena Patzinaca to Tyrachus a Turkish Governor. See ZONARAS, Vol. III. in the Life of that Emperor. Nor would the Governor Inunginus deliver up Osman to Eskisar, as LEUNCLAVIUS tells us, Hist. Turc. Lib. II. The Portuguese made the same Refusal in regard to the Duke of Albuquerque according to MARIANA XVI. 18. GROTIUS.

[8] Lib. I. Cap. XVI. SERVIUS upon the eighth Book of the Aeneid, (Ver. 342.) THEOPHYLUS in his Greek Paraphrase upon the Institutes, Lib. I. Tit. II. § 1. GROTIUS.

Our Author has apparently quoted CICERO in this Place upon the Authority of the Scholiast on STATIUS, who says: Hanc aram CICERO, libro Tusculanarum, Misericordiae nominat, &c. In Theb. XII. 481. For I do not find, that NIZOLIUS himself Points out any Passage of the Roman Orator, that mentions this Altar. And the Scholiast, quoting by Memory, might have given, as from the Tusculan Questions, a Passage, which he had read in some Work not now in Being.

[9]

*Urbe fuit media nulli concessa potentum
Ara Deum: Mitis posuit Clementia sedem,
Et miseri fecere sacram. — — —
Huc victi bellis, &c. — — —*

STAT. Theb. XII. 481. & seqq. 507. & seqq.

[10] Orat. Panathen. p. 187. B. Vol. I. Edit. P. Steph. Οὕτως ὁ παλαιός, &c. Orat. Leuct. I. p. 89. A. Vol. II. [And not De Pace as the Author quotes in the Margin.] MARIANA gives the Arragonians the same Praise. Hist. Hisp. XX. 12. The Gepidae declared that they would all perish, rather than give up Ildigial to the Romans or the Lombards, PROCOP. Gothic. Lib. IV. (Seu Hist. Miscell. Cap. XXVII.) GROTIUS.

[11] (Hist. Graec. Lib. VI. Cap. V. § 38. Edit. Oxon.)

[e] Ver. 558. See the whole Passage which is very well worth reading.

[f] Euripid. Heraclid. v. 330, &c.

[g] See Eurip. in his Heraclid. and Apollodorus in his Biblioth. Lib. 2 Cap. 8. § 1.

[12] The Words of CALLISTHENES are not taken, as might be conceived, from any of the Histories composed by that Philosopher, who was the Cousin and Disciple of ARISTOTLE: But I find them in ARRIAN's History of Alexander the Great. They are an answer, which he is there said to have given Philotas, and which was probably made use of to colour the Accusation, laid against him, of being concerned in a Conspiracy to kill Alexander. He said therefore to Philotas, that the Persons whose Memory was most honoured by the Athenians were Harmodius and Aristogiton, because they had killed a Tyrant, and subverted the Tyranny: Upon which Philotas asked him where it would be proper for him, who should kill a Tyrant, to take Refuge, to which CALLISTHENES replied, at Athens or no where, and gave for his Reason, what our Author reports of the Aid and Protection granted by that City to the Heraclidae. De Exped. Alexand. Lib. IV. Cap. X.

[13] The following Verses ought to be translated either from SOPHOCLES or EURIPIDES; but from the Manner in which our Author expresses himself, it does not appear at first, which of those two Poets he means:

*Hunc qui facinorum conscius, nunc legibus
Fidens, ad aras volvitur supplex Deum,
Trahere ad Tribunal, nulla religio mihi;
Mala semper aequum ferre, qui fecit malè.*

Before this he only says: De maleficis hoc habes in eadem Tragoedia. Now he had quoted SOPHOCLES first, Oedip. Colon. Ver. 512. & seqq. and afterwards EURIPIDES in his Heraclidae, Ver. 330. & seqq. but without naming either the Poet or Tragedy, and as if he still quoted the same; attributing besides to Demophon the Words of the Chorus. I find the Original in STOBÆUS, where however the Edition even of our Author only refers us to EURIPIDES without mentioning the Tragedy. He believed it to be the Heraclidae, because STOBÆUS cites it just before; and from thence it was that he omitted the Verses in Question, in his Excerpta ex Frag. & Comoed. Graec. But these Verses are certainly not in the Piece above mentioned, nor are they to be found in the Fragments of EURIPIDES, which the late Mr. BARNES collected, after our Author, whose Translation he every where gives. However that be, the following are the Verses, which our Author translates in the same Manner in his STOBÆUS as here; except that he has not suffered an Erratum of the Press in the first Latin Verse to creep in, which all the Editions of my Original, not excepting the first, have retained: Nunc legibus, for nec legibus, &c.

Ἐγὼ γὰρ ὅστις μὴ δίκαιος ὢν ἄνθρω-ποῦν προσίξει, τὸν νόμον χαίρειν ἔδωκεν τῆν δίκην ἄγοιμ' ἄν οὐ τρέσας Θεούς.
Καὶ γὰρ ἄνδρα χρεὶ κακῶς πάσχειν ἄεί.

Florileg. Tit. XLVI. De Magistrat.

I have also let the same Fault pass in my Edition of this Work, because I had not then the STOBÆUS of my Author.

[h] Orat. Adversus Leocrat. (p. 156. Edit. Wech.)

[14] MARIANA in his twenty first Book relates, That in Portugal one Ferdinand, Lord High Chamberlain, was forced from the Church to which he had retired, and burnt for a Rape committed upon a Maid of Quality. See also about Sanctuaries, a Treatise of that great

[i] Annal. Lib. 3. Cap. 60. Num. 2, 3.

[k] Ibid. Cap. 36. N. 3.

[15] He was not a Persian, but a Lydian, as HERODOTUS calls him in more than one Place. The Passage wherein I find what our Author says, is: Οὐ βουλόμενοι [ὅτι Κυμαῖοι] οὔτε ἐκδόντες ἀπολέσθαι, οὔτε παρ' ἐωύτοιοι ἔχοντε; πολιορκέεσθαι, ἐς Μυτιλήνην αὐτὸν ἐκπέμπουσι. Lib. I. Cap. CLX.

[16] LIVY, Lib. XLII. Cap. XLI. Note 8. APPIANUS too has this Relation, Excerpt. legat. Num. xx. There is something like it in the Latin Author of the Life of Themistocles: When he was publicly demanded by the Athenians and Lacedemonians. Admetus King of the Molossi would not deliver up his Refugee, but advised him to provide for his Safety; and for this Purpose ordered him to be conducted under a sufficient Guard to Pydna. So also the Gepidae in PROCOPIUS, Goth. III. dismiss Ildigis the Lombard. Add to this Theuderick's Letter to King Thrasamund about the receiving of Giselic, Ver. 43, 44. and what is in the Life of King Lewis; so the Emperor Rudolphus the Second removed from him Christopher Sborowski, as is testified by THUANUS, Lib. LXXXIII. Anno 1585. Queen Elizabeth answered the Scots, that she would either deliver them up Bothwell, or banish him England. CAMDEN has this Affair about the Year 1593. See MARIANA xix. 6. of Alphonsus Earl of Gegion, who was condemned by the French King, and denied Admission into Spain. GROTIUS.

[17] LIVY, Lib. XLV. Cap. V. Num. 8.

[18] As in the Switzers League with the People of Milan, Simlerus relates this Matter. By the Treaties of the English with the French, it was provided, that Rebels and Deserters should be delivered up; and by others of theirs with the Burgundians, that they should be expelled. CAMBDEN at the Year 1600. GROTIUS.

[19] This Condition, which our Author supposes, is to be well observed; for otherwise the Exemption from Punishment would favour Robberies and Pyracies.

[1] EURIP. Heraclid. Ver. 252, 253.

[2] Footnote number missing in text, supplied from Latin edition. In one of SOPHOCLES's Tragedies. Oed. Colon. Ver. 904. & seq.

[3] Supplic. p. 321. Edit. H. Steph.

[a] Chap. 26. of this Book.

[1] In LEVITIC. Quaest. XXVI.

[2] In the Original it is Distinctae enim sunt poenae, &c. But I believe the Author intended etiam, instead of enim, which is perhaps a Fault of the Press that he overlooked. This however includes no Reason for what precedes it.

[3] LYCURG. Orat. Advers. Leocrat. (p. 139. Edit. Wech.) GROTIUS.

[b] Ch. ix. § 4.

[4] Si ususfructus, &c. Digest, Lib. VII. Tit. IV. Quibus modis ususfructus vel usus, &c. Leg. XXI.

[c] Plut. in Alex. p. 670. Tom. 1. Edit. Wech.

[5] See before B. I. Chap. III. § 12. Num. 1. and B. II. Chap. V. § 32.

[6] St. CHRYSOSTOM says the same Thing with the Pagan Orator in his seventeenth Discourse upon the throwing down of Statues. The Emperor MARCUS ANTONINUS had formerly condemned the People of Antioch to suffer the same Punishment, as Theodosius did afterwards; according to CAPITOLINUS, (Cap. XXV.) Severus also destroyed the City of Byzantium, and deprived it of its Theatre, Baths, all its Honours and Ornaments. He even reduced it into a Village, and gave it to the Perinthians; as HERODIAN informs us, (Lib. III. Cap. VI. Num. 19. Edit. Boecler.) See also ZONARAS, and what we have said above, (Chap. V. § 32.) GROTIUS.

[a] Ch. 9. § 3.

[b] See Aristot. Pol. Lib. 7. Cap. 13.

[c] In the preceding Chapter.

[1] Footnote number missing in text, supplied from Latin edition. Orat. De Sedit. Antioch.

[2] This is the Reason that Conqueror employed, when Parmenio would have dissuaded him from burning the Royal Palace of Persepolis: Ὅ δὲ τιμωρήσασθαι, &c. After which follows the Historian's Reflection: Ἀλλ' οὐδ' ἐμοὶ δοκεῖ, &c. De Expedit. Alexand. Lib. III. Cap. XVIII. Our Author, who in the first Edition contented himself with citing ARRIAN once in this Place, added, in the following Editions, a like Thought of the same Author, which is placed after the Passage of QUINTUS CURTIUS. But his Memory has improperly multiplied one and the same Reflection upon one and the same Occasion; [for which Reason Mr. BARBEYRAC thought, he might suppress that superfluous and ill-grounded Repetition in the Text of his Edition]. What led our Author into this Error, was Alexander's saying elsewhere in a Letter to Darius, "Your Ancestors entered Macedonia, and the rest of Greece, and did great Damages, without our having given them any Cause for such Injuries. But I, on the contrary, tho', having been elected General of the Greeks, it was my Inclination and Duty, to revenge the Wrongs they have received from the Persians, have not entered Asia, till you had first commenced Hostilities." Οἱ ὑμέτεροι πρὸ γονοὶ, &c. Lib. II. Cap. XIV. The Historian says nothing here that tends to condemn the Motive of his Hero. The following Note will shew, that our Author had this Passage in View, which relates to the undertaking of the War in general against the Persians; whereas the other relates only to a particular Act of Hostility.

[3] And therefore the Emperor Julian ascribes to a different Motive the War undertaken by Alexander against the Persians: "All the World knows, says he, that no War, reputed just, was ever undertaken upon such an Occasion; not that of the Greeks against Troy, or of the Macedonians against Persia. For they did not enter into it to inflict Punishments for Injuries of a very antient Date, not even upon the Grandchildren or Children of the Authors of them, but attacked those, who had insulted and dispossessed the Issue of the most deserving Persons of their Crowns": Καὶ ὅτι μὲν οὐδεὶς—τῶν εὐδοκησάντων (for so it should be read instead of ἄδικησάντων) ἀπογόνους. Orat. II. De rebus gestis Constantii (p. 95. Edit. Spanheim.) GROTIUS.

I have translated the Passage, according to the Version given us by our Author: But if he had considered the Context, he would have perceived, that in giving a false Sense to the Words in Question, he makes the Emperor say directly the reverse of what he did, and should, say. The Subject relates to the War against Magnentius, who had possessed himself of the Empire. JULIAN would prove the Justice of that War, and for this Purpose compares it with those, which passed for the most just, as that of the Greeks against Troy, and of the Macedonians against the Persians; of which the first was undertaken to revenge the carrying away of a Woman, as he says afterwards, and the other, as he plainly insinuates here, had for its Motive the desire of revenging the Injuries Greece had formerly suffered from the Persians. Whereas Constantius took up Arms solely to bring to Reason an Usurper, who had deprived him of the Empire he had a Right to inherit, as the Son of Constantine the Great; to which the Word ἐυδοκησάντων relates, and which our Author judiciously substitutes instead of ἔδικησάντων. Therefore what he ascribes to the Greeks and Macedonians must relate to Constantius; and the whole Passage be thus translated: Everyone knows, that no War was ever undertaken upon so just a Foundation, not even that of the Greeks against Troy, nor of the Macedonians against the Persians; which pass however for just Wars. For our Emperor had not in View the revenging of some antient Injury, nor has he invaded the Sons or Descendants of those, from whom he had received it; but has attacked a Man who ravished the Empire from the Posterity, and lawful Successors of Persons renowned for their Merit. It is plain from his using the Plural, that he alludes to the Usurpation of the Empire in Prejudice of Constantius, and the Assassination of Constans his Brother, which were both the Acts of Magnentius. I conclude, therefore, that this Passage, far from proving that Julian assigns another Motive for Alexander's War against the Persians, than that of revenging the antient Injuries they had done the Greeks; serves, on the contrary, to confirm the Reality of that Motive. But I must not forget to observe on the other Hand, to our Author's Praise, that he has very happily corrected a manifest Corruption at the End of the Passage, in the Word ἔδικησάντων. The Latin Translator, the learned Father PETAU, has extricated himself from that Difficulty, by not expressing the four last Words at all, of which that Word is one; and the illustrious Baron SPANHEIM has given no Intimation in the Margin of any Fault.

[4] Lib. VII. Cap. V. Num. 35. See PLUTARCH, De sera numinis vindicta, p. 557. B. Vol. II. Edit. Wech.

[5] See PLUTARCH, Apophthegm. p. 176. D. E. and De sera numinis vindicta, p. 557. B.

[6] De Herodot. malignit. p. 859, 860. Vol. II. Edit. Wech.

[c] sic:<sup>d</sup> § 14.

[7] This is a false Consequence drawn by PLUTARCH. De sera numinis vindicta, p. 558. B.C.

[1] Item videamus, quando damnum, &c. Digest. Lib. XXXIX. Tit. II. Dedamno infecto, &c. Leg. XXIV. § 12.

[2] Multumque interesse, &c. Ibid. Leg. XXVI.

[3] Esse autem praeposterum, &c. Lib. XXXV. Tit. II. Ad Leg. Falcid. Leg. LXIII. Princ.

[4] Eum, qui civitatem amitteret, &c. Digest. Lib. XLVIII. Tit. XXII. De Interdictis & Relegatis, &c. Leg. III.

[5] In qua [sententia] &c. Epist. Ad Brutum XV. See also Epist. XII.

[6] See the Interpreters upon the Digest, Lib. XLVIII. Tit. XX. De bonis Damnatorum. Leg. VII.

[1] This is a very antient Saying, since it is ascribed to Thales, one of the Seven wise Men, as appears from STOBAEUS, Florileg. Tit. III. See ERASM. Adag.

[2] It is evident, that the Hebrews were also of the same Opinion, from Reuben's Proposals to his Father Jacob, Gen. xlii. 37. See also JOSEPHUS, Antiq. Jud. Lib. II. Cap. II. These Sureties are called Ἀυτίψυχοι (such as engaged their Life for that of another) by EUTROPIUS, in Caligula: And Ἐγγυηταὶ θανάτου, Sureties of Death, by DIODORUS

SICULUS, in Excerpt. Peiresk. [p. 245, where speaking of Damon, who was bound for Phintias, he says, Ἐγγυος εὐθὺς ἐγενήθη θανάτου] St. CHRYSOSTOM supposes this Custom, in the Comparison he makes of an innocent Man, who when another is condemned to die, is willing to suffer the Punishment, in order to save his Life. In GALAT. Cap. II. St. AUSTIN observes, it sometimes happens, that he, who occasions another's Death, is more criminal, than he who kills him; as for Example, when a Surety is punished with Death, in consequence of having been deceived by the Person, for whom he was bound. Et aliquando qui causa mortis fuit, &c. Epist. LIV. Ad Macedonium. GROTIUS.

One will be undoubtedly surprized to see EUTROPIUS, a Latin Author, in whose Writings there is not one Greek Word, quoted here upon the Use of the Word, Ἀυτίψυχοι. Our Author however had not in View the Greek Translation which we have of that Writer by PAEANUS; but he confounds a Greek, with a Latin, Author; an Abridger of the Roman History, with one of the great Historians, whose Works remain in Part: For DION CASSIUS mentions one Publius Afranius Potitus, who out of a foolish Adulation had sworn to die, if Caligula recovered his Health; and a Knight, as great a Fool, called Atanius Secundus, who had promised in that Case to fight amongst the Gladiators at the publick Shews. Both these Men expected great Rewards from the Emperor, for the Zeal that induced them to sacrifice their Lives for his: But instead of Gifts he compelled them to kill themselves, that they might not break their Oaths. Lib. LIX. p. 741. B. Edit. H. Steph. See further concerning the Expression, and Matter in Question, the Additions of Mr. LE CLERC to HAMMOND's Notes upon MATTHEW xx. 23.

[3] Quis subit in poenam capitali judicio? VAS. Technopaegnion Monosyllab. p. 488. Edit. Tollii.

[4] Or rather Phintias, which is the true Name. See CICERO, De Offic. Lib. III. Cap. X. and the Commentators upon him. I had Occasion to refer in Note 2. of this Paragraph to a Passage of DIODORUS SICULUS, wherein that Pythagorean Philosopher is so called.

[a] Lib. 3. c. 4. § 14.

[5] See PUFENDORF, B. V. Chap. IV. § 6. Law of Nature and Nations.

[b] Lev. xviii. 23. and xx. 15, 16. See Maimon. Duct. Dubitant. iii. 40.

[1] Si poena alicui irrogatur, &c. Digest, Lib. XLVIII. Tit. XIX. De Poenis, Leg. XX. But ZIEGLER observes here, that the Civilian speaks of the Punishment of the Criminal himself, and not that of other Men. Our Author himself has cited him in that Sense, in the preceding Chapter, at the beginning of § 7. But indeed it is difficult enough to explain the Meaning of Jus commentitium, to which PAULUS refers the Establishment of the Maxim in Question. The Reader may consult on that Head the Jurisprudentia Papiniana of ANTHONY FAURE, Tit. I. Princip. II. Illat. V. MARC. LYCKLAMA, Membran. Lib. I. Eclog. IX. and the new Explanation of Mr. WAECHTLER, in the Acta Eruditorum of Leipsick, Ann. 1714. p. 555.

[a] In the following Paragraph. N. 1.

[1] Nec virtutes, nec vitia parentum liberis imputantur, Epist. III. Ad Heliodor. De morte Nepotiani, Vol. I. p. 21. A. Edit. Froben 1537.

[2] DEUS ipse foret injustus, si quemquam damnaret innoxium. Epist. CV. So our Author relates and quotes the Passage. I do not find it in the Letter he refers to: But there is the same Thought, expressed in other Terms, in that which follows: Quamquam vero immeritum & nulli obnoxium peccato si Deus damnare creditur, alienus ab iniquitate non

[3] This Maxim is taken from what is said in the Digest, in Relation to Slaves: Servi quorum noxa caput sequitur, ibi defendendi sunt, ubi deliquisse arguentur, Lib. IX. Tit. IV. De noxalib. Action. Leg. XLIII. But the Roman Lawyers mean only by that, as appears from Paragraph V. of the same Title of the Institutes, and other Places, that the Action against the Master, for Damage done by a Slave, ought to be brought against him, who is in actual Possession of the Slave at the Commencement of the Suit; or against the Slave himself, if he was afterwards made free; and not against him who owned the Slave at the Time the Offence was committed. So that this is not directly to the Purpose. See what is already said above, Chap. V. B. II. § 32. Note. 7.

[4] Sancimus ibi esse poenam, ubi & noxia est. Propinquos, notos, familiares, procul a calumnia submovemus—Nec ulterius progrediatur metus, quam reperiatur delictum. Cod. Lib. IX. Tit. XLVII. De Poenis, Leg. XXII.

[5] He maintains, on that Occasion, that Justice requires only the Punishment of the Guilty, as is expressly ordained by the Law of MOSES, (Deuteron. xxiv. 16. De special Legib. Lib. II. p. 802. E. 803. A. B.) The same Author observes elsewhere, that there is no Establishment more pernicious to a State than not to punish a wicked Person, because descended of honest Parents, and not to reward a Man of Worth, because the Son of a bad Father. The Laws, adds he, ought to reward or punish every one according to their personal Merit. (De Nobilitate, in fin. p. 910. A.) JOSEPHUS says, in regard to Alexander, King of the Jews, who followed a quite contrary Maxim, and caused the Throats of the Wives and Children of those he put to Death to be cut, as criminal against him; that such Punishment exceeded all Bounds of Humanity (Antiq. Jud. Lib. XIII. Cap. XXII.) OVID insinuates, that Jupiter Ammon was unjust in ordering Andromeda to be fastened to a Rock, and punished in that manner for the Fault of Cassiope, her Mother, in boasting that she was more beautiful than the Nereids:

*Illic immeritam maternae pendere linguae
Andromedan poenas injustus jusserat Ammon.*

Metam. IV. 668, 669. GROTIUS.

I cannot help taking Notice in this Place to the Reader of a false Citation, which I have corrected. Our Author gives us the second Passage of PHILO, as from his Treatise upon Piety, (Libro de pietate.) Now it is well known there is no Work of that Jew which bears such a Title. The Mistake arose from the Resemblance between two Greek Words. Instead of Περὶ εὐγενείας, our Author read, without thinking of it, Περὶ εὐσεβείας.

[6] I have observed in my Notes upon PUFENDORF, that this is not exactly related. The Historian, far from refuting the Reason in Question, does not so much as decide, whether the Custom of punishing Children for the Crimes of their Fathers be unjust or not, and leaves it to be determined by the Reader, whether his Ideas of Equity were not sufficiently just, or that he did not care to offend those of his Country. Antiq. Rom. Lib. VIII. Cap. LXXX. p. 525. Edit. Oxon. (p. 547. Sylburg.)

[7] Cod. Lib. IX. Tit. VIII. Ad Leg. Jul. Majestatis, Leg. V. § 1. See the whole Dissertation of JAMES GODEFROY, upon this Law in his Opuscula, printed 1654.

[a] Lib. 28. c. 2. in fin. Edit. Vales. Gron.

[b] See Victoria. De Jure belli. Num. 38.

- [8] ARISTOT. Rhetoric. Lib. I. Cap. XV. See Adag. ERASM. at the Proverb, Stultus, qui, patre caeso, liberis pepercit.
- [9] De Ira, Lib. II. Cap. XXXIV.
- [c] <sup>c</sup> Herodot. 1. 9. c. 87. XIV. The Objection from God's Proceedings in Relation to the Children of Offenders answered.
- [10] See also VULCATUS in his Life of Avidius. Julian commends the like Humanity in Constantius, and shews ill Parents have often good Children, as Rocks produce Bees, a bitter Wood Figs, and Thorns the Pomegranate. He says also, ὀλλῶ καὶ τὸν παῖδα, &c. But you took Care not to let the Infant of the Deceased be involved in his Father's Punishment: This Proceeding of yours so full of Lenity and good Nature, is an evident Sign of perfect Virtue. (Orat. I. in fin.) GROTIUS.
- [a] This is the Opinion of the Rabbi Simeon Barsema, and a very just one.
- [b] As in the Examples of Zimri and Jehu.
- [1] Homil. XXIX. In Cap. IX. Genes. PLUTARCH had said the same before him: Αἱ δὲ διὰ τῶν παίδων, &c. (De sera numinis vindicta, p. 561. A. Vol. II.) GROTIUS.
- [2] Duritia Populi ad talia remedia compulerat, &c. (Advers. Marc. Lib. II. Cap. XV.) In QUINTUS CURTIUS Alexander the Great says to some Conspirators, who being condemned to die, desired him to spare their Relations; they did not deserve to know their Fate, that they might die with the more Regret; but by an Effect of his Goodness, he assures them, that their Relations should suffer nothing either in their Honours or Fortunes; because he had long abolished the Custom, which had prevailed amongst the Macedonians, of putting the Innocent to Death with the Guilty.
- [3] See PLUTARCH in his Pericles, and what was said above in this Book, Chap. XIII. §1. GROTIUS.
- [4] Var. Hist. Lib. III. Cap. XLIII. LIBANIUS says the same Thing speaking also of Sacrilege. There is something of the like Kind in a Discourse of that Orator published by GODEFROY. GROTIUS.
- [c] Geogr. 1. 4. p. 286. 287. Edit. Amst.
- [d] Noct. Attic. 1. 3. c. 9.
- [5] TERTULLIAN, De Monogamia. The sour Grape that the Father eats, no longer sets the Childrens Teeth on Edge, for every one must die in his own Iniquity. Cap. VII. GROTIUS.
- [e] Deut. xxiv. 16. See Joseph. 1. 4. c. 8. p. 129. and Philo de Legib. sp. l. 2. p. 801. & seq.
- [6] That Orator, in his Praise of Busiris, which our Author cites in the Margin, makes no mention of a Law established in Egypt, that prohibited the putting of innocent Children to Death for the Crimes of their Fathers. But, in praising the Religion of the Egyptians, he says, that they pay more Regard to an Oath, than any other People; and believe, that the Divine Vengeance will punish every Crime immediately, without deferring the Punishment of the Guilty, or transferring it to their Offspring p. 391. I confess however, it is very probable, that the Egyptians, in whose Laws there was so much Equity, (as may be seen in BOECLER's Collection of them, Vol. II. Dissert. XXIII.) did not imitate the Barbarity of some other Nations, which as early as Moses's Time, very probably put innocent Persons to Death upon account of their Relation to the Guilty; as the Prohibition itself of Moses's Law seems to insinuate. At least I do not see how such a Custom can be reconciled with the Law of the Egyptians, which our Author recites a little lower, concerning the Delay of punishing Women with Child. There would be more Cruelty without doubt in putting Creatures come into the World to Death, especially after having been long in it, than to let the Infant in the Womb perish with its Mother. And I cannot comprehend how such wise Legislators would have been guilty of so gross a Contradiction.

[f] See also Lex Wisigoth. l. 6. t. 1. c. 8.

[7] He does not commend it, as I have said already in Note 7. upon Paragraph XIII. He only says that those who were for introducing a contrary Practice, in regard to the Children of the Persons proscribed by Sylla, were looked upon by the Romans as doing a Thing highly odious, not only in the sight of Men, but of the Divinity, who so manifestly punished them for it, in reducing them to a mean Condition, and not suffering any of their Descendants to remain, except on the Side of the Women. Antiq. Rom. Lib. VIII. Cap. LXXX. p. 524. Edit. Oxon.

[8] Ἐνὶ δὲ λόγῳ, πατρὸς ὄνειδη καὶ τιμωρίας παιδῶν μηδενὶ ξυνέπεσθαι. De Legib. Lib. IX. p. 856. D. Vol. II. Edit. Steph. The Philosopher adds however an Exception to this Law of his imaginary Commonwealth; which is, that if the Father, Grandfather, and Great-Grandfather have been all condemned to die successively, the Children ought to be banished from the State; keeping however their Estates, except those inherited from their Fathers: Πλὴν ἐάν τι πατὴρ, &c. Ibid.

[9] Crimen vel poena paterna nullam maculam filio infligere potest. Namque unusquisque ex suo admisso sorti subjicitur, nec alieni criminis successor constituitur. Digest, Lib. XLVIII. Tit. XIX. De Poenis. Leg. XXVI.

[10] Ferretne ulla civitas, &c. De Natura Deorum. Lib. III. Cap. XXXVIII.

[11] See DIODORUS SICULUS, Lib. I. Cap. LXXVII.

[12] The same Historian says, in the same Place, that many of the Grecian States adopted this Law: And PLUTARCH attributes it to some of them. De sera Numin. vindicta, p. 552. D. Vol. II. Edit. Wech. It appears to have been in Force amongst the Athenians, according to what AELIAN relates, Var. Hist. Lib. V. Cap. XVIII.

[13] Imperator HADRIANUS Publicio Marcello rescripsit, liberam, quae praegnans ultimo supplicio damnata est, liberum parere: & solitum esse servari eam, dum partum ederet. Digest, Lib. I. Tit. V. De Statu hominum, Leg. XVIII. See also Lib. XLVIII. Tit. XIX. De Poenis. Leg. III.

[14] PHILO the Jew praises this Law. De Humanit. (p. 710. E.) GROTIUS.

[1] PHILO says, it was usual with Tyrants to put to Death, with the Persons condemned, five Families of their next Relations. See HERODIAN, Lib. III. and an Instance at Milan upon the Death of Galeatius. In PET. BIZARO, Hist. Genu. Lib. XIV. GROTIUS.

The Passage of PHILO, which our Author has in View, is in his second Book De Legib. special. Decalog. but he has very much changed the Sense of it; for the Greek Text says plainly, that some Legislators have ordained, that a Traitor should be put to Death with his Children; and a Tyrant with five Families of his nearest Relations, p. 802. D. Edit. Paris. There is also great Room to believe, that our Author, his Copist, or Printers have put HERODIAN in this Place for HERODOTUS. At least I can find nothing in B. III. of the first of those Historians that can relate to the Subject here; whereas I find in B. III. of the other Intaphernes, condemned to die by Darius, according to the Custom of the Persians, with his Children and all his Family, Cap. CXIX.

[2] See the Passage cited above Note 2. upon Paragraph XIV.

[3] He calls it an abominable Law: Leges apud eos (Persas) &c. Lib XXIII. (Cap. VI. p. 416. Edit. Vales. Gron.) See also the fourth Council of Toledo. GROTIUS.

[1] Καὶ τοῖς περὶ τῶν προδοτῶν, &c. [Vit. decem Rhetorum, Vol. II. p. 833. A.] GROTIUS.

All the Editions of our Author are faulty in this Place, as to what he says after PLUTARCH without quoting the Place whence he took it; for Antiphanes is put instead of Antiphon. For the rest, the Word ἄτιμος seems here to imply something more than a bare Exclusion from Honours, because it is said of the Criminals themselves, who were put to Death, as well as of their Posterity. It was therefore a Mark of Infamy, which fell both on the Guilty and Innocent, and which consequently rendered them incapable of pretending to Honours.

[2] See VELLEIUS PATERCULUS, Lib. II. Cap. XXVIII. PLUTARCH in Sylla, p. 472. C. Vol. I. But Julius Caesar abolished this: Admisit ad honores & proscriptorum liberos. SUETON. Cap. XLI.

[a] § 13. n. 2.

[b] Ch. 5. § 29. of this Book.

[a] §2.

[1] PHILO, De Abraham. (p. 363. D.) speaking of the Aegyptian King's Subjects in Abraham's Days, παρ᾽απὴλ᾽αυσε, &c. His whole Family as well as he, had their Share in the Punishment, because not one of them blamed his Injustice, but were all, as it were, Accomplices with him, by applauding what he did. And JOSEPHUS, where he relates the Prophecy denounced against Jeroboam, μετέξει δὲ, &c. The People too are to bear their Part in the Punishment, and are therefore to lose that good Land, and to be dispersed beyond Euphrates, because they followed the Impieties of their Prince. (Antiq. Lib. VIII. Cap. IV. p. 280 E.) GROTIUS.

[2] De eo CONTACTU qui ex natura oritur ejus corporis, &c. It must be read so according to the first Edition, and that of 1632. as I have observed in my Latin Edition, in which the Printers however have not followed my Correction in the Text, and have left contractu. The Fault was even in the Edition of 1642. which is the last before the Author's Death, and arose perhaps from the Ignorance of some Corrector, who did not understand that Word contactus, used for contagio, as we find it also in some Authors, for Instance in SENECA and TACITUS. The learned GRONOVIVS had thus read the Passage, as appears by his Note, tho' he takes no Notice of it. But ZIEGLER, without suspecting that the Text was faulty, as he must have perceived, if he had attentively considered the Connection of the Discourse, accuses our Author of giving an Explication more obscure than the Question itself; and after having racked his Wits to discover a rational Sense of the Passage, he at last confesses, there is none. From whence it appears, how necessary it was to consult the antient Editions carefully, before he undertook it, I do not say, to criticize, but to read a Work like this, in order to understand it.

[3] Quaest. ad Orthodox CXXXVIII. GROTIUS.

[4] In a Treatise, which has been already cited several Times, wherein he endeavours to justify the Punishments inflicted upon the Posterity of Criminals. De sera numinis vindicta, p. 559. E. Vol. II.

[1] MAIMONIDES, Tit. כרלה Cap. VII. § 6. GEMARA, Baba Cama, Cap. IX. §2. GROTIUS.

- [2] This Law has been cited above, § 12. Note 1.
- [3] See the Council of Toledo VIII. in Receswinthus's Case; and what is above in this Book, Chap. XIV. § 10. There is no Person so proper to represent the Deceased as his Heir, says CICERO, De legibus, Lib. II. (Cap. XIX.) GROTIUS.
- [4] That is from one Man's having more and another less than he ought to have. See above Chap. XII. § 8.
- [1] We find this for Instance, in the Law of Suabia in Germany; according to which a penal Action cannot lie against an Heir, till after Sentence, in the cases of Theft, Gaming or Usury; and for other Offences, the Fact must at least be proved juridically before the Death of the Delinquent. See a Dissertation of Mr. THOMASIIUS, De usu Actionum Poenaliu Juris Romani in foris Germaniae, Cap. II. § 16. where he cites the express Words of SPECULUM SUEVIUM, Art. CCLVII.
- [2] Post litem contestatum. This is the Decision of the Roman Law; and the Custom in Countries which follow it: Omnes poenales actiones post Litem inchoatam, & ad Haeredes transeunt. Digest. Lib. XLIV. Tit. VII. De Obligat. & Actionib. Leg. XXVI. See also Law XVIII. and Lib. I. Tit. XVII. De diversis Reg. Juris. Leg. CXXXIX. CLXIV.
- [3] This is a general Rule in the Roman Law, as well in this as in other Cases. As soon as Sentence is given, the Person, in whose Favour it passed, or his Heir, has his Action against the Heir of the other Party: Judicati actio perpetua est, & rei persecutionem continet. Item haeredi & in haerodem competit. Digest. Lib. XLII. Tit. I. De re judicata, & de effectu sententiarum, &c. Leg. VI. § 3.
- [4] From the Moment a Suit is commenced, the two Parties are presumed to engage thereby to pay whatsoever shall become due in Virtue of the Sentence: Nam sicut stipulatione contrahitur cum filio, ita iudicio contrahi: Proinde non originem iudicii spectandam, sed ipsam iudicati velut obligationem. Digest. Lib. XV. Tit. I. De Peculio, Leg. III. § 11. So that there being an Obligation of the Deceased founded on this Presumption, which the Laws authorize; it is transferred to his Heirs, in the same Manner, as that of express Contracts and Engagements, which is, as it were, attached to the Defunct's Estate.
- [5] Ut & ea quae in conventionem deducta est. But this is only a Penalty improperly so called; in Strictness, it ought to be termed a Sort of Reparation agreed upon: The following is an Example of this Kind taken from the Roman Law. A Man had sold some Materials, and taken the Money for them, under a certain Penalty if the whole Quantity were not delivered in a Time fixed. This Person happened to die, before he had fully performed the Contract, and his Heir did not take care to make it good, by delivering the remaining Part of the Materials. The Buyer therefore had his Action against the Heir, for the Penalty or Reparation, to which the Deceased had made himself liable by the Contract of Sale: Lucius Titius, accepta pecunia, &c. Digest. Lib. XIX. Tit. I. De actionibus emti & venditi, Leg. XLVII.
- [a] Chap. 1. § 1. of this Book.
- [1] This Distinction is made also by PLUTARCH, in his Galba; and DION, in the Affairs of Caesar and Pompey; and by POLYBIUS, where he treats of the Roman War against the Illyrians, Excerpt. Legat. CXXXVI. We may call the justifying Reasons the Pretext, and the Motives the Cause of the War, as Suetonius does, where he speaks of Julius Caesar, This was his Pretext indeed for a Civil War; but all the World are of Opinion, that the Causes were something else. THUCYDIDES in some Places distinguishes between ΠΡόφασις the Pretence, and Τὸ ἄληθές, the Truth, as in the Athenians Descent upon Sicily, where the Pretence was to assist the People of Egesta, but the Truth and Reality was their Desire of seizing upon Sicily for themselves. HERMOCRATES, in an Harangue of his, speaking of the Athenians, calls that the Colour, this the Intent. You have both these Passages in THUCYDIDES's sixth Book. And APPIAN, in his Mithridatic uses the Word ΠΡΟΦΑΣΕΩΝ: and in his Civilian, Lib. VI. where he treats of the Peace between Octavius and Sextus Pompeius being broken, he says, that the concealed Reasons were quite different from those that were declared. AGATHIAS, in his fifth Book, what others term ΠΡΟΦΑΣΙΝ calls Σκῆψην καὶ προκάλυμμα, Fiction and Disguise, to which he opposes αἰτίαν, In Hist. Hunn. Zamergan. Add to this what we said above, in Chap. I. § 1. of this Book. PROCOPIUS, Persic. II. says, that It is but Folly to be reserved when the Action is directed by Justice, and attended with Advantage. GROTIUS.

One may perceive at first Sight, that the last Passage from PROCOPIUS is not to the Purpose, for the Question here is not concerning Freedom of Speech. I cannot comprehend how our Author found any Thing in it that could relate to the Subject of this Note, nor how he came to change the Sense of the Historian; for the Passage he had, probably, in View, at least there is nothing elsewhere that has any Resemblance to the present Subject, in the two Books of the War against the Persians, is, at the Close of the Speech made by the Embassadors of the Lazians, to Chosroez King of Persia, to intreat him to receive their Nation into his Alliance and Protection against the Romans. After having set forth all the Reasons that were capable of shewing the Justice of their Demand, they represent the Advantages that Chosroez himself would have in complying with it; and conclude, that it is no more than prudent to accept offers, Which Justice precedes, and Advantage accompanies. Lib. II. Cap. XV.

[b] For Instance, l. 37. c. 54. n. 13.

[2] See what is said in the preceding Chapter, § 8. Note 2.

[3] In the famous Retreat of the ten thousand Greeks, of which that Philosopher and great Captain has writ the History.

[4] See his Life in CORNELIUS NEPOS, Cap. III. and in POLYBIUS, Lib. III. Cap. VI.

[c] Lib. 3. c. 6, 7, 8, 9.

[5] Lib. I. (Cap. XXIII. See also Cap. LVI. and LXVIII.) In his fifth Book, where he treats of the War between the Argives and the Epidaurians, he calls αἰτία, what he had a little before called ΠΡΟΦΑΣΙΣ. In the same Manner (as we have observed in the first Chapter of this Book) the Greek Word Ἄρχαί, and the Latin Word Principia, and such others as are made Use of to express the Origin of a War, are equivocal. The Writers of the Constantinopolitan History often use the Word Πατροκλος, to signify what others call Pretext, ΠΡΟΦΑΣΙΣ, and that in Allusion to the History of Achilles, who took Occasion from the Death of Patroclus to resume his Arms, which he had before renounced. GROTIUS.

[6] Quanquam pugnativus, &c. LIVY, Lib. VII. Cap. XXX. Numb. 12.

[7] Our Author by not attending to the Construction of the Terms, attributes to King Antiochus, what the Latin Historian says of the Boeotians: In Boeotiam ipse [Antiochus] ——— habentem ——— revera per multa jam secula publicè privatimque labante egregiâ quondam disciplina gentis, & multorum eo statu, qui diuturnus esse sine mutatione rerum non posset. Lib. XXXVI. Cap. VI. Num. 1, 2. BOECLER has exactly copied this Error, in a Dissertation, intitled De Clarigatione & Manifestis, Vol. II. p. 1212. where he expresses himself in the same Manner as our Author, tho' he does not mention him.

[8] As the Place where the Philosopher makes that Reflection is not named here, GRONOVIVS seems to doubt whether it be really his. But I shall give the Passage; from which it will appear also, that that learned Man was mistaken, in imagining our Author spoke of Octavius, or Augustus Caesar, whereas the Passage relates to Julius Caesar. Διὸ καὶ Κικέρων ἐν τοῖς φιλιππικοῖς, &c. In Vit. Marc. Anton. p. 918. C. D. Vol. I. Edit. Wech. The Passage in the Philippicks, of which PLUTARCH speaks, and wherein it is said, that Antony was the Cause of the Civil, as Hellen had been of the Trojan, War, is in the II. Philippick. Cap. XXII. Our Author cites here, in a Note, some Verses of LUCAN, wherein that Poet says on the same Subject, that the ill Treatment of the Tribunes of the People, Q. Cassius and Mark Antony, finally determined Caesar, who was before irresolute, Fortune supplying him thereby with Pretexts to justify the War wherein he engaged himself.

*Ecce faces belli, dubiaeque in proelia menti
Urgentes addunt stimulos, cunctasque pudoris
Rumpunt fata moras: justos Fortuna laborat
Esse ducis motus, & causas invenit armis.*

Pharsal. Lib. I. ver. 262, &c seq.

[1] Periculorum propter ipsa avidi. Our Author reports the Sense rather than the Words, in this Place; for he had probably in View the Passage concerning Cornelius Fuscus. Non tam praemiis periculorum, quam ipsis periculis, laetus. Hist. Lib. II. Cap. LXXXVI. Num. 7. But TACITUS says elsewhere, only periculorum avidi, Lib. III. Cap. XLI. Num. 4. and Lib. V. Cap. XIX. Num. 5. I find in SENECA an Expression implying the very same Thing, Pereclitatur periculi causâ. Quaest. Nat. Lib. V. Cap. XVIII. p. 778. Edit. Var. Elzevir.

[2] AMMIANUS MARCELLINUS says of the Alani, that they love Dangers and War, as much as pacifick Persons do Repose and Tranquillity, Utque hominibus quietis & placidis otium est voluptabile, ita illos pericula juvant & bella. Lib. XXXI. (Cap. II. p. 672. Edit. Vales. Gron.) GROTIUS.

[3] ἠθικὸς (Ethic. Nicomed. Lib. VII. Cap. I.) GROTIUS.

[4] Possumus dicere, non esse hanc crudelitatem, sed feritatem cui, voluptati saevitia est, &c. De Clementia, Lib. II. Cap. IV. He says elsewhere, speaking of Apollodorus and Phalaris, two most inhuman Tyrants, who delighted in shedding human Blood, without any Reason for it, that they could not be said to have acted purely and simply from Passion, but that what they did was the Effect of a brutal Ferocity: Hi qui vulgo saeviunt, & sanguine humano gaudent, &c. De Ira, Lib. II. Cap. V. GROTIUS.

[a] Eth. Nic. 1. 10. c. 7. p. 138. tom. 2. Edit. Paris.

[b] Orat. 37.

[1] Sed enim & bonarum possessor, &c. Digest. Lib. V. Tit. III. De haereditatis petitione, Leg. XI. in fin. & XII. XIII. init. Such was the War of the Heruli against the Lombards, undertaken without Pretext. Πόλεμος ἄπροφάσις, (as PROCOPIUS stiles it, De bello Gothic. Lib. II. Cap. XIV.) GROTIUS.

[a] Rhet. 1. 1. c. 3.

[2] Romanis quaerentibus, & quid in Etruria rei Gallis esset? Quum illi se in armis jus ferre, & omnia fortium virorum esse, ferociter dicerent, &c. LIVY, Lib. V. Cap. XXXVI. Num. 5.

[3]

*Ductoremque feram, cui nunc pro foedere, proque
Justitiâ est, Ensis — — —*

De bello Punic. II. Lib. XI. ver. 183, 184.

[4] Our Author had, probably, in View what the Emperor Valentinian says in a Letter to Theodorick, as JORNANDES relates, Qui [Attila] causas praelii non requirit, sed quidquid commiserit, hoc putat esse legitimum. De Goth. orig. & reb. gestis, Cap. XXXVI. Edit. Vulcan.

[5] It is a Passage in one of SENECA's Tragedies,

*— — — Quaeritur belli exitus,
Non causa — — —*

Hercul. Fur. v. 407, 408.

[6] This is the Sense our Author gives to a Verse of LUCAN which he uses here, without saying whose it is. But Caesar, whom the Poet introduces speaking in this Manner to his Soldiers, means, that the Gods would shew whose Cause was good, by making the Victory turn to that Side; so that the Application is not very just. The Original is

*Haec, fato quae teste probet, quis justius arma
Sumserit, haec acies victum factura nocentum est.*

Pharsal. Lib. VII. ver. 259, 260.

In the same Manner a Roman Herald, declaring War against the Samnites, said, that the Gods who preside in War, would judge which of the two Nations had broken the Treaties. DIONYSIUS HALICARNASSENSIS, Excerpt. Legat. p. 705. Edit. Oxon.

[7] These are TACITUS's Words, and are cited before, in the Preliminary Discourse, § 3. Note 2.

[8] Inferre bella finitimis, &c. De civitat. Dei. Lib. IV. Cap. VI. in fin.

[b] Lib. 2. c. 3.

[9] Sed ea animi elatio, &c. De Offic. Lib. I. (Cap. XIX.) AGATHIAS treats those as insolent and abandoned, who, from the Love of Gain, or unreasonable Enmity, Possess themselves of other People's Land, without any just Subject of Complaint against them, Lib. II. (Cap. I.) MENANDER, Protector, gives us a remarkable Instance of this, in the Person of Bagan, Chagan (or Prince) of the Avari, who broke the Treaties he had made with the Romans, without so much as seeking any false Pretext to colour the Rupture. (Cap. XXI. Of the Embassies of Justinian, Justin, and Tiberius.) GROTIUS.

[10] (Paraph. Ethic. Nicom. Lib. IV. Cap. II. p. 202.) PHILO the Jew, speaking also of Tyrants and ambitious Persons, excellently observes, that when they have the Power in their own Hands, and can assure themselves of Impunity, they plunder whole Cities, and commit the greatest Robberies, under the specious Name of Government. In Decalog. (p. 763. C. D.) This agrees perfectly well with the Passages of SENECA, QUINTUS CURTIUS, JUSTIN, and S. AUSTIN, cited above, Chap. I. § 1. of this Book. GROTIUS.

- [1] The Historian says this of Hannibal, who sought Pretexts to quarrel with the Neighbours of Saguntum, Quibus, quum adesset idem, qui litis erat sator, nec certamen juris, sed vim quaeri, adpareret, &c. Lib. XXI. Cap. VI. Num. 2.
- [2] In Vit. Pyrrhi, p. 389. E. Vol. I. Edit. Wech.
- [3] See PUFENDORF, Law of Nature and Nations, B. VIII. Chap. VI. § 4, 5.
- [a] Ch. 1. § 17. of this Book.
- [b] Zonar. tom. 2. ubi de bell. Maced. 1.
- [1] PAUSANIAS, cited in the Margin by our Author, says, that Lysimachus was for preventing Demetrius, whom he knew to be as ambitious as his Father, Lib. I. Cap. X. p. 9. Edit. Graec. Wech. But we find immediately after, that Lysimachus took his Pretext from the Perfidy of Demetrius to Alexander, the Son of Cassander, whom he assassinated, that he might reign in his Stead in Macedonia. The Romans also alledged other Reasons in Justification of their War against Philip; which, however, were not much better. See the Specimen Jurisprud. Hist. of Mr. BUDDEUS, § 101. The Conjecture of GRONOVIVS in this Place, in accusing our Author of having taken one Thing for another, has no Foundation. For our Author does not mean, that those Wars were undertaken to hinder a Neighbour from building a Fortress upon the Frontiers; that was said only by Way of Instance of what gives Umbrage; and it suffices, that those Wars had, either for their End or Pretext, the Prevention of an Evil apprehended from another. Now this is what ZONARAS, cited in the Margin, expressly says of the War of the Romans against Philip. So that our Author had not in View what LIVY says Lib. XXXII. Cap. XXXVII. Num. 3. as GRONOVIVS supposes.
- [2] Populus [Chauci] inter Germanos nobilissimus, &c. German. Cap. XXXV. Num. 4, 5, 6.
- [1] The commodious Situation of a Place, and its being proper to cover a Prince's Frontiers, are not lawful Causes for seizing it by Force of Arms. This is an instance alledged by the late Mr. VITRIARIUS, Instit. Jur. Nat. & Gent. Lib. II. Cap. XXII. § 3.
- [1] See above, Chap. II. of this Book, § 21.
- [2] If we follow APOLLODORUS, this Example is ill applied. For, according to him, Eurytus, King of Oechalia, had promised his Daughter Iole in Marriage to him who could outshoot him and his Sons. Hercules presented himself, and having won the Prize proposed, Eurytus refused to let him have it: So that here was a Breach of Faith, for which Hercules had a Right to do himself Justice by Arms. Biblioth. Lib. II. Cap. VI. § 1. But our Author has followed DIODORUS SICULUS, who does not mention the Promise, and only says, that Hercules demanded Iole in Marriage, Lib. IV. Cap. XXXI.
- [3] Our Author has, no Doubt, taken this from JUSTIN. That Epitomiser says, that Jancyres (a Name very differently expressed by Authors) I say, that Jancyres, Idantyes, or Indathyses, having refused to give his Daughter in Marriage to Darius, the latter declared War against him upon that Account. Huic Darius Rex Persarum — — — quum filiae ejus nuptias non obtinisset, bellum intulit. Lib. II. Cap. V. Num. 9. I perceive however, that ALBERICUS GENTILIS, whose Work our Author had before him, when he composed his own; relates this Example on the Authority of JORNANDES, Hist. Gotth. (Cap. X.) and of PAULUS OROSIUS, Lib. II. Cap. VIII. See the Treatise of that Civilian often cited, De jure Belli, Lib. I. Cap. XX. p. 158.
- [4] And Antoninus Caracalla, against Artabanus, King of the Parthians. See XIPHILINUS, (Epit. Dion. p. 356. Edit. H. Steph.) GROTIUS.

- [1] Eadem semper causa Germanis, &c. Hist. Lib. IV. Cap. LXXIII. Num. 6.
- [a] Franc. Victor. de Indis, Relect. 1. n. 31.
- [a] Idem, de bello, n. 5, 6, 7, 8. & 1. 2. n. 18.
- [b] Ch. 3. § 6. of this Book.
- [1] Φύσει πολέμιοι. See PLATO, De Republica, (Lib. V. p. 470. C. Vol. II. Edit. Steph.) ARISTOTLE, Politic. (Lib. I. Cap. II.) EURIPIDES, in Hecub. [or rather Iphigen. in Aulid. ver. 1400, 1401.] LIVY, Lib. XXXI. (Cap. XXIX. Num. 15.) ISOCRATES, Orat. Panathen. (p. 267. Edit. Hen. Steph.) GROTIUS.
See above, Chap. XX. § 40. Note 10, and 11.
- [c] Ch. 20. § 40. of this Book.
- [1] See the fourth Council of Toledo, and what we have said above in Chap. IV. § 14. of this Book. GROTIUS.
- [2] See PUFENDORF, B. III. Chap. II. § 8. Law of Nature and Nations.
- [3] ALBUTIUS, & philosophatus est; dixit, &c. SENECA, Controvers. Lib. III. Cont. XXI.
- [4] He does not say this of his own Head, but relates it as the Opinion of others, who believed that all Slavery is contrary to Nature, and consequently unjust. Politic. Lib. I. Cap. III.
- [a] Franc. Victor. de Indis, n. 24. Ayala. de jure belli, 1. 1. c. 2. n. 29.
- [1] Mr. BARBEYRAC adds, And Idiots, (les Insensez) because, says he, it is highly probable, that the Printers skipt over & amentium, from the Resemblance of the Word infantium which preceded. In § 10. our Author joins together Infants and Madmen.
- [a] See Covar. in Cap. peccatum. part 2. § 9. n. 5.
- [b] Ad Leg. 24. Dig. De captiv. & postlim. &c.
- [1]
- [c] See also the Council of Calcedon, Act. 11. and 12.
- [2] As ATHANASIUS does also, in his Letters Ad Solitarios, and that was scarce the sixth Part of the then known World. GROTIUS.
The same Father says, Rome is the capital City of Romania. Vol. I. p. 832. C. Edit. Colon. seu Lips. 1686.
- [3] PHILO the Jew says, that the Countries between the Euphrates and the Rhine may be properly called the Earth, or habitable World. De Legat. ad Cajum. (p. 993. D. E.) GROTIUS.
- [d] Luke ii. 1.
- [4]

Orbem jam totum victor Romanus habebat.

PETRON. Satyr. Cap. CXIX.

- [5] The Word Earth, tho' the Particle all be added to it, must be restrained to that Country the Discourse is of. St. JEROM. GROTIUS.
See the late Mr. RELAND's Palestine, Lib. I. Cap. V.
- [6] Consult the Geograph. Sac. of the last cited Author, Lib. I. Cap. X.
- [e] See Joseph. de bello Jud. 1. 3. c. 4.
- [7] The Authorities of the Antients upon this Head may be found in the same Part of Mr. RELAND's Work.
- [8] In the second Book of DANTE ALIGHERI, De Monarchia, printed at Basil in the Year 1559, by John Oporin.
- [f] See Aristot. Politic. 1. 7. c. 4.
- [g] Sylvest. verbo Bellum, p. 1. n. 21. Covar. ubi supra.
- [9] Spain, for Instance: Upon which see GOMEZ, in § Fuerat, Num. 5. De Actionibus. PANORMITAN, in Cap. Venerabilem, Col. 9. De Electione. JASON, in Leg. I. Cod. De Summa Trin. Col. 2. MENOCHIUS, Consil. II. Num. 102. Cardinal TUSCHUS, Practic. Concl. CCCXLV. § Rex Hispan. DU MOULIN, Cons. Paris. Num. 20. Princ. CHASSANEUS, De gloria Mundi, Part. V. Considerat. XXVIII. AZORUS, Institut. Moral. Lib. II. Cap. V. p. 2. GROTIUS.
- [a] See Franc. Victor. De Indis, Relict. 1. n. 21, &c. Ayala, l. 1. c. 11. n. 29.
- [1] Compare with this the Treatise of our Author, De Imperio Summarum Potestatum circa Sacra. Cap. IV.
- [b] John xviii. 36. See Petr. Damian, l. 4. epist. 9. and Bernard. epist. 220.
- [c] As Tostatus admirably explains it, on Matt. ix.
- [2] Audite erga Judaei & Gentes, &c. In JOANN. XVIII. 36. (Tractat. CXV.) St. HILLARIUS Arelatensis says, For CHRIST did not come to invade another's Glory, but to bestow his own: Not to seize on an earthly, but to confer an heavenly, Kingdom. Non enim ad hoc venerat CHRISTUS ut alienam invaderet gloriam, sed ut suam donaret; non ut regnum terrestre praeiperet, sed ut coeleste conferret. GROTIUS.
- [d] In Act. Apost. hom. 3. In Epist. ad Tit. 1. to Thess. hom. 4.
- [3] His Words are in his second Book, De Sacerdotibus, Μάλιστα μὲν οὖν τοῖς χριστιανοῖς, &c. It is by no Means allowable for Christians to reform Offenders by Force and Violence. The secular Judges indeed, when they get Malefactors under their Jurisdiction, exercise a large Power over them, and make them, whether they will or no, amend their Manners: But as for us, we are to better People by Persuasion, and not by Compulsion. The Laws give us no such Authority to restrain Criminals; nor, if they did, could we put it in Execution, because GOD does not crown those who by Necessity abstain from their Vices, but who do it out of Choice: And therefore, there is a great Deal of Art and Industry to be used by us, that they who labour under such Distempers may voluntarily apply themselves to the Clergy for a Cure. And presently after, οὐ γὰρ ἐλκύσαι, &c. For we must not drag him by Force, nor necessitate him by Fear. And upon Ephes. iv. εἰς διδασκαλίαν, &c. Our Business is to teach and instruct; not to command and govern, but to persuade and advise: Now he who offers his Advice, says what he pleases, he does not compel his Hearer, but leaves him to his own Liberty and Discretion, of following his Advice or not. St. AMBROSE, Lib. I. De Cain & Abel, Cap. IV. The Priest indeed tells the Man his Duty, but he exercises no Power and Authority over him. This is cited, C. Verbum. De poenitent. Distinct. I. GROTIUS.

Our Author has treated this Subject more at large in his Treatise De Imperio Summarum Potestatum circa Sacra. Cap. III. and IV.

[4] See the Passages cited by our Author in the Margin, and in his Treatise, De Jure Summarum Potestatum circa Sacra, (Cap. IV. § 7.)

[5] For it belongs to Princes and not to the Church, to determine about Fiefs. C. Novit. de Judiciis, de Feudis, de Possessionibus. C. Causam quae inter qui Filii sint legitimi. For Kings allow no Superior in Temporals. C. per venerabilem, as before, Christ would have Christian Emperors be beholden to the Clergy for what regards an eternal Life, and the Clergy to make Use of the Emperor's Laws in what concerns their temporal Affairs, that so our spiritual Proceedings might have no clashing and interfering with those that are carnal, and that he who is engaged in the Service of GOD might not be involved in secular Matters. C. quoniam distinct. x. and c. cum ad verum distinct. xcvi. Not foreign to this is what we laid down in the last Section of these cond Chapter of the first Book, from the eighty second Apostolical Canon, and several other Passages there both in the Text and Notes upon that Subject. GROTIUS.

[6] Our Author intimates by this that if Ecclesiasticks, have any coactive Power, as they hold it from the Laws and the Sovereign, when they exercise it, they do not act as Ministers of the Gospel; they assume, if I may say so, another Personage, and become in that Regard Seculars. See again here our Author's Treatise, De Jure Summarum Potestatum circa Sacra. Cap. VIII. and IX.

[7] Ut regi, sic Episcopo, &c. Epistol. and Heliodor. De Epitaphio Nepotian. (Vol. I. p. 25. B. Edit. Froben.) In a Letter of one that was Captain of the Emperor's Life-Guard, to the Bishop, it is said, Let the Bishop instruct so as the Judge may find no Cause to punish: Episcopus doceat, ne judex possit invenire quod puniat. CASSIODOR. Var. XI. 3. The Emperor Frederick Barbarossa says, in a Poem, speaking of the Pope: Let him govern his Church, and make spiritual Regulations; but let him leave Empire and Civil Authority to us:

*Ecclesiam regat ille suam, divinaque jura,
Temperet: imperium nobis fascisque relinquat.*

GUNTHER. Ligurin.

When William, Bishop of Roschild, refused Sueno, King of Denmark, who was excommunicated, entrance into his Church, by opposing his Crosier against him, and the King's Officers upon that laid their Hands on their Swords, he did as a Bishop ought to do, and offered them his Neck. See what we have said upon this, B. I. Chap. IV. § 5. GROTIUS.

[e] Chap. 20. § 48. & seqq.

[1] See, concerning a Person named Theodore, in the Emperor Gratian's Time. ZOSIMUS, (Lib. IV. Cap. XIII. Edit. Cellar.) And AMMIANUS MARCELLINUS, (Lib. XXIX. Cap. I.) and in Relation to John of Cappadocia, PROCOPIUS, Persic. Lib. II. (Cap. XXX.) See also LEUNCLAVIUS, Hist. Turc. Lib. XVIII. GROTIUS.

We may add here what the celebrated Mr. SCHULTING says upon the Receptae Sententiae of PAULUS the Civilian, Lib. V. Tit. XXI. § 1. Jurisprud. Ante-Justin, p.502.

[2] For the Books of the Prophets are closed up and sealed till the Time of the End, so that they cannot be understood, Dan. xii. 4, 8, 9. St. JEROME upon DANIEL. If the Prophet heard and did not understand, what will they do who presume to declare what is contained in that sealed Book; a Book involved in numerous Obscurities till the Time of its Consummation? PROCOPIUS, Goth. Cap. II. Τῶν γὰρ Σιβύλλης, &c. I think it impossible for any Man to find out the Meaning of the Sibyls Oracles before the Event. And presently, ταύτη τε ἔδύναται, &c. It is impossible for any Man living to understand the Sibylline Oracles before their Accomplishment; for it is Time alone, which upon the Arrival of the Affair itself, and the Conclusion of what is predicted, can exactly tell what the Verse intended. GREGORAS, Lib. V. ἄλλ' ὅσπερ, &c. But as other Predictions are very difficultly guessed at and expounded, because they have a thousand Intricacies and various Explications till their actual Expiration, so this Oracle too deceived many, and even the Emperor Andronicus himself till his Decease, as it shall be related by and by. But when he was dead and gone, the Oracle discovered itself. Have a Care then you who are Divines, that you be not too bold this Way: And do you who are Politicians have a Care, that you be not imposed on by such presumptuous Theologists. There is a Passage very well worth your viewing in THUANUS, Lib. LXXIX. at the Year 1583. about one Jacobus Brocardus. GROTIUS.

[1] See PUFENDORF, B. III. Chap. III. § 4. Of the Law of Nature and Nations.

[2] Our Author cites Nobody: But he has here in View, what STRABO says of Ptolomy the last King of Cyprus, who was deprived of his Kingdom by the Romans, for his ill Conduct and Ingratitude to his Benefactors. Geogr. Lib. XIV. in fin. p. 1004. A. Edit. Amstel. (684. Edit. Paris.) But this War had still more unjust Causes, as well with Regard to P. Clodius, who brought the Roman People into it; as to the Roman People themselves. See CICERO, Orat. pro Sext. Cap. XXVI. FLORUS, Lib. III. Cap. IX. DION CASSIUS XXXVIII. p. 86, 87. Edit. Steph. APPIANUS ALEXANDRINUS, De Bell. Civil. Lib. II. p. 728. Edit. Amstel. (441. H. Steph.) AMMIANUS MARCELLINUS, Lib. XIV. Cap. VIII. in fin. Edit. Vales. Gron.

[3] See PUFENDORF, Law of Nature and Nations, B. III. Chap. III. § 17.

[a] Franc. Victor. De Jure Belli, Num. 2.

[1] Which Vice insinuates itself the most, under the Appearance of Virtue. But as St. AUSTIN well observes, it is much better to suffer as the greatest Coward, than to acquire Glory by such an use of Arms: Satius est cujuslibet inertiae poenas luere, quam illorum armorum gloriam quaerere. De Civit. Dei. Lib. III. Cap. XIV. See the Passage of AGATHIAS cited above, § 3. (Note 3.) GROTIUS.

But in the Passage referred to here, as well as in the other of St. AUSTIN, the Question relates to Wars unjust in themselves.

[2] Orat. II. De Societate, Vol. II. p. 256, 257.

[b] Epist. Mithr. ad Arsacem, Frag. Lib. 4. § 3.

[c] Hist. Lib. 4. Cap. 74. n. 7.

[d] Senec. Hipp. V. 540, 541.

[e] Contra Faust. 1. 22. c. 74.

[f] Covar. in C. peccatum, Part 2. § 9. n. 2. Cajetan. 2. 2 Quaest. 40. Art. 1. Sylvest. verb. Bellum, n. 2. Summa Ang. verb. Bellum, n. 5. Summ. Ros. ib. n. 3. & 8. Thom. Aquin. 2. 2 Qu. 66. Art. 8.

[1] See the Passage related at large in PUFENDORF, Law of Nature and Nations, B. I. Chap. II. § 1. and what I have said in the Notes upon that Paragraph.

[2] PUFENDORF has examined this in the last cited Chapter, § 9. All that our Author says, proves only, that the Application of the Principles of Morality to particular Cases is often very difficult. See my Preface to the same Work of PUFENDORF, § 3. Num. 3.

[3] In this Sort of Forms, the Change is made Εἰς τὸ ἀντικειμένον, from one Extremity to the other: Whereas in Moral Things, it is εἰς τὸ μετὰξὺ, by a Medium. GROTIUS.

[4] See St. CHRYSOSTOM upon Ephesians iv. and ARISTOTLE, Magn. Moral. (Lib. I. Cap. IX.) GROTIUS.

I have supplied here the latter Citation by guess, of which the Author is omitted in the Original, where the Note stands thus: Vide Chrysostomum ad IV. Ephesiorum. II. Morali. I imagined the Printers had skipped the Word Aristot. and then put II. for I. For I find in the Chapter of the Book which I have referred to, something agreeable enough to the Subject; the Philosopher there shewing, that Vices are sometimes more and sometimes less remote from the Mean, [Medium] in which he makes Virtue consist. In my Latin Edition, I conjectured, that the Name omitted was Azorium, the Schoolman, whose Institutiones Morales, cited elsewhere by our Author, are extant. But I have not the Book, to see whether that Conjecture be better founded than the other, to which I shall therefore keep. The Thing is indeed of little Importance.

[5] Ἔστι δὲ χαλεπὸν, &c. Ethic. Nicom. Lib. III. Cap. I.

[a] Lib. 1. c. 3. p. 10.

[1] To the same Purpose are the following Expressions in the same Chapter of that Epistle of St. PAUL, ἕκαστος ἐν τῷ ἰδίῳ νοῦ πληροφροεῖσθω, Let every Man be fully persuaded in his own Mind, And μακάριος ὁ μὴ κρινὼν ἑαυτὸν ἐν ᾧ δοκιμάζει, Happy is he that condemneth not himself in that Thing which he alloweth. St. AMBROSE. Whatever is done contrary to the Approbation of the Judgment, is Sin. St. AUSTIN is of the same Mind; they are both quoted by GRATIAN after Chap. XIV. Caus. XXVIII. Quaest. I. Not very foreign to this is that of PLUTARCH in his Timoleon, δεῖ οὐ μόνον, &c. For an Action must not only be good and just in itself, but the Persuasion upon which it is grounded must be firm and constant, that so we may do it out of Principle and Conviction. GROTIUS. To this may be added, what our Author says in his Votum pro pace Ecclesiastica, Ad Attic. XXI. p. 71. & seq. Edit. 1642.

[a] See Covar. Tom. 1. De Matrimon. Part 2. c. 7. § 2. n. 9. & seqq.

[2] Bene praecipunt, qui vetant quidquam agere, quod dubites, aequum sit an iniquum. De Offic. Lib. I. Cap. IX. See PUFENDORF upon this, Lib. I. Cap. III. § 8. Law of Nature and Nations.

[3] And PLINY the younger: Aut si tutius putas, illud cautissimi cujusque praeceptum: QUOD DUBITAS NE FECERIS, id ipsum rescribe, Lib. I. Epist. XVIII.

[b] R. Gamaliel, in Perke Aboth, p. 14. Ed. P. Fagii.

[4] This requires to be rectified. See the Place in PUFENDORF which I have cited in the second Note of this Paragraph.

[5] Ethic. Nicomed. Lib. II. Cap. IX. p. 27. Vol. II. Edit. Paris.

[6] Sed quia sic ab hominibus doctis, &c. De Offic. Lib. III. Cap. I.

[7] Nam in comparatione malorum, &c. Instit. Orat. Lib. VII. Cap. IV. p. 626. Edit. Burman.

[1] St. AUSTIN says, Lib. III. De Ordine. When the Obscurity of an Affair perplexes us, here are two Ways for us to go, either to follow our own Reason, or some other's Authority. This is explained by GABRIEL VASQUEZ, Disput. LXII. Chap. III. Num. 10. See also MEDINA I. 2 Quaest. XIV. GROTIUS.

[2]

Ὁς τὸς μὲν πανάριστος, &c.

The Poet adds, he who wants Understanding himself, and will not follow that of others, is a worthless Wretch:

Ὅς δέ κε μήτ' αὐτὸς νόεη, &c.

(Oper. & Dier. Ver. 293. & seqq. Edit. Cleric.) This Thought has been copied by LIVY, who puts it into the Mouth of Minutius speaking to his Soldiers: Saepe ego audivi, Milites, eum, primum esse virum, qui ipse consulat quid in rem sit; secundum eum, qui bene monenti obediat: Qui nec ipse consulere, nec alteri parere sciat, eum extremi ingenii esse. Lib. XXII. (Cap. XXIX. Num. 8.) CICERO has also borrowed it: All the World allows him to be the wisest Man, who can himself judge what is most expedient and necessary, and that he is next to him who conforms to the good Counsels of another. Sapientissimum esse dicunt eum, cui, quod opus sit, veniat in mentem: proximè accedere illum, qui alterius bene inventis obtemperet. Orat. pro Cluent. (Cap. XXXI.) GROTIUS.

[a] Franc. Victor. De Indis, Relect. 1. n. 12. and De Jure Belli, n. 21. and 24.

[1] Topic. Lib. I. Cap. I.

[2] Quibus artium momenta ediscere aut expendere vix vacat. Our Author has here imitated what CICERO says in regard to Cato Major, Et primum M. Catoni vitam ad certam rationis normam dirigenti, & diligentissimè perpendenti MOMENTA OFFICIORUM omnium, de officio respondebo. Orat. pro Muren. Cap: II. He cites here the Greek Verse in the Text without saying from whence he took it.

Σοφοὶ τύραννοί, &c.

That is; The Conversation of wise Men makes Princes wise. This is an antient proverbial Sentence, as AULUS GELLIUS tells us, Noct. Attic. Lib. XIII. Cap. XVIII. upon which the Commentators may be consulted, who however have not observed, that STOBÆUS, Serm. XLVIII. cites it as from EURIPIDES; and others, as from SOPHOCLES, as appears from the Excerpta ex Trag. & Comoed. Graecis of our Author, p. 122. As to the Thing itself, it is but too true, that the Great in general, and especially Princes, see little with their own Eyes, and rely upon those of others. But this proceeds not from the Want of Time or Means of being instructed by themselves in the Affairs, of which they are obliged to judge. If they were well educated, and would employ as many Hours for that Purpose, as they devote to Pleasures and frivolous Occupations; they would have all the Leisure necessary to enable them to judge for themselves, in acquiring sufficient Knowledge: And they generally have all the necessary Means in their own Hands, if they would vouchsafe to use them.

[3] Vol. II. p. 378. B.C.

[4] See the Dissertation of Mr. JENSIUS, De Fetialibus, in his Ferculum Literarium, printed 1717.

[5] But were those Bishops to know better than the Emperors, what related to so important a Part of the Power and Duty of Sovereigns? Have Ecclesiasticks, or ought they to have, a sufficient Knowledge in political Affairs to determine, when War ought, or ought not, to be made? If we consider the Temper that many amongst them have been of in all Ages, there is more Reason to fear that they would engage a Prince in unjust and rash Wars. The History of such of them as have been Ministers of State sufficiently proves this.

[1] Verum in istam partem potius peccato tamen. [TERENT. Adelphi. Act II. Scen. I. Ver. 20.] AMMIANUS MARCELLINUS, [or rather CICERO, Epist. ad Quint. Fratr. I. 1. cited by that Historian] says, that a Facility to be angry and to be appeased is better than implacable Wrath, and that therefore the former Vice is preferable to the latter, as the least of two Evils: Interdum enim exoratus parcebat aliquibus, &c. Lib. XXVIII. (Cap. I. p. 562. Edit. Vales. Gron.) See GABRIEL VASQUEZ, Disput. LXII. Cap. IV. Num. 21. GROTIUS.

[2] Ἔτι δὲ ἕκαστος ἥμῶν μᾶλλον ἢ προέλοιτο τοῦ ἀδικοῦντος (it should be read so instead of μᾶλλον ἀδικοῦντος) ἀποψηφίσασθαι ὡς οὐκ ἀδικεῖ, ἢ τοῦ μᾶλλον ἀδικοῦντος καταψηφίσασθαι ὡς ἀδικεῖ, &c. Sect. XXIX. Num. 13. GROTIUS.

See PUFENDORF, B. I. Chap. III. § 6. Note 3. of the second Edition.

[a] Orat. 14. 15. p. 133. Edit. Wech.

[1] He says,

*Ast Fabius cauta speculator mente futuri,
Nec laetus dubiis, parcusque lacessere Martem.*

Punic. Lib. I. Ver. 679, 680. Edit. Cellar.

[1] Nam, quum sint duo genera decertandi, &c. De Offic. Lib. I. Cap. XI.

[a] Eunuch. Act. 4. Scen. 7. V. 19, 20.

[2] DIONYSIUS HALICARNASSENSIS, in Excerpt. legat. μᾶλλον πρότερον ἔρξαι, &c. We must not proceed to Deeds before we have tried what Words can do. And Menelaus in LIBANIUS, πρῶτον μὲν, &c. For it is more agreeable to human Nature, to attempt by Reason and Argument to have Justice done one, than immediately to fly to Arms. Not very different from this are those Reflections of the Chorus in EURIPIDES's Helena.

Τὸ Θεῶν

Ἔπος ἀληθὲς εἶπον,

Ἄφρονες, &c.

*What the Gods say I always found was Truth.
For none but Fools and Madmen e'er would seek
Or Rest or Virtue from the bloody Points
Of Sword and Spear: For if human Mis'ries
By these should be determin'd, War and Contention
Would every City, every State infest.*

GROTIUS.

[b] Argon. 1. 3. v. 185.

[3] (Lib. XXXV. Cap. XLV. Num. 4.) Donatus ad Eunuchum: For it is an Observation almost to a Proverb, That what a Man will stand up for, and maintain with all his Might and Main when you would force it from him, he will generously part with, when you quit your Pretensions. GROTIUS.

[c] Lib. 7. cap. 9. n. 2. Ed. Gronov.

[d] Antiq. Rom. 1. 8. c. 8. p. 468. Edit. Oxon. 487. Sylb.

[e] Lib. 3. c. 11. in fin.

[f] Annal. 1. 15. c. 2. n. 3.

[g] Cassiodor. Var. iii. 1.

[1] A Method indeed generally slighted by the more potent. See CONNESTAGIUS about the Union of the two Crowns of Castile and Portugal: but this is a Way that ought to be taken by those who have any Regard to Justice and Peace. Several great Princes and People mentioned in the Text, have done it. Let us subjoin a few more. The Contest between Magnus and Canutus, Kings of Norway and Denmark, each of them laying Claim to both Crowns, was put to Arbitration: Just as Julian, the first of that Name, finding that Severus disputed with him the Empire, would have a Decree about the Possession. Magnus King of Sweden was chosen Umpire between the two Ericks Kings of Denmark and Norway. Five Spartans, Critoliadas, Amompharetus, Hipsechidas, Anaxilas, Cleomenes, were elected Judges of the Controversy of the Athenians and Magarenses about Salamis. In the Treaty of the Lacedemonians and the Argives in THUCYDIDES V. δίκας δίδοντας κατὰ πάτρια, willing, as the Custom of their Ancestors was, to compromise the Matter. And again, εἰ δὲ τις τῶν, &c. If any Dispute should happen between two States in Alliance, let them refer their Cause to some other State that is indifferent to them both. You have both these Passages in THUCYDIDES, Lib. V. Several Nations independent of the Roman Empire to avoid entering into Wars, took Marcus Antoninus for the Arbitrator of their Controversies. VICTOR and others take Notice of this. In PROCOPIUS, Gotthic. III. the Gepidae say to the Lombards, δίκῃ γὰρ διαλύειν, &c. For we for our Parts are ready to have our Differences concluded by Arbitration; and it is by no Means reasonable to offer Violence to those who are desirous to be determined by a Reference. And in Gotthic. IV. Theudibaldus King of Austrasia, declares himself ready to submit his Dispute with the Romans to Judgment. See too what the Romans signified to Philip, in POLYBIUS, Excerpt. legat. Num. 4. And what there is in Antiochus's Treaty out of the same POLYBIUS, in Excerpt. Num. 35. The King of England was Judge of the Succession to the Crown of Scotland, and the Count of Holstein between the King of Denmark and his Brothers, as PONTANUS relates it. Hist. Dan. Lib. VII. Add to these some Instances in MARIANA, Lib. XXIV. Chap. XX. Lib. XXIX. Chap. XXIII. in PARUTA, Lib. VII. and XI. in BIZARUS, Lib. XII. CRANTZIUS, Lib. VI. Saxon. Cap. XV. and what we say below, B. III. Chap. XX. § 46. GROTIUS.

In this Note our Author thro' Inadvertency ascribes to Marcus Antoninus the Philosopher what the Historians say of Antoninus Pius: For there is nothing like this related of the first of those Emperors. AURELIUS VICTOR or he whom our Author cites under that Name, which is generally given him, says of the other, Adeo trementibus eum, [Antoninum Pium] atque amantibus cunctis Regibus, Nationibusque, & Populis, ut Parentem, seu Patronum, magis quam Dominum, Imperatoremve reputarent: Omnesque uno ore, in coelestium morem, propitium optantes, de controversiis inter se judicem poscerent. Epitom. Cap. XV. Num. 3. See also EUTROPIUS, Breviar. Lib. VIII. Cap. IV. SUIDAS, Lexic. in voc. Ἀντωνίνου: CAPITOLIN. in Antonin, Pio. Cap. IX. with the Note of the learned CASAUBON, upon these Words: Caussas regales terminavit: In which he seems to have Reason for saying, that this ought only to be understood of some petty Eastern Kings, who were in some Manner dependent on the Romans. The Passage itself of AURELIUS VICTOR, which I have just recited, insinuates it plainly enough. So that on that Foot, the Application made of it by our Author is not entirely just. As to what he says of Didius Julian, that he would agere interdicto, I do not find that Expression in any of the Historians, who have writ his Life. Our Author had probably in View the Partition of the Empire, upon which the Senate passed a Decree at that Emperor's Request, when Advice came of the Approach of Severus's Army: Quare meliore consilio ad Senatum venit, petiitque ut, fieret Senatus consultum de participatione Imperii, quod statim factum est. SPARTIAN, in Did. Julian. Cap. VI. in fin. See also the Life of Septimius Severus, Cap. V. and the Abridgment of DION, by XIPHILINUS, in Did. Julian. p. 292. Edit. Rob. Steph. But this Step of Julian's was only an Effect of his want of Power to resist a Competitor more beloved than himself. His Fear was so great, according to HERODIAN, (Lib. II. Cap. XII. Edit. Boecler.) That he even urged for Permission to renounce the Empire entirely. So that our Author might have spared doing him the Honour of a Thing, in which there was nothing less than a Desire of terminating amicably the Dispute for the Empire.

[2] Lib. I. Cap. LXXXV. Edit. Oxon.

[a] Lib. 4. c. 67.

[b] Plutarch in Solon. p. 83. Tom. 1. Edit. Wech.

[c] Lib. 1. c. 28.

[3] In his second Oration against PLATO. Vol. II. p. 248. B. Edit. P. Steph.

[4] Our Author refers us in this Place, from the first Edition of his Work, to the Oration against Ctesiphon: But ISOCRATES has none upon that Subject; and I do not know that the Word Ctesiphon is to be found in his Writings. He meant AESCHINES: For here is the Passage in which the Orator, accusing DEMOSTHENES of having been the Cause of the War with Philip of Macedon, says, that when that Prince offered to be determined by the Arbitration of some natural and disinterested State, DEMOSTHENES maintained, there was no such Judge between Philip and the Athenians: Εἰ δὲ ἐπιτρέπειν (Φύλιππος) &c. Orat. Advers. Ctesiphon. p. 286. A. The Mistake of our Author arose from ISOCRATES's Commendation of Philip of Macedon, especially in an Oration addressed to himself; but in which there is nothing concerning these Offers of Accommodation with the Athenians.

[d] Liv. Lib. 3. c. 71. n. 2.

[5] Our Author cited Nobody here in all the Editions before mine, except LIVY, Lib. VIII. which could agree only with the Instance of the Samnites related in the following Period. This proceeded from his not understanding rightly, to what the marginal Citation of ALBERICUS GENTILIS referred, De Jure Bell. Lib. I. Cap. III. p. m. 23. The Fact in Question is in CICERO, Lib. I. Cap. X. and in VALERIUS MAXIMUS, Lib. VII. Cap. III. Num. 4.

[6] I am very much deceived, if this is not the same Fact which our Author relates a little lower, by changing the Parties. For LIVY says of the Ambassador, sent by the Romans to the Samnites: Quum Romanus Legatus ad disceptandum eos [Samnites] ad communes socios atque amicos vocaret, &c. Liv. Lib. VIII. Cap. XXIII. Num. 8. I know no other Place, where this is said of the Samnites in regard to the Romans: And it is very probable, that our Author, who uses in both Places the express Terms of the Original, as recited above, with this Difference only, that in the one he puts amicos, and in the other socios; it is, I say, very probable, that having at first quoted by Memory, or rather on the Credit of the same Author I mentioned in the preceding Note, who commits the same Fault, p. 23.

and uses also the Word amicis; he afterwards cited by the Original itself, where he imagined he had found a new Fact, thro' the Mistake he had fallen into, in putting the Samnites for the Romans in the first Citation.

[e] Xenophon. Cyrop. l. 2. c. 4. § 7. Edit. Oxon.

[7] See LIVY, Lib. XL. Cap. XVII.

[8] See Note 6.

[f] Plutarch, Pomp. p. 637.

[9] PLUTARCH, Vit. Numae. p. 68. A. Vol. I. Edit. Wech.

[10] Geograph. Lib. IV. p. 302. A. Edit. Amstel. (197. Edit. Paris Casaub.)

[g] Lib. 11. p. 765. Edit. Amst.

[11] One of the Writers of the Byzantine History, speaking of Alexander the Bulgarian says, that it was very indecent for Christians to make War with so much Barbarity upon one another, when they might accommodate their Differences with great Ease, and unite their Arms against the impious. NICEPHOR. GREGORAS, Lib. X. GROTIUS.

[h] Franc. Victor De Jure Belli, n. 28.

[12] I find this Passage in the Treatise De Coron. Milit. where that Father speaks thus: Et praelio operabitur filius pacis, cui nec litigare conveniet? Cap. XI.

[i] B. 1. c. 2. § 8. n. 3.

[k] Molina. Disp. 103. § Quando inter, &c. Aegid. Reg. De Act. Supern. Disp. 31. Dub. 4. n. 72.

[13] See a Precedent in CASSIODORE, Lib. III. 1, 2, 3, 4. and GAIL. De Pace publica, Lib. II. Cap. XVIII. Num. 12. GROTIUS.

[14] They discharged this Office because of the great Respect they were held in by the People; as appears from the Passage of STRABO quoted above Note 10. which is the same our Author had here in View, and that which agrees with that of DIODORUS SICULUS.

[15] The Druids were succeeded in this Office, and indeed with a much better Title, by the Bishops. See the Letter of the Bishops to King Lewis in the Statutes of Charles the Bald, and RODERIC of Toledo, Lib. VII. Chap. III. about the Bishops of Spain. GROTIUS.

[l] Lib. 5. C. 31.

[m] Geogr. l. 4.

[16] I do not know whom our Author means here; for he cites Nobody. This must relate to some of the first Race of the Kings of France, amongst whom the Kingdom was hereditary, as Father DANIEL shews in his Historical Preface. And our Author must have known, that the Crown of France was elective under the second Line, after what he has said above, B. I. Chap. III. § 13.

[1] See St. AUSTIN, De Doctrina Christ. Lib. I. Cap. XXVIII. and THOMAS AQUINAS, Summ. Theol. II. 2 Quaest. XCV. Art. VIII. & ibi Cajetan. GROTIUS.

[2] See what I have said on this Head in my Discourse upon the Nature of Lot, § 27. and what our Author says below, B. III. Chap. XX. § 42.

[1] See below, B. III. Chap. XX. § 43. and PUFENDORF, B. VIII. Chap. VIII. § 5. Law of Nature and Nations.

[2] The Author of the Thebais [or SENECA in the Phoenissae, according to the best Manuscripts] introduces Jocasta saying to her Sons Eteocles and Polynices: Determine which of you shall reign, between yourselves: But let not the Kingdom be ruined.

— — — Rex sit e vobis uter
Manente regno, quaerite. — — —

(Ver. 564, 565.)

The Emperor Otho said, that it was much juster that one Man should perish for the Publick, than that a Multitude should perish for one Man. DION [or rather his Epitomizer XIPHILINUS] in Othon. (p. 204 B. Edit. H. Steph.) GROTIUS.

[a] Herodot. l. 9. c. 26.

[b] Plutarch, Qu. Graec. p. 294. Tom. 2.

[c] Strabo, Geogr. l. 8. p. 548. Edit. Amst.

[d] Liv. l. 28. c. 21.

[3] Ineamus aliquam viam, quâ, utri utris imperent, sine magna clade, sine multo sanguine utriusque populi decerni possit. LIV. Lib. I. Cap. XXIII. Num. 9.

[4] Upon Occasion of the single Combat between Pyraechma and Degmenus, of which mention is made a little above, Lib. VIII. p. 548. B. Edit. Amst. (357. Paris.)

[5] Aequius huic Turnum fuerat se opponere morti. Aen. XI. Ver. 115.

Turnus then should try
His Cause in Arms to conquer, or to die;
My Right and his are in Dispute, the Slain
Fell without Fault, our Quarrel to maintain.

DRYDEN.

Upon just such an Account Anthony sent a Challenge to Octavius. PLUTARCH in his Life of Anthony, (p. 944. E. Vol. I. Edit. Wech. GROTIUS.)

It was not out of Compassion for the Romans, that Mark Anthony sent that Challenge to Octavius, but to oppose Bravado with Bravado: ἔντιχομπάζων, as the cited Historian says.

[6] Lib. I. (Cap. II.) See the Statute of Charles the Bald in S. Arnulfus, and the Treaty of Aix la Chapelle. The Lombards were as equitable. See PAULUS WARNEFRID, Lib. I. Cap. XII. Lib. IV. Cap. XVIII. Lib. V. Cap. XL. GROTIUS.

[a] Victor. De Jure Belli, n. 27. 30. Herrera, Tom. 2.

[1] In parî causa possessor potior haberi debet. Digest. Lib. L. Tit. XVII. De diversis Reg. Juris, Leg. CXXVIII.

[2] See Cap. V. of this Book, § 18. Note 4.

[b] Lessius, De Justitia, c. 29. Dub. 10. Molina, Disp. 103. § In secundo vero, &c. Lorca ii. 2. Sect. 3. Disp. 53. n. 4.

- [a] Lorca ii. 2. Sect. 40. Disp. 53. Soto. 5. De Institut. Jur. 41. Art. 7.
- [a] Covar. in Cap. peccatun. Relect. 2. § 410. n. 6. Alciat. Paradox ii. 21. Falgos. De Just. 1. 5. Picolomino. Philos. Civil. Lib. 6. c. 21. Alb. Gent. Lib. 1. c. 6.
- [1] GRATIAN, in an Addition to a Passage of the Canon Law, distinguishes between a Sentence, just in its Cause, just in regard to Order, and just in Conscience, causa, ordine, animo, Caus. XI. Quaest. III. Post. Cap. LXV. GROTIUS.
- [2] [The first Sort of Justice may be called Positive, and the other Negative.] This Sentence had apparently been left out here by the Printers in all the Editions of sic: but the first. I restored it in mine published in 1720.
- [3] Ethic. Nicomach. Lib. V. Cap. XI. (p. 70. A. Vol. II. Edit. Paris.) See the foregoing Chapter, and the Rhetorick of the same Philosopher. Lib. I. Cap. XIII. GROTIUS.
- [b] See St. Austin, De Civit. Dei. Lib. 15. c. 5. Lib. 19. c. 15. and Covar. ubi supra.
- [c] See Suarez. De Legibus, Lib. 3. c. 18. Alphons. de Castro, De potest. Leg. paen. Lib. 1. c. 1. and 3.
- [4] He says this in Opposition to the Question of Fact, in regard to which either one of the Parties falsly denies his having done what he is conscious he has done; or the other accuses him without Grounds of having done what he has not done. Whereas, when the Question is to know what is just or unjust, there may be Ignorance on both Sides. Rhetoric. Lib. III. Cap. XVII. init. See VICTORIUS's Notes upon that Passage.
- [5] The Rhetorician says, that this can scarce happen but by a Sort of Miracle; because Causes manifestly unjust, are foreign to the Art of Rhetoric: Alioquin, ubi unjuxta causa, &c. Instit. Orat. Lib. II. Cap. XVII. p. 196. E. Vol. I. Edit. Burman.
- [6] Topic. Lib. I. Cap. XV. p. 190. Vol. I. Ed. Paris.
- [7] Ethic. Nicom. Lib. V. Cap. XII.
- [8] That is to say, unjust Effects, which may give some right before Man, but none before the Tribunal of GOD.
- [a] Chap. 1. § 8. of this Book. See Fr. Victor. De Jure Bell. n. 14. & 33.
- [b] Rhet. ad Alexandr. Cap. 3.
- [1] Our Author cites in the Margin the fourth Book of that Historian, where I find nothing that has any Relation to the present Subject, but the Reflection he makes in blaming the Messenians for not entering into a War against the Aetolians: I agree, said he, that War is what we ought to fear, but not so far as to suffer every Thing to avoid it. Cap. XXXI. p. 416. Edit. Amst. It is plain he supposes here, that we ought to suffer something, rather than come to a War.
- [2] SENECA, Suasor V. Gallio said, That we ought to engage in War for the Defence of our Liberty, our Wives and our Children; but that we ought not to do so for any trifling Matter, or for what, if it did happen, could not hurt us. Apollonius said something more to the King of Babylon, πρὸς ἐπιθελ, &c. He added, says PHILOSTRATUS, Lib. XXIII. that one should not differ with the Romans for a few small Villages, much larger than which some private Men often possess, and that one should not even for greater Matters commence a War against them. JOSEPHUS in his second Book against APIAN, speaking of his Countrymen, Ο οὐδὲ τῶν ἀνδρῶν, &c. Nor do we exercise our Courage, or enter into Wars out of Avarice and Ambition, but for the Security and Preservation of our Laws; and therefore, tho' other Damages we bear with abundance of Patience, yet if once they attempt to force us to recede from our Constitutions, we then even beyond our Strength betake us to our Arms, and will maintain them to the last Extremities. (P. 1080. C.) GROTIUS.

[3] But where do they condemn him? PAUSANIAS, whom our Author cites here in the Margin, Lib. V. says only, that Hercules had not Opportunity to signalize himself very much in the War he undertook against Augeas, Cap. II. p. 148. Edit. Graec. Wech. And he adds, that this was occasioned by the powerful Support of the Actorides. Our Author, in reading this Passage hastily, or quoting it by Memory, might have imagined to find there that this Expedition was not glorious to Hercules, and explained the Word λαμπρόν, implied that the Occasion of the War was frivolous.

[4] See an Account of this in APOLLODORUS, Biblioth. Lib. II. Cap. IV. § 9. in DIODORUS SICULUS, Lib. IV. Cap. XXXII.

[5] The Authors, I have cited in the foregoing Note, speak of this: The first at § 5. of the same Chapter; and the other at Chapter XXXIII. of the same Book.

[a] Lib. 44. p. 290. Edit. H. Steph.

[1] Where he speaks of Abdication or disinheriting: Numquid aliquis sanus filium, &c. De Clement. Lib. I. Cap. XIV. PHILO the Jew says also, that Fathers do not resolve to disinherit their Sons, till the Wickedness of the latter has overcome their paternal Tenderness and Affection. De Nobilitat. (p. 904. C. Edit. Paris.) A Father, who tried his Son for parricide [at the Time when Fathers had a Power of Life and Death over their Children] took Augustus Caesar for one of his Counsellors, or Assessors, according to Custom; who was of Opinion, that the Father should content himself with banishing him whither he thought fit; and for this Reason, because a Father ought to punish his Children with as little Rigour as possible. Dixit [Caesar Augustus] relegandum, &c. SENECA, De Clement. Lib. I. Cap. XV. The same Thought is expressed thus in a Verse of Terence,

Pro peccato magno paululum supplicii satis est patri.

Andr. (Act. V. Scen. III. Ver. 32.)

CICERO says, that when a Person is accused before his Father, he asks Pardon, confesses his Fault, imputes it to Ignorance, promises never to be guilty of the like again, and submits upon Breach of Word to all the Indignation his Offence deserves. Whereas, before the Judges he denies the Fact, maintains that the Crime is forged, and the Witnesses false: Ignoscite, judices: erravit, &c. Orat. pro Legario. GROTIUS.

[b] Lib. 4. c. 45. p. 172. Edit. H. Steph.

[c] Lib. 8. c. 18. p. 569. Edit. Heins. 1616.

[2] SENECA in his eighty seventh Epistle says, That good Nature spares another's Blood as it would its own, knowing that one Man must not be lavish of another's Life. DIODORUS SICULUS, in Frag. Οὐ δεῖ τοὺς ἀμαρτήσοντας, &c. Not every one who offends must by all Means be punished, but those only who persist in their Crimes without Repentance. St. CHRYSOSTOM, De Statuis vi, μαθέτωσαν, Let all who are Strangers to our Faith know that the fear of Christ bridles and restrains every Power. Honour your Master, and forgive your Fellow Servants that he may have the greater Regard to you, that he may at the Day of Judgment remembring this Tenderness and Humanity of yours, shew you a kind and propitious Countenance. And GRATIANUS, Caus. XXIII. Quaest. IV. cites the following Expression out of St. AUSTIN, It is not in vain that we use these two Words, a Man and a Sinner together; for if the Sinner deserves Punishment, the Man claims our Pity. See both what follows there, and what we have said above, at Chap. XX. § 12. § 26. and 27. GROTIUS.

[3] This Passage is quoted in the JUS CANONIC. Caus. XXIII. Quaest. V. Can. I.

[d] Epist. 159.

[e] Orat. 2. p. 50. Edit. Spanheim.

[f] Molin. De Justit. Tractat. 2. Disp. 103. Lorca, Disp. 153. n. 2. Aegid. Reg. De Act. Supern. Disp. 31. Dub. 7. n. 107.

[g] Chap. 1. § 9. of this Book.

[4] Si quidem de suo jure, &c. De Offic. Lib. II. Cap. XXI.

[5] I doubt whether this Passage be in ARISTIDES or not. I do not find it either in the Harangue of this Orator to the States of Greece, to exhort them to Union, or in any other Place. Our Author perhaps wrote the Name of one Greek Orator for another, as for Instance, ARISTIDES for DION Prusaensis.

[6] It is in the Discourse of Callias to the Lacedemonians: Καὶ σωφρόνων μὲν δὴ, &c. Hist. Graec. Lib. VI. Cap. III. § 4. Edit. Oxon.

[7] This Passage is cited above in Note 2. upon Paragraph I.

[1] See Note 2. upon § 2. of this Chapter; and what has been said above, Chap. XX. § 26. at the End.

[2] Antiq. Jud. Lib. II. Cap. III. p. 49. C.

[a] De Clement. 1. 1. c. 20.

[3] St. CHRYSOSTOM, speaking in commendation of Clemency, ἅπαντα μὲν, &c. For this is glorious to every one, particularly to People in Power. For since Sovereignty allows a Man to do any Thing, it is prodigiously for a Prince's Reputation and Glory, to put a Restraint upon his Passions, and to make the Law of GOD the Director of his Actions. St. AUSTIN, in his 104th Letter to Count Boniface. Remember to forgive as soon as he who has injured you asks your Pardon. GROTIUS.

[b] Orat. pro Ligar. c. 12.

[c] Lib. 55. p. 643. Edit. H. Steph.

[4] In VULCATIUS GALLICANUS's Life of Avidius Cassius. (Cap. XII.) GROTIUS.

[5] (Ethic. Nicomach. Lib. IV. Cap. VIII. p. 51. C. Vol. II. Edit. Paris.)

[d] De Offic. 1. 1. c. 25.

[e] Dried. de Libert. Christ. 1. 2. c. 6.

[6] This Passage of CICERO is cited above, Ch. XX. § 39. Num. 2.

[7] PROCOPIUS, Vandal. II. Μεταμέλως γὰρ, &c. When Offenders are seized with a timely Sorrow and Concern for what they have done, the Parties injured are commonly induced to forgive them. GROTIUS.

[f] De Clement. 1. 2. c. 7.

[1] PROCOPIUS, Goth. Lib. II. Cap. VI. says, that the Goths addressed themselves to Belisarius in the following Manner, ὅταν δὲ αὐτῶ. &c. Since Matters stand thus, the Governors on either Side should not, out of their own Vanity and Ambition, sacrifice their Subjects Safety, but prefer what is just and advantageous, not only for themselves but their Enemies. GROTIUS.

[2] PLUTARCH speaks of the King, In Vit. Numa, p. 68. B. Vol. I. Edit. Wech. Our Author cites here, in a Note, a Passage from THUCYDIDES, which is recited above, Chap. XX. § 4. Num. 1.

[a] Plut. in Vit. Camill.

[3] Frustra adversus Aeduos, &c. (Histor. Lib. I. Cap. LXIV. Num. 5.) In the Reign of Septimius Severus, a King of Armenia prevented a War with which that Emperor threatened him, by sending him Hostages and Presents of his own Accord. See HERODIAN, Lib. III. (Cap. IX. Num. 3. Edit. Boecl.) GROTIUS.

[b] Procop. Vandal. 1. 2. c. 5. Goth. 1. c. 3.

[c] Geograph. 1. 7. p. 462. Ed. Amst. (301 Ed. Paris.)

[4]

Ὅταν γὰρ ἔλθῃ, &c.

Supplic. ver. 481. & seq.

[5] In Hannibal's Harangue to Scipio, Quum tuas vires, tum, &c. Lib. XXX. Cap. XXX. Num. 20.

[6] The Embassadors of Athens say this to the Lacedemonians. Lib. I. Cap. LXXXVIII. Edit. Oxon. Our Author, from his having quoted this Passage after STOBÆUS, (Florileg. Tit. L.) expresses it a little differently from the Terms in the Original.

[1] These subordinate Ends may be considered as Means, with Regard to the last End.

[2] Cap. VII. p. 705. D. Vol. I. Edit. Paris.

[3] See an Explanation of these Rules in PUFENDORF, Law of Nature and Nations, B. I. Chap. II. § 7.

[4] [Orat. I. De pace, Vol. II. p. 63. B. Edit. P. Steph.]

[a] Paraphr. in Ethic. Nicom. 1. 4. c. 5. p. 219.

[5] Narses makes a very wise Use of this Rule in PROCOPIUS, Goth. Lib. II. (Cap. XVIII.) GROTIUS.

[6] I have observed, in my Notes upon PUFENDORF, at the Place referred to Note. 3. that in the Original there is comparata ad malum, for comparata efficaciae ad malum. This Omission had been in the first Edition, and was suffered to pass, amongst other Faults of the like Nature, in all subsequent Revisals and Editions. But I have restored the Text, as the Author's Thought and Intention required.

[7] Sed fugiendum etiam illud, &c. De Offic. Lib. I. Cap. XXIV.

[8] Ubi enim ἐπίτευγμα, magnum, &c. Lib. XIII. Epist. ad Attic. XXVII.

[9] Orat. Sic. II. Vol. II. p. 52. D.

[1] The Passage is recited above B. I. Chap. IV. § 19.

[2] This Passage from CICERO, is quoted in the Place referred to in the foregoing Note.

[3] LUCAN says this,

*Non tamen ignavae, post haec exempla virorum,
Percipient gentes, quam sit non ardua virtus
Servitium fugisse manu — — —*

Pharsal. Lib. IV. v. 575, & seq.

[a] 2 Chron. xii. 7, 8.

[b] Jer. xxvii. 13.

[4] They burnt themselves, with their Wives, Children, and all their Effects. See LIVY, Lib. XXI. Cap. XIV. Our Author cites here, without saying from whom he takes it, a Verse which makes a Part of the Speech that LUCAN puts into the Mouth of the Marseillian Deputies, addressed to Caesar. This is it, with that which precedes,

*Nec pavet hic populus pro libertate subire
Obsessum Paeno gessit quod Marte Saguntum.*

Lib. III. ver. 349, 350.

[c] See St. Austin, De Civit. Dei, l. 22. c. 6.

[5] Atque etiam hoc mihi, &c. De Invent. Lib. II. Cap. LVII.

[6] Anaxilaus, who had surrendered the City of Byzantium, for Want of Provisions, justified his Conduct by saying, that Men are to fight against Men, but not against Nature. This XENOPHON tells us, (Hist. Graec. Lib. I. Cap. III. § 12.) PROCOPIUS observes, that Men do not commend those who make Death their Choice, whilst there is any Hope that appears greater than the Danger. Gothic. Lib. IV. (seu Hist. Misc. Cap. XII. in Bessas's Speech to persuade the Garrison of a Citadel to surrender). A German Poet makes Guido Blandratensis say, in a Discourse to the People of Milan, no Man of Sense loves his Liberty better than his Life; and that it is not Love of Liberty but Vain Glory, to expose one's Self to certain Destruction when it may be avoided;

*Omnia securi pro libertate feremus.
Sed libertatem contempta nemo salute
Sanus amat: Neque enim certae susceptio cladis,
Quam vitare queas, nisi cum ratione Salutis,
Libertatis amor, sed gloria vana putanda est.*

GUNTHER. Ligurin. (Lib. VIII. p. 397. Edit. Reuber.) GROTIUS. Anaxilaus does indeed excuse himself on Account of the Famine which oppressed the City; but the Sentence our Author puts in his Mouth, is not in the Place of XENOPHON referred to, which speaks of that Governor of Byzantium. I imagine our Author has confounded this with what the same Historian makes Cyrus say, That there is no Man valiant and vigorous enough to contend with Hunger and Cold. Cyrop. Lib. VI. Cap. I. § 10.

[7] Lib. XVII. (Cap. X.) The same Author, when he has given an Account of the War the Athenians engaged in, after Alexander's Death, says, that in the Opinion of the wisest Men, They had consulted their Glory well, but had vastly mistaken their Interest; because it was a Danger they hurried themselves into, without any Manner of Necessity for it; no Ways warned by the Fate of the unhappy Thebans. (Lib. XVIII. Cap. X.) GROTIUS.

[d] In vit. Othon.

[8] Our Author had evidently the Passage of that Orator in his Thoughts, where he says, the Master of a Ship cannot command any of the People on board to be thrown into the Sea; but only the Goods, for the People's Safety. Orat. Platon. II. Vol. III. p. 283. B.

[a] Cajetan, ii. 2. qu. 95. art. 8.

[b] Molin. De Instit. tract. 1. c. 102.

[1] Justum est bellum, Samnites, &c. Lib. IX. (Cap. 1. Num. 10.) OVID's Words are Sola gerat miles, quibus arma coerceat, arma.

(Ver. 715.)

GROTIUS.

[1] The Grammarian SERVIUS supposes, that there is none just enough to engage Men to enter into a War. It is where he explains a Verse of VIRGIL, in which the Poet says, that the Gods pitied the foolish Rage of the two Parties at War, and the great Trouble that Men give themselves,

*Dī Jovis in tectis iram miserantur inanem
Amborum, & tantos mortalibus esse labores.*

IRAM MISERANTUR INANEM.] Generaliter dicit omnem iram bellicam, &c. In Aeneid. X. (ver. 758, 759.) GROTIUS.

[2] Here is only the Expression which suits our Author's Sense, and that different from the Historians. It relates to Quintilius Varus, the Roman General, who administered Justice to the Germans newly conquered, in a Manner more cruel, in their Opinion, than the War itself; which obliged them to revolt, under their Leader Arminius, Ut primum Togas, & saeviora armis jura viderunt, duce Arminio arma corripunt. Lib. IV. Cap. XII. Num. 32.

[3] Incurri in pericula, ubi quiescenti paria metuuntur. This is the Manner in which our Author quotes the Passage, which I can find no where.

[4] In his first Oration concerning Peace. Vol. II. p. 67. B.

[5] Miseram pacem vel bello bene mutari. Annal. Lib. III. Cap. XLIV. Num. 3.

[6] Denique ausos aut Libertas sequetur, aut victi iidem erimus. Hist. Lib. IV. Cap. XXXII. Num. 6.

[7] The Samnites say this, when about to throw off the Yoke of the Romans: Rebellasse, quod pax servientibus gravior, quam liberis bellum esset. Lib. X. Cap. XVI. Num. 5.

[8] He speaks of the Course that was to be taken in the War between Caesar and Pompey, Depugna, inquis, potius quam servias. Ut quid? Si victus eris, proscribare? Si viceris, tamen servias. Lib. VII. ad Attic. Epist. VII.

- [1] He speaks both in Regard to undertaking War, and giving Battle, after having had Recourse to Arms. Praelium quidem aut bellum suscipiendum omnino negabat, nisi quum major emolumentum spes, quam damni metus ostenderetur. SÜETONIUS, in August. Cap. XXV.
- [2] Idem [Scipio Africanus] negabat aliter cum hoste configi debere, quam si aut occasio obvenisset, aut necessitas incidisset. VALERIUS MAXIMUS, Lib. VII. Cap. II. Num. 2.
- [3] In quo de Publico Africano, Pauli filio ita scriptum est: Nam se patrem suum audisse dicere L. Aemilium Paulum, nimis bonum imperatorem signis collatis non-decertare, nisi summa necessitudo, aut summa ei occasio data esset. AULUS GELLIUS, Noct. Attic. Lib. VII. Cap. II. Num. 2.
- [4] PLUTARCH, in his Gracchus's, Οὐ γὰρ ἄνευ τῆς, &c. It is neither like a good Surgeon nor a good Politician, to cut and hack, unless there is the utmost Necessity for it. It is Marcian's Expression in ZONARAS, Μὴ δεῖν ὄπλα βασιλείᾳ κινεῖν, ἕως εἰρηγεύειν ἐξόν, A Prince ought never to think of War as long as he may enjoy Peace. St. AUSTIN, in his fiftieth Epistle to Boniface: Peace should be our Choice, but War the Result of Necessity alone; that so GOD may deliver us from that Necessity, and preserve us in Peace. GROTIUS.
The last Passage is not in the fiftieth, but the two hundred and fifth Epistle to Boniface, and there is even some Difference as to the Terms in the Editions I have seen.
- [5] The Lion scorning to use the Weapons Nature gives him, for a long Time defends himself by his Terror only, and does as it were shew that he is forced to engage. This Passage is in PLINY's Natural History, Lib. VIII. Cap. XVI. GROTIUS.
- [a] Diod. Sicul. l. 16. c. 17.
- [6] Ostentatoque bello, ferocissimam gentem (quod est pulcherrimum victoriae genus) terrore perdomuit [Spurinna] Lib. II. Epist. VII. Num. 2.
- [1] Vit. Camill. p. 134. B. Vol. I. Edit. Wech.
- [2] Quorum malorum, [quae ex bello nascuntur] &c. De Civit. Dei, Lib. XIX. Cap. VII.
- [3] The Lacedemonians say, in an Harangue extant in DIODORUS SICULUS, Lib. XIII. Θεωροῦντες τὰς ἐν τῷ πολέμῳ, &c. Seeing so many Animosities, and so many other shocking Incidents in War, we think it our Duty to declare, both to GOD and Man, that we are not any Ways the Authors of these Things. PLUTARCH, in his Numa, Τὶ οὐκ ἔστιν φήσει, &c. If any one says to me, Has not Rome improved by Wars? He asks me a Question that requires a long Answer; when we have to do with those who make Improvement to consist rather in Riches, Luxury and Empire, than in Safety and Humanity, in Justice and Contentment. Stephanus, a Physician, says in PROCOPIUS, Persic. Lib. II. to Chosroes the Persian King, Οὐκ ἔστιν ἂν κρᾶτιστε βασιλεῦς, By being employed in Massacres and Battles, and enslaving of People, you may probably, great Prince, acquire some other Titles, but you can never by such Methods be reputed Good. Add to this a famous Passage in GUICCIARDIN, Lib. XVI. (§ 4. in the Speech of the Bishop of Osima.) GROTIUS.
- [4] Belligerare, malis videtur felicitas, bonis necessitas. De Civit. Dei. Lib. IV. Cap. XV.
- [5] (Dissert. XIV. p. 146. Edit. Davis.)
- [6] Quae (Clementia) alieno sanguini, tanquam suo parcit, &c. Epist. LXXXVIII. p. 390. Edit. Gron. maj.
- [7] AELIAN. Var. Hist. Lib. IV. Cap. XI.

[a] Numb. xxxv. Deut. xix.

[b] 1 Chron. xxviii. 3.

[8] Οὐκ ἐπιτρέπει, &c. He would not suffer him, a Man who had been engaged in so many Wars, and who was stained with Blood, tho' it was the Blood of his Enemies. These are JOSEPHUS's Words, Lib. VII. Cap. IV. where there follow more to the same Purpose. And PLINY, Lib. VII. Cap. XXV. after having related the Battles of Caesar the Dictator, says, I cannot indeed think it for his Reputation, to have brought so many Miseries upon Mankind, tho' he had even been forced to it. PHILO, in his Life of MOSES, καὶ γὰρ εἰ νόμιμοι, &c. For tho' the Laws allow us to kill an Enemy, yet whoever kills any Man, tho' justly, tho' in his own Defence, tho' forced to it, seems to be guilty of Blood, on the Account of that common Relation we bear to one another, and therefore such Homicides were obliged by some Purgations to expiate the reputed Crime. GROTIUS.

[9] See PUFENDORF, Law of Nature and Nations, B. II. Chap. V. § 15. Note 2.

[c] Basil. ad Amphil. ii. 13. Zonar. Niceph. Phoc. vol. 3.

[a] B. i. chap. 5.

[1] See PUFENDORF, Law of Nature and Nations, B. VIII. Chap. VI. § 14.

[b] Navar. 1. 24. c. 18.

[2] PROCOPIUS says, it is not sufficient, in Order to be just, that we do no Wrong to any one, but that we must also be ready to protect those who are under our Charge, from the Injuries of others. Persic. Lib. II. (Cap. XV. in the Speech of the Embassadors from the Prince of the Lazians to Chosroez, King of Persia.) GROTIUS.

[c] Joshua x. 6.

[3] Majores vestri saepe, mercatoribus, &c. Orat. pro Leg. Manil. Cap. V. Quot bella majores nostros & quanto, &c. In Verr. Lib. V. Cap. LVIII.

[4] Quandoquidem, inquit [princeps legationis Campanorum] LIVY, Lib. VII. Cap. XXXI. Num. 3.

[5] Erat foedus cum utrisque, &c. Lib. 1. Cap. XVI. Num. 2.

[6] Tum jam fides agi visa, deditos non prodi. Ubi supra. Num. 7.

[1] See PUFENDORF, B. VIII. Chap. II. § 5.

[2] See the Patriarch Nicephorus's Advice given to Michael Rangaba, about delivering up some Deserters to the Bulgarian General, as an Article of the Peace, where you have in ZONARAS the following Period, Κρεῖσσον εἶναι, &c. Judging it much better for a Few, than an immense Multitude to suffer. (Vol. II. in Mich. Rangab.) GROTIUS.

[a] Soto, De Just. & Jure, 1. 5. qu. 1. art. 7.

[b] Controv. Illust. 1. 1. c. 13.

[3] See his Life in PLUTARCH, Vol. I. p. 856. E. Edit. Wech.

[c] Ubi supra.

[4] As if the State broke the Engagement they had entered into with the Subject demanded by the Enemy.

[5] But as there is no Obligation on a Man to make a Sacrifice of his own Life, unless when there is good Reason to believe he may save the State, or a great Number of Persons, by doing so; it is necessary to know, in the present Case, whether there be sufficient Certainty on that Head. He who demands an innocent Person, in Order to destroy him, gives Reason, by that Demand, to fear every Thing from him. If he be capable of desiring to deprive a Person of Life, who has done nothing that merits Death, he will be as capable of breaking his Engagement to leave the State in Tranquillity, when the Person demanded is delivered up. In a Word, it is my Opinion, that these Demands may generally be considered as the Measures of a Power, which seeks Pretexts for a Rupture, and designs at any Rate to oppress a Prince or State, that it perceives not to be in a Condition to oppose it.

[6] (Ver. 82. & seqq. Edit. Barnes.) PHILO, the Jew, says, it is not just that the Whole should be deemed an Appendix of one of its Parts. De vita Mosis, Lib. I. (p. 652. B.) In the same Place are other Things well worthy of being read. GROTIUS.

[d] Diod. Sicul. 1. 17. c. 15.

[e] See Apollod. Biblioth. 1. 3. c. 14. § 8.

[7] Etenim si mihi in aliqua nave, &c. Orat. pro Sextio, Cap. XX.

[8] Ut enim leges omnium, &c. De finib. bon. & mal. Lib. III. Cap. XIX.

[9] Quae vos rabies, inquit, agitat, &c. Lib. XLV. Cap. XXVI. Num. 8.

[10] So among the Lucani there was a particular Punishment for the Extravagant; among the Macedonians for the ungrateful, and among both the Lucani and Athenians for the idle. Add here what is said B. I. Chap. I. §9. Note 6. GROTIUS.

As for the Law of the Athenians against Idleness, the Reader may see DIOGENES LAERTIUS, Lib. I. § 55. with the Notes of MENAGE. That of the Lucani upon the same Subject may be found in a Fragment of NICOLAUS DAMASCENUS, in STOBÆUS, Florileg. Tit. XLII. See other Examples in AELIAN, Var. Hist. II. 5. iv. 1. In regard to the Punishment of Ingratitude by the Macedonians, some learned Writers pretend, that this is founded upon an Error in the Editions of SENECA, De Benefic. Lib. III. Cap. VI. where the Word Macedonum is read for Medorum. See what I have said upon PUFENDORF, B. III. Chap. III. § 17. Note 3. Edit. II.

[11] As Sovereigns may prescribe Things indifferent in themselves, when the Good of the Publick demands it; with much more Reason may they require those Things, which one was before bound to perform by the Rules of some Virtue; tho' he could not be compelled to it without the Authority of a lawful Sovereign. But the Question is to know, whether in the present Case, there be a plain Obligation of Charity, and which may be preferred to the Care of the Preservation of an innocent Person. See what I have said in the fifth Note upon this Paragraph.

[f] Lessius, 1. 2. c. 9. Dub. 7.

[g] Plutarch, in ejus vita, p. 749. t. 1. Edit. Wech.

[1] Qui enim non repellit a Socio injuriam, &c. Offic. Lib. I. Cap. XXXVI. That Father does not speak there of Allies, to whom our Author applies the Passage, as appears from the Example that follows, of what Moses did in killing the Egyptian, who insulted one of his Nation. SOCIUS therefore means here all those, with whom we have any particular Tie or Relation.

[2] See SIMLER, De Republica Helvetiorum: If the Lord makes War upon any one, and it be known to be just, or not known to be otherwise, the Vassal is obliged to assist him. But if it be visible that he enters into it without any Grounds for so doing, he shall help him to defend himself, but not to offend the other. Lib. II. De Feudis, Cap. XXVIII. at the End. GROTIUS.

[3] In the Peloponnesian War. See THUCYDIDES, Lib. I. Cap. CXIX. CXXV. Edit. Oxon.

[a] Liv. I. 34. c. 22.

[4] See what PUFENDORF says upon this Head, Law of Nature and Nations, B. VIII. Chap. VI. § 14.

[5] The Case, of which our Author speaks, happened a little before the Peloponnesian War. See THUCYDIDES, Lib. I. Cap. XXXI. & seqq. and what is said above in Chap. XVI. of this Book, § 13. Num. 4.

[1] A Person having formerly consulted the Oracle at Delphos, the God told him, he would give him no Answer, only that he should forthwith depart out of the Temple; because he had not assisted one of his Companions, who had been killed by Robbers:

Ἄνδρῃ φίλῳ θνήσκοντι παρ᾽ὄν πέλας οὐκ ἐβοήθεις.

Οὐ σε θεμιστεύσω περικαλλέος ἔξιθι νηοῦ.

GROTIUS.

This Oracle is in AELIAN, Var. Hist. Lib. III. Chap. XLIV.

[a] Fr. Victoria, De Indis, Part 2. n. 17. Cajetan. 2. 2 Q. 4. Art. 1.

[b] Gen. xiv.

[2] Our Author has without Doubt taken this Fact from STRABO, for neither LIVY, nor DIONYSIUS HALICARNASSENSIS, nor any other Author that I know of, says any Thing of it. The Geographer says, that the People of Antium had formerly Ships and exercised Piracy in Conjunction with the Tyrrhenians, even after they were subjected to the Romans. Alexander complained to the Romans upon this account, and Demetrius after him, who sent also all the Pyrates he could take to the Romans, telling them, that he delivered them up, upon account of the Relation that was between the Greeks and Romans; but adding, that it was unworthy of the Romans, who ruled Italy, and had a Temple dedicated to Castor and Pollux, beneficent Divinities, whom all the World honoured with the Name of Saviours, to send Corsairs into Greece. Upon which the Romans put a Stop to those Piracies. Geograp. Lib. V. p. 354, 355. Edit. Amst. 232. Edit. Paris. Casaub. This does not seem to agree entirely with what LIVY says; that after the Defeat of the Antiates, they were prohibited Navigation, and their Ships taken from them, some of which were kept at Rome, and others burnt, with the Beaks of which the Pulpit for Harangues was adorned, and from then cetook the Name Rostra: Naves inde longé, &c. Lib. VIII. Cap. XIV. Num. 8. 12. Or else the Romans must soon after have become less rigorous, with regard to the Antiates, and have suffered them to fit out Ships again, and to make Use of them in exercising Piracy. However it be, the Example is ill applied to our Author's Subject; because it relates to the putting a Stop to Hostilities on the Part of a dependent People, and not the aiding of Friends against an Enemy, over whom one has no Authority.

[a] See above, B. 1. c. 5.

[1] Homo in adjutorium mutuum generatus est. De Ira, Lib. I. Cap. V.

- [2] Ἔχει γὰρ καταφυγῆν, &c.
Supplic. Ver. 267. & seqq. The Passage quoted here by our Author from St. AMBROSE has been already recited above, B. I. Chap. II. § 10. Num. 5. Note 18.
- [1] Our Author cites here in the Margin, Lib. IV. De Legibus, in which there is nothing like this. He meant to refer to the ninth Book, where however the Law is not general, as he makes it. The Philosopher speaks of those, who seeing a Son in his right Senses beat his Father or Mother, his Grandfather or Grandmother, do not aid the Person treated with so much Indignity by another, who on the contrary owed him all kind of Respect, p. 881. B. He had said the same Thing in the preceding Page, with some Modification, of those who see any one beaten by a Person twenty Years younger, or less.
- [2] The Rabbins are also for having such a Man punished. See MOSES DE KOTZI, Praecept. jubent. LXXXVII. LXXX. vetant. CLXIV. CLXV. GROTIUS.
- [3] It was a capital Crime, whether they found a Man in danger of being killed upon the Highway, or treated cruelly in any other Manner. DIOD. Biblioth. Histor. Lib. I. Cap. LXXVII. p. 49. Edit. H. Steph.
- [4] Qui autem non defendit, nec obsistit, si potest, injuriae, tam est in vitio, quam si parentes, aut amicos, aut patriam deserat. De Offic. Lib. I. Cap. VII.
- [5] Non defendi homines sine vituperatione fortasse possunt. This we find in AMMIANUS MARCELLINUS, Lib. XXX. Cap. IV. p. 643. tho' the Passage is not amongst the Fragments, which have been collected of the last Words of CICERO. The other Passage from SALLUST is the beginning of Mithridates's Letter to Arsaces, King of Persia: Omnes qui secundis rebus, &c. Frag. Lib. IV. Num. 2.
- [6] Succurram perituro, &c. De Benefic. Lib. II. Cap. XV. The same Philosopher says in another Place, that one would defend a Person of Merit at the Expence of his own Blood, and even as to a Person of no Merit, if by crying out one could deliver him from Robbers he would willingly exert his Voice to preserve a Man's Life: Dignum etiam impendio sanguinis, &c. Lib. I. Cap. X. See what is said above, B. II. Chap. I. §8. GROTIUS.
- [a] Lessius, l. 2. c. 4. Dub. 15.
- [7] This is founded upon a Principle we have refuted elsewhere. It is certainly better to save the Life of an innocent Man, than that of a Criminal.
- [1] The Herald Copraeus demanded on the Part of Eurystheus the Heraclidae to be delivered up; who had taken Refuge at Athens, and had been, as he says, condemned to die in their own Country. To which he adds, that every Prince has a Right to execute Justice upon his own Subjects, Ver. 143, 144.
- [a] Ex Euripid. Frag. Phoenic. apud Barnes, v. 19, 20.
- [b] See B. 1. c. 3. §6.n.1.
- [c] Aeneid. l. 1. v. 142.
- [d] Metamor. l. 14. v. 784, 785.
- [e] Hippolyt. coron. v. 1328. & seqq.
- [2] Qui [Poetae] mundum in tres ferunt esse divisum, &c. Offic. Lib. I. Cap. XIII. in fin.
- [3] It relates to Allies and not Subjects. The Orator of the Corinthians says, that every State had a Right to revenge the Injuries done it by its Allies. Lib. I. Cap. XLIII. Edit. Oxon.

[4] St. AUSTIN says, Lib. II. De libero Arbitrio: It is no Argument of Justice to punish People who are under another's Jurisdiction, because it is a Proof of a Man's Goodness to do Strangers a Kindness. PROCOPIUS, Vandal. I. ὑπάρχουσιν, &c. It is proper that every Man should look after his own Province, and not concern himself with Affairs of other States. GROTIUS.

This last Passage is in GELIMER's Answer to the Emperor JUSTINIAN's Letter, Cap. IX.

[5] In doubtful Cases the Presumption ought to be in Favour of the Sovereign. Otherwise a Handle would be given to other Powers for intermeddling in what passes out of their own Dominions.

[f] Fr. Victor. De Ind. rel. n. 15.

[6] This Busiris is said to have been King of Egypt; and to have sacrificed the Strangers who came into his Country to Jupiter. Thus he is represented in fabulous History. See APOLLODORUS, Biblioth. Lib. II. Cap. V. § 11. But some antient Authors justify him as to this Charge; and others maintain, that there never was such a Person as Busiris. See MARSHAM's Canon Chronicus, p. 50. 79. Edit. Lips.

[7] He was a very cruel Tyrant of Sicily, and was said to have eaten his own Son. See Dr. BENTLEY's learned Dissertation upon the Letters of Phalaris, p. 512, 513. Edit. 1699.

[8] This King of Thrace is said to have fed his Horses with human Flesh. See DIODORUS SICULUS, Lib. IV. Cap. XV. APOLLODORUS, Lib. II. Cap. V. § 8.

[9] Every Man, as Man, has a Right to claim the Aid of other Men, in Necessity, and every Person is obliged to give it him, if in his Power, by the Laws of Humanity. See PUFENDORF, Law of Nature and Nations, B. III. Chap. III. § 1. Now a Man, neither does, nor can, renounce those Laws by entering into Civil Society; tho' he may justly be supposed under an Engagement not to implore a foreign Aid for slight Injuries, or even great ones, that affect only few Persons. But when all the Subjects, or the major Part of them, groan under the Oppressions of a Tyrant; the Subjects, on the one Side, re-enter into all the Rights of natural Liberty, which authorizes them to seek Aid where ever they can find it; and on the other, those, who are in a Condition to give it them, without considerable Prejudice to themselves, not only may, but ought, to endeavour with all their Power to deliver the oppressed; for this is very Reason, that they are Men, and Members of human Society, of which Civil Societies are Parts.

[g] Victor. De Indis. Rel. p. 2. n. 13.

[h] See another Instance in the History of Pepin, apud Fredegar. in fin.

[i] B. 1. c. 4. § 11.

[10] This is what the Roman Law terms Defensor; a Term which our Author uses here, in Opposition to Procurator. See above, Chap. X. § 2. Num. 3.

[11] This Passage has been cited above, Chap. XX. § 41. Num 3.

[12] All the Editions of the Original have: Cum defensione innocentium conjuncta est. But it is plain the Author, or the Printers, have left out the Word Subditorum. For it is always supposed, that Strangers oppressed, or injured, are innocent.

[a] § 4. n. 2.

[b] Sylvest. in verbo Bellum, Part. 1. § 10 circa fin.

[1] Quod Plato ex Tyrtaeo probat. Our Author expresses himself thus after having cited the Verse only in Latin in these Words:

— — — Ibi fas, ubi plurima merces.

He does not point out the Place of PLATO's Works, which he had in his Thoughts, and which I shall here set down. There is not one Verse of TYRTAEUS in it, nor even a Thought of that Poet, that relates to the Application our Author makes of it. The Philosopher blames the Poet, because in his lofty Praises of Military Valour, he seems to have considered only that shewn against foreign Enemies. He avers, on the contrary, that those who signalize themselves in Civil Wars, are much the bravest; and alleges this Reason for his Opinion, that to preserve Fidelity and Integrity in the midst of such a War requires every kind of Virtue; whereas in a War against a foreign Enemy, a great Number, even of those who serve for Pay, will fight to the last Moment of their Lives, tho' most of them are only stupid, insolent, profligate Fellows, and the most imprudent of Mankind: Πιστός μὲν γὰρ καὶ ὑγίης, &c. De Legib. Lib. I. p. 630. B. Vol. II. Edit. H. Steph. In speaking of the Intrepidity of those mercenary Soldiers, the Philosopher uses the Word διαβάντες, by which, as HENRY STEPHENS observes, he alludes to the two following Verses of TYRTAEUS, which he explains in Terms not very poetical:

Ἄλλὰ τις εὖ διαβάς μενέτω ποσὶν ἀμφοτέρωσι

Στηρικθεὶς ἐπὶ γῆς, χεῖλος ὀδοῦσι δακῶν.

That is to say, "A Man of Courage, being well planted, stands firm upon his Legs, and bites his Lips with his Teeth." So that TYRTAEUS says nothing of Troops, that serve for Pay: It is PLATO, who speaks of them, without saying however, whether he blames or approves that Trade in itself; the Defects with which he reproaches them being applicable, according to him, only to most of them.

[2] That Prince says, the Aetolians were much in the wrong to complain, that he disturbed the Tranquillity of their Allies, as they themselves had at all Times, if not expressly authorized, at least connived at, their Youth's serving against their Allies; so that it was common to see Etolians in both Armies at War: An quod a sociis, &c. Liv. Lib. XXXII. Cap. XXXIV. Num. 5. See another antient Instance cited by our Author, Lib. III. Chap. XX. § 31. Note 1. And add here what the late Mr. BAYLE says of the Swiss in the Article Bullinger of his Diction. Hist. & Critic. Letter E. p. 696. B. Third Edition.

[3] Ἄγορὰ πολέμου, &c. which Passage our Author cites, and translates without saying from whence he takes it. But I have found it in PHILOSTRATUS, Vit. Sophist. Lib. I. Cap. XXII. And I observe that our Author has omitted the following Words, which clearly express the ill Repute of the Arcadians in regard to the Point in Question: Τοῖς κερτομένοις ἐπὶ τῷ μισθοφορεῖν Ἀρκάσιν ἀγορὰ πολέμου, &c. This Omission is the more remarkable, because, if we may believe the last Editor of PHILOSTRATUS, the Passage will not otherwise include what our Author finds in it; for he translates the last Words thus: The War is carried on every where, and none can blame the Arcadians on that Account: And instead of saying, That the Arcadians made a Market of War, DEMOSTHENES, whom the Sophist introduces speaking here, says, according to our learned Interpreter, that the Greeks make a Trade of the War amongst the Arcadians, by endeavouring to list them; whereas it was their Custom to endeavour to list themselves wherever they could. It will not be improper to add here a Passage, which I find in THUCYDIDES, and which confirms what is said there of the Arcadians. That Author observes, that the Arcadians were accustomed at all Times to engage in Wars against any Enemy whatsoever; and he says, that in the Syracusan War, there were auxiliary Troops of Mantineia, and other Parts of Arcadia, that served the Athenians even against those of their own Nation, who were in the Pay of the Corinthians, the Allies of the Syracusans, Lib. VII. Cap. LVII. Edit. Oxon.

[4] PLUTARCH expresses this in his Bacchides:

Suam qui auro vitam venditant.

GROTIUS.

The last Passage is not in the Comedy cited by our Author, and I doubt whether it is in any other Piece of that Poet. It is not cited in the Lexicon Plautinum of PAREUS, which is very exact in pointing out all the Passages, where there is any Expression in the least remarkable. But I remember a Thought very like it in MANILIUS, in regard to those who sold themselves to fight in the Shews of Gladiators:

Nunc caput in mortem vendunt & funus arenae.

Astronomic. Lib. IV. p. 87. Edit. Scalig. 1655. The second Greek Verse of ANTIPHANES is in STOBÆUS, where there is one before it, which, joined with it, makes the whole Passage, to be, That it is taking pay of Death, to hazard Life for the Means of living:

Τίς δ' οὐχὶ θανάτον μισθοφόρος ἄ φιλτατε ὅς ἔνεκα, &c.

Florileg. Tit. LIII. Our Author cited here also a Passage from SENECA, which however treats of something else. The Philosopher ridicules the Passion for amassing Riches at the hazard even of Life, in order to employ them in Things, which contribute to shorten Life: Magis ridebis, quum cogitaveris, vitâ parari ea, in quibus vita consumitur. Quaest. Natur. Lib. V. Cap. XVIII. in fine, Lib. & Cap.

[5] Καὶ τοὶ τί τοῦ ζῆν, &c. which the ingenious LA BRUYERE has expressed thus in his excellent CHARACTERS of the Age: There is nothing Men are more fond of preserving, and take less Care of, than their Lives, p. 362. Edit. de Brux. 1697.

[c] Bellinus, De re militari, par. 2. t. 2. n. 4.

[6] SENECA says, What can a Man call this but Madness? To carry our Dangers about us, and to invade People we know nothing of, to be angry without any Provocations to ruin and destroy all we meet with, and like so many wild Beasts, to murder a Man we have no Manner of Hatred against. Hoc vero quid aliud, &c. Lib. V. Cap. XVIII. A German Poet, describing those who serve thus without examining whether the War be just or unjust, says, that they seek nothing but Pay; that they change Sides according as it suits their Interest, and look upon, as Enemies, whomsoever those that pay them please:

*Aere dato conducta cohors, & bellica miles
Dona sequens, pretiosque suum mutare favorem
Suetus, & accepto pariter cum munere bello,
Hunc habuisse, dator pretii quem jusserit hostem.*

GUNTHER. Ligurin. (Lib. VII. p. 389. Edit. Raub.) GROTIUS.

[7] STOBÆUS has preserved this Saying in his Florilegium. Tit. XLIX.

[8] DIOD. SICUL. Bibl. Hist. Lib. XVIII. Cap. X. p. 632. Edit. H. Steph.

[9] This Passage is quoted before as St. AMBROSE's, B. I. Chap. II. § 10. Num. 5. Note 17.

[1] See PUFENDORF, Law of Nature and Nations, B. VII. Chap. V. § 5.

[a] Aegid. Reg. De Act. Super. Disput. 31. n. 80.

[a] Fr. Vict. De Jure Belli, n. 22.

[1] PLATO, Apolog. Socrat. (p. 29. D. Vol. I. Edit. H. Steph.) The Philosopher, Apollonius Tyanaeus, opposed the Edict of Nero, to prescribe Philosophy, with this Verse of SOPHOCLES, (Antigon. Ver. 456).

Ὅ γάρ τι μοι Ζεὺς ἦν κηρύξας τάδε.

This was not enjoined by Jupiter, (PHILOSTRAT. Vit. Apollon. Tyan. Lib. IV. Cap. XXXVIII. Edit. Olear.) GROTIUS.

[2] JOSEPHUS tells us, that some young People of his Nation, upon being asked by the General of Herod's Troops, why they had thrown down the golden Eagle, which that Prince had caused to be put up over the great Gate of the Temple; replied boldly, he ought not to be surprized that they chose rather to obey the Divine Laws of MOSES, by which the consecrating such Representations was prohibited, than the Decrees of Men. Antiq. Jud. Lib. XVII. See the Passage of a Rabbin cited by DRUSIUS upon Acts v. 29. GROTIUS.

[3] EUSEB. Hist. Eccles. Lib. IV. Cap. XV. See our Author's Treatise De Imperio Summar. Potestat. circa Sacra, Cap. V. § 5, 10, 11.

[4] St. CHRYSOSTOM explains this Passage in the LORD, thus, τουτέστιν ἐν οἷς μὴ προσκρούσης Θεῷ, That is in those Things you do not offend GOD by. And in his Letter ad Patrem infidelem, ὅ γάρ δὴ μικρὸς, &c. For it is no small Reward that is designed us if we honour our Parents, whom we are commanded to regard as our Lords and Masters, and to obey both in Words and Actions, provided they order us nothing that is prejudicial to Religion. It is thus that you must understand that of St. JEROME, Per calcatum perge Patrem, Go on tho' over the Belly of thy Father; which is a rhetorical Expression, borrowed from the Rhetorician Latro, in SENECA; and thus too what you have in St. AMBROSE, De Virginitate, and in St. AUSTIN, Epist. XXXVIII. Ad Laetum, and in the fourth Canon of the first Council of Nice, according to the Arabick Translation. GROTIUS.

[5] Peccatum filiorum est, Vol. IX. p. 237. C. Edit. Froben.

[6] St. CHRYSOSTOM, 1 Cor. vii. 24. Καὶ γὰρ εἰσιν, &c. For the Servant too has his Limits prescribed him by GOD. And it is particularly enjoined him how far to go, beyond which he must never pass. For when his Master commands him nothing disapproved of GOD, he is to be punctually followed and obeyed, but no farther. And CLEMENS ALEXANDRINUS speaking of a good Wife, πάντα τῷ ἄνδρϊ, &c. She complies with her Husband in every Respect, nor does she do any Thing against his Inclinations, unless what she thinks may be of some Consequence in regard to Virtue and her own Salvation. GROTIUS.

The Passage of CLEMENS ALEXANDRINUS is in his Stromata, Lib. IV. Cap. XIX. p. 620, Edit. Oxon. Potter.

[b] De Idol. c. 15.

[7] See some illustrious Examples, both of Punishment and Commendation, in 1 Sam. xxii. 18, 19. 1 Kings xviii. 4. 13. 2 Kings i. 10, 12, 14. And among Christians, Manuel and George refused to execute the Order for killing Augusta, NICETAS in his Life of Alexius, Manuel's Son. (Cap. XVI.) GROTIUS.

- [8] Idcirco Leges Romanos, &c. In Martyrolog.
- [9] CR. Πῶς; τὸν τεταλμένον οὐ δίκαιον ἐκτελεῖν;
ANT. Οὐκ, ἦν πονηρὰ τ' ἢ κακῶς τ' εἰρημένα.
Supplic. Ver. 1642, 1643.
- [c] These Words are in Stobaeus, and are part of a pretty long Discourse, in which the Subject is treated at large. Florileg. Tit. 72. The Original is εἴσατε, &c. p. 458. Edit. Gesner. 1549.
- [10] There are two noble Instances among the Heathens, of some who would not obey their Princes in a dishonest Action, that of Papinian is sufficiently celebrated, and the other is of Helpidius in AMMIANUS XXI. And Severus would not pardon those who had killed a Senator, tho' by the Emperor's Orders. See XIPHILINUS. GROTIUS.
The Emperor Caracalla having caused his Brother Geta to be put to Death, would have obliged Papinian, as some say, to compose a Discourse, to excuse that Murder before the Senate or People. But the Lawyer replied, That it was not so easy to excuse, as to commit a Parricide; and that it was a second Parricide, after having deprived an innocent Person of his Life, to accuse him of Crimes, and to endeavour to blast his Memory. SPARTIAN, in Antonin. Caracalla, Cap. VIII. IX. As to the second Instance, Constantius having commanded the Captain of the Life-Guard to put an innocent Person to the Rack, he refused it, desiring the Emperor to dismiss him from his Office, and give that Commission to another. This Helpidius was not a Pagan, as our Author supposes, but a Christian. See VALOIS upon the Passage here quoted. In regard to Severus, he decreed, that whoever killed a Senator, whether the Emperor, or any one by his Order, himself and his Children should be deemed Enemies of the State.
- [11] Neque autem illa [sententia] &c. Noct. Attic. Lib. II. Cap. VII.
- [12] Non omnibus imperiis parendum est, &c. Lib. I. Controvers. I. p. 80.
- [13] Ergo non omnia necesse est facere liberis, &c. Declam. CCLXXI.
The same Author maintains, that the Gratitude we owe a Father and Mother, does not oblige us to do every Thing they command; for at that rate, Kindnesses would be very burthensome and dangerous, since they would reduce us to the Necessity of committing even Crimes: Non omnia esse praestanda, etiam parentibus, &c. Declam. CCCXXXIII.
- [14] PLUTARCH. Vit. Demet. Vol. I. p. 899, 900. Such was the Bond Andronicus Comnenus demanded of Basilius Camaterus, ἐκείνα ἐν τῷ ἀρχιερατεύειν, &c. That in his patriarchal Office he should do every Thing that Andronicus had a Mind to, however unlawful it was, and that on the other Hand he should do nothing but what Andronicus pleased. NICETAS CHONIAT. In Alex. Comnen. (Cap. XIV.) GROTIUS.
- [15] Horum antequam crimina, &c. Lib. III. Epist. IX. (Num. 14. Edit. Cellar.) TERTULLIAN says, that he who commands an evil Action, deserves Punishment more than the Person who commits it; since the latter himself is not to be excused, tho' he acts only in Obedience to the other's Commands: Plus caeditur, qui jubet, quando nec qui obsequitur, excusatur. De Anima, (Cap. XL.) He observes elsewhere, that Justice is never more perfectly exercised amongst Men, than when it searches out those, who were only the Instruments in an Action, in order to their being punished or rewarded as well as the Authors of it who made use of their Service: Quum humana Censura, &c. De Resurrectione Carnis, (Cap. XV.) See GAILLIUS, De Pace publica, Lib. I. Cap. IV. Num. 14. GROTIUS.

[16] Ad ea, quae non habent atrocitatem, &c. Digest. Lib. L. Tit. XVII. De divers. reg. Juris. Leg. CLVII. There is another Law, which supposes, that a Master commands his Slave to kill a Man, to rob, or commit Piracy: Servus non in omnibus rebus, sine poena, domino dicto, &c. Leg. XLIV. Tit. VII. De obligat. & action. Leg. XX. See Mr. NOODT, Ad Legem. Aquil. Cap. X. and Observat. Lib. II. Cap. XIV.

[17] Neque in ulla [lege] praeteritum tempus, &c. In Verr. Lib. I. Cap. XIV.

[18] Maleficia sponte, &c. In hoc loc.

[d] Contr. Apion. l. 1. p. 1048, 1049.

[19] In the Persuasion, that the Jewish Soldiers were in, that they should violate their Law, in serving as Workmen to carry Earth for rebuilding the Temple of a false God, their Resolution was undeniably laudable. But to consider the Thing in itself, I do not know whether their Scruple was not ill founded. Indeed, if before the Babylonish Captivity, a King of Israel or Judah had designed to erect a Temple in his Dominions to some false Divinity, his Subjects might have refused all Labour necessary for building such an Edifice; because in doing that Office, they would have contributed to the Introduction of Idolatry in a Country, from which GOD would have it entirely banished. And therefore Uriah the Priest, of whom the Scripture speaks, did wrong to execute the Order of Ahaz, in building him an Altar after the Model of that he had seen at Damascus, 2 Kings xvi. 10, &c. But here the Case is different. Idolatry had reigned long at Babylon, and would no less have reigned tho' some Jewish Soldiers had refused to carry Stones or Earth; that is to say, to do a Thing indifferent in itself, by the Order of a Prince, in whose Service they were. Besides, Alexander did not require this of them, as a Token of their abjuring Judaism; he demanded it as a Duty purely civil. So that they ought to have made no more Difficulty of carrying Stones or Earth for rebuilding the Temple of Belus, than Naaman, the Syrian, did, with the Prophet Elisha's Approbation, of accompanying the King of Syria in the Temple of Rimmon, and of bowing himself down to let his Master lean upon him.

[e] B. l. c. 4. §7. n. 9. & seq.

[20] For Julian did not altogether abstain from offering Violence to the Christians, especially when he thought he had some Colour for it. He is called in St. JEROME's Epitaph. Nepotiani, (p. 26. Tom. I. Edit. Froben.) Julian, the Butcher of the Christian Army. And St. AUSTIN, Lib. I. Cap. XXXIII. relates, that the Persecution at Antioch was begun by his Order, and that a certain Youth was put to the Rack. In the Martyrologies, there is mention made of St. Eliphius a Scot, and thirty three of his Companions beheaded by Julian's Order, between the Cities of Toul and Grand. See also JOANNES ANTIOCHENUS, in Exc. ex MS. Peiresc. St. AUSTIN, Epist. L. Ad Bonifacium, cited by GRATIAN, Caus. XI. Quaest. III. Julian was an unbelieving Prince, was he not an Apostate and an Idolater? Christian Soldiers served an Infidel Emperor, but when they came to the Cause of Christ, they acknowledged no Sovereign but him in Heaven: When he was for having them worship and offer Incense to Idols, they preferred GOD before him. GROTIUS.

[21] This Passage, which is not in St. AMBROSE, has been cited above, B. I. Chap. II. § 10. Num. 9. Note 38. where my Observation upon it may be seen. But St. AUSTIN has something very like it, which our Author cited at the End of the preceding Note: JULIANUS, Exstitit infidelis Imperator, &c. Which our Author quotes from Lett. L. of that Father to Boniface; and he adds, that the Passage is inserted in Jus Canonic. Caus. XI. Quaest. III. Can. XCVIII. But GRATIAN gives it us, as from the Commentary on the Book of Psalms: And we are referred in the Margin to Psalms cxxiv.

[22] The Word falso, or one of the same Signification has been omitted here in all the Editions of the Original.

[f] Victor. De Jure Belli, n. 23.

[1] St. CHRYSOSTOME, De Providentia III. πολλοὶ γοῦν ἀρχόντων, &c. Many a Magistrate being impeached of putting People unjustly to Death has been punished, but Nobody ever indicted the Executioner, who was employed in the Murder, tho' the very Person whose Hands committed it, nor ever inquired after him, because the Necessity he was under excuses him as well by the Dignity of his Principal as his own Subjection. And ULPIAN out of CELSUS says, That a Servant is in no Manner of Fault who only obeys his Master, Lib. II. D. De Nox. Act. He is supposed to do it against his Inclinations, who only complies with his Father's or his Master's Order. D. De regulis Juris, and CUJACIUS there. SENECA: There is Force upon a Person who is willing. Add the Lombard Law, Lib. I. Tit. IV. Chap. II. Mithridates dismissed Attilius's freed Man unpunished, tho' guilty of an intended Murder against him, and the Friends of his Son who had revolted from him. APPIANUS, Mithridatic. And Tiberius Gracchus was acquitted from the Crime of the Numantian Treaty, because it was by another's Command that he had offended. GROTIUS.

[2] Is damnum dat qui jubet dare: ejus vero nulla culpa est, cui parere necesse est. Digest, Lib. L. Tit. XVII. De diversis Reg. Jur. Leg. CLXIX. Liber homo, si jussu alterius, Lib. IX. Tit. II. Ad Leg. Aquil. Leg. XXXVII. init. QUI jussu judicis, &c. De diversis Reg. Jur. Leg. CLXVII. § 1. GROTIUS.

[3] He puts the Slave acting by his Master's Orders in the same Class with in animate Things used in killing, for Instance, or the Hand by which one strikes, Cap. XII. He expressly in another Place calls Slaves, animate Instruments, and Instruments, inanimate Slaves: Ὁ γὰρ ἀνθρώπος, ἔμψυχον ὄργανον· τὸ δ' ὄργανον, ἀψυχον ἀνθρώπος, Lib. VIII. Cap. XIII.

[4] This, in my Opinion, is what our Author means by these Words: In famulo vis deliberatrix non est; as when he says above of Infants very young, that they have not vis electrica, Chap. V. of this Book, § 2. num. 1. And from this want of Judgment it is supposed, according to him, that Slaves have not the Liberty to deliberate upon what their Master's command, in order to know whether it be just or not. Hence, when he afterwards applies this Maxim to Children even at Years of Discretion, and to Subjects, his Thought is, that according to those whose Opinion he relates, a Son does not know, so well as his Father, what he ought, or ought not to do; and that Subjects have not a sufficient Knowledge of the Affairs of Government, to inter-meddle in judging of what the Sovereign commands. For which Reason the Orator THEMISTIUS, (Orat. IX.) speaking of War, compares Princes to Reason, and Soldiers, who serve under him, to Anger, as our Author observes a little lower in a short Note. It is indeed often but not always so.

[5] This Verse is in the Treatise of PHILO Judaeus intitled, Every good Man is free, p. 871. D. Edit. Paris. For the others, he has apparently taken the first from LONGINUS, who quotes it as HOMER's, Sect. XLIII. That Rhetorician had a Passage of the Odyssey in View, Lib. XVII. Ver. 322, 323.

Ἦμισυ γάρ τ' ἀρετῆς ἀποαίνονται εὐρύοπα Ζεὺς

Ἄνθρωπος, εἴτ' ἂν μιν κατὰ δούλιον ἦμαρ ἔλθῃσιν.

These are without Doubt the two Verses our Author gives as different from the first, tho' like it, without mentioning from whence he has them. He had read them in PLATO, who quotes them exactly in the same Manner, De legibus, Lib. VI. p. 777. A. Vol. II. Edit. H. Steph. The Sense is indeed much the same.

- [6] He puts this into the Mouth of a Roman Knight speaking to Tiberius: Tibi summum rerum judicium Dii dedere: Nobis obsequii gloria relicta est. Annal. Lib. VI. Cap. VIII. Num. 5.
- [7] Post quae Tiberius adolescentem [Pisonem] crimine, &c. Annal. Lib. III. Cap. XVII. Num. 1.
- [8] Servus herilis imperii non censor est, sed minister, Lib. III. Excerpt. Controv. IX.
- [9] Quum ergo vir justus, &c. Contra Faust. Lib. XXII. Cap. LXXV.
- [10] The same St. AUSTIN in his first Book De libero Arbitrio. If killing a Man be Murder, Murder may sometimes be committed without a Crime; for a Soldier who kills his Enemy, and a Judge or the Executioner who kills a Malefactor, and he who unawares and without Design lets a Weapon fall out of his Hand, do not seem to me to be any Ways to blame, when they kill a Man: Nor indeed is it usual to call such People Murderers. GRATIANUS has inserted this in Caus. XXIII. Quaest. V. GROTIUS.
- [a] Sylv. verb. Bellum, part 1. n. 9. Qu. 4. Cast. in Digest. De Just. & Jure, Leg. 5. Soto, l. 5. Q. 1. Art. 7. and Q. 3. Art. 3. Vict. De Jure Bell. n. 32. Covar. Ad Cap. peccatum, part 2. § 10. n. 6.

[11] Our Author here cites two half Verses, without saying from whence he has them.

— — — Quis justius indicit arma,
Scire nefas. — — —

LUCAN says this is in regard to the War between Caesar and Pompey. Pharsal. Lib. I. Ver. 126, 127. The Reason he alledges for this Uncertainty is, that the Gods declared for Caesar, but wise Cato for Pompey:

— — — Magno se judice quisque tuetur:
Victrix caussa Diis placuit, sed victa Catoni.

A Thought which has been censured with Reason, as too bold, and injurious to the Divinity.

[b] Quaest. Quod. l. 2.

[c] See Instances of other Authors, who follow this Opinion, in Lambert. Scafnaburgensis.

[12] This is Right, when Men are at Liberty either to enter, or not to enter, into a War. But here it is necessary to compare the Uncertainty in regard to the Justice of the War, with the evident Obligation to obey a legal Superior. So that the safest Course is to obey; because no one can doubt his being obliged to obey him, who commands, and that his Command may have nothing unjust in it, tho' he is not assured that it is entirely just. Upon the Whole as to those Things, concerning the Justice of which there is some Reason to be doubtful, all honest and legal Methods should be tried, to prevent the Sovereign from resolving to lay us under the Necessity of doing them. See further what PUFENDORF says upon this Question, B. VIII. Chap. I. § 8. or last.

[13] JOSEPHUS, De Bell. Jud. Lib. II. Cap. XII. p. 786. E. PORPHYRIUS has exactly the same Words, De abstin. Animal. Lib. IV. p. 388. Edit. Lugd. 1620.

[14] See what is said above, Chap. II. of this Book, § 2. Note 4.

[15] De Vita Pythagor. § 186. Edit. Kuster.

[d] Bald. ii. Cons. 385. Sotus, de det. Secr. Membr. 3. q. 2. in Resp. ad 1.

[16] But the Slaughter made in a just War, and by the Necessity of War, not being actual Homicide, and in the present Case the Subject not being assured that the War is unjust, the least Evil on the contrary, is Obedience.

[17] I cannot tell in what Work of the Antients our Author has found this Circumstance, and he had done better not to have alledged it; because, as OBRECHT observes upon it, the Example is not to the Purpose. Mercury might and ought to have known, that Jupiter's Order was manifestly unjust; Argus being guilty of nothing but serving Juno, in her Design of preventing the criminal Gallantries of her Husband.

[18]

Antoni tamen est pejor, quam causa Pothini: Hic facinus domino praestitit, ille sibi.

Epigr. Lib. III. Ep. LXVI. ver. 5, 6.

This Example is still worse applied than the former. For every Body knows it was Pothinus himself who inspired King Ptolemey with the Design of causing Pompey to be assassinated, solely to ingratiate himself with Caesar.

[e] Victor. de jure belli. n. 25.

[19] But besides that, it may happen, as BOECLER observes, (Diss. de Religione Mandati) that it may not be proper to alledge immediately the principal justifying Reasons; those Reasons, however clear, may be such that the greatest Part of the Subjects, and those for whom there may be most Occasion, will not be capable of conceiving their whole Force, on Account of the very Subject which requires Discussions above their Reach. Hence it would be easy for them to form Scruples, or to frame Pretexts from them for their Laziness, and Inclination to disobey. In general it is dangerous to admit, that a simple Doubt may dispense with Obedience to a lawful Superior; and it suffices to grant this Dispensation in Cases where the Injustice of the Command is evident and undeniable. It is just, where that is doubtful, that the Presumption should be in Favour of the Superior.

[20] Neque civis fideliter, &c. Apologet. Cap. IV. See also Ad Nationes, Lib. I. Cap. VI.

[21]

— — — *Quae Danais tanti primordia belli,
Ede: libet justas hinc sumere protinus iras.*

Achilleid. Lib. II. ver. 332, 333.

[22]

Ite, alacres, tantaeque, precor, confidite caussae.

The baid. Lib. XII. ver. 648.

[23] I have already quoted the Passage, upon our Author's Preliminary Discourse, § 28. Note 2.

[24] That Panegyrist is NAZARIUS, in his Panegyrick on Constantine, which is the ninth in the Collection which has been made of this Kind of Pieces. The Passage is, Tantum etiam inter arma bona conscientia sibi vindicat, ut jam coeperit non virtutis magis, quam

[25] Some strain the Word הניכיר, Trained, to the same Sense, and interpret it, Informed by him. Herod, in an Harangue to the Jews, after the Defeat in Arabia, is introduced, by JOSEPHUS, saying Βούλομαι δὲ πρῶτον, &c. I am willing first to shew you how justly we entered into this War, being necessitated to it from the Insults of our Enemies. For if you understood this, it must needs be a very great Incitement to your Courage. GROTIUS.

The Sense which the Interpreters our Author speaks of, give to the Words of the Book of Genesis, is not well founded. There is great Reason to believe that the sacred Historian intended to say only, that Abraham led his People armed, or provided with Arms to Battle. See Mr. LE CLERC upon that Place.

[26] In his Politicks, Lib. III. Cap. III. p. 268. Edit. Heinsii.

[f] Aegid. Reg. de Act. supern. Disp. 31. Dub. 5. n. 85. Bannes ii. 2. qu. 40. Molina, Tract. 2. Disp. 113.

[27] This indeed, if it could be, were always best. But Executioners are generally such Sort of People, that it is impossible they should judge whether a Sentence be just or not. It is sufficient therefore to say, that they ought not to lend their Arm in an Execution commanded them, when convinced, or when they may be convinced, of the Innocence of the Person condemned, either by Proofs of Fact in which they cannot be deceived, or by Reasons of Right within their Comprehension. See what I have said of Officers and Serjeants, PUFENDORF, Law of Nature and Nations, B. VIII. Chap. I. § 6. Note 4.

[28] And therefore Saul's Servants, who had more Honesty and Goodness in them than Doeg, would not kill the Priests of Nob, 1 Sam. xxii.17. And Ahab's third Captain refused to hurt Elijah, 2 Kings i. 13, &c. And some Executioners converted to Christianity, did, for the future, renounce that Office, as a very dangerous Employment. See the Martyrology and Bede, Lib. I. Cap. VII. GROTIUS.

[1] But as HENNIGES, one of the Commentators upon this Work, observes here, if the Prince has no Right to compel his Subjects to serve when they doubt the Justice of his Arms, he will neither have a Right to impose Subsidies upon them for carrying on the War. The Subjects who, admitting this Supposition, ought not to serve him with their Arms, can neither in Conscience assist him with their Estates; as no Aid whatsoever ought to be supplied for the Execution of a bad Action.

[2] It would be well indeed, not to press any one as long as a sufficient Number of Soldiers are to be had, whether Natives or Foreigners, who would list voluntarily. But, as Troops may happen to be wanting, the State would find itself without Defence, if the Sovereign were never permitted to press his Subjects, tho' his Cause for taking Arms be never so just. Mr. BUDDEUS, who believes, in other Respects, with our Author, that a Subject who doubts, ought not to take up Arms for the Service of his Prince; maintains, however, that when the Justice of the War is clear, the Prince may compel his Subjects to march. See the Dissertation, De Officio Imperantium circa conscribendum militem, amongst the Selecta Juris Nat. & Gentium. Wherein I do not know whether the Principles of this ingenious Author are sufficiently consistent with themselves. For however well founded a Prince may believe his justifying Reasons to be, and tho' they are so in effect; yet should his Subjects say, that they do not find them so, and that they doubt of their Solidity; as every Man is the sole Judge of what passes in his own Conscience, no one could ever convict them, that they were fully satisfied with Regard to the Justice of the Cause, and consequently, they could never justly be forced to serve. The Truth is, that by a necessary Consequence of the very Nature of Civil Societies, the Sovereign has a full Right to oblige his Subjects to carry Arms, when he determines to undertake a War by justifying Reasons of the utmost Evidence, and he cannot find elsewhere a sufficient Number of People who will list voluntarily; and is not obliged to have any Regard to the Scruples of those whose Service is absolutely necessary to him. But I believe it will very seldom happen, that Subjects will be convinced a Cause is unjust, when the Justice of it is evident. The most simple can hardly more than doubt in that Case; and Doubt, in my Opinion, does not exempt from Obedience. Upon the Whole, the Conflict which might arise between some Mens Rights of Conscience, and the Rights of the Sovereign, might authorize such Men to refuse Obedience; but could not hinder the Sovereign from maintaining his Authority. The Good of the State ought not to be sacrificed to vain Scruples.

[3] This is founded upon the Distinction of Counsels and Precepts, which we have refuted elsewhere, B. I. Chap. II. §9. Note 19. On the contrary it may be said, that to desire to be dispensed with from the War, when it is necessary, as we always suppose it, with our Author, is not only Cowardise, but Want of Charity, or rather a Violation of the Engagements every Citizen, as such, is under, to defend his Country.

[4] Contra Celsum, Lib. VIII. p. 427. Edit Cantab.

[a] See B. iii. ch. 1. § 4.

H. GROTIUS, OF THE RIGHTS OF WAR AND PEACE.

BOOK III

CHAPTER I ↩

Certain General Rules, shewing what, by the Law of Nature, is allowable in War; where also the Author treats of Deceit and Lying.

I. We have already seen, not only who may make War, but for what Reasons too they are permitted to engage in it. We are now to enquire [1] what is allowable in War, and how far, and in what Circumstances it is so. And this we must consider, either simply in itself, or with Regard to some antecedent Promise. What is simply in itself allowable in War, shall be considered first from the Law of Nature, and then from that of Nations. To begin with what Nature allows.

I. The Subject and Design of this Book.

II. 1. And here we must observe, First, That in Things of a moral Nature, as we have often said before, [1] those [a] Means which conduce to a certain End, do assume the very Nature of that End: And therefore we are supposed to be authorised to employ those [517] Things, which are (in a moral, not a physical Sense) [2] necessary to the obtaining our just Rights. By Right I understand what is strictly so called, and imports that [3] Power of acting which is intirely founded on the Good of Society. Wherefore, as we have remarked elsewhere, [b] if I cannot otherwise save my Life, I may, by any Force whatever, repel him who attempts it, tho', perhaps, he who does so is not any ways to blame. Because this Right does not properly arise from the other's Crime, but from that Prerogative with which Nature has invested me, of defending myself.

II. In War all Things necessary to the End are lawful.

2. By which also I am impowered to invade and seize upon what belongs to another, without considering whether he be in fault or no, whenever what is his threatens me [c] with any imminent Danger; but I am not to claim a Property in it, for that is not necessary to the End in Question, but only to detain it till my Security be sufficiently provided for; as we have elsewhere [d] declared. So by the Law of Nature I have a Right to take from any one what he has of mine, [4] and if this cannot easily be effected, I may take what is equivalent to it; and [e] this I may do too for the Recovery of Debt. And in those Cases I become Proprietor of what I have taken, because there is no other Way of redressing the Inequality that was to my Disadvantage.

3. So likewise where the Punishment is just, there all Manner of Violence and Force, and whatever is a Means necessary to execute that Punishment, or is a Part of it, is just too; as Devastations by Fire, or otherwise, provided that they exceed not the Bounds of Equity, but bear a Proportion to the Offence committed.

III. We must remember, Secondly, That this our Right is not to be accounted for only by the first Occasion of the War, but also from other subsequent Causes; as in a Suit of Law, where the contending Party does often acquire and find out a new Right, after the Process is commenced, which was not thought of before. Thus they, who join with him that invades me, whether they be Allies or Subjects, do give me a Right of defending myself against them likewise. Thus they who engage with others in an unjust War, especially in a War which they might or ought to have known to be unjust, are thereby obliged to reimburse the Charges, and to repair the Damages of it, because it is through their Fault that they are sustained. Thus too, those who come into the Measures of a War, undertaken without any warrantable Reason, are themselves culpable, and obnoxious to Punishment, in Proportion to the Injustice that accompanies their so doing; according to Plato's [1] Opinion, who justifies the Continuance of a War, Till the Guilty are compelled to undergo the Punishment which the Party offended shall inflict upon them.

III. What is lawful and right does not arise only from the Occasion of the War, but also from incident Causes in the Course of it.

IV. 1. We must observe, Thirdly, [1] That many Things sometimes fall in indirectly, and beyond our Design, to be lawful to us, to which, in the Nature of the Things, simply considered, we have no Pretence. How this holds good in the Case of Self-Defence, we have elsewhere [a] shewn. Thus, in the getting of our own, [b] if just so much as is precisely our Due, cannot be had, we have a Right to take more, but under the Obligation of restoring the Value of the Overplus. Thus a Ship full of Pirates, or a House of Thieves, may be sunk and fired, tho' within the Ship, or the House, there may be Children, or Women, or other innocent Persons, who from such an Assault must needs be exposed to manifest [518] Danger. [2] Nor is he guilty of Murder, says St. Austin, who has inclosed his Estate with a Wall, if any one by the Fall of it shall be wounded and die.

IV. Some Things may by Consequence be acted without any Injustice, which would be no Ways lawful had they been purposely and originally designed.

2. But, as we have frequently advised before, every Thing that is conformable to Right properly so called, is not always absolutely lawful; for sometimes our Charity to our Neighbour will not suffer us to use this rigorous Right. Wherefore, in such Cases, we ought to take all possible Care to prevent all such Accidents, which may fall out beyond what we aim at; unless the Good we design be far greater than the Evil we fear, or unless, where the Good and the Evil being equal, our Hopes of obtaining the Good be greater than our Fears of the Evil, which Prudence must determine; yet so, that always in a doubtful Case we incline, as the safer Side, to that Part which provides rather for another's Advantage than our own. Let the Tares grow up, (says our best Teacher, Matt. xiii. 29.) lest whilst you gather up them, ye root up also the Wheat with them. [3] To destroy whole Multitudes, says Seneca, without Distinction, looks like the Rage of Fire, or the Fall of Buildings. History tells us how much Sorrow and Repentance such an immoderate Revenge cost the Emperor Theodosius, upon the Reproof of St. Ambrose.

3. Nor tho' GOD does so sometimes, ought it to be an Example to us, because of that absolute Right of Dominion which he has over us, which he has not granted us to have over one another, as [c] I have observed elsewhere. And yet even GOD himself, who is the just Sovereign of Mankind, does often spare a Multitude of wicked Men, for the Sake of a Few that are good; thereby declaring his Equity, as he is a Judge; as fully appears from Abraham's interceding with GOD for Sodom. (Gen. xviii. 23.) And from these general Rules we may easily perceive, how far our Right extends against our Enemies, by the Law of Nature.

V. 1. Here also there uses to arise another Question, what we may lawfully do to those, who are not our Enemies, nor are willing to be thought so, and yet supply our Enemies with certain Things. There have been formerly, and still are, great Disputes about this Matter, some contending for the Rigour of the Laws of War, and others for a Freedom of Commerce.

V. What we may do against them that supply our Enemies with Necessaries, explained by Distinction.

2. But first we must distinguish between the Things themselves. For there are some Things which are of use only in War, as Arms, &c. Some that are of no Use in War, as those that serve only for Pleasure; and lastly, there are some Things that are useful both in Peace and War, as Money, Provisions, [1] Ships, and naval Stores. Concerning the first, (viz. Things useful only in War) it is true what [2] Amalasontha said to the Emperor Justinian, he is to be reputed as siding with the Enemy, who supplies him with Things necessary for War. As to the second Sort of Things, there is no just Cause of Complaint. Thus Seneca says, [3] I will be grateful to a Tyrant, [a] if what I present him with neither encreases, nor confirms his Power of ruining the State, for such Things a Man may give him without contributing to the common Calamity; which he thus explains, I will not supply him with Money to [519] pay his Guards, but if he wants Marble, or Robes of State, I shall injure nobody, by procuring him such Things, to gratify his Luxury. I will supply him with neither Soldiers, nor Arms; but if he will take it as a Kindness, I will help him to Comedians, and other Things that may contribute to the softening of his fierce Temper. I would not send him Gallies and Men of War, but I would procure him Pleasure Boats, Galliot, and other such Vessels, for Diversion and Recreation. So also Saint Ambrose, [4] It is not a commendable Liberality to assist him that conspires against his own Country.

3. As to the third Sort [b] of Things that are useful at all Times, we must distinguish the present State of the War. For if I cannot defend myself without intercepting those Things that are sent to my Enemy, Necessity [5] (as I said [c] before) will give me a good Right to them, but upon Condition of Restitution, unless I have just Cause to the contrary. But if the Supply sent hinder the Execution of my Designs, and the Sender might have known as much; as if I have besieged a Town, or blocked up a Port, and thereupon I quickly expect a Surrender, or a Peace, that Sender is obliged to make me Satisfaction for the Damage [d] that I suffer upon his Account, as much as he that shall take a Prisoner out of Custody, that was committed for a just Debt, or helps him to make his Escape, in order to cheat me; and proportionably to my Loss I may seize on his Goods, and take them as my own, for recovering what he owes me. If he did not actually do me any Damage, but only designed it, then have I a Right, by detaining those Supplies, to oblige him to give me Security for the future, by Pledges, Hostages, or the like. But further, if the Wrongs done to me by the Enemy be openly unjust, and he by those Supplies puts him in a Condition to maintain his unjust War, then shall he not only be obliged to repair my Loss, but also be treated as a Criminal, as one that rescues a notorious Convict out of the Hands of Justice; and in this Case it shall be lawful for me to deal with him agreeably to his Offence, according to those Rules which we have set down for Punishments; and for that Purpose I may deprive him even of his Goods.

4. For these Reasons, those that make War [6] publish Manifesto's, and send out Declarations to other Nations, as well to signify the Justice of their Cause, as also what probable Hopes they have to obtain their Right.

[520]

5. Now the Reason why we refer this Case to the Law of Nature, is [7] because we find nothing in Histories decreed by the voluntary Law of Nations concerning it. [521] The Carthaginians sometimes took the Romans Prisoners, who carried Provisions to their Enemies, [e] but upon demand set them at Liberty. When Demetrius had entered Attica with an Army, and had taken the adjoining Towns of Eleusis, and Rhamnus, [f] designing to starve Athens, he took a Ship, attempting to relieve it, with Provisions, [8] and hanged up the Master and Pilot of it, and by that Means deterring others from doing the like, he quickly took the City.

VI. 1. As to the manner of acting against an Enemy; Force and Terror are the proper Characteristick of War, and the Method most commonly used: The Query is, whether Deceit be lawful; for Homer said an Enemy might be annoyed, VI. Whether Fraud be lawful in War.

[1] ἢ δόλῳ ἢ ἐ βίῃ, ἢ ἄμφιδόθεν, ἢ κρυφῶς,

By Fraud, or Force, openly or secretly.

And Pindar, [2]

Χρῆ δὲ πᾶν ἔρ — δόντ' ἄμεινον εἶναι τῆν ἐχθρόν.

*Whether by Craft or Force we overthrow,
All Means allow'd to crush the daring Foe.*

And Virgil's [3] Direction,

Let Fraud supply the want of Force in War.

Dryd.

Is strictly followed even by Riphaeus,

Just of his Word, observant of the Right.

Dryd.

And Solon, [4] so famous for Wisdom, also observes this Maxim; so did Fabius Maximus, [5] commended for it by Silius:

Who to Force join'd Artifice.

2. In Homer, Ulysses, a very wise Prince, was famous for Stratagems of War; whence [6] Lucian makes this Inference, that Deceit in War is commendable. There is nothing more profitable in War, than Fraud, said [7] Xenophon; and Brasidas [522] in [8] Thucydides gives the greatest Honour in War to cunning Stratagems. And in [9] Plutarch, Agésilas said, It is both just and lawful to deceive an Enemy. And Polybius, [10] Military Exploits performed by open Force are less considerable than what is done by Stratagem and making good Use of Opportunity. And from him Silius brings in Corvinus speaking thus, [11]

Bellandum est astu; levior laus in duce dextra.

*Ambush in War is still by Fortune crown'd,
The Captain's most for Policy renown'd.*

So also thought the rigid Spartans, as [12] Plutarch observes, therefore they offered greater Victims for a Victory obtained by Policy, than by plain Force. [13] The same Author highly commends [14] Lysander, ἅπασιν τῶ πολλῶ διαποικίλλοντα τῶ πολέμου, versed in all the Arts and Skill of War. He also praises Philopoemen, [15] that being instructed in the Cretan Discipline, he united the plain and open Way of fighting with Sights and Stratagems. And [16] Ammianus was of Opinion, that Without any Distinction of Valour, or Cunning, all prosperous Successes in War deserve Commendation.

3. The Roman Lawyers [17] accounted all Fraud used against an Enemy, innocent; and that it mattered not, [18] whether a Man baffled his Enemy by Force or Fraud. Eustathius on the 15th of the Iliad observes that Deceit is not to be blamed, as [523] belonging to a Soldier. And among the Divines, [19] St. Augustine, If the War be just, it concerns not Justice, whether it be managed by Force or Craft. And St. [20] Chrysostom says that those Generals, that overcame by Subtilty, are most commended.

4. But there are Opinions which seem to maintain the contrary, of which I shall mention some hereafter. To decide this Question, it must be considered, whether Deceit be one of those Things that are always Evil, and in which the Maxim takes Place, that we must not do Evil, that Good may come of it; or whether Deceit be to be reckoned among such as are not Evil in their own Nature, but that it may sometimes happen, that they may be good.

Timothy, [6] tho' he well knew what Sense the Jews would put upon it, viz. that the Law of Circumcision (tho' it was now really abolished) did still oblige the Children of Israel, in the Opinion of St. Paul and Timothy; whereas St. Paul had something else in View, that he and Timothy might obtain a greater Opportunity of a familiar Conversation with the Jews. For neither did Circumcision, the ceremonial Law being abolished, by its Institution any longer signify such a Necessity, neither was the Evil, which followed upon the Error, in which the Jews would continue for a while, (tho' afterwards to be laid aside) so great, as that Good which St. Paul designed, which was a more easy Propagation of the Doctrine of the Gospel. The Greek Fathers often call this dissembling οἰκονομία, [7] good Management, of which we have an excellent Sentence of Clemens Alexandrinus, who discoursing of a good Man, says, ἐπὶ τῶν πλησίων ὀφειλεί μόνῃ ποιήσει τινα ἢ οὐκ ἂν προηγουμένως αὐτῷ πρῶτον ἀχθεῖν, &c. [8] He will do some Things for the Benefit of his Neighbour, which otherwise he would not of his own free Will, and first Intention. Such was the Act of the Romans, [b] who when they were besieged, threw Loaves of Bread from the Capitol, into the Enemies Camp, that they might not be thought to have any want of it.

An Example of the other Case, is the pretended Flight of Joshua [c] before the Inhabitants of Ai, which is often practised by other Generals. For we suppose here the consequent Harm to be lawful, from the Justice of the War. But such a pretended Flight signifies nothing by Institution, tho' the Enemy may take it as a Sign of Fear, which the other is not bound to guard against, using his own Liberty of going this way or that way, faster or slower, and with such or such a Countenance, as he pleases. The same Thing may be said of those, who use the Enemies Arms or Habits, or set up his Standards or Flag, as we read in many Histories.

For all these Things every Man may make use of, as he pleases, tho' contrary to the general Custom; because that very Custom is established by the Pleasure of particular Persons, not as by common Consent, and therefore obliges none.

[526]

IX. There is a greater Dispute concerning those Signs which enter, if I may say so, into the Commerce of Men, and in the wrong Use of which a Lye does properly consist; much is found in Holy Writ against Lying, A righteous Man hateth Lying, Prov. xiii. 5. Remove far from me Falshood and Lyes, Prov. xxx. 8. Thou shalt destroy all those that speak Lies, Psal. v. 7. Lie not one to another, Colos. iii. 9. And this St. Austin stiffly defends; with him agree many Poets and Philosophers. Remarkable is that of Homer,

IX. Of that in the latter Sense, the Question is difficult.

[1] *Hated to Death may that grand Villain be,
Whose Heart and Tongue do ever disagree.*

And Sophocles,

[2] *'Tis never handsome to report a Lye;
But if on Truth a certain Mischief wait,
You may dissemble.*

And Cleobulus,

[3] The truly wise abhor a shameful Lie.

[4] Aristotle said, κατ' αὐτὸ τὸ μὲν ψεῦδος, φαῦλον καὶ ψεκτὸν, τὸ δὲ ἀληθὲς καλὸν καὶ ἐπαινετὸν, Lying in itself is vile and base, but Truth is beautiful and commendable. Neither does the other Side want its Defenders: As first in Holy Writ, [5] it has the Precedents of Men, whose Probity is commended, who nevertheless have sometimes lied, without being any where blamed for it: As also the formal Decision of many antient [6] Doctors of the Christian Church, as Origen, Clemens, Tertullian, Lactantius, Chrysostom, St. Jerome and Cassianus; and indeed almost all of the primitive Christian Writers, as St. Austin [7] himself confesses, herein dissenting from them, but owning [8] it to be a very difficult and intricate Question, and by the Learned variously disputed, for these are his very Words.

Among the Philosophers, the open Maintainers of this Opinion are Socrates, [9] and [527] his Disciples [10] Plato and [11] Xenophon; as also [12] Cicero; and, if we believe Plutarch [13] and [14] Quintilian, the Stoicks, who reckon this among the Accomplishments of a wise Man, to lie in a proper Place and Manner. Neither does [15] Aristotle himself seem to differ from them in some Places, whose καθ' αὐτὸ, in itself, which we have cited, may be interpreted commonly speaking, or the Thing considered in itself, without respect to Circumstances. His Expositor, Andronicus Rhodius, said thus of a Physician that told a Lye to his Patient, [16] ἄπατῶ μὲν, ἀπατεῶν δὲ οὐκ ἔστιν, He deceives indeed, but yet he is not a Deceiver. And he gives the Reason, οὐ γὰρ τέλος ἔχει τὴν ἀπάτην τοῦ νοσοῦντος, ἀλλὰ τὴν σωτηρίαν, Because he has no Design to deceive his Patient, but to cure him. [17] Quintilian before mentioned defending this Opinion said, Many Things are honest, or dishonest, not simply from the Fact, but from the Motives of it. So [18] Diphilus,

*If a kind Lye the Life of Man can save,
Where is the Crime to rescue from the Grave?*

When Neoptolemus in [19] Sophocles asked Ulysses,

What! not asham'd by Falshood to offend?

Ulysses answered,

No, if our Safety thereupon depend.

The like may be brought out of [20] Pisander and Euripides; [21] so in Quintilian also we find, it is allowable in a wise Man sometimes to tell a Lye. And [22] Eustathius upon the second of the Odysses, said ψεύσεται κατὰ καιρὸν ὁ σοφὸς, A wise Man will tell a Lye upon Occasion. He also produces Testimonies out of [23] Herodotus and Isocrates.

[528]

X. These so different Opinions may perhaps be reconciled by the common Distinction of Lies, taken either in a stricter or a looser Sense. For we do not here take the Word Lye so largely, as [a] comprehending every Untruth that one says, without knowing it to be such, as Gellius [1] distinguished between mendacium dicere, and mentiri, to tell an Untruth, and to Lye. But here we take it to signify a Falsehood spoken knowingly, in a Sense contrary either to what we think or design. For what is first, καὶ ἀμέσως, and immediately declared by Words, or any other Signs, are the Conceptions of the Mind: Therefore he does not lie, who tells a Thing that is false, yet supposing it to be true; but he that tells Truth, at the same Time thinking it to be false, does certainly lye. It is the Falshood therefore of the Expression which is requisite to the common Nature of a Lye. Whence it follows, when any Word or Sentence is πολύσηγος, of divers Significations, either by common Use, or by the Custom of Art, or by any Figure that is intelligible, then if our inward Meaning agree with any of these Significations, it is not to be reputed a Lye, [2] tho' the Person to whom we speak may take it in a different Sense.

X. The Use of Words in another Sense, than that wherein we know they are understood, not always unlawful.

But these ambiguous Expressions are not rashly to be allowed, but yet may upon Occasions be justified. As if it relates to the instructing of one committed to our Charge, or to avoid some captious Questions. [3] Of the former CHRIST gave us an Example in himself, when he said our Friend Lazarus sleepeth, John xi. 11. which his Disciples understood of his taking rest in Sleep. And when he said, John ii. 20, 21. Destroy this Temple, and in three Days I will raise it up, meaning that of his Body, he knew very well that the Jews understood it of the real Fabrick of the Temple. So again, when he promised his Disciples, Luke xxii. 30. That they should sit on twelve Thrones, judging the twelve Tribes of Israel; and Mat. xxvi. 25. That they should drink new Wine with him in his Father's Kingdom, he knew very well, that they understood it of a Temporal Kingdom, whereof they were full of Hopes even to the very Moment of his Ascension, Acts i. 6. Thus he speaks to the People in Parables, that hearing they might not understand, Mat. xiii. 3. that is, unless they came with such Attention and Docility (or Willingness to be [529] taught) as was requisite. An Instance of the latter Case we meet with from prophane History in the Person of L. Vitellius, who being importuned by Narcissus to explain himself, and to speak freely (in regard to the loose Life of Messalina) would not be prevailed upon, but still gave such doubtful and uncertain Answers, [4] as would admit of various Senses. Hither we shall refer the Hebrew Saying, [5] מוטב ראם לא זשתוק אם יורע ארסלחמיר עתרברג, If a Man can speak ambiguously let him, if not, let him say nothing.

3. On the contrary it may happen, that to use this kind of speaking may not only be discommendable, but wicked, [6] as when either the Honour of GOD, [7] or our Charity to our Neighbour, or Reverence to our Superiors, or the Nature of the Thing in Question requires, that we should plainly declare the Truth; so in Contracts (as we have said [b] already) whatsoever the Nature of the Contract requires to be understood, should be declared. In which Sense we may very well understand that of Cicero, [8] That a Lye should be banished from all human Commerce, borrowed from the old Attick Law, [9] No lying in a Market. In which Places the Word Mendacium is to be taken so largely, as to include even obscure Expressions, which we, properly speaking, do not comprehend under the Notion of Lying.

XI. 1. It is then required to the common Notion of a Lye, that what is either spoken, written, intimated by Characters, or declared by any Gesture, cannot be otherwise understood than in such a Sense [1] as differs from the Mind of the Person who expresses it; but to a Lye strictly taken, as it is naturally unlawful, there is necessarily required some peculiar Difference; which if rightly considered, at least according to the common Opinion of Nations, can be nothing else than, the Violation of a real Right, and that subsisting without any Diminution, belonging to him, to whom we make a Sign, or direct our Discourse. For it is certain, that in Respect of himself, let him speak ever so falsely, no Man can lye. I do not here mean every Right, and what is foreign to the present Affair; but that Right which is proper and essential to the Matter in Hand, which is nothing else, [2] but the Freedom of him, with whom we discourse to judge of the Conceptions of our Minds, a Freedom which, as by a silent Contract, we are supposed to owe him. [3] For this, and no other, is [530] that mutual Obligation, which Men intended to introduce by establishing the Use of Speech, and such other Signs; for without that such an Establishment had been to no Purpose.

XI. The form of a Lye, as it is unlawful, consists in a Repugnancy to another's Right. This explained.

2. It is also requisite, that this Right to judge should subsist without any Diminution, while we discourse. [4] For it may happen, that tho' there were such a Right, it ceases or may be taken away, by some other supervening Right, as a Debt may cease by an Acquittance, or Non-Performance of some Condition. It is moreover required, that the Right that is violated be his, with whom we discourse, and not any other's; as in Contracts there arises no Injustice, but by the violating the Right of the Contracters. Hence perhaps it is, that after Simonides,

Plato [5] refers the speaking of Truth to Justice; and that the Lying which is forbidden, Holy Writ often describes by bearing [6] false Witness against our Neighbour, and what [7] St. Austin himself puts into the Definition of a Lye, [8] A Purpose to deceive; and Cicero [9] will have the speaking of Truth referred to the Fundamentals of Justice.

3. But as this Right may be taken away by the express Consent of him, with whom we deal; as if any one shall declare before hand that he will speak false, and the other allows it, so also by a tacit Consent, or a Presumption founded upon just Reason, or by the Opposition of another's Right, which by the Judgment of all Men is far more considerable; from these Principles rightly understood many Inferences may be drawn, which may be of Use to reconcile those different Opinions formerly mentioned.

[531]

XII. First, when we talk to Children or Madmen, if what we say be false, yet it cannot be reputed a criminal Lye. Because it is generally allowed, XII. That it is lawful to speak what is false to Children and Madmen.

[1] Ut puerorum aetas improvida ludificetur.

That imprudent Youth may be thus deceived.

And [2] Quintilian says, speaking of Children, We make them believe many Things for their Advantage. But the immediate Reason is, because Children and Madmen not having a freedom of Judgment, they cannot be injured in that Liberty which they have not.

XIII. Secondly, whilst we discourse with one Man that is not deceived, if a third Person be thereby deceived, it is no Lye; no Lye in Respect of him to whom it was spoken, because his Judgment continues unperverted, as does his who hearing a Fable, takes it as such, or his who hears a figurative Speech, whether κατ' εἰρωνειᾶν by way of Irony, or καθ' ὑπερβολήν, by an Hyperbole, which Figure brings us to the Truth [1] by something which is not true; as Seneca speaks, and Quintilian calls it, A lying Exaggeration. Neither is it a Lye in respect of him, that hears it by the by; because he is not concerned in the Discourse, and therefore we are not any ways obliged to inform him right; but if that Person mistake our Meaning, he may thank himself, and not any Body else, for his being deceived. For (if we consider it rightly) the Discourse between ourselves is no Discourse at all in respect to a Stander by, but a meer Sound that may indifferently signify any Thing. Therefore neither was Cato the Censor to be blamed for [a] promising Assistance to his Confederates, tho' falsly, nor Flaccus [b] in reporting to others, that Aemilius had taken the Enemies City by Storm; tho' the Enemies were deceived by it. Plutarch relates the like of Agesilaus. For nothing was here said to the Enemy, and the consequent Damage was an accidental Thing, and not in itself unlawful to wish, or cause to an Enemy. And to this Kind do [2] St. Chrysostom and St. [3] Hierom refer that Saying [c] of St. Paul, wherein he reprov'd St. Peter at Antioch for too much judaizing, supposing that St. Peter well understood, that he did it not seriously, but to accommodate himself to the Weakness of those who heard him. XIII. Also when he is deceived, to whom our Speech is not directed, and whom without Speech we may lawfully deceive.

XIV. 1. Thirdly, When we are certain that he with whom we discourse will not only not be offended, tho' his Judgment be for that Time imposed upon, but on the contrary will be thankful for it, on account of the Advantage, that he shall get by it, there is no Lye properly so called, or unjust Deceit, committed, no more than he can be charged with Theft, who presuming the Owner's Consent spends something of his of small Value to obtain him a great Profit. For in such Cases, where we have so much Reason to be assured of what we think, a Presumption of another's Will has the same Force as an express Consent. And it is an incontestable Maxim that no Wrong is done to him that is willing. Wherefore a Person seems [532] not to be culpable, when he comforts his sick Friend, by making him believe what is false, as Arria did Paeteus upon the Death of their Son, which Story is in [a] Pliny's Epistles; or he that in a Danger encourages the Soldiers with false News, whereby he occasions their Safety and Victory; and so the deceived is not caught, as Lucretius speaks.

2. And [1] Democritus, ἀληθομυθεύειν χρεῶν, ὅπου λώϊον We must speak Truth, when it is for our Interest; and Xenophon, [2] φίλους δίκαιον ἐξαπατᾶν, ἐπὶ δὲ ἀγαθῷ, It is lawful to deceive our Friends, for their Advantage; and [3] Clemens Alexandrinus allows, ψεύδεσθαι ἐν θεραπείας μέρει, To use a Lye for a Remedy: [4] So Maximus Tyrius, καὶ ἰατρος νοσοῦντα ἐξαπατᾶ, καὶ στρατηγὸς, καὶ κυβερνήτης νάυτας, καὶ δεινὸν οὐδὲν, The Physician deceives his Patient, the General his Soldiers, and the Pilot his Mariners, and yet no Injury. And Proclus [5] on Plato gives this Reason, τὸ γὰρ ἀγαθὸν κρείττον ἐστὶ τῆς ἀληθείας, Goodness is preferable to Truth. The like we have in Xenophon, [6] that their Confederates were coming to their Assistance; and of Tullus Hostilius, that [b] he ordered the Alban Army to withdraw, in order to surround the Enemy; (tho' he knew it was an Effect of the Alban General's Treachery) and that Salubre Mendacium, [7] that wholesome Lye of Quinctius the Consul (as Historians call it) to encourage his Army, gave out, that his left Wing had routed their Enemies; and of many others. But we must observe, that the Injury done to the Judgment in this Case, is of less Concern, because it is but as for a Moment, and the Truth immediately appears.

XV. 1. Fourthly, Another Consequence which has an Affinity with the former is this, that it is not a criminal Lye, when he who [1] has an absolute Right over all the Rights of another, makes use of that Right, in telling something false, either for his particular Advantage, or for the publick Good. And Plato seems to have respect to this, [2] when he allows Princes the Liberty to speak false. And yet [3] when he sometimes grants, and sometimes takes away this Privilege to, and from Physicians, he seems to make this Difference, that he gave it to the publickly authorized ones, and took it away from such as assumed it to themselves. Yet the same Plato does justly acknowledge, [4] that it is not suitable to the Nature of GOD to lye, notwithstanding the Sovereign Power that he has over Men, because it is an [5] Argument of Weakness to fly to such Shifts.

XV. And when he that speaks, uses that Sovereign Power that he has over his own Subjects.

[533]

2. An Example of this, perhaps, innocent Falshood we have [6] in Joseph, and commended by Philo, [a] who being Viceroy, pretends, tho' against his Knowledge, to charge his Brethren, first with being Spies, and afterwards Thieves. And in Solomon, who gave a remarkable Demonstration of his divine Wisdom, when to discover the true Mother, he commanded the living Child to be divided, when he intended nothing less. 1 Kings iii. 25, 26, 27. True is that Saying of Quintilian, [7] Sometimes the common Good requires that some Falshoods should be maintained.

XVI. Fifthly, [1] When the Life of an innocent Person, or something equal to it, cannot otherwise be preserved, or the Execution of a dishonest Act be otherwise prevented; as was the Fact of Hypermnestra, [2] commended by Horace.

XVI. Or perhaps, when the Life of an innocent Person, or something equal to it, cannot otherwise be preserved.

[534]

*Splendide mendax, & in omne Virgo
Nobilis aevum.*

Lib. 3. Od. 11.

A Virgin famous for her pious Lye,

Whose glorious Memory shall never die.

XVII. 1. What we have now laid down, does not extend so far as the common Maxim of some wise Men, who assert in general, and without Restriction, that it is lawful to lye to an Enemy: Thus [a] Plato and [b] Xenophon among the Greeks, [1] Philo among the Jews, and St. Chrysostom among [2] the Christians, to the Rule given against Lying, add this Exception, Unless we have to do with an Enemy. Hither we may perhaps refer that Message sent by the Men of Jabesh Gilead to the Ammonites, by whom they were besieged, 1 Sam. xi. 10. And that of [3] Elisha [535] the Prophet, 2 Kings vi. 19. as also that of Valerius [4] Laevinus, who boasted that he killed Pyrrhus.

XVII. That it is lawful by speaking false to deceive an Enemy, by whom asserted.

2. To the third, fourth, and fifth of the Observations abovementioned, we may refer that of Eustratius Archbishop of Nice, [5] Ὅτι βουλευόμενος οὐκ ἐξ ἀνάγκης ὁ ἀληθεύων ἐστίν· ἐστὶ γὰρ πότε τὸν ὀρθῶς, βουλευόμενον καὶ περὶ αὐτοῦ τοῦ ψεύδους βουλευσασθαι, ἢ ἐπιτηδὲς ψεύδεται πρὸς τινὰ ἢ ἐχθρὸν ὄντα, ἢ να σφάλῃ αὐτὸν, ἢ φῶλον ἢ ἐκκόψῃ αὐτὸν ἀπὸ κακοῦ, καὶ τούτων τὰ παραδείγματα ἐν ταῖς ἱστορίαις πολλὰ. There is not always a Necessity that a good Counsellor should speak Truth; for possibly a good Councillor may consult how he may designedly tell a Lye, whereby either to deceive his Enemy, or save his Friend from Harm. Examples of these Kinds are common in all Histories. And Quintilian [6] says, that a Lye, otherwise blameable, even in a Slave, will deserve Commendation, when a wise Man makes Use of it to hinder one from being murdered by Highwaymen, or to save his country by deceiving an Enemy.

3. I know the Schoolmen of some Ages past will not allow of this, [c] who out of all the primitive Fathers have generally chose [7] St. Austin for their Guide in almost every Thing; yet, tho' they are scrupulous of admitting false Speaking in any Case, they allow of tacit Interpretations, so contrary to all Use, that it is doubtful whether it be not better to admit of false Speaking to some Persons, in the fore-mentioned Cases, or some of them (for I do not here pretend to determine any Thing) than so generally to distinguish them from Falshood, as when they say I know not, they mean, I know not how to tell you so. Or, I have nothing, they mean, I have nothing to give you. And many such like mental Reservations, which even common Sense is ashamed of; and which, if allowed, will introduce plain Contrarities; so that he that affirms any Thing, may be said to deny it, and he that denies a Thing, may be said to affirm it.

4. For it is certain, that there is no Word [8] but may admit of a double Interpretation, because every Word, besides the primitive [9] Signification, [10] has also a derivative one, and that divers, [d] according to the Diversity of Arts, and also others by Metaphor, or some such Figure. Neither do I like their Device better, who, as if [536] they quarrelled more with the Word than the Thing, call that Jest which they speak with a Countenance and Pronunciation very serious.

XVIII. But we must observe, that what we have here said concerning false Speaking, is to be referred to assertory (or affirming) Speech, (and that too so far only as to hurt Nobody, but a publick Enemy) [1] but not to promissory. For every Promise, as I said before, confers a new and special Right to the Person promised: And this is in Force, even among Enemies, notwithstanding their open Hostility, and that not only in express Promises, but also in tacit ones, as when an Interview is demanded, of which we shall treat more here after, when we come to speak of publick Faith to be preserved amongst Enemies.

XVIII. This is not to be extended to Words promissory.

XIX. Neither is it to be extended to Oaths, either as sertory or XIX. Nor to Oaths. promissory, for Oaths have a Power to exclude [\[1\]](#) all Exceptions which may arise from the Party we deal with, because therein we treat not only with Men, but with GOD, to whom we stand obliged by our Oaths, tho' there should arise no Right at all to Man: And, as I have said already, it is not so in other Speeches, as in Oaths, for in others it is enough to clear us of a Lye, if the Words be true in any Sense, not altogether unusual; but in Things sworn [\[2\]](#) it is necessary that our Words be true in that Sense, in which we sincerely believe those to whom we swear, understand them; so that we perfectly abhor [\[3\]](#) their Impiety, who scruple not to affirm, that it is as lawful to deceive Men with Oaths, as Children with Toys.

XX. 1. We know there are some Kinds of Fraud, which, tho' naturally XX. It is more generous, and more agreeable to Christian Simplicity to abstain from Falshood, even to our Enemies, illustrated. permitted, yet are rejected by some Nations and Persons, not so much on the Account of any Injustice in them, as out of either a Greatness of Spirit, or sometimes a Confidence of our own Strength. There is in [\[1\]](#) Aelian a remarkable Saying of Pythagoras, that Man comes near to GOD in two Things, in always speaking Truth, and in doing Good to all Men. And in Jamblicus, [\[2\]](#) Truth is the Guide to all Good, both divine and human. And in Aristotle, [\[3\]](#) ὁ μεγαλόψυχος παρ' ἑσιαστικὸς, καὶ ἀληθευτικὸς, A Man of a great Soul delivers himself with Freedom and Truth. And in [\[4\]](#) Plutarch, Τὸ ψεύδεσθαι δουλοπρεπές, It is base and servile to lye. And [\[5\]](#) Arrianus of King Ptolemy, καὶ αὐτῷ βασιλεῖ ὄντι αἰσχρότερον ἢ τῷ ἄλλῳ ψεύσασθαι ἦν, It is much worse in a King to lye, than in another. [\[6\]](#) So the same Author, of Alexander, Οὐ χρῆναι τὸν βασιλέα ἄλλο τι ἢ ἀληθεύειν, πρὸς τοὺς ὑπηκόους, A Prince should speak nothing to his Subjects but Truth. And [\[7\]](#) Mamertine speaks of Julian. Admirable is the Agreement between our Prince's Tongue and his Heart; he is sensible that Lying argues a base and mean Spirit, and is a servile Vice; and whereas Fear or Want makes Men Lyars, that Prince is ignorant of his own Majesty that lyes. Plutarch [\[8\]](#) records of Aristides, Φύσις ἰδρυμένη ἐν ἡθει βεβαίῃ καὶ πρὸς τὸ δίκαιον ἀτενῆς, ψεῦδος δ' οὐδ' ἐν παιδιῷ τι τρῶπι προσιεμένη, He was naturally so great an Admirer of Truth, that he would not allow of a Lye in Jest. And Probus of Epaminondas, [\[9\]](#) So great a Lover of Truth, that he would not tell a Lye, tho' but [\[537\]](#) for Sport. Which ought the more religiously to be observed by [\[10\]](#) Christians, who are not only commanded to use Simplicity, Matt. x. 16. but are also forbidden idle [\[11\]](#) Talk, Matt. xii. 36. having him for an Example in whose Mouth was found no Guile. Wherefore, as [\[12\]](#) Lactantius said, he that is truly honest and just will not say with Lucilius, Homini amico ac familiari non est mentiri meum, It is not my Custom to tell a Lye to my Friend; but also will think it his Duty not to lye to a Stranger, or an Enemy; nor will his Tongue ever speak what his Heart does not think. Such a one was Neoptolemus, says Sophocles, [\[13\]](#) ὑπερβάλλων ἀπλότητι, καὶ εὐγενείῃ, Excelling for his generous Candor: As Dion Prusaeensis rightly observed, who being urged by Ulysses to use Treachery, replied,

*I grieve to hear your secret Treacheries,
But should do more to act as you advise.
[14] If I (Ulysses) were not nobly born,
I yet should base unmanly Actions scorn:
But it would ever shame Achilles Son,
To steal by Craft what should by Force be won.*

And Euripides, [\[15\]](#)

*A gallant Soul will gallant Actions do,
And scorns by Treachery to kill his Foe.*

3. Thus [16] Alexander said he would not steal a Victory; and Polybius [17] writes, that the *Achaean*s hated to use Fraud against an Enemy, esteeming that the surest Victory, which, to use Claudian's Words, [18] Confessus animo quoque subjugat Hostes.

A Victory confess'd by Enemies is true.

So were the Romans till the second Punic War; so that [19] Aelian said, ἴσασι Ῥωμαῖοι ἀγαθοὶ εἶναι καὶ οὐ μὲν διὰ τέχνης καὶ ἐπιβουλῆς καταγωνίσασθαι τοὺς ἐχθροὺς, The Romans are truly valiant, overcoming their Enemies, not by Craft and Subtilty, but by plain Force. And when Perseus the Macedonian King was deceived by the Hopes of Peace, [20] the old Senators disallowed the Act, as inconsistent with Roman Bravery, saying, that their Ancestors prosecuted their Wars by Valour, not Craft, not like the subtil Carthaginians, nor cunning Grecians, among whom it was greater Glory to overcome their Enemies by Treachery, than by true Valour. To which they added, That sometimes Cunning might for a little While prevail against Valour, but his Courage was for ever lost, who was convinced that in a regular and [538] just War, he was neither by Fraud, nor by Chance, but engaging closely in Battle, with his whole Strength, fairly vanquished. So in later Times we read in Tacitus, [21] That the Roman People avenged themselves on their Enemies, not by Craft or Cunning, but openly, and by Force of Arms. Such also were the [22] Tibarenes (a People of Cappadocia) who always proclaimed the Time and Place of Battle. The like does Mardonius in Herodotus [23] testify of the Grecians in his Time.

XXI. As to the Manner of prosecuting a War, this Rule is also necessary, [1] that whatsoever is unlawful for a Man to do, is also unlawful for another to force or persuade him to. As for Example, [2] it is unlawful for a Subject to kill his Prince, or to deliver up a Town without the Consent of a Council of War, or to plunder his Countrymen. Therefore it is also unlawful to persuade him, who continues a Subject, to do so; for he that causes another to sin, always sins himself; neither is it enough to say, that it is lawful for him who tempts another to a base Act to do it himself, as to kill an Enemy, suppose; he may kill him, it is true, but not in such a Manner. And St. Augustine [3] says true, It signifies nothing, whether a Man commit a Crime himself, or employ another to do it for him.

XXI. That it is not lawful for us to force another to do what is lawful for us to do, but not for him.

XXII. But it is another Thing if a Person shall freely offer himself, without any Persuasion to it; for it is not unlawful for us then to make use of him, as an Instrument, to do that which it is lawful for us to do. As we have proved already, [a] by the Example of GOD himself. We receive a Deserter by the Law of War, said Celsus, [1] that is, it is not contrary [2] to the Law of War, to receive him, who quitting the Enemy's Party, embraces ours.

XXII. Yet we may use his Service that freely offers it.

CHAPTER II ↩

How Subjects Goods, by the Law of Nations, are obliged for their Prince's Debts: And of Reprisals.

I. 1. Let us now come to those Rights [1] which the Law of Nations allows us, which partly belong to every War, partly to some particular Kinds of War only. Let us begin with the first. By the bare Law of Nature no Man is bound by the Fact of another, but he that inherits his Goods. [2] For when [539] Property was first introduced, it was then agreed on, that all Debts should pass together with the Goods to the next Possessor. The Emperor Zeno used to say, [3] that it was contrary to natural Equity, that one Man should be troubled for another Man's Debt. Hence arise those Titles in the Roman Laws, [a] that a Wife shall not be sued for the Husband; nor the Husband for the Wife; the Son for the Father; nor the Father or Mother for the Son.

I. Naturally no Man is bound by the Fact of another but the Heir.

2. Neither (as Ulpian [4] says expressly) shall particular Persons be obliged for the Debts of the Community, that is, if the publick Stock be able to discharge them; otherwise they shall be, not as particular Persons, but as they are part of the Whole. [5] Seneca says, If any Man lend Money to my Country, I shall not own myself his Debtor, nor take it as my own Debt, [b] but shall willingly pay my Proportion to discharge the Debt. He had said before, As one of the People, not as for myself, I shall pay, but advance it for my Country. So again, Every particular Person owes, not as his own Debt, but as part of the Publick. Hence it was particularly provided by the Roman Laws, that no [6] Peasant should be obliged for the Debts of another Peasant; and in another Place, that [7] no one's Possession should be distrained for the Debts of another, nor even for the Publick; and in Justinian's Novels, ἐνεχυριασμοῖ, Reprisals, [8] are expressly forbid; giving this Reason for it, because it is not just that one Man should be the Debtor, and another be forced to pay the Debt; where also such Exactions are called odious. And Theodorick, [9] in Cassiodore, called it a base License, for one Man to be kept as a Pledge for another.

II. 1. Tho' this be true, yet by the [1] voluntary Law of Nations, it may be, and as appears has been introduced, that whatsoever Debts any State, or the Prince, shall [540] contract, either primarily by themselves, or be engaged for by not restoring to others what is their Right; all the Goods, both corporal [2] and incorporeal, of their Subjects, shall be obliged to discharge. But this was occasioned by a Kind of Necessity, otherwise there would be such a Loose given, as to let in all Manner of Injuries, for the Goods of Princes cannot so easily be seized upon as those of private Men, who, being many in Number, have each their own. Wherefore Justinian [3] reckons it among those Rights which Nations have established amongst themselves, because they judge it useful and necessary to Mankind.

II. But by the Law of Nations, the Goods and Persons of Subjects are obliged for their Prince's Debts.

2. Neither is this so disagreeable to Nature, [a] that it might not be brought in by Custom, and the tacit Consent of Nations, since Sureties stand obliged for other Mens Debts, without any other Cause than their own free Consent. It was also believed, and with Reason believed, that Foreigners, for whom little Regard is had in many Places, would not be able so easily to obtain their Right, or find Means to be indemnified, as the Members of the same Civil Society amongst themselves. Besides, the Benefit arising from this Obligation being common to all People, they that find themselves aggrieved by it at one Time, may be relieved by it at another.

3. That this has passed into a Custom, appears not only from [4] compleat Wars between Nation and Nation, (for what is practised in such Wars the very Words of the Denunciation declare). [5] Against the antient Latin People, and the Men of old Latium, I denounce and make War, says the Herald in Livy. So when the People's Consent was demanded, [6] Is it your Will and Pleasure that War shall be proclaimed against King Philip, and the Macedonians, and all under his Dominion? And in the Decree itself, The Roman People do denounce War against the Hermundulian People, and the Men of Hermunduli. Which is out of Cincius, in his Res [7] Militaris. Also, in another Place, Let him be an Enemy, and all that are [8] under his Protection. But also from what is practised where no perfect War is absolutely denounced; yet where a certain violent Prosecution of our Right is necessary, which is, as it were, an imperfect War. Agessilaus formerly told Pharnabazus, a Subject to the King of Persia, [9] Ἡμεῖς, ὡς φαρνάβαζε, καὶ φίλοι ὄντες πρότερον βασιλέως, ἐχρῶμεθα τοῖς ἐχθροῦ πράγμασι φιλικῶς· καὶ νῦν πολέμοι γεγονότες, πολεμικῶς ἐν οὖν καὶ σε τῶν βασιλέως κτημάτων ὀρῶντες εἶναι βουλόμενον, εἰκότως διὰ σοῦ βλάπτομεν ἐκεῖνον, When (O Pharnabazus) we were heretofore Friends to the King, we dealt [541] friendly to all that belonged to him; but now being his Enemies, we shall use them all as Enemies; and therefore, since you resolve to continue one of his, we shall endeavour to hurt him through you.

III. 1. A Branch of the Execution of this Right is, what the Athenians called Ἀνδροληψίαν, Taking of Men Prisoners: Concerning which the Attick Law was this, [1] Ἐάν τις βιαίῳ θανάτῳ ἀποθανῆι, ὑπὲρ τούτου τοῖς προσήκουσιν εἶναι τὰς ἀνδροληψίας, ἕως ἂν ἢ δίκας τοῦ φόνου ὑποσχωσιν, ἢ τοὺς ἀποκτείναντας ἐκδώσι· τῆν δὲ ἀνδροληψίαν εἶναι μέχρι τριῶν πλέον δὲ μή, If any Man was found murdered, the next of Kin had a Right to take any three Men, and no more, and detain them till the Murderer were either punished or delivered up in Order to it. Hence we may see, that there is a Kind of incorporeal Right of Subjects, (that is, a Liberty to live where they please, and to do what they please) engaged for the Debts of every Society, which ought to punish such of their own Body, who shall injure those of another Society; so that the Members thereof may be held in Bondage until the Society do that which it is bound to do, that is, punish the Offenders. For tho' the Aegyptians (as we learn out of Diodore) did maintain, that it was not just to imprison a Man for Debt, yet there is nothing in it contrary to Nature; and the contrary Practice prevailed, not only amongst the Greeks, but also amongst other Nations.

2. Aristocrates, who was Contemporary with Demosthenes, proposed that a Decree might pass, that whosoever should kill Charidemus, might be taken wherever he was met with; and who ever made Resistance should be held as an Enemy. In which Demosthenes finds these Faults. First, That [2] Aristocrates did not distinguish the killing Charidemus justly or unjustly, since it was possible to have been justly. Next, That he did not put in this Clause, that in Case Charidemus happened to be killed, Judgment should first be demanded against the Murderer, before the Permission of seizing him was made use of. And thirdly, That not they among whom he should be killed, but they that protected the Murderer, should be reputed as Enemies. The Words of Demosthenes are these, Ὁ μὲν νόμος, ἂν μήτε δίκας ὑπόσχωσι παρ' οἷς ἂν τὸ πάθος γένηται, μήτε τοὺς δεδρακότας ἐκδίδωσι, κελύει κατὰ τούτων εἶναι τὸ ἀνδρολήψιον κατὰ τριῶν· ὁ δὲ τούτους μὲν ἀθῶους παρήκε, καὶ οὐδ' ἐ λόγον πεποιήται περὶ αὐτῶν οὐδένα, τοὺς δὲ τὸν ἴδ' πεφευγότα, φήσω γὰρ οὕτω, κατὰ τὸν κοινὸν ἀνθρώπων νόμον, ὅς κεῖται τὸν φεύγοντα δέχεσθαι ὑποδεξαμένους ἐκσπίνδους εἶναι γράφει ἂν μὴ τὸν ἰκέτην ἔκδοτον διδώσιν, If a Murder be committed among any People, and they refuse either to punish, or deliver up the Murderer, the Law allows us to seize on three Men; but he (Aristocrates) leaves these Men untouched, and does not so much as mention them, but would have those prosecuted as Enemies, who have, according to the common Right of Nations concerning Suppliants, received him that has fled to them for Protection, (for so I put the Case) unless they deliver him up. The fourth Thing that he finds Fault with, is, That Aristocrates would immediately bring it to an open and compleat War, whereas the Law only demands the taking up of three Men.

3. Of these four Exceptions, the first, second, and fourth are reasonable, but the third, unless confined to the sole Event of the Murder done, either accidentally, or in Self-Defence, I cannot help thinking, that Demosthenes reasons here rather like an Orator, or one that seeks for every Thing that may serve to favour his Cause, than according to Truth and Right; for (as we said [a] before) that Right of Nations to receive and defend Suppliants, does only concern them whom Fortune, not their own Crime, has made miserable.

4. Otherwise there is no Difference between those among whom the Crime was committed, and them who refuse either to punish or to deliver up the Offender. And therefore the Law it self, cited by Demosthenes, has been thus interpreted [542] either by Custom, or by some express Clause, added afterwards to prevent the like Cavils: No Body will deny the Truth of one of them, who has read that of [3] Julius Pollux, ἀνδρολήψιον δὲ ὅταν τις τοῦ εἰς ἀνδροφόνους καταφυγόντας ὡς τινὰς ἀπαιτῶν μὴ λαμβάνῃ ἔξεστιν ἐκ τῶν οὐκ ἐκδιδόντων ἄχρι τῶν τριῶν ἀπαγαγεῖν, The seizing of Men is then lawful, when a Man having demanded Murderers who have fled to others for Refuge, cannot receive them; for the Right of apprehending three Men, is against those that refuse to deliver up the Delinquent. And so [4] Harpocraton, Ἀνδροληψία τὸ ἀρπάζειν ἄνδρας ἐκ τινὸς πόλεως· ἐνεχῶρ αἴζον γὰρ τὴν ἔχουσαν πόλιν τὸν ἀνδροφόνον, καὶ μὴ προἰεμένην αὐτὸν εἰς τιμωρίαν, The Right of taking Prisoners, is to snatch away some Men from some City: For against such States, who received Malefactors, and refused to deliver them up to Punishment, they antiently used this Right of Reprisal.

5. The like may be done by any State, whose Subject has been manifestly and injuriously taken away and detained. So at Carthage some opposed the taking Ariston the Tyrian Prisoner, [5] upon this account, That the like would be done against the Carthaginians, both at Tyre, and in other trading Towns, where their Business called them.

IV. Another Kind of forcible Execution is ἐνεχυριασμός, [1] Reprisals among divers Nations, called so by our modern [a] Lawyers, which the Saxons and English call [2] Withernam, and the French, where commonly an express Permission must be obtained from the King for that Purpose, Letters of [3] Mark, and is of Force (as [4] Lawyers say) where Right is denied.

IV. And in seizing their Goods.

V. 1. Which may be supposed, not only when Judgment cannot within a reasonable Time be obtained against a Malefactor, or a Debtor, but also when in a Case that will not admit of any Doubt, (for in doubtful Cases the Presumption is in favour of the Judges established by public Authority) Sentence shall pass plainly against Right. For the Authority of the Judge is not of the same Force against Strangers, as Subjects: Nay, even between Subjects, it does not make void a just Debt. For (as Paulus [1] the Lawyer observes) A real Debtor, tho' he be discharged [543] by the Judge, yet by the Law of Nature still continues a Debtor; and when by an unjust Sentence, a Creditor had taken away something from the right Owner, that had not been the Debtor's, as if engaged to him, the Question being put, whether the Debt being paid, that Thing should be restored to the Debtor, [2] Scaevola maintained that it should. Here is the Difference; Subjects are bound up by the Sentence of the Judge, tho' it be unjust, so as they cannot oppose the Execution of it lawfully, nor by Force recover their own Right, for the Efficacy of that Power under which they live: But Strangers have a coercive Power, tho' it be not lawful to use it, whilst they may recover their Right in a judicial Way.

V. Which is lawful when our Right is first denied, and when that is, where is also shewed, tho' the Thing be adjudged, yet it neither gives, nor takes away any Man's Right.

2. Therefore in such a Case, that both [3] the Persons and Moveables of his Subjects, that refuses to render Justice, may be seized, is not indeed authorized by Nature, but generally received by Custom. We have a very old Example of this in Homer's Iliad, where Nestor is said to drive away the Cattle of the Eleans, because they had before plundered his Father's Horses, [4] ἑύσι' ἐλαυνόμενος, taking them by way of Reprisal; where ἑύσια is expounded by Eustathius; τὰ ἀντὶ τινῶν [544] ἑυόμενα, ὃ ἔστιν ἐλκόμενα καὶ ἀντὶ τῶν προαφ πασθέντων ἀρπαζόμενα, Things taken in lieu of others, that is, seized, and carried away to make amends for others taken from us. Whereupon, as the Story goes, Proclamation was made, that every Man to whom the Eleans owed any Thing, should come, and take of the Spoil proportionably to his Debt, that is to say,

[5] Μή τις ἀτεμβόμενος κίου ἕσης.

That no one might go without his just Share.

Another Example we have in the Roman History, where Aristodemus, Tarquin's Heir, seized the Roman Ships at Cumae, [6] for the Goods of the Tarquins detained at Rome. [7] Dionysius Halicarnassensis says he took the Servants, Cattle, and Money. And in Aristotle [8] in his second Book of Oeconomicks, we find a Decree of the Carthaginians to seize foreign Ships, εἴ τις σύλαν ἔχει, If any had a Right of Reprisals.

VI. It has also been believed among some People, that the Lives of innocent Subjects stand engaged on the like account, and that perhaps upon this Presumption, that every Man has an absolute Power over his own Life, and that it may be transferred to the State; which we have said elsewhere, [a] is without Foundation, and not consistent with sound Divinity. Yet it may happen, that Subjects may be killed, tho' not designedly, but accidentally; [1] namely, while they attempt by Force to hinder the Execution of this Right. But if such a Thing may be foreseen, we are obliged by the Law of Charity [2] to forbear the Prosecution of our Right, (as we have shewed in another Place) since by that Law we Christians especially should set a greater Value upon the Life of a Man, than upon our Goods, as he has been also shewed [b] elsewhere.

VI. This Right reaches not to the Life of him that is taken.

VII. 1. Moreover in this, as in several other Cases, we must take heed, that we distinguish between those Things that are properly due by the Law of Nations, and those that are due by the Civil Law, or by particular Agreements between some People.

VII. The Distinction herein between the Civil Law, and the Law of Nations.

2. By the Law of Nations [a] all the Subjects of the Sovereign from whom one has received an Injury, who are such from a permanent Cause (i.e. settled in the Country) are liable to this Law of Reprisals, whether they be Natives or Foreigners; but not if they be only Travellers, or sojourn there but for a little Time. For these Reprisals are much of the same Nature with Taxes, which are introduced for the paying of publick Debts. Wherefore they are exempted from them, who only for a Time are Subjects to the Law of the Place. Amongst perpetual Subjects, [549] the Law of Nations excepts only from Reprisals, the Persons of Ambassadors [1] and their Baggage, when they are not sent to our Enemies.

3. But by the Civil Law of Nations, the Persons of Women and Children use to be privileged, and even the Goods of Scholars and such as go to Fairs. By the Law of Nations every Person [2] is permitted to use the Right of Reprisals, as at Athens, ἐν ἀνδρολεψία, in the seizure of Persons. By the Civil Law of many Nations this Right must first be desired of the Sovereign, in other Places from the Judges: By the Law of Nations [3] the Propriety of Things taken, is immediately acquired to the Value of the Debt and Charges, [4] the remainder to be restored: By the Civil Law, the Persons concerned therein use to be cited, and the Goods by publick Authority sold, and delivered to the Creditors. But in these and the like Cases one may consult the Civilians, and especially Bartolus, who has written concerning Reprisals.

4. I shall add this because it helps somewhat to qualify the Severity of this Right, in itself too rigid, viz. [b] that they who either by not paying what they owe, or not doing Justice to injured Persons, have occasioned these Reprisals, are bound by the Laws of GOD and Nature, [5] to make Satisfaction for those Losses, which others have suffered upon this account.

---

CHAPTER III ↩

Of a just or solemn War, according to the Right of Nations, and of its Denunciation.

I. 1. We have [a] already mentioned, that according to the Opinion of the best Authors, a War is often said to be just, not from the Cause whence it [550] arises, nor, as elsewhere, from the great Actions [1] done in it, but from some peculiar Effects of Right. But what manner of War this is, is best understood by the Definition which the Roman Lawyers give of an Enemy. Pomponius says, [2] They are Enemies, who publickly denounce War against us, or we against them; the rest are but Pirates, or Robbers. So says Ulpian, [3] They are Enemies against whom the People of Rome have publickly declared War, or they against the Romans; the rest are called pilfering Thieves, or Robbers. Wherefore he that is taken by Robbers, is not a Slave to those that take him, neither does he want the Right of Postliminy. But one taken by the Enemy, suppose by the Germans, or Parthians, is the Enemies Slave, and may recover his former Condition by the Right of Postliminy. And Paulus the Lawyer says, They that are taken [4] by Pirates, or Robbers, continue free. To which we may add that of Ulpian, [5] In civil Dissentions, tho' by them the State be often wounded, yet the Ruin of the State is not intended; they that embrace either Party, are not such Enemies as they who have the Right of taking Prisoners, and of Postliminy; therefore they who are taken and sold, and afterwards recover their Liberty, have no Occasion to petition the Prince for their Freedom, having never left it.

I. That a solemn War by the Right of Nations, is to be between divers People.

2. This only is to be observed, that under the Example of the People of Rome, whosoever has sovereign Power in a State is to be comprehended. He is an Enemy [6] (says Cicero) Who has the Government of publick Affairs, a publick Council, a Treasury, the Right of commanding the People by Vertue of their Consent and Union, the Power of making Peace and War, when necessary.

II. 1. Neither does [1] a State immediately cease to be a State, tho' it commits some Acts of Injustice, even by publick Deliberation; nor is a Company of Pirates and Robbers to be reputed a State, tho' perhaps they may observe some kind of Equity among themselves, [2] without which no Body can long subsist. For these latter are [3] associated on the account of their Crimes; but the other, tho' sometimes not wholly guiltless, do associate for the peaceable Enjoyment of their own Rights, and to do Right to Foreigners, if not in all Things according to the Law of Nature, which (as I have elsewhere [a] shewed) among many Nations, is in part forgotten, at least according to the Agreements which they have made, and the Customs that are established. Thus the Commentator upon Thucydides observes; [4] that whilst the Greeks allowed Piracy they abstained from Murders, from robbing in the Night and from stealing plowing Oxen. And Strabo [5] informs us, that other Nations, [551] tho' they lived by Piracy, upon their return Home, would send to the Owners, that if they would they might redeem their Goods at a moderate Price; to which we may refer that of Homer Odyss. & 14.

II. A Distinction of a Nation doing unjustly from a Company of Pirates and Robbers.

[6] Καὶ μὲν δυσμενέες,

*In search of Prey to foreign Coasts they sail,
And if successful, then do with full Gale
Return unto their Country, fearing still
The Gods, that do regard both Good and Ill.*

2. But in Morals, the principal Part gives form to the Whole: And as Cicero [7] well observed in his 5th Book De Finibus, Because it contains the greatest Parts, and spreads furthest, the Whole is named from it; to which agrees that of Galen, ὅτι τὸ πλεονεκτοῦτος ἐν τῇ κρείσσει γίνονται αἱ πρῶτοι, In Mixtures the Denomination is always taken from that which is the greatest Portion. The same Author often calls them ὀνομαζόμενα κατ' ἐπικράτησιν, named from the most powerful. Wherefore [8] Cicero was too loose in his Expression, in saying, when a King is unjust, the Nobles unjust, or the People, it is not properly a corrupt State, but none at all. Which St. Augustine [9] thus corrects, Neither can I therefore say that a People is no People, or the State no State, as long as there remains a Multitude of reasonable Creatures associated for the Defence of the Things that they love. A sick Body is yet a Body. And a State, however distempered, is still a State, as long as it has Laws and Judgments, and other Means necessary for Natives, and Strangers, to preserve, or recover their just Rights. [10] Dion Chrysostome is more in the right, who says that the Law (especially that of Nations) is in a State, as the Soul in a human Body, [11] for that being taken away it ceases to be a State. [12] Aristides in his Exhortation to the Rhodians unto Peace, shews that many good Laws may be consistent even with [552] Tyranny. And [13] Aristotle says, that tho' in an Aristocracy, or Democracy, the Nobles or People govern ill, yet that does not immediately destroy the Civil Government, but only renders it vitious. Let us illustrate this by Examples.

3. We have already declared the Opinion of Ulpian, [14] that they who are taken by Robbers do not become their Slaves; but he says, those taken by the Germans lost their Freedom. Yet among the Germans, whatever Robberies were committed without the Bounds of any State, were not blamed; they are [15] Caesar's own Words. And Tacitus tells us, that the Venedi [16] robbed in the Woods and Mountains between the Peucini and Fenni. He also observes, that the Catti, [17] a noble People of Germany, practised Robberies. And again the Garamentes, [18] a Nation abounding in Robbers, and yet a Nation. The Illyrians, [19] without Distinction, used to rob by Sea, yet a Triumph was granted to their Conqueror, tho' it was denied to Pompey [20] over the Pirates. So great a Difference is there between a Nation, however wicked, and those who, not making a Body of People, are confederated only to do Mischief.

III. Yet sometimes there may happen a Change, not only in particular Persons, as in [1] Jephtha, [2] Arsaces, [3] Viriatus, who from Captains of Thieves, became lawful Commanders; [4] but also in Companies; as when a Company of Robbers leaving their wicked Practices, and following an honest Course of Life, become a civil Society. St. Augustine says thus of Robberies, [5] If this Mischief by a great concourse of desperate Men should grow so great, that they should seize on certain Places, settle themselves in them, take Cities, and subdue Nations, it then assumes the Title of a Kingdom.

III. Yet sometimes there happens a Change.

IV. We have already [a] shewed who are they that have Sovereign Power, whence we may also gather, that he that hath it but in part, may for that Part make a just War; [b] much more they who are not Subjects, [1] but unequally Confederates: As between the Romans and their Allies, (tho' upon unequal Terms) the Volscians, Latins, Spaniards and Carthaginians, every Thing that a War in form requires was observed, as we may learn from History.

IV. It is required in a solemn War, that he that makes it have a Sovereign Power; and how that is to be understood.

V. But that War may be called just in the Sense under Consideration, it is not enough that it is made between Sovereigns, but (as we have heard before) it must be undertaken by publick Deliberation, and so [1] that one of the Parties declare it to the [553] other: Whence Ennius calls it published Battles. [2] Cicero in his first Book of Offices observes, There is no lawful War but what is made after redemanding what was due, or after a Declaration in form. The antient Writer quoted by Isidore is not so clear, That War is just which is made in consequence of a Declaration, either for the recovering our own, or for repulsing the Enemy. Livy [3] says, a just War is that which is openly made, and by publick Deliberation. And having first declared, that the Acarnanians had wasted the

V. And that it be solemnly denounced.

Athenian Lands, [4] says, That was the beginning of Disputes, but that afterwards they came to a War in form, decreed and declared by the States.

VI. 1. For the better understanding of these and other Passages that treat of the denouncing of War, we must carefully distinguish what Things are due by the Law of Nature, and what are not by the Law of Nature, and yet are honest; and also what Things are required by the Law of Nations to obtain the proper Effects of the Right of Nations; and lastly, what Things do arise from the peculiar Customs of some People.

VI. In denouncing what is required by the Law of Nature, what by the Law of Nations is handled distinctly.

By the Law of Nature, where either Force is repelled by Force, or Punishment demanded of him who is the Offender, there no denouncing of War is required. And this is what Sthenelaidas the Ephorus pleads in [1] Thucydides, οὐ δίκας οὐδὲ λόγοις διακρίτέα μὴ λόγῳ καὶ αὐτοῦς βλαπτομένους, There is no disputing with Words and Arguments when we have been injured by them otherwise than in Words. And Latinus observes in Dionysius Halicarnassensis, [2] τὸν ἄρχοντα πολέμου πᾶς ὁ προπαθὼν ἀμύνεται, Whoever is attacked defends himself immediately against the Aggressor. And as [3] Aelian [554] out of Plato, [4] That War made to beat away an Invader needs no other Herald but Nature itself. Hence Dion Chrysostome observes, [5] πόλεμοι ὧς τὸ πλεῖστον ἀκήρυκτοι γίνονται, Many Wars are made without denouncing. Neither does [6] Livy blame Menippus, Antiochus's General, for any Thing, but that he had killed certain Romans, when no War had been denounced, and when they had heard nothing of the drawing of a Sword, or any Bloodshed; thereby implying, that if either of these had been done, it might have justified the Fact. Neither does the Law of Nature require, that the right Owner, [7] being to recover his own, should declare War.

2. But as often as one Thing is to be taken for another, or the Goods of a Debtor to be seized for a Debt, a Demand is requisite; much more when the Goods of Subjects are to be seized for the Debt of the Prince, whereby it may appear we have no other way to recover our own, or our Debt (but by War). For the Right which we have in those Things is not principal, but secondary, and substituted, as we have declared [a] elsewhere. So a Sovereign ought not to be attacked, either for the Debts or Offences of his Subjects, till Satisfaction has been demanded, the Denial of which puts him in the Wrong, so that he may be deemed to be the Cause of the Damage done to Foreigners, or to render himself culpable towards them, according to what we have [b] treated of before.

But where the Law of Nature does not require such a Demand to be made, [c] yet it may be done honestly [8] and commendably, to the End that the Offender may forbear, if he will, to give Offence, or that that already given may be atoned for by Repentance and Satisfaction; according to those Rules which I have [d] already set down, for the preventing the Calamities of War; to which we may apply, [9]

Extrema primo nemo tentavit loco.

No one at first will fly unto Extremes.

And the Command which [10] GOD gave the [e] Hebrews, to offer Peace to a City before [555] they fought against it, was peculiarly given to that People; and therefore by some ill confounded with the Law [11] of Nations. Nor was that Peace offered as absolute, but upon Condition of Submission and Tribute. When Cyrus had marched into Armenia, he forbore Acts of Hostility, till he had sent Embassadors to the King, to demand the Tribute and Troops he owed, by Vertue of a Treaty, νομίζων φιλικώτερον εἶναι οὕτως ἢ μὴ προειπόντα πορ εὐεσθαι, esteeming it more humane to act thus, than to go on without any Declaration, as Xenophon [12] speaks in his History of that Action. But by the Law of Nations, a publick Denunciation is required in all [13] Cases, as to those peculiar Effects of a just War, if not on both Sides, yet on one.

VII. 1. But this Denunciation is either conditional or absolute. Conditional, when Restitution is demanded at the same Time; but the Feacial (or Herald) Law [1] under the Notion of Things demanded, comprehends not only a Vindication of due by Right of Property, but also the Prosecution of it, whether due upon a civil or criminal Account, as [2] Servius well expounds it. Hence we meet in the form [3] of it these Words, to be restored, to be repaired, to be delivered up; where to be delivered up (as we have said [a] in another Place) is to be understood, unless they from whom they are demanded, should chuse rather to punish the Offenders themselves. Pliny declares, that this reclaiming of Things was called [4] Clarigatio (because the Demand was made clearly and with a loud Voice.) A conditional denouncing of War is thus in [5] Livy, They are resolved with all their Power to revenge that Injury, unless redressed by the Offender. And in [6] Tacitus, Unless they punish the Malefactors, they will put to Death without Distinction. And of this Kind we have an old Precedent in Euripides, where Theseus orders his Heralds to tell Creon the Theban, VII. War denounced sometimes conditionally, and sometimes absolutely.

[556]

[7] *Your Neighbour Theseus friendly would obtain
A decent Burial for the thousands slain.
If this you grant, then, Thebes, you may depend,
Theseus, as well as Athens, is your Friend.
If not, prepare for War, to meet with those Whom you have forc'd to be your deadly Foes.*

Statius relating the same says,

Aut Danais edice rogos, aut praelia Thebis.

Grant Burials to the Greeks, or look for War on Thebes.

Polybius calls this ἐύσια καταγγέλλειν, The old Romans, condicere. A pure (or absolute) Denunciation, is what is especially called an Indiction (or Proclamation) when either the other Party has begun the War (and this Isidore [b] calls a War to repel an Enemy) or he himself has done something that deserves [c] to be punished.

2. Sometimes a pure (and absolute) Denunciation follows a conditional one, tho' not necessarily, but over and above. Hence comes the usual [8] Form, I call the Gods to Witness that Nation is unjust, and will not render what is right. And another of which Things, Differences and Causes, the Declaration has been made by the King at Arms of the People of Rome, to the King at Arms of the antient Latins, and to the People of the antient Latium, they have neither paid, given, nor done those Things they ought to have paid, given, or done; wherefore I judge, agree and declare, that Satisfaction be sought by a fair and just War. To which we will add a third Form, Because the antient Latin People have injured the People of Rome, and failed in their Duty, and because the People of Rome have commanded to make War against the antient Latins, and the Senate of the People of Rome have judged, agreed and resolved to declare War against the antient Latins; therefore I and the People of Rome do denounce and make War against the antient Latins. And that, in this Case, a Declaration of War was not thought absolutely necessary, does appear from [553] hence, that it was sufficient, if it was but proclaimed at the next Garrison. As the Heralds in the Case of [9] Philip of Macedon, and afterwards of Antiochus, [10] gave their Opinion; whereas the first Time it was necessary to declare War to the Person himself, against whom it was intended to take up Arms. Nay, the War against Pyrrhus was denounced only to one of his Soldiers; and that in the Flaminian Cirque, where that Soldier was ordered to purchase a Place, for Form sake, as [11] Servius observes on the 9th of the Aeneid.

3. Another Thing which shews that a pure and simple Declaration after a conditional one is needless, is that a Denunciation of War is often made by both Parties, as the Peloponnesian [12] War by the Corcyreans and Corinthians, when the denouncing of it by one would have been sufficient.

VIII. We must not confound with the Rules which properly belong to the Law of Nations, the Use of the Caduceum [1] established amongst the Greeks; [554] that [2] of Vervein, and the Spearmade [3] of Cornil, amongst the Romans, who took it from the Aequicolae; the solemn Renunciation [4] of all Friendship and Alliance, if ever there had been any, with him against whom War was declared; a Renunciation made after the Term of thirty Days, in which he was allowed to restore what had been demanded; the Ceremony [5] of throwing once more a Spear into the Enemy's Ground; and such other Things which proceed merely from the peculiar Customs of some Nations. For [6] Arnobius tells us, that many of these Formalities were left off in his Time, and some disused, even in [7] Varro's Days. [555] The third Punick War [8] was both denounced, and commenced at the same Time. And [9] Maecenas, in Dion, will have some of these Ceremonies to be peculiar to popular States only.

VIII. In denouncing War, what belongs to the Civil Law and not to the Law of Nations.

IX. War denounced against a Sovereign, is presumed at the same Time to be denounced, not only against all his Subjects, but also others who shall join him, and who ought to be considered, in Regard to him, only as an Accessory. And this our modern Lawyers mean, when they say, [1] A Prince being defied, all his Adherents are defied. For to denounce War they call diffidare, to bid Defiance, which is to be understood of that very War which is made upon him against whom it is proclaimed. Wherefore, when the Romans had declared War against Antiochus, they would not do it separately against the Aetolians, because they openly sided with him. [2] The Heralds replied, The Aetolians have voluntarily proclaimed the War against themselves.

IX. War denounced against a Prince, is denounced also against his Subjects, and all his Adherents.

X. But that War being ended, if we are to attack any other Prince, or People, for having assisted in the War, we ought to denounce War anew, to obtain the Effects of a just War by the Law of Nations. For they are not then looked on as Accessories, but as Principals; [1] wherefore it is well observed, that the War of Manlius against the Gallo-Greeks, and of Caesar against [2] Ariovistus, were not [3] [556] just by the Law of Nations: For they were not now Accessories of another War, but attacked as Principals, on which Account, as a Denunciation of War was requisite by the Law of Nations, so a new Decree of the Roman People was necessary by the Laws of Rome. [4] If the Consent of the People to make War against Antiochus was desired in this Form, Is it your Will and Pleasure that War be made against Antiochus, and his Adherents? Which was also observed in the [5] Decree against King Perseus: It ought to be understood thus, as long as that War should continue against those two Kings, and their Adherents.

X. But not by themselves considered, this illustrated by Examples.

XI. The Reason why a solemn Proclamation was required unto such a War as by the Law of Nations is called just, was not (as [a] some imagine) to shew that they would do nothing in Secret, or by Deceit; for this Motive would not tend so much to establish any Right as to distinguish them by an extraordinary Valour and Generosity. As some Nations [1] (we read) have appointed both the Time and Place of Battle. But that it might manifestly appear, that the War is not made by a private Authority, but by the [2] Consent of both Nations, or of their Sovereigns. For hence arise certain peculiar Effects, which in a War against Robbers, or a War [557] made by a Prince against his own Subjects, will not be allowed. Therefore [3] Seneca distinguished Wars denounced against Neighbours from Civil Wars.

XI. The Reason why Denunciation is requisite to some Effects of War.

XII. Now, as [a] some observe, and by Examples teach, that even in such Wars as these, whatever is taken becomes the Captor's, [1] it is true but only on one Side, and that too by the Law of Nature; and not by the voluntary Law of Nations, which only provides for the Interest of Nations, not of those who are either no Nation, or but Part of one. They are also mistaken that [b] think a War, undertaken in Defence of our Persons or Goods, needs no Denunciation. [2] For it is absolutely necessary, indeed not simply, but to obtain the Effects proper to a just War, as we have already mentioned, and shall more fully explain by and by.

XII. That those Effects are not to be found in other Wars.

XIII. Neither is that true, that War cannot justly be made as soon as it is proclaimed, which Cyrus did against the Armenians, and the Romans against the Carthaginians, as I said [a] before. For by the Law of Nations, a Denunciation [1] requires no Time to be allowed after it; but it may happen, that by a natural Right some Time may be required from the Quality of the Business, as if Restitution be demanded, or Punishment required against an Offender, and not yet denied; for then convenient Time is to be granted for the performing it.

XIII. Whether a War may be made as soon as denounced.

XIV. Nay, tho' the Rights of Ambassadors should be violated, it will not thence follow, that there is no Need of Denunciation to obtain those Effects proper to a just War; but it will be sufficient if it be done the safest Way it can, that is, by Letters: As it is usual, in Law, to give a Summons or Intimation, in Places that are not safe.

XIV. Whether against him that has violated the Right of Ambassadors a War may be made, tho' not denounced.

CHAPTER IV ↩

The Right of killing Enemies in a solemn War; and of other Hostilities committed against the Person of the Enemy.

I. Servius upon this Verse of Virgil's,

I. The Effects of a solemn War generally explained.

[1] Tum certare odiis, tum res rapuisse licebit.

*Then is your Time for Faction and Debate,
For partial Favour, and permitted Hate.*

Dryden.

Deriving the Feacial (or Herald) Law from Ancus Marcius, who had borrowed it himself from the Aequicolae, says thus, [2] When Men or Cattle were taken from the Romans by any other Nations, the Pater Patratus (King at Arms) with some other Heralds, whose Office it was also to make Treaties of Alliance, went to the Borders of that Nation, and standing there, with a loud Voice proclaimed the Cause of the War; and if they would not restore the Things taken, or deliver up the Offender, (within thirty Days) he threw a Javelin into their Territories, which was the [558] Beginning of Hostilities, and then it was lawful to plunder, as is usual in War. But he had before said, that The Antients by [3] plundering, (Res rapere) understood the damaging what belonged to the Enemy, tho' nothing be taken from him: And by restoring what was redemanded (Res reddere) they meant all Manner of Satisfaction for the Injury done. Whence we learn, that a War solemnly denounced between two Nations, or their Sovereigns, [4] has some peculiar Effects, which do not follow from the Nature of the War itself: Which is very agreeable to what we have already [a] quoted from the Roman Lawyers.

II. 1. But we must observe, that this Word Licebit, will be lawful, in Virgil, is capable of a double Meaning. For sometimes that is said to be lawful which is altogether just and honest, tho' perhaps, some other Thing may be more commendably done, as that of the Apostle St. Paul, Πάντα μοι ἔξεστιν, ἀλλ' οὐ πάντα συμφέρει, All Things (of the same Nature with those he had begun to speak of, [1] and of which he was going to speak further) are lawful for me, but all Things are not expedient, 1 Cor. vi. 12. Also to marry is lawful, but to abstain from [2] Marriage with apious Intent is more laudable, as St. Augustine [a] argues to Pollentius, out of the same Apostle. To marry a second Time is likewise lawful; but to marry but once is more laudable, as [3] Clemens Alexandrinus rightly decides the Question. A Christian Husband may lawfully put away a Heathen Wife, as Saint Augustine [b] allows (which, with what Circumstances it may be proved, is not our Business here to dispute) but yet he may keep her. Therefore he adds, [4] Both are equally lawful by the Rules of Justice, which our Saviour hath given us, for he hath prohibited neither of them, but both are not equally expedient. Ulpian says of a Trader, who was permitted, by the Roman Law to pour out the Wine, if the Buyer did not come to fetch it at the Time appointed, [5] Tho' he may do it, yet if he did it not he is more to be commended.

II. The Word Lawful distinguished into what may be done with Impunity, tho' not without a Crime, and what is not criminal, tho' it were an Act of Virtue to let it alone; with the Addition of several Examples.

[559]

2. This [6] Word Licere, to be lawful, may be taken for that which is not punishable by human Laws, and yet is not consistent with Piety, or the Rules of Morality. Thus, in many Countries, Fornication is allowed. Among the [7] Lacedemonians and Aegyptians, Theft was lawful. We read in Quintilian, [8] There are some Things not commendable in their own

Nature, yet tolerated by the Law, as by that of the Twelve Tables, the Body of the Debtor might be divided amongst the Creditors. Indeed this Acceptation of the Word Licere, to be lawful, is not very proper, [9] as Cicero observes in the fifth of his Tusculan Questions. Speaking of Cinna, On the contrary I think him miserable, not only because he did such Things, but because he so managed, that he might lawfully do them, tho' it is not lawful for any Man to do ill, but we are misled by the Error of Speech, when we say that is lawful which is only allowed. But yet it is very common, as when the same Cicero, in Behalf of Rabirius Posthumus thus addresses the Judges, [10] Ye ought to consider what is suitable to be done, not what you may do by Strictness of Law, for if you regard what is strictly lawful, you may put to Death whom you please. Thus it is said, [11] it is lawful for Kings to do what they please, because they are ἀνευπεύθυνοι, exempted from Punishment amongst Men, as we have said [c] elsewhere. But Claudian well advises a Prince or Emperor, when he says,

[12] *Nec tibi quid liceat, sed quid fecisse decebit,
Occurrat mentemque domet respectus Honesti.*

*Think not what is by strictest Law allow'd,
But what by Truth and Conscience is avow'd.*

And [13] Musonius blames those Princes, Μῆ τὸ, καθήκει μοι, λέγειν μεμεληκότας, ἢ λλὰ τὸ ἔξεστί μοι, Who say thus I can do, rather than thus I should do.

3. And in this Sense we find Licet, it is lawful, and Oportet, it be hoveth, often opposed to each other, as by [14] Seneca the Father, in his Controversies. And in Ammianus Marcellinus, [15] Some Things are not fit to be done, tho' they may be lawfully done. And Pliny, [16] in his Epistles, We should avoid Things that are dishonest, not because they are unlawful, but shameful. And Cicero, [17] in his Oration for Balbus, Some Things are not fit to be done, tho' lawful. And for Milo, [18] he refers to natural Right what is just or innocent, and to the Laws what is permitted. [560] So Quintilian [19] the Father, in one of his Declamations tells us: It is one Thing to have a regard to the Laws, and another to consider what Justice demands.

III. Therefore in this Sense it is lawful for one Enemy to hurt another, both in Person and Goods, not only for him that makes War on a just Account, and does it within those Bounds which are prescribed by the Law of Nature, as we have said [a] in the beginning of this Book, but on both Sides, and without Distinction; so that he cannot be punished as a Murderer, or a Thief, tho' he be taken in another Prince's Dominion, neither can any other make War upon him barely upon this Account. And in this Sense we are to take Sallust, [1] By the Laws of War all Things are lawful to the Conqueror.

IV. The [1] Reason why this was established by Nations, is because when two States are engaged in War, it would be dangerous for any other to pronounce on the Justice of their Cause, for by that Means that State might quickly be involved in a War with other People, as the [2] Inhabitants of Marseilles argued in the Cause of [561] Caesar and Pompey; that it did not belong to them, nor did their Forces permit them to determine, which had the juster Cause. Besides, even in a just War it is very hard by any outward Tokens to judge, which is the just Measure of defending ourselves, of recovering our own, or of exacting Punishment, so that it is far better to leave it to the Conscience of the Persons engaged in War to determine these Things among themselves, than to appeal to the Arbitration of others. The [3] Achaeans in Livy thus addressed the Senate, How should what had been acted by the Right of War, now come into Debate? Besides this Permission or Impunity, there is another Effect, viz. the Right of appropriating to ourselves what we take in a solemn War, of which we shall treat hereafter.

III. The Effects of a solemn War generally considered, refer to Lawfulness with Impunity.

IV. Why such Effects were introduced.

V. 1. But that Licence which a just War gives to an Enemy to hurt another (which we have begun to treat of) extends first to his Person, of which we have many Testimonies in approved Authors. There is a great Saying of [1] Euripides, which had passed into a Proverb amongst the Greeks, Καθαρός ἔπας τοὶ πολεμίους ὅς ἔν κτάνῃ.

*The Blood of an Enemy doth not stain
The Man who kills him.*

Therefore the Custom of the old Greeks was, not to wash, drink, much less to perform any Acts of a religious Worship with him that was a Homicide (that is, [2] had killed a Man out of War) but it was lawful to do it with him that in War had slain his Enemy; and frequently to kill is called the Right of War. And Marcellus declares in Livy, [3] What so ever I did among the Enemies, the Right of War defends. So does Alcon to the Saguntines in the same Author, [4] But I think this is rather to be endured, than that you should be all put to the Sword; and suffer your Wives and Children to be dragged about before your Faces, by the Right of War. And the same Livy in another Place, relating the general Massacre of the Astapenses, [5] adds, that it was done by the Right of War. And Cicero pleads thus for Deiotarus, [6] But how could he be suspected as your Enemy, who cannot but remember, that when you might have adjudged him to die by the Law of Arms, you made both him and his Son Kings. And for Marcellus, [7] For when by the Right of that Victory we might have been all put to Death, we were preserved by your Clemency. And Caesar [8] tells the Haedui, That he had out of his Mercy preserved them, whom by the Right of War he might have slain. And Josephus [9] in his Jewish War, καλὸν ἐν πολέμῳ θνήσκειν, ἀλλὰ πολέμου νόμῳ, τοῦτ' ὄσστιν ὑπὸ τῶν κραιοῦντων, calls it honourable to die in War, but by the Right of War, that is by the Hands of the Conqueror. And so Statius, [10]

[562]

Non querimur caesos, haec bellica jura, vicésque Armorum — —

*We grieve not for our Men, who bravely dy'd,
This is the Right of War, we're satisfy'd.*

2. Yet we must observe, that when these Authors write thus, they do not mean a Permission that renders the Action of killing the Enemy entirely innocent, but an Impunity, such as I have described, as appears from other Places. Tacitus [11] said, In Time of Peace every one is treated according to his Desert, but in War the Guilty and Innocent fall alike. And in another Place, [12] Neither would the common Right of Men permit them to reward so unnatural a Murder, nor the Law of Arms to punish it. Neither is the Right of War to be otherwise taken, where Livy [13] mentions, that the Greeks spared Aeneas, and Antenor, because they had been always for Peace. And Seneca in his Tragedy of Troas.

Quodcunque libuit facere, victori licet.

The Victor's Will is an assured Law.

And in his Epistles, [14] Those Things, which would be punished with Death, had they been done in secret and by private Authority, are commended, when done by Generals of Armies. And St. Cyprian, [15] It is a Crime when a private Person is guilty of Homicide, but when it is done by publick Authority it is called a Vertue; Crimes acquire the Right of Impunity, not because they do but little hurt, but because the Cruelty of them is carried to a great Excess. And a little farther, the Laws connive at Sin, and that is esteemed lawful, which is authorised by the State. Thus Lactantius says, [16] that the Romans did lawfully injure others; and in the same Sense Lucan, [17] Crimes were authorised.

VI. But this Right of Licence is of a large Extent, for it reaches not only those who are actually in Arms, and the Subjects of the Prince engaged in War, but also all those who reside within his Territories; as may appear from that form in Livy. [a] Let him, and all that live within his Country, be our Enemies. And no wonder, since we may apprehend Damage from them, which in a general and uninterrupted War is enough to justify the Right here spoken of, otherwise than in Reprisals, which, as I have said, were first introduced after the manner of Taxes laid for the Payment of publick Debts. Wherefore we are not to be surpris'd, if, as Baldus [c] observes, this Licence in War be much greater, than that in Reprisals. And without doubt Strangers, that come into an Enemy's Country after a War is proclaimed, and begun, are liable to be treated as Enemies.

VI. All that are found among Enemies may be killed or hurt.

VII. But they who went thither before the War, are by the Law of Nations allowed [1] a reasonable Time to depart, which if they do not make [2] [563] Use of they are accounted Enemies. For thus the Corcyreans, before they laid Siege to Epidamnus, gave Notice to all [3] Strangers to depart, or else they should be reputed Enemies.

VII. What if they came thither before the War.

VIII. 1. But such as are really Subjects of the Enemy, that is, [1] from a permanent Cause, if we respect only their Persons, may in all Places be assaulted; because when War is proclaimed against a Nation, it is at the same Time proclaimed against all of that Nation, as we have shewn [a] above, in the Form of Denunciation. So in the Decree against King Philip, They did will and command, that War should be denounced against him, and the Macedonians under his Dominion. And he that is an Enemy may by the Law of Nations, be assaulted every where; according to Euripides, [2]

VIII. The Subjects of Enemies are every where to be attacked, unless in the Territories of a neutral State.

Νόμος γὰρ ἐχθρὸν δρᾶν ὅπου λάβῃς κακῶς.

Assault your Enemy where'er you find him.

And in Marcian the Lawyer, [3] Deserters, where-ever they are found, may be killed as Enemies.

2. They may then lawfully be killed in their own Country, in the Enemies Country, in a Country that belongs to no Body, or on the Sea. But that we may not kill or hurt them in a neutral Country, proceeds not from any Privilege attached to their Persons, [4] but from the Right of that Prince in whose Dominions they are. For all civil Societies may ordain, that no Violence be offered to any in their Territories, but by proceeding in a judicial Way, as we have proved [b] out of Euripides,

*If you can charge these Guests with an Offence,
Do it by Law; forbear all Violence.*

But [5] in Courts of Justice, the Merit of the Person is considered, and this promiscuous Licence of hurting each other ceases, which I have said was granted among Enemies in Time of War. [6] Livy relates that seven Carthaginian Gallies [c] rode in [564] a Port belonging to Syphax, who at that Time was in Peace both with the Carthaginians and Romans, and that Scipio came that way with two [d] Gallies; these might have been seized by the Carthaginians before they had entered the Port, but being forced by a strong Wind into the Harbour, before the Carthaginians could weigh Anchor, they durst not assault them in the King's Haven.

IX. 1. But to return to the Point in Hand, how far this Licence extends itself, will hence appear, in that the Slaughter of Infants and Women is allowed, and included by the Right of War. I will not to this refer the slaying of the Women and Children of Heshbon by the Hebrews, Deut. ii. 34. nor that they were commanded to do the like to the Canaanites, Deut. xx. 16. and other Nations [1] who were in the same Case [2] with them. It was the special Act of GOD, whose Right over Men is far greater, than that of Men over Beasts, as we have [e] proved elsewhere. That which is more proper to testify the common Custom of Nations, is that of the Psalmist, Psal. cxxxvii. 9. Blessed shall he be, that taketh and dasheth thy little ones against the Stones. Like to that of Homer, [3]

IX. This Right of hurting extends to Women and Children.

Καὶ νήπια τέκνα
Βαλλόμενα ποῖσι ἄστυ ἐν αἰνῆι δηϊότητι

*When bloody Wars a wretched Land infest,
The harmless Infants suffer with the rest.*

2. The Thracians of old having taken the City Mycalessus, put Women and Children to the Sword, as Thucydides [f] informs us. Arian [g] relates the same of the Macedonians, when they took Thebes; and so did the Romans at Ilurgis a City of Spain; ἔκτειναν ὁμαλῶς καὶ παιδιᾶ καὶ γυναῖκας, They slew Women and Children without Distinction, which are the Words of [h] Appian. Germanicus Caesar is reported by [4] Tacitus, to have wasted the Villages of the Marsi, (a People of Germany) with Fire and Sword; adding, Neither Sex nor Age found any Pity. And the Emperor Titus [5] exposed the Women and Children of the Jews to be devoured by wild Beasts in the publick Shews; and yet these two Princes were never esteemed to be of a cruel Nature: Whence it appears how much that Inhumanity was turned into [565] Custom. Now on der the nif old Men were also killed, as Priam by Pyrrhus. Aeneid. ii. 550. & seq.

X. 1. Neither were Prisoners exempted from this Licence ; Pyrrhus in Seneca, according to the Custom at that Time, pleads thus:

X. Yea, and to Captives, and that at any Time.

[2] Lex nulla capto parcit, aut poenam impedit.

*No Law commands to spare the captive Slave,
Or does forbid to punish him.*

In the Ciris of Virgil, this Licence is called the Law of War, and that even with respect to captive Women; for thus argues Scylla:

[3] At belli saltem captivam lege necâsses

By Law of Arms your Captive you might kill.

The Passage of Seneca just mentioned speaks of a Woman, namely Polyxena, who was to be killed. Horace advises, [4] Vendere cum possis captivum, occidere noli.

Forbear to kill the Captive, thou canst sell.

Creech.

For he supposes it lawful to kill him. And Donatus derives the Word Servus (a Slave) from a Verb that signifies to preserve, [5] Because, says he, a Slave is a Person whose Life is preserved, which by the Right of War ought to have been taken away. Ought, is an improper Expression, for it was lawful: So the Prisoners taken at Epidamnus were killed by the Corcyreans as Thucydides [a] relates, and 5000 Prisoners by [b] Hannibal. [6] And in Hirtius, a Caesarean Captain in the African War thus addresses Scipio, [7] I return you Thanks, that you have been pleased to engage your Word for my Life and Safety, being Prisoner by the Right of War.

2. Nor is this Licence of killing our Captives confined to any Time, by the Right of Nations, but it is restrained more or less in some Places, by the particular Laws of each State.

XI. We meet also with many Examples of Suppliants that have been slain, as by Achilles in [1] Homer, of Mago, and Turnus in [2] Virgil; which are not only recorded, but also justified by the Right of War. St. Augustine commending the Goths, for sparing Suppliants, and those that had fled for Refuge to Churches, acknowledges, [3] That which by the Right of War they might do, they thought unlawful for them to do. Neither are they always received to Mercy, that beg it; witness [566] the Greeks [4] who served the Persians at the Battle of the Granicus. And the Uspenses in Tacitus [5] begging Quarter, which (he says) the Conquerors denied, but let them die by the Law of Arms. Observe here also the Right of War confessed by that Author.

XI. Yea, even such as are willing to yield, if not accepted of.

XII. Neither do they always find Mercy, that [a] surrender without any Condition, but are often slain, as the Princes of Pometia [1] by the Romans, the Samnites [2] by Sylla, the [b] Numidians, and [c] Vercingetorix by Caesar. Nay, it was almost the constant [3] Custom of the Romans on the Days of their Triumph to put to Death the Commanders of the Enemies, as Cicero tells us in his fifth Oration against Verres. Livy in his 28th Book, and elsewhere. Tacitus in his 12th Annal, and many others. And the same Tacitus informs us, that Galba [4] caused the tenth Man to be killed of those, whom upon Submission he had received to Mercy; and Caecina upon the Surrender of Aventicum, caused Julius Alpinus to be slain, as the chief Promoter of the War; he left the rest to either the Mercy, or Cruelty of Vitellius.

XII. Yea, and to such as yield without Conditions.

XIII. 1. [a] Historians sometimes set down the Reason of this Cruelty, of the Enemies, especially to Captives, and Suppliants, as either by way of Retaliation, or because of an obstinate Defence. But these are rather Motives, than justifying Causes, as I have distinguished in another Place. For just Retaliation (properly so called) is to be executed only upon the Person of the Offender (as has been already said, [b] when we treated of the Communication of Punishment.) But on the contrary, in War this Right of Retaliation is often exercised upon the Innocent. This Custom is thus described by [1] Diodorus Siculus, The Chance of War being equal on both Sides, neither Party can be ignorant, that if they be vanquished, they must suffer the same themselves, which they intend to their Enemies. And in the same Author, Philomelus the Phocian General, Diverted the Enemies from an insolent and cruel Revenge, by treating in the same manner such of them as fell into his Hands.

XIII. This Right not to be referred to any other Cause, as Retaliation, Obstinacy of Defence, &c.

2. But there is no Man will judge an obstinate Adherence to our Party punishable, as the [2] Neapolitans alledged to Belisarius in Procopius; especially if we were engaged therein either by a natural Obligation, or by an honest and deliberate Choice. It is so far from being a Crime, that on the contrary it is reckoned one if [567] a Man quits his Post, especially by the Laws of the antient Roman Discipline; for in this Case they rarely allowed any Excuse, were the Fear or Danger never so great. [3] Livy says, to desert a Post was capital among the Romans. Every one therefore may use this Rigour to his own Advantage, and this Rigour is justified before Men, by that Right of Nations, which we now treat of.

XIV. This Right also reaches to Hostages, nor to them only, who freely give themselves as Pledges by a Sort of Agreement, but also those who are delivered up by others. 250 Hostages were slain by the [a] Thessalians, and 300 of the Volsci Aurunci by the [b] Romans. And we must observe, that sometimes Children were given as Hostages, as we may learn from the [1] Parthians, and from [c] Simon Macchabaeus, and sometimes Women, as by the Romans [d] in the Time of Porsena, and by the [2] Germans in Tacitus.

XIV. It extends also to Hostages.

XV. 1. As the Law of Nations permits many Things, in the Sense we have explained, which are forbid by the Law of Nature, so it prohibits some Things allowed by this Law of Nature. For if we respect the Law of Nature, when it is permitted to kill a Man, it signifies not much, whether we do it by the Sword or Poison. I say the Law of Nature, for indeed, it is more generous to attempt another Man's Life in such a manner, as to give him an Opportunity of defending himself, but we are under no Obligation to use such Generosity towards those who deserve to die. But the Law of Nations, if not of all, yet of the more civilized, allows not the taking the Life of an Enemy, by Poison; which Custom [1] was established for a general Benefit, lest Dangers should be increased too much, since Wars were become so frequent. And it is probable, that it was first introduced by Kings. For if their Life be more secure, than that of others, when attacked only by Arms; it is, on the other Hand, more in danger of Poison, unless protected by a regard to some Sort of Law, [2] and the fear of Disgrace and Infamy.

XV. By the Law of Nations it is forbidden to kill any by Poison.

[568]

2. Livy speaking of Perseus, [3] calls it a clandestine Villany. Claudian of the Offer of Pyrrhus's Physician to poison him rejected by Fabricius, [4] calls it an abominable Action; and Cicero [5] hinting at the same Story terms it a Crime. It concerns the common Interest of Nations, that no such Examples be given, [6] say the Roman Consuls, in their Letter to Pyrrhus, which Gellius recites out of Cl. Quadrigarius; and Val. Maximus [7] observes, Wars should be waged by Arms, not by Poison. And Tacitus [8] relates, that when the Prince of the Catti offered to poison Arminius, Tiberius refused it, imitating by that glorious Action the Conduct of antient Generals. Wherefore [a] they that hold it lawful to poison an Enemy (as Baldus [9] did upon the Authority of Vegetius) do regard the mere Law of Nature, but overlook that Law which is established by the Consent of Nations.

XVI. 1. Somewhat different from this manner of poisoning (as having something of open Force in it) is to poison the Heads of Darts, and thereby force Death a double way, which Ovid says [1] was much practised by the Getes, [2] Lucan by the Parthians, and Silius by some of the [3] Africans, and Claudian particularly by the [4] Ethiopians. But this also is [5] contrary to the Law of Nations, tho' not of all, yet of the European, and others civilized like them, which is rightly observed by Johannes Salisberiensis, [6] whose Words are these: Neither do I find the Use of Poison allowed by any Law, tho' sometimes practised among Infidels. Therefore Silius calls it, [7] to render Arms infamous by Poison.

XVI. Or to empoison Waters or Weapons.

2. So also the empoisoning of Springs (which cannot be concealed, or at least not long) Florus declares to be contrary not only to the Custom of the antient Romans, but also to [8] the Laws of the Gods; for the Antients frequently ascribed to the Divinity the Rules of the Law of Nations, as I have elsewhere observed; neither should it seem strange, that there are such tacit Agreements among Nations, in order to lessen the Dangers that attend Wars, when of old it was agreed between the [569] Chalcidians [9] and Eretrians during the War, Μῆτι χροῖσθαι τηλεβόλοις, Not to make use of Darts.

XVII. But it is not the same, when Waters are [1] (without Poison) so corrupted, [2] that they cannot be drunk, which Solon, and the [3] Amphictyones approved against the Barbarians. Oppianus, of Fishing, declares it was commonly done in his Time; it being, in Effect, the same Thing as if the Current of a River [a] were turned, or [b] The Veins of a Spring cut off, which, by the Law of Nature, and the general Consent of Nations, are allowed.

XVII. But not any other ways to corrupt the Waters.

XVIII. 1. But it is frequently disputed, whether the Law of Nations permits the sending one privately to kill an Enemy. But to explain this, we must distinguish between the Persons sent; whether they violate their Faith, given expressly or tacitly; as Subjects to their Prince, Vassals to their Lord, Soldiers to their General, Suppliants, Strangers, or Deserters to them that have entertained them; or whether the Person sent owe no Faith to him against whom he is employed. Thus Pepin Father of [1] Charlemagne, attended with only one of his Guard, passed the Rhine, and killed his Enemy in his own Chamber. Which [2] Polybius relates was attempted by Theodotus, an Aetolian, against Ptolemy, King of Aegypt, in the same Manner, calling it, ὁ υκ ἄνανδρον πολυμίην, An Act of Bravery. Such was that famed Enterprize [a] of Q. Mutius Scaevola, which he himself thus defends, I being an Enemy would have killed an Enemy. [3] Porsena himself acknowledged this to be an Act of great Valour. [4] Valerius Maximus calls it, A commendable and gallant Resolution; and Cicero [5] praises it in his Oration for P. Sextius.

XVIII. Whether it be against the Law of Nations to employ Assassins, explained.

2. For to kill an Enemy any where is allowed, both by the Law of Nature and of Nations (as I have said already), neither is it of any Concern, how many or how few they be who kill or are killed. 600 Lacedemonians with Leonidas [b] marched through the Enemy's Camp to the King's (Xerxes) Pavilion; [* The same might have been done by fewer. There were but a few that circumvented Marcellus [c] the Consul, and slew him; and but a few had almost killed Petilius Cercalis [d] in his Bed. [6] St. Ambrose brose commends Eleazar, that assaulted a mighty Elephant, [570] higher than all the Rest, supposing the King had sat upon it. Neither are they only that make these Attempts, but also they that employ them, excusable by the Law of Nations. [e] Those antient Roman Senators, such religious Observers of the Laws of War, were esteemed the Authors of that gallant Attempt of Scaevola.

3. It is to no Purpose to object, that such Men, being taken, are commonly put to exquisite Torments; for that is not because they violate the Law of Nations, but because, by the same Law of Nations, any Thing done against an Enemy is lawful, and every one is more or less severe as he judges it proper for his Interest. For so are Spies used, yet it is held lawful, by the general Consent of Nations, to send such, as Moses did, and such was Joshua himself (Ἔθος τοῦς κατασκόπους κτείνειν, It is the Custom to kill Spies, said [7] Appian) and that justly sometimes, by such as have manifestly a lawful Cause to make War, by others with Impunity, which the Law of Arms grants. But if there be any [f] that will not make Use of such Service when offered, that is rather to be attributed to Magnanimity, and the Confidence of one's own Strength, than to an Opinion of its being unjust.

4. But the Case is otherwise of those Assassins who act treacherously, for they not only transgress the Law of Nations, but also those that employ them. For tho' in other Things, they that make Use of wicked Instruments against an Enemy, may be reputed guilty before GOD, yet not before Men, that is, they have not offended against the Law of Nations; because,

[8] Mores leges perduxerunt in potestatem suam.

Custom has prevailed above Laws.

And, To deceive (Pliny [9] says) according to the Custom of the Age, is Wisdom; yet this Custom does not reach to the killing an Enemy, for he that should thus make Use of another Man's Treachery, is held not only to [10] offend against the Law of [571] Nature, but also of Nations. This is plain from what Alexander [11] wrote to Darius, Ye wage impious Wars, and tho' you carry Arms, you set a Price upon your Enemies Heads. And again, You do not observe towards me [12] the Law of Arms. And in another Place, I ought to persecute him to Death, [13] not as a just Enemy, but as a Poisoner, and an Assassin. And to this we may refer that of Livy, [14] concerning Perseus, He does not wage a just War like a Prince, but uses all base and clandestine Villainies, like Thieves and Poisoners. And Marcus Philippus, of the same Perseus, [15] All which, how hateful they were to the Gods, he would find by Experience. And also Valerius Maximus, The Murder of Viriatus, [16] had a double Perfidiousness, the one in his Friends, who killed him; the other in Q. Servilius Caepio, the Consul, who was the Author of it, by promising Impunity, and who thus bought the Victory, instead of gaining it by open Force.

5. Now the Reason why this is not allowed, as in other Cases, is what we gave before in the Case of Poison, to lessen the Dangers attending those who are at War, [572] especially Persons of the [17] most distinguished Rank. Eumenes (in Justin) said, He could not believe, [18] that any Commander would so desire to conquer, (viz. by hiring to kill his Enemy) as to set so bad an Example against himself. And in the same Author, when [19] Bessus had assassinated Darius, it is said, It was not to be endured for Example's Sake, and that it was the common Cause of all Kings. And Oedipus, to justify the Killing of King Laius, says, in Sophocles, [20] Κεῖν' ἑμῶν προσαρξάνων ὄψιν ἐμαυτὸν ὠφέλιμῶν.

Assisting him, I also help myself.

And in Seneca, on the same Subject,

[21] Regi tuenda est maximè Regum salus.

Kings should, in Honour, save their fellow Kings.

And the Roman Consuls, in their Letter to [22] ] Pyrrhus, It concerns the common Interest of Nations, that we endeavour your Safety.

6. In a solemn War then, and among those who have a Right to denounce a solemn War, it is not allowed: But where there is no solemn War it is accounted lawful, by the same Law of Nations. So Tacitus [23] declares the Plot against the Life of Gannascus, was not dishonest, because he was a Traitor. Curtius said, the Treachery of Spitamenes [24] to Bessus was the less odious, because no Perfidiousness seemed unjust against a Murderer of his Prince. Thus Treachery towards Robbers and Pirates, tho' it be not altogether blameless, yet is not punished amongst Nations, in Detestation of those against whom it is committed.

XIX. 1. The Ravishing of Women is sometimes permitted in War, and sometimes not. They that permit it, respect only the Injury done to the Body of an Enemy, which by the Law of Arms they think should be subject to all Acts of Hostility. But others, with more Reason, look not to that Injury alone, but also to the Act of Brutality, which being neither necessary for the Security of those who commit it, nor proper for the Punishment of those against whom it is committed, should be as much punished in War as in Peace; and this last is the Law of Nations, if not all, yet of the most civilized. So Marcellus, before he took Syracuse, is recorded to have taken [1] particular Care to preserve the Chastity, even of his Enemies. Scipio (in Livy) said it concerned his own Honour, and that of the People of Rome, [2] that nothing reputed sacred, by [573] the more civilized Nations, should be profaned by them (his Soldiers). Diodorus Siculus complains of Agathocles's Soldiers, [3] οὐτε τῆς εἰς γυναῖκας ὑβρεως καὶ παρανομίας ἀπέσχοντο, They did not abstain from that detestable Crime of violating the Chastity of Women. Aelian speaking of the victorious Sicyonians ravishing the Wives and Virgins of the *Pellenaean*s, exclaims, [4] Ἀγριώτατα ταῦτα ὦ Θεοὶ Ἕλληνοὶ, καὶ οὐδὲ ἐν βαρβάροις καλῶ κατάγε τῆν ἐμῶν μνείαν, These, (O ye Gods of Greece!) are Acts so cruel and abominable, as were never practised among the Barbarians, as far as I can remember.

XIX. Whether Ravishing of Women be against the Law of Nations.

2. And certainly, this should be [5] observed among Christians, not only as a Part of military Discipline, but as a Part of the Law of Nations, viz. that whosoever ravishes a Woman, tho' in Time of War, deserves to be punished in every Country. For by the Hebrew Law none did it without Punishment, as we [6] may gather from that Part which treats of a captive Woman, Deut. xxi. 10. That the Master might marry her, but upon Dislike might not sell her. Thou shalt not take Money for her, because thou hast humbled her. Upon which Beccai, one of the Hebrew Doctors, thus comments, GOD would have the Camp of Israel to be holy, not defiled with Whoredoms, and other Abominations, like the Camp of the Gentiles. Arrian, speaking of Alexander's falling in love with Roxana, says, Οὐκ ἐθέλησαι ὑβρίσαι καθάπερ αἰχμάλωτον, ἀλλὰ γῆμα γὰρ οὐκ ἀπαξιῶσαι, He would not ravish her, as a Captive, but honourably married her. Which he highly [7] commends. And [8] Plutarch, of the same, Οὐκ ὑβρίσειν, ἀλλ' ἔγημε φιλοσόφως, He scorned to debauch her, but married her; which was an Action worthy of a Philosopher. Plutarch also mentions one Torquatus, Banished, by the [9] Romans, into the Island of Corsica, for ravishing his Prisoner.

CHAPTER V ↩

Of Spoil and Rapine in War.

I. Cicero, in the third of his Offices, declares, [1] It is not against the Law of Nature to spoil or plunder him whom it is lawful to kill. No wonder then if the Law of Nations allows to spoil and waste an Enemy's Lands and Goods, [574] since it permits him to be killed. [2] Polybius tells us in the fifth of his History, by the Right of War it is lawful to take away, or destroy, the Forts, Havens, Cities, Men, Ships, Fruits of the Earth, and such like Things of an Enemy. And we read in Livy, [3] There are certain Rights of War, which, as we may do, so we may suffer, as the burning of Corn, the pulling down of Houses, the taking away of Men and Cattle. We may find in History, almost in every Page, the dismal Calamities of War, whole Cities destroyed, or their Walls thrown down to the Ground, Lands ravaged, and every Thing set on fire. And we may observe, these Things are lawful to be done, even to those that surrender themselves. The Townsmen, says Tacitus, [4] freely set open their Gates, and yielded themselves, and all they had, to the Romans, whereby they only saved their Lives: Artaxata was burnt by the Romans.

I. The Goods of an Enemy may be spoiled, or taken away.

II. 1. Neither does the [1] mere Law of Nations exempt sacred Things, that are consecrated, either to the true GOD, or to false Divinities, setting aside the Consideration of other Duties, (of which we will treat hereafter) from these Insults of War. Pomponius, the Civilian, tells us, When Places are taken from the Enemy, [2] all Things therein cease to be sacred. Cicero, in his fourth Oration against Verres, observes, [3] The Victory made all the sacred Things of Syracuse profane. The Reason of which is this, because those Things that are called sacred, are not of such a Nature, that the Moment they are consecrated to Religion, Men [4] cannot more dispose of them, and make them serve to the Uses of Life, but they [5] belong to the [575] Publick, and are termed sacred on Account of the religious Use to which they were intended. For Instance, when one People submit themselves to another Nation, or King, they then deliver up what is called divine, as appears from the Form which we have [a] elsewhere quoted, out of Livy; to which agrees that in Plautus's Amphitryo,

II. Even those that are sacred, which how to be understood.

They deliver up their City, Fields, Altars, Houses, and themselves.

And again,

They deliver up themselves, and all they have Divine and human.

2. Ulpian infers therefore, [6] that there is a publick Right, even in Things that are sacred. [7] Pausanias tells us, that it was a common Custom with the Greeks and Barbarians, that Things sacred should be at the Disposal of the Conqueror. So when Troy was taken, the Image of Jupiter Hercaeus fell to the Share of Sthenelus: And he brings many other Examples of the like Custom. Thucydides, Lib. iv. It was a Law among the Grecians, that he who was Master of any Country, whether great or small, was also of the Temples. To which also that in Tacitus agrees, All the Ceremonies, Temples, and Images, in the Italick Towns, were at the Disposal, and under the Power of the Romans.

3. Wherefore the People themselves changing their Minds, may turn any Thing sacred into profane, which the Civilians, [8] Paulus and [9] Venulejus, plainly intimate. And in Times of Necessity, Sacred Things [10] have been converted, even [576] by those who consecrated them, to the Uses of War, as by [11] Pericles, but with a Promise of full Restitution, by [12] Mago, in Spain, the [13] Romans, in the Mithridatic War, by Sylla, Pompey, [14] Caesar, [15] and others. Tiberius Gracchus says in Plutarch, [16] ἱερὸν καὶ ὁ σῦλον οὐδὲν οὕτως ἔστιν, &c. There is nothing so sacred, so inviolable, as Things consecrated to the Gods, and yet no Body hinders the People from using, changing or removing them at their Pleasure. Our Temples, says Seneca [17] in the Controversies, are stript for the State, and we melt the Vessels consecrated to the Gods to pay our Soldiers. And Trebatius [18] the Lawyer in Caesar's Time, That is profane, which from being Sacred, or Religious, is converted to the Use of Men and into Property. Thus Germanicus used this Right of Nations against the Marsi, as Tacitus [19] relates, He destroyed all Things both sacred and profane, and levelled with the Ground that most famous Temple among those Nations which they called the Temple of Tansanes: To this we may add that of Virgil,

*If my religious Hand
Your Plant has honoured, which your Foes profan'd.*

Dryden.

Pausanias [20] observes, that Things consecrated to the Gods used to be taken by the Conquerors; and Cicero [21] calls it the Law of Arms, speaking of P. Servius, He took away, says he, the Images, and the Ornaments of the Enemy's City, taken by [577] Force and Valour, by the Law of Arms, and Right of Conquest. So [22] Livy concerning the Ornaments taken out of the Temples at Syracuse by Marcellus, and brought to Rome, said they were got by the Right of War. And [23] C. Flaminius in his Oration for M. Fulvius, The Images were carried away, which is commonly done at the taking of Cities. Also Fulvius [24] calls this very Thing the Right of War. And Caesar [25] in Sallust relating the Miseries that usually fall on the Conquer'd, mentions the robbing of the Temples.

4. It is true however that, if it be believed, that there is any Deity in this or that Image, then to break or spoil it, is to them that are of that Opinion, a great Impiety. And upon this Supposition they that commit such Things are so often accused of Wickedness, and even of violating the Law of Nations; but if the Enemy be of another Opinion, then it is not so. As it was not only permitted, but commanded the Jews, (Deut. vii. 5.) utterly to abolish the Idols of the Gentiles; for that they were forbid to take them to themselves, the Reason was, to create in the Hebrews the greater Detestation of their Superstitions, by supposing that the very Touch of them was polluting: And not that what was consecrated to strange Gods should be spared, as Josephus [26] expounds it; doubtless in Flattery to the Romans, as he does in the Exposition of another Precept, of not naming the Gods of the Heathen, which he explains by [27] not speaking reproachfully of them; whereas the true Sense is that they should not name them with any Honour and Reverence, or without testifying an Abhorrence. For the Hebrews knew certainly, by the immediate Instruction of GOD himself, that there resided in those Images neither the Spirit of GOD, nor good Angels, or any Virtue of the Stars, as the deluded Gentiles imagined; but wicked Daemons, and such as are destructive to Mankind. Therefore Tacitus justly said, in describing the Rites and Ceremonies of the Jews, [28] All Things sacred to us, are profane to them. No wonder then if we read of so many Idol-Temples burnt by the Macchabees. So also Xerxes, when he destroyed the 1Mac. v. and 10. Images of the Grecians, did nothing against the Law of Nations, tho' the Grecian Writers [29] cry out upon it as a heinous Crime, to render their Enemy odious. For the Persians [30] did not believe there was any Divinity in them; but they [578] imagined the Sun was the only true GOD, [31] and Fire one of his Parts. By the Hebrew Law, as the same Tacitus rightly observes, [32] none were allowed to enter the Temple but the Priests only.

5. But Pompey, [33] says the same Author, entred the Temple by the Right of Conquest; or as St. Augustine relates it, [34] none with the Devotion of a Suppliant, but by the Right of a Conqueror. He did well to spare the Temple, and the Treasures of it, tho' as Cicero [35] expressly said, out of meer Shame, and to avoid Occasions of Reproach, not out of any Reverence; but he did ill to enter it again, as in Contempt of the true GOD, which the Prophets so highly blame the Chaldeans for; (Daniel v. 23.) for which Cause some think it was so ordered by the Divine Providence, that the same Pompey should be killed at Casius, a Promontory of Egypt, as it were in sight of Judea; but if we consider the Opinion of the Romans, [36] there was nothing done by him against the Law of Nations. So Josephus mentioning the Destruction of the same Temple by Titus, adds that it was done, τῷ τοῦ πολέμου νόμῳ, by the Right of War.

III. What we have said of Things sacred, may also be understood of Things [1] religious, (or Sepulchres) for these also do not belong to the Dead, but to the Living, whether a People, or a Family. Wherefore Pomponius observes, in the abovementioned Place, that as sacred Things, so likewise Sepulchres cease to be such, when taken by the Enemy; and [2] Paulus the Lawyer says, The Sepulchres of our Enemies are not religious to us, and therefore we may take the Stones thereof, and put them to any Use. Which yet is so to be understood, that no Violence be offered to the Bodies of the Dead, which [3] we have shewed in another Place, to be contrary to the Rights of Burial established by the Law of Nations.

IV. This I shall also here repeat, that the Goods of our Enemies may be taken away from them, not only by plain Force, by the Law of Nations, but even by Fraud, so it be without Treachery; nay, in this Case, [1] we may solicit others to betray our Enemy. For, in regard to such Sort of Actions, less vicious and very common, the Law of Nations now uses a Kind of Connivance, as the civil Laws do with respect to Prostitution and Usury.

III. Yea, and Sepulchres, adding a Caution.

IV. How far Fraud may be used in this Case.

CHAPTER VI ↩

Of the Right to the Things taken in War.

I. 1. Besides the Impunity of some Acts allowed to be used against our Enemies, of which we have treated hitherto; there is also another Effect, which [1] by the Law of Nations is proper to a solemn War. And indeed by the Law of Nature those Things may be acquired by a just War, which are [a] either equivalent to that, which tho' due to us, we cannot otherwise get, or which damnifies the Injurer, but within the Bounds of a just Punishment, as has been said [b] elsewhere. By Virtue of his Right Abraham [2] offered unto GOD the Tenth of his Spoil he took from the five Kings, Gen. xiv. as the Author to the Hebrews expounds it, Heb. vii. 4. and thus did the [3] Grecians, Carthaginians and Romans make the same Offering to their Gods, as to Apollo, to Hercules, to [4] Jupiter Feretrius. The Patriarch Jacob leaving an especial Legacy to Joseph above his Brethren, I give to thee (says he) one Part above thy Brethren which I took out of the Hand of the Amorite, with my Sword and with my Bow, Gen. xlviii. 22. where [5] the Word, I took, seems to be taken prophetically for I shall surely take, and this attributed to Jacob, which was done after by his Posterity, who were called by his Name, as if the Ancestor and his Children were but one and the same Person. Which is much better than to wrest these Words, as the Jews do, to that plundering of the Sichemites, which had been done before by the Sons of Jacob; for that, as being done treacherously, Jacob a just and religious Man did ever condemn, as we may see, Gen. xxxiv. 30. and xlix. 6.

I. What the Law of Nature is, concerning Things taken in War.

2. Now that this Right to the Spoils taken in a just War, was approved of by GOD, within the natural Bounds prescribed, (as I said) will appear, by other Places also of Scripture. GOD in his Law, Deut. xx. 14. concerning a City, which upon Refusal of Surrender was afterwards taken by the Sword, thus orders, Thou shalt take the Spoil of it to thy self, and shalt enjoy the Prey of thine Enemies, which the LORD hath given thee. Also the Reubenites and Gadites, and half the Tribe of Manasseh are said to have conquered the Ituraeans and their Neighbours, and to have taken much Spoil from them, 1 Chron. v. 20, 21, 22. This being added as a Reason, because in the War they called upon GOD, and he was propitious to them. It is also said of good King Asa, that having called upon GOD, he obtained the Victory over the Ethiopians [6] that had unjustly warred against him, and carried away much Spoil, 2 Chron. xiv. 13. which is the more remarkable, because those Wars had been undertaken not by the special Command of GOD, but by Virtue of the common Right of all Mankind.

[580]

3. Joshua also blessing the Reubenites, Gadites, and half the Tribe of Manasseh before mentioned, said, Divide the Spoil of your Enemies with your Brethren, Jos. xxii. 8. And when David sent to the Elders of Israel the Spoil taken from the Amalekites, he gave it this honourable Title, a Spoil taken from the Enemies of the Lord, 1 Sam. xxx. 26. For, as Seneca says, [7] Military Persons think it most honorable to enrich Men with the Spoils of their Enemies. We have also divine Laws for dividing such Spoils, Num. xxxi. 27. And Philo [8] reckons among the Curses of the Law, that their Fields should be reaped by their Enemies, whence must follow, Famine to their Friends, and Plenty to their Enemies.

II. 1. Moreover, by the Law of Nations, not only he that makes War for a just Cause, but every Man in a solemn War acquires the Property of what he takes from the Enemy, and that without Rule or Measure; so that both he and his Assigns are to be defended in Possession of them [1] by all Nations; which, as to the external Effects of it, may be called the Right of Property. Thus said Cyrus in Xenophon, [2] It is an eternal Law with all Men, when a City is taken by Force, the Goods all belong to the Conqueror. And so Plato, [3] All that belonged to the Conquered, now belong to the Conqueror. And in other Places, among several, as it were, Kinds of [4] natural Acquisitions, he places πολεμικῶν, that got by War, which he also calls ληιστικῶν by plundering, and χειρωτικῶν by superior Force. To which agrees Xenophon, [5] in whom Socrates brings Euthydemus by divers Interrogatories to this Confession, that it was not always unjust to spoil, when against an Enemy.

II. What the Law of Nations is in this Case, of which Examples are given.

2. And in Aristotle, [6] The Law, which is a Kind of general Agreement, has allowed, that the Goods and Effects of the Conquered should become the Conquerors. As also that of Antiphanes, [7] ὅτι τοῖς πολεμίοις, &c. We ought to wish our Enemies abundance of Riches without Valour, for in that Case they belong, not to the present Possessors, but their Conquerors. [8] And Plutarch observes in the Life of Alexander, [581] What did belong to the Vanquished, is and ought to be esteemed the Vanquishers. And in another Place, [9] The Goods of those overcome in War are the Reward of the Victors. Which are the Words of Xenophon, in his second Book of his Institution of Cyrus. And Philip in his Letter to the Athenians says, [10] All of us enjoy Cities, which were either left us by our Ancestors, or we became Masters of by the Right of War. Also Aeschines, [11] If you fight with us, and take our City by Arms, you justly possess the Rule over it by the Law of War.

3. Marcellus [12] in Livy declares, that what he took from the Syracusans he did it by the Right of War. The Roman Embassadors told Philip, [13] concerning the Cities of Thrace, and some others, if he had taken them by War, he might enjoy them by the Right of War, as the Reward of his Victory. And Masinissa [14] pleads, the Land which his Father conquered from the Carthaginians he held by the Law of Nations. So [15] Mithridates in Justin, he had not called his Son out of Cappadocia, which as a Conqueror he possess by the Law of Nations. Cicero [16] tells us, that Mitylene became the Romans by Right of War and Victory. He likewise says, [17] that some Things may become a private Property, either by Seizure, where they are without an Owner, or by War, when one Party proves victorious over the other. And Dion Cassius, [18] What was the Conquered's, becomes the Conquerors. And Clemens Alexandrinus [19] informs us, that the Goods of Enemies are plundered and acquired by the Right of War.

4. What is taken from the Enemy, by the Law of Nations, immediately becomes the Captors, [20] is the Opinion of Cajus the Lawyer. Theophilus the Greek Paraphrast on the Institutes, calls it φυσικῶν κτησῶν, [21] a natural Acquisition, as [22] Aristotle had called it, πολεμικῶν φύσει κτητικῶν; because the Right here acquired arises from the bare Fact, or taking Possession, without any other Title; as [23] Nerva the Son, by the Testimony of Paulus the Lawyer, declared the Property of Things begun from a natural Possession, and some Footsteps of it remain still in regard to those Animals that are taken, whether on the Earth, in the Sea, or in the Air; as also in regard to Things taken in War, all which are the Right of those who are the first Possessors of them.

5. It must be observed here that those Things are supposed to be taken from an Enemy, which are taken from the Subjects of an Enemy. So Dercyllides argues in Xenophon, [24] since Pharnabazus was an Enemy to the Lacedemonians, and Mania a Subject to Pharnabazus, therefore the Goods of Mania were just Prize by the Law of Nations.

[582]

III. 1. Moreover, by the Consent of Nations, Things are then said to be taken in War, when they are so detained, that the first Owner has lost all probable Hopes of recovering them, and cannot pursue them, as [1] III. When moveable Goods are said to be taken by the Right of Nations.

Pomponius determines a like Question. This takes Place, in Regard to moveable Things, when they are carried home, that is, into Places whereof the Enemy is Master. For in the same Manner a Thing is lost it is recovered by Postliminy; but it [2] returns to its antient Proprietor, as soon as it comes again into the Dominions of the Sovereign on whom he depends; which is explained elsewhere, [3] by Places whereof he is Master. And Paulus [4] the Lawyer affirms, that Man to be taken that is carried out of our Bounds. And Pomponius [5] declares, that Man to be taken in War, whom the Enemy has taken from us, and carried into Places whereof they are Masters; for till then he is reputed our Subject.

2. And by this Law of Nations the Case is the same with Respect to Goods as Persons, whereby we may easily perceive, that when in other Places Things taken are said immediately to be the Captors, [6] it ought to be understood upon Condition that they continue so long in their Possession; whence it seems, by Consequence, that at Sea, Ships, and other Things are then only said to be taken, when they are brought into the Enemy's Harbours, or the Place where their whole Fleet rides, for then there is no Hope of Recovery. But by a new Law of Nations, [a] established among the States of Europe, they are accounted lost, [7] if they continue twenty-four Hours in the Enemy's Possession. [583]

IV. 1. But [a] Lands are not said to be taken as soon as they are seized on; for tho' it be true, that that Part of the Country, (as [1] Celsus observes) which the Enemy with a strong Army has entered, is for that Time possessed by them; yet every Possession is not sufficient for the Effect which we are now treating of, but such a one as is durable only: Therefore the Romans were so far from thinking that Part of Land without the Gate to be entirely lost, whereon Hannibal encamped, [2] that at that very Time they sold it as dear as before. That Land then is reputed lost, which is so secured with Fortifications, which without being forced cannot be repossessed by the first Owner.

IV. When Lands are said to be acquired.

2. And this Derivation of the Word Territory given by Siculus Flaccus, [3] à terrendis Hostibus, from terrifying the Enemy, seems as probable as that of Varro; [4] à terendo, from treading upon; or that of [5] Frontinus, à terrâ, from the Earth; or that of Pomponius the Lawyer, à terrendi jure, from that Power to terrify which the Magistrates have. Thus Xenophon, in his Book concerning Tributes, says, that the Possession of Lands is held in Time of War by Fortifications, which he himself calls [6] Τείχη, καὶ ἐρύματα, Walls and Retrenchments.

V. This is also plain, that before the Right of War can entitle us to any Thing taken, it is requisite that our Enemy had first the true Propriety of it; for what Things may be within the Enemy's Towns, or other Places whereof he is Master, the Owners thereof being neither Subjects to our Enemy, nor animated with the same Spirit [1] as he against us, cannot be acquired by the Right of War; as is [584] proved, among others, by the Saying of [2] Aeschines, that Amphipolis being a City belonging to the Athenians, could not be appropriated by King Philip to himself, in a War which he made with the Amphipolitans. And indeed there is no Reason that [3] authorises us to take the Goods of those who are not of our Enemy's Party, under Pretence that they are found in his Country; and the Change of Master by Force, is too odious to admit any Extension.

V. Things not our Enemy's are not to be acquired by War.

VI. Wherefore the common Saying, [1] that Goods found in our Enemies Ships are reputed theirs, is not so to be understood, as if it were a constant and invariable Law of the Right of Nations, but a Maxim, the Sense of which amounts only to this, that it is commonly presumed, in such a Case, the Whole belongs to one and the same Master: A Presumption however, which, by evident Proofs to the contrary, may be taken off. And so it was formerly adjudged in Holland, in a full Assembly of the sovereign Court, during the War with the Hanse Towns, in the Year 1338, and from thence hath passed into a Law.

VI. What of Things found in Enemies Ships.

VII. 1. But this is certain, if we only respect the Law of Nations, what we take from our Enemies, cannot be claimed by those from whom our Enemies before had taken them by Right of War; because the Law of Nations [1] had first made our Enemies Proprietors of them by an outward Right, and then us. By which Right, among others, Jeptha defends himself against the Ammonites, (Judges xi. 23, 24, 27.) because the Land in Dispute was taken from the Ammonites; as also another Part of the Land from the Moabites, by the Amorites, by the Right of War; and from them by the same Right, by the Hebrews. [2] So David challenges, and divides as his own, the Spoils which he had taken from the Amalekites, and they before from the Philistines. (1 Sam. xxx. 18. & seq.)

VII. Things taken from our Enemies are ours by the Law of Nations, tho' they took them from others.

2. Titus Largius, (as Dionysius [3] Halicarnassensis relates it) thus gave his Opinion in the Roman Senate, [4] when the Volscians laid Claim to some Lands which the Romans had won by the Right of War, because they had been formerly theirs, We Romans account the Possessions won by the Sword most just and honest; neither can we be persuaded by a foolish Easiness, to destroy the Monuments of our Valour, [585] by returning them to those that lost them. Nay, those very Lands we ought not only to communicate to those Citizens now alive, but to leave them to our Posterity, instead of parting with what we have, and treating ourselves like Enemies. This also is plain from the Answer the Romans gave the Aurunci, [5] We Romans think it just, that whatsoever a Man wins by his Valour from his Enemies, he may leave to his Children, as being his own by a very good Title. In another Place, the Romans answer the [6] Volsci thus, But we account those our best Estates which we conquer from our Enemy; since they are ours, not by our own Laws, but a Law derived rather from the Gods than Men, and allowed by the constant Practice of all Nations, both Greeks and Barbarians; we shall therefore yield up nothing cowardly of what we have purchased valiantly; for it would be a great Disgrace to us, if either through Fear or Folly we should quit what we have won by Bravery and Valour. So in the Answer of the Samnites, [7] We have gained this by War, which Law of Acquisition is the justest.

3. Livy, speaking of Land near Luna, divided by the Romans, says, [8] That Land had been taken from the Ligurians, and it had been the Hetrurians before it was the Ligurians. By this Right the Romans held Syria, as [9] Appion observes, not restoring it to Antiochus Pius, from whom Tigranes, an Enemy to the Romans, had taken it; and Justin, out of Trogus, brings in Pompey returning this Answer to the same Antiochus, [10] As he took not the Kingdom from him whilst he was in Possession of it, so neither would he, after he had yielded up his Right to Tigranes, restore to him a Kingdom which he could not keep. So those Parts of Gallia which the Cimbri had taken from the Gauls, [11] the Romans afterwards taking, [12] held as their own.

VIII. But here is a more difficult Question, to whom do the Spoils taken from the Enemy in a publick and solemn War belong, whether to the People in general, or to private Persons, of and among [1] the People? The modern Expositors of the Law here vary very much in their Opinions; for most of them finding [a] in the Roman Law, [2] that the Things taken become the Captors; and in the Canon Law, [3] that the Spoils are to be divided by publick Determination, do say, one after another, (as is usual) that tho' principally, and by original Right, the Captor has the best Title to them, yet they are to be brought to the General, and he is to [586] distribute them among the Soldiers. Which Opinion, not less common than false, I shall take the more Care to confute, that we may see how unsafe it is in such Controversies to rely upon the Authority of those Doctors. There is no Doubt, but the Consent of Nations might have established the one or the other of these two Rules, either, that the Things taken should belong to the People that bear the Charge of the Wars, or to the first Captor; [4] but the Question is, what Nations really intended to establish in this Case? And I affirm, that their Intention was, that the Goods of one Enemy, with Respect to another, should be considered as Things [5] without a Proprietor; as we have before [6] explained, from the Words of Nerva the Son.

VIII. That Things taken from the Enemy are not always theirs that take them.

IX. 1. The Things that are Nobody's, indeed become the Captor's; but they may be called Captors, who employ others to take them, as well as they who take them themselves. So they who are employed by others to catch Fish, Fowl, Deer, or Pearls; as Slaves, Children not emancipated, and sometimes Freemen, take them for those that employ them. Modestinus [1] the Lawyer said well, Whatsoever is naturally gained, as Possession is, we may gain by any one whom we will appoint to do it for us. And also Paulus, [2] We acquire Possession by the Mind, and by the Body; the Mind, I mean our own, but the Body may be either our own or another's. And in another Place, [3] Possession may be taken by an Attorney, Guardian, or Trustee; provided it be done with the Design of doing it for us, and in our Name. So among the Greeks, they that overcame in the [4] Olympick Games, gained the Prizes, not for themselves, but for them that sent them. The Reason is, because one Man may make Use of another, as his Instrument, if both are willing, as we have declared in another Place. (B. i. Chap. v. § 3.)

IX. That naturally both Possession and Property may be acquired by another.

2. Wherefore the Difference put between Freemen [5] and Slaves, in Respect to Acquisitions, regards only the Civil Law, and properly belongs to Civil Acquisitions, as appears from the afore-quoted Place of [6] Modestinus And yet the Emperor Severus [7] brought these afterwards nearer to the Pattern of natural [587] ones; not only for the Good of the Publick, as he himself acknowledges, but also to follow the Rules of Right and Equity; therefore, setting aside the civil Right, that Saying holds true, that what a Man does himself, for himself, he may also do by another, and it is the same Thing [8] to do it by another as by himself.

X. We must then here distinguish between the Acts which in a War are truly publick, and private Acts, that are done by the Occasion of a publick War. [1] By these private Acts the Goods of an Enemy principally and directly belong to the private Persons, by the other to the People. Upon this Principle of the Right of Nations Scipio argues with [2] Masinissa, in Livy, Syphax has been vanquished and taken, by the Conduct of the Romans; therefore he, his Wife, Kingdom, Lands, Towns, and their Inhabitants, and, in a Word, whatsoever belonged to Syphax, is become lawful Prize to the People of Rome. And thus did Antiochus the Great plead, that Coelo-Syria did of Right belong to Seleucus, and not to Ptolemy, for that Seleucus maintained the War, to whom Ptolemy was but an Assistant, according to Polybius, in the fifth Book.

X. A Distinction of Actions done in War into publick and private.

XI. 1. Immoveable Goods are not usually taken, but by some publick Act, as by bringing in an Army, or by planting of Garrisons, therefore, as Pomponius decided, [1] Lands taken from the Enemy fall to the State, that is, as he explains it, Is not Part of the Booty, [2] strictly taken. Thus Salomo, a Lieutenant-General, in Procopius, [3] That Prisoners, and all other Moveables, should be a Booty to the Soldiers, is not unreasonable, (so it be done by publick Grant, as we shall hereafter explain it) but that the Lands should belong to the Emperor, and the Roman Empire.

XI. The Land taken is the People's, or his that maintains the War.

2. So among the [4] Hebrews and Lacedemonians, [5] Land taken in War was divided by Lot: Thus the Romans either kept the Lands taken in War to let out, (a small Part of it sometimes being left out of Civility to the former Owners) or sold them, or assigned them to Colonies, or made them tributary; whereof you may find many Testimonies in Laws, Histories, and Treatises on Surveying. [6] Appian [588] in his first Book of the Civil War tells us, When the Romans had conquered Italy, they took away Part of their Lands. And in his [7] second Book, Having subdued their Enemies, they did not take away all their Lands, but a Part. And Cicero [8] observes that their Generals having conquered an Enemy, sometimes consecrated his Lands, but by the Decree of the People.

XII. 1. But Things moveable, whether with or without Life, are either taken in publick Service, or out of it. If they are not taken in publick Service, [1] they are the private Captor's. And hither we may refer that of Celsus, [2] Whatever among us was the Enemy's, belongs not to the State, but to the prior Occupant. Whatever is among us, that is, is found with us in the Beginning of the War. For the same was observed of Persons, when they were in this Case considered as Goods taken. There is a remarkable Passage in Tryphoninus, to this Purpose, [3] But they who in Times of Peace came to dwell in another Country, upon the sudden breaking out of a War, unfortunately become the Slaves of those who are become their Enemies; where we may observe, that the Lawyer attributes this to Fate, because they fell into Bondage, without any Merit of their own. For it is common to ascribe such Things to Fate. So that of Naevius, The Metelli were made Consuls of Rome by Fate, that is, without any Merit of their own.

XII. Things moveable, either with or without Life, taken by a private Act, are the Captor's.

2. Thus it is, when Soldiers take any Thing from their Enemies when they are not upon Duty, or executing the Commands of their Captain, but doing what any other Person might do, or by a bare Permission, what is thus taken, is lawful Prize to the Captors, because they do not take them as Servants of the Publick. Such are the Spoils taken in a single Combat, and in Excursions, made freely, without Command, into an Enemy's Country, at a Distance from the Army, (ten Miles, according to the Roman Law, as we shall see presently) which the Italians call Correria, and distinguish it from Bottino, Booty.

XIII. And whereas we say, that by the Law of Nations, whatsoever is thus gained, becomes directly the Captor's, it is to be so understood, that this was the [1] Law of Nations, before any Thing was decreed in this Case by the Civil Law. For every State or People may otherwise determine of it among themselves, and prevent the Right of private Men, as we see done in many Places concerning wild Beasts and Fowl. So it may be ordained by Law, that whatsoever Goods of the Enemies are found among us, should be confiscated to the State.

XIII. Unless the Civil Law otherwise ordain.

XIV. 1. But as to those Things that a Man takes in a military Expedition, the Case is very different. For here every Soldier represents the Body of the State, and executes the Business of the whole political Body: Wherefore (if the Civil Law does not otherwise provide) the State acquires both the Possession and Property of Things taken, which it may transfer to whom it pleases; and because this directly contradicts the common Opinion, I find myself obliged to enlarge upon it more than usual, and to prove it from the Examples of the most celebrated Nations.

XIV. What is taken by a publick Act is the Publick's, or his that maintains the War.

[589]

2. I shall begin with the Greeks, whose Custom Homer [1] describes in several Places.

Ἄλλὰ τὰ μὲν πολίων ἐξεπράθομεν, τὰ δέδασται.

The Cities sack'd, the Spoils we did divide.

Achilles, in the same Poet, recounting the Cities which he had taken himself, says,

[2] Τάων ἐκ πάσεων, &c.

*The worthiest Spoils with our own Hands we took,
And rich they were: We bore them instantly
To Agamemnon: He behind the Ships
Divided some; but far the most reserv'd.*

For here we must look upon Agamemnon, partly as Head of all Greece at that Time, and so representing the whole Body of the People, by which Right he divided the Spoil, but with the Advice of his Council; and partly as General, and so out of that which was publick, he claimed a greater Share than others to himself. Therefore Achilles thus addresses Agamemnon, [3] Οὐ μὲν σοὶ ποτε ἴσον ἔχω γέρας, &c.

*I don't pretend to equal Share with you,
When any Trojan Town we do subdue.*

And in another Place Agamemnon, by the Advice of his Council, [4] offers to Achilles, a Ship laden with Gold and Silver, and twenty Women, as his Share of the Spoil. When Troy was taken, as Virgil relates, Aeneid ii. [5]

*There Phoenix and Ulysses watch the Prey,
And thither all the Wealth of Troy convey:
The Spoils which they from ransack'd Houses brought,
And golden Bowls from burning Altars caught:
The Tables of the Gods, the purple Vests,
The People's Treasure, and the Pomp of Priests.*

Dryden.

So, long after, [a] Aristides faithfully watched the Booty taken at the Battle of Marathon. And after the Battle at Plataeae, it was strictly forbidden, that any Man should take to himself any Part of the Spoil; and [b] afterwards it was distributed among the People, according to every one's Deserts. The Athenians being subdued, [c] Lysander brought the Spoil into the publick Domain. And the Spartans had publick Offices, called Λαφύροπῶλαι, [6] appointed to make Portsale of all the Prizes taken in War.

[590]

3. If we pass to Asia, Virgil [7] tells us, that the Trojans used to divide the Spoil by Lot; as is usual where Things held in common are to be divided among many. Otherwise the General had the dividing the Spoil, by which Right Hector, upon Dolon's Request, [d] promised to give him Achilles's Horses; whereby we may perceive that this Right of gaining Property was not in the sole taking of the Thing. The Spoil taken in Asia was brought to [e] Cyrus, being Conqueror, and so afterwards to [f] Alexander. If we look into Africa we there find the same Custom; so the Things taken at [g] Agrigentum, and at the Battle of [h] Cannae, and elsewhere, were sent to Carthage. Among the old Franks, as we find in the History of Gregorius Turonensis, whatsoever was taken in War [8] was divided by Lot. Neither had the King any other Share than what the Lot gave him.

4. But by how much the Romans exceeded all other Nations in the military Art, so much the more do they deserve our Consideration of the Examples they furnish us with, in Regard to the Subject we are now upon. Dionysius Halicarnassensis, a most exact Observer of the Roman Customs, thus instructs in this Case, [9] Τὸ ἐκ τῶν πολεμίων λάφυρα, &c. Whatsoever their Valour has taken from the Enemy in War, the Law has decreed to be publick, so that not only the private Soldiers are not Proprietors thereof, but not even the General himself; the Quaestor causes the whole to be sold, and brings the Produce of it into the publick Treasury. These are the Words of those that accused Coriolanus, who, to render him odious, do not express themselves altogether exactly.

XV. For it is true that the People are the Right [a] Owners of the Spoil. [1] Yet it is as true, that the Power of disposing of it was, in the Times of the Republick, left [2] to the General; yet so that he was to give an Account of it to the People. L. Aemilius says, in Livy, [3] that Cities taken by the Sword, not those that surrendered, were pillaged; but this at the Will of the General, not of the Soldiers. Yet this Power, which Custom had bestowed on the Generals, they themselves have sometimes, to take away all Suspicion, referred to the Senate, as Camillus [4] did; and they that have retained it, are found to have disposed it to several Uses, either for Religion, Reputation, or Ambition.

XV. Yet in such Things some Power was left to the Will of the General.

XVI. 1. But they who desired to be, or be thought most upright, [1] would not at all meddle with the Prey; but whether it were in Money, they ordered the [591] Quaestor of the People to receive it, or other Goods, the Quaestor was commanded to sell them publickly, and the Money arising from thence (called Manubiae, [2] Spoils, as Favorinus observes, in Gellius) was, by the Quaestor, brought into the Treasury; but if the Expedition was such as deserved the Honours of a Triumph, it was first publickly shewed. And [3] Livy says of C. Valerius the Consul, There was but a little Spoil (because they had been often plundered, and had secured most of their Goods in Places of Safety); this being publickly sold, the Consul ordered the Quaestors to put the Money into the Treasury. Pompey did the same, of whom Velleius [4] records, He gave the Money that he had taken from Tigranes, as his Custom was, to the Quaestor, and had it registered. And so M. Tully, [5] in his Letter to Salust, writes of himself, Besides the Quaestors of the City, that is, the People of Rome, no Man has or shall touch the Prey that I have taken. And this was generally done in the antient and best Times of the Commonwealth, to which Plautus alluding, says thus,

XVI. Who either brings 'em to the publick Treasury;

[6] Nunc hanc praedam omnem jam ad Quaestorem deferam.

Now all this Spoil I'll to the Quaestor bring.

And likewise of Prisoners,

[7] Quos emi de praeda de Quaestoribus.

Whom from the Quaestors of the Spoil I bought.

2. But other Generals did without a Quaestor sell the Spoil, and put the Money into the Treasury, as we may gather from [8] what follows in the Passage of Dionysius Halicarnassensis, whom we have cited a little above. So King Tarquin, when he had conquered the Sabins, [a] sent the Prey and Prisoners to Rome. So Romulius and Veturius the Consuls [b] sold the Spoil to supply the Treasury, the Army repining at it. But there is nothing more common, than to find in History an Account of the Riches that such or such a General, either by himself or the Quaestor, brought into the Treasury from the Triumphs over Italy, Africa, Asia, Gaul and Spain: So that it would be needless to heap together a great many Examples. But this is more remarkable, that the Spoil, or Part of it, was sometimes given to the Gods, sometimes to the Soldiers, and sometimes to others. To the Gods were given either the Spoils themselves, as those which Romulius [c] hung up to Jupiter Feretrius, or turned into Money, as [d] Tarquin the Proud built the Temple of Jupiter on the Tarpeian Hill, with the Money raised from the Spoils of the City Pometia.

XVII. 1. To give the Spoil to the Soldiers, the old Romans thought a Sign of Ambition. So Sextus the Son of Tarquin the Proud, when retired to Gabii, is said to have distributed the Prey among the Soldiers, [1] to make himself the more powerful. [2] Appius Claudius in the Senate, declared such Largesses to be new, prodigal, and inconsiderate.

XVII. Or divides them among the Soldiers, and how.

But the Spoil given to the Soldiers is either divided, or left to be pillaged. It may be divided, either instead of Pay, [3] or to reward Merit. Appius Claudius [4] [592] was for giving it in lieu of Pay; if it could not be sold, and the Money brought into the Treasury. [a] Polybius describes exactly the Manner of this Distribution, namely, that one Part of the Army, the Half at the most, was sent out in the Day-Time, [5] or in the Night, to fetch in the Spoil, who were ordered to bring all they found into the Camp, that it might be equally divided by the Tribunes, Shares being likewise allowed to them who staid in the Camp (which King David [6] made a Law among the Hebrews, 1 Sam. xxx. 24, 25.) and also to those, who either by Sickness, or because they were sent elsewhere, were then absent.

2. Sometimes the Spoil was turned into Money, and that, in lieu of it, [b] was given to the Soldiers, which was often done in Triumphs. The Proportions I find thus, a single Share to a Foot Soldier; a double Share to a [7] Centurion or Captain; a treble to a Trooper; sometimes a single [8] one to a Foot Soldier, and double to a Trooper; at other Times a Centurion had double the Share of a Foot Soldier, and the Tribune, as also [9] a Trooper, quadruple. There was also sometimes Regard had to their Merit, as Marcius, because he had behaved himself gallantly, was particularly rewarded by Posthumius, out of the Spoils taken at [10] Corioli.

3. Which Way soever the Spoil was divided, [c] the General [11] was allowed to take to himself ἐξαιρέτων, A choice Part, what he pleased; that is, what he thought was just and reasonable, [12] which also was sometimes granted to others for their [593] Valour. Euripides, speaking of the Trojan Ladies, says, [13]

Τοῖς πρῶτοις ἐξῆρημέναι Στρατοῦ.

The fairest were given to the Princes.

And of Andromache, [14]

Καὶ τὴν Ἀχιλλέως ἔλαχε παῖς ἐξαιρέτων.

She was a Prize for great Achilles' Son.

Ascanius, in Virgil, [15]

Ipsum illum clypeum cristasque rubentes, Excipiam sorti.

*His Arms and nodding Crest,
And Shield, from Chance exempt, shall be thy Share.*

Dryden.

Herodotus relates that noble Presents were given to Pausanias [16] after the Battle of Plataeae, Women, Horses, Camels, &c. So King Tullius [17] chose Ocrisia Corniculana for himself; and Fabricius, [18] in his Oration to Pyrrhus, in Dionysius Halicarnassensis, speaks thus, Of the Spoils taken in War, I might have chosen what I pleased for myself. Isidore, [19] treating of the Right of War, refers to it, The Distribution of the Spoil, according to the Quality and Services of Persons; to which he adds, The Portion of the General. Tarquin the Proud, according to Livy, [20] would both enrich himself and gain the Affections of the People with the Spoil. Servilius, [21] in his Oration for L. Paulus, said, he might have made himself rich by dividing the Spoil. And some think, that only the General's Part was called Manubiae, as Asconius Pedianus [22] ] for one.

4. But those Generals are more worthy of Commendation, who, quitting their own Right, have taken nothing of the Prey to themselves, as [23] Fabricius just mentioned, Preferring Glory even to Riches justly acquired, which he said he did in Imitation of Valerius Publicola, and a few others; whom M. Portius Cato [24] imitated in his Spanish Victory, saying, that he would take nothing to himself of the Prey, but barely what he eat and drunk; yet adding, that he did not blame those Generals who made Use of the Advantages allowed them; but as for himself, he had rather rival the best of Men in Virtue, than the richest in Wealth. Next to these are those Generals to be commended, who take to themselves some of the Prey, but moderately, as Pompey is praised by Cato in Lucan, [25] who,

[594]

— — Plura retentis
Intulit — —

Brought into the Treasury more than he kept.

5. In dividing the Spoil, they sometimes considered those that were absent, as Fabius Ambustus [d] ordered, at the taking of Anxur; and sometimes for certain Reasons for were omitted that were present, as the Army commanded by [26] Minutius, when Cincinnatus was Dictator.

6. But what Right the Generals, called Imperatores, in the Time of the Commonwealth had, was transferred, after it had been seized on by those who governed absolutely under that Name, to the Lieutenants, (Magistri Militum) who, by their Order commanded the Armies. This appears by Justinian's Code, [27] where it is enacted, that the Commanders of the Army shall not be obliged to put into the List of military Affairs, for which they were accountable, the Donations of Moveables, either with or without Life, which they gave the Soldiers out of the Spoils of the Enemies, whether at the Time and Place of Pillage, or elsewhere.

7. But this Division proved often the Occasion of Slander, as if the Generals by that Means proposed to gain Favour to themselves; with which they charged Servilius, Coriolanus, and [28] Camillus, as if they had enriched their Friends and Clients out of the publick Stock. They, on the other Side, alledged, that they had done it for the publick Good, [29] That the Persons who took the Pains being rewarded for their Labour, might with more Courage undertake other Exploits; which are the Words of Dionysius Halicarnassensis on this Subject.

XVIII. 1. I now come to Plundering, which was granted to the Soldiers, <sup>XVIII. Or suffers them to be plundered.</sup> either when they went to ravage the Enemy's Country, or after a Battle, or after the taking of a Town, so that upon a Signal given, they might run in immediately, which was rarely granted of old, and yet not without some Examples in those Times. For Tarquin [a] gave the City Suessa Pometia to be plundered by his Soldiers. So did Q. Servilius, [b] the Dictator, the Camp of the Aequi. Camillus, [1] the City of the Veii: Servilius, the Consul, [2] the Camp of the Volsci. Also L. Valerius [3] gave License to plunder in the Country of the Aequi. So did Q. Fabius, [c] having routed the Volsci, and taken the City Ecetra, and several others afterwards. Paulus, [d] the Consul, having conquered Perseus, gave the Spoil of that Prince's Army to his Foot, and that of the Country round about to his Horse. And, by the Decree of the Senate, he gave the Plunder of the [4] Cities of Epirus to his Soldiers. [5] Lucullus having vanquished Tigranes, a long while forbad his Soldiers plundering, [595] but at last, being assured of the Victory, he gave them Leave to do it. Cicero, [6] in his first Book of Invention, among the Methods of [7] acquiring a Right of Propriety, puts the taking of the Enemies Effects, which have not been publickly sold.

2. They who do not like this Custom, say, that by this License to plunder, [e] the greedy Soldiers often hinder the truly Valiant of the just Reward of their Bravery; and that We frequently see the backwardest to fight the most forward to plunder; whilst the most courageous expect only the largest Share of Labour and Danger, which are the Words of Appius, in Livy. [8] To which let us add that of Cyrus, in Xenophon, [9] ἐν τῷ ὑπάρχοντι ἐστὶ οἱ δ' ὅτε οἱ πονηρότατοι πλεονεκτήσειαν ἑν, In plundering I know the worst Soldiers get most. To this it is alledged, on the other Side, what a Man takes from the Enemy with his own Hand, is more dear [10] and pleasing to him than much more bestowed upon him by the Order of another.

3. Sometimes also Plundering is granted, because it cannot well be hindered; as it was at the taking of Cortuosa, a Town of the Hetrurians, according to Livy. [11] The Tribunes ordered the Spoil to be sold, but the Command was too late for the Purpose, for the Soldiers had already seized on it, and it could not be taken away without Envy. We also read, that the Camp of the Gallo-Greeks [12] was plundered by the Army of C. Helvius, against the Will of the General.

XIX. What I said, that sometimes others who were no Soldiers partook of the Spoil, or of the Money arising from the Sale of it; this happened commonly when some had contributed to the Maintenance of the War, and were to be [1] reimbursed. And sometimes Plays were instituted out of the Money of the Spoil.

XIX. Or gives them to others.

[596]

XX. 1. Neither is the Spoil diversly disposed of, only when the Wars are divers; but the same Prey, in the same War, is often appropriated to several Uses, distinguished either by its Parts or its Kinds. So Camillus [a] dedicated the Tenth of the Spoil to [1] Apollo Pythius, in Imitation of the Greeks, who first learnt it of the Hebrews; at which Time, under the Vow of tithing the Spoil, the Chief-Priests adjudged, that not only Moveables, but also Towns and Fields, were included. The same Camillus having vanquished the Falisci, delivered the greatest Part of the Spoil to the Quaestor, and [b] reserved a small Part for the Soldiers. So did also L. Manlius, [2] Either sell the Spoil which he brought into the publick Treasury, or divided it among the Soldiers, as equally as possible: Which are the Words of Livy.

XX. Or dividing them into Parts, disposeth of some one way, some another, and how.

2. The Kinds into which a Prey may be divided are these: Prisoners of War, Herds, Flocks, (called properly in Greek λεία, the Prey) Money, and other Moveables, both rich and ordinary. [3] Q. Fabius having overcome the Volsci, ordered the Prey and Spoils to be sold by the Quaestor; but the Silver he brought himself into the publick Treasury. And when he had subdued the Volsci and Aequi, [c] he gave the Prisoners, excepting those of Tusculum, to the Soldiers; and in the Lands of Ecetra, he left the Persons and Cattle to be plundered. When L. Cornelius took Antium, [d] he brought all the Gold, Silver, and Brass into the Treasury; sold the Prisoners, and the Prey, by the Quaestor, and left to the Soldiers the Provisions and Cloaths. Not unlike to this was that of Cincinnatus, [e] who having taken Corbio, a Town of the Aequi, sent the richest of the Spoil to Rome, the Rest he divided to the Soldiers by Companies. Camillus, upon taking Veii, [f] brought nothing into the Treasury, but the Money arising from the Sale of the Prisoners, and having conquered the Hetrurians, he sold the Prisoners, and out of that Money repaid [g] the Roman Ladies what they had contributed to the War, and laid up three golden Cups in the Capitol. And when Cossus was Dictator, all the Prey from the Volsci, except free Persons, was given [h] to the Soldiers.

3. Fabricius having conquered the Lucans, the Bruttii, and the Samnites, [4] enriched his Soldiers, restored to the Citizens what they had contributed to the War, and brought 400 Talents into the Treasury. Q. Fabius and Appius Claudius having [i] taken Hanno's Camp, sold the Prey, and divided it, rewarding those that had done signal Services. Scipio at the taking of Carthage, [k] gave his Soldiers the Plunder of the City, except the Gold, the Silver, and the Things consecrated to the Gods. Acilius having taken Lamia, [l] divided Part of the Spoil (among his Soldiers) and sold the Rest. Cn. Manlius having vanquished the Gallo-Greeks, and according to the Superstition of Rome, burnt their Arms, he ordered every one to bring in what he had taken; of which he sold a Part, that is, what was to come to the Publick; and divided the Rest amongst the Soldiers as equally as possible.

XXI. 1. From what we have said, it appears, that no less among the Romans, than other Nations, the Spoil belonged to the People; but the Disposing of it was sometimes left to the Generals; yet so, (as I said before) they were to give an Account of it to the People; which we may learn among others, from the Example of [1] L. Scipio, who, according to Valerius Maximus, was condemned of wronging the Publick, as having received six Pounds of Gold, and 480 Pounds of Silver, more than he had brought into the Treasury; and of others whom I have mentioned before.

XXI. Sometimes the Publick cheated of the Spoil.

2. M. Cato, in his Oration concerning the Spoil, did (as Gellius observes) in strong and noble Terms complain of the Licence granted to their Generals, and [597] their Impunity for cheating the Publick. Of which Oration there remains this Fragment, [2] Those who rob a private Person are condemned to be laid in Irons for Life; but the Robbers of the Publick live in Magnificence, we see nothing but Gold and Purple in their Houses. And again, [3] That he admired how any Man durst set up in his House Statues taken in War, as if they were so much Furniture. Thus did Cicero [4] exaggerate the Crime of Verres, in defrauding the Publick, because he had stoln a Statue, and that taken out of the Prey of the Enemy.

3. Neither were Generals only, but also private Soldiers, accused of this Crime of robbing the Publick, if they did not produce what they had taken. For they were all, as Polybius [5] says, bound by an Oath, That they should carry off nothing of the Prey, but honestly keep their Faith, as they had sworn. To which we may refer the Form of the Oath in Gellius, [6] by which the Soldier is obliged to take away nothing within the Army, or ten Miles round, that was of more Value than two Pence Halfpeny; or if he took it, to bring it to the Consul, or within three Days declare it publickly. Hence we may understand the Meaning of Modestinus, [7] He that hath stolen away the Spoil taken from the Enemy, is guilty of wronging the Publick. Which one Passage is enough to convince the modern Interpreters, that the Spoils taken from the Enemy do not peculiarly belong to the Captors; for it is plain there can be no robbing the State, but in Things publick, sacred, or religious. The Design of all this is to shew, (as I said before) that setting aside the Civil Law, and primarily, whatsoever is taken from the Enemy, in any military Expedition, belongs to the Prince or People who maintain the War.

XXII. 1. We added, Setting aside the Civil Law, and primarily, or directly: The first, because the Law, whether made by the People, as among the Romans, or by the King, as among the Hebrews and others, may dispose of Things not actually possest, to the Benefit of the State. And here, under the Notion of Law, we comprehend also Custom, if duly established. And the other, that we may know, that it is in the Power of the People to grant the Spoils to others, as well as other Things; and that not only after Acquisition, but also before it; so that the Capture following, the Donation and the taking Possession are united, [1] Brevi manu, as the Lawyers term it. Which Grant may be made, not only by Name, but also in general; as part of the Spoil was given in the Time of the Maccabees, to Widows, aged People, and poor Orphans; or to uncertain Persons, as the Gifts thrown [2] among the People, which the Roman Consuls allowed to them that could catch them.

XXII. That something may be changed of this common Right by any Law, or Act of the Will.

2. Neither is the transferring this Right, either by Law, or Grant, always a mere free Gift, but sometimes the Payment of a Debt, or Satisfaction for Loss received, or by Way of Reimbursement of Charges in the War, or Recompence for Services, as when Allies or Subjects serve without Pay, or for less than their Labours deserve. For in these Cases it is usual to grant either the Whole, or some Part of the Spoil, to others.

XXIII. And our Lawyers observe, that silent Custom has so prevailed almost every where, that our Allies, or Subjects, who serve without Pay, and at their own Cost and Hazard, should enjoy what they take. [1] The Reason, as to our Allies, is plain, because by the Law of Nature one Confederate is obliged to repair [598] the Losses of another, suffered on Account of the common or publick Affair. Besides, few will take Pains for nothing; Therefore, (Seneca [2] observes) we pay Physicians, because we call them away from their own Affairs to serve us. Quintilian [3] says the same, in Regard to Advocates, because they spend their Time and Study to defend other Mens Estates, and neglect all other Means of improving their own. As Tacitus also remarks, They neglect their own Affairs, to mind those of other Men. It is therefore to be presumed, (unless some other Cause appears, as pure Kindness, or some previous Contract) that the Hope [4] of gaining the Enemies Spoils, as a Reward to their Pains and Hazard, made them undertake it.

XXIV. 1. The Thing is not so plain as to Subjects, because they owe their Service to the State; but since not all, but some only, hazard themselves; therefore it is but just, that a Retribution be made by the whole Body, to those, who more than the Rest, undergo the Fatigues and Charges of the War, but much more the Damages attending it; in Return of which, the Hopes of the whole Prey, or of an uncertain Part, is readily granted to them, and not without Reason. Thus thought the Poet.

Praeda sit haec illis quorum meruere labores.

Prop. Lib. 3. Eleg. 3. Ver. 21.

Let them enjoy the Prey, who took the Pains.

2. As to our Allies, we have an Example in the Roman League, whereby the Latins [1] were admitted to an equal Share [2] of the Spoils taken from the Enemy in the Wars that should be made under the Conduct of the Roman People. So in the Wars wherein the Aetolians were assisted by the Romans, it was agreed, that the Towns and Lands should be the Aetolians, [3] but the Romans have the Prisoners and Moveables. After the Victory over King Ptolemy, [a] Demetrius gave Part of the Prey to the Athenians. St. Ambrose, [4] treating of Abraham's Expedition, shews the Equity of this Custom, He thought it just, that they who assisted him in that Expedition, and were perhaps in Alliance with him, should partake of the Spoils, as a Reward of their Labour.

3. As to Subjects, we have an Example in the Hebrews, among whom half the Prey was given [5] to them who went out to Battle, Num. xxxi. 27, 47. and 1 Sam. [599] xxx. 22. 2 Macc. viii. 28, 29. So the Soldiers of Alexander claimed the Spoil taken from private Men to themselves, but any that was very valuable, they presented to the King; whence we find them accused at Arbela, [b] who conspired to rob the Publick, by appropriating the Prey to themselves, and to bring none into the Treasury.

4. But what publick Things belonged to the Enemies, or their King, were exempted from this Licence. Thus the Macedonians having forced Darius's Camp, near the River Pyramus, carried away an infinite Mass of Gold and Silver, and left nothing untouched, [6] besides the Royal Pavilion; It being an antient Custom among them, (says Curtius) to receive the Conqueror in the Pavilion of the conquered King. Not unlike the Custom of the Hebrews, who set the Crown of the conquered King on the Head of the Conqueror, 2. Sam. xii. 30. assigning to him (as we find in the [c] Talmud) all the Royal Baggage taken in War. We read of Charles the Great, when he had conquered the Hungarians, he gave the private Spoils to the Soldiers, but what belonged to the vanquished King he brought into the Treasury. The Greeks [7] called the publick Spoils Λάφυρα, as we shewed before, the private Σκῆλα; their Σκῆλα were such as were taken in the Heat of Battle; and Λάφυρα when the Battle was over. A Distinction likewise allowed by other Nations.

5. It is plain, by what I have said already, that the Romans, in the early Days of their State, did not allow so much to their Soldiers, but the civil Wars indulged them with more Liberty. Thus [8] Equulanum was given to be plundered by the Soldiers, by Sylla. And Caesar, after the Battle of Pharsalia, gave Pompey's Camp to be pillaged by the Soldiers; and Lucan [9] introduces him speaking thus,

— — *Super est pro sanguine merces,
Quam monstrare meum est; nec enim donare vocabo,
Quod sibi quisque dabit.*

*Let each reward himself, there lie the Spoils,
The Claim of War, and of illustrious Toils.*

So the Soldiers of Octavius and Anthony [d] plundered the Camp of Brutus and Cassius. In another civil War the Soldiers of Vespasian being led against Cremona, tho' it was now near Night, made haste to storm the City, fearing lest otherwise the Wealth of the Cremonese should fall to the Share of their Commanders, and Lieutenant-Generals; for they knew well, says Tacitus, that [10] The Plunder of a City taken by Storm belonged to the Soldiers, of one surrendered, to the Generals.

6. But upon the Decay of Discipline, the Soldiers had greater Licence of Plundering granted them, upon this Account, lest, before the Danger was over, the Soldiers should leave the Enemy, and fall to plunder, [11] which has often caused the Victory to be lost. When Corbulo had taken Volandum, a Castle in Armenia, Tacitus [12] tells us, The common People, who did not bear Arms, were publickly sold, the Rest of the Spoil fell to the Conquerors. In the same Author, Suetonius [13] encouraged his Soldiers, in a Battle against the Britons, to continue the Slaughter of the Enemy, without any Regard to the Spoil, assuring them, that when [600] the Victory was fully gained, they should enjoy the whole. Such like Examples we frequently meet with, besides what we have above quoted [14] out of Procopius.

7. There are some Things of so small a Value, that they do not deserve to be reserved for the Publick, these generally belong to the Captors, by the Consent of the People: Such, in the old Roman State, were a Spear, a Javelin, Wood Fodder, Casks, Leather Bags, Torches, and any Thing else below the Value of two Pence Halfpeny. For, as Gellius [15] informs us, these Things were expressly excepted in the military Oath. Like to this is the Allowance to Seamen that serve even for Pay. The French call it Dépouille, or Pillage, and under it they include Apparel, Gold and Silver, within ten Crowns. In other Places, a certain Part is given to the Soldiers, as in Spain, one While [16] the fifth, another Time the third, and sometimes half the Booty, falls to the King; and the seventh, sometimes the tenth, to the General; the Rest belongs to the Captors, [17] except Ships of War, which are all the King's.

8. Sometimes the Spoil is bestowed with Regard to the Labour, Hazard, and Charge; as in Italy, the third Part of a Ship taken belongs to the Proprietor of the victorious Ship, a third to those who had Merchandizes in the Ship, and the other to those that sought against the Enemy. Sometimes it happens, that they who at their own Charge and Danger go upon military Enterprises, do not carry away all the Prize, but some Part is owing to the State, or to him who derives his Right from the State. So in Spain, if any Ship be fitted out upon a private Charge, part of the Prize comes to the King, and part to the Admiral. So likewise by the Custom of France and Holland, the tenth Part belongs to the Admiral, the fifth Part of the Prize being first laid aside for the State. But now it is customary at Land, in the taking of Towns, and in Battles, that every one keep what he takes; but in Excursions, whatsoever is taken, is divided among them that take it, according to the Merit and Dignity of each Person.

XXV. What has been said may serve to let us understand, that if in any Nation, not engaged in War, a Dispute arise concerning any Thing taken in War, the Things shall be adjudged to him, whom the Laws or Customs of the People on whose Side he is, and by whose Authority the Things were taken, shall favour. But if nothing can thereby be proved, then by the common Right of Nations, the Thing taken shall be adjudged to the People; if at least it were taken in the Act of War. For it is plain from what we have already said, that what Quintilian all edges for the Thebans, [1] does not always prove true, that the Right of War has no Power on that which is reducible to a Trial of Law, and that what is got by Arms can only be kept by Arms.

XXV. What Use may be made of what has been here said.

XXVI. 1. But whatsoever Things do not belong to the Enemy, tho' found among the Enemies, shall not be the Captor's. For this (as I said [a] before) is neither agreeable to the Law of Nature, nor was introduced by the Law of Nations. So the Romans, in Livy, tell Prusius, [1] If that Land had not been Antiochus' s, it [601] could not by Conquest belong to the Romans themselves. But if the Enemy had any Right annexed to the Possession of the Things, as of Pledge, or [2] Retention, or Servitude, that is no Hindrance that it should not be the Captors.

XXVI. Whether Things taken out of the Dominions of either Party be lawful Prize.

2. This is also disputed, whether Things or Persons taken without the Territories of either Party engaged in the War, belong to the Captors. If we only respect the Right of Nations, I think the Place here can be no Security, as we have said, we may lawfully kill an Enemy any where. But the Sovereign of that Place may, by his Laws, prohibit it; and, if they will not obey him, may demand Satisfaction, as for an Insult on his Authority: Just as, according to the Roman Lawyers, [3] the Proprietor of a Ground may hinder any one from coming to hunt there, tho', when one does so, the Beasts taken belong to the Hunter.

XXVII. But this external Right of acquiring Things taken in War, is by the Law of Nations so peculiar to a [1] solemn War, that it has no Force in other Wars. For in other Wars between Foreigners, a Thing is not acquired by Vertue of the War, but in Satisfaction of some Debt, which otherwise could not be recovered. But in civil Wars, whether they be great or small, there is no Change of Property but by the [2] Sentence of a Judge.

XXVII. How proper is this Right to a solemn War.

CHAPTER VII↩

Of the Right over Prisoners.

I. 1. There is no Man by Nature Slave to another, that is, in his primitive State considered, independently of any human Fact, as I have [a] said in another Place; in which Sense we may take the Lawyers, when they say that Slavery is [1] against Nature, but it is not repugnant to natural Justice, that Men should become Slaves by a human Fact, that is, by Vertue of some Agreement, or in Consequence of some Crime, [b] as we have also said already.

I. All Prisoners in a solemn War are, by the Law of Nations, Slaves.

2. But by the Law of Nations, which I am now treating of, Slavery is of a more large Extent, both as to Persons and Effects. For if we consider the Persons, not only they who surrender themselves, or submit by Promise to Slavery, are reputed Slaves; but all Persons [2] what so ever taken in a solemn War, as soon as they shall be brought into a Place whereof the Enemy is Master; as Pomponius [3] tells us. Neither is there any previous Crime required, for here every one's Condition is alike, even of those who have unhappily been found among the Enemies, upon the sudden breaking out of the War, [4] as I have said already. Polybius, of the Perfidy of the Mantineans, speaks thus, [5] What must these Men suffer, to make their Punishment just? If any one say, they should be sold, with their Wives and Children, as Prisoners of War; but so may they be, by the Law of Arms, who are most innocent. And hence it is, as Philo [6] observes, Many good Men lose their natural Liberty by divers Accidents.

3. Dion Prusaensis, recounting the several Ways of acquiring Property, says, [7] The third is, when a Man has taken a Prisoner in War, by that Means he makes him his Slave. So Oppian calls the carrying away of Children taken in War, Πολέμου νόμον, the Law of Arms. Halicut. Lib. 2.

II. Neither do only they themselves become Slaves, but their Posterity for ever; for whosoever is born of a Woman after she is a Slave, is born a Slave: And this is what [1] Martian said, that by the Law of Nations those that were born of Bond-Women are accounted Slaves. And Tacitus, [2] speaking of the Wife of a German Prince (taken Prisoner) said, she had Servitio subjectum uterum, a Womb subjected to Bondage, that is, her Child would be a Bondslave.

II. And their Posterity.

III. 1. But the Effects of this Right are infinite, so that there is nothing that the Lord may not do to his Slave, as Seneca [1] the Father said, no Torment but what may be inflicted on him with Impunity, [2] nothing commanded him but what may be exacted with the utmost Rigour and Severity; so that all manner of Cruelty may be exercised by the Lords upon their Slaves; unless this Licence is somewhat restrained by the civil Law. It is allowed by all Nations to the Lord, to have Power of Life and Death over his Slave, we are told by Caius, [3] (the Lawyer.) He also adds, that this large Power had been limited by the Roman Laws, that is, in Countries which are under the Dominion of the Romans. Hither we may refer that of Donatus upon Teren. What may not a Lord lawfully do to his Slave?

III. Any Thing done to them is unpunishable.

2. Not only the Person, but all Things taken with him, become lawful Prize. A Slave that is in the Power of another, [4] Justinian says, can call nothing his own.

IV. Hence the Opinion may be confuted, or at least restrained, which maintains that Things incorporeal [1] cannot be acquired by the Law of Arms. It is true, that primarily, and directly, they cannot, but they may be acquired by means of the Person whose they had been. But we must except those Rights that are founded on a particular Relation of Persons, which renders them unalienable, such as paternal Power. For if these Rights are capable of remaining, they remain with the Person, [2] if not, they are extinct.

IV. The incorporeal Goods of the Slave become the Lord's.

V. 1. Now this large Power is granted by the Law of Nations for no other Reason, than that the Captors being tempted by so many Advantages might be inclined [604] to forbear that Rigour allowed them by the Law, of killing their Prisoners, either in the Fight, or some Time after. As [a] I said before: [1] The Name of Slaves, Servi, (Pomponius tells us) arose from this, that Generals sold their Prisoners, thereby preserving them from Death. I said that they might be inclined to forbear, for there is no Sort of Agreement to engage them to it, if we only respect this Law of Nations, but a Motive drawn from Interest.

V. The Reason why this was ordained.

2. And for the same Reason he has Power to transfer this Right to another, in the same manner as the Property of Goods. This Power also reaches to the Children born in Captivity, because if the Captor had been pleased to have used his utmost Power, he might have prevented their being born; and consequently those born before the Captivity of the Mother, (if they are not personally taken) do not become Slaves. And the Reason that by the Law of Nations Children followed the Mother's Condition, without regard to that of their Father, is because the Cohabitation of Slaves was neither regulated by the Laws, nor maintained in such a manner, that the Mother should be always under the Eye and Guard of the Father, so that it would have been a very difficult Thing to prove who was the Father. And thus we must understand that of Ulpian, [2] The Law of Nature is this, that he that is born without lawful Marriage should follow the Mother's Quality, that is, general Custom founded on some natural Reason; for so the Expression Natural Right is sometimes taken in an improper Sense, as we have shewed [b] in another Place.

3. But that this Custom of Nations was not admitted without Reason, we may gather from the Practice of civil Wars, wherein Prisoners are generally put to the Sword, because they cannot be made Slaves, which [3] Plutarch well observed in the Life of Otho, and [4] Tacitus in the second Book of his History.

4. But whether Prisoners should belong to the People, or to the private Persons who took them, must be determined from what we have said already of the Spoil; for the Law of Nations has in this Case put Men in the same Rank with Goods. So [5] Cajus the Lawyer, Those Things which are taken from the Enemy, by the Law of Nations are instantly the Captors, so also free Men are made Slaves.

VI. 1. I cannot agree with those Divines, who maintain that Prisoners taken in an unjust War, or their Children, may not lawfully make their Escape, unless it be to their own Country. Here is the Difference, [1] If they can escape to their own [605] Country during War, they recover their Liberty by the Right of Postliminy: But if elsewhere, or to their own Country after the making of the Peace, they are to be delivered to their Masters upon demand. But it does not therefore follow, [2] that the Prisoners are bound in Conscience not to run away, for there are many Rights that have only an external Effect, and impose no internal Obligation, such are those of War, of which we are now treating. Neither can one object, that from the very Nature of Property a real Obligation is laid upon the Conscience: Because there being many Kinds of Property it may be such an one as has only Power in [3] human Judgment and by Compulsion, which is often found in other Kinds of Right.

VI. Whether Prisoners may make their Escape.

2. For such in some Sort is also that Right that makes void some Wills, or Testaments, for want of some particular Forms which the civil Law requires. For the more probable Opinion is, that what is bestowed by such a Will, may be retained with [4] a safe Conscience, at least, whilst there is no Opposition made to it. And the Right of Prescription, which a dishonest Possessor acquires by the civil Law, very much resembles that we now treat of. For the Courts of Justice maintain such a Possessor, [5] as if he were real Proprietor; just as the Law of Nations maintains the Possessors of Prisoners that are taken even in an unjust War. And by this Distinction is solved that difficult Point of Aristotle's, [6] Ἄρα δίκαιον τὰ αὐτοῦ ἔχειν ἕκαστον, &c. Is it not just that every one should enjoy his own? But whatsoever the Judge has decreed to the best of his Knowledge, (however unjust his Sentence be) stands good in Law, so that the same Thing may be both just and unjust.

3. But to return to our Question, there can be no Reason supposed, why Nations should have extended the Force of this Right so far as to oblige the Conscience. For the Power of claiming a Prisoner, of forcing him to return, nay, of binding him too, and of taking what he has, is a Motive strong enough to induce the captor to save Life of his Captive; or if he were so barbarous as not to be moved by this Consideration, then certainly he would not be prevailed upon by any Bond of Conscience, but if he think that absolutely necessary, [a] he may demand an express Promise, [7] or a formal Oath.

4. Besides we must not rashly admit that Interpretation, which makes an Act criminal, which is otherwise allowable, in a Law not arising from natural Equity, but made purposely to avoid a greater Mischief. [8] It signifies not much (says Florentinus the Lawyer) how a Prisoner escapes, whether freely dismissed, or by Force or [606] Cunning has got out of the Power of his Enemy. [9] Because this Right of Captivity is so a Right, that in another Sense it is for the most part even an Injustice; as [10] Paulus the Lawyer expressly calls it; a Right as to some Effects, but an Injustice in respect to the Nature of the Thing itself. Whence it is also plain, if any Man taken in an unjust War fall into the Power of his Enemy, he cannot in his Conscience be thought guilty of Theft, if he carries off with him [11] what was his own; or tho' not his own, [12] if it were due to him as a Reward for his Labour, over and above his Sustenance; provided that he himself owes nothing to his Master, upon his own, or the publick Account, or to him from whom the Master derives his Right. Neither does it avail to say, that such a flight, and carrying off Goods, when caught, use to be severely punished: For there are many other Things that those who have the Power in their Hands do for their own Advantage, and not because they are just.

5. But whereas some Canons [13] prohibit the persuading a Slave to quit his Master's Service; if that Prohibition relate to those Slaves who are justly punished with Bondage, or have by a voluntary Contract made themselves so, it is then just; but if to them, who are taken in an unjust War, or born of such, it shews only that Christians [607] should advise Christians to Patience, rather than to those Acts, which tho' strictly lawful, may give Offence either to Infidels or weak Minds. In like manner we are to understand the Advice of the Apostle's given to Slaves, unless that Advice may seem rather to require of Slaves a faithful Obedience to their Masters, whilst they are with them, which is agreeable to natural Equity, for their Labour and their Maintenance mutually answer one another.

VII. But as the same Divines hold, that a [1] Slave cannot resist his Lord in executing that external Right which he has over him without Injustice, I entirely agree with them; but there is this manifest Difference between that external Right, and those Things I said before. That external Right, which consists not in a bare Impunity, but is moreover supported by the Authority of Courts of Justice, would be wholly vain, if on the other Side it were lawful to resist. For if it be allowable for a Slave to resist his Lord, he may [2] as well resist the Magistrate that defends his Lord: Since it is from the Law of Nations that that Magistrate ought to defend the Lord in that Right, and in the

VII. Whether they may resist their Lords.

Exercise of it. This Right therefore is like that, which we have elsewhere [3] allowed to the Chief Magistrate in every State, whom the Subjects can never in Conscience resist. Therefore St. Augustin joins them both together, when he says, [4] Subjects should so bear with their Sovereigns, and Slaves with their Lords, that by suffering these temporal Evils with Patience, they may hope for eternal good Things.

VIII. But this also we must observe, that this Law of Nations concerning Prisoners, has not been at all Times, nor among [1] all Nations received, tho' the Roman Lawyers call it General, thus giving the Name of Whole to the most known and most considerable Part. So among the Hebrews, who had peculiar Laws, whereby they were separated from the Commerce of other Nations, there was a Place of Refuge [a] for Slaves, that is, for those (as the Interpreters well observe) who [2] became so by their Misfortune, not their Crime; on which that Privilege seems grounded among the French, given to Slaves to enter again on Possession of their Liberty, the Moment they come into the Dominions of that Kingdom, which is also now allowed, not only to those taken in War, but to all others whatever.

IX. 1. But among Christians [1] it is generally agreed, that being engaged in War, they that are taken Prisoners, are not made Slaves, so as to sell them or force them to hard Labours, or to such Miseries as are common to Slaves, and that with Reason; for they are, or should be better instructed by the great Recommender of every Act of Charity, than not to be diverted from the killing of unhappy Persons, unless they may be allowed the Exercise of a somewhat less Cruelty. [2] And Gregoras declares [608] it is a continued Custom among those of the same Religion, nor was it peculiar to them who lived under the Roman Government, but was common to the Thessalians, Illyrians, Triballians and Bulgarians. And this at least (tho' but a small Matter) is an Effect of the regard Men have to the Christian Religion, which Socrates [3] in vain attempted to have introduced among the Grecians.

2. And what Christians in this Case observe among themselves, [4] the Mahometans likewise do among themselves. Yet even among Christians this Custom still continues, that those taken in War are kept till their Ransom [5] be paid, which is set at the Pleasure of the Conqueror, unless it be otherwise agreed upon; but this Right of keeping Prisoners is usually granted to the Captors, except they be Persons of considerable Rank, to whom the State only, or its chief Magistrate has a Right, according to the Custom of most Nations.

VIII. That this Right is not allowed in all Nations.

IX. Nor now among Christians, and what is introduced in its stead.

CHAPTER VIII ↩

Of Empire over the Conquered.

I. 1. No wonder that he who can bring into Slavery every particular Person of the Enemies Party, that falls into his Hands, (as we have shewn in the preceding Chapter) may [1] also impose a Subjection upon the whole Body, whether it be a State, or part of a State; whether that Subjection be merely Civil, merely despotical or mixt. Seneca makes Use of this Argument in the Controversy De Olynthio, [2] he [609] had been taken by Right of War; he is my Slave by Purchase. It is your Interest, O Athenians, to maintain me in my Rights: Otherwise your Dominion must be confined within its former Bounds, by restoring what you have gained by War. Wherefore Tertullian [3] owns, that Empires are gained by Arms, and enlarged by Conquests. So Quintilian, [4] Kingdoms, Nations, the Bounds of Cities and Countries are determined by the Right of War. Alexander in Curtius [5] says, that Laws are imposed by the Conqueror, and received by the Conquered. A Favourite (of Antiochus) in his Oration to the Romans, [6] Why do you send every Year your Praetor with the Ensigns of Empire, the Rods and Axes, unto Syracuse, and other Greek Cities in Sicily? Truly you can say nothing else, but that having subdued them by Arms, you impose these Laws upon them. And Ariovistus [7] in Caesar's Commentaries says, that by the Law of Arms the Conqueror may govern the Conquered as he pleases. And again, The Romans govern those whom they have conquered, not after the Prescriptions of others, but according to their own Pleasure.

I. That Sovereignty, whether in a King, or People, may be acquired by War; and the Effects of such an Acquisition.

2. Justin tells us out of Trogus, [8] that Princes that made War before Ninus, sought not Empire, but Glory, and being contented with the Victory, did not reduce their Enemies under their Dominion. That Ninus was the first who enlarged the Bounds of his Empire, and subdued other Countries by War, and from him it became a Custom. Bocchus argues in Salust, [9] That he took up Arms to defend his Kingdom, for that Part of Numidia, from whence he had beaten Jugurtha, was become his own by the Right of War.

3. But Sovereignty may be acquired by Conquest, either so far as it was [10] in the King, or another Governor, and then all the Power he had passes to the Conqueror, and no more. Or [11] as it is in the People, and then the Conqueror has the same Right to alienate it as the People had, and thus Kingdoms become patrimonial, as I have said elsewhere, B. I. Chap. III. § 11.

[610]

II. 1. And yet a Sovereignty may be more absolutely acquired, as that which before was a State may cease to be a State; which may be done, either by adding it to another State, as the Roman Provinces were, or without any such Incorporation, when a King making War [1] at his own Charge conquers the People, so as to govern them not for their Profit, but chiefly his own Interest, which is the Character of despotic Power in Opposition to civil Government. Aristotle [2] says, There is a Government for the Benefit of the Sovereign, and another for the Advantage of the Subject, the one takes Place among free Men, the other between Masters and Slaves. The People then under this Government, for the future, are not a State, but a Multitude of Slaves; for it was well said of Anaxandrides, [3]

II. An Empire may be acquired over the People that is despotical, and then they cease to be a State.

Ὁὐκ ἔστι δούλων, ὧν γὰθ', οὐδ' ἀμοιβὴ πόλις.

My Friend, a State is not made up of Slaves.

2. And Tacitus thus opposes civil Government to arbitrary Power. And Xenophon of Agesilaus, ὁπόσας δὲ πόλεις προσαγάγοιτο, &c. [4] Whatsoever Cities be subdued, be excused them from all servile Offices, and required no more Obedience than what a free People pay their Prince.

III. And hence we may understand, what a mixt Sovereignty is between the despotick and the civil, namely, when Slavery is mixt with a kind of personal Liberty. Thus we read some People have their Arms taken away, and that they should use no other [1] Instruments of Iron, but what were necessary for Husbandry: [2] Others forced to change their Language and Method of living.

IV. 1. But as the Goods of every particular Prisoner, by the Right of War, belong to the Captors, so the Goods of the People in general belong to the Conquerors, if they please. For what Livy said of those that surrendered themselves, [1] When all Things are given up to the Conqueror, it is wholly in his own Power and will to take what he pleases to himself, and to leave them what he has a mind; the same may be said of those conquered in a solemn War. For a Surrender doth but voluntarily yield up, what would otherwise be taken away by Force. So Scaptius in Livy [2] says, That the [611] Lands in dispute were Part of the Territory of Corioli, which being taken, by the Right of War, they became then the Romans. And Hannibal in the same Author thus encourages his Soldiers in his Oration before the Battle, [3] Whatsoever the Romans have by so many Victories got, and heaped up, shall, together with themselves the Masters of it, be ours upon the Victory. And thus [4] Antiochus pretended, that Seleucus having subdued all the Dominions of Lysimachus, those Countries belonged to him (Antiochus) as Conqueror of Seleucus. So all that Mithridates had taken in War, and added to his own Dominion, [5] Pompey (by beating him) made the Romans.

III. Sometimes a mixt Government is acquired.

IV. That even the incorporeal Things may be acquired by War, where is handled a Question concerning the Thessalian Bond.

2. Wherefore even those incorporeal Rights, which belonged to the State, shall become the Conqueror's, as far as he pleases. So upon the subduing Alba, all the Rights of the Citizens were [a] claimed by the Romans: Whence it follows, that the Thessalians were entirely discharged from the Obligation of an hundred Talents [6] which they owed to the Thebans, when Alexander the Great having conquered the Thebans, had as their Lord by the Right of Conquest forgiven the Debt. Neither is that perfectly true, which Quintilian [7] all edges in behalf of the Thebans, that what he takes only belongs to the Conqueror, that the Right which is incorporeal cannot be seized on; that the Condition of an Heir is one Thing, and that of a Conqueror another; because the Right passes to the one, and the Thing to the other: For he that is Master of the Persons, is also of the Things, and of the Rights belonging to them. He that is possessed by another, [8] can be in Possession of nothing in his own Name, and when one is under the Power of another, [9] he has nothing in his own Power.

3. Yea, tho' the Conqueror leave to the Conquered Jus Civitatis, the form of a State, yet may he take to himself some Rights that belonged to it. For it is in his Power to limit his own Bounty as he pleases. Caesar imitated Alexander, in forgiving a Debt [b] to the Dyrrachians, which they owed to some of the contrary Party. But here it may be objected, that the War of Caesar [10] was not of the same Kind, concerning which this Law of Nations was instituted.

CHAPTER IX ↩

Of the Right of Postliminy.

I. 1. As the Lawyers of latter Ages have writ almost nothing reasonably of Things taken from Enemies, so neither have they of the Right of Postliminy. This Subject has been treated of by the old Roman Lawyers somewhat more accurately, [612] but often times too confusedly; so that the Reader could not well distinguish, what they attributed to the civil Law, and what to the Law of Nations.

I. The Original of the Word Postliminium.

2. The Opinion of Servius Sulpicius of the Word Postliminium, is to be rejected, who takes the latter Part of it to be only an Extension of no Signification; but that of Scaevola to be approved, who compounds [1] it of Post, [2] that may signify a Return, and Limen, which signifies Frontiers; for Limen, and Limes, differ only in Termination and manner of declining, for they are both derived from the old Word Limus, that signifies oblique, or across, and in the primitive Notion are the same; as Materia and Materies, Pavus and Pavo, [3] Contagio and Contages, Cucumis, and Cucumer; tho' afterwards, Limen was particularly applied to the Entrance of private Dwellings, and Limes to that of the Lands of the State. So the Antients called banishing of a Person Eliminare, and Banishment they termed [4] Eliminium, thrusting out of their Bounds, or Limits.

II. 1. Therefore the Right of Postliminy is that which ariseth from a [1] return to [2] the Frontiers, that is, the Territories of the State. Pomponius [3] says, that a Man has this Right of Return, the Moment he enters into any Place, that the State is Master of. Paulus, [4] when he is entered our Bounds, or Territories. But from a Parity of Reason, the general Consent of Nations has extended the Thing further, so that this Postliminium (or Right of Return) should take Place, even as soon as a Person (or any Thing capable of this Right) should come safe to our Friends, as Pomponius [5] has it in the aforesaid Place; or as Paulus [6] explains it by way of Example, [613] to a King in Alliance or Friendship with us; (where Friends, [7] or Allies, are not to be taken simply for those with whom we are at Peace, but those who join with us in the same War) unto whom they who shall arrive, are to be safe, as Paulus speaks, upon the publick Account; for it is all one, whether Person, or Thing, escape to these, or to his own Countrymen.

II. Where this Right takes Place.

2. But among those who are Friends, but not engaged in the same Party, Persons taken in War, change not their Condition (of Captivity) unless by a special Article and Agreement, as it was stipulated [8] between the Romans and Carthaginians, in their second Treaty, that if any of the Friends of the Romans, being taken by the Carthaginians, should escape into any Ports subject to the Romans, they should obtain their Liberty, the like Provision being made for the Friends of the Carthaginians. [9] Therefore the Romans, who being taken in the second Punick War, and sold as Slaves, were come from Master to Master into Greece, could not be admitted to this Right of Postliminy, because the Greeks were Neuters in that War; there was therefore a Necessity of their being ransomed, before they could be set at Liberty. We also read in Homer of several Persons taken in War, sold into such Countries as were at Peace, as Lycaon, Iliad, (Lib. XXI.) and Eurymedusa, Odysseus. Lib. VII.

III. According to the antient Language of the Romans, even free Men were said to be recovered by Right of Postliminy. Gallus Aelius, in his first Book of the Significations of Law Terms, saith, That a free Man who went from one City to another, and afterwards returned to that City, was first said to be recovered by the Right of Postliminy. Also a Slave taken Prisoner, by the Enemy, if he afterwards returns to us, returns to the Obedience of his old Master by Right of Postliminy. A Horse, a Mule, and a Ship, have the like privilege of Postliminy, in postliminii receptu, (thus

III. That some Things return, and some are recovered by this Right of Postliminy.

I judge those three Words with little Alteration may be retained, which Jacobus Cujacius, a Man incomparable for his Study of the Roman Law, would have left out) as a Slave: What kinds of Things do return to us by this Right of Postliminy, the same may return from us to our Enemies. But the modern Roman Lawyers have with more Exactness distinguished two Kinds of Postliminy, [1] viz. when we either return, or recover something.

IV. 1. The Opinion also of Tryphoninus [1] is allowable, who says this Right of Postliminy takes place in War, or Peace; in a Sense some what different than Pomponius [2] expressed it. This Right of Postliminy in Peace (unless it be otherwise stipulated) belongs [a] to those who were not overcome in War by force of Arms, but were by their own Misfortune surprized, as found in the Enemies Country, when the War suddenly broke out. But there is no Benefit of Postliminy to the other Prisoners in Time of Peace, [3] unless it were comprised in the Treaty of Peace: As the most learned [4] Peter Faber judicially corrects that Place of Tryphoninus, not disapproved [614] by Cujacius; the Solidity of which Correction appears, as well by the Reason that follows immediately after, as by the Opposition to what goes before. The Peace was made, and the Prisoners released (saith [5] Zonaras) for so it had been agreed upon. So Pomponius, [6] If the Prisoner, concerning whom, it was comprehended in the Articles of Peace, that he might return, should chuse of himself to remain with the Enemy, he shall not afterwards challenge this Right of Postliminy. And Paulus, [7] If a Prisoner taken in War, after the making of Peace shall fly Home, and upon the War's breaking out again be retaken, he by this Postliminy returns to him, who in the former War had taken him, unless it be expressed in the Articles of Peace, that the Prisoner should be released.

IV. This Right of Postliminy is of Force in Peace and

2. Tryphoninus [8] alledges this Reason out of Servius, that the Romans thus behaved themselves to their Prisoners, because they would have them place all their Hopes of returning in their own Valour, rather than in Peace. For as Livy saith, [9] Rome in the most antient Times had no Compassion on those that fell into the Enemies Hands. But this Reason being peculiar to the Romans, could not constitute a Rule of the Law of Nations; it might yet be one Motive why they themselves did admit that Custom introduced by other Nations. But this seems to be a better founded Reason, because Kings, and States, who enter into War, desire to have it believed, that their Cause was just in doing it, and theirs unjust who engaged against them: Which whilst both Parties desire to have equally believed, it would not be safe, for others not interested that would live in Peace, [10] to engage in the Controversy. Therefore the Nations that are at Peace can do nothing better, than quietly [11] to take that to be just, that was done in that War, and so the Prisoners mutually taken in Arms, should be esteemed lawful Captives.

3. But the same cannot be alledged against those who have been unhappily surprized by the sudden breaking out of a War, for no Design of injuring can be laid to their Charge: Yet it has not been thought unjust to detain them during the War, in order to weaken the Enemies Power; but upon the End of the War, nothing can be offered why they should not be discharged. Therefore it was established by a tacit Consent of Nations, [12] that such Prisoners, upon the Conclusion of a Peace, [615] should be released, [13] as being accounted innocent by both Parties. But that as to other Captives, every one might use the Right which he would be thought to have over them, unless the Articles of Agreement have otherwise provided. Therefore for the same Reason, [14] neither Slaves, nor Things taken in War, are restored in Peace, unless expressed in the Articles. Because the Conqueror pretends to have a just Title to them, which to contradict, were to lay a Foundation for a new War; whence it is plain, that that alledged in Quintilian for the Thebans, is rather ingenious than true; that Prisoners, if they can escape into their own Country, are to be esteemed free, because what is gotten [15] by Force, is not to be kept but by the same Force; we have hitherto treated of the Acquisition of the Right of Postliminy in Time of Peace.

4. In Time of War they return by the Right of Postliminy, who [16] were free before they were taken Prisoners, but Slaves and other Things are said to be recovered.

V. He that was free, returns so by this Right (of Postliminy,) if here turns with this Design, to follow the Fortunes of his own People to whom he returns, as Tryphoninus [1] has it. For a Slave, in order to become free, ought (if I may so speak) to acquire himself, which he cannot do without willing it. But whether he be retaken from the Enemy by force of Arms, or by Craft made his Escape, it is all the same Thing, as Florentinus [2] observes. And so it is likewise, if he be freely [3] delivered up by the Enemy. But what [4] shall we say of a Prisoner, who having been sold by the Enemy, is arrived amongst his own People, by passing, as it often happens, from Master to Master? This Controversy is discussed by [5] Seneca in the Olynthian, whom Parrhasius bought. For when a Decree was passed by the Athenians, whereby the Olynthians were ordered to be free; he makes this Query, whether by it was meant, that they should become free, or adjudged to be free; [6] of which the last is the best founded.

V. When a free Man, during the War, may return by this Right of Postliminy.

VI. 1. But one that is free, after he is returned to his own Country, does not only become Master of himself, but also of all Things, that he had in any Nation at Peace, whether corporeal, or incorporeal; because as neutral States had reputed the Fact for a real Right, in regard to the taking of the Prisoner, they ought to do [616] the same in regard to his release; otherwise they would not act in an equal manner towards both Parties; wherefore he that by Right of Arms is possessed of the Body of a Prisoner, has not an absolute but conditional Right to all Things that belong to him, for it may cease against his Will, viz. if the Captive should return into his own Country; for so he loses his Right to those Goods of his, as he does to his Person, of which they were an Accessory.

VI. What Right he may recover, and what not.

2. What if he had alienated those Goods, shall he who derives his Title from him that was Owner of the Prisoner by Right of War, be secured by the Right of Nations, or else shall those Things (alienated) be recovered? I mean those that are in a neutral Country. And here, in my Opinion, we ought to distinguish between those Things that may be recovered by Postliminy, and those not capable of that Right; which Distinction we shall explain below, so that the former seem to be alienated only so far as they could be alienated, that is, conditionally, but the other, [1] simply and absolutely. By Alienation here, I mean such as includes Donation and [2] Acceptilation.

VII. But as he that returns by Postliminy, recovers the Rights he was possessed of before, so those Rights which one had in Regard to him, are re-established, and deemed to have always subsisted, as if he had never been in the Enemy's Power, as Tryphoninus [1] says.

VII. All Rights in Regard to him are restored.

VIII. Paulus [1] justly makes this Exception to this Rule, as it relates to Freemen, They have no Benefit of Postliminy, that being conquered by Arms, yield themselves up to their Enemies. Because all Agreements made with Enemies, by the Law of Nations, are to be punctually observed, as we shall shew hereafter; neither is Postliminy allowed against them. Therefore those Romans, in Gellius, [2] taken by the Carthaginians, did own, that The Right of Postliminy did not belong to them, because they had engaged themselves by Oath. Whence it is well observed by Paulus, [3] that during the Time of Truce there is no Postliminy allowed. But Modestinus [4] [617] says, that if they that are delivered up to the Enemy, are engaged by no Covenant, [5] or Promise, they may return by the Right of Postliminy.

VIII. Why they that yield themselves are not capable of the Right of Postliminy.

[618]

IX. 1. What we have said of particular Persons, the same may be likewise of Nations, that those that were free, may recover their Freedom, if the [1] Assistance of their Allies happen to rescue them from the Power of the Enemy. But if the Body of the People that constitute the State, be dissolved, it is more reasonable to say, [2] that they are not to be esteemed the [3] same People; nor the Things formerly belonging to that State to be restored to them by the Law of Nations; because a People, like a Ship, by a Dissolution of the Parts, is entirely destroyed, because its whole Nature consists in that perpetual Conjunction. Therefore the City of Saguntum was not the same, when it was restored to the antient Inhabitants, eight Years after they had been driven out of it. Nor Thebes the same, after the Thebans had been sold by Alexander for Bondslaves. Hence it is plain, that what the Thessalians were indebted in to the Thebans before, was not restored to the Thebans by the Right of Postliminy, and that for these two Reasons. First, Because they were a new People that demanded this Debt; then, because Alexander, whilst he had the Lordship over them, had a Power to alienate that Right, and did really alienate it; besides that a Debt [4] is not to be reckoned among Things capable of the Right of Postliminy.

IX. How a People may obtain this Right of Postliminy.

2. What we have said of a State, is not very different from that of the old Roman Law, by which Marriages were dissoluble: Marriage was not reputed to be restored by Postliminy, but to be renewed [5] by joint Consent of both Parties.

X. 1. By what we have said, one may easily judge what Manner of Right, by the Law of Nations, Postliminy gives to Freemen. But by the Civil Law this very Right, as to what respects those Things that are done within the State, may be restrained by adding some Exceptions, or Conditions, and may be extended to other Profits and Advantages. Thus by the Roman Civil Law, [1] Fugitives are excepted out of the Number of those intitled to this Right of Return, even the Sons of Families, over whom the Father, (one would think) should have retained his paternal Power, as a Privilege peculiar to the Romans. But it was thought proper to make this Regulation, because, as Paulus [2] says, the Romans sacrificed their paternal Tenderness to the Observation of military Discipline. Agreeable to which, [619] says Cicero of Manlius, [3] that he strictly maintained the Roman Discipline, to his own personal Sorrow, that he might effectually consult the Safety of the State, in which he esteemed his own included; and that he preferred the Preservation of the General's Authority to the Motions of Nature, and the Affections of a Father.

X. What Rights have they of the Civil Law, who return by Postliminy.

2. This also somewhat lessens the Right of Postliminy, which was first enacted by the Athenian [4] Laws, and after by the [5] Roman, viz. That he that was redeemed from the Enemy, should be Slave to him who had paid the Ransom, till he had reimbursed it. But this seems to have been made in favour of Freedom, lest all Hopes of recovering the Money being lost, many (of the Captives) should be left in the Power of the Enemy. And this very Slavery was much softened by the Roman Laws, and by the last Law of Justinian [6] it was limited to five Years Service. Also, upon the Death of the Ransomed, [7] the Right of recovering the Money entirely ceased. Likewise, by any Contract of Marriage between the Redeemer and the Redeemed, [8] it was adjudged to be remitted; it was also [9] lost by the Prostitution of a Woman ransomed. There were also many other Things enacted by the Roman Law, in favour of those that would redeem Captives, and for the Punishment of their Kinsmen that would not redeem them.

3. This Right of Postliminy was on the other Hand extended by the Civil Law; in that, not only those Things which are capable of being recovered by the Law of Nations, but also all Goods, [10] and all Rights in general were preserved to a Prisoner that returned, as if he had never been in the Power of the Enemy; this was also the Athenian Law: For as we read in Dion Prusaeensis, fifteenth Oration, A certain Man pretending to be the Son of Callias, and that he had been taken Prisoner, in the Defeat at Acanthus, and had been a Slave in Thrace; when by the Right of Postliminy he returned to Athens, demanded the Inheritance of Callias from the present Possessors of it; and the only Thing he was obliged to do, was to prove that he was really the Son of Callias. The same Author also relates, that the Messenians, [11] after a long Time of Slavery, recovered both their Liberty and Country. Nay further, when a Prisoner of War was returned, [12] what had been taken from his Goods, either by Prescription, or a [13] Disengagement of any Obligation of another, by Vertue of which he might have before demanded any Thing, was [620] restored to him by a rescissory Action: As well as the Rights that were otherwise deemed extinct by [14] Non-Usage: For in the Edict of entirely restoring Ancestors, he is likewise included, who [15] is in the Power of the Enemy; and this was established by the antient Roman Law.

4. The Cornelian Law afterwards made Provision for the Heirs of those that died in Captivity with the Enemy, and [16] preserved all their Goods, just as if the Person taken Prisoner died at that very Time. If it were not then for these Civil Laws, the Captive's [a] Goods [17] would immediately be theirs that seized on them, because he that is taken by the Enemy, [18] is reputed as not to be at all. But if a Captive did return, he should receive [19] only those Things which, by the Law of Nations, challenge the Right of Postliminy. But that the Goods of a Prisoner, if he have no Heir, should come to the Publick, [20] was a Law peculiar to the Romans. We have hitherto treated of Persons who return from Captivity. I will now speak of such Things as are recovered.

XI. 1. Among these are chiefly Slaves of both Sexes, yea [1] even those that have been often alienated, [2] or have been discharged by the Enemy. Because (as Tryphoninus [3] well observes) a Release from the Right of an Enemy ought not to prejudice a Citizen of ours, his former Master. But that the former Master may recover his Slave, it is necessary that he either actually possess him, or that he may easily possess him. Wherefore, tho' in other Things it is sufficient, that they be brought just within our Territories, that will not be enough, in Regard to a Slave, unless also the antient Master know his being there. For he that is in the City of Rome (as it were) incognito, in Paulus's Opinion, is not [4] allowed to be yet [621] recovered. And as a Slave, in this Case, differs from Things inanimate, so does he likewise from a Freeman in this, that in Order to recover him by Right of Postliminy, it is not required that he should return, with an Intent to follow the Fortunes of the State. For that is only required of him, that is to recover his own Freedom, not of him that is to be recovered by another. And as Sabinus has it, [5] Every Man has a free Power to chuse what State he pleases to make himself a Member of, but not to dispose of the Right of Property which we have over him.

XI. How Slaves are recovered by Postliminy, how Fugitives, and those that are redeemed.

2. The Roman Law did not except fugitive Slaves from this Law of Nations; for even in these the Master may recover his old Right, as Paulus [6] observes; lest, allowing the contrary, it may be prejudicial, not to him who is still to continue a Slave, but to the Master himself. The Emperors [7] (Dioclesian and Maximinian) say in general, and without Restriction, of Slaves retaken in any military Expedition, what some extend without Reason to all Things retaken from the Enemy, that They ought to be deemed recovered, and not taken, and that the Soldier should be their Deliverer, and not their Master.

3. Those Slaves who are ransomed from the Enemy, by the Roman Law [8] become his that redeemed them, but upon laying down their Ransom, they are deemed recovered by the Right of Postliminy. But it belongs to the Civilians to give a more exact Explication of all this. But some Things have been altered by the modern Laws: And, to invite captive Slaves to return, they propose present Liberty to the disabled, and to the Rest, after five Years; as you may see in the military Laws collected by [9] Rufus.

XII. That Question more nearly relates to us, whether a People subjected to a foreign Prince return to their antient State, which may be handled, by supposing that it is not their antient Sovereign, but some Ally, who has rescued them from the Enemy; the same, I think, may be answered, [1] as before, of Slaves, unless it be otherwise agreed by the Treaty of Alliance.

XII. Whether Subjects may be recovered by Postliminy.

[622]

XIII. 1. Among Things recoverable by Postliminy, the first to be considered are Lands; It is true (saith [1] Pomponius) the Enemy being beaten out of the Lands which they had seized on, the Right of them returns to their former Owners. But the Enemy must be understood to be driven out, when they cannot come thither any more openly as we have explained elsewhere, (Ch. iv. of this Book, § 4.) Thus the Lacedemonians restored the Island Aegina, recovered from the Athenians [2] to the antient Lords. So [3] Justinian, and other Emperors, restored the Lands recovered from the Goths and Vandals, to the Heirs of the antient Possessors, [4] not admitting those Prescriptions against them, which the Roman Laws had introduced.

XIII. That Lands are recovered by Postliminy.

2. What I have said of Lands takes Place also, in my Opinion, in Regard to all Rights annexed to those Lands. For even Places taken by the Enemy, which had been sacred or religious, when freed from that Misfortune, return as it were by a Kind of Postliminy to their former State, as [5] Pomponius decides. Whereto agrees that of Cicero, in his Oration against Verres, concerning Diana [6] of Segesta, She recovered her Worship and Habitation by the Valour of Publius Africanus. And Marcianus [7] compares that Right to the Right of Postliminy, by which, a Place of the Shore being built upon, when the Building is fallen, makes again Part of the Shore. Upon this Principle it must be [8] said, that the Profits of the Land recovered are to be restored; like to what Pomponius delivers of Lands that had been [9] drowned. So it is provided by the Laws of [a] Spain, that Counties, and other hereditary Jurisdictions, shall return by Postliminy; the greater absolutely, the less if within the Space of four Years they be claimed after their Recovery, unless it be a Castle, or Fort, lost by War, and recovered again in what Manner soever, the King then hath Right to keep the Possession of it.

XIV. 1. Concerning Moveables, the general Rule is directly contrary, that they do not return by Postliminy, but make Part of the Spoil; for Labeo [1] opposes those two Ideas. Therefore, when such Things pass from the Enemy to others by Commerce, where soever they are found, they are allowed to be his who bought them; neither has the first Owner [2] any Power to claim them, either amongst [3] [623] a neutral People, or in his own Country. But from this Rule we find of old excepted, Things that were useful in War; which seems to have been generally allowed by all Nations, for this Reason, that the Hope of recovering them might render Men more willing to provide them: For the Laws and Views of most States at that Time, had Respect to warlike Affairs, and therefore they easily agreed in this. We have already mentioned, out of Gallus Aelius, [4] what Things were esteemed useful in War; but they are more exactly set down, both by Cicero [5] in his Topicks, and in Modestinus, [6] viz. Men of War and Merchant Ships, but not Gallies and Pleasure-Boats; Mules, but only those used to the Pack-Saddle; Horses and Mares, but only those that will endure the Bit. And these are Things [7] which by the Roman Law may be validly bequeathed, and may come into the Division [8] of an Inheritance.

XIV. What Difference was formerly observed in Relation to Moveables.

2. Arms [9] also, and Cloaths, are useful in War, but these returned not by Postliminy, because it was an odious Thing, and was even accounted criminal, for a Man to suffer his Arms or Cloaths to be taken from him, as may be every where found in Historians. And in this, Arms are observed to differ from [10] Horses, because the Horse may possibly break loose without the Fault of the Rider. And this Difference of Moveables seems to have been used in the West, even under the Goths, to the Time of Boetius. For he expounding the Topicks of Cicero, seems to speak of this Right, as if it were in full Force to that Day.

[624]

XV. But in these later Times, if not before, this Difference seems to have been taken away. [1] For those skilled in the Customs of Nations do commonly declare, that Moveables are not recovered by Postliminy, [a] and we see the same in many Places determined in Relation to Ships.

XV. What the Law now says of Moveables.

XVI. But those Things (tho' taken by the Enemy) which were not yet brought into Places whereof he is Master, have no Occasion for Postliminy, because they have not yet changed their Owner by the Right of Nations. Also what Pirates and Robbers have taken from us, has no Need of Postliminy, (as [2] Ulpianus and Javolenus [3] relate) because the Law of Nations has not authorised them to appropriate it to themselves, in Prejudice of the antient Owner; on which Account the Athenians pretended to receive the Island [4] Halonesus, which Pirates had taken from them, and Philip from the Pirates, as restored, not given, by Philip. Therefore, Things taken by them, where soever they are found, may be claimed; but, as we have concluded [a] in another Place, so much must be restored to the Person who got Possession upon his own Charge, as the right Owner would willingly have expended for the Recovery of them.

XVI. What Things are recovered that want not this Right of Postliminy.

XVII. But it may be otherwise determined by the Civil Law. As [1] by the Laws of Spain, Ships taken from Pirates, become theirs who take them from the Pirates. For it is not unjust that a private Thing should yield [2] to a publick Advantage, especially when the Recovery may prove so difficult. But this Law cannot hinder Foreigners from challenging their own.

XVII. That the Civil Law changes some Things, as to their own Subjects.

XVIII. 1. That is more admirable, which the Roman Laws do testify, viz. That this Right of Postliminy took Place, not only between Enemies, but even between Romans and all foreign Nations. But this (as I said [a] before) was the Reliques of that barbarous Age of the Nomades, wherein the Sentiments of that natural Society that is between all Men were stifled by wicked Customs. Therefore, among Nations which were not actually engaged in a publick War with one another, there was a Kind of War between private Men, authorised and, as it were, declared by Custom; and that such a Licence might not produce many Murders, they agreed to settle Laws of Captivity, which, consequently, introduced that of Postliminy, yet otherwise than with Robbers and Pirates, because those private Hostilities terminated in Conventions, accompanied with a Sort of Equity, which Robbers and Pirates usually despise.

XVIII. How Postliminy was observed among those that were not Enemies.

[625]

2. It seems of old to have been very much disputed, whether any of a confederate Nation, being our Slaves, if they should escape home, might be esteemed to return by Postliminy. For so [1] Cicero propounds this Question, in his first Book De Oratore. And Gallus Aelius [2] thus gives us his Opinion, We observe the same Right of Postliminy, with a free People, with Allies, and with Kings, as with Enemies. On the contrary Proculus, [3] I doubt not, but that Allies, and a free People are as Strangers to us, there is no Postliminy between us and them.

3. In my Opinion we ought to distinguish between Treaties, that if any were made merely with design to put an End to, or to prevent open War, they could not for the Time to come prevent the taking of Prisoners, or the Right of Postliminy. But if any expressed, that they might on both Sides travel in Safety, from one State to another, upon the publick Faith, then the taking of Prisoners ceasing between these two Nations, the Right of Postliminy ceased also. And Pomponius [4] seems to hint as much, when he says, If there be a Nation, with whom we have neither Friendship nor Hospitality, nor Alliance on account of Friendship, they indeed are not Enemies. But whatever of ours happens to come to them, is theirs. And a free Man of ours taken by them, becomes their Slave; and so from them to us; therefore in this Case also Postliminy is allowed. When he said an Alliance on the account of Friendship, he plainly shews that other Alliances may be made, in which may be neither Tie of Friendship nor Right of Hospitality. And Proculus fully declares, that he takes those to be People confederated, who have reciprocally promised Friendship, and safe Hospitality, [5] when he adds, For what need is there of any Postliminy between us? When they also may retain even their own Liberty, and Property of their own Things with us, as freely as among themselves, and so we among them. Therefore that which follows in Gallus Aelius, There is no Postliminy with those Nations, that are under our Government, as Cujacius [6] rightly reads it, must be supplied with this Addition, nor with those, with whom we have made an Alliance on account of Friendship.

XIX. 1. But in our Days, not only among Christians, but even most of the Mahometans, as this Right of Captivity out of Time of War, so also that of [626] Postliminy is abolished, the Necessity of both ceasing because the Rights of that natural Relation, which is between all Mankind, have been re-established.

XIX. When this Right may now be in force.

2. Yet that antient Right of Nations may still be in Force, if we should have to do with a State so barbarous, as to think it lawful without any manner of Reason, or Denunciation of War, to treat in a hostile Manner the Persons and Goods of all Strangers. And even while I am writing this, it is adjudged in the great Chamber of the Parliament of Paris (Nicolaus Verdunius being first President) [1] that the Goods of the Subjects of France, taken by the Algerines, a Nest of Pyrates that live upon the Spoil of all Sea-faring People, by the Right of War had changed their Owner, and therefore when retaken by others than the antient Proprietors, became theirs that retook them. In the same Cause was this likewise adjudged, (which I said but now) that Ships are not in these Days reckoned among Things recoverable by Postliminy.

CHAPTER X ↩

Advice concerning Things done in an unjust War.

I. 1. I must now reflect, and take away from those that make War almost all the Rights, which I may seem to have granted them; which yet in Reality I have not. For when I first undertook to explain this Part of the Law of Nations, I then declared, that many Things are said to be of Right and lawful, because they escape Punishment, and partly because Courts of Justice have given them their Authority, tho' they are contrary to the Rules, either of Justice properly so called, or of other Vertues, or at least those, who abstain from such Things, act in a manner more honest and more commendable in the Opinion of good Men.

I. In what Sense Honour and Conscience may be said to forbid what Law permits.

2. Seneca in his Troas [1] makes Pyrrhus speak thus,

Lex nulla capto parcat, aut poenam impedit.

*No Law commands to spare the Captive Slave,
Or does forbid to punish him.*

Agamemnon replies,

Quod non vetat Lex, hoc vetat fieri Pudor.

What Law forbids not, Honour doth restrain.

By Honour we are here to understand, not so much the Consideration of other Men, and the Care of our own Reputation; as a respect for Equity and Justice, at least a constant Adherence to that which is most just and most honest; so we read in Justinian's [2] Institutions, Feoffments of Trust so called, because they are secured by no Bond of Law, but only the Honour of the Person entrusted. So in Quintilian [3] the Father, the reditor cannot (Salvo pudore) with Honour demand his Debt of the Security, but when he cannot get it from the prime Debtor. And in this Sense we often see, Justitia and Pudor, Justice and Honour, joined together.

[4] *Nondum Justitiam facinus Mortale fugârat,
Ultima de superis illa reliquit humum.
Proque metu populum sine vi pudor ipse regebat. [627]*

*The Crimes of Men were not so mighty grown,
As Justice to expell from mortal View;
She, last of all the Goddesses, retir'd;
And Honour, without Force, then rul'd the World.*

Hesiod. Oper. & Dior. Ver. 192, 193.

— — Δίκη δ' ἐν χερσὶ, καὶ Αἰδῶς
Ἵσυχ' ἔσται· βλάψει δ' ὁ κακὸς τὸν ἀρεῖονα φῶτα.

*Honour and Justice both have left the Stage,
All fall a Sacrifice to Vice and Rage.*

Plato in his 12th Book of Laws, [5] παρθένος γὰρ αἰδοῦς δίκη λέγεται τε καὶ ὄντως εἰρηται, or rather πάρεδρος. That the Sense may be, Justice is called the Companion of Honour, and that with Reason. And in another Place the same Plato tells us, [6] θεὸς, &c.

God being solicitous for Mankind, lest they should be entirely destroyed, bestowed upon Men Honour and Justice, the Ornaments of States, and the Bonds of Friendship. [7] Plutarch in like manner calls δίκην Justice, ἕνοικον αἰδοῦς, the Cohabitant of Honour; and in another Place he joins αἰδῶ & δικαιοσύνην, Honour and Justice, together. In Dionysius Halicarnassensis [8] are named together, αἰδῶς, κόσμος, καὶ δίκη, Honour, Modesty and Justice. So Josephus [9] couples together, αἰδῶ and ἐπιείκειαν, Honour and Equity. Paulus [10] the Lawyer unites natural Right and Honour. But Cicero [11] thus distinguishes between Justice and Honour. Justice (says he) teaches not to hurt our Neighbour, Honour not to offend him.

3. With the Verse before quoted of Seneca, agrees that Expression of the same Author in his philosophical Writings. [12] How small a Matter is it, to be a good Man, only so far as the Laws require? How much larger is the Rule of Duty than of Right? How many Things does natural Affection, Humanity, Liberality, Justice and Faith demand? Which are all beyond the reach of the civil Laws. Where one may see he puts a Difference between Jus, and Justitia, Right and Justice. He means by Right, that which is actionable in Courts of Judicature. The same Seneca excellently explains this in another Place, by the Example of a Master's Right over his Slaves. [13] As to our bond Servants we must consider, not what we may without Danger of the Law put upon them, but what the Nature of Equity and Honesty would allow, which obliges us to be merciful to our Prisoners, and those purchased with our own Money. Further, Indeed every Thing is lawful with regard to a Slave, [628] considered as such: But there are some Things which are not lawful with regard to a Slave, considered as a Man, according to the common Right of Animals. In which Place we may observe the double Meaning of the Word lawful, the one being taken for that which is really lawful in itself, the other for that which is only lawful externally.

II. 1. To the same Intent is the Distinction of Marcellus in the Roman Senate, [1] Not what I have done is here to be debated, since the Right of War justifies whatsoever I have done against the Enemies, but what they ought to have suffered, viz. in Reason and Equity. Aristotle disputing the Point, whether Slavery arising from War may be esteemed just, hints at this Distinction. [2] Some having in View a Sort of Right, that is, the Law which is certainly [3] something just, maintain that Captivity in War is just, but they do not say it is absolutely just, because it may so happen that the War may proceed from an unjust Cause. Agreeable to this is that of Thucydides [4] in the Oration of the Thebans, For those ye killed in Fight, it is not so much a Grievance to us, what they suffered was by a Kind of Right.

II. This applied to what is allowed by the Law of Nations.

2. So also the Roman Lawyers themselves, what they often call the [5] Right of Captivity, in another Place call an Injury, and oppose it to natural Equity; and Seneca [6] says the Name of a Slave arose from Injustice, having a respect to what often happens. The Italians also in Livy, [7] retaining what they had taken from the Syracusians in War, are called obstinate in keeping what they had unjustly gotten. Dion Prusaensis having declared, that when Prisoners return Home, they recover their Liberty, adds this, [8] ὥς ἀδίκως δουλεύοντας, As being unjustly enslaved.

3. [9] Lactantius speaking of the Philosophers says, When they dispute of Duties relating to military Affairs, they reason not according to the Principles of Justice and true Vertue, but adapt their Precepts to the common Practice and Customs of civil Life. He says afterwards, that the Romans [10] acted unjustly by Law.

III. We then first declare, if the Cause of the War be unjust, tho' it be undertaken in a solemn Manner, yet all the Acts of Hostility done in it are unjust in themselves. So that they who knowingly do these Acts, or join in the acting of them, Are to be accounted in the Number of those, who without Repentance cannot enter into the Kingdom of Heaven, 1 Cor. vi. 10. But true Repentance, if Opportunity and Ability will allow, absolutely requires [1] that he who has done any [629] Damage, either by killing, ravaging or plundering, should make full Restitution. Therefore GOD himself declares their [2] Fasts to be unacceptable to him, who detained their Captives unjustly taken. And the King of Nineve, (Jonah iii. 8.) proclaiming a Fast to his Subjects, commands them all to restore what they had taken by Rapine; acknowledging, by the Guide of natural Reason, that all Repentance without such a Restitution would be but pretended, and to no Purpose. And not only the [3] Jews and Christians are of this Opinion, but even the [a] Mahometans themselves.

III. What is done in an unjust War is unjust in itself.

IV. But the Authors of War, whether by their Authority, or Counsel, are obliged to make this Restitution, according to what we have declared in general [a] elsewhere, for all those Damages which are the usual Consequences of War; and for what are unusual, if they either contributed to them by Command or Advice, or not prevented them, if it was in their Power to have done it. Thus are Generals and Officers also obliged to do, in Relation to those Things which have been committed by those under their Command. The Soldiers, who have concurred in an Act of Hostility committed in common, as the burning of a Town, are each responsible for [1] the whole Damage. But if the Damage has been caused by the distinct Acts of several, each shall be answerable for the Mischief, of which he has been the sole or partial Cause.

IV. Who are hereby obliged to make Restitution, and how far.

V. 1. Neither can I allow the Exception, which some make of those that serve under others, that they are only responsible for the Damage, when there is on their Part [1] some Fault accompanied with Fraud. For the bare Fault, without bad Intention, is sufficient to engage to a Restitution. There are some who seem to think, that Things taken in a War, tho' its Cause were really unjust, are not to be returned; because both Sides, when they engaged in the War, were supposed to have granted them to the Captors. But it cannot be easily presumed, that any Man will rashly part with his Right, and War in itself is far different from the Nature of Contracts. But that neutral Nations might know what to do, and might not be forced into a War against their Wills, it was judged sufficient to introduce this external Right of Property, (which we have mentioned before) which may be agreeable with the internal Obligation to Restitution. And indeed those very Authors seem to allow as much concerning the Right over Prisoners of War. Wherefore the Samnites in Livy [2] say, We have restored the plundered Goods of our Enemies, which by the Law of Arms seemed to be ours; seemed only, he saith, because that War was unjust, as the Samnites had before acknowledged.

V. Whether Things taken in an unjust War, are to be restored by the Captor.

[630]

2. Not much unlike this, a certain Power arises from the Law [3] of Nations in a Contract made without Fraud, wherein there is an Inequality, to force the Contracter to perform his Contract; Nevertheless he that stipulates more than his Due, is obliged in Honesty and Conscience to reduce it to a fair and just Equality.

VI. 1. But further, tho' a Man has not done the Damage himself, or if he did it without any Fault of his, [a] but yet keeps in his Possession [1] a Thing taken away by another in an unjust War, he is obliged to restore it; because there can be no Reason produced naturally just, why the other should be deprived of it. There is neither a Consent on his Part, nor an Occasion of Punishment, nor a Compensation to make. Not unlike to this is that of Valerius Maximus. [2] The People of Rome, saith he, when P. Claudius publicly sold some Camerine Prisoners taken in the War, when he was General, tho' they found their Treasury filled with the Money, and the Borders of the Empire enlarged, yet because they were not fully convinced of the Justice of that Expedition, they with utmost Diligence having sought out the Prisoners, redeemed them, and restored them their Lands.

VI. Whether by him also that detains.

Thus by the Decree of the Romans, even their publick Liberty was restored to the [3] Phocians, and also their Lands, which had been taken from them: And afterwards the [4] Ligurians, who had been sold by M. Pompilius, (their Ransom being paid to the Purchasers) were restored to their Liberty, and their Goods carefully returned. The Senate [5] decreed the same in favour of the Abderites, adding this Reason for it, because the War made upon them was unjust.

2. Yet may the present Possessor, whatsoever Charge or Pains he has been at, lawfully deduct as much, as the Proprietor would willingly have expended to have recovered his endangered Possession, according to the Principles we have before laid down. But if the Possessor of it, without any Fault of his, has either wasted or alienated it, he shall not be obliged to refund, further than he shall be thought to have been made richer by it.

---

CHAPTER XI ↩

Moderation concerning the Right of killing Men in a just War.

I. 1. But that is not to be allowed in a just War, as is commonly said,

I. That some Acts in a just War, are unjust in themselves.

— — [1] Arma tenenti
Omnia dat, qui justa negat. — —

He gives up all, who what is just denies.

But Cicero has it better, There are certain Duties to be observed even towards those that have wronged us, [2] for there is a Moderation required in Revenge and Punishment [631] . The same Author commends the antient Times of the [3] Romans, when the Ends of their Wars were either mild, or rigorous, merely through Necessity. Seneca [4] calls those cruel, who having a just Cause to punish, have no Moderation in it. Aristides saith, [5] It is possible that they may be unjust, who only revenge a Wrong done to themselves, if they go beyond Moderation; for he that in this Act shall exceed just Bounds, renders himself culpable in his Turn. Thus in Ovid's [6] Opinion, a certain King,

— — Caede nocentum
Se nimis ulciscens extitit ipse nocens.

Following the Guilty with too quick Revenge,
Deriv'd a Guilt upon himself. — —

The Plateans in an Oration of Isocrates demand, [7] If it be just, thus for such slight Trespasses to exact rigorous Punishments. And the same Aristides in his second Oration for Peace, saith, Consider not only the Reasons for punishing, but also the Persons to be punished, who we ourselves are, and what is the just Measure of Punishment. Minos is commended in Propertius:

Victor erat quamvis, aequus in hoste fuit.

Tho' Conqueror, [8] to Foes was always just.

And in Ovid, [9]

— — leges captis justissimus auctor
Hostibus imposuit — —

Most just to Captives he dispenses Laws.

II. 1. But when it is just to kill (for there we must begin) in a just War according to internal Justice, and when not, may be plainly understood from what I have said in the first Chapter of this Book. For a Man may be killed either designedly, or [632] without a direct Design. No Man can be justly killed with Design, unless for a capital Crime, or because we cannot really secure our Lives and Estates without doing it. Tho' that very Thing, to kill a Man on account of our Estates, which are frail and perishable Goods, is not repugnant to Justice strictly taken, yet is it far wide from [1] the Law of Charity. But that the Punishment may be just, it is absolutely required, that he who is killed should have rendered himself culpable, and that in so heinous a Manner, that before an upright Judge he should be condemned to die. Of which we shall here say the less, because we have fully explained already, in the Chapter concerning Punishments, whatever is necessary to be known on this Head.

II. Who may be killed with a safe Conscience.

III. 1. Above, [a] when we treated of Suppliants, (for there are such both in Peace and War) we distinguished between the unfortunate and culpable. Gylippus in that Place of Diodorus Siculus, which I there quoted, asks this Question, [1] in what Class the Athenians ought to be reckoned, either of the unfortunate or the unjust. And he declares, they cannot be ranked among the unfortunate, because voluntarily without any manner of Provocation, they had made War on the Syracusans: When ceheinfers, since they had freely begun a War, they must expect to undergo the Miseries of that War. They are to be esteemed unfortunate who happen to be in the Party of one of the Enemies, without any hostile Disposition towards the other Party, as the Athenians in the Time of Mithridates, of whom thus speaks Velleius Paterculus, [2] If any one should charge the Athenians with Rebellion, at the Time (when Athens was besieged by Sylla ) he is very ignorant both of Truth and antient History. For the Fidelity of the Athenians was so firm to the Romans, that always, and upon all Occasions, whatsoever was done with a singular Honesty, the Romans used proverbially to say, it was done Athenian like. But then being oppressed by the Forces of Mithridates, they were reduced to a most miserable State, whilst they were within enslaved by their Enemies, and besieged by their Friends, whilst their Hearts were without the Walls, but their Bodies in compliance with Necessity, were within. Which last Part seems to be taken out of Livy, [3] in whom Indibilis the Spaniard declares, that his Body only served the Carthaginians, but his Mind the Romans.

III. No Man can be justly killed for his Misfortunes, as they that are forced to follow a Party.

2. For, saith Cicero, [4] all those whose Lives are in the Power of others, often consider what they can or may do, at whose Mercy they lie, rather than what they ought to do. So says the same Cicero [5] for Ligarius, It is the third Time that he continued in Africk after the coming of Varus, which if it be a Crime, it is of Necessity not of Will. And Julian took this course in the Case of the Aquileians, as Ammianus [6] testifies, who when he had ordered the Punishment of a few, adds, he let the others Escape, as whom Necessity, not Choice, had forced into Arms. Thus says an antient [b] Commentator on that Place of Thucydides, of the Corcyrean Captives that were sold. It was an Act of Clemency, worthy of the Greeks, for it is inhuman to kill [633] Prisoners after the Battle is over, especially Slaves, who do not fight of their own Choice. The Plataeans thus argue in the aforesaid Oration of Isocrates, [7] We did not serve them willingly (the Lacedemonians ) but were forced to it. And so for the other Grecians, They were forced with their Bodies to join with them, but their Hearts were with you. Herodotus [8] also says of the Phocians, They followed the Medes not voluntarily, but forced by Necessity. Alexander spared the Zeldi, as Amianus relates, [9] Because they were forced into the Service of the Barbarians. Diodorus [10] makes Nicolaus the Syracusan thus plead for the Captives, The Allies were forced to make War; wherefore as it is but just that they should be punished, who designedly offer the Wrong; so it is equally just to pardon them, who offend against their Will. So in Livy, [11] the Syracusans to excuse themselves to the Romans, said, they broke the Peace being oppressed by Fear and Fraud. Thus for a like Reason Antigonus declared, [12] That he made War with Cleomenes, and not with the Spartans.

IV. 1. But it is to be observed, that between an absolute Injury, and a mere Misfortune, there often intervenes something of a middle Nature, as it were composed of both, so that the Action cannot be said to be either entirely of Knowledge and voluntarily, nor purely of Ignorance and against the Will.

IV. Nor for a middle Fault between Misfortune and Fraud, whose Nature is explained.

2. Aristotle calls this Act ἑμάρτημα, in Latin rendered culpa, a Fault. For thus he says in the 5th Book of his Morals, and the 10th Chapter. Of voluntary Actions, some we do deliberately, others not. They are said to be done deliberately, which are acted by a certain previous Consultation of the Mind; what are otherwise, we say are done unadvisedly. Since then in human Society an Injury may be done three Ways, that which proceeds from Ignorance is termed a simple Fault. As, if a Man should do a Mischief to one whom he did not design to hurt, or what he did not really intend, or not in the manner he intended it, or not with such a View; as if any one did not think to strike with this Instrument, not this Man, or not upon this account; but it happened otherwise than he proposed to himself: He designed to pinch, not to wound, either not this Person, or not in this manner. Therefore if a Damage happen thus against all Expectation, it is a Mischance; but if it might in some manner have been expected or foreseen, tho' not with an evil intent, it is a simple Fault: For there is some Fault on the Part of the Agent, when the Principle of Action is within him: But when the Principle of Action is without him, he is only unfortunate; but when a Man does knowingly what he does, though not deliberately, it must be acknowledged that an Injury is done: As whatsoever Men may do through Anger, or other like Disturbances of the Mind, either natural, or inevitable; for they who in Passion do Mischief, and yet through their Fault, do certainly commit an Injury, neither yet are they reckoned unjust or malicious. But if a Man should do it deliberately, he is rightly accounted wicked and unjust.

3. Therefore whatsoever is done through Anger, is judged with Reason not to be done premeditatedly; for he does not begin, who in a Passion does an Injury, but he that provoked that Passion. Hence it is, that when such Cases are tried at Law, the Question frequently turns, not upon the Fact, but upon the Right; for Anger arises from hence, that a Man thinks himself wronged. Therefore the Query is not here, as in Contracts, whether what is complained of be done, or not; for there, unless there be Forgetfulness, one of the Parties must of Necessity be wicked in not performing the Contract, but in this they demand, whether what was done were justly done. Now he that first laid an Ambush, did it not through Ignorance, wherefore no wonder if the one Person [634] thinks himself wronged, and the other not. But even those who commit Injuries without Deliberation, and in Passion, ought to be accounted unjust, when in rendering Evil for Evil, they pass the Bounds of Proportion or Equality; so he is truly just who acts justly with Deliberation, for sometimes a Man may do a just Thing willingly, but not deliberately.

4. But of those Wrongs that are not done voluntarily, some may be pardonable, others not; [1] those are pardonable that are done not only by Men ignorant, but through pure Ignorance also. But if any be done by ignorant Persons, but not through pure Ignorance, yet through some Passion that exceeds the common Bounds of human Nature, they are no wise pardonable.

5. Michael Ephesius interpreting this Passage, as an Instance of what happens contrary to all Expectation, gives us the Case of a Son, who by the opening of a Door, has hurt his own Father: Or of a Man who in a solitary Place trying to shoot, has accidentally wounded a Person; and of that which might have been foreseen, but without any evil Intent, he alledges the Case of a Man shooting at random in a Highway. The same Commentator gives us an Example of Necessity in him, who is obliged by Hunger, or Thirst, to do any Thing. Of natural Passions, in Love, Grief, Fear: He says that one acts through Ignorance, when the Fact is unknown; as if a Man did not know a Woman was married; a Crime is done by a Person ignorant, not through pure Ignorance, when the Right is not known. But this Ignorance of Right may sometimes be excused, and sometimes not; all which well agree with the Opinion of the antient Civilians. There is a Place in Aristotle not unlike this, in his Book of the Art of Oratory: Equity distinguishes between simple Faults and Injuries, and between simple Faults and Mischances; Mischances are those which could neither be foreseen, nor done with an ill Design. Simple Faults, those that might have been foreseen, but not done with an evil Intent; but Injuries, which have been done both designedly; and with a malicious Intent. The Antients have remarked that Homer had a Notion of those different Sorts of Action: And on that Head alledge what the Poet [2] relates in the last of his Iliad concerning Achilles.

Ἦ οὐτε γὰρ ἐστ' ἄφρων, οὔτ' ἄσκοπος, οὔτ' ἀλιτήμων.

Not ignorant, nor rash, nor ill disposed.

6. The like Distinction is also in Marcian, [3] We offend either purposely, through Passion, or accidentally. Purposely, as a Gang of Thieves do. Through Passion, as when a Man in Drink falls to fighting with Fists or Sword. Accidentally, as when in Hunting an Arrow levelled at a Deer, kills a Man. Those two which are done purposely and through Passion, Cicero thus distinguisheth, In all Acts of Injustice it is highly to be considered, [4] whether they be done by any Perturbation of Mind, which is generally short, and quickly over; or with premeditated Design. For those are much slighter, which are done by some sudden gust of Passion, than they done deliberately and designedly. [5] Philo in his Explanation of some particular Laws, says, It is but half a Crime, which is not done deliberately.

7. Of which Kind are those chiefly, which Necessity, [6] if it does not justify, yet [635] excuses; for as Demosthenes [7] argues against Aristocrates, Necessity takes from us the Liberty of examining what we ought to do, or not to do; wherefore such Cases are not to be too strictly searched into by equitable Judges. Which Point the same Author (Demosthenes) handles [8] more largely, in his Oration of false Witness against Stephanus. As also Thucydides, in his fourth Book, [9] It is highly probable, that GOD himself is willing to forgive those, who are compelled by War, or otherwise necessitated to do any Thing; for the sacred Altars have been ever allowed sure Places of Refuge for them to fly unto, as have unwillingly offended; and the Name of Crime is given to unlawful Actions, which are committed on purpose, and not to those which extreme Necessity gives Courage to commit. The Cerites in Livy, [10] thus address the Romans, That they would construe that a deliberate Act, which was more justly to be called Force or Necessity. And Justin [11] says thus, The Act of the Phocians, tho' all condemned it for its heinous Sacrilege, yet it brought a greater Odium upon the Thebans, who perfectly forced them to it, than upon themselves. And this is the Opinion of Isocrates, [12] Of him who steals purely to keep himself from starving, he hath Necessity, a good Plea for Pardon. Also Aristides [13] says, The Hardness of the Times is some Excuse for those that abandon their Allies. Thus says [14] Philostratus of the Messenians, that they did not receive those that were banished from Athens, They could not safely do it, for Fear of Alexander, whom all Greece severely dreaded. And thus we find in Aristotle, [15] Half wicked, but not unjust, nor a Lie-in-wait. Themistius, in his Praises of the Emperor Valens, thus applies these Distinctions to our Purpose, [16] You have well distinguished between a real Injury, a Fault, and a Misfortune; [17] tho' you are not acquainted either with Plato, or Aristotle, yet you put in practice their Precepts; for you have not judged them worthy of the same Punishment, who were the Authors of the War, and those who afterwards were forcibly [636] engaged in it, and those who submitted to him who seemed Master of the Empire. But those you have condemned, those you have corrected, and the last received unto Mercy.

8. The same Author, in another Place, advises a young Emperor. Consider what Difference there is between a Misfortune, a Fault, and a direct Injury; and how it becomes a Prince to forgive the first, chastise the second, and severely punish the third. Thus, according to Josephus, [18] did Titus the Emperor punish only the principal in a Crime, μέχρ'ις ἔργου, really; but the Multitude μέχρ'ι λόγου, only by Reprimands. Bare Misfortunes neither deserve Punishment, nor engage us to make any Restitution; but unjust Actions are obnoxious to both. But the Fault of a middle Nature, as it is liable to Restitution, so often it does not merit Punishment, especially capital. To this we may refer that of Valerius Flaccus.

*At quibus invito maduerunt sanguine dextrae,
Si sors saeva premat miseros, sed proxima culpae
Hos variis mens ipsa modis agit, & sua carpunt
Facta viros resides — —*

*But those who by Chance imbrue their Hands in Blood,
Press'd by Misfortune, tho' not the greatest Crime,
Yet conscious of a Guilt, feel Loads of Anguish,
Remorse distracts 'em, and the hideous Image
Still stares them in the Face.*

V. We meet with frequent Examples in History, of different [a] Punishments inflicted on the principal Authors of a War, and those who have been drawn into it (as Themistius observes); Herodotus [b] relates, that the Grecians took an exemplary Punishment on those who had been the chief Authors of the Thebans Revolt to the Medes. Thus (as Livy tells us) [1] the principal Men of Ardea were beheaded. In the same Author, [2] Valerius Levinus, having taken Agrigentum, he whipt their chief Leaders with Rods, and then beheaded them, the Rest, and the Prey, he sold. Also, in another Place of the same Livy, [3] When Atella and Calusia were surrendered, their Leaders were put to Death. Again, in another Place, [4] (he addresses the Roman Senate) Since the chief Authors of this Rebellion are deservedly punished by the immortal Gods, and by you, illustrious Fathers, what do you intend to do with the innocent People? At last they were pardoned, and their Freedom restored; [5] to the End (as he says) where the Fault begun there the Punishment should stop. Eteocles the Argive is highly commended in Euripides, [6] because

V. The principal Authors of a War to be distinguished from those drawn into it.

*When he was Judge, the Guilty always bore
The Weight of their own Faults; the People never Groan'd with the Burden of their Rulers Crimes.*

And the Athenians (as Thucydides relates) repented of their Decree against the Mitylenians, [7] That they should destroy the whole City, rather than the principal Authors of the Revolt. Demetrius is also reported by Diodorus, when he took Thebes, to have put only ten of the chief Leaders to the Sword.

VI. 1. But also in the very Authors of the War, we must distinguish the Causes; for there are some, not indeed just, but yet such as may impose upon Men not really wicked. The Writer to Herennius lays down this as a most just Plea for Pardon, [1] If any one who hath offended, did it not out of Hatred or Cruelty, but out of Duty and good Design. Seneca's Wiseman, [2] Will let his Enemies go off safe, even sometimes commended, if they were engaged in the War upon honest Grounds, out of Loyalty, according to the Obligations of an Alliance, for their Liberty. The Caerites, in Livy, [3] beg Pardon for their Fault [4] in assisting their Kinsmen. The Phocians, [5] the Chalcidians, and others, who had aided Antiochus, according to their Treaty, were pardoned by the Romans. Aristides, in his second Leuctrica, speaks of the Thebans, who under the Conduct of the Lacedemonians marched against the Athenians, [6] They were indeed engaged in an unjust Action, but with a fair Plea, they did it out of Fidelity to the Lacedemonians.

VI. In the very Authors we must distinguish the Causes, whether probable, or improbable.

2. Cicero, [7] in his first Book of Offices, says, they are to be pardoned who have not been cruel nor inhuman in the War. Also, that Wars undertaken for the Glory of Empire, are to be managed with less Severity. Thus King Ptolemy signifies to [8] Demetrius, that They ought not to make War for every Kind of Reason, but only for Glory and Empire. And so Severus, [9] in Herodian, When we first took Arms against Niger, we had not any specious Pretences of Quarrel against him; but the Empire being the Prize disputed for, both of us with equal Ambition contended for it.

3. That often happens, which Cicero [10] observed in the War between Caesar and Pompey. There was a great Uncertainty, the most famous Commanders were not agreed, many could not tell whose Cause was best. And what he also says in another Place, [11] Tho' we be guilty of a Failing, through human Frailty, yet we are certainly free from a Crime. As in Thucydides, those Acts are positively declared [638] pardonable which are done, Not out of Malice, but through Error. The same Cicero [12] says of Dejotarus, He did not engage out of any Hatred to you, but slipt through common Frailty. And Salust, [13] in his History, And the common People, more from Example than any Understanding of the Cause, flocked in one after another, and followed the foregoing Leader as the wiser. What Brutus writ of Civil Wars, may not improperly be applied to all Wars, [14] We ought to be more severe in preventing them, than ready to discharge our Wrath upon the conquered.

VII. 1. Even where Justice does not demand it, yet it is often agreeable to Goodness [1] to Moderation, and a great Soul to forgive. Salust [2] says, that The Romans advanced their Greatness by forgiving. And Tacitus, [3] We ought to be as merciful to Suppliants, as implacable against Enemies. But Seneca, [4] that It belongs only to wild Beasts, and even such as have no Spark of Generosity, to bite and tear those they have thrown down. Elephants and Lions, after they have slung on the Ground, what resisted them, leave it there, and go away. The Situation of Things is often such that one may say, as it is in Virgil,

VII. Even to Enemies who have deserved Death, often times the Punishment may rightly be remitted.

[5] — — — *Non hic victoria Teucrûm
Vertitur, aut anima una dabit, discrimina tanta.*

*If I survive, shall Troy the less prevail?
A single Soul's too light to turn the Scale.*

Dryden.

2. There is a remarkable Place to the same Purpose, in the fourth Book to Herennius. [6] “Our Ancestors well observed, to put no captive King to Death. And why? It would be unjust to abuse that Power which Fortune hath bestowed on us to the Destruction of them, whom the same Fortune, a little before, had placed in the most eminent Station. But, you will say, he brought an Army against us! I now absolutely forget it. Why so? Because it is the Part of a brave Man to hold those his Enemies who dispute with him the Victory, and to consider them as Men, when vanquished; that so Valour may finish the Calamities of War, and Humanity augment the Advantages of Peace. But, you will say again, suppose he had got the Victory, would he have done the same? Why then should you spare him? Because it is my Practice to despise such Folly, not to imitate it.” If you understand this of the Romans, (which is very uncertain, since the Author often employs Reasons drawn from foreign Examples, or even such as are fictitious) it is absolutely repugnant to that which we meet with in the Panegyrick of Constantine, the Son of Constantius. [7] “Tho’ he be the more prudent Man, who by a Pardon gains the Affection of [639] Enemies, yet he is the more valiant, who treads them under Foot when vanquished. You have revived, O Emperor! that antient Boldness of the Roman Empire, which always put the Generals of the Enemy, whom they had taken Prisoners, to Death. For then the captive Kings, after they had attended the triumphant Chariot of the Conqueror, from the Gates to the Forum, as soon as ever he turned his Chariot to the Capitol, were dragged to Prison, and there put to Death.

Except only Perseus, who, by the particular Favour of Paulus Aemilius, (to whom he had yielded himself) escaped this severe Punishment. But the Rest, deprived of Life in a Prison, served as a Warning to other Kings, rather to court the Friendship of the Romans, than provoke their Justice.” But this Author expresses himself too generally. Josephus indeed mentions the like Severity of the Romans, in the History of Simon Barjora, who experienced it; but he speaks of Generals, such as Pontius the Samnite, not of those who had the Title of Kings. The Meaning of his Words may be taken thus. [8] “The Conclusion of the Triumph was when they were come to the Capitol, the Temple of Jupiter, for there, by antient Custom, the Conqueror staid, till he had Notice of the Death of the Enemy’s General. It was Simon the Son of Jora, who was led among the Prisoners in triumph: He then having a Halter about his Neck, was hurried to the publick Place, his Keepers also whipping him on: For in that Place it is the Custom of the Romans to put to Death, those that are condemned for capital Crimes. As soon then as it was declared that he was dead, they first offered up Vows, and then Sacrifices.” Cicero [9] almost writes the same of Punishments, in his Oration against Verres.

3. We have many Examples of Generals thus executed, and some of Kings, as [10] of Aristonicus, [11] Jugurtha, [12] Artabasdus. Yet besides Perseus, Syphax, [13] [640] Gentius, [14] Juba [15] and, in the Time of the Caesars, Caractacus, [16] and others, escaped this Punishment; whence it appears, that the Romans had Respect to the Causes of the War, and the Manner of prosecuting it; whom yet Cicero, [17] and other antient Authors, do acknowledge to have been too cruel in their Victories. Therefore M. Aemilius Paulus, in Diodorus Siculus, well advised the Roman Senators, in the Case of Perseus. [18] Tho’ they fear not the Power of Man, yet they ought to dread the Divine Vengeance, which is ready to fall on them who insolently abuse their Victories. And [19] Plutarch observes, that in the Grecian Wars, the very Enemies refrained all Violence to the Lacedemonian Kings, in Respect to their Dignity.

4. An Enemy then who hath not Respect purely to what human Laws allow, but what is really his own Duty, and what the Rules of Virtue require, will spare even his Enemy’s Life; and will put no Man to Death, unless to save himself from Death, or something like it, or to punish personal Crimes that deserve Death. Nay, and to some of those that deserve it, either from a Principle of Humanity, or some other good Reason, he will either remit all Punishment, or at least the capital Part. The same forementioned Diodorus Siculus [20] excellently observes, “The taking of Cities, successful Battles, and other Prosperities of War, are often more owing to Fortune than Valour. But to shew Mercy to the Vanquished is purely the Effect of Wisdom.” We read in Curtius, [21] “Tho’ Alexander had just Reason to be angry against the Authors of the War, yet he forgave them all.”

VIII. As to Persons who are killed accidentally, and not on purpose, we are to remember what we said [a] above, that if not for Justice, yet for Pity, we must not attempt any Thing which may prove the Destruction of Innocents, unless for some extraordinary Reasons, and for the Safety of many. Polybius is of the same Opinion, who, in his first Book, thus speaks, [1] “It is the Part of a good Man not to prosecute a War to the utmost, against those that are wicked, but only so far, till they have made Satisfaction for, and amended their Crimes, and not promiscuously to involve the Innocent in the Punishment of the Guilty, but, for the Sake of those Innocents, even to pardon the Guilty.”

VIII. We must take all possible Care that the Innocent be not, tho’ against our Intention, kill’d.

IX. 1. These general Principles being laid down, it will not be difficult to infer more particular Rules. [1] Tender Age must excuse the Child, and her Sex the [641] Woman, (says Seneca, in his Books against Anger). GOD himself, in the Wars of the Hebrews, even after Peace offered and refused, would have Women and Infants spared, (Deut. xx. 14.) only some few Nations excepted by a special Command, against whom the War was not a human War, but a War of GOD, as it was commonly called. And when he ordered the Midianitish Women to be slain for their own personal Crimes, he yet excepted those that were pure Virgins. (Numb. xxxi. 18.) Nay, when he denounced fearful Judgments on the Ninevites, for their enormous Sins, he was pleased to delay the deserved Vengeance, in Compassion of so many thousands, who could not distinguish between Good and Evil. (Jonah iv. 2.) Like to which is that in Seneca, [2] Can any one be angry with Children, whose Age as yet understands not the Difference of Things? And in Lucan, [3]

IX. Children to be spared, and Women, unless highly criminal, and also old Men.

Crimine quo parvi caedem potuere mereri?

How could young Infants ever merit Death?

If then GOD, who, as the Author and Lord of Life, may, without Injustice, take it away when he pleases, and without any other Reason, from Persons of whatsoever Sex or Age, has, nevertheless, commanded, and acted himself towards Women and Children, in the Manner we have now seen; what ought Men (to whom he hath given no other Right over their Fellows, than what is necessary to preserve the Safety and Society of Mankind) to do in this Case?

2. We might add here, first, in Regard to Children, the Judgment of those Nations and Times wherein Justice most prevailed: [4] We carry Arms (says Camillus, in Livy) not against that tender Age, which is spared, even at the taking of Cities, but against those who are in Arms. He adds, that this is one of the Laws of War, that is, one of the Rules of natural Right, which take Place here. Plutarch, treating on the same Subject, tell us, [5] Good Men observe even some Laws of War. Where, pray observe, he saith Good Men, that you may distinguish this Right from that allowed by Custom, and which only implies a bare Impunity. So Florus [6] says, it cannot in Honesty be otherwise. And Livy has it in another Place, [7] [642] Which Age the Enemy, tho' highly provoked, should spare. And again, [8] Their savage Cruelty and Rage reached even to harmless Infants.

3. There is no Exception here with Respect to Children, who have not as yet the Use of Reason. But as to Women, the Thing takes Place only in general, that is, unless they have committed some Crime which deserves a particular Punishment, or have usurped the Offices of Men. For that is, as Stattius expresses it,

[9] Sexus rudis insciusque Belli,
A Sex unskill'd, and ignorant of War.

The Prefect in the Tragedy, replies to Nero, calling Octavia his Enemy,

— — — Femina hic nomen capit?

[10] Can a Woman deserve that Name?

And Alexander, in Curtius, [11] I use not to make War with Captives and Women. He must be in Arms that I take for an Enemy. So Grypus, in Justin, [12] None of his Ancestors after Victory did ever, in all their Wars, either foreign or domestick, shew Cruelty to Women, whom their very Sex did fully secure from the Hazards of War, and the Fury of the Conqueror. And another, in Tacitus, [13] That he never made War against Women, but only those that were actually in Arms against him.

4. Valerius Maximus [14] calls the Behaviour of Munatius Flaccus against Women and Children, a barbarous Cruelty, and not fit to be mentioned; Diodorus [15] tells us, that the Carthaginians, at Selinus, killed old Men, Women, and Children, without any Manner of Compassion. And in another Place he calls this Act a savage Cruelty. Latinus Pacatus [16] stiled Women, A Sex which the Wars spare. And so did Stattius of old Men.

[17] — — — Nullis violabilis armis
Turba senes — — —

Old Men should be from Violence secur'd.

X. 1. What we have said (of Women and Children) may be generally said of all Men, whose Manner of Life is wholly averse to Arms. [1] By the Laws of War, only those that are in Arms, and do resist, are to be killed, according to Livy, that is, that Law which is agreeable to Nature. So says Josephus, [2] It is just that they should suffer by Arms, who have taken up Arms, but the Innocent should not be [643] touched. When Camillus had taken the City of Veii, [3] he ordered, that they should not hurt those that were not in Arms. In the first Rank of these ought to be held, those who are engaged in holy Things. For as it was in all Ages the general Custom of Nations to excuse them from bearing Arms, [4] so were they excused also from the Violence of Arms. Thus the Philistins, tho' professed Enemies of the Jews, spared the [5] College of Prophets at Gaba, as you may find, 1 Sam. x. 5. and 10. And so to another Place where was a like College, as it were set apart and privileged from all Violence, did David flee with Samuel, 1 Sam. xix. 18. Plutarch [6] informs us, when the Cretans were engaged in Civil Wars, they mutually forbore all manner of Violence [7] to the Priests, and those who had the charge of burying the Dead. To this we may apply the Greek Proverb, Ἄνδρ' ἕνα μόνον ἐπέλειπθη.

Not a single Priest escaped.

[8] Strabo observes, when all Greece was up in Arms, the Eleans, as sacred to Jupiter, and those that sojourned among them, enjoyed a secure Peace.

2. They also have justly this same Privilege, as the Priests, who have embraced a like Sort of Life, as Monks, and [9] Lay-Brothers, that is, Penitents, whom the [10] Ecclesiastical Canons, according to natural Equity, would have spared equally as Priests. To these we may justly add those who apply themselves to the Study of Sciences and Arts beneficial to Mankind.

XI. Next to these, the Canons [1] privilege Husbandmen. Diodorus Siculus [2] highly commends the Indians, In their Battles they kill one another (without Mercy) [644] but they do not Harm to the Husbandmen, as being necessary for the publick Good. Plutarch says of the antient Corinthians [3] and Megareans, None of them would in any wise hurt the Husbandmen. And Cyrus sends to the Assyrian King, [4] He was desirous that Husband men should be secure and indemnified. And Suidas [5] says of Belisarius, He was so favourably inclined to Husbandmen, and took such a particular care of them, that whilst he was General, there was no manner of Violence done to them.

XII. Next to these the Canon [1] includes Merchants, which is not to be understood only of those who sojourn for a Time in an Enemy's Country, but also such as are natural and perpetual Subjects, because the manner of the Life they use is entirely averse from War: And under this Denomination are comprehended all Sorts of Mechanicks and Tradesmen, whose immediate Interest makes them more inclinable to Peace than War.

XIII. 1. That we may come to those that bore Arms, I have [a] already mentioned that of Pyrrhus in Seneca, [1] who said that Honour, that is, a regard to Equity, does not permit us to take away the Life of a Prisoner. We have quoted [b] a Saying of Alexander to the same Purpose, who allows Captives the same privilege with the Women. We may add that of St. Augustin, [2] In fight we ought not to kill the Enemy but through Necessity, and against our Will. But as Violence is allowable against one that is in Arms, and in a Case of Resistance, so is Mercy due to the Vanquished, or Captive, especially where there is no danger of the Disturbance of the Peace thereby. Xenophon [3] reports of Agesilaus, He ordered his Soldiers not to punish their Prisoners as Malefactors, but to preserve them as Men. And we find in Diodorus Siculus, All the [4] Greeks in general engaged stoutly against those that resisted, but shewed Mercy to the Vanquished. The same Author also informs us of the Macedonians [5] under Alexander, They were more severe to the Thebans, than the Laws of War allowed.

2. Sallust, [6] in his History of Jugurtha, speaking of young Men, who were put to Death, after they had surrendered, says, it was done against the Law of Arms, [645] that is, against the Law of natural Equity, and the known Practice of all civilized Nations. And we read in Lactantius, [7] They spare the Vanquished, and even in Arms there is room for Mercy. Tacitus commends Primus Antonius and Varus, two Generals of Vespasian, That after the Battle was over, they exercised no Cruelty to any. So Aristides [8] says of the Lacedemonians, that They fought vigorously against those who resisted, but shewed Mercy to them when conquered.

The Prophet Elisha asks the King of Samaria this Question about Prisoners of War, Wilt thou kill those whom thou hast taken Captive, with thy Sword, and with thy Bow? 2 Kings vi. 22. In Euripides, [9] when one asked in the Heraclidae,

Does your Law forbid the killing of an Enemy?

The Chorus answers,

Yes; when taken Prisoner in a Fight.

In the same Author Eurystheus the Captive says,

My Murderer shall be rank'd among the Guilty.

In Diodorus Siculus, [10] the Byzantians and Chalcedonians, because they had slain many of their Prisoners, were branded with this Character, They committed Acts of abominable Cruelty. The same Author in another Place calls [11] to spare Captives, The Law of Nations. And they who transgress this Law, he says, without doubt, are guilty of a great Crime. Equity teaches us to be merciful to Prisoners, as we mentioned before out of the philosophical Treatises of Seneca. [12] And Historians [13] highly commend those, who when the Multitude of their Prisoners has been so great, that the Number would be either chargeable or dangerous, have chose rather to send them all away freely, than to kill them.

XIV. 1 For the same Reasons, [1] they that either in a Battle, or a Siege, shall demand Quarter, are to be accepted. Wherefore Arrianus [2] says, that the Thebans killing of their Prisoners that had yielded, was not done according to the Grecian Custom, οὐκ Ἑλληνικὴν σφραγὴν. Likewise Thucydides, [3] in his third Book, You received us unto Mercy, who voluntarily, and with Hands listed up, craved a Surrender. And it is the Custom of the Greeks not to put such to Death. And the Syracusan Senators, in Diodorus Siculus, [4] tell us, It is the Part of a great Soul to spare a Suppliant. And Sopater [5] says, It is the Law to preserve Suppliants in the Wars.

XIV. Those to be accepted who surrender upon fair Terms.

2. In besieged Towns, the Romans observed this Custom before the battering Ram struck the walls. Caesar [6] declares to the Aduatici, he would save their City, [646] if they surrendered themselves before the Ram touched the Wall; which is still observed, viz. in weak Towns, before the playing of the Batteries; and in fortified Cities, before the giving of a Storm. But Cicero [7] considering not so much what is done, as what ought in Equity to be done, gives his positive Opinion thus: As we ought to take Care of those we conquer, so we should take them into our Protection, who laying down their Arms, surrender to our Generals, tho' our Rams have battered their Walls. The Hebrew Expositors [8] observe, that it was a Custom among their Ancestors, when they laid Siege to a Town, not to encompass it quite round, but to leave one Place free for them to escape, that desired to flee, that they might have less Occasion to shed Blood.

XV. The same Equity commands us to spare those, who surrender to the Conqueror without Conditions in a suppliant Manner. [1] To kill those that have yielded, (says Tacitus) is barbarous. And Salust [2] relating how Marius put to Death the young Men of Campsa, who had surrendered, calls it, An Act against the natural Right of War. And the same Author in another Place, He put to the Sword not those that were in Arms, and in Battle, by the Right of War, but the very Suppliants that cried for Mercy. And (as I before mentioned) in Livy, [3] Killing of armed Men, and those that resist, is allowed by the Right of War. And the same Livy again, [4] He made War upon those that had submitted, against all Equity and Justice. Nay, the chief Business of a General should be rather to force his Enemies thro' Fear to a Surrender, than to put them to Death. It was highly commendable in Brutus, [5] He suffered not his Men to fall on the Enemy immediately, but surrounding them with his Horse, bid his Soldiers spare those who shortly would be their own.

XV. They are also to be spared that surrender without Conditions.

XVI. 1. Against these Rules of natural Right and Equity, some Exceptions use to be made, no way just, viz. If it be done by way of Retaliation; if by way of Terror, to frighten others; or if they have been obstinate in their Resistance. But no Man can look upon this enough to justify a Slaughter, who has seriously weighed what has been said before of the just Causes of killing Enemies; For there is no Danger from Prisoners, or from those who have actually surrendered themselves, or desire to do it. That they may therefore be justly put to Death, there ought to be a previous Crime, and that such a one, as an impartial Judge shall think Capital. And so we sometimes see Prisoners, and those that have surrendered themselves, put to the Sword, and their yielding upon Condition to have their Lives spared, not accepted; if they being satisfied of the Injustice of the War, [1] have still continued in Arms; if they have [2] abused the Conqueror with slanderous Reproaches, if they [647] have [3] broke their Faith, or any other Law [4] of Nations, as the Privilege of Ambassadors; or if they have [5] deserted their Colours.

XVI. Provided they were not guilty of some enormous Crime before, and how this is to be understood.

2. But Nature doth not allow Retaliation, unless against the personal Offenders; neither is it enough to pretend, that the Enemies are but one entire Body engaged against us, as may easily be understood from what hath been already [a] said concerning the Communication of Punishments. We find in Aristides, [6] It is not perfectly absurd, to imitate as just, what we ourselves condemn as wicked and unjust? Wherefore Plutarch [7] blames the Syracusans, for putting to Death the Wives and Children of Hicetas, purely because Hicetas had before killed the Wife, Sister, and Son of Dion.

3. The Benefit which may follow from hence, by striking a Terror for the future, does by no Means give a Right to put to Death. But if we are otherwise authorised to put to Death, this Consideration may engage us not to abate of our Right.

4. Further, an eager Desire to maintain our own Party, if the Cause itself be not absolutely dishonest, cannot really deserve Punishment, as the Neapolitans argue in Procopius; or if there were any Punishment due, it could never amount to that of Death, before an equitable Judge. When Alexander had commanded all the young Men [8] in a certain Town to be put to the Sword, because they had made an obstinate Defence, he seemed to the Indians to make War like a Robber; whereupon the King to avoid for the future such Reflections, shewed more Mercy in his Victories. He more honourably spared some Milesians, because they appeared brave and faithful to their own Country, which are the very Words of [9] Arrian. When Phyto, Governor of Rhegium, was hurried away to Torments and Death, for stoutly defending his City against Dionysius, he cried out, that he was thus barbarously used, because he would not be tray his Country, and that Heaven would quickly revenge his Death. Diodorus Siculus calls it, [10] unjust Punishment. I much approve that Wish in Lucan, [11]

— — — Vincat, quicumque necesse
Non putat in Victos saevum distringere ferrum
Quique suos cives, quod signa adversa tulerunt,
Non credit fecisse nefas. — — —

— — — May he be crown'd with Victory,
Who thinks it base to kill th' unhappy Vanquish'd;
Tho' in the Battle, with Minds truly brave,
They stood against him. — — —

But we must understand by the Word Cives, not the Inhabitants of this or that Country, but all those who are Members of that great State, which comprehends all Mankind. Much less can the Resentment for a Loss received by War, render the shedding of Blood just and lawful; as we read that Achilles, Aeneas and Alexander, celebrated the Obsequies of their deceased Friends with the Blood of their Prisoners, or those that had yielded themselves; therefore Homer justly expresses it, [12] Κακὰ δὲ φρεσὶ μῆδετο ἔργα.

And in his Mind did evil Things devise.

[648]

XVII. But where the Crimes are such, as they really deserve Death, yet the Greatness of a Multitude may be some Plea to mitigate the Severity of the Punishment; a Pattern of which forbearing Mercy we have from GOD himself, who [a] ordered a Peace to be offered to the Canaanites, and their Neighbours, tho' notoriously wicked, with the Promise of Life under the Condition of being Tributaries. To this agrees that of [1] Seneca, Generals rigorously punish a Soldier, who alone commits any Fault; but where a whole Army is unanimously engaged in a Mutiny, a general Pardon is requisite. What abates then the Anger of a wise Man? The Multitude of Offenders. And in Lucan, [2]

Tot simul infesto juvenes occumbere Letho,
Saepe fames, pelagique furor, subitaeque ruinae,
Aut Caeli, Terraeque lues, aut bellica clades,
Nunquam poena fuit. — — —

At once so many Youths to hurry into Death,
Hunger may do it, or Shipwrecks, or the quick
Amazing fall of Buildings, or poyson'd Air,
Or blasting Damps, or War; it can't be Punishment.

Therefore (Cicero [3] tells us) to prevent the shedding of too much Blood, they brought in the casting of Lots. And Salust [4] thus addresses Caesar, Neither does any one provoke you to severe Punishments, or fearful Judgments, which rather tend to depopulate a State, than to correct the Guilty.

XVIII. 1. From what has been already [a] mentioned, may easily be understood, what is allowable by the Law of Nature concerning Hostages. As it was formerly believed every one had the same Right over his own Life, as over other Things wherein he had a Propriety; and that this Right, by the Consent, either express, or tacit, of the Individuals, was transferred to the State, it was the less to be admired, if Hostages, personally innocent, were (as we [1] read) put to Death for the Crimes of their Country, whether by Vertue of their own particular Consent, or of the Publick, which may be inclusive of their own. But since a truer Wisdom has informed us, that GOD has reserved to himself the Power of our Lives, so that no Man can solely by his own Consent bestow upon another a Power either over his own Life, or that of his Subjects. Therefore (as Agathias writes) that good General Narses abhorred putting innocent Hostages to Death, as a brutish and cruel Act. So also have others done; witness the Example of Scipio, who used to say [2] that he would severely punish those who had rebelled, but not the innocent Hostages; neither would he take Revenge of an unarmed Person, but of an Enemy actually in Arms.

XVIII.
Hostages to be spared, unless personally faulty.

2. But what our modern Lawyers, and those not in considerable, maintain, that [649] such Agreements are valid, if authorised by Custom, I allow, if they mean by Right, only an Impunity; which in this Case often comes under that Denomination. But if they suppose, that they who take away a Man's Life, only by vertue of such an Agreement, are really blameless, I am afraid they are both mistaken themselves, and by their own Authority dangerously mislead others. Indeed, if he that comes as an Hostage, is then, or was before, a notorious Offender, or has afterwards falsified his Faith given in weighty Affairs, his Punishment may then be just.

3. Yet when Clelia, who [3] not of her own accord, but by the Order of the State, went an Hostage, escaped by swimming over the Tyber, [4] The Hetrurian King not only did her no Harm, but even commended her on account of her Bravery: To use Livy's own Words in the Affair.

XIX. This also is to be added, that all Combats, which are not of Use for the obtaining of Right, or concluding a War, but merely for vain Ostentation of Strength, that is, as the Greeks call it, Rather a show of Strength, than a warlike Action, are wholly repugnant to the Duty of a Christian, and Humanity itself. Therefore all Magistrates ought strictly to forbid these Things, for they must render an account for the unnecessary shedding of Blood to him, whose vicegerents they are; Sallust, [2] tho' a Pagan, commends those Generals, who purchase Victory with the least Blood. And Tacitus [3] writes of the Catti, a People of known Valour, They seldom made Excursions, or had skirmishes with the Enemy.

XIX. All needless Combats to be avoided.

CHAPTER XII↩

Concerning Moderation in regard to the spoiling the Country of our Enemies, and such other Things.

I. 1. That one may destroy the Things of another without the Imputation I. What Spoil is just, and how far. of Injustice, one of these three Things should necessarily go before. 1. Either such a Necessity as may be supposed to have been excepted in the primitive Establishment of Property. As when a Man, purely for his own Safety, shall throw the Sword of another Person, which a Madman was going to seize on, into a River; yet in that very Case he lies under an Obligation to make Satisfaction for it to the full Value; as I have [a] shewed in another Place, according to the most reasonable Opinion. 2. Or some Debt arising from an Inequality, that so what is wasted may be reputed, as taken in Satisfaction of that Debt, for otherwise it could not be lawful. 3. Or some Injury, that may merit such a Punishment, or which such a Punishment does not proportionably exceed. For as a judicious [b] Divine well observes, there is no manner of Justice, that a whole Kingdom should be laid waste, for the driving away of a few Cattle, or the burning of some Houses. Which is also allowed by Polybius, [1] who would not have the Rigour of War be exercised without Controul, but just so far, that Wrongs and Punishments may be equally balanced: And for these Reasons, and with these Limitations, it may be done without Injustice.

[650]

2. But unless it be for some Advantage, it would be very foolish to do another a Damage, without any Profit to ones self. Wherefore wise Men always propose to themselves some Advantage thereby, the principal whereof Onosander has observed, [2] Let him destroy, burn, and lay waste his Enemy's Country: For the want of Money and Provisions shortens the War, as Plenty lengthens it. To which agrees that of Proclus, [3] It is the Duty of a good General to straiten his Enemies as much as possible. And thus says Curtius of Darius, [4] He expected that he should be overcome by Famine, having nothing to sustain him, but what he could get by Spoil and Plunder.

3. And that Waste and Desolation cannot be condemned, which quickly forces an Enemy to Peace: This way of making Wars did Halyattes use against the Milesians, the Thracians against the Byzantians, the Romans against the Campanians, Capenates, Spaniards, Ligurians, Nervians, and Menapians. But if we rightly weigh the Matter, such Things are for the most Part managed rather out of Spite than wise Counsel: For very often either those inducing Reasons cease, or there are others more powerful, that advise to the contrary.

II. 1. This happens first, when we have got such Possession of a Thing II. No wasting of Things that may be profitable to us, and out of the Enemy's Power. belonging to the Enemy, that he cannot any more enjoy the Fruits of it. To which the divine Law [1] does properly refer, which allows wild Trees and unfruitful to be cut down, to make Fortifications and Engines of War; but those that bear Fruit to be preserved for Subsistence, giving this Reason, because Trees cannot, as Men may, rise up in Arms against us. Which [2] Philo, by a Parity of Reason, extends also to fruitful Fields; and by a pathetic Fiction introduces the Law itself thus speaking to those who ought to observe it. Why are you angry with Things inanimate, particularly [651] those that are mild, and yield grateful Fruit? Do they, like Men, discover any hostile (or disobliging) Intentions against you? Do they deserve to be entirely rooted up, for what they do, or threaten to do against you? But they are very beneficial to the Conqueror, and afford a large plenty of Things immediately necessary, and even contribute to our Pleasures; Men do not only pay Tribute, but even Trees, and that of more Value in their proper Seasons, and also such as Man cannot live without. And Josephus [3] to the same Purpose says: If Trees could speak, they would cry out, and reproach us with Injustice, for making them suffer the Punishment of War, who were no Occasion of it. And hence it is, in my Opinion, that the Pythagoreans have derived their Maxim, [4] That we ought not to destroy or hurt a cultivated Plant or Fruit-Tree.

2. And Porphyry [5] describing the Manners of the Jews (in his fourth Book of not eating living Creatures) esteeming their Custom to be (I suppose) the best Interpreter of their Law, enlarges it even to all Beasts serviceable to Husbandry, for he says Moses commanded to spare also these in War. But their Talmud Writings, and Hebrew Interpreters extend it yet farther, [6] declaring that this Law ought to reach to every Thing that may be destroyed without Cause, as the burning of Houses, the spoiling of Eatables and Drinkables. The wise Moderation of Timotheus the Athenian General agreed with this Law, who (as Polyaenus [7] relates it) would not suffer a House or Village to be destroyed, or a Fruit-Tree to be cut down. There is a Law also in Plato, [8] in his fifth Book De Republica, forbidding to waste Lands or burn Houses.

3. Much less ought it then to be allowed after a compleat Victory. Cicero [9] blames the destroying of Corinth, though they had in a gross Manner abused the Roman Embassadors. And in another Place [10] he calls that War, horrid, abominable, and spitefully malicious, which was made [11] against Walls, Houses, Pillars and [652] Gates. Livy much commends the Mercy of the Romans, at the taking of Capua, that they did not exercise their Cruelty [12] on the innocent Houses and Walls, by burning and demolishing them. Agamemnon says in Seneca,

[13] *Equidem fatebor (pace dixisse hoc tuâ Argiva tellus liceat) affligi Phrygas
Vincique volui: ruere, & aequari solo
Etiam arcuissem. — — —*

*'Tis true, the Trojans (and I hope my Country Forgives my Clemency) I thought to conquer;
But to apply th' Extremities of War,
Or raze their City, this I ne'er intended.*

4. Indeed holy Writ informs us, that some Cities were by GOD's especial Command entirely rased, Joshua vi. even against that general Law which we have mentioned, the Trees of the Moabites were ordered to be cut down, 2 Kings iii. 19. But that was not done in Hatred to the Enemy, but in just Detestation of their Impieties, which were either publicly notorious, or esteemed worthy of such Punishment in the Sight of GOD.

III. 1. This will likewise happen, where the Possession is yet in Dispute, if there be great Hopes of a speedy Victory, of which those Lands and Fruits will be the Reward. Thus Alexander the Great, as Justin relates it, hindered his Soldiers from wasting Asia, [1] declaring to them, that they should spare their own, and not destroy those Things, which they came to possess. Thus Quintius, when Philip overrun Thessaly, wasting it with Fire and Sword, exhorted his Soldiers (as Plutarch [2] informs us) to march thro' the Country, as if it were now entirely their own. Croesus [3] advising Cyrus not to give up Lydia to be plundered by his Soldiers, tells him, You will not ruin my Cities, nor my Lands, they are no longer mine, they are now become yours, they will destroy what is yours.

2. They who do otherwise, may apply to themselves the Words of Jocasta to Polynices in Seneca's Thebais.

[4] *Patriam petendo perdis: Ut fiat tua,
 Vis esse nullam: Quin tuae causae nocet
 Ipsum hoc, quod armis uris infestis solum
 Segetesque adultas sternis, & totos fugam
 Edis per agros: Nemo sic vastat sua.
 Quae corripit igne, quae meti gladio jubes,
 Aliena credis.*

*You ruin your Country whilst you seek it; to make it yours
 Its Being you destroy; it defeats your Claim [653]
 To level, thus in Arms, the ripen'd Harvest;
 Is Fire and Sword, the Vengeance of an Enemy,
 Applied to Spoil and Ravage what's ones own?
 No, our deadliest Foes we thus afflict.*

To the same Sense are the Words of [5] Curtius, Whatsoever they did not waste, they owned to be their Enemies. Agreeable hereunto is that which Cicero, in his Letters to Atticus, says against the Design that Pompey had formed of taking his Country by Famine. Upon this Account Alexander the Isian blames Philip (in the 17th Book of Polybius) whose Words Livy [6] has thus rendered: Philip dared not engage in a fair Field-fight, nor come to a pitch'd Battle, but flying away burned and plundered Cities; so that the Conquered rendered useless to the Conquerors what should have been the Recompence of Victory. But the old Kings of Macedon did not use to do so, they used to come to a fair Engagement, to spare Cities as much as possible, that they might have the more wealthy Dominion. For it is not a strange Conduct, to make War in such a Manner, that at the same Time, we dispute the Possession of a Thing, we leave nothing for ourselves but War.

IV. 1. In the third Place, this happens, if the Enemy can be supplied elsewhere, either by Sea or Land. Archidamus in Thucydides, [1] in his Speech to dissuade his Subjects the Lacedemonians from a War with Athens, puts this Query, What Hopes had they to succeed in the War, whether, because they excelled in Number of Soldiers, they pretended to waste the Athenian Lands? But consider (says he) they have other Countries under their Dominion, (meaning Thrace and Ionia) and they might easily supply themselves by Sea, with whatsoever they wanted. Wherefore in that Case it were best to protect Husbandry even in the Frontiers of each Side: Which we have lately seen practised in the Wars of the Low-Countries, by paying Contributions to both Parties.

IV. If the Enemy can be supplied otherwise.

2. And this is agreeable to the antient Custom of the Indians, among whom, as Diodorus Siculus [2] relates, Husbandmen are indemnified and as it were sacred, so that they follow their Labour even close by the Camp, and near the Troops. And he adds, They do not burn the Enemies Lands, nor cut down the Trees. And again, No Soldier will willingly wrong Husbandmen, but esteeming them as common Benefactors, forbear doing them any manner of Injury.

3. Xenophon [3] informs us, that it was agreed between Cyrus and the Assyrian King, That the Husbandmen should enjoy Peace, and that War should be made only against those that were in Arms. Thus Timotheus, as Polyaeus [4] relates, Let out the fruitfullest Lands of the Country where he had entered with his Army: Nay, (as Aristotle [5] adds) sold the very Corn to his Enemies, and with that Money paid his own Soldiers. Which Viriatus also practised in Spain, as Appian witnesseth. And this very Thing we have seen done in the aforesaid Low-Country War, with great Prudence and Profit, to the Admiration of all Foreigners.

4. These Customs do the Canons, which are full of Lessons of Humanity, propose to our Christian Imitation, as being obliged to, and professing more Humanity than others; therefore they [6] enjoin us to put not only the Husbandmen beyond the hazard of War, but also their Cattle with which they plow, and their Seed which they carry to the Field; it is undoubtedly for the same Reason that the Civil Law [7] forbids [654] to take in pawn any Thing belonging to Agriculture. And it was formerly prohibited among the Phrygians and Cyprians, afterwards [8] with the Athenians, and then the Romans, to kill a plowing Ox.

V. There are some Things of that Nature, that they can no way contribute either towards the making or maintaining of a War, which Things even common Reason will have spared during a War. To this Purpose is the Speech of the Rhodians to Demetrius, the Taker of Towns, with regard to the Picture of Ialysus (one of the Founders of their Nation) translated by A. Gellius. [1] What Reason can you have to desire to destroy so excellent a Piece, by burning our Houses? For if you vanquish us, and take the City, this Picture will also be entirely your own; but if you are forced to raise the Siege, pray consider, what a Disgrace it will be to you, because you could not overcome the Rhodians, you must needs make War with Protogenes a dead Painter. Polybius [2] called it an Act of extream Madness to destroy those Things, which by being destroyed do not weaken the Enemy, nor advantage the Destroyer. Such are Temples, Portico's, Statues, and the like. Cicero [3] much commends Marcellus, because he took such a particular Care to preserve all the Buildings of Syracuse both publick and private, sacred and prophane, as if he had been sent with an Army, rather to defend than take the City. And the same Author [4] again, Our Ancestors used to leave to the Conquered, what Things were grateful to them, but to us of no great Importance.

V. If the Things be of no Use for War.

VI. 1. But as this Maxim ought to be observed in regard to publick Ornaments, for the Reason aforesaid, so more especially in regard to Things dedicated to sacred Uses, for, although these also (as we have said [a] elsewhere) are in some Sort publick, and therefore by the Law of Nations may be damaged or destroyed with Impunity, yet if no Danger can arise from the preserving of such Buildings, and their Appurtenances, [1] the Reverence due to holy Things may be a sufficient Plea, especially with those who worship the same GOD according to the same Law, tho' they may differ in Opinions and Ceremonies.

VI. This especially ought to take in Things sacred, or thereto belonging.

[655]

Thucydides [2] says, it was a Law observed by the Greeks in his Days, When they invaded the Lands of an Enemy, they mutually spared holy Places. When Alba was destroyed by the Romans, [3] Livy says the Temples were preserved. And Silius [4] ] in his 13th Book thus writes of the Romans taking Capua.

*Ecce repens tacito percurrit pectora sensu
Religio, & Saevas componit Numine mentes,
Ne flammam taedasque velint, ne templa sub uno
In cinerem sedisse rogo.*

*Religion, by insensible Degrees
Steals on the Mind, and soothes the Breasts of Conquerors,
Lest in the universal Wrack of Cities,
The Temples of the Gods fall undistinguish'd.*

The same Livy [5] tells us, it was objected to Q. Fulvius the Censor, That he had involved the People of Rome in the Crime of Sacrilege, by the Destruction of Temples, as if the immortal Gods were not the same in all Places, but that they of one Place should be honoured, and adorned with the Spoils of those of another. But Marcius Philippus being arrived at Dius, caused the Troops to encamp near the very Temple of that City, in order to secure it and all that was in it from Hostilities. Strabo [b] writes, that the Tectosages, who with others had robbed the Temple of Delphos, to appease the injured God, did consecrate those Spoils, with some Addition, when they returned Home.

3. To come now to the Christians. Agathias relates, that the Franks spared the Temples of the Greeks, as being themselves of the same Religion with them. Nay, it was customary to save the Persons of Men in respect to Churches, which (not to quote Examples of Heathen Nations, whereof there are many, for Writers [6] call this Custom, A Law amongst the Grecians) St. Augustin thus commends [7] in the Goths, when they took Rome. The [8] Churches consecrated to (the Memory of) Martyrs and Apostles, in that general Devastation, secured all those that fled to them for [656] Refuge, whether Natives or Foreigners. So far the Rage of the Enemy extended without Controul, but here the Fury of Slaughter stopt; to these Places did the compassionate Soldiers convey their Prisoners, whom they had spared even without the Bounds of these Sanctuaries, from the Fury of their own Companions, that had less Tenderness than themselves; and they who other ways were inhumanly cruel, as soon as ever they came near any of those Places, where they were forbid to make use of their Right of War, immediately restrained their Eagerness to kill, and their Desire of making Prisoners.

VII. 1. What I have said of sacred Things, the same may also be VII. Also burial places understood of Sepulchres, and even of Monuments that have been erected in Honour of the Dead. For even those (tho' the Law of Nations hath not exempted them from the Fury of the Conqueror) cannot be violated without Breach of common Humanity. The Lawyers maintain [1] that whatever engages a religious Respect to burial Places, ought to be of very great Weight. There is a pious Saying of Euripides in his Troades, in regard to Sepulchres, as well as sacred Things,

[2] Μῶρος δὲ θνητῶν ὅστις ἐκπορθεῖ πόλεις,
Ναοὺς τε τύμβους θ' ἱερὰ τῶν κεκμηκότων,
Ἐρημῶν δούσ' αὐτὸς ὕστερον.

*Whoever ravages the silent Dead,
Or impiously profanes their sacred Urns,
Unwise I'll call him; for he ne'er reflects, That his own Dust may once be so disturb'd.*

Apollonius Tyaneus [3] thus interpreted the Fable of the Giants fighting against Heaven, ὃ βρῖσαι εἰς τοὺς νεῶς αὐτῶν, καὶ τὰ ἔδη, That they violated the Temples and Habitations of the Gods. Hannibal is called sacrilegious by Statius, [4] for burning the Altars of the Gods.

2. Scipio, at the taking of Carthage, presented his Soldiers with large Donatives, χωρὶς τῶν εἰς τὸ Ἀπολλώνειον ἁμαρτόντων, says Appian, [5] Except those who had profaned the Temple of Apollo. The Trophy erected by Mithridates, Caesar (as Dion [6] relates) durst not demolish, as consecrated to the Gods of War. Marcus Marcellus [7] (as Cicero observes in his fourth Oration against Verres) would not out of Conscience touch those Things which Victory had rendered profane. And the same Author [8] adds, that there were some Enemies, who in War observed the Right of Religion, and of Customs. And he in another Place calls the Acts of Hostility which Brennus exercised against the Temple of Apollo, an [9] abominable War. Livy [10] calls the Action of Pyrrhus in plundering the Treasure of Proserpine, vile and insolent against the Gods. So does Diodorus [11] that of Himilco, ἄσεβειαν, καὶ εἰς θεοῦς ἁμαρτημα, [657] impious, and sinful against the Gods. The same Livy [12] terms the War of Philip execrable, as if made against both the coelestial and infernal Deities; nay, he calls it Madness and a Series of Crimes. And Florus on the same, [13] Philip, contrary to the Right of Victory, vented his Cruelty on the Temples, Altars, and even the Sepulchres of the Dead. Polybius [14] speaking of the same, passes this Judgment, Who can call it any Thing else but an Act of downright Madness, to destroy those Things which can be of no Advantage to us, nor Prejudice to our Enemies, particularly Temples, Images, and such like Ornaments? And here he doth not permit the Law of Retaliation, as a sufficient Excuse.

VIII. 1. Tho' it be not properly my Design to enquire, what it is advantageous to do or not to do, but to reduce the extravagant Licence of War to what natural Equity allows, or what is best among Things lawful; yet Vertue itself, little esteemed in this Age, ought to forgive me, if, whilst she is by herself neglected, I endeavour to render her valuable on the account of her Advantages. First then, Moderation observed in preserving those Things which do not lengthen out the War, takes from the Enemy a powerful Weapon, Desperation. Archidamus thus speaks in Thucydides, [1] Look upon the Enemy's Country as an Hostage, and so much the surer the better it is cultivated, and with the more Reason to be spared, lest Despair should render the Enemy more invincible. [2] The same was the Advice of Agesilaus, when against the Opinion of the Achaeans, he gave the Acarnians free Liberty to sow their Corn, saying, the more they sowed, the more desirous they would be of Peace. And to this Purpose in the Satyr, VIII. The Advantages mentioned, which arise from this Moderation.

[3] Spoliatis arma supersunt.

The Plunder'd still have desperate Arms.

Livy tells us, when the Gauls [4] had taken Rome, their chief Commanders would not let all the Houses be burnt; that what they left standing of the Town, might be as a Pledge to bend the Minds of the Besieged.

2. Besides, the sparing of an Enemy's Country during a War, looks as if we were pretty confident of Victory. And Clemency is of itself proper to soften and pacify the Minds of Men. Hannibal (according to [5] Livy) wasted none of the Lands of the Tarentines, not out of Moderation, either in General, or Soldiers, but to gain the Tarentines to his Party. For the same Reason did Augustus Caesar [6] forbear plundering Pannonia. Dion gives the Reason, He hoped to win them without Blows. And Timotheus by doing what we have before mentioned of him, proposed to himself (as Polyaenus [7] relates) among other Things, to gain the Affections of his Enemies. Plutarch [8] speaking of the Moderation of Quintius, and the Romans that were with him (in Greece) adds this, They quickly reaped the Benefit of this Forbearance, for as soon as he came into Thessaly, the Cities readily yielded to him. The Greeks also which dwelt within the Thermopylae, earnestly desired his coming; and the Achaeans renouncing the Friendship of Philip, immediately confederated with the Romans against him. Frontinus [9] informs us, that a City of the Lingones having escaped the plundering they were afraid of, in the War made by Domitian, under [658] the Conduct of Cerealis, against Civilis the Batavian, and his Associates; Because beyond their Expectation, they had lost nothing of their Goods, submitting to his Obedience, they furnished him with 70,000 Men well armed.

3. Contrary Counsels have met with contrary Success. Livy [10] gives an Instance in Hannibal, Giving himself up to Covetousness and Cruelty, he destroyed what he could not keep, that he might leave nothing to the Enemy but wasted Lands. And this Counsel was wretched both in the beginning and in the End. For he not only lost the Affections of those whom he thus barbarously used, but of all others also, who were afraid of being exposed to the like Desolation.

4. I readily agree to what has been observed by some Divines, that it is the Duty of supreme Powers, and of Commanders who desire to be thought Christians by GOD and Man, to prevent the merciless plundering of Towns, and the like Acts of Hostility, as cannot be done without infinite Loss to Multitudes of innocent People, and be but of little Advantage in regard to the principal Affairs of War. Such Sort of Violence is almost always contrary to Christian Charity, and commonly to Justice itself. There is certainly a greater Bond among Christians, than there was formerly among the Grecians, in whose Wars it was enacted by a Decree of the Amphictyones, [11] that no Grecian City should be pillaged. And some antient Writers [12] affirm, that Alexander the Macedonian repented of nothing more than his destroying of Thebes.

---

CHAPTER XIII ↩

Moderation about Things taken in War.

I. 1. But the taking away of our Enemies Goods in a just War, is not to be reputed wholly innocent, or clear from the Obligation of Restitution. For [1] if we respect that which is done rightly, it is not really lawful to take, or keep from the Enemy more than may be justly due from him, except what Things (beyond the same due) we are obliged to detain for our own necessary Security; but when the Danger is over, they are also to be restored, either in Kind, or to the full Value; according to the Principles we have laid down in the second Book, Chap. II. For what we may lawfully do with the Goods of those that are at Peace with us, we may do it much more to those of our Enemy. This then is a Sort of Right to take, without a Right of acquiring.

I. That so much of the Goods of the Enemies Subjects taken in War, may be detained, as comes to the Value of what is due to us.

2. But since a Debt may arise to us, either from the Inequality of Things, [2] or by way of Punishment, we may on either of these accounts seize on the Goods of the Enemy, but with some Difference; for as we said [a] before, from that former Obligation, not only the Goods of the Debtor, but also those of his Subjects by the allowed Law of Nations (as by way of Surety ship) stand engaged; which Law of Nations we look upon to be of another Kind, than that which consists in a bare Impunity, or of which the Use is maintained and authorised only externally, by the Effect of a Sentence, whether just or unjust. For as by our own personal Consent, our Dealer does not only acquire an external Right, but also an internal one; (that [659] is, which he may in Conscience make use of.) So also by a certain general Consent, which virtually comprehends in it, the Consent of each Individual. In which Sense the Law is called [3] πόλεως συνθήκη κοινή, A general Convention of the State. And it is the more probable, that it was thought proper by Nations, that in such a Case, such a Right might be allowed, because this Law of Nations [4] was intended, not only to prevent greater Mischiefs, but also to enable every Person to recover his Due.

II. But, if the Prince's Debt be penal, I do not see that by the Consent of Nations, such a Right is allowed on his Subjects Goods. For such an Obligation upon another Man's Goods is odious, and therefore not to be extended beyond the manifest Intention of those who authorise it. [1] Besides, there is no Reason of Utility so weighty, as could have induced Nations to establish in regard to the latter Sort of Debt, what they established in regard to the former. For that which is due to us on account of any Damage, makes Part of our Goods; but not that which is due to us in form of Punishment; so that the Prosecution of the latter may, without any Damage, be omitted. Neither does what I have already [a] mentioned of the Attic Law at all contradict it: For in that Case Men stood engaged not strictly because the State could be punished, [2] but only to force the State to do what it ought to do; that is, to judge the Guilty: Which Obligation founded on a Duty, has Relation to the former Sort of Debt not to the latter. For it is one Thing to be obliged to punish, and another Thing to be liable to Punishment. Tho' this is commonly the Consequence of an Omission about that; but still they are two different Things, since the one is the Cause, and the other the Effect. Therefore the Goods of the Enemies Subjects cannot be acquired under the Notion of Punishment, but only those of Offenders themselves, among whom are included the Magistrates, that do not (according to their Duty) punish Offences.

II. But not for the Punishment of another Man's Crime.

III. Moreover, the Goods of an Enemy's Subjects may be taken and acquired, not only to reimburse ourselves of the primary Debt, which was the Occasion of the War; but also to make Satisfaction for the subsequent

III. By Debt is here understood the Charges in War. Examples of this.

Charges, according to what we have said in the beginning of this Book. And thus we must understand what some Divines have written, that Things taken in War are not to be compensated by the principal Debt. For this is to be understood, till, according to sound Judgment, Satisfaction be made for the Damage done in that War. Thus in the Treaty with Antiochus, the Romans (as Livy [1] relates) judged it equitable, that the [660] King should bear the Charges of the War, who by his Fault had been the Occasion of it. So Justin [2] calls it a reasonable Condition. The Samians are condemned in Thucydides, [3] To bear the Charges of the War. And elsewhere we find a great Number of the like Examples. But whatsoever is justly imposed on the Conquered, may be exacted in a just War.

IV. 1. But we must observe, which we have elsewhere mentioned, that the Rules of Charity reach farther than those of Right. He that abounds in Wealth is guilty of gross Inhumanity, if he strip his poor Debtor of all that ever he is worth, by the Rigour of the Law, to satisfy his own Debt; but more particularly, if that Debtor contracted that Debt by his Kindness to another; as if he had engaged for his Friend, but had received none of the Money to his own proper Use. [1] Very miserable is the Condition of a Security, says Quintilian the Father. Yet such a hard hearted Creditor acts nothing against Right, properly so called.

IV. Humanity bids us not use this Right to the utmost.

2. Wherefore [2] Humanity requires us to spare the Goods of those who are in no Fault concerning the War, and who are no otherwise concerned than by Way of Surety ship, which we may better be without than they; but especially if it appear, that they shall receive no Reparation for them from their own State. Agreeably to this, said Cyrus to his Soldiers, at the taking of Babylon, [3] What ye get (from your Enemies) is justly your own, but if you leave them any Thing, it will be an Act of Humanity.

3. This is also to be observed, since this Right of seizing the Goods of innocent Subjects is but Subsidiary, or by Way of Surety ship, as long as there are any Hopes of recovering our own from the principal Debtor, or from those who, by refusing to render Justice, make themselves Debtors, to prosecute those who are wholly innocent, tho' it does not contradict the Rules of strict Justice, yet it is far distant from the Rule of Humanity.

4. Examples of this Humanity are very frequent in History, especially the Roman; as when, upon conquering the Enemy, their Lands were returned to them, [4] upon this Condition, that they should from thenceforth belong to the conquered State. Or when a small Part of those Lands were, for Honour's Sake, [5] left to [661] the antient Possessors. Thus Livy tells us, that the Veientes [6] were punished by Romulus, with the Loss of part of their Lands only. So Alexander the Macedonian restored their Lands to the Uxii under a Tribute. Thus we often read that surrendered Cities were not pillaged. And we said before, [a] that not only the Persons, but also the Goods of Husbandmen, were by a laudable Custom, and conformable to the Canons, spared, at least with a Tribute laid upon them; and a Liberty of Trade was allowed to Merchants, upon their paying Custom for their Commodities.

CHAPTER XIV ↩

Of Moderation concerning Captives.

I. 1. In what Places the taking of Men Prisoners, and making them Slaves, is yet allowed, if we respect internal Justice, it is to be thus limited; that is, it may be so far lawful, till Satisfaction be made for the Debt, either principal, or accessory; unless it should happen, that the Persons taken be guilty of such Crimes as may justly forfeit their Liberty. Hitherto therefore, and no further, he that wages a just War, has a Right over the Subjects of his Enemy taken Prisoners, and a Power to transfer it firmly to others.

I. How far, in Conscience, we may make Prisoners of War.

2. But we are taught by Equity and Humanity to put the like Differences, as before [a] observed, when we treated concerning killing our Enemies. Demosthenes, in his Epistle for Lycurgus's Children, highly commends Philip of Macedon, because that he did not make all that were found among his Enemies Slaves. [1] For he did not think to use all alike, either just or honest; but duly weighing the Merits of each Person, he acted rather the Judge (than Conqueror).

II. 1. But [1] we must observe again here, that the Right which arises, as it were, [2] from Surety ship for a State, is not of so large an Extent, as that which is derived from the personal Offences of those that are made [3] Slaves of Punishment, as they are called. Whereupon a certain Spartan [4] said he was a Prisoner, but not [662] a Slave. For if we rightly consider the Thing, this general Right over Prisoners in a just War, is not greater than that which a Lord hath over those Slaves, who by Reason of Poverty have sold themselves to him; excepting, that the Case of those is far more deplorable, who are brought into this Condition, not by their own proper Fact, but by the Fault of their Governors, [5] It is a dreadful Thing (says Isocrates) to be made a Slave by the Right of War.

II. What may be done to Slaves by the Right of internal Justice.

2. This Bondage then is a perpetual Obligation to serve the Master, for a perpetual Maintenance. Chrysippus's [6] Definition does very well agree with this Sort of Slaves, A Slave is a perpetual Hireling. And the Law of the Hebrews does directly compare him to a Hireling, who compelled by Necessity, has sold himself for a slave, Deut. xv. 18. Levit. xxv. 40, 53. and will have his Ransom paid by his Labour, [7] just as the Fruits of Land sold, shall redeem it for the antient Owner, Lev. xxv. 49, 50.

3. There is then a vast Difference between what may be done to a Slave by the Law of Nations, and what by natural Right. As we have it in the afore-quoted Place of Seneca, [8] Tho' it be lawful to do any Thing to a Slave, there is something which the common Right of Animals forbids to be done to the Man. So in Philemon,

[9] Κἄν δοῦλος ἦν τις οὐδὲν ἥττον, δέσποτα
ἄνθρωπος οὐτός ἐστιν ἄν ἄνθρωπος ἦ.

*What tho' in Servitude, my Master,
He is still a Man as much as ever.*

So Seneca, in another Place, [10] Are they Slaves? Yet they are Men. Are they Slaves? Yet our Companions. Are they Slaves? Yet our Friends. Are they Slaves? Yet fellow Slaves. And what we read in Macrobius [11] has the same Meaning with that of St. Paul, Coloss. iv. 1. Masters, render to your Servants what is just and right, knowing that you yourselves have a Master in Heaven. And in another Place he advises Masters not to terrify them with Threatnings, for the same Reason before-mentioned; Because we have also a Master in Heaven, with whom is no Respect of Persons. Ephes. vi. 9. In the Constitutions attributed to Clemens Romanus, we are advised, Be not too [12] severe to thy Man or Woman Slave. Clemens Alexandrinus [13] would have us use our Slaves as our second Selves, being Men as well as we; in imitation of that wise Hebrew, [14] If thou hast a Servant, use him as a Brother, for he is such a one as thyself.

[663]

III. The Power of Life and Death which is ascribed to a Master over his Slave, gives to the former a Sort of domestick [1] Jurisdiction; but yet that Power is to be managed with the same Moderation, as do the publick Magistrates. This was Seneca's Meaning, when he said, [2] In thy Bondman consider, not what thou mayest inflict on him with Impunity, but what thou mayest do in Equity and Conscience, which requires that we should be merciful to our Captives and purchased Slaves. And in another Place he says, [3] What signifies it what Government one is under, if he be under a Supreme? In which Place he compares the Subject with the Slave, and says, tho' they be under different Titles, yet the [4] Authority over them is the same; which is certainly very true, with Respect to this Power of Life and Death, and other Things that resemble it. And again, the same Seneca, [5] Our Ancestors reputed every Family a little Commonwealth. Also Pliny, [6] A Man's House is a certain Republick, and as a State to his Slaves. And Plutarch [7] tells us, that Cato the Censor would not punish any of his Slaves; no not for the most heinous Offences, unless he were found guilty by his own fellow Servants. To which agree the Words of Job, Chap. xxxi. Ver. 13. and so on.

IV. But as to lesser Punishments, viz. Blows, &c. Equity, and also Clemency is to be shewed to Slaves. [1] Thou shalt not oppress him, nor rule over him with Rigour, says the Divine Law concerning a Hebrew Slave, Lev. xxv. which, as the Title of Neighbour is not now confined to one Nation only, should extend to all Slaves, Deut. xv. 12, &c. On which Place thus [2] Philo, Slaves indeed, as to Fortune are Inferiors, but as to Nature equal with their Masters; and, according to the Law of GOD, the Rule of just is not what comes from Fortune, but what is agreeable to Nature. Wherefore Masters ought not to use the Power they have over their Slaves, to gratify their Pride, Insolence, and Cruelty: For these are not the Signs of a meek and peaceable Spirit, but of a passionate and tyrannical Disposition. Seneca [664] puts the Question, [3] Is it equitable to exercise a more severe and cruel Authority over a Man, than is generally done over Beasts? but a skilful Manager that designs to break a Horse, does not pretend to do it by frequent Blows, for he will be fearful and headstrong, if he be not gently handled. And again, the same Author, [4] What can be more foolish, than to practise that brutish Cruelty upon a Man (that is our Slave) which we should be ashamed to do to Cattle, or Dogs? On which Account the Hebrew Law ordered the Master to let his Bondman or Bondwoman go free, [5] Not only for the Loss of an Eye, but even if he had struck out a Tooth, Exod. xxi. 26, 27. that is, if there had been no just Cause to correct them.

V. 1. But [1] we are also to enjoin them Labour with Moderation, having a Respect to their Strength and Constitution. To which, among other Things, the Hebrew Law pointed in the Institution of the Sabbath, viz. that all might have some Rest from their Labours, Exod. xx. 10. xxiii. 12. Deut. v. 14. And the Epistle of C. Pliny to Paulinus begins thus, [2] I see how gently you treat your Servants, wherefore I will more freely confess to you with what Tenderness I use mine: Always remembering that Expression of Homer, Like a Father he was indulgent to his Slaves, and this our Pater-Familias, the Father of a Family.

2. Seneca [3] takes Notice of the Humanity of the Antients, in using that Word, Do you not observe how careful our Forefathers were to prevent all Occasion of Envy to Masters, and Reproach to Slaves? When they called the Master Pater-Familias, The Father of the Family. And his Slaves Familiares, Domesticks. Dion Prusaeensis, [4] describing a good King, says, He is so far from taking a Pleasure in being called Lord and Master of his free Subjects, that he does not willingly receive that Title with Respect to his Slaves. Ulysses declares in Homer, [5] That those Slaves whom he found faithful, should be regarded by him as the Brothers of his Son Telemachus. And in Tertullian, [6] The Name of Goodness is more glorious than that of Power, and to be called the Father than the Master of a Family. And Hierom, or Paulinus, thus speaks to Celantia, [7] So govern and order your Family, that you may seem desirous to be accounted, rather the Mother than the Mistress, and engage your Servants to respect you, rather by Kindness than Severity. And St. Augustine [8] makes [665] this Observation, Good Parents formerly so managed their Families, that as to temporal Things the Children had the Advantage of the Servants; but as to Affairs of Religion, there was no Distinction. Whence it came to pass, that every Master was called Pater-Familias, which in Time became so customary, that even severe Masters affected that Title. But they who are true Fathers of Families, do take the same Care of their whole Family, in Regard to the Worship and Service of GOD, as of their own Children.

3. The same Tenderness Servius [9] observes to be in the Word Children, by which they meant Slaves, in his Remark upon that of Virgil, Claudite jam rivus Pueri.

And thus did the Heracleotae call their Slaves Mariandyni, [10]  $\Delta\omega\rho\phi\acute{o}\rho\omicron\upsilon\varsigma$ , Carriers of Presents; abating the Harshness of the Name of Slave, as Callistratus, an old Interpreter, observed on Aristophanes. Tacitus [11] commends the Germans, who treated their Slaves like Husbandmen. And Theana, [12] in an Epistle, says, The right using of Slaves is not to over-work with hard Labour, nor enfeeble them for Want of necessary Sustenance.

VI. 1. As I said before, we are obliged to maintain our Slaves for their Work. Cicero says, [1] We are to use Slaves as Mercenaries, by making them do their Work, and paying them their Due. And in Aristotle, [2] A Slave's Wages is his Maintenance. And Cato advises, [3] Provide carefully for your Family, that it be not starved with Cold or Hunger. There is something, says Seneca, [4] that a Master owes to his Servant, viz. Food and Raiment. Donatus [5] writes, that a Slave was allowed four Bushels of Corn every Month, for his Maintenance. And Martianus the Lawyer informs us, that a Master is obliged to provide his Slave [6] Cloaths, and the like. [7] The Sicilians are blamed in Histories for cruelly starving the Athenian Prisoners.

VI. The Stock of the Slave, how far the Master's and how far his own.

[666]

2. Seneca [8] also, in the fore-mentioned Place, proves, that in Regard to certain Things a Slave has the same Rights as if he were free, and that he may even become a Benefactor to his Master, by doing for him something beyond the Services he owes him, provided he therein Acts, not through Fear and Constraint, but of his own free Will, and out of Affection; which the Philosopher explains at large. So likewise, if a Slave, (as it is in [9] Terence) save any Thing out of his own Belly, or earned ought in his spare Hours, that properly is his own. Theophylus justly defines the Peculium,  $\omicron\upsilon\sigma\acute{\iota}\alpha\nu\ \phi\upsilon\sigma\iota\kappa\acute{\iota}\nu$ , [10] a natural Patrimony, as if you should call the Copulation of Slaves [11] a natural Marriage. Ulpian expressly calls the Peculium a small Patrimony. [12] Nor does it import much, that his Master may, at his own Pleasure, take it away, or diminish it; for if he does it without Cause he will act unjustly. By a Cause I mean, either by way of Punishment, or for his Lord's Necessity. For the Interest of the Slave ought to give Place to that of the Master, even more than the particular Interest of Subjects to the Interest of the State. Agreeable to this is that of Seneca, [13] It does not therefore follow that a Slave has nothing, because he cannot enjoy it unless his Lord pleases.

3. Hence it is, that the Master cannot demand again any Debt due to his Slave, in the Time of his Slavery, which he pays him after his Release. Because (as Tryphoninus [14] says) in a personal Action, the Consideration of a Debt, or no Debt, is understood naturally. And the Master may possibly be a Debtor naturally to his Slave. Therefore, as we read that [a] Clients have contributed something to the Use of their Patrons, and Subjects to the Use of Princes, so have Slaves [15] to the Use of [667] their Masters. As if a Daughter were to be portioned out, or a Son to be ransomed, or something like it should happen. Pliny, [16] as he himself relates in his Epistles, allowed his Slaves the Privilege of making a Sort of Will, that is so far as to distribute, to give, or bequeath within the Family. Among some Nations we read, that even a fuller Right of acquiring Things was allowed to Slaves, as we have before [b] explained, that there are different Degrees of Servitude.

4. And even the Laws among many Nations have reduced the external Right of Masters unto this internal Justice, of which we are now treating. For among the Greeks it was lawful for Slaves, if they were hard used, [17] To demand that they might be sold. And at Rome, [18] to fly to the Statues (for Refuge) or implore the Assistance of the Governors of Provinces, in Case of Cruelty, Hunger, or intolerable Wrongs. But a Master is not obliged in Rigour to make his Slave free, after a long Service, or a Service whereby the Slave has done for him something of great Importance. If then he grants him his Liberty it is a Favour; tho' this Favour may be sometimes due by the Laws of Humanity and Beneficence. After that Bondage, says [19] Ulpian, prevailed by the Law of Nations, the Benefit of Release likewise was allowed. We have an Example of this in Terence, [20]

[668]

Feci è servo ut esses Libertus mihi, Propterea quod serviebas liberaliter.

When you were my Slave, I freed you, Because you serv'd me with Integrity.

Salvian [21] declares that it was daily practised, that Slaves, tho' none of the best, yet if they were not arrant Knaves, were presented with Liberty. And he adds, they were allowed to carry away what they had got in the Time of their Service; of which Generosity in Masters we have many Examples in the Martyrologies. And here I must commend the Lenity of the Hebrew Law, Deut. xv. 13. which absolutely commands, that a Hebrew Slave having served out such a certain Time, shall be set free; [22] ] and that he should not go away empty; the Contempt of which Law the Prophets grievously complain of. Plutarch [23] blames Cato the Elder, that he sold his Slaves when they were old, forgetting the common Nature of Mankind.

VII. Here arises a Question, whether it be lawful for a Captive taken in a just War to flee away; I do not mean him who for some personal Fault had deserved that Punishment, but who, by the Fact of the State, has fallen into that Misfortune. According to the most reasonable Opinion he ought not, because, as we have said elsewhere, he is engaged, as a Member of the State, and in its Name, by Vertue of the [1] general Convention among Nations; which yet is so to be understood, unless an intolerable Cruelty has forced him to it. You may see the Answer of Gregory Neocaesariensis concerning this Affair. [a]

VIII. 1. We have [a] in another Place debated the Question, whether, and how far, the Children of Slaves are engaged to the Master by internal Right, which, on the Account of the particular Relation it has to Prisoners

VII. If Slaves may run away.

VIII. Whether they that are born of Slaves are obliged to the Master, and how far?

taken in War, ought not here to be omitted. If the Parents for their own personal Crimes have deserved Death, their Children, for the saving of their Lives, are obliged to serve, because otherwise they had not been born. For Parents have a Power to sell their own Children for Bondslaves, when they are not able to maintain them, as we have remarked in the same Place. Such a Right did GOD himself give to the Hebrews, over the Posterity of the Canaanites, (Deut. xx. 14.)

2. But for the Debt of a State, Children already born, as being Members of that State, may be obliged, no less than the Parents themselves. But this Reason cannot hold for those that are yet unborn, but some other is required; as the express Consent of the Parents, joined to the Impossibility of having otherwise wherewithal to keep the Children that are born to them, on which Account they are even authorised to render them Slaves for ever. There may be also a tacit Convention between them and their Master, grounded on the Master's finding Victuals for the Children that are born: But in that Case they engage the Liberty of their Children only till the latter have, by their own Labour, satisfied for those Expences. If any Right beyond this be allowed to the Master over them, it seems to be granted by the Civil Laws, which sometimes give to Masters more than Equity permits.

IX. 1. Among those Nations where this Right of Bondage over Captives is not practised, the best Way will be to exchange Prisoners; and, next to that, to release them for a moderate Ransom. Neither can one positively rate the Sum. But common Humanity teaches us, that it should not be so extravagant, as not to leave the ransomed Person the Necessaries of Life. For the Civil Law allows this even to those, who, by their personal Act, are fallen into Debt. In some Places the Price is determined by Cartels, or regulated by Custom, as formerly among the Greeks, the Ransom was a [1] Mina, and in our [669] Days a [2] Month's Pay. Plutarch [3] tells us, that the Wars between the Corinthians and Megarenses, were waged mildly, and as became Kinsmen. If any one were taken Prisoner, he was entertained by his Captor as a Guest, and, upon his bare Word for paying his Ransom, he was sent Home: Whence came the Name of δορυξένοϛ, a War Guest.

IX. What may be done where the Bondage of Captives is not in Use.

2. But more heroick is that of Pyrrhus, highly applauded by Cicero. [4]

*Nec mî aurum posco, nec mî pretium dederitis,
Ferro, non auro vitam cernamus utrique.
Quorum virtuti belli fortuna pepercit,
Eorundem Libertati me parcere certum est.*

*No Gold I seek, no Ransom shall you pay.
The Sword alone our Difference shall decide:
But those whose Valour the Lot of War respects,
I am resolved their Liberty to spare.*

No Doubt Pyrrhus thought his War just, yet looked upon himself obliged to restore them their Liberty, whom plausible Reasons had engaged against him. Xenophon commends the like Act in Cyrus. And Polybius, that of Philip the Macedonian, after his Victory at Cheronea. Curtius, that of Alexander to the Scythians: And Plutarch observes, of King Ptolemey and Demetrius, that they strove who should prevail in Civility to the Prisoners, as much as in Battle. And Dromichaetes, King of the Getes, [a] having taken Lysimachus Prisoner, entertained him as his Guest, and thereby engaged him, being an Eye-Witness of both the Poverty and Civility of the Getes, ever after to desire such People for his Friends, rather than Enemies.

CHAPTER XV ↩

Moderation in obtaining Empire.

I. If there be some Rules of Equity which we cannot dispense with, and some Acts of Humanity which we laudably exercise towards private Persons, tho' not bound to it in Rigour, we are so much more obliged to observe the former, and it is so much more commendable to practise the latter, towards a whole Nation, or part of one, as the Injury done to a great Number of People is more enormous, and the good done to a Multitude is more considerable, than that which we do to a single Person. As other Things may be obtained in a just War, so the Right of [670] the Sovereign over a People, and the Right which the People themselves have, in Regard to the Sovereignty, may be acquired; but only so far as the Degree of the Punishment due to their Crimes, or the Value of any other Debt, may justify. To which we may also add, the Necessity to avoid some extraordinary Danger. But this last Reason is for the most part joined with the other two, which yet, either in making Peace, or in managing a Victory, is chiefly to be considered. For in other Cases we may abate of our Right, from a Principle of Goodness and Indulgence, but in a publick Danger it is a cruel Compassion to trust too much to a conquered Enemy. Thus Isocrates addresses Philip, [1] It will be necessary for you so far to subdue the Barbarians, as to secure your own Country from all Danger.

I. How far internal Justice allows the gaining of Empire.

II. 1. Sallust [1] records of the antient Romans, Our Ancestors, the most religious of all Men, took nothing from the Vanquished, but the Power to hurt. A Reflection well worthy of a Christian: And to this Purpose he tells us in another Place, [2] Wise Men make War for the Sake of Peace, and undergo Labour in Hopes of Rest. Aristotle often said, [3] The Design of War is Peace, and Rest of Labour. And this is the Meaning of Cicero's excellent Saying, [4] War should be undertaken for no other Reason but to procure a firm Peace. And the same Author again, Wars are to be undertaken for this End, that we may live securely in Peace.

II. To forbear this Right over the Conquered is commendable.

2. Agreeably to this our Christian Divines teach us, that the End of War is to remove those Things which disturb Peace. Before the Days of Ninus, as we have before observed out of Trogus, [5] the Custom was rather to defend the Bounds of a State, than to enlarge [6] them. Every one's Dominion was limited within his own Country. Kings did not seek for Empire to themselves, but Glory to their People; and contenting themselves with the Victory, would not rule over the Conquered. To which State St. Augustin would reduce us, if possibly he could. [7] Let them consider, says he, that it does not belong to good Men to endeavour at the enlarging their Dominion: To which he adds, It is a greater Happiness to have a peaceable Neighbour, than to subdue an ill one in War. And the Prophet Amos, (Chap. i. ver. 23.) highly blames the Ammonites, for their eager desire to enlarge their Borders, by encroaching on their Neighbours.

III. The prudent Moderation of the old Romans comes very near to this exemplary Innocence of the primitive Times. [1] What would our Empire now have been? (says Seneca) if a sound Policy had not intermixed the Conquered with the Conquerors. Our Founder Romulus, (says Claudius, [2] in Tacitus) was so wise, that he made those that were his Enemies, the same Day Citizens; and he tells us, [3] That nothing so much contributed to the Ruin of the Lacedemonians and Athenians, as their excluding the Conquered as Strangers from the common Rights of their Citizens. Livy [4] says, the Roman Republick was aggrandized, by giving the Freedom of Citizens to its Enemies, after they were conquered. Histories give us the Examples of the Sabins, Albans, Latins, and other Italian Nations; till at last, Caesar led the Gauls [5] [671] in Triumph, and then introduced them into the Senate. Cerealis, in Tacitus, [6] thus addresses the Gauls, You yourselves generally command our Legions, you govern these, and the other Provinces; you are denied or debarred nothing: And he adds, Wherefore love Peace, and reverence a City where you enjoy the same Right as the Conqueror. Lastly, what is very admirable, all within the Compass of the Roman Empire, by the Decree of the Emperor Antoninus, [7] were made Citizens of Rome, which are the very Words of Ulpian. After that, as Modestinus [8] observes, Rome was the common Country of all that were under its Dominion. And thus said Claudian of it,

III. Either by mixing the Conquered with Conquerors.

[9] *Hujus pacificis debemus moribus omnes,
Quod cuncti gens una sumus.*

*We owe this Union of so many States
To her pacific Maxims.*

IV. 1. There is another Kind of Moderation in Victory, to leave to the Conquered, either Kings or People, their own Government. Thus Hercules to Priam,

IV. Or by leaving the Sovereignty in the Hands of those that possessed it before.

[1] *Hostis parvi victus lacrymis,
Suscipe, dixit, Rector habenas,
Patrioque sede celsus solio,
Sed scepra fide meliore tene.*

*Won by the Tears of a disabled Enemy,
Once more (says he) receive the Reins of Empire,
Fill once again, the Throne of your Progenitors;
But keep your Faith with more Integrity.*

The same Hercules having conquered Neleus, gave his Kingdom to his Son Nestor. Thus the Persian Monarchs left their Kingdoms to the conquered Kings. So did Cyrus to the King of Armenia, and Alexander to Porus. This [2] Seneca much commends, To take nothing from the vanquished King but Honour. And Polybius [3] admires the Moderation of Antigonus, that when he had Sparta in his Power, he left to the Citizens, Their antient Government and Liberty. Which Act, he says, acquired him great Praise throughout Greece.

2. Thus the Cappadocians were permitted by the Romans to use what Form of Government they pleased; and several other Nations, after the War, were left free. [672] Carthage [4] was left free, to be governed by her own Laws, as the Rhodians pleaded to the Romans, after the second Punick War; and Pompey, (says [5] Appian) Of the conquered Nations he left some free. And Quintius answered the Aetolians, crying out that there could be no firm Peace, till Philip the Macedonian were driven out of his Kingdom; [6] they had perfectly forgot the Custom of the Romans, to spare those they had conquered; adding this, That a great Soul was always the most merciful to the Vanquished. And Tacitus informs us, [7] That nothing was taken away from Zorsines when he was conquered. [8]

V. Sometimes with the restoring of the Sovereignty, the Conqueror's Security is also provided for. [1] Thus it was ordered by Quintius, that the City of Corinth should be restored to the *Achaean*s, but a [2] Garrison put into the Citadel. And that Chalcis and Demetrius should be detained, till all Fear of Antiochus were over.

V. Sometimes by placing of Garrisons.

VI. The imposing of Tributes is oftentimes not so much to reimburse the Charges of a War, as for the Security both of the Conqueror and Conquered, for the future. Cicero writes thus of the Greeks, [1] Let Asia also consider, That she can never be free from a foreign War, or domestick Quarrels, if she be not secured by the

VI. Or by Tributes, and the like Impositions.

Roman Empire, and since that cannot be done without Tributes; she may very reasonably part with some of her Wealth, to secure to herself a perpetual Peace. Petilius Cerealis, in Tacitus, thus pleads for the Romans, with the Lingones, and other Gauls. [2] We, tho' so often provoked, yet, by the Right of Victory, exact of you only what is necessary to maintain Peace. For the Peace of Nations cannot be maintained without Arms, nor Arms without Pay, nor that without Tributes. Agreeable hereunto is that which we have said [a] before, when we treated of unequal Alliances, as to deliver up one's Arms, Fleets, Elephants, to keep no Fort nor Army.

VII. 1. But that their own Sovereignty should be left to the Vanquished, VII. Profit arising from this Moderation. is not only agreeable to Humanity, but often also to Policy. This is commended among Numa's Laws, that he would have no Blood shed at the Rites of the God Terminus, thereby intimating, that nothing more contributed to a firm Peace than to live contentedly within our own Bounds. And Florus [1] well observes, It is harder to keep Provinces, than to conquer them; they are gained by Force, but must be retained by Justice. Like to this is that of Livy, [2] It is more easy to conquer several Countries, one after another, than to keep them all together. And Augustus says, in Plutarch, [3] It costs less to conquer a great Empire, than to govern it when conquered. [673] Darius's Embassadors tell Alexander, [4] A foreign Empire is dangerous, it is hard to hold what one cannot grasp. It is easier to conquer some Places than to keep them. How much more easily do our Hands take than they can hold!

2. Which [5] Calanus the Indian, and before him Oebarus, [6] Cyrus's Friend, explains, by the Comparison of dry Leather, which when pressed down with your Foot on one Side, rises up on the other. And T. Quintius, in Livy, [7] by the Similitude of a Tortoise, who when he draws himself into his Shell is safe from Harm; but as soon as ever he peeps out, is presently in Danger. Plato [8] in his third Book of Laws, thus applies the Saying of Hesiod, Omni dimidium plus, One half is better than the whole. And Appian [9] observes, that when some Nations desired to be admitted under the Roman Government, they were refused; and to some Nations they appointed Kings. In the Opinion of Scipio Africanus, the Roman Empire in his Days was so large, that to desire more would be but Covetousness; to keep quietly what they had, would be sufficiently happy. Wherefore that Prayer in which, at their solemn Purgations, the Romans used to intreat the Gods to prosper and enlarge their Empire, [10] he thus amended, that they would preserve it in perpetual Safety.

VIII. The Lacedemonians, and in the Beginning, the Athenians, never pretended to any sovereign Power over conquered Cities, they only insisted that they should use the same Form of Government with themselves. The Lacedemonians being under an Aristocracy, and the Athenians under a Democracy, as Thucydides, Isocrates, and Demosthenes inform us, and also Aristotle himself, in his eleventh Chapter of his fourth Book, and seventh of the fifth of the Republick; to which very Thing, Heniochus, a Writer of those Times, makes this Allusion in his Comedy, VIII. Examples, and of the Change of Government among the Conquered.

[1] Γυναίκα δ' αὐτὰς δὺ' ἐταράττετόν τινα
Ἄει συνοῦσαι· Δημοκρατία θατέρῳ·

[674]

Ὅνομ' ἐστὶ, τῇ δ' Ἀριστοκρατία θατέρῳ,
Δι' ἧς πεπαρωνήχασιν ἤδη πολλάκις

*Two Women, turbulent in their Designs,
Arriv'd amongst them: Democratia
The one was call'd, Aristocratia th'other,
These some Time since distracted them.*

Tacitus mentions the same Thing done by Artabanus, in Regard to Seleucia, [2] He established Aristocracy for his own Interest, because popular Government comes nearer to Liberty, and the Dominion of a few Nobles somewhat resembles arbitrary Power. But whether such Alterations [3] make for the Security of the Conqueror, it is not my Business to determine.

IX. But if it be not perfectly safe to leave to the Conquered their entire Liberty, yet it may be so moderated, that some Part of the Government may be left to them, or their Kings. Tacitus [1] tells us, that it was the Custom of the Romans, to make even Kings Instruments of Subjection. So Antiochus is called, [2] The richest of all the Kings that were subject to them. Kings, Subjects of the Romans, [3] in the Commentaries of Musonius. And in Strabo, [4] about the End of the sixth Book. Thus Lucan,

IX. If the Sovereignty be assumed, part of it to be left to the Conquered.

[5] Atque omnis Latio, quae servit purpura ferro.

And every Prince that serves the Roman State.

Thus the Government continued among the Jews, in the Sanhedrim, [6] even after Archelaus had been stript of his Kingdom. And Evagoras, [7] King of Cyprus, (as Diodorus relates) said, he would obey the King of Persia, but that as one King did another. And Alexander offered to Darius, after he had overcome him, [8] That he should rule over others, provided he would obey him, his Conqueror. We have already [a] treated of the Manner how a Government may be mixed. Sometimes, conquered Kings had Part of their States restored to them, and at the same Time, Part of the Lands [9] was left to the antient Possessors.

X. Yet when all Sovereignty is taken from the conquered, there may be left to them their own Laws, about their private and publick Affairs, of small Moment, and their own [1] Customs and Magistrates. Thus Pliny's Epistles tell us, that in [675] Bithynia, a Proconsular Province, the City [2] Apamea was indulged to govern their State as they pleased themselves. And in other Places, the Bithynians had their own Magistrates, and their own Senate. So in Pontus, the City of Amisus, by the Favour of Lucullus, [3] was allowed its own Laws. The Goths left their Civil Law to the conquered Romans.

X. Or at least some Sort of Liberty.

XI. 1. Another Privilege which ought to be allowed the Conquered, is [1] the Exercise of their antient Religion; unless they themselves, being convinced, are desirous to change it; which Agrippa, in his Oration to Cajus, (which Philo gives in his Relation of his Embassy) proves to be both very agreeable to the Vanquished, and not prejudicial to the Victor. And in Josephus, both Josephus himself, and the Emperor Titus, [2] objected to the rebellious Jews at Jerusalem, that, by the Favour of the Romans, they might use their own religious Ceremonies with so much Liberty, that they might drive away Strangers from their Temple, even at the Peril of their Lives.

XI. Especially in Religion.

2. But if the Religion of the Conquered be false, the Conqueror ought to take Care, [3] that the true one be not oppressed; which Constantine did, by weakning Licinius's Party; and after him the antient Kings of France, and of other Nations.

XII. 1. The last Advice is, where the Empire is entirely and absolutely obtained, there we should treat the Conquered with Gentleness, and in such a Manner that their Interests may be blended with those of the Conqueror. Cyrus bid the conquered Assyrians be of good Courage, telling them that their Condition should be the same it was before, except only that they would have another King; that they should enjoy their Houses, Lands, their Authority over their Wives and Children, as before; and if any one wronged them, he and his would take Care to see them righted. We read in Salust, [1] The Romans chose rather to gain Friends than [676] Slaves, and thought it safer to govern by Love than Fear. In the Days of Tacitus, [2] the Britons readily made their Levies, paid their Tributes, and performed all Duties enjoined them by the Romans, whilst they were not ill-treated; but they could not easily bear Wrongs, being so far conquered, as to be Subjects, not Slaves.

XII. At least we ought to use the Conquered with Mercy, and why.

2. The Privernian Ambassador being asked in the Roman Senate, what Sort of Peace the Romans might expect from them, replies, If you shall grant a good Peace, it will be firm and lasting; if a bad one, it will not hold long. And he gives the Reason, [3] Do not think that any People, or single Person, will ever continue longer in a Condition that he does not like, than he is absolutely forced to it. So said Camillus, That Empire is most secure, which is agreeable to those over whom it is exercised. The Scythians told Alexander, There is no true Friendship between the Lord and the Slave; and, in the midst of Peace, the Rights of War remain. And Hermocrates, in Diodorus, It is not so glorious to overcome, as to use the Victory with Humanity. In Order to make a right Use of Victory, the Saying of Tacitus ought always to be remembred, that We cannot finish a War in a more happy and glorious Manner than by pardoning the Vanquished. Julius Caesar, in a Letter he wrote when Dictator, says, Let this be the new Way of conquering, to secure ourselves with Mercy and Liberality.

---

CHAPTER XVI↩

Moderation concerning those Things which, by the Law of Nations, have not the Benefit of Postliminy.

I. 1. How far Things taken in a just War may be the Captors, I have declared [a] above, from which are to be deducted, what are recoverable by the Right of Postliminy; for these are to be esteemed as not taken. But Things taken in an unjust War, I have already [b] said, are to be restored, not only by the immediate Captors, but by others also, who shall happen to be possessed of them on any Account. For no Body can make over to another more Right than he has himself, say the [1] Roman Lawyers; which Seneca briefly explains, [2] No Man can give what he has not to give. If the first Captor did not become lawful Proprietor of them, according to the Rules of true Justice, then he cannot possibly be so, who derives all the Title he can have from him. Therefore the Right of Property which the second or third Possessor may have, is what we call external, that is, he is entitled to Defence by all judiciary Power and Authority, as if he were the right Owner; yet if he makes Use of this Right against him from whom the Things were unjustly taken, he acts dishonestly.

I. That internal Justice requires that what is taken away by an Enemy in an unjust War, be restored.

2. For what some eminent Lawyers [3] have decided concerning a Slave, who being taken by Robbers, afterwards fell into the Hands of the Enemy, that he was to be considered as a Thing stolen, though he had been Slave to the Enemy, and returned by Right of Postliminy. The same may be [677] answered from the Law of Nature, concerning him, who being taken in an unjust War, and afterwards, by a just War, or some other Accident, comes into the Power of another. For by internal Right, there is no Difference between an unjust War and downright Robbery. And Gregorius Neo-Caesariensis, being consulted, made a correspondent Answer, when some of the Inhabitants of Pontus [4] had recovered some Goods taken away by the Barbarians.

II. 1. Therefore Things so taken, ought to be restored to them from II. Examples. whom they were taken, which we see frequently done. [1] Livy, relating how the Volsci and Aequi were overcome by L. Lucretius Tricipitinus, says, That the Spoil was exposed for three Days in the Field of Mars, that every one might have that Time to come and acknowledge his own, and freely take it away. And the same Author in another Place, speaking of the Volsci, defeated by Posthumius the Dictator, says, [2] Part of the Spoil was restored to the Latins and Hernici, upon their owning of it, of another Part he made Portsale. And again, [3] Two Days were allowed to the Owners to come and claim their Goods. And the same Author, speaking of the Samnites's Victory over the Campanians, tells us, [4] It was a most joyful one to the Conquerors, for they had retaken 7400 Prisoners; a vast Booty for their Confederates; and the Owners were summoned by Proclamation, to own and take their Goods by a certain Day. And a little further he gives us the like Account of the Romans. [5] The Samnites endeavouring to take Interamna, a Colony of the Romans, but not able to hold it, they plundered the Country, and carrying off a great Number of Men, Cattle, and other Things, they accidentally fell into the Hands of the Roman Consul, returning Conqueror from Luceria; nor did they lose only their Booty, but, being encumbered with their heavy Baggage, were themselves routed and slain. The Consul, by Proclamation, summoning the Owners to come to Interamna, to fetch their Goods, leaving his Army there, went to Rome, on the Account of chusing Officers. The same Author also, in another Place, speaking of the Booty which Cornelius Scipio had taken at Ilipa, a City of Portugal, says thus, [6] It was all exposed to View before the City, and Leave given to the Owners to take their own, the Rest was delivered to the Quaestor to be sold, and the Money arising from thence distributed to the Soldiers. [7] After the Battle of T. Gracchus at Beneventum, the whole Prey, except the Prisoners, and what Cattle were not owned within thirty Days, were given to the Soldiers: As we read in the same Livy.

2. Polybius writes of L. Aemilius, when he had conquered the Gauls, [8] He restored the Spoils to those that came for them. [9] Plutarch and Appian relate, that Scipio did the same, when at the taking of Carthage, he found there many Things consecrated to the Gods, which the Carthaginians had brought thither from the Cities of Sicily, and elsewhere, (viz. restored them to their first Owners). And so does Cicero, in his Oration against Verres, concerning the Jurisdiction of Sicily, [10] The Carthaginians had formerly taken the City of Himera, that had been one of the stateliest and richest of Sicily; Scipio looking upon it as an Act worthy of the Roman People, when the War was ended by the taking of Carthage, took Care that their proper Goods should be restored to all the Sicilians. And the same Author does largely speak of the same Act of Scipio, in his Oration against Verres, concerning Statues. [678] Thus the Rhodians restored four Ships to the Athenians, which they had recovered from the Macedonians, that had formerly taken them from the Athenians. So Phaneas the Aetolian (as Livy [11] says) thought it equitable, that all that had belonged to the Aetolians before the War, should be restored to them. Neither did T. Quinctius deny it, if the Demand had been only of Cities taken in War; and if the Aetolians had not broke the Conditions of the Alliance. Nay, even those Goods which had been consecrated at Ephesus, and which the Kings had afterwards made their own, the Romans [12] restored to their former State.

III. 1. But if such Things should come to one in Way of Trade, may he not charge him, from whom they had been taken, with as much as they cost him? He may, as we have already [a] said, in Equity, so far as the Recovery of the Possession of those desperate Things, [1] might probably cost him, from whom they were taken. If then those Charges may be demanded of him, [2] why may not also our Pains and Hazard be valued, as if a Person should recover another Man's Goods out of the Sea, by Diving? Apposite to this is the Story of Abraham's returning Conqueror of the five Kings to Sodom: Moses says, He brought back all those Things, (viz. that they had taken away), as related before, Gen. xiv. 16.

III. Whether any Thing may be deducted.

2. Neither can the Offer made by the King of Sodom, Ver. 20, 21, 22, 23, 24. to restore to him the Prisoners, and to keep the Rest himself, as the Reward of his Pains and Hazard, be otherwise applied. But Abraham [3] being a Man not only of a pious [679] Mind, but also of a heroick Spirit, would take nothing to himself; but of the Booty, (for, as we said before, that is what is meant [4] ) as being his due, he gave the tenth unto GOD; he deducted the necessary Expences of that Expedition, and some Part he desired to be given to his Confederates.

IV. As Things (taken in an unjust War) are to be restored to their proper Owner, [1] so a People, or Part of them, are to be returned to their lawful Sovereigns, or even to themselves, if they were free before this unjust Conquest. Thus was Sutrium retaken, and restored to its Allies in the Time of Camillus, as Livy informs us. The Lacedemonians restored the Aeginetae and Melii [2] to their Cities. And the Cities of Greece, which had been oppressed by the Macedonians, were set at Liberty by Flaminius; who, in the Conference with [3] Antiochus's Embassadors, told them, it is equitable that all the Cities of Asia, which were of Greek Original, should be restored to their Liberty, which Seleucus, the Great-Grandfather of Antiochus, had taken by Force, and afterwards being lost, had been reconquered by this Antiochus: For, says he, those Colonies were not sent into Aeolia and Ionia to be subjected to the Kings of Asia, but to preserve a Nation so antient as that of Greece, and to propagate it throughout the World.

IV. The People, or Part of them, to be restored, if unjustly possessed.

V. It has been sometimes disputed, how long a Time is allowed, before this internal Obligation to Restitution may cease? But this Question, if it be between Subjects [1] of the same State, is best decided by their own Laws, provided those Laws give a true Right, that sets the Conscience at Rest, and not an external Right only; which may be collected by a prudent Searching into the Words and Meaning of those Laws. But if it be between Strangers each to other, it can be decided only by just Presumptions of a tacit Dereliction; of which we have spoken enough in [a] another Place to our Purpose.

V. In what Time the Obligation of Restitution ceaseth.

VI. But if the Justice of the War be very doubtful, it will be best to follow the Advice of Aratus the [1] Sicyonian; who in part persuaded the new Possessors [2] to accept of Money in lieu of them; and in part advised the first Owners rather to accept of the Value of their Lands, than run the Hazard of recovering them.

VI. What is to be done in a dubious Case.

CHAPTER XVII ↩

Of Neuters in War.

I. It may seem needless for us to treat of those that are not engaged in the War, when it is manifest that the Right of War cannot affect them; but because, upon Occasion of War, many Things are done against them on Pretence of Necessity, it may be proper here, briefly to repeat what we have already mentioned [a] before, that the Necessity must be really extream, to give any Right to another's Goods. That it is requisite, that the Proprietor be not himself in the like Necessity. When real Necessity urges us to take, we should then take no more than what it requires. That is, if the bare keeping of it be enough, we ought to leave the Use of it to the Proprietor; and if the Use be necessary, we ought not to consume it; and if we cannot help consuming it, we ought to return the full Value of it.

I. From Neuters nothing is to be taken but upon extream Necessity, and with restoring the full Value.

II. 1. Moses, when he was obliged of Necessity to pass with the Israelites through the Country of the Edomites, he first offers to go through the Highway, and not to touch their Fields or Vineyards, and if they should want Water they would pay for it, Numb. xx. 17. The same did the Generals of the most renowned Probity amongst the Greeks and Romans. The Greeks, in [1] Xenophon, under Clearchus, promise the Persians to march without doing any Damage; and if they would sell them Provisions, they would not by Force take Meat or Drink from any one.

II. Examples of Abstinence, and some Precepts.

2. Dercyllides, in the same Xenophon, [2] led his Army through neutral Countries, without any Injury to the Confederates. Livy [3] tells us of King Perseus, He returned into his own Kingdom, through Pthiotis, Achaia, and Thessaly, without any Damage to the Country. And Plutarch, of the Army under Agis the Spartan, They were a Sight to all the Cities of Greece, [4] marching through Peloponnesus inoffensively, civilly, and almost without any Noise. Thus Velleius says of Sylla, [5] You would think he came into Italy, not as a revengeful General, but as a Peace-maker, he marched his Army so quietly through Calabria and Apulia, with such particular Care of the Fruits, the Fields, the Cities, and the Men, as far as Campania. [6] And Tully, of Pompey the Great, Whose Legions so marched into Asia, as not only the Hands of so great an Army, but not even so much as their Feet, could be said to have done the least Damage to any one that was peaceable. And Frontinus, [7] of Domitian, When he built Forts on the Frontiers of Ubii, he ordered the Fruits of those Places which he was to intrench, to be appraised and paid for; and the Fame of that particular Act of Justice, gained him the Credit of all Men. And Lampridius, of Severus's Parthian Expedition, [8] He managed it with so much Discipline, and so great a Reverence to his own Person, that his Men seemed rather Senators than Soldiers: The Tribunes so ready, the Captains so modest, the Soldiers so friendly, that wheresoever they came, the Country People, for so many and extraordinary Benefits, honoured him as a God. The Panegyrist speaks [9] of the Goths, Huns, and Alani, [681] that served under Theodosius, No Noise, no Confusion, no Plundering was there, as from Barbarians; but if their Provisions happened to fall short, they bore it patiently, and proportioned every one's Allowance to their Numbers. And Claudian attributes the same to Stilico.

[10] *Tanta quies, tantisque metus servator honesti
Te moderante fuit, nullis ut vinea furtis
Aut seges ereptâ fraudaret messe colonum.*

*You ruling us, so great was our Security
That all enjoy'd their own; the Vine her Tribute
Paid to the just Owner; the Husbandman
Received the fruitful Produce of his Fields.*

And [11] Suidas to Belisarius.

3. This was brought about by those famous Warriors, by taking great [12] Care to provide for the Subsistence of their Army, by paying their Troops well, and by observing a strict Discipline, whose chief Law [13] Ammianus says is, That the Countries of those at Peace with us should not be wasted. And in Vopiscus, [14] Let no one dare to take away a Chicken of another Man's, let none touch a Sheep, let none pluck a Grape, let none tread down the Corn, and let none demand Oil, Salt, or Wood. And so in Cassiodore, [15] Let them live with the Provincials according to the Civil [682] Law, neither let them grow Insolent, because they are armed; for the Shields of our Army ought to protect those who wear none. To which we may add that in the sixth Book of Xenophon's Expedition, [16] We must not pretend to compel a State at Peace with us to give any Thing against their Will.

4. From which Passages we may best understand that Advice of the great Prophet, even of him that was more than a Prophet, Luke iii. 14. Offer Violence to no Man, [17] accuse no Man falsely, and [18] be content with your Wages. To which agrees that of Aurelian in Vopiscus in the aforequoted Place, [19] Let him be content with his Allowance, let him live rather on the Spoil of the Enemy, than the Tears of the Provincials. Neither may any one think that this is only finely spoken, but not to be practised. For neither would so holy a Man (as St. John) advise, or wise Law-Makers command what they believed not possible to be done. Lastly, [20] What has been done we must necessarily own possible to be done. Therefore we have brought several Examples. To which we may add, that remarkable one [21] which Frontinus mentions out of Scaurus, that an Apple Tree full of Fruit standing within the Compass of the Ground where the Camp was pitched, was the next Day, after the Army was gone, found with its Fruit untouched.

5. Livy [22] ] relating how insolently the Roman Soldiers behaved in their Camp at Sucro, and that some of them in the Night-time pillaged the Neighbouring Country that was at Peace, adds this as the Reason, that all Things were done loosely and disorderly, without any regard to military Discipline. There is also another remarkable Place in the same Author, describing Philip's March through the Country of the Dentelatae; They [23] were indeed Allies (says he) but the Macedonians being in great Necessity plundered them, as if it had been the Enemy's Country; for robbing every where, they first laid waste great Houses, then some Towns, to the great Dishonour of the King, who heard his Confederates in vain calling upon the Gods and him for Assistance. Tacitus [24] says Pelignus very much blasted his Reputation, for that he preyed more upon the Allies, than Enemies. And the same Author observes, [25] that the Soldiers of Vitellius were scandalously slothful throughout all Italy, and only [683] dreadful to those that entertained them. And in Cicero's Oration against Verres, one of the Heads of the Accusation was this, [26] You have taken Care to have the peaceable Cities of our Allies and Friends plundered and wasted.

6. And here I cannot omit the Opinion of some Divines, which I hold to be very right, that the King who does not give his Soldiers their just Pay, stands not only engaged to the Soldiers, but to his Subjects and Neighbours for the [27] Damages consequent thereupon, which the Soldiers, compelled by pure Want and Necessity, have done them.

III. 1. On the other Side, it is the Duty [1] of those that are not engaged in the War, to sit still and do nothing, that may strengthen him that prosecutes an ill Cause, or to hinder the Motions of him that hath Justice on his Side, as we have said [a] before. But in a dubious Cause [b] to behave themselves alike to both Parties; as in suffering them to pass through their Country, in supplying them with Provisions, and not relieving the Besieged. The Corcyreans in Thucydides [2] tell the Athenians, if they would really be Neuters, they should either forbid the Corinthians to raise Men in the Country of Attica, or suffer them to do so too. The Romans [3] objected against Philip King of the Macedonians, that he had doubly broke the Alliance, first that he had injured the Confederates of the Romans, and then that he had assisted their Enemies with Men and Money. T. Quinctius urges the same in a Conference [4] with Nabis. You say, I have not directly violated my League of Friendship with you. How often would you have me convince you that you have? But to sum up all in a few Words, by what Means may Friendship be broken? Certainly by these two chiefly, if you treat our Allies as Enemies, or if you join our Enemies.

III. What is the Duty of Neuters to those that are engaged in War.

2. Agathias tells us, he is an Enemy who does what pleases an Enemy; and Procopius [5] looks upon him to be in the Enemy's Army, who supplies them with Things that are properly useful in War. Thus said Demosthenes of old, [6] He that invents, or prepares these Things, by which I may be taken, is mine Enemy, tho' he neither strikes me, nor throws a Dart at me. M. Acilius [7] told the Epirots, who indeed had not assisted Antiochus with Soldiers, but were accused of having furnished him with Money, he could not tell whether he should account them Enemies or Neuters. And L. Aemilius [8] the Praetor complains of the Teii, that they had victualled the Enemy's Fleet, and promised them Wine, declaring, that unless they did the like to the Roman Fleet, he should hold them as Enemies. Plutarch mentions a Saying of Augustus Caesar, [9] That City has forfeited her Pretensions to Peace, that entertains the Enemy.

3. It would also be very advantageous to make an Alliance with both Parties, so as with their full Consent we might sit still in Quiet, and might be permitted to do common Offices of Humanity promiscuously to them both. Livy says, [10] It becomes those that are Friends to both Parties, to desire Peace, and not to engage on either Side. Archidamus King of Sparta, observing the Aeleans inclining to side with the Arcadians, writ a Letter to them, with only this in it: It is good to be quiet.

---

CHAPTER XVIII↩

Concerning Things privately done in a publick War.

I. 1. What we have said hitherto, does most belong either to those who command with an absolute Authority in War, or those who act by Vertue of the Orders they have received from the Sovereign. We are now to see, what may be privately done in War, whether we respect the Law of Nature, of Nations, or the Divine Law. Cicero [1] relates in his first Book of Offices, that the Son of Cato the Censor served in the Army under Popilius the General, and in a short Time that Legion was disbanded; yet the young Man out of a military Inclination still continuing in the Army, Cato writ to Popilius, if he designed to have him still in the Army, to give him a second Oath; adding the Reason, because the former being discharged he could not lawfully fight with the Enemy. He also records the very Words of Cato out of his Letter to his Son, in which he warns him from engaging in Fight, for it is not lawful, for one that is not a Soldier to fight an Enemy. Plutarch much commends [a] Chrysantas a Soldier of Cyrus, who drew back his Sword, that he had lifted up to kill his Enemy, upon his hearing the Trumpet sound a Retreat. And Seneca tells us, [2] He is a bad Soldier, who regards not the Signal of a Retreat.

I. Whether it be lawful to hurt a publick Enemy privately explained by the Law of Nature, of Nations and Civil Law.

2. But they are mistaken, who think this arises only from the external Right of Nations; for if you barely consider that, as it is lawful for any one to seize on his Enemy's Goods, (as we [b] said before) so he may also kill his Enemy, for by that Right [3] Enemies are accounted as if they were not real Persons. What Cato therefore adviseth, proceeds from the Roman military Discipline, which had a Law [4] (as Modestinus observes) that he who disobeyed, should be put to Death, tho' he had had good Success; but he was understood not to have obeyed, who without the General's Command, fought the Enemy, as appears from the Example of Manlius. For if such a Thing were commonly permitted, the Soldier would abandon his Post of his own Head, or even Licentiousness might in Time proceed to such a Length, that the Whole Army or Part of it would rashly engage [5] in dangerous Fights; which was by all Means to be avoided. Therefore Salust describing the Roman Discipline, says, [6] They were oftener punished in War, who contrary to Orders had fought the Enemy, or kept the Field after sounding a Retreat. A certain Spartan, when just ready to kill his Enemy, stopt his Blow upon hearing the Retreat [685] sounded, and gave this Reason, [7] It is better to obey our Commanders, than to kill an Enemy. And Plutarch [8] gives this Reason, why a Man dismissed from the Service, cannot kill an Enemy, because he is not obliged by the military Laws, which they that are to fight must observe. And Epictetus in Arrian [9] relating the Action of Chrysantas, just mentioned, says, He thought it much better to obey the Orders of his General, than his own Will.

3. But if we respect the Law of Nature and true Justice, [10] it seems lawful in a just War for any Man to do those Things, which may be beneficial to the innocent Party, provided it be within the just Measure of making War: Every one however has not a Right to appropriate to himself what he takes from the other Party, whose Cause we suppose bad; because nothing is due to him: Unless perhaps he may exact a just Punishment by the common Right of Men. Which last how it is restrained by the evangelical Law, may easily be understood from what we have [c] said before.

4. An Order then may be either general or special; general, as when the Consul cried out in the Tumult among the Romans, [11] Let them that wish well to the Commonwealth, follow me. Nay, this Right [12] of killing is sometimes granted to every Subject, even beyond his own Defence, when the publick Safety requires it.

II. 1. They may have a special Order, not only who receive Pay, but also they who serve in War at their own Expences, and what is more, they who maintain Part of the War at their own Charges; as they who fit out Ships, and maintain them at their own private Cost; who to reimburse themselves (instead of Pay) are allowed to keep and appropriate to themselves what they take, as we have [a] said elsewhere; but how far this may be reconcilable to true Justice, and Charity, may very well admit of a Dispute.

II. What may they do, that make War at their own private Charge, or fit out Ships, by internal Justice, in respect of the Enemy.

2. Justice either respects the Enemy, or the State, with which we contract. We have already [b] said, that in a just War the Possession of all Things that can contribute to the Maintenance of the War, may for our own Security be taken away from an Enemy, but even this with a Condition of Restitution; but the Property of those Things can be only so far acquired, as amounts to the Value of what is due to the State, either at the beginning of the War, or in the Prosecution of it, whether the Things belong to the State at Enmity with us, or particular Persons, that may be of themselves innocent; but the Goods of the Guilty, by way of Punishment, may be taken away, and become the Property of the Captor's. Therefore the Goods of their Enemies shall be theirs, who maintain Part of the War at their own Charge; what respects the Enemy, so far, as that the reasonable Satisfaction on which I have mentioned, be allowed, to be adjudged by equal Arbitrators.

III. And as to the State, the very same will be just, according to internal Justice, if there be an Equality in the Contract, that is, if our Charges and Hazard be equal to the uncertain Hope of the Booty. But if this Hope [1] does far exceed, the Overplus is to be restored to the State; just as if one should buy at a very low Price the cast of a Net, the Success of which, tho' uncertain, promises much, according to all Appearance.

III. What in respect of their own State.

[686]

IV. But it is not enough that we do nothing against the Rules of rigorous Justice, properly so called; we must also take Care that we offend not against Charity, especially Christian Charity. Now this may happen sometimes; when, for Instance, it appears, that such a plundering doth not so much hurt the State, or the King, or those who are culpable themselves, but rather the Innocent, whom it may render so extremely miserable, that if we should use the like Extremity to our own private Debtors, it would be judged barbarously cruel. But farther, if the taking of this Booty neither contributes to the finishing of the War, nor considerably weakens the Enemy, [1] the Gain arising to himself only from the Unhappiness of the Times, would be highly unbecoming an honest Man, much more a Christian.

IV. What the Law of Christian Charity requires of us.

V. But it happens sometimes, that from the Occasion of a publick War, there arises a private one; as if a Man should by Chance fall among his Enemies, and be thereby in Danger of losing his Life or his Goods, in which Case he ought to follow the Rules we have given [a] elsewhere concerning the just Defence of ones self. Private Persons are likewise often authorised by the State to act for their own particular Interest; as when having suffered much by the Enemy they obtain Permission to refund themselves out of their Effects. And here we are to regulate ourselves by what has been said above [b] of the Right of Reprisals.

V. How a private War may be mixt with a publick.

VI. Yet if a Soldier, or any other Person, even in a just War, shall burn the Enemy's Houses, lay waste their Fields, and commit such other Acts of Hostility, without any Command, and besides when there is no Necessity, or just Cause, in the Opinion of the Divines he stands obliged to make Satisfaction for those Damages. I have with Reason added, what they have omitted, if there be not a just Cause; for if there be, he may perhaps be answerable for it to his own State, whose Orders he hath transgressed, but not to his Enemy, to whom he hath done no Wrong. Not unlike to this was the Answer [1] which a certain Carthaginian made to the Romans, when they demanded Hannibal to be delivered up to them. The Question is not whether Saguntum was besieged by private, or publick Authority, but whether the Fact were just or unjust? For it is our Business to call our own Subject to an Account, whether he did it of his own Head or by our Order? The only Point to be decided between you and us, is whether the Thing could be done without Prejudice to our Treaties.

VI. What he stands obliged to, who without Command hurts an Enemy, explained with a Distinction.

---

CHAPTER XIX ↩

Concerning Faith between Enemies.

I. 1. We have already [a] said, what, and how much may be lawfully done in War, is either considered simply in itself, or with regard to a foregoing Promise. The first Part being concluded, the other remains to be discussed, which is, concerning Faith (to be kept) between Enemies. It is a remarkable Saying of Silius Italicus, who had been a Roman Consul,

I. Faith is to be kept with all Sorts of Enemies.

[1] — — — *Optimus ille
Militiae, cui postremum primumque tueri
Inter bella fidem — — —*

The most excellent Warrior is he who has nothing so much at Heart, as the punctual Observance of his Word to an Enemy.

[687]

Xenophon [2] in his Oration concerning Agesilaus, says, So great and noble a Thing it is for every Man, but especially for Generals to be strict Observers of their Faith, and to be so accounted. And Aristides [3] in his fourth Leuctrica. It is in Treaties of Peace and other publick Conventions, that we chiefly know whether those that make them love Justice. For as Cicero [4] well observed in his fifth Book of Bounds, There is no Body, but approves and commends that Disposition of Mind, by which not only no Interest is sought, but on the contrary Faith is kept against Interest.

2. It is the publick Faith, as it is in Quintilian the Father, [5] that procures a Truce between armed Enemies, and preserves the Rights of yielded Cities. And the same Author in another Place: [6] Faith is the surest Bond of human Things, the Reputation of Faith is sacred among Enemies. And so St. Ambrose: [7] It is plain that Faith and Justice must be strictly observed in War. And in St. Augustine, [8] When our Faith is engaged, it must be kept even to our Enemy, tho' at that Time at War with him. For their being Enemies, does not make them cease to be Men. And all Men arrived at the Years of Discretion are capable of a Right from a Promise. Camillus declares in Livy, [9] That he had such a Society with the Falisci, as was established by Nature.

3. From this Society founded on Reason and Speech, arises that Obligation from a Promise, which we now treat of. And we are not to imagine that, because it is permitted to tell a Falshood to an Enemy, or because, according to the Opinion of several, there is no Harm in it, as we have observed [b] elsewhere; we may extend such a Permission to the very Words we use in treating with the Enemy. For the Obligation to speak Truth arises from a Cause, prior to War, and perhaps may be in some Measure annihilated by War, but a Promise of itself confers new Right. Aristotle [10] perceived this Difference, when treating of Veracity, he said, I do not speak of him, who says the Truth in the Conventions he makes, nor what relates to Justice or Injustice; for these Things belong to another Virtue.

4. Pausanias [11] said of Philip of Macedon, No Body can justly call him a good General, who has always despised his most solemn Oaths, and has upon the slightest Pretence broke his Faith, the most of any Man. And the like says Valerius Maximus of Hannibal. [12] A profest Enemy to the Romans, and all Italy, and a greater to Faith itself, glorying in Lies and Falshood, as if laudable Virtues; whence it came to pass, that whereas he might otherwise have left an illustrious Memory of himself, he now left it disputable, whether he ought to be considered as a great Man, or a notorious Villain. In Homer, the Trojans pricked in Conscience condemn themselves.

[13] Νῆνδ' ὄρκια πιστὰ ψευσάμενοι μαχόμεσθα τῷ οὐ νό τι κάλλιον ἐστι.

[688]

Unjust Arms we bear, Perjur'd as we are.

II. 1. We have already said, that we may not allow of that of Cicero, [1] There is no Society with Tyrants, but rather the greatest Division: And again, A Pirate is not of the Number of those with whom we make War in form; there ought to be no Faith nor Oath kept with him. Nor that of Seneca [2] concerning a Tyrant, Whatever Engagements I had with him, they are all void, because he has violated the Laws of human Society. From which Fountain arose that Error of Michael of Ephesus, who says on the fifth of the Nicomachia, [3] It is no Adultery to debauch the Wife of a Tyrant. Which very Thing [a] some of the Jewish Doctors erroneously maintained concerning Strangers, whose Marriages they esteemed void.

II. The Opinion refuted, that Faith is not to be kept with Pirates and Tyrants.

2. [4] Yet Cn. Pompey finished most of the piratick War by Treaties, agreeing to save the Men's Lives, and allow them a Place where they might live without robbing. And sometimes Tyrants have restored Liberty on Condition of Impunity. Caesar in his third of the Civil War writes, that the Roman Generals compounded with the Robbers, and Fugitives, that were in the Pyrenean Mountains. Now who can say that such a Composition is not obligatory? [5] Indeed such Sort of People have not with others that particular Community, which the Law of Nations hath introduced between Enemies engaged in a solemn and compleate War. But yet, as Men, they are to enjoy the common Benefits of the Law of Nature, as Porphyry [6] rightly argues in his third Book of not eating living Creatures; now it is one of the most inviolable Laws of Nature, that we should perform what we promise. So Diodorus [b] relates, that Lucullus kept his Faith to Apollonius Captain of the Fugitives. Thus Dio writes, that Augustus paid to Crocota the Robber, who surrendered himself, the Price he had set upon his Head, because he would not break his Word.

III. 1. But let us see if we cannot produce something more plausible than what Cicero has said; and first, they who are notoriously wicked, and Members of no civil Society, may be punished by any Man, according to the Law of Nature, as we have [a] declared above. But they who may be punished, even with Death, both their Goods, and their Rights may be taken from them. As the same Cicero well observes, [1] It is not against Nature to strip him, if we can, whom it is lawful to kill. But among his other Rights, is also a Right derived from Promise, and therefore this too may be taken away from him by way of Punishment. To this I answer, that the Reason would be good, if we had not treated with him as an Offender; but if we treat with him as such, it is to be understood, as if we in that Respect, remitted the Punishment, because, (as we have said [b] elsewhere) we are to explain the Sense of a Convention, so as that it may be reduced to nothing.

III. This Objection answered, that such deserve Punishment, and it is shown that this is not considered, when we treat with them as such.

2. Nabis replied well in Livy, when Quintius Flaminius objected Tyranny to him. [2] Whatever Name is given, and whatsoever I am, just the same I was, when [689] you yourself (O T. Quintius) made a Treaty with me. And again, I had done these Things already, whatsoever they are, when you contracted an Alliance with me; to which he adds, If I had changed, I ought to give an account of my Inconstancy; but since you have changed, you ought to give an account of yours. Like to this there is a Place in the Oration of Pericles, recorded by Thucydides, We shall let those Cities remain free, which were so when we made an Alliance with them.

IV. That may likewise be objected, which I said [a] before, that he who through Fear has forced a Promise from one, ought in Equity to release the Promiser, because he damnified him by Injustice, that is, by an Act both repugnant to the Nature of human Liberty, and to the Nature of the Act extorted, which should have been free. Tho' this (I confess) in some Cases holds true, yet it does not respect all Promises made to Robbers; for that the Promised be obliged to disengage the Promiser, it is required, that he have extorted the Promise by an unjust Fear. If any one then, to deliver his Friend out of the Hands of Robbers who have taken him, shall promise to pay a certain Sum of Money, he is bound to do it, [1] because he cannot pretend to have been influenced by Fear, who came voluntarily to make this Contract.

IV. No Objection, that the Promise was extorted by Fear, if the Promiser was not himself affrighted.

V. Add to this, that he that is compelled by an unjust Fear to make a Promise, may be obliged to perform it, if he has confirmed it by an Oath, for thereby (as I have said [a] before) the Man stands bound not only to a Man, [1] but unto GOD, in regard to whom Fear can be no Exception. Yet it is true, that the Heir of the Promiser does not stand engaged by such a Bond alone; [2] for those Things only pass to the Heir, which by the original Establishment of the Right of Property, enter into the Commerce of Life: But the Right acquired unto GOD by an Oath, cannot as such be included in these. Again, as we have likewise observed elsewhere, if a Man does happen to break his Faith to a Robber, whether sworn, or not sworn, he shall not upon that Account be liable to Punishment among other Nations; because in Detestation to Thieves and Robbers, all Nations by a general Consent are pleased to connive at any Thing (even tho' ill) done against them.

V. Or if there passed an Oath, tho' with Men, such a Violation is not punishable.

VI. What shall we say of the Wars [1] that Subjects make against their Kings, or such as have the supreme Authority? Tho' they may possibly have a Cause not in itself unjust, [2] yet that they cannot have a Right to act by Force against their Prince, I have shewed [a] elsewhere. But sometimes their Cause may be so very unjust, or their Resistance so criminal, that it may deserve a rigorous Punishment. Yet, if they be treated with as Deserters, or Rebels, [3] and a Promise made to them; a Punishment, tho' justly due, is not to be pleaded to prevent the Performance of that Promise, according to what we have now said. Faith is to be kept even with Slaves; and the Morality of Pagan Antiquity was so pure, as to own the Truth of that Maxim: It being generally believed, that the Lacedemonians suffered a Divine Vengeance [4] for putting to Death some Taenarian Slaves, contrary to their Covenants. And Diodorus Siculus observes, serves, that the Faith given to Slaves in the Temple [5] of the Palician Gods, was never broken by any of their Masters: Neither will any Exception of Fear be allowed in this Case, if the Faith given be confirmed by an Oath. [690] As M. Pomponius, [6] the Tribune of the People, being bound by an Oath, tho' compelled by Fear, punctually performed what he had promised to L. Manlius.

VI. The same applied to the Wars of a Sovereign against his Subjects.

VII. But a greater Difficulty than any yet mentioned may arise from the Legislative Power, and from that super-eminent Right over the Goods of the Subjects, with which the State is invested, and which the Sovereign exercises in its Name. For that Right, if it reach to all the Goods of the Subjects, why not then to that Right also derived from a Promise made in War? Which if granted, all such Covenants seem to be void, and so all Hopes of concluding a War, but by a compleat Victory, would be lost. But on the contrary we must observe, that this super-eminent Right is not to be promiscuously used, but only so far as the publick Good requires it in a civil Government, which, tho' monarchical and absolute, is not despotical. Now, this general Interest commonly requires, that such Agreements should be performed: Agreeable hereunto is what we have already [a] said of the Obligation of maintaining the present State of the Government. Add hereunto, where Necessity requires this eminent Right to be used, Satisfaction is to be made, as hereafter [b] shall be more fully explained.

VII. A special Difficulty concerning Promises made to Subjects in respect of the Sovereign Power handled.

VIII. 1. Moreover Agreements may be confirmed by Oath, [1] not only by King, or Senate, but by the whole Body politick; as Lycurgus bound the Lacedemonians, and Solon the Athenians by Oath to observe their Laws: And lest by the Change of the Persons the Oath should lose its Force, [2] to renew the same Oath every Year. In that Case, there would be no receding from the Engagement, not even for the publick Advantage. For a State has Power to part with its own Right, and the Terms of the Treaty may be so plain, as to admit of no Exception. Valerius Maximus thus speaks to the City of Athens, [3] Read the Law which you have sworn to observe. The Romans [a] called such Laws sacred, which they were obliged to keep by Oath, as Cicero [4] says in his Oration for Balbus.

VIII. And it is shewn that such Promises may be confirmed by the Oath of the State.

[691]

2. There is in the third Book of Livy [5] a Passage agreeable to this, tho' of itself pretty obscure; where from the Opinion of several antient Lawyers, he declares, that the Tribunes of the People were sacred: But so were not the Aediles, Judges, nor Decemviri, and yet to hurt any of these was contrary to the Laws. The Reason of the Difference is, because the Aediles and the rest had no other Protection than that of the Law, that is, an Ordinance of the People, which could not be lawfully contravened, whilst it subsisted, but might be revoked by another posterior to it. Whereas the Inviolableness of the Tribunes was founded on the publick Religion, having been established by an Oath, which could not be revoked even by those who had sworn. Dionysius Halicarnassensis thus records it in his sixth Book: [6] Brutus, calling an Assembly, proposed to the People, that the Tribunes might be rendred sacred and inviolable, not only by the Law, but also by a publick Oath, to which they all agreed. Hence this Law was called Sacred. And therefore [7] that Fact of Tiberius Gracchus, in deposing Octavius from the Tribuneship, pretending that the Tribune's Power derived its Inviolableness from the People, but that this Privilege could not take Place in regard to the People themselves, was condemned by all good Men. Therefore (as I have said) both a State and a King may be bound by an Oath made to their own Subjects.

IX. But farther, a Promise [1] made to a third Person, who has done nothing to extort it, shall be of full Force. But we shall not examine, wherein and how far that third Person may stand interested in it, being one of the Niceties [2] of the Roman Law. For by Nature it is the Interest of all Men to consult the Advantage of others. Thus we read, [3] That Philip having made Peace with the Romans, was denied the Power of treating the Macedonians ill, that in the War had revolted from him.

IX. Or if a Promise be made to a third Person.

X. Moreover, as we have [a] already proved that mixt Governments sometimes exist, as a State may pass from one pure Form into another, so it may also by Covenant, or Agreement, pass into a mixt. So that they who before were Subjects, may become Sovereigns, or at least acquire a Part of the Sovereignty with the Right of defending it by force of Arms.

X. How the publick State may be changed.

XI. 1. But a solemn War, that is, publick, and denounced on both Sides, among other particular Effects of external Right, has also this, that whatever Promises are made in that War, or for bringing it to a Conclusion, are so valid, that tho' they were occasioned by [1] a Fear unjustly caused, yet they cannot be made void without the Consent of him to whom the Promise was made. Because as many other [692] Things, tho' in themselves not wholly innocent, are yet by the Law of Nations reputed just, so is Fear, [a] which in such a War is occasioned on either Side; for if it were not allowed, such Wars, that are but too frequent, could be neither moderated, nor concluded, which yet are very necessary to be done for the good of Mankind. And this we may reasonably suppose to be that Right of War, which [2] Cicero says, must be kept with the Enemy; who also tells us in another Place, [3] that an Enemy retained some Rights in War, that is, not only natural ones, but also some derived from the Consent of Nations.

XI. That Fear in a solemn War by the Law of Nations is no just Exception.

2. Neither does it from hence follow, that he who has extorted such a Thing in an unjust War, may with a safe Conscience, keep what he has got, or compel the other Party to stand to his Covenants, whether sworn or not sworn. For internally, and in the very Nature of the Thing, it still continues unjust: Neither can this internal Injustice of the Act be taken away, but by a new and entirely free Consent of the Promiser.

XII. Further, whereas I have said that Fear is accounted just, which is caused in a solemn War, [1] it is to be understood of such a Fear as the Law of Nations allows of. For Instance, if any Thing be extorted thro' the fear of Ravishment, or any other Terror, contrary to our Faith given, this ought to be adjudged by the Law of Nature, because the Law of Nations does not extend so far as to authorise any such Fear.

XII. What is to be understood by such a Fear as is allowed by the Law of Nations.

XIII. 1. That Faith is to be kept even with those that are perfidious, I have already said, [a] in treating of the Obligation of Promises in general; and it is likewise the Doctrine of [1] St. Ambrose: Which doubtless extends to Enemies that are treacherous; such as the Carthaginians, with whom nevertheless the Romans inviolably kept their Faith. Valerius Maximus says on this Subject, [2] The Senate regarded themselves, not those to whom they performed their Engagements. And likewise Salust, [3] In all the Punic Wars, tho' the Carthaginians in Time of Peace, and of Truce, were often guilty of most villanous Practices, yet they (the Romans) never returned the like to them, when they had an Opportunity.

XIII. That Faith is to be kept even with the Perfidious.

2. Appian speaking of Servilius Galba, who put the Lusitanians to the Sword for breaking their Alliance, after having deceived them in his Turn by a new Treaty, observes, [4] He avenged one Treachery by another, and to the Scandal of the Romans, imitated the Barbarians. The same Galba was afterwards accused for it by Libo, a [693] Tribune of the People; which Valerius Maximus [5] relating, thus censures it: Compassion, not Equity, pleaded in that Cause; for the Absolution, which his own Innocency could not demand, was granted him in respect of his Children. And Cato [6] writes in his Originals, he would certainly have suffered, if his Children and Tears had not interceded for him.

XIV. But we must also observe, that there are two Ways, where by to avoid the Crime of Perfidiousness, and yet not perform the Promise; namely, in Default of the Condition, or by Compensation. The Promiser is not properly discharged for Want of the Condition; but the Event shews, that there had been no real Obligation, since he did not intend to engage himself but upon Condition. To which we may refer this, [1] if the other do not perform what he was bound on his Part to do first. For all the Articles of one and the same Agreement seem to be included one in the other, in the Manner of a Condition, as if it had been thus expressed, I will do these Things thus; provided the other also do what he has promised. Therefore Tullus, [2] in his Answer to the Albans, calls the Gods to witness, whether of the two Nations had scornfully sent back the Embassadors reclaiming their own, that all the Miseries of War might light upon them. Ulpian observes, [3] He shall not be held a Confederate, who has renounced his League, because some Condition, on which it was made, is not performed. For which Reason, when it is otherwise designed, this express Clause is usually added, if any Thing be done contrary to this or that Article, yet shall the rest be in full Force.

XIV. Not if the Condition ceases, which happens when the other Party refuses to stand to his Part of the Agreement.

XV. We have elsewhere [a] declared the Original of Compensation, that is, [1] when we cannot otherwise recover what is our own, or what is justly due to us, we may take from him, who either keeps what is ours, or is indebted to us, the full Value thereof in any Thing else; whence it follows, that we may much more keep what is actually in our Possession, whether corporeal or incorporeal. Whatever therefore we have promised, we need not perform, if it be of no greater Value than that of ours, which the other Part injuriously detains from us. [2] Seneca says in his sixth Book of Benefits, Thus the Creditor is often cast by the Debtor, when he has upon some other Account taken more than the Value of his Debt. Nor does the Judge only sit between the Creditor and the Debtor, who may say to the Plaintiff, You lent your Money. What then? You now possess Land, which you never purchased, wherefore upon a just Valuation, depart you hence a Debtor, who came a Creditor.

XV. Neither when there is a just Compensation opposed.

XVI. It will be the same Case, if he with whom I deal owes me as much, or more, upon any other Contract, and I cannot otherwise recover it. Indeed in Courts of Justice, Seneca [1] says, certain respective Actions of the Parties are not granted at the same Time; but this is a pure Effect of the Disposition of the civil Laws, to which we are bound to conform. Each Law has its Rights apart, which it has been thought proper not to mingle with those of other Laws; as the same [2] Author observes. But the Law of Nations allows no such Distinctions, provided there be no other Hopes of recovering our own.

XVI. Tho' by another Contract.

XVII. The same may be said, where he that exacts a Promise, owes nothing in Consequence of an Agreement, but hath damnified the Promiser. [1] As the same Seneca testifies, The Farmer is not bound to his Landlord, tho' his Lease be not cancelled, in Case he wilfully tramples down his Corn, or cuts down his Trees; not because he has received what he agreed for, but because he has prevented his Tenant's receiving whereby he might pay him. Then he gives other Instances. [2] You have driven away his Cattle, you have killed his Slave. [3] And again, It is lawful for me to compare the good that a Man has done me, with the Hurt he does me, and then declare, whether I am more indebted to him, or he to me.

XVII. Or some Damage done.

XVIII. Lastly, whatsoever is also due by way of Punishment, may be balanced against the Thing promised. Which in the same Place of Seneca is at large explained. [1] Thanks is due for a Kindness, and Revenge for an Injury. I neither owe him Thanks nor he Punishment to me, we are fully discharged one of another. And again, [2] By comparing the Benefits and Wrongs which I have received, I shall find whether there does not remain something due to me.

XVIII. Or for some Punishment due.

XIX. 1. But as amongst contending Parties at Law, if they have made any Agreement whilst the Suit is depending, none of them can compensate what he has promised, either by the Thing contended for, or the Costs and Damages of the Suit: So during the Continuance of the War, neither can that which first occasioned the War, nor the Damages allowed by the Law of Nations in War, be compensated. For the very Nature of the Engagement, which without that would be reduced to nothing, sheweth, that all the Disputes of War were set aside: Otherwise there could be no Agreement made so firm that might not be evaded. Whereto I may properly apply that Saying, [1] of the same Seneca, whom I have cited so often, Our Ancestors would allow of no Excuses, that Men might be assured that Faith was strictly to be kept. For it were better not to admit of an Excuse, tho' just, from a few, than encourage every one to make them.

XIX. How these take Place in War.

2. But what is it then that may be compensated by the Thing promised? That which is due to us by any other Convention made during the War; or on account of the Damage done us by Acts of Hostility in the Time of Truce; or in Consequence of an Outrage committed on our Embassadors, or any other Action condemned by the Law of Nations.

3. But we must observe, that this Compensation be made between the same Persons, and that the Right of no third Person be injured; yet so that the Subjects Goods must stand engaged for the Debts of their own State by the Law of Nations, as I have said [a] elsewhere.

4. To which we may add, it is the Part of a generous Soul to keep firm to his Treaties, even after Injuries received; on which Account that wise Indian, Jarchas, [2] highly commended the King, who being injured by a confederated Neighbour, Would not break his Faith given, saying, That he had sworn so solemnly, that he durst not hurt the other, no not after great Provocation.

5. Now what Questions use to arise concerning Faith given to Enemies, may almost all of them be resolved, by the Rules we have established [b] above in treating of the Effect of Promises in general, and of the Oath that accompanies them in particular, of Alliances and publick Treaties, as also of the Right and Obligation of Kings, and the Interpretation of obscure or ambiguous Clauses. Yet that the Use of the Principles we have laid down may be better perceived, and to clear any Doubt that may arise hereafter, I shall not think much to point out some of those special Cases which are most remarkable, and most frequently occur.

---

CHAPTER XX↩

Concerning the publick Faith whereby War is finished; of Treaties of Peace, Lots, set Combats, Arbitrations, Surrenders, Hostages, and Pledges.

I. All Agreements between Enemies depend upon Faith, either expressed or implied. Faith expressed, is either publick or private. Publick is either of the supreme or subordinate Powers. That of the supreme Powers, either puts an end to the War or is of Force during its Continuance. Among those Things that conclude a War, some are looked on as Principals, some as Accessories. The Principals are those very Things that finish the War, either by themselves as a Treaty of Peace, or by Consent that it be referred to another Thing, as the Decision of Lot, the Success of a Battle, the Judgment of an Arbitrator; whereof the first is purely casual, but in the two others the Chance is moderated by the Strength of the Mind or of the Body of the Combatants, and by the Power given to the Judge.

I. The Division of Faith between Enemies, in order to what follows.

II. They who have Power to begin a War, have likewise Power to enter upon a Treaty to finish it; for every Man is the best Manager of his own Affairs; [a] whence it follows, that in a War on both Sides publick, it is wholly in their Power who enjoy the supreme Authority, which in a Government truly monarchical [1] belongs to the King, unless there be any Thing that hinders him from exercising his Right.

II. The Power of making Peace is in the King, if the Government be Regal.

III. [a] For if a Prince be not out of his Minority, (which in some Kingdoms is determined by Law, in others by probable Conjectures) or be not in his true Senses, he is not capable of making Peace. The same is to be said [1] of a King that is a Prisoner, if his Kingdom had its first Rise [2] from the Consent of the People; for it is not to be supposed, that the People would confer the Sovereignty upon one, with a Power even to exercise it at a Time when he is not Master of his own Person. Therefore in such a Case not the full Sovereignty, but the Exercise of it, and as it were the Guardianship is in the People, or him whom they shall delegate. But of those Things which are privately his own, whatsoever a King, tho' a Prisoner, shall Contract, will be valid, according to the Principles which we shall [b] establish concerning private Agreements. But what if a Prince be an Exile, [3] is it in his Power to make Peace? Yes [4] certainly, if it appear that he has no Dependence upon any Person. Otherwise his Condition would be little different from that of a Prisoner, for there are Prisoners at large. Regulus refused to declare his Opinion in the Senate, [5] alledging, that as long as he was bound by an Oath to his Enemies, he could not rightly be a Senator.

III. What if the King be an Infánt, Mad, a Prisoner, an Exile?

IV. In an Aristocracy, or Democracy, the Power of making Peace shall be in the major Part: In the one of the Sovereign Council, in the other of the People [696] who have a Right to vote according to the Custom of the Country, as we have [a] said in another Place. Therefore Things thus agreed upon, shall be obligatory even upon those who dissented from them. As in Livy, [1] When it shall be once decreed, it must then be maintained as a good and profitable Alliance by all, even those who before were against it. Also Dionysius Halicarnassensis, [2] It must be obeyed as just, whatsoever the Majority has decreed. And Appian, All are obliged to obey a Decree, and no Excuse to be admitted against it. As also Pliny, [3] What has pleased the most, must bind the rest. But they may, if they please, make use of the Advantages of the Peace concluded against their Opinion.

IV. In an aristocratical or democratical State this Power is in the Majority.

V. 1. Now let us see what Things are subject to such an Agreement. Most Kings in our Days, holding their Kingdoms not as patrimonial, but as usufructuary, have no Power by any Treaty to alienate the Sovereignty in Whole, or in Part: Yea, and before they come to the Government, at what Time the People are their Superiors; [1] such Acts may be a fundamental Law, for the future be rendered absolutely void and null; so that even as to Damages and Interest, they shall be no ways binding. For it is probable, that Nations thought fit to ordain that [2] in that Case, the other Party should have no Action against the King for Damages and Interest, since, if that took Place, the Goods of the Subjects might be seized, as answerable for the King's Debt; and so the Precaution that might have been taken to hinder the Alienation of the Sovereignty, would become entirely useless.

V. How the Sovereignty or any Part thereof, or the Goods of a Kingdom, may be alienated to obtain Peace.

2. But that the entire Sovereignty may be firmly alienated, the Consent of the Whole Body of the People is required; which may be done by their Representatives, whom they call the Orders or States. And that any Part of the Kingdom may be firmly alienated a twofold Consent is required, both of the Whole Body, and especially of that Part which is to be alienated, which cannot be divided from the Body to which it was united against its Will. But yet in Case of extreme Necessity, and otherwise unavoidable, that very Part may firmly convey the Government over themselves to another without the Consent of the People, [3] because it is probable that Power was reserved, when civil Societies were instituted.

3. But in patrimonial Kingdoms, nothing hinders, but that a King may alienate his Crown as he thinks fit. But it may happen to be so, that that King may not have Power to alienate any Part of his Dominion, as if he received it as his Propriety [4] upon Condition not to divide it. But as concerning those Things which are called the Goods of the Kingdom, they may become the King's Patrimony two Ways, either separably, or inseparably with the Kingdom; if this latter Way, they may be transferred, but not without the Kingdom; if the other, without it.

4. But those Kings, whose Kingdoms are not patrimonial, can scarcely be thought to have a Power to alienate the Goods of the Kingdom, unless it plainly appear by some fundamental Law or Custom, that has never been opposed, that such a Power was given them.

[697]

VI. We have elsewhere [a] said, how far the People and the Successors may be bound by the Promise of a King; namely, [1] as far as the obligatory Power is comprehended in the Sovereignty; which should neither be drawn out to an Infinity, nor confined within too narrow Bounds; but we ought to consider as valid in that Respect whatever the Sovereign engages himself to do for apparent Reasons. It is a different Thing, if a King be the absolute Lord of his Subjects, and his Rule be rather despotical than civil, [2] as having brought them into Bondage by Conquest; or have obtained the Property of their Goods, without being Master of their Persons, as Pharaoh when he had purchased all the Land of Egypt, or as those who receive [3] Strangers into their private Lands. For in this Case, besides a regal Right, there accrues another Right, which renders an Engagement valid, which a bare regal Power of itself could not do.

VI. How far the People or Successors are obliged by a Peace made by the King.

VII. 1. This also is often disputed, what Right Kings have to dispose of the Goods of private Men to procure a [a] Peace, who have no other Power over the Goods of their Subjects, than as they are Kings. I have already [b] said, that the State has an eminent Right of Property over the Goods of the Subjects, so that the State, or those that represent it, may make Use of them, and even destroy and alienate them, not only upon an extreme Necessity, which allows to private Persons a Sort of a Right over Men's Goods; but for the publick Benefit, which ought to be preferred to any private Man's Interest, according to the Intention, reasonably presumed, of those who first entered into civil Society.

VII. The Goods of Subjects may by a Peace be granted away for the publick Good, but with Condition of repairing Losses.

2. To which we must add, that the State is obliged to repair the Damages, sustained by any Subject on that Account, out of the publick Stock; so that he himself who hath sustained the Loss, contribute, if it be necessary, according to his Quota, to the discharge of that publick Debt. Neither shall the State be released from this Obligation, tho' at present it be not able to satisfy it, but whenever the State shall be in a Capacity, this suspended Obligation shall resume its Force.

VIII. Neither can I here generally admit the Opinion of Ferdinandus Vasquius, that a State is not obliged to repair such Damages caused by War, because the Right of War permits such Damages. For this Right of War, (as we have [a] elsewhere explained it) partly Respects other Nations, and partly those [b] that are at War among themselves; but it does not extend to the Members of the same State, who since they are closely associated, it is equitable, that they should esteem each Man's Loss, sustained on Account of the Association, [1] as common to all; yet this also may be [698] constituted by the civil Law, that no Action may be brought against the State for Damages by War, [2] in order to make every Man more ardent to defend his own.

VIII. What of Things already lost in War.

IX. There are some that place a vast Difference between those Things which are the Subjects by the Law of Nations, [1] and those which are theirs by the civil Law; that they may allow the Prince a larger Right over these, even of taking them away without Cause or Satisfaction; but not so over the other: But falsly. For the Right of Property, whatever be the Title of it, has always its proper Effects by the Law of Nature itself; so that it cannot be taken away, but for such Causes as are naturally [2] inherent in the Property, or such as arise from some Fact of the Proprietor.

IX. No Distinction here between Things got by the Law of Nations, and those by the civil Law.

X. But whether the publick Interest required that the Goods of the Subjects should be granted away by a Treaty, which a King ought not to do but for such a Reason, is a Question to be decided between the King, and the Subjects, as that of repairing Damages regards the State, and particular Persons. For to Strangers that contract with him the bare Fact of the Prince is sufficient, not only from the Presumption which the Dignity of his Person brings with it, but also from Law of Nations, which [a] allows the Goods of Subjects to stand obliged by the Fact of the King.

X. What is done by a King, is taken by Foreigners to be for a publick Good.

XI. 1. But as to the true Understanding of the Articles of Peace, we must here observe, what has been said [a] before. The more favourable any Article is, the more largely it should be taken; and the less favourable it is, the more strictly it should be understood. If we consider the bare Law of Nature, there is nothing more favourable than what tends to this, that every one should enjoy his own. Which the Greeks express thus, ἕλαστον ἔχειν τὸ ἑαυτοῦ. Wherefore where the Meaning of the Articles is ambiguous, it should be taken in this Sense, that he that has the Justice of the War on his Side, should obtain what he took up Arms for, and also recover his Costs and Damages, but not that he should get any Thing farther by way of Punishment, for that is odious.

XI. A general Rule for the interpreting Articles of Peace.

2. But because in treating of a Peace it seldom happens, that either the one or the other of the Enemies owns he had been in the wrong; therefore in Articles of Peace, such an Interpretation should be admitted, as may according to the Justice of the War make the Balance [1] even on both Sides; which is generally done two Ways. For either it is intended, that those Things whereof the Possession has been disturbed by War, should be put on their antient Foot, (which are the Words of Menippus in his Oration, wherein he treats of the several Sorts of Leagues) or as the Greeks, say, [2] ἔχοντες ἢ ἔχουσι, That Things should remain as they are.

XII. 1. Of these two Senses, in a doubtful Case, the latter is more readily presumed, because what it includes is more easy to be done, and it brings no Alteration. Hence Tryphoninus observes, that after the Peace such Captives only are to return by Postliminy, as are expressly mentioned in the Treaty, as we have proved elsewhere [1] by invincible Arguments, in following the Correction of Faber. So Fugitives also are not to be restored, unless stipulated. [2] For by the Law of War we [699] receive Deserters, that is, by the Law of War we are allowed to entertain, and list among our own Troops such as quit their own Party. All Things by such an Agreement continue his, who is possessed of them.

XII. In doubtful Cases, it is believed that Things should remain as they are.

2. But that Word possessed is taken not civilly, but naturally; for in War a Possession in Fact is sufficient, neither is any other required. Lands, I have already [a] said, are then possessed, when they are inclosed by some Fortifications; for such as are only encamped upon for a Time, are not here respected. Demosthenes [3] in his Oration for Ctesiphon, says, that Philip made haste to possess all the Places he could possibly, knowing well that at the concluding of the Peace, he should keep all that he had in his Possession. But incorporeal Things [4] cannot be possessed, but either [b] by the Things to which they adhere, (as the Services of Manors) or by the Persons whose they are. [5] It is not however necessary to be Master of the Person, in order to possess this Sort of Things, when the Question is concerning a Right, which can only be exercised in the Country, which was formerly the Enemies.

XIII. In that other Kind of Agreement, whereby the Possession of Things disturbed by War, is to be restored, we must observe, that the last Possession immediately before the War is here meant; yet so as those private Persons that were then unjustly ejected, [1] may have recourse to Justice, either to obtain a provisional Decree, whereby they may be put again in Possession, or to claim their Estate.

XIII. What if it should be agreed that Things should be restored to the same Condition that they were in before the War begun?

XIV. But if a free People shall [1] voluntarily submit themselves to either Party engaged in War, this Article of Restitution cannot reach them; because it only relates to those Things which were done by Force, Fear, or otherwise by a Treachery not allowable but in regard to an Enemy. Thus though the Peace were concluded among the Greeks, the Thebans yet [2] retained Plataea, pretending That they were possessed of it, not by Force nor Treachery, but by the voluntary Surrender of the Inhabitants. And by the same Right was Nisaea [3] retained by the Athenians. T. Quinctius used the same Distinction against the Aetolians, replying, That was the Law of Cities taken by Force, but the Cities of Thessaly freely [4] submitted themselves unto the Roman Dominion.

XIV. Then they who were before free, and have voluntarily submitted themselves, are not to be restored.

XV. If there be no Clause whereby it is otherwise agreed upon, it is to be supposed in every Peace, that no Action shall be commenced for Damages done in War; which also is to be understood of those done between private Persons, [1] these being also the Effects of War. For in a Doubt, those who treat of Peace, [700] are presumed with Reason to do it on such a Foot, that there be nothing which supposes the one or the other guilty of Injustice.

XV. Damages by War, if in doubt, are supposed to be forgiven.

XVI. Yet those Debts, which were due to private Persons at the beginning of the War, [1] are not to be accounted forgiven, for these are not acquired by the Right of War, but only forbidden to be demanded in Time of War; therefore the Impediment being removed, i.e. the War ended, they retain their full

XVI. But not those before the War due to private Persons.

Force. But tho' it ought not to be easily presumed, that what was a Man's Right before the War is taken from him, for this Cause chiefly (as Cicero [2] well observes) Civil Societies were first constituted, that every one might keep his own, yet this must be understood of that Right, which is derived from the Inequality of Things.

XVII. It is not so concerning the Right to Punishment; for this Right, as far as it concerns Kings, or People, is for this Reason presumed to be remitted; lest the Peace should not be compleat, if it left any old Grudges behind, which might in Time renew the War. Wherefore unknown Injuries are also comprehended in the general Terms, as the Action [1] of the Carthaginians in drowning some Roman Merchants, was remitted by the Romans, before it was discovered to them, as Appian relates. Dionysius [2] Halicarnassensis says, Those are the best Reconciliations, which leave behind nothing of Resentment, or Ill-will. And also Isocrates, [3] After a Peace is concluded, it is base to remember former Injuries.

XVII.
Punishments also before the War publicly due, if in doubt, are believed to be forgiven.

XVIII. There is not the same Reason that private Men should be thought to remit the Right of demanding Punishment, because this may without War be judicially required; but since this Right is not ours in the same manner, as that, which arises from Inequality, and besides, Punishments having always something odious: The slightest Conjectures that may be drawn from the Terms of the Treaty, are sufficient to found a just Presumption, that this also is passed by.

XVIII. What of the Right of private Persons to exact Punishment.

XIX. But whereas we have said, that the Right, which we had before the War, should not easily be thought to be remitted, this indeed holds very true in the Right [701] of private Men. But as to the Right of Kings and Nations, a Remission may be more easily presumed, if the Terms of the Treaty, or probable Conjectures drawn from them, lead us to that Interpretation; but especially if the Right in question were not clear, but in dispute. For it is humane to believe that those who make Peace intend sincerely to stifle the Seeds of War. The same Dionysius Halicarnassensis well observes, [1] We are not so much to endeavour to patch up a broken Friendship for the present, as to take Care to prevent our being involved again in the same War. For we are met here not to put off the Miseries of War, but entirely to take them away; which last Words are almost taken Verbatim from Isocrates, in his Oration concerning Peace.

XIX. That Right which before the War was publicly claimed, but disputed, is easily presumed to be forgiven.

XX. Whatsoever is taken away after the Peace is absolutely concluded, is to be restored, for from that Time the Right of War immediately ceased.

XX. Things taken after Peace to be restored.

XXI. But of those Articles which relate to the Restitution of Things taken in War, those in the first Place may be more largely interpreted, that are mutual, than [1] those that concern only one Party. Next, those relating to Persons [2] are more favourable than those that respect Things; and even among those that relate to Things, they that concern Lands [3] are more favourable, than those that respect Moveables; and also among these, they that are in [4] Possession of the State, more than those of private Persons. And again, among those in the Possession of private Men, they are [5] more favourable, that are possessed under a gainful, than those under a chargeable Title, as Things bought with Money, and those held in Dowry by Marriage.

XXI. Some Rules of Agreement whereby Things taken in War are to be restored.

XXII. To whom any Thing is granted by Articles of Peace, to whom are also all the Profits allowed [1] from the Time of that Grant, but not before; as Augustus Caesar well argued against Sextus Pompeius, who having Peloponnesus granted to him, would have also had all the Tributes that were in Arrears for some Years past, before the Time of that Grant.

XXII. Fruits, to be restored.

XXIII. [1] The Names of Countries are to be taken according to the present use, not so much of the common People, as of intelligent Persons, for such Affairs are commonly managed by Men of understanding.

XXIII. Of the Names of Countries.

[702]

XXIV. These two Rules are of frequent use, viz. as often as Reference is had to some precedent Article, or antient Treaty, so often the Qualities or Conditions expressed in the preceding Article or antient Treaty are supposed to be repeated; and he shall be reputed to have fulfilled his Agreement, who was willing to have done it, [1] if he had not been prevented by the other, who quarrels with him on that Head.

XXIV. Of Reference to some former Agreements, and of the Obstruction here.

XXV. But whereas some affirm, that an Excuse is allowable for a short delay in the Performance, [1] this holds not true, [a] unless caused by an unforeseen Necessity. For it is no wonder, that some of our Canons seem [2] favourable to such Excuses, when it is their Design to exhort Christians to such Things as are agreeable to mutual Charity. But in this Question of the interpreting Agreements, we do not enquire what is most commendable, nor what Piety or Religion demands, but what every one may be forced to do; in a Word what is merely of external Right, as we call it in Opposition to the Duty of Conscience.

XXV. Of Delay.

XXVI. But where the Meaning is doubtful, the Interpretation ought to be rather made against him [1] who imposes the Conditions, as generally the more powerful. [2] The Power is in him that gives, says Hannibal, not in him that desires Conditions of Peace: As the Interpretation ought to be against the [3] Seller. For he can only blame himself, for not fully explaining himself; but the other receiving Conditions in Words capable of divers Senses, has a Right to take them in the Sense most favourable to himself; agreeable to which is that of Aristotle, [4] When Friendship is contracted on the account of Interest, the Profit of the Receiver ought to be the Measure (of what is due).

XXVI. In a doubtful Case the Interpretation is to be given against him that gives the Conditions.

XXVII. It is also a daily Dispute, when a Peace may be said to be broken, which the Greeks call παρ'ασπόνδημα; for it is not directly the same Thing, to give a new Occasion of War, and to break a Peace. But there is a great Difference [1] between them, as well in regard to the Penalty which the Breaker incurs, as with respect to the Liberty of the injured Party to disengage his Word in the other Articles of the Treaty. A Peace then may be broke three Ways, either by doing what is contrary to all Peace, or against that which is expressly mentioned in that Peace, or against that which is to be understood from the Nature of every Peace.

XXVII. Distinctions to be made between new Occasions of War, and breaking the Peace.

[703]

XXVIII. First, It may be done, when that is acted which is contrary to all Peace; as when we are invaded in a hostile Manner, when there is no new Cause of War, which if it may be alledged with any Plausibility, it were better to suppose it an Act of Injustice without Treachery than with it. It seems almost unnecessary to mention that of Thucydides, [1] Not they who repel Force by Force, but they who first offer the Violence, are the Breakers of the Peace. This being granted, we must next see, who are the Invaded, and who by invading break the Peace.

XXVIII. How a Peace may be broke by doing contrary to what is supposed to be in every Peace.

XXIX. I find some are of Opinion, that if the Invaders be but their Allies, the Peace is broken. I do not deny but such a Contract may be made, not properly, that one Ally should be liable to Punishment for the Fact of another; but that the Continuance of the Peace may then be deemed to depend on a Condition, partly arbitrary, and XXIX. What if we be invaded by Allies.

[1] partly casual. But it is scarce credible, that such a Peace should be made, unless it manifestly appear from the Treaty itself; for it is irregular, and inconsistent with the Design of those that make Peace. Therefore they that thus invade, without the Assistance of others, shall be adjudged the Breakers of the Peace, and it shall be lawful to make War on them, not on others; contrary to which, the Thebans formerly pleaded against the [2] Associates of the Lacedemonians.

XXX. But if Subjects commit any Violence without publick Order, we must then see whether this Act of private Men can be said to be approved by the State; to which three Things are required. 1. The Knowledge of the Fact. 2. A Power to punish. And 3. A Neglect in the Person authorised to do it; as you may easily gather from what has been [a] said before. 1. The Knowledge may be proved, if the Fact be notorious, or has been complained of. 2. A Power is presumed, unless there be a Rebellion. 3. A Neglect may appear, if the Time be elapsed, which every State generally takes to punish Offenders. And such a Neglect is equivalent to a publick Decree. Neither can what Agrippa says in Josephus be otherwise understood, That the King of Parthia should look upon the Peace as broken, if any of his Subjects took up Arms against the Romans.

XXX. What if by Subjects, and how their Act may be judged approved.

XXXI. Another Query is often made, whether it be all one, if Subjects take up Arms, not by themselves, but fight under others engaged in War. The Cerites in Livy clear themselves, by saying, their Subjects took up Arms without any publick Order. The same was the Defence of the [a] Rhodians. And indeed the best founded Opinion is, that such a Thing ought not to be deemed permitted, unless there are [704] apparent Reasons for believing that there was an Intention to permit it; as we see now that is sometimes practised, in Imitation of the old Aetolians, who accounted it lawful, [1] To plunder the Plunderer. Which Custom Polybius says was so powerful, [2] That tho' they were not at War themselves, but only others, their Friends, or Allies, yet it was lawful for the Aetolians, without any publick Order, to fight on both Sides, and to prey on either Party. And Livy gives the same account of them. They suffer their Youth, [3] but without any publick Commission, to fight against their Allies, and often both Parties have Aetolian Auxiliaries at the same Time. Thus the Hetrurians [4] of old denied to assist the Veientes, but yet did not hinder their Youth from going of their own free Will into the Service.

XXXI. What if Subjects serve under another Prince?

XXXII. 1. Again, the Peace is said to be broken, not only when the whole Body of a State, but if any of the Subjects be forcibly invaded, unless upon Occasion of some new Cause of War. For Peace is made to the Intent that all the Subjects might live in Safety: The Treaty being an Act of the State for all the Members in general, and for each in particular. And if there be even a new Cause of War, it shall be lawful, tho' the Peace subsists, for every one to defend himself and his Goods, against those that attack him. For it is natural (as Cassius says) to repel Force by Force. Therefore this Right cannot easily be thought to be renounced amongst Equals. But it shall not be lawful to revenge ones self, or by Force to recover what has been taken away, unless Judgment be first denied us. For this may admit of some Delay, but that of none.

XXXII. What if Subjects be injured, explained by a Distinction.

2. [1] But if Subjects make it their constant Practice to commit Outrages contrary to the Law of Nature, so that there be Reason to believe they do it wholly against the Will of their Rulers, and no Court of Judicature can reach them, such as are Pirates; we may both recover our Losses from them, and avenge ourselves on them by Force of Arms, as if they were surrendered to us. But to assault others that are innocent on that Pretence, is directly against the Peace.

XXXIII. 1. [1] A forcible Invasion of our Allies also breaks the Peace, but it must be those [2] that are comprehended in the Peace, as I have [a] already shewn in the Case of the Saguntines. This the Corinthians alledge in Xenophon, in his 6th Book of the Greek History, We have all sworn to one another. But tho' those Allies do not covenant for themselves, but others do it for them, it is still the same Thing, provided it fully appears that they have ratified it; but as long as it is not certainly known that they have done it, they are reputed as Enemies.

XXXIII. What if Allies? With a Distinction.

2. But the Case is different of the other Allies, who have neither been engaged in the War, nor comprehended in the Treaty of Peace; as also of [4] our Kinsmen and Relations, who are not under our Dependence; neither can an Assault upon them amount to the Breach of Peace. Yet it does not follow, (as we have [b] said before) that War may not be made on their account, but then it will be a new War and for a new Subject.

XXXIV. The Peace is likewise broken, (as I have said already) by doing contrary to what is expressed in the Peace; where by doing is likewise comprehended, not doing what we ought to do, and when we should do it.

XXXIV. How a Peace may be broken by doing contrary to what is expressed in the Peace.

[705]

XXXV. Neither can I here admit of any Distinction between the Articles of Peace, as if some were of greater Concern than others: For whatever is inserted in the Articles, ought to be regarded as important enough to be observed. But Goodness, especially Christian Goodness, will more easily forgive small Faults, particularly if they be repented of; as Seneca speaks,

XXXV. Whether any Distinction is to be made between the Articles of Peace?

[1] Quem poenitet peccasse, paene est Innocens.

Who repents of his Crime, is almost innocent.

But to secure the Peace the better, it would be well done [2] to add to the [a] Articles of less Concern, this Clause, That the Violation of any of them shall not be sufficient to break the Peace, but they shall be first put to Arbitration, before recourse is had to Arms, which Thucydides [3] records was stipulated in the Peloponnesian Treaty of Peace.

XXXVI. And I am clearly of Opinion, that it is on that Foot we are to explain the Intention of the two Parties, when a particular [1] Penalty is expressly added to the Violation of certain Articles; not that I am ignorant, that such an Agreement may be made, that it shall be in the injured Person's Choice, either to exact the Punishment, or make void the Accommodation. But the Nature of the Affair in question requires rather the other Interpretation, which I mentioned. This is also very plain, and what I have [b] said before, and proved by the Authority of History, that even in regard to Articles simply stipulated, he who fulfils not his Promise, when the other, who ought first to have executed his Engagements has failed therein, does not break the Peace; since his Obligation was conditional.

XXXVI. What if some Penalty be added.

XXXVII. But if an absolute Necessity occasion the Non-Performance of the Agreement, as if the Thing promised be lost, or taken away, or the doing of it be by some Means or other rendered impossible, the Peace shall not indeed be looked upon as broken; for (as I have said already) Peace does not use to depend upon a casual Condition; but the other Party shall have his Choice whether he had rather wait for the Performance of the Promise, if there be any Hopes of a possibility of its being done, though late, or receive the full Value of it, or be discharged from any mutual Engagements answerable to this Article, or thought equivalent to it.

XXXVII. What if hindered by absolute Necessity?

XXXVIII. When there is even Treachery on one Side, it is certainly at the Choice of the innocent Party to let the Peace subsist; as Scipio [a] did formerly after many perfidious Actions of the Carthaginians. Because no

XXXVIII. The Peace shall stand firm, if the injured Person be willing to it.

Man, by doing contrary to his Obligation, can there by discharge himself from it. For though it be expressed, that by such a Fact the Peace shall be reputed as broken, yet this Clause is to be understood only in Favour of the Innocent, if he thinks fit to make use of it.

XXXIX. Lastly, We have said, that the Peace may be broken by doing what is contrary to the Special Nature of the Peace concluded.

XXXIX. How a Peace may be broken, by doing what is contrary to the Nature of every particular Peace.

XL. 1. Thus those Things that are done contrary to Friendship, do break that Peace which was contracted under the Condition of Friendship; for what the Duty of Friendship alone may require from others, ought also here to be performed by the Right of Covenant. And to this (tho' not to every Peace, [1] for there are some not on the same Account of Friendship, as Pomponius observes,) we may refer many of those Things, which Civilians advance concerning Injuries and Affronts done without force of Arms; and especially that of [2] Tully, If any Thing be committed after a Reconciliation made, it shall not be accounted a Neglect, but an Offence, and not imputed to Imprudence, but Perfidiousness; but even here also we are not to judge of it invidiously.

XL. What comes under the Notion of Friendship.

[706]

2. Therefore an Injury done to a Relation, or a Subject, of him with whom a Treaty of Peace has been concluded, shall not be deemed as done to himself, unless there was a manifest Design to affront and insult him thereby. Which natural Equity the Roman Laws observe, in Regard to Slaves [3] that have been cruelly handled; and Adultery and Ravishment shall be imputed rather to Lust than Hatred: And the invading another Man's Property, shall be reputed rather a new Act of Covetousness than of Treachery.

3. But cruel Threatnings, without some new Cause given, are inconsistent with Friendship; and hereto I will refer the Building of strong Places on the Frontiers, not so much for Defence as Offence, and an unusual raising of Forces, if there be just and apparent Reasons to think that they are prepared against him with whom we have made Peace.

XLI. 1. To [1] receive particular Persons as are willing to remove from one Prince's Territories into another's, is no Breach of Friendship; for this Liberty is not only natural, but has something favourable in it, (as we have said [a] elsewhere). In the same Place I shall rank the Entertainment given to Exiles: For as I have [b] before proved out of Euripides, the State has no Right over those whom they have banished. Perseus argues well in Livy, [2] To what Purpose is it to ordain one to be banished, if there were no Place allowed for his Refuge? And Aristides [3] calls, To receive the Banished, a Right common to all Mankind.

XLI. Whether to entertain Subjects and Exiles be contrary to Friendship.

2. But [4] we have already [c] proved, that it is not lawful to receive whole Towns, or any great Multitudes, who made a considerable Part of the State from whence they came: Nor those who are engaged by Oath, or otherwise, to continue in the Service, or under the Slavery of him whom they have quitted. But we have mentioned [d] above, that the like hath been introduced among some People, by the Law of Nations, concerning those who have been made Slaves by the Chance of War; and also concerning the delivering up of such who are not banished, but fly from Justice, I have treated in [e] another Place.

XLII. To decide a War by Lots is not always lawful, but only then, when we have a full Propriety [1] in the Thing disputed for: For the State is more strictly [707] obliged to defend the Lives, Chastity, and such like of the Subjects; and the King also is more strictly obliged to consult the Safety of the State, than to omit those Means which are most natural to his own and others Security. But yet, if he that is unjustly assaulted, shall, upon due Examination, find himself too weak to make any considerable Resistance, he may reasonably refer his Case to Chance, that by exposing himself to an uncertain, he may escape a certain Danger, which of the two Evils is the least.

XLII. How War may be ended by Lots.

XLIII. 1. Here follows a Question much controverted, viz. whether it may be lawful to decide a War by a Combat of one of each Side, [1] as that of Aeneas and Turnus, [2] Menelaus and Paris; or between two of either Party, as that between the Aetolians and Eleans; or between three of a Side, as between the Roman Horatii and the Alban Curiatii; or between three hundred on each Side, as that between the [3] Lacedemonians and Argives.

XLIII. How by a set Combat, and whether it be lawful.

2. If we only respect the external Right of Nations, no Doubt but such Combats are lawful, for that [4] Right gives a Man Leave to destroy his Enemy how he can; and if the Opinion of the old Greeks, Romans, and other Nations, were right, that every Man had an absolute Power over his own Life, then those Combats are likewise reconcilable to internal Justice. But we [a] have several Times said, that this Opinion is repugnant to right Reason and GOD's Commands. We have [b] elsewhere proved [5] by Reason, and the Authority of Holy Scriptures, that he offends against Charity who kills a Man, for those Things which he can well spare. To which we shall add, that he who sets so small a Value upon his Life, which GOD hath given him as a great Blessing, sins against GOD and his own Soul. If the Thing disputed for be worthy of a War, as the Preservation of the Lives of many innocent Persons, we ought to endeavour it to the utmost of our Power; but to make use of a set Combat, purely as the Trial of a good Cause, or as an Instrument of Divine Judgment, [6] is vain and superstitious.

3. There is but one Thing that can render such a Combat innocent and lawful, and that but on one Side, [7] when otherwise it is highly probable that he who prosecutes an unjust Cause should be the Conqueror, and thereby cause the Destruction of many innocent Persons; he cannot then be any Ways blamed, who undertakes a Combat on this Account, wherein he has most probable Hopes of Success. And this is also true, that many Things which are not rightly done, may be by others, tho' not really approved, yet permitted, in Order to prevent greater Mis-chiefs, that [708] could not otherwise be avoided; as in many Places [8] Usurers and Prostitutes are tolerated.

4. What therefore we have [c] said before, when we treated of the Means of preventing a War, if two Persons that dispute about a Kingdom, are willing to try it by single Combat, the People [9] may safely allow it, that a greater Calamity which threatens them may be prevented: We may say the same, when it is to conclude a War; as Cyrus [10] challenged the Assyrian King. And Metius, in Dionysius Hali carnassensis, [11] declares, that it is not unreasonable, if the Dispute be not concerning the Power and Dignity of the Nation, but of the Princes themselves, [12] that they only should decide the Controversy by their own Swords. Thus we read, that the Emperor Heraclius sought a single Combat with Chosroez, Son to the King of Persia.

XLIV. They who thus refer their Cause to the Trial of a Combat, may indeed lose their own Right, if they have any, to the Kingdom disputed for; but they cannot make over a Right to another, who has none of his own, to those Kingdoms which are not patrimonial. Therefore to make the Agreement valid, there is a Necessity to have the Consent [1] of the People, and of Persons already born, that have any Right to the Succession. And even as to Fiefs [2] that are not free, the Consent of the Lord, or Superior, is absolutely necessary.

XLIV. Whether the Fact of the King does here oblige the People.

XLV. 1. Often in such Combats it is disputed [1] which is the Conqueror. They cannot be reputed conquered, unless the whole Party on one Side be slain or put to flight. [2] So in Livy, he that retreats within his own Borders, or into his own Towns, is to be esteemed vanquished.

XLV. Who is to be judged the Conqueror.

2. Those three famous Historians, Herodotus, Thucydides, and Polybius, furnish us, each of them, with an Example of Disputes concerning Victory. The Case related by the first, respects only set Combats; but he that rightly considers the Matter will find, that in all those Combats neither Party had a real Victory. For [709] the Argives were not put to flight by Othryades, but marched off in the Night, supposing themselves Conquerors, and with a Design to carry the News to their Countrymen. Neither did the Corcyreans defeat the Corinthians; but the latter, after having fought with Advantage, seeing a strong Fleet of the Athenians near, without hazarding an Engagement with them, retreated in good Order. Lastly, Philip the Macedonian had indeed taken a Ship of Attalus, forsaken by those of her own Party, but did not rout the whole Fleet: Therefore, (as Polybius observes) he rather behaved himself like a Conqueror, than really thought himself so.

3. But those Things, as gathering the Spoils, [3] giving Leave to bury the Dead, and offering Battle a second Time; which, both in the abovementioned Authors and in Livy, you may find set down as Tokens of Victory, prove nothing of themselves, but as they may be attended with other Indications of the Enemy's Flight. And certainly, in a Doubt, the strongest Presumption is, that he who retreats runs away; but where there are no positive Proofs of Victory, the Case is just as it was before the Battle, and so they must either pursue the War, or come to a new Agreement.

XLVI. 1. Proculus [1] tells us, that there are two Sorts of Arbitrations, one whereof he makes so absolute, that its Sentence must be obeyed, whether just or unjust; which, he says, takes Place when the Arbitration is founded on a Compromise. The other is, when the Judgment [2] of the Arbitrator has Force only so far as is conformable to what an honest and equitable Person ought to pronounce. Of which we have an Example in the Decision of Celsus, [3] If a Slave made free shall swear (says he) to do what Services his Patron shall require of him, the Demands of his Master shall be no farther obligatory than consists with Reason and Equity. But this Interpretation of an Oath, tho' it may have been allowed by the Roman Laws, yet it is not agreeable to the plain Sense of the Words simply taken; but this holds very true, that the Word Arbitrator may be taken in both Senses, either as a Mediator only, such as were the [4] Athenians, between the Rhodians and Demetrius; or for an absolute Judge, whose Decree must be obeyed. And it is in this Sense that we here take it; as also we have [a] done before, when we treated of the Means to prevent a War.

XLVI. How War may be ended by Arbitration; and here Arbitration to be understood without Appeal.

2. Tho' even against such Arbitrators, to whose Judgment both Parties have promised to stand, it may be provided by the Civil Law, as in some Places it is, to appeal from it, and exhibit Bills of Complaint; [5] yet this cannot be between Kings and Nations. For here can be no superior Power, which may either hinder or disannul the Obligation of a Promise, so that their Sentence must stand, whether just or unjust; to which we may rightly apply that of Pliny, [6] Every Man makes him the supreme Judge of his own Cause, whom he has chosen Umpire. For it is one Thing to speak of the Duty of an Arbitrator, and another of the Obligation of those who have engaged by Promise to stand to their Arbitration.

[710]

XLVII. We must consider, in the Duty of an Arbitrator, whether he be chosen under the Notion of a Judge, properly so called, or whether a more extensive Power be given him, which, according to Seneca, is in some Manner essential to every Arbitration. [1] A good Cause, says he, had better be referred to a Judge than an Arbitrator, because the Judge has a constant Rule and Orders to proceed by, which he must not transgress; but the other having full Liberty to judge according to his Conscience, may retrench or add something, and pronounce Sentence, not according to the rigorous Laws of Justice, but as Humanity and Piety shall direct. And Aristotle [2] reckons it,

XLVII. Arbitrators in doubtful Cases bound to the Equity.

The Duty of an honest Man, rather to go to an Arbitrator than a Judge; giving this Reason for it, For an Arbitrator respects that which is equitable, the Judge that which is legal; and for that Purpose the Use of Arbitrators was invented that Equity may prevail. For Equity, in this Place, does not properly signify, as elsewhere, that Part of Justice which restrains the Generality of the Terms of a Law, according to the Intent of the Law-maker, (for even this is the Judge's Charge) but every Thing which is better done than not done, tho' not according to the strict Rules of Justice, properly so called. But such Arbitrators, as they are frequent among private Persons, that are Subjects to the same State; and are particularly recommended to Christians, by the Apostle St. Paul, 1 Cor. vi. so, in doubtful Cases, so large a Power is not supposed to be granted them. For when there is any Obscurity, we are to follow [3] that Side which gives the least Extent to the Things in Question. But especially this is to be observed between sovereign Princes, who having no common Judge are presumed to tie up the Arbitrator to those strict Rules which Judges are generally confined to.

XLVIII. But this is to be observed, that Arbitrators chosen by a People, or sovereign Power, [1] are to give Sentence of the principal Matter, but not of the Possession, [2] for Judgments of Possessions belong to the Civil Law: By the Law of Nations, the Right of Possession follows Property; therefore till the Cause is tried, no Innovation is to be made, both to avoid Prejudice, as also because the Recovery of those Things is difficult. Livy, in his History of the Arbitration between the Carthaginians and Masinissa, says, [3] The Deputies did not change the Right of Possession.

XLVIII.
Arbitrators ought not to judge of Possessions.

XLIX. 1. There is another Way of submitting to the Judgment of one in Order to terminate the War, which is to give the Enemy a full Power to dispose of us; whereby [1] we surrender at Discretion, and become subject to him to whom we surrender. The Greeks call it ἐπιτρέπειν τὸ καθ' αὐτὸν. Thus the Aetolians were asked, in Livy, whether they would submit themselves to the Discretion of the Romans. This was the Advice of L. Cornelius Lentulus, as related by Appian, about the End of the second Punick War, concerning the Affairs of the Carthaginians. [2] Let the Carthaginians, says he, surrender at Discretion, as the Conquered use to do, and as others have done formerly; then we shall see what we have to do; they will then take kindly of us whatever we grant them, since they cannot consider it as the Effect of a Treaty concluded with them. Now this makes a great Difference: For whilst we enter into Treaties with them, they will always have some Pretence to break them, alledging, that they had been wronged in some Part of them. For since many Things are capable of a double Interpretation, there will always remain Room for a [711] Dispute: Whereas, if they surrender, and we disarm them, and become Masters of their Persons, they will then see that they have nothing properly their own; they will humble themselves, and whatsoever they shall receive from us, they will look upon as of meer Grace and Favour.

XLIX. *How far the Force of a pure Surrender
extends.*

2. But here we must also distinguish, what the Vanquished ought to suffer, and what the Conqueror may do, either in Strictness, or without transgressing some Duty, or without exacting what is unworthy of him. The Conquered having yielded himself, must suffer any Thing at the Will of his Conqueror, as being now in Subjection; and if we respect the [3] external Right of War, they have nothing but what may be taken from them, their very Lives and personal Liberty, much more their Goods, whether publick, or belonging to private Persons. Livy tells us in another Place, [4] that The Aetolians having surrendered at Discretion, were afraid lest they should be ill-used in their Persons. We have cited [a] in another Place, When all Things are surrendered to the Conqueror, it depends on him to take away or to leave what he pleases. To this agrees that of Livy, [5] It was the antient Custom of the Romans, when they would not make any Treaty, either of Peace or Friendship with a People, to punish them by Arms, till they had surrendered themselves with all their Right, divine and human, given Hostages, delivered up their Arms, and received Garrisons into their Towns. And even sometimes those that yielded themselves might be killed, as we have shewn in [b] another Place.

L. 1. But the Conqueror, that he may do nothing unjustly, ought first to take Care that no Man be killed, unless for some capital Crime; so also, that no Man's Goods be taken away, unless by Way of just Punishment. [1] And even by keeping within these Bounds, as far as his own Security will permit it, it is honourable (to a Conqueror) to shew Clemency and Liberality, and sometimes even necessary, by the Rules of Virtue, according as Circumstances shall require.

L. The Duty of the Conqueror, with Respect to those who thus surrender.

2. Admirable are the Conclusions of those Wars which are finished with a general Pardon, as I have [a] said in another Place. Thus pleaded Nicolaus the Syracusian, in Diodorus, [2] They surrendered themselves up, with their Arms, trusting to the Mercy of the Conquerors; it would then be an eternal Shame, that they should be deceived in their Opinion of our Clemency. And again, What Grecian ever condemned them to barbarous Punishment, who yielded to the Mercy of the Conqueror? And thus Octavius Caesar, in Appian, speaks to L. Antonius, coming to surrender himself, [3] If you had come purely to treat with me, you should have found me a Conqueror highly incensed at your Actions; but now you come to surrender yourself, your Friends, and your Army to our Discretion, you have disarmed my Anger, and taken from me the Power which you would have been forced to give me, if we had made an Agreement together; for upon considering what you ought to suffer, and I to grant, I shall prefer my Honour to Revenge.

3. We often meet in Roman Histories [4] with these Expressions, Tradere se in fidem, To yield themselves to the Faith. Tradere in fidem & clementiam, To yield [712] to the Faith and Clemency. So in the thirty-seventh Book of Livy, He gave a gracious Audience to the neighbouring Embassadors, that came to surrender their States to the Faith of the Romans. And in the forty-fourth Book, Paulus earnestly desiring that he might be allowed to surrender himself, and all he had, unto the Faith and Clemency of the People of Rome. But it must be understood, that by these Words is meant an absolute Surrender: [5] And that the Word Fides in these Places signifies nothing but the Probity of the Conqueror, to which the Conquered yields himself.

4. There [6] is a remarkable Story in Polybius and Livy, of Phaneas, an Aetolian Ambassador, who, in his Speech to the Consul Manius, said these submissive Words, that The Aetolians did freely surrender themselves, and all they had, to the Faith of the People of Rome. Which when he had affirmed again to the Consul, who asked whether that was really the Design of the Aetolians; the Consul demanded that the chief Authors of the War should be immediately delivered up to him. Phaneas presently replied, [7] We surrender ourselves up to your Faith, not unto Slavery: And added, that it was not the Custom of the Greeks to exact such a Thing as he commanded the Aetolians to do. The Consul answered, he valued not what the Custom of the Grecians was; that, according to the Custom of the Romans, he had an absolute Power over those who had surrendered themselves by publick Deliberation; and presently ordered the Embassadors to be laid in Irons, [8] Do ye, having surrendered yourselves to our Faith, pretend to teach us what in Duty and Honour we should do? as Polybius has it. From which Words it is plain, what he to whose Faith any People have surrendered themselves, may do with Impunity, and without violating the Law of Nations. However, the Roman Consul did not make Use of this Power, but dismissed the Embassadors, and permitted the Aetolians to have a new Consultation in their Assembly. [9] Thus the People of Rome are said to have answered the Falisci: That they had been informed the Falisci had yielded themselves, not to the Power, but the Faith, of the Romans. And of the Campanians, we read, [10] that they had submitted absolutely, and not by any Agreement.

5. But concerning his Duty to whom the Surrender is made, that of Seneca [11] is very applicable, Clemency has an unlimited Power to judge: It is not tied down by the Forms of Law, but pronounces according to Equity: It may both absolve and condemn, as it thinks fit. Neither does it signify much how the Person surrendering expresses himself, whether he yield to the Wisdom, Moderation, or Mercy of the Conqueror, for they are all but Compliments, the Reality of the Matter is, the Conqueror becomes absolute Master to do what he pleases.

LI. But yet there are also conditional Surrenders, which are made either LI. Of a conditional Surrender. in Favour of private Persons, as when [1] the saving their Lives, their personal Liberty, or [713] some of their Goods [2] be expressly stipulated; or in Favour of the whole Body of People, whence may result a mixt Government, of which we [a] have treated in another Place.

LII. To publick Treaties are sometimes joined Hostages and Pledges, LII. Who may and ought to be given for Hostages. which are a Sort of Accessory. Hostages (we have [a] said) are either such as freely give themselves, or are given by him that hath the sovereign Power. For he that is possessed of the supreme civil Power, has a Right both over the [2] Actions and the Goods of the Subjects; but the Prince, or State, shall be obliged to make Satisfaction to him or his Friends, for any Losses which he may thereby suffer. And if it be indifferent to the State, which, of several Persons, goes as Hostage, it is best to decide that by Lots; but the Lord of a Fief has not this Right over his Vassal, unless he be also his [3] Subject; for the Homage and Obedience that he owes him, does not reach so far.

LIII. We have already said, that a Hostage may be put to Death by the LIII. What Right is given over Hostages. external Right of Nations, but not by the internal, unless he himself be guilty of a capital Crime. Neither can they become [1] Slaves; but they may even by the Right of Nations enjoy, and leave their Goods to their Heirs. Tho' it is provided by the Roman Law, that their Goods [2] should be confiscated to the Publick.

LIV. The Query is, whether a Hostage may lawfully Escape? And LIV. Whether Hostages may lawfully escape. certainly he may not; if at first, or since, he hath engaged his Word (in Order to have a little more Liberty) that he would not; otherwise, it does not seem to be the Intent of the State that sent him, [1] to oblige their Subject from making his Escape, but to [714] allow the Enemy to secure him as he pleased: And thus may the Fact of Clelia be defended. But tho' she had not offended in doing it, yet the State could not [2] receive and detain their Hostage; whereupon Porsenna declared, [3] If they did not send back his Hostage, he would take it as a Breach of the Treaty. Then [4] The Romans immediately restored her, according to Covenant, as a Pledge of the Peace.

LV. The Obligation of Hostages has something odious in it, both LV. Whether a Hostage may be lawfully detained upon any other Account. because it is contrary to Liberty, and because it arises from the Fact of another: So that we are here to explain the Sense of the Terms in a Manner that restrains, as much as possible, such an Engagement. And therefore, they who are delivered Hostages on one Account, cannot be detained on another: Which must be taken thus, provided any other Promise in Question was made, without an Engagement at the same Time to give Hostages; but if we have already broke our Faith in any other Case, or a just Debt be contracted, then the Hostage may be retained, yet not as a Hostage, but by the Law of Nations, [a] whereby Subjects may be retained Prisoners for their Sovereign's Debts, κατ' ἀνδρῶληψίαν, by way of Arrest, or Reprisal. Which however may easily be prevented, by inserting an express Clause, that the Hostages shall be [1] restored, when that shall be performed for which they were given.

LVI. He that is delivered as a Hostage only, to release either a Prisoner or another Hostage, if this die the other is released; for by his Death all Right of Pledge dies with him, as Ulpian has said, in the Case of a ransomed Prisoner: Wherefore as in Ulpian's [1] Case, the Ransom ceases to be due by the Death of the Person, in whose Room it had been substituted, so in this Case, the Person substituted cannot be here detained. Therefore the Demand of Demetrius to the Roman Senate to be dismissed, was not unreasonable, As being a Hostage for Antiochus, he being dead, he ceased to be so, says [2] Appian; and Justin out of Trogus, [3] Demetrius being a Hostage at Rome, as soon as ever he heard of the Death of his Brother Antiochus, went directly to the Senate, and told them he came thither as a Hostage for his Brother, being alive, but now he was dead he could not tell whose Hostage he was.

LVI. Upon the Death of the Principal, the Hostage to be free.

LVII. But if the King who made the Covenant die, shall his Hostage still be detained? That depends upon what we have [a] already said, whether the Treaty were personal or real. For Accessories cannot justify us in receding from the general Rule in the Interpretation of Principal Acts, whose Nature they themselves also ought to follow.

LVII. The King dying, whether the Hostage may be retained.

LVIII. By the Way we must add this, that Hostages sometimes are not a bare Accessory of the Obligation, but really the [1] principal Party; as when by Agreement, [715] a Person having engaged himself for the Fact of another, and being bound for Damages and Interest, in Case what he promises is not executed, gives Hostages in his stead: And this seems to have been the Meaning of the Treaty concluded near the Furcae Caudinae, as we have [a] remarked elsewhere. But the Opinion of those who maintain, that [2] Hostages may stand engaged for the Fact of one another, even without a mutual Consent, is not only severe but unjust.

LVIII. Hostages may be principally obliged, and one of them is not bound for the Fact of another.

LIX. Pledges have some Things common with Hostages, and some peculiar to themselves. What they have in common is, they may be detained for another [1] Debt at present due, unless Faith be given to the contrary. The Peculiar is, that what Contract soever is made concerning these, is not so strictly taken as that concerning Hostages. For this Act is not in itself so odious, because it is natural that Things [2] should be kept, not Men.

LIX. What Obligation lies upon Pledges.

LX. We have said [a] elsewhere, that no Time can prejudice the Right of Redemption, if that be performed for which the Things were first deposited. For that Act which has an antient and manifest Cause, cannot easily be believed to proceed from a new one; therefore tho' the Debtor has left the Pledge for a very long Time in the Hands of the Creditor, it is presumed he has done it, by supposing that the antient Contract still subsisted, and not because he renounced his Right; Unless some evident Conjectures necessarily require another Interpretation. [1] As if when a Man was ready to have redeemed it, but met with some Impediment, and afterwards kept Silence so long as to give Reason to suppose that he had voluntarily abandoned it.

LX. The Right of Redemption, how lost.

CHAPTER XXI ↩

Of Faith during War, of Truces, of Safe-Conduct, and the Redemption of Prisoners.

I. 1. There are some Things that use to be granted mutually by sovereign Princes, in Time of War, which [1] Virgil and [2] Tacitus call Belli Commercica, The Commerce of Wars. [3] Homer, Συνημόσυνα. Such as Truce, Safe-Conducts, Ransom of Prisoners. A Truce is an Agreement, by which, during the War, for a Time we forbear all Acts of Hostility. I say, during the War: For as Cicero [4] says, in his eighth Philippick, there is no Middle between War and Peace. And War is a certain State, which (like Habits) may subsist, even tho' its Actions be for a While suspended. Aristotle says, [5] A Man may be virtuous, tho' asleep, and tho' he lead an inactive Life. And again, The [6] Distance of Place doth not dissolve [716] Friendship, it only interrupts the present Exercise of it. And [7] Andronicus Rhodius, There may be a Habit, tho' at present it may not operate. So [8] Eustratius, An Habit, in Respect to an Ability simply taken, is called an Act, but in Respect to Action itself, is called Power; as Geometry is in a Geometrician when he is asleep. And in Horace, Lib. 1. Sat. 3.

*Ut, quamvis tacet Hermogenes, cantor tamen, atque
Optimus est modulator, & Alfenus vafer, omni
Abjecto instrumento Artis, clausâque tabernâ
Sutor erat — — —*

*Why, as Hermogenes, [*tho' he holds his Tongue,
Is skill'd in Musick, and can set a Song;
And shuffling Alfen, tho' he lost his Awl,
And threw away his Last, and shut his Stall,
And broke his Threads, yet was a Cobler still.*

Creech.

2. So then, as Gellius says, [9] A Truce cannot be called a Peace, for the War continues, tho' Fighting ceases. And in the Panegyrick of Latinus Pacatus, [10] Truce suspends the Effects of War. Which I here mention, that we may understand [11] that whatever is agreed upon to be of Force during a War, has also the same Force during a Truce; unless it fully appear, that it was not so much the general State of War, as the Exercise [12] of it, was had regard to. On the contrary, if any Thing be agreed on concerning Peace, it is of no Force in Time of Truce. Tho' Virgil calls a Truce [13] Pacem Sequestram, A provisional Peace; and Servius, [14] A temporary Peace; and so does the Scholiast on Thucydides, [15] A temporary Peace bringing forth War. Varro, [16] Pacem Castrorum, The Peace of Camps for a few Days. All which are not Definitions, but certain Descriptions, and those figurative: Such also was that of Varro, [17] when he calls it Bellorum ferias, War's Holy-Day: He might as well have called it Belli Somnum, War's Sleep. So Statius [18] called the Days wherein there was no Pleading, Peace. And Aristotle [19] called Sleep The Chain of the Senses; and so you may call Truce, The Fetters of War.

3. But in M. Varro's Exposition (which also [20] Donatus follows) [21] Gellius finds just Fault with this, that he added, A few Days, shewing that it is sometimes granted for a few Hours, I may also add, for twenty, thirty, forty, nay a hundred Years, of which we have Examples in Livy; [22] ] which may also confute that [717] Definition of Paulus the Lawyer, [23] A Truce is, when it is agreed for a short Time, and for the present Time, that neither Party shall offer Acts of Hostility.

4. But yet it is possible, if it shall clearly appear, that Cessation from Acts of Hostility in general, was the only Reason simply and wholly moving both Parties to make such an Agreement, that then [24] whatsoever is said concerning a Time of Peace, may be likewise said of a Truce; not by Vertue of the Word, but from a certain Conjecture of the Intention of the Mind; of which we have treated [a] elsewhere.

II. The Word [1] Induciae (a Truce) is not (as Gellius would have it) from inde uti jam, because the Moment it is ended we may act as before: Nor (according to Opilius) from Endoitus, which signifies Entry; because we may then enter freely into Lands of one another; but from inde otium, because there should be Rest from such a Time, as the Greeks call it ἐκεχειρία. For it appears, both from Gellius and Opilius, that the Word (Induciae) was by the Antients written with a t and not a c; and what we now use in the Plural, was certainly used of old in the Singular Number. The antient Manner of Writing was Endoitia; for then they pronounced Otium, Rest, Oitium, from the Verb Oiti, which we now pronounce Uti, to use; as from Poina [a] (we now write Poena, Punishment) is made Punio, to punish; and from Poinus (now Poenus, a Carthaginian) is made Punicus. So of the Word Ostia, Ostiorum, the Entries or Mouths of Rivers, is now made Ostia, Ostiae; [b] so from Indoitia, Indoitiorum, is made Indoitia, Indoitiae, and thence Indutia, whose Plural (as I said) is now only in use. Gellius says it was also used formerly in the singular Number. Donatus is not much in the wrong, when he would derive Induciae, from in dies otium, A Rest for some Days. A Truce then is a Rest in War, not a Peace; therefore some Historians nicely distinguish it, when they say a Peace [2] was refused, but a Truce granted.

III. Wherefore, the Truce being expired, there is no Occasion for a new Declaration of a War; for the temporary Impediment [1] being removed, the State of War, which was only suspended, and not extinct, returns of itself; as the Use of the Right of Property, and the Exercise of paternal Power, in Regard to a Madman, when he is come to himself. But we read in Livy, that by the Judgment of the Heralds, War was formerly denounced upon the expiring of a Truce. But the old Romans were desirous to shew, by those unnecessary Cautions, how much they loved Peace, and how careful they were not to engage in War, unless for just Reasons. Livy intimates as much, when he says, [2] After a Battle sought with the Veientes, at Nomentum and Fidenae, a Truce was granted, but no Peace made, and the Truce expired, and they had rebelled within that Time, yet the Heralds were sent to demand Satisfaction, according to antient Custom: But they would not hear them.

IV. 1. The time appointed for a Truce, is either continual, as when it is made for a hundred Days, or by prefixing a Time when it shall end, as unto the Calends [718] (or first Day) of March. In the former Case the Time must be [1] reckoned according to its just Measure, that is, conformably to its natural Measure: For that Account which is made by Days civil, arises from the Laws and Customs of Nations. In the other Case it is generally asked, whether the Day, the Month, or the Year, on which the Truce is to expire, is meant to be excluded or included.

2. It is certain, that as in natural Things there are two Sorts of Bounds, the one within the Thing, as the Skin is the Bound of the Body; the other without the Thing, as a River is the Bound of the Land: So, according to either of these two Ways, may those Bounds that depend on the Will be conceived; but it seems more natural, [2] that the Bound should be taken, which is part of the Thing, That is called the Bound of any Thing which is the extrem Part of it, says Aristotle. [3] Neither is this against [4] common Use. Spurina forewarned Caesar of a Danger that should not exceed the [5] Ides (or the 15th) of March. Being asked upon the very Day about it, he said, it was indeed come, but not yet past. Wherefore much more should this Interpretation of Truces be thus understood, where the lengthning of the Time has in it something favourable, viz. the sparing of human Blood.

3. But yet that Day, from whence a certain Space of Time is to commence, is not to be reckoned in that Space, because [6] the Preposition from does not signify Conjunction but Separation.

V. This I shall add by the Way, that Truces, and such like Agreements, V. When it begins to bind. do immediately oblige both Parties consenting, from the Time they are concluded; but the Subjects on both Sides then begin to be bound, when the Truce receives the Form of Law, that is, when it has been solemnly notified, [1] which being done, it immediately begins to have a Power to bind the Subjects. But that Power, if the Publication be made only in one Place, shall not at that Instant extend itself throughout the whole Dominion; but upon a convenient Time allowed, to give Notice in every Place. And if any Thing in the mean Time be done by the Subjects contrary to the Truce, they shall not be punishable for it. [2] The contracting [719] Parties, however, are not the less bound to repair [3] those Damages.

VI. 1. What may be lawfully done, and what not, in the Time of Truce, VI. What may be lawfully done during a Truce. may be understood from the Definition of it. All [1] Acts of Hostility are unlawful, either against Persons or Things; that is, whatsoever is then done by Force of Arms against the Enemy. For all such Acts, during the Time of the Truce, is against the Law of Nations, as L. Aemilius, in Livy, [2] tells his Soldiers.

2. Nay, whatsoever Things of the Enemy shall by Accident fall into our Hands, tho' they had been formerly ours, are to be restored; because, in Regard to external Right, by which we are here to regulate ourselves, the Property of them has passed to the Enemy. And therefore, as Paulus [3] the Lawyer observes, the Right of Postliminy, during a Truce, does not subsist; because Postliminy supposes an antecedent Right of taking by Force; which ceases during a Truce.

3. To come and go, to have free egress and regress, but without any Train or Attendance that may give Umbrage, is also permitted, as [4] Servius observes on those Words of Virgil, Mixtique impune Latini.

Latians, no longer Foes, mixed in the Woods.

Where he also tells us, that the City of Rome being besieged by Tarquin, and a Truce agreed upon between Porsenna and the Romans, whilst the Circean Games were celebrated in the City, the Enemy's Captains were allowed to come into the City, and contend in the Races, and that proving Victors they were crowned.

VII. To retreat back with an Army, which we find in Livy that Philip VII. Whether to retire back, to repair Breaches, or the like. did, is not a Breach of Truce; nor to repair a Wall, nor to levy Soldiers, [a] unless it be particularly excepted in the Agreement.

VIII. 1. It is undoubtedly a Violation of the Truce, to seize on any Place possessed by the Enemy, by corrupting the Garrison. For such an Acquisition cannot be lawful, unless authorised by the Right of War. The same may be said of the Reception of Subjects who would revolt to the Enemy. We have an Example in Livy's forty-second Book, [1] when The People of Coronaea and Haliartus, from a natural Inclination to Monarchy, sent Embassadors into Macedon, to desire a Garrison that might defend them against the insupportable Pride of the Thebans; the King told them he could not send them any, having lately made a Truce with the Romans. In the fourth Book of Thucydides, we read that Brusidas received the City Menda, revolting from the Athenians to the Lacedemonians in Time of Truce; but at the same Time an Excuse is added, which is, that he had in his Turn somewhat to charge the Athenians with.

2. It is indeed lawful to take Possession of Places deserted, that is, really deserted, viz. with a Design not to possess them again; but not, if they be left ungarrisoned, whether the Garrisons were withdrawn before or after the Truce. For the Property remaining renders the other's Possession unjust; which shews how groundless the Cavil of Belisarius was, who, under that Pretence, seized, during the Truce, some [a] Places from whence the Goths had withdrawn their Garrisons.

[720]

IX. 1. The Query is, Whether he who being detained by some unforeseen and inevitable Accident, is found among the Enemies at the expiring of the Truce, has a Right to return? If we barely respect the external Right of Nations, his Case I do not doubt, is the same [1] as his who coming in Time of Peace, upon the sudden breaking out of a War (not having Time to withdraw) is unhappily found among his Enemies, who, we have [a] already declared, is to continue a Prisoner till the End of the War. Neither is it against internal Justice, as the Goods and Actions of the Enemies stand obliged for the Debt of their State, and may be taken by Way of Payment. Neither has he any more Cause to complain than many other innocent Persons, on whom the Calamities of War accidentally fall.

IX. Whether he may return that is forcibly retained during the Truce?

2. It signifies nothing to alledge here what is said of the Excuse of an unforeseen Tempest, [2] which has driven a Vessel into some Place where it is subject to Confiscation. Nor that in Cicero's second Book of Invention, concerning a Man of War, by a Storm driven into Harbour, which the Quaestor would have sold by the Law. For those Examples relate to a Punishment which the insuperable Accident secures from; but here we do not properly discourse of Punishment; but of the Use of a Right that for a certain Time lay suspended, yet it would be far more humane, far more honourable, to release such-a-one.

X. There are also some Things unlawful during a Truce, from the special Nature of the Agreement. As suppose a Truce were granted only for the Burying of the Dead, [1] nothing ought to be changed; so if a Truce be made, that the Besieged should not, [2] within such a Time, be assaulted, then it would be unlawful to receive fresh Supplies of Men or Provisions. For since such a Truce is granted to oblige one Party, the other ought not to be prejudiced by it. And sometimes it is agreed in the Truce, that they shall not have Liberty to pass and repass; [3] sometimes Protection is granted to Persons, not to Things; wherefore, if in Defence of our Goods we wound any Person, it is not Breach of the Truce. For since it is lawful to defend our Goods, personal Safety is to be referred [4] to that which is [721] principal in the Treaty, not unto that which may be deduced from it by consequence.

X. Of the special Agreements of Truces, and what Queries usually arise from thence.

XI. If the Faith of Truce be broken on one Side, the other may undoubtedly proceed to Acts of Hostility, without any Declaration; for every Article of the Agreement implies a Condition, as I have said a little [a] before. We may find indeed some Examples in History, where some have bore it ought to the End of the Truce. But we read also that War was made upon the Hetrurians, and others, for Breach of Truce. From which Diversity of Examples we may infer it to be lawful for the injured Person to have Recourse to Arms; but whether he will or not is left to his own Choice.

XI. A Truce broken on one Side, the other may renew the War.

XII. This is certain, that if the Punishment agreed on, be demanded, and be inflicted on the Transgressor, then the other Party [1] has no Right to make War; therefore Punishment is inflicted, that other Things may continue safe. So, on the contrary, if the War be renewed, the Offender [2] is acquitted from Punishment, since the other had his Choice.

XII. What if a Punishment be added.

XIII. The Actions of private Persons do not break a Truce, unless the State has some Share in them, either by an Order or an Approbation, which is also implied, if the Offender be neither punished nor delivered up, nor Restitution made.

XIII. When private Acts break the Truce.

XIV. A Right to pass and repass beyond Truth, is a Kind of Privilege; therefore what we have already said concerning Privileges, must be observed in the interpreting of it. But this is a Privilege not hurtful to any third Person, nor very burthensome to him that granted it, therefore not to be taken in the strictest Sense of the Words, but with some Allowance, within the Propriety of the Terms. And more especially, if it were not granted upon Request, but freely offered. But still the more, if besides a private Advantage, [1] a publick one is intended. Therefore we are to reject a strict Interpretation, tho' the Words may bear it, unless it would otherwise create an Absurdity, or that very probable Conjectures of the Intent of the Person may induce us to it. But, on the contrary, an Extension even beyond the proper Signification of the Words shall take Place, to prevent such an Absurdity, or from very reasonable Conjectures.

XIV. Free Passage without a Truce, how to be interpreted?

XV. Hence we gather, that a safe Pass granted to Soldiers, extends not only to inferior Officers, but also chief Commanders; because the Propriety of the Word will allow [1] that Signification, though there is also another [2] more strict. So under the Name of Clergy [3] are comprehended Bishops. So the Mariners [4] [722] in a Fleet may be called Soldiers; and all in general, who have taken the military Oath.

XV. Who may come under the Name of Soldiers.

XVI. 1. Leave given to go [1] implies also one to return; not that the Word go includes it of itself, but because otherwise this Absurdity would follow, that a Favour would be intirely useless. If one promises to let us go away in Safety, we are to understand a Permission to depart, without having any Thing to fear, till we shall be got into a Place of Security. [2] It was therefore Treachery in Alexander, to cause them to be murdered in their Return home, to whom he had given Leave to depart.

XVI. To go, to come, to depart, how to be here understood.

2. But he that has Leave given him to go away, has not also to come back again; so neither has he that is allowed to come, a Liberty to send; nor on the contrary; for they are distinct Things, neither will Reason [3] warrant us to go beyond the Words; but yet, tho' an Error cannot give any Right, it may excuse from Punishment, if any were stipulated. He also that has Leave to come, shall come but once, and not again, unless the Time allowed [4] in the Pass gives Room to conjecture otherwise.

XVII. The Son must not follow the Father, nor the Wife her Husband; tho' when the Question is about the Right of Dwelling in a Country, the one follows the other: For we used to [1] dwell, not to travel, with our Families. But a Servant or two, tho' not particularly expressed, shall be presumed to be allowed, to him who cannot decently travel without them. For he that grants any Thing, is supposed to grant the necessary Consequents, which Necessity is here to be morally understood.

XVII. How far a safe Conduct extends to Persons.

XVIII. Goods likewise shall be comprehended, not all, but what are necessary for Travellers.

XVIII. How far unto Goods.

XIX. Under the Name of Attendants we must not understand those whose Character is more odious than that of the Person himself, whose Safety is provided for: Such as are Pirates, Robbers, Fugitives, and Deserters The expressing the Name of their Country [1] in the Passport, plainly shews that the Permission does not extend to others, who are not of that Country.

XIX. Who may come under the Name of Attendants, and who under the Name of a Nation.

XX. Licence to pass freely being derived from the Authority with which he who gives it is invested, in a dubious Case, does not cease by the Death [1] of the Granter, [723] according to what we have said [a] before, concerning the Grants of Kings, and other sovereign Princes.

XX. Whether a Passport be valid upon the Death of the Granter?

XXI. It is often disputed, what is meant by this Expression in a Pass, during my Pleasure. And the best founded Opinion is, that it shall last till the Donor shall declare his [1] Will to be otherwise, for that is presumed to continue, in a doubtful Case, which is sufficient to produce some Effect of Right: But not if he that granted it be disabled to will, which [2] may happen by Death: For the Moment the Person ceases to be, that Presumption of a Continuance of his Will falls of itself, as Accidents vanish as soon as the Substance is destroyed.

XXI. What if it be given only during the Pleasure of the Granter?

XXII. But a safe Pass is a Security to him who has it, even beyond the Territory of the Granter, because it is granted by Way of Protection against the Right of War, which of itself is not confined to any particular Prince's Dominion, as we have said [a] in another Place.

XXII. Whether Security be allowed beyond the Territory of the Donor?

XXIII. The Redemption of Prisoners is a Thing very favourable, especially amongst Christians, to whom the divine Law particularly recommends this Kind of Mercy. [1] The Redemption of Prisoners is a great and signal Part of Justice, says Lactantius. To redeem Prisoners, especially from a barbarous Enemy, is called by St. Ambrose, [2] the most noble and highest Liberality. The same Author defends his own and the Churches Fact, in selling even the consecrated Vessels to redeem Prisoners. The greatest Ornament of Sacraments, says he, is [3] the redeeming of Captives: And many other Things to the same Purpose.

XXIII. The Redemption of Prisoners favourable.

XXIV. 1. I dare not then approve, without Restriction, those Laws which forbid the ransoming of Prisoners, as we may read [1] of among the Romans. No [724] State so negligent of Captives as ours, [2] said one in the Roman Senate. And Livy says, that in the most antient Times Rome had no Compassion for those who were fallen into the Hands of the Enemy. The Ode [3] of Horace is well known on this Subject, where he calls the redeeming of Prisoners a shameful Condition, and an Example of dangerous Consequence, a Loss added to the Cowardice of the redeemed Prisoner. But what Aristotle condemns in the Spartan Government, is generally blamed in the Roman; namely, that every Thing in it related too much to warlike Affairs, as if the Safety of their State consisted only in them. But if we would consider it according to Humanity, it were better sometimes to renounce all the Pretensions for which War is undertaken, than to leave so many Men, either our Kindred or Countrymen, unto intollerable Slavery.

XXIV. Whether such a Redemption can be forbidden by any Law, explained.

2. Such a Law then cannot be esteemed just, unless there appear a Necessity for that Severity, purely to prevent greater, or more numerous Calamities, which are otherwise morally unavoidable. For in such a Necessity, as the Prisoners themselves, by the Law of Charity, should patiently bear their hard Fortune, they may be laid under an Obligation to it, and others prohibited to do any Thing to draw them from it, according to what we have [a] said in another Place, that a Citizen may be delivered up for the Good of the Publick.

XXV. Prisoners taken in War are not made Slaves, by our Laws or Customs. Yet I doubt not, but that Right of demanding a Ransom from one so taken, may be transferred by the Captor to another, for Nature allows even incorporeal Things to be alienated.

XXV. The Right in a Prisoner may be transferred.

XXVI. And the same Person may be indebted for his Ransom to several Men; as if discharged by one, before he paid his Ransom, he be taken by another; for these are distinct Debts, from distinct Causes.

XXVI. The Ransom of one may be due to more than one.

XXVII. An Agreement made for a Ransom can not be made void, because the Prisoner is found to be much richer than he was thought to be; because by the [1] external Right of Nations, which is now the Matter in Question, no Man may be compelled to give a greater Price than what he first agreed for, if there was no Cheat in that Contract; as may be easily understood from what I have said [a] already concerning Agreements.

XXVII. Whether the Ransom agreed upon may be made void, if the Estate of the Person be then unknown.

XXVIII. From what has been said already, that Prisoners are not now made Slaves, it follows, that we do not acquire all their Goods in general, as was done formerly, in Consequence of the Right of Property, which one had over their Persons, as we have said [a] in another Place. The Captor then has Right to nothing but what he actually takes; wherefore, if the Prisoner can hide any Thing from him, it is none of the Captor's, because he is not possessed of it. As Paulus the Lawyer decides, against Brutus and Manilius, [1] he that seizes upon a Field, cannot be said to possess the Treasure that is buried there, because he knows not of it; for no Man can possess what he knows not of; whence it follows, that what is so concealed may help to pay for his Ransom, [2] he having still kept the Property of it.

XXVIII. What Goods of a Prisoner belong to the Captor.

[725]

XXIX. 1. There is also another Query, whether a Ransom agreed upon, and not paid before the Prisoner's Death, is to be recovered from the Heir; the Answer is easy in my Opinion: If he died in Prison there is nothing due, for the Agreement was made upon Condition that he should be set at Liberty; but he that is dead can not be so. On the contrary, if he die, being set at Liberty, it shall be due; because he had already gained that for which the Ransom was promised.

XXIX. Whether the Heir be chargeable with the Prisoner's Ransom.

2. I freely own, that the Contract may be so made, that the Ransom shall be simply due from the very Moment of the Contract, and the Captive shall still be detained, not as a Prisoner of War, but as one engaged for himself. So, on the contrary, the Covenant may be so made, that the Money of the Ransom shall be only then due, if the Prisoner be alive, and at Liberty, upon a Day prefixed. But such Sort of Clauses not being very natural, are not presumed, without evident Proofs.

XXX. Here is one Query more, whether he is obliged to return to Prison, who was released on Condition of releasing another, if that other die before the Releasement. I have proved [a] elsewhere, that in regard to gratuitous Promises, the Promiser has performed his Word, if he has omitted nothing to engage a third Person to do such or such a Thing; but a Promise being made upon a valuable Consideration, the Promiser stands obliged to the full Value, that he promised. So in this very Case, he that is released, is not obliged to return into Custody; for that was not stipulated in the Agreement: And Liberty is a Cause too favourable for presuming a tacit Convention. But neither ought the Prisoner to enjoy Liberty for nothing; but shall [1] pay the Value of what he could not perform. For this is more agreeable to the Simplicity of natural Right, than what the Expositors of the Roman Laws have delivered unto us concerning an Action Praescriptis verbis (in prefixed Terms) or a personal Action, [2] Ob causam datam, causâ non secutâ (for a Thing given and a Thing not following).

XXX. Whether he that is released to free another ought to return, the other being dead.

CHAPTER XXII ↩

Concerning the Faith of inferior Powers in War.

I. Among publick Agreements Ulpian [1] reckons this as one, When the I. The several Kinds of Commanders. Generals of each Army agree some Things between themselves. I promised, that after having discoursed on Faith given by Sovereign Powers, to say something of that given by Inferior ones, either between themselves, or unto others; whether those Powers be immediately next to the Sovereign, such as Generals, so called by way of Excellency; to which we may apply that of Livy, [2] We allow no other as General, but he to whose Conduct the whole War is committed; or those of a lower Rank, whom Caesar thus distinguishes, [3] The Duty of a Lieutenant General is one Thing, and that of a Commander in Chief another. The one is to execute Orders, the other to do whatever he judges proper for the Management of Affairs.

II. There are two Things to be examined with respect to their Engagements. As whether they thereby engage the supreme Power, or whether themselves. The former [1] Query may be determined by what I have said [a] elsewhere, viz. That we are obliged by those whom we depute to be Ministers of our Wills, whether that Will be specially expressed, or gathered from the Nature of their Commission. For he that grants a Power, grants, as much as he can, all Things necessary to the Exercise of that Power, which in moral Things is to be morally understood. Inferior Commanders therefore may bind their Sovereigns two several Ways, either by doing that which they think is probably included in their Office, or by doing that which belongs not to it, yet have a special order to do it, which is either publicly known, or to those with whom they treat.

III. There are also other ways, where by a Sovereign Power may be obliged by the previous Facts of his Ministers, but yet not so, that that Fact is the proper Cause [727] of that Obligation, but only the Occasion of it; and that two Ways, either by consenting to it, or by the Thing itself. Their Consent will appear by their Ratification, which may be not only express, but tacit; that is, when the Sovereign had Knowledge of what passed, and yet permitted Things to be done, which cannot probably be referred to any other Cause, than the Execution of the Engagements contracted without his Participation. In what manner, and how far, this Approbation may be presumed, we have [a] shewed in another Place. By the Thing itself he may be so far obliged, as not to enrich himself by another's Loss; that is, either that he perform the Agreement, by which he is willing to receive a Benefit, or quit that Benefit; of which Equity I have also [b] treated elsewhere. And thus far, and no farther, that Saying holds true, Whatever brings Profit, is binding. On the contrary, we must condemn them of Injustice, who refuse to perform the Agreement, and yet still retain that, which they could never have had without the Agreement; as when the Roman Senate could neither approve the Fact of Cn. Domitius, nor would make it void, as Val. Maximus [1] observes: We meet with many such Examples in History.

IV. 1. And here we must repeat what we have formerly [a] said, viz. that the Sovereign is obliged by the Fact of his Agent, tho' he act contrary to his private Instructions, provided he keep within the Bounds of his publick Office. The Roman Praetor well observed this Equity in Actions relating to Factories. For not every Contract made by a Factor, [1] binds the Person that employs him, but such only as regard the Affairs for which he is appointed Factor; but [2] if it be publicly notified, that no Man should henceforward contract with him, he shall not be any longer treated with as an Agent. But tho' such a Declaration be made, [3] yet if it be not known to the Contractors, he that employed him shall be obliged. It must likewise be considered, [4] on what Foot the Factor was appointed: For if he was ordered to treat under certain Conditions, or by the Intervention of a certain Person, he ought necessarily to follow the Method prescribed him; in Default of which, we have a Right to disown what he has done.

2. Whence it follows, that Kings or People, some more, some less, may be bound by the Contracts of their Generals, if their Laws and Constitutions be sufficiently known. But if they be not well known, we must follow the most probable Conjectures, which always suppose that to be within their Power, without which they cannot well discharge the Functions of their Office.

3. If a publick Minister exceeds his Commission, and promise more, than he can perform, he himself shall be bound to full Restitution, unless some well known Law shall hinder it. Or if there be any Deceit in it, as if the Minister should pretend to a greater Power than really he has, he shall then be bound also to make Satisfaction for the Damages consequent thereto; nay, he may be punished for his Deceit, in Proportion to the Greatness of the Crime. In the former Case his Goods are liable to make a Recompence, but if they are not sufficient, his Service or corporal Liberty. In the latter also, his Person or his Goods, or both, according to the Greatness of his Crime: But as to what I have said of Deceit, it will not be enough in Case of it, to declare beforehand, that he will not oblige himself, for both Satisfaction [728] faction for Damages received, and Punishment for an Offence committed are due, [5] not by a voluntary, but by a natural Connection.

V. But because in all such Agreements either the Sovereign, or his Ministers, stands obliged, therefore by Consequence the other Party stands engaged likewise, neither can it be said the Contract is imperfect. Thus we have done with the comparing the inferior Powers to their Superiors.

V. In such a Case whether the other Party stands obliged?

VI. Let us also see, what Power they have over their Inferiors; neither is it to be doubted, but that a General may oblige his Soldiers, and a Magistrate those of his Town, as far as the Power they generally have to command them extends; for as to other Things, there must be a Consent on their Part. On the contrary, an Agreement made by a General or Magistrate in Things merely advantageous, shall always turn to the Profit of the Inferiors; for that is plainly included in the Power of the Superior, and in such Things as may be burthensome, provided those Burdens are usually exacted, but otherwise not without their Acceptance: Which Things agree to what we have [a] already established concerning the Effect which, according to the Law of Nature, a Stipulation has in favour of a third Person. But these Generals will be more clearly illustrated by handling of the Particulars.

VI. What the Generals in War, or Magistrates may do concerning their Inferiors, or for them.

VII. [1] It does not belong to a General to examine the Causes, or Consequences of a War, for it is his Business to manage the War, not to conclude it, no, tho' he has an unlimited Power in his Commission, that being only understood of the Conduct of War. Agessilaus thus answered the Persians, [2] It was only in the Power of the State to make Peace. Therefore the Roman Senate made void that Peace, which Albinus made with King Jugurtha, as Salust [3] tells us, because it was made without the Order of the Senate. And in [4] Livy, How can that Peace be established, which is made without the Authority of the Senate, or Decree of the People of Rome? Therefore the Treaty made at the Furcae Caudinae, and at Numantia, did not bind the People of Rome, as we have [a] shewed in another Place. And thus far is that of Posthumius true, [5] If there be any Thing to which the People may be obliged, they may to all Things; that is, those Things that do not belong to the Conduct of War; and this is evident from what that

VII. It is not in the Power of Generals to make a Peace.

General had said just before concerning Conventions, whereby one should engage that the City of Rome should surrender, or that the Romans should abandon it, or set Fire to it; or that they should change the Form of their Government.

VIII. [1] To grant a Truce is in the Power not only of a General, but of inferior Commanders, that is, unto those whom either they attack or besiege, as far as it concerns [729] them, and the Forces under their Command. For they cannot thereby oblige [2] other Commanders who are equal to them, as the History of Fabius and Marcellus in Livy informs us.

VIII. Whether he may grant a Truce? This is distinguished.

IX. 1. It is not in the Power of Generals to release Persons or dispose of Sovereignties, or Lands gained in a War; upon which Account Syria was taken from Tigranes, [1] tho' Lucullus had bestowed it upon him; neither could Masinissa release Sophonisba, whom he had taken in War, [2] for Scipio maintained, that she was under the Power, and at the Discretion of the People of Rome: But as to other Things, which are by way of Prey, the General has some Power given him to dispose of them, yet not so much by Virtue of his Authority, as from the Custom of each Nation, of which we have said [a] enough before.

IX. What Protection of Persons, or Things, may be granted by them.

2. But as to Things not as yet actually possessed, it is certainly in the General's Power to grant or leave them; because in War many Cities and Men often surrender themselves, upon Condition of preserving their Lives or Liberties, or sometimes their Goods, concerning which the present Circumstances do not commonly allow so much Time as to consult the Sovereign. By a Parity of Reason, this Right ought to be granted to inferior Commanders concerning Things within the Extent of their Commission. Maharbal in the Absence of Hannibal had promised to some Romans that had escaped at the Battle of Thrasymene, to give them not only their Lives, as Polybius [3] too concisely expresses it, but also, upon delivering up their Arms, to let them depart every one [4] with a Suit of Cloaths. Hannibal detained them under Pretence [5] That Maharbal had not Power to grant such Security, without his Approbation, to People that surrendered themselves. And Livy censures his Action thus. [6] Hannibal kept his Faith like a true Carthaginian.

3. Wherefore let us consider M. Tully rather as an Orator, than a Judge, in the Cause of Rabirius. He would argue that Saturninus was lawfully killed by him, tho' Marius the Consul had got him out of the Capitol upon Promise of Life. [7] How could [730] Faith (says he) be given, without a Decree of the Senate? And so would infer, that the Faith given by Marius did only oblige himself; but C. Marius was empowered by the Senate to do whatever he should judge proper for maintaining the Empire and Majesty of the Roman People. This was the greatest Authority that could be [8] given according to the Custom of the Romans: And who can say that it did not include the Right of granting Impunity to any one, if that were absolutely necessary for the Security of the State?

X. But in these Agreements made by Generals, because they act for another, the strictest Interpretation is to be taken, as far as the Nature of the Contract will allow, that by their Fact their Sovereign be not more obliged than he is willing, or themselves suffer Damage in doing their Duty.

X. Such Agreements are to be taken in a strict Sense, and why.

XI. So he that is accepted of by a General upon an absolute Surrender, shall be judged to yield himself wholly to the Will of the Conqueror, whether of the King or People. An Instance of which we have in Gentius, King of Illyria, [1] and Perseus of Macedon, of which the former yielded to Anicius, the other to Paulus.

XI. How a Surrender accepted by a General is to be understood.

XII. Wherefore the adding of this Caution, It shall be established if the Sovereign ratify it, which we often find in Agreements, will provide, that if the Agreement be not allowed by the Sovereign, the General himself shall be bound to nothing, except so far as he has reaped an Advantage by the Convention.

XII. How that Caution is to be understood, if the King or People please.

XIII. And they who have engaged to deliver up a Town, may dismiss their Garrisons, as we read the Locrians did.

XIII. How the Promise of delivering up a Town is to be understood.

CHAPTER XXIII ↩

Of Faith given by private Men in War.

I. That Saying of Cicero [1] is well known, Whatsoever any private Person, urged by Necessity, shall promise to the Enemy, even in that very Thing he must keep his Faith. Private here implies, either Soldier or any other Person that does not bear Arms, for Faith is to be kept by all. It is surprizing then, that any Lawyers should maintain, That Faith in publick Agreements made with the Enemy is to be kept, but not in private; for if private Persons have particular Rights which they can engage, and an Enemy be capable of acquiring some Rights, what should hinder such an Obligation? Besides, unless this be allowed, there would be an Occasion given for Massacres, and a Bar to Liberty; for if private Faith were not held obligatory, the Lives of Prisoners oftentimes could not be saved, nor their Liberty procured.

I. That Faith given by private Men in War is not binding, confuted.

II. Further, not only to those who are Enemies by the Law of Nations, but even [1] to Robbers and Pirates, we are to keep our private Faith, as we have said [a] above concerning publick Conventions made with such People; with this Difference, that if an unjust Fear, occasioned by the other, shall force a Promise from us, the Promiser [b] may demand Restitution, and upon Refusal may take it upon himself; which could not be done, if the Fear proceeded from a publick War according to the Law of Nations. But if that Promise were confirmed by an Oath, the Promiser must indispensibly perform his Word, unless he would be perjured. But if such [c] a Perjury be committed against a publick Enemy, it is commonly [731] punished by Men; but if against Thieves, or Pirates, it remains unpunished in Detestation of those, with whom we had to do.

II. Faith given to Pirates and Robbers is binding, and how far.

III. In this private Faith we are not to except Minors, if they are capable of understanding what they promise. [1] For the Privileges allowed to Minors arise from the civil Law; whereas we now speak of the Law of Nations.

III. A Minor here not excepted.

IV. And we have already said [a] of Promises made by Mistake, that we have a Power to retract them, when that which through Error believed, was according to the Intention of the Promiser, the Condition of the Promise.

IV. Whether an Error does excuse it.

V. 1. But how far the Power of private Men may extend in making any Contract, is a more difficult Question. It is certain, that no private Person can alienate what is publick; for if this be not allowed to Generals, as I have proved [a] a little above, much less ought it to be allowed to private Persons. But yet it is to be disputed, whether the Covenants made with their Enemies of their own private Concerns, whether Actions or Things, may stand; because we can not grant those to the Enemy, without some Damage to our own Party. Whence it may seem, that all such Covenants are unlawful, whether they be made by Subjects, on the Account of the eminent Right of their State over them, or by listed Soldiers, in regard to their military Oath.

V. An Objection made from publick Profit answered.

2. But we must observe, that such Agreements, which prevent a greater or more certain Mischief, are to be esteemed [1] rather beneficial than hurtful, even to the Publick; because a lesser Evil has comparatively the Appearance of Good: Of Evils the less is to be chosen, as one says in [2] Appian. Yet neither can that bare Faith, whereby a Man does not absolutely renounce all Power over himself, and what he has, nor can the publick Benefit, without the Authority of a Law, have that Power, as to make an Engagement void and of no Effect, tho' we should grant that what was promised was against the Duty of the Promiser.

3. The Law indeed can take away this Power from Subjects, whether perpetual or temporary, but yet it does not always do so, for it spares Citizens. Neither can it always do it, for human Laws (as I have [a] said already) have no Force to oblige, but when they are proportioned to human Infirmary, and not when they impose any Thing too burthensome, which is entirely repugnant to Reason and Nature. Therefore those Laws and particular Orders, which manifestly enjoin such Things, are not to be accounted Laws. And general Laws are to be taken in a favourable Sense, so as to exclude Cases of extreme Necessity.

4. But if that Act, which was prohibited by any Law, or particular Order, and declared void, might justly be so prohibited, then that Act of the private Person shall be made void, and he may also be punished, because he promised what was not in his Power, especially if being bound by Oath he did it.

VI. The Promise of a Captive to return unto Prison is justly tolerated, [1] because it does not render his Condition worse than it was. Therefore that Action of M. Regulus was not only glorious (as some account it) but what was his Duty. [2] Regulus, says Cicero, Ought not by his Perjury to have violated the Conditions and Covenants of War, notwithstanding what Horace says,

VI. These applied to our Faith given to return into Prison.

[3] *Atqui sciebat, quae si barbarus
Tortor pararet — — —*

*What Cords and Wheels, what Racks and Chains,
What lingring Tortures for his Pains
The barbarous Hangman made, he knew.*

Creech.

For when he promised to return he knew what they might do. So of the ten [732] Captives, as Gellius relates it from old Writers, Eight declared they had no Right of Postliminy, because [4] they were bound by Oath.

VII. 1. Some Prisoners are released upon their Promise, not to return to such a Place, or not to bear Arms against the Releaser. We have an Example of the former in Thucydides, where those [1] of Ithome promised the Lacedemonians to depart out of Peloponnesus, and never to return again: The latter is now common. There is an antient Example in Polybius, [2] where the Numidians were dismissed by Amilcar, upon Condition, That none of them should bear Arms against the Carthaginians. Procopius [a] has the like Condition in his Gotthicks.

VII. Not to return to such a Place, or bear Arms against such a Party.

2. Some maintain this Agreement to be void, because it is contrary to the Duty which we owe to our Country: But not every Thing that is against our Duty, is immediately void, as I said [b] before. Besides, it is not against our Duty, to procure our Liberty by promising to forbear a Thing, which it is in the Enemies Power to hinder. For whilst we are not released, we are as useless to our Country, as if we were really dead.

VIII. Some also promise not to make their Escape; this also binds them, tho' they were in Fetters when they made it; tho' some are of another Opinion. For by this very Promise sometimes our Lives are saved, or we have more Liberty allowed. But if after this Promise, a Person be laid in Irons, he is therefore discharged of that Promise, if he made it upon that Condition, that he should not be bound.

VIII. Not to make an Escape.

IX. It is a foolish Query some make, whether a Person taken Prisoner by one, may yield himself to another. For it is very plain, that no Man can by Contract take away that Right, which another has acquired. For by the very Right of War, or partly by the Right of War, and partly by the Grant of him that makes the War, a Prisoner taken in War belongs to the Captor, as we have said [a] before.

IX. A Captive taken by one, cannot yield himself to another.

X. There is a remarkable Question concerning the Effects of such Agreements, namely, whether private Men upon their neglecting to perform what they have promised, may be compelled to it by their Sovereign. And that they may, is the best grounded Opinion, but only in a solemn War, and that by the Right of Nations, which binds those that make War, to do what is right and just to each other, even concerning the Facts of [1] private Men; as if an Ambassador sent from the Enemy should be insulted by a private Person. Thus A. Gellius quotes out of Cornelius Nepos, [2] That many in the Senate agreed, that those of the ten Prisoners, who being obliged by Oath to return, refused, should by a strong Guard be delivered up to Hannibal.

X. Whether private Men may be compelled by their Sovereign, to perform what they have promised.

XI. We must observe those Rules which we have several Times mentioned, [a] concerning the Interpretation of Words in such Agreements, that is, we ought not to recede from the proper Signification of the Words, unless to avoid an Absurdity, or when there is any other Conjecture, sufficiently certain, of the Intention of the Promiser; so that where the Words are dubious, we are to incline rather to that Sense that is against him who gives the Conditions.

XI. What Interpretation to be allowed in such Covenants.

XII. He that agrees for his Life, has not therefore a Right to his Liberty; under the Name of Apparel, Arms are not comprehended, for they are distinct Things. [733] Aids are said then to come when they are in fight, tho' they do nothing; for the bare Presence has its Effect.

XII. How we must take these Words, Life, Apparel, the coming of Aids.

XIII. But he cannot be said to return to the Enemy, who returning privately, departs again immediately; for our Promise to return is to be so understood, that we shall be again in the Power of our Enemy; to take Advantage of an Explication quite contrary, is according to Cicero [1] a notorious Cheat, a foolish Cunning, which adds Perjury to Chicanry. [2] Gellius calls it a fraudulent Trick, branded by the Censors with Infamy, and says the Practicers of it were rendered odious and execrable.

XIII. Who may be said to return to the Enemy.

XIV. [1] In Agreements made not to surrender, if just Succours should come, we must by them understand, such as are sufficient to free us from the Danger we were in.

XIV. Succours, when said to be sufficient.

XV. This also is to be observed, if any Thing be agreed on concerning the Manner of Execution, that alone does not render the Agreement conditional: As if it be stipulated that we should pay in a certain Place, and that Place happen afterwards to change its Master.

XV. The manner of Execution makes no Condition.

XVI. We must judge of Hostages as [a] above said; for the most Part they are but a bare Accessory of the principal Engagement; but yet it may be so covenanted, that the Obligation may be alternatively understood, that is, that such a Thing shall be done, or the Hostages may be detained. But in a dubious Case, we must incline to that which is most natural, that is, that they shall be reputed as an Accessory only of the Agreement.

XVI. Of Hostages to perform such Covenants.

CHAPTER XXIV ↩

Of Faith tacitly given.

I. That some Things [1] agreed only by Silence, was not ill observed by Javolenus, which takes Place, in publick, private, and [2] mixt Agreements. I. How Faith may be given by Silence.
The Reason is this, because it is the Consent, howsoever signified and accepted, that has the Power of transferring Right. But this Consent may be declared otherwise than by Words and Letters, as we have more than once shewed [a] already. And some Signs are included in the Nature of certain Acts.

II. As for Example. He that coming from an Enemy, or a strange Country, commits himself to the Faith of another King, or People; does without doubt tacitly oblige himself to do nothing against that State, whose Protection he desires; [734] wherefore we are not to join with them [1] that justify the Act of [2] Zopyrus; for his Loyalty to his King could not justify his Treachery to those unto whom he had fled. The same may be said of Sextus [3] the Son of Tarquin, who retired to Gabii. Virgil upon Sinon, says,

[4] *Accipe nunc Danaûm insidias, & crimine ab uno
Disce Omnes — — —*

Now hear how well the Greeks their Wiles disguis'd; Behold a Nation in a Man compris'd.

Dryden.

III. So he that demands, or admits of a Parley, silently promises, [1] that during the Parley both Parties shall be secure. Livy [2] calls it a Breach of the Law of Nations, to hurt an Enemy under the Pretence of an Interview. He terms it, [3] An Interview perfidiously violated. Val. Maximus [4] passes this Censure on Cn. Domitius, who had invited Bituitus King of Auvergne to a Conference, and had entertained him as his Guest, and then treacherously bound him, His insatiable Ambition of Glory made him be perfidious. Wherefore I admire, why he that wrote the 8th Book of Caesar's Gallick Wars, whether Hirtius, or Oppius, relating the like Act of T. Labienus, adds these Words, [5] He supposed, that Comius's Infidelity might be prevented without any Imputation of Treachery to himself. Unless this be rather the Judgment of Labienus, than of the Writer.

IV. But we must not extend this tacit Consent beyond what I have said; for if those with whom we have an Interview receive no Hurt, it is no Breach of Faith to make use of that Conference to divert the Enemy from his military Projects, and in the mean while to advance our own Affairs. It is one of the innocent Artifices of War. Wherefore they who blamed the deluding of King Perseus, [1] with the Hopes of Peace, had not so much regard to Justice and Fidelity, as to a generous Mind, and martial Glory, as may be sufficiently gathered from what has been [a] already said of warlike Stratagems. Of this Kind was that Policy, by which [2] Asdrubal saved his Army out of the Ausetan Defiles; and by which Scipio Africanus the elder discovered [3] the Situation of Syphax's Camp, both recorded by Livy. Whose Example L. Sylla followed in the Social War at Esernia, as Frontinus [4] tells us.

V. There are also some dumb Signs, [1] significant through Custom; as of old [735] Hair-laces, and Branches of Olives; and among the Macedonians, [2] the Erection of Pikes; among the Romans, [3] their V. Of some dumb Signs, to which Use has given a Signification.

covering their Heads with their Shields, were Signs of a submissive Surrender, and consequently obliged to the laying down of Arms. But whether he that signifies his accepting of a Surrender, be obliged, and how far, may be easily learnt from what has been said [a] already. [4] Among us the hanging out a white Flag is a tacit Sign of demanding a Parley, and shall be as obligatory, as if expressed by Words.

VI. We have already [a] declared how far an Agreement made by a General without the Order of the State, may be believed to be tacitly approved by the Prince or People; as when the Act is fully known, and thereupon some Thing done, or not done, of which no other Reason can be given, but their Consent to their Agreement.

VII. [1] A Punishment cannot be supposed to be remitted from its being for a Time neglected; but some positive Act must necessarily intervene, which may either by itself argue a good Will, as a Treaty of Friendship; or at least so great an Opinion of the Virtue of the Person to be punished, that his former Actions may merit a Pardon, whether this Opinion be expressed by Words, or by such Actions as are usually taken to signify as much.

CHAPTER XXV ↩

The Conclusion, with Admonitions to preserve Faith and seek Peace.

I. 1. And here I hope I may make an End; not that I have said all that I. Admonition to Princes to keep their Faith. might have been said, but that which hath been said may be enough to lay a Foundation, on which if any other will build a more stately Fabrick, I shall be so far from [736] envying him, that I shall heartily thank him. Yet before I dismiss my Reader, as before, when I treated of the Design of undertaking War, I brought some Arguments to persuade all Men, to the utmost of their Power, to prevent it. So now I shall add some few Admonitions that may be of Use, both in War and after War. These Admonitions regard the Care of preserving Faith and seeking Peace. We ought to preserve our Faith for several Reasons, and amongst others, because without that we should have no Hopes of Peace. [1] For by Faith, (says Cicero) not only every State is preserved, but that grand Society of all Nations is maintained. If this be taken away, says [2] Aristotle rightly, All human Correspondence ceases.

2. Therefore the same Cicero [3] calls it detestable to break Faith, the Observation of which is the Bond of human Life, and, as Seneca [4] says, Faith is the most sacred Good of the rational Soul. Which Sovereign Princes ought the more solemnly to keep, by how much they offend with more Impunity than others. Wherefore take away Faith, [5] they will be like wild Beasts, whose Rage all Men dread. Justice indeed in other Parts, has often something that is obscure, but the Bond of Faith is self-evident, and to that End do Men engage their Faith in their Dealings, that all Doubts may be removed.

3. How much more then does it concern Princes religiously to observe their Faith, first for the sake of their Conscience, then for that of their Reputation, on which depends the Authority of their Government. Let them not then doubt, but that they who endeavour to instill into them the Art of Deceiving, practise the same they teach. Their Practices cannot possibly prosper long, which render Men unsociable to Men, and hateful to GOD.

II. Further, it is impossible that we should have a quiet Conscience, and a just Confidence in the Protection of Heaven, unless we aim at Peace in II. The Design of War to settle a firm Peace. every Thing we do throughout the whole Course of a War. For it was very truly said of Salust, [1] That wise Men, for the sake of Peace, make War. To which agrees the Opinion of St. Augustine, [2] We seek not Peace, to make War; but we make War, in order to establish Peace. Aristotle himself often condemns those Nations that make War their chief End. Violence is in itself brutish, which is yet most eminent in War; wherefore it ought to be the more carefully tempered with Clemency and Humanity, lest by too much imitating Beasts, we absolutely forget the Man.

III. A safe and honourable Peace then is not too dearly bought, at the Expence of forgiving Offenders, Damages, and Charges, especially among III. Peace to be embraced, tho' with Loss, especially among Christians. Christians; to whom our LORD bequeathed Peace, as his last Legacy, whose best Expositor St. Paul, Rom. xii. 18. Would have us live peaceably with all Men, as far as in us lies. A good Man unwillingly enters into a War, nor is willing to push it to the utmost, as Salust [1] tells us.

[737]

IV. This Reason alone might indeed be sufficient; but very often our own Interest requires it. First, when we are weaker than our Enemy, IV. Peace is profitable to the Conquered. because it is dangerous to contend long with one more mighty; and here, as at Sea, we must by some Loss redeem a greater Mischief, without listening to revenge or hope, bad Counsellors, as Livy [1] rightly calls them; which [2] Aristotle thus expresses, It is much better to part with some of our Substance to those that are stronger, than being overcome to perish with all we have.

V. Yea, and to the stronger Party Peace turns to account; because as the V. And to the Conqueror. same Livy most truly says, [1] Peace is glorious and advantageous, when we give it in our Prosperity; it is better and safer, than a hoped-for Victory. For we must consider, that the Success of War [2] is uncertain. Aristotle says, [3] We must remember how many and unforeseen Changes happen in War. Diodorus [4] in an Oration for Peace blames those, Who boast of their great Exploits done in War, as if it were not usual for Fortune to favour sometimes one Side, sometimes another. And [5] the bold Attempts of [738] desperate Men are as much to be feared, as the most violent Bitings of [6] dying Beasts.

VI. But if both Parties think they are of equal Strength then (in the VI. And to those whose Affairs are doubtful. Opinion of [1] Caesar) it is the fittest Time to treat of Peace, whilst each Party has a good Opinion of his own Strength.

VII. But Peace being made, whatever the Conditions be, they ought to VII. Peace once made to be religiously kept. be punctually observed, on account of the Faith given, the Obligation of which I have proved to be sacred and indispensable. And we ought to be very careful to avoid not only Perfidiousness, but whatsoever may exasperate the Mind. For what [1] Cicero said of private Friendship, may be fitly applied to publick. That all the Duties of Friendship are to be observed religiously at all Times, but especially when it has been renewed by a Reconciliation.

VIII. May the ALMIGHTY then (who alone can do it) impress these VIII. The Author's Wish, and the Conclusion. Maxims on the Hearts of Christian Powers; may he enlighten their Minds with the Knowledge of every Right, [1] Divine and Human, and inspire them with the constant and dutiful Sense of their being the Ministers of Heaven, ordained to govern Men; Men, for whom, of all his Creatures, [2] GOD has the greatest Regard and Affection.

END of the third and last BOOK.

---

Endnotes for Book III↩

[1] St. AUGUSTIN says, that in the midst of War itself, Faith is to be observed, and Peace endeavoured, Ut in ipsis bellis, &c. Ad Bonifac. Comit. Epist. LXX. Esto ergo, etiam bellando, pacificus, Epist. CCV. Ad eundem Bonifac. There is in PROCOPIUS, Vandalic. Lib. I. (Cap. XVI.) a fine Discourse of Belisarius to his Soldiers, wherein he shews, that those who make War, ought not to abandon Justice. PAULUS OROSIUS says, that Civil Wars are made in this Manner, when unavoidable, by Christian Princes, in the Times of Christianity. Ecce, Regibus & temporibus Christianis, &c. Lib. VII. The same Historian, speaking of Theodosius, defies all the World to instance, from the first founding of Rome, a single War undertaken so justly and so necessarily, and so successfully terminated, through the divine Providence, that neither the Battles, during it, had been very bloody, nor Victory attended with cruel Revenge. GROTIUS.

[1] See B. II. Chap. V. § 24. Num. 2. and Chap. VII. § 2. Num. 3.

[a] Victor. De jure belli, n. 15.

[2] Our Author does not mean Things essentially bad, and which, as such, cannot be lawful in any Case, or to any End whatsoever; but only those, which a Man could not do otherwise, without the necessary Connection they have with a lawful End. See what he says afterwards, at the End of Paragraph 6. Things bad in their Nature are indeed generally not necessary, with Regard to the Necessity in Question. But, admitting they were, as that is not impossible; and that a Person, for Instance, could not obtain or preserve his just Rights but by Adultery, Blasphemy, Sacrilege, Abjuration of the Religion he believes true; the Innocence of the End would neither hinder the Means from being utterly unlawful, nor discharge him from the Obligation of renouncing the most lawful Pretensions, rather than to employ such Means.

[3] Facultatem agendi in solo Societatis respectu. See our Author's Preliminary Discourse, § 7, 8. Not that the other Kinds of Rights which impose an imperfect Obligation, do not contribute to the Good of Society. But they are not absolutely necessary to maintain it in Peace; and therefore they cannot be pursued by the Methods of Force.

[b] B. ii. ch. 1. § 3. n. 3.

[c] Victor. ubi supra, n. 18, 39, 55.

[d] B. ii. ch. 2. § 10.

[4] See above, B. II. Chap. VII. § 2.

[e] Sylv. in verb. bellum, part 1. n. 10. ver. prima.

[1] This Passage has been cited above, B. II. Chap. XX. § 8. Num. 8. at the End.

[1] See THOMAS AQUINAS, II. 1. Quaest. LXXIII. Art. 8. and MOLINA, Tract. II. Disp. CXXI. GROTIUS.

[a] B. ii. ch. 1.

[b] Victor. de jure belli, n. 27.

[2] Unde nec reus est mortis, alienae, qui quum suae possessioni murorum ambitum circumduxit, aliquis ex ipsorum usu percussus interiit. Epist. ad Publicol. CLIV. Our Author cites this Passage thus in the first Edition, and in those of 1632, and 1642, the last in his Life Time. The later Editions have been changed, I know not by whom, according to the Original, in which there is murum instead of murorum ambitum, and si aliquis — — intereat for aliquis — — interiit. Our Author had followed the Reading in the Canon Law, Caus. XXIII. Quaest. V. Cap. VIII. But the Corrector of the Edition of Rome has since inserted, upon the Authority of a Manuscript in the Vatican, ex lapidibus murum circumduxerit; which is better. In the Words that follow, some Editions of the Original have ex ipsius RUINIS, instead of ex ipsorum usu. The latter Reading seems to be the best, provided it be corrected, and CASU be put for USU, as it ought in my Opinion; it being easy for such an Error to have crept in. The Sense plainly requires it; and GRONOVIVS, who is for reading prolapsus instead of percussus, was not aware that it would then be clearly and directly the Fault of him who should get upon the Wall; whereas the Question relates to certain Cases, wherein Damage seems to arise from what a Person does in Consequence of his Right; as in this Example, wherein St. AUSTIN means, that a Man has not the less Power to build a Wall, for the enclosing his Possessions, because that Wall may happen to fall down and kill somebody. Which Sense is followed in the Translation of this Passage.

[3] Multos autem occidere & indiscretos, &c. De Clement. Lib. I. Cap. XXVI. in fin.

[c] B. ii. ch. 21. § 14.

[1] At Athens it was prohibited to export Cordage, Casks, Timber, Wax, Pitch &c. See the Commentator upon ARISTOPHANES'S Comedy of the Frogs, (ver. 365.) and that of the Knights, (ver. 282.) GROTIUS.

[2] It is in that Princess's Answer to Justinian's Letter, both which PROCOPIUS recites, whom our Author quotes in the Margin. Gothic. Lib. I. Cap. III.

[3] Sed quamvis hac ita sit, &c. De Benefic. Lib. VII. Cap. XX.

[a] See Paruta, l. 7.

[4] Officere enim istud est, &c. Offic. Lib. I. Cap. XXX.

[b] See the Decretals, l. 5. tit. 6. De Judaeis. Can. 6. and 17.

[5] Our Author here supposes the Case of being reduced to the last Extremity; and then his Decision is well founded, whatever Mr. COCCEIUS says, Dissert. De Jure Belli in Amicos, § 12. wherein he only criticizes our Author, in Regard to what he advances elsewhere, that, in a Case of Necessity, the Effects become common. It is true it suffices, that at such a Time the Goods of another may be used, without even the Proprietor's Consent. But as to the following Cases, that Lawyer has Reason, in my Opinion, to say, § 15, 17. that provided that in furnishing Corn, for Instance, to an Enemy besieged, and pressed by another, it is not done with Design to deliver him from that unhappy Extremity, and the Party is ready to sell the same Goods also to the other Enemy; the State of Neutrality and Liberty of Commerce, leave the Besieger no Room for Complaint. I add, that there is the more Reason for this, if the Seller had been accustomed to traffick in the same Goods with the Besieged before the War.

[c] B. ii. ch. 2. § 10.

[d] Sylvest. verb. Restitutio. part 3. § 12.

[6] See Examples of such Declarations, in the League of Christian Princes against the Aegyptians, Saracens, and others, Can. ult. de Transact. C. signific. de Judaeis, Extrav. Copios. de Judaeis, and Can. I. Lib. V. Extravag. de Judaeis. A Book is written in Italian, entitled, Liber Consulatus Maris, in which are related the Constitutions of the Emperors of Greece and Germany, of the Kings of France, Spain, Syria, Cyprus, Majorca, and Minorca, and also of the Venetians and Genoese on this Subject. In Tit. CCLXXIV. of that Work, such Questions are treated of; and thus it is adjudged, if both the Ship and Freight belong to the Enemy, then, without Dispute, they become lawful Prize to the Captor; but if the Ship belong to those that be at Peace with us, and the Cargo be the Enemies, they may be forced by the Persons at War, to put into any of their Ports, but yet the Master must be satisfied for the Expences of the Voyage. But on the contrary, if the Ship belongs to the Enemy, and the Goods to Neuters, we must then agree for the Ship; but if the Ship-Men will not treat, they shall be forced to carry the Ship into some Port of the Captor's Party, and to pay what they owed for the Use of the Ship. In the Year 1438, there being War between the Dutch and the City of Lubec, and other Towns lying on the Baltick Sea, and the River Elb, it was adjudged in a full Assembly in Holland, that the Goods found in an Enemy's Ship, which appeared to belong to others, were not to be reputed as good Prize; and this was from that Time established there for a Law. So the King of Denmark was of the same Opinion, when in the Year 1597 he sent Embassadors to the Hollanders, and their Allies, challenging a Liberty for his Subjects to carry their Goods into Spain, with which the Dutch had the most cruel War. In France it has always been permitted for Nations at Peace to carry on Trade, even with the Enemies of the Kingdom; and that with so little Reserve, that the Enemies have often, under other Mens Names, concealed their own Goods, as appears by an Edict in the Year 1543, Chap. XLII. which was renewed in that of the Year 1584, &c. In which Edicts it is expressly provided, that their Friends might, in Time of War, exercise a free Trade, so that they did it in their own Ships, and by their own Men, and carry their Ships and Goods where so ever they pleased; provided that those Goods were not Belli instrumenta, war like Instruments, which might assist the Enemy; in which Case the French were then allowed to take them themselves, paying a just Price for them. Here are two Things to be observed, First, That warlike Ammunitions were not made Prize, much more were indifferent Merchandizes free from this Danger. I cannot deny but that the Northern Nations have sometimes acted otherwise; but the Practice there has been variable, and accommodated to the Circumstances of Times, rather than regulated by the perpetual Maxims of Equity: For when the English, upon Pretence of their Wars, stopt the Danish Traffick, there arose a War between those Nations long since, which had this Conclusion, that the Danes should lay a Tribute upon the English, called the Danish Penny, which, tho' the Cause was changed, retained its Name even to the Time of William the Conqueror, who founded the present Royal Family in England, as THUANUS, an Author of great Credit, relates in his History, on the Year 1589. Again, in the Year 1575, Sir William Winter, and Mr. Robert Beal, Secretary to the Privy Council, were sent by Queen Elizabeth, a very wise Princess, to remonstrate, that the English could not bear that the Dutch should, in the very Heat of the War between Spain and the United Provinces, detain the English Ships trading to the Spanish Ports; as RHEDANUS, in his Dutch History, on the Year 1575, and Mr. CAMBDEN, an Englishman, on the Year following. But when the English, being themselves at War with Spain, disturbed the Cities of Germany in their Trade with Spain, with what a disputable Right they did it, appears from the Writings published on both Sides, worth the Reading, in Order to understand this Controversy. And it is observable, that the English themselves acknowledged this in their own Writings; where they chiefly alledge two Things for their Cause, viz. that they were Instruments of War that were transported by the Germans into Spain; and that their antient Treaties had made it unlawful to be done: As afterwards the Dutch, and their Confederates, agreed with the Lubeckers, and their Allies, in the Year 1613, that neither Party should permit the Subjects of their Enemies to traffick within their Territories, or assist the Enemy with Money, Men, Ships, or Provisions. And after that, in the Year 1627, it was agreed between the Kings of Sweden and Denmark, that the Dane should prevent all trading with the Dantzickers, then at War with the Swede, and that he should not permit any Merchandizes to pass through Mare Cimbrium, the Sound, (or the Baltick) to any of the Swede's Enemies, for which the King of Denmark, on the other Side, had Advantages allowed him; but these are particular Agreements, from whence nothing can be inferred that may be obligatory to all; for the Germans also alledged in their Writings, that all Merchandizes were not prohibited by Agreements, but those which had been once imported into England, or were procured in England. Neither did only the Germans blame the English, for denying them to trade with their Enemies, but the Poles also complained by their Ambassador, that the Law of Nations was violated, because, on England's War with Spain, they were denied the Liberty of trading with the Spaniard, as the aforesaid CAMBDEN and RHEDANUS relate, on the Year 1597. But the French, after the Peace of Vervins, Elizabeth, Queen of England, still continuing the War, being importuned by the English, that it might be lawful to search the French Ships trading to Spain, lest any warlike Stores might be concealed, would by no Means grant it, alledging, that it was only a Pretence for Rapine, and to disturb Trade. And in that Treaty which the English made with the Dutch, and their Allies, in the Year 1525, it was agreed, that other Nations, whom it concerned to lessen the Power of the Spaniard, should be asked to forbid all Commerce with Spain; and if they did not do it freely, then that the Ships should be searched, whether they had in them any warlike Stores; but further than this, that neither the Ships nor Goods should be detained, or any Hurt done upon that Pretence, to those in Peace. And it happened in the same Year, that some Hamburgers were going with a Ship into Spain, laden, for the most Part, with warlike Provisions, all which was challenged by the English (as Prize) but they paid the just Value for the other Goods. But the French, when their Ships going into Spain were confiscated by the English, declared that they would not endure it. We had Reason therefore to say, that publick Declarations are requisite, which also the English themselves were sensible of; by whom there is an Instance of such a Declaration made, in CAMBDEN, about the Year 1591, and 1598. Neither are such Notifications always regarded, but Times, Places, and Causes are distinguished: For, in the Year 1458, the City of Lubeck did not think itself obliged to take Notice of the Declaration the Dantzickers made to them, not to traffick with the Malgenses and Memelenses, then at Enmity with Dantzick. Neither did the Dutch observe it in the Year 1551, when the Lubeckers declared to them, that they should not trade with Denmark, with which they were then at War. But in the Year 1522, when there was War between the Swedes and Danes, when the Danes desired of the Hanse Towns to have no Commerce with Sweden, some Cities indeed that stood in need of his Friendship complied with him, but the others did not. The Dutch, when the War was hot between the Swede and the Pole, never suffered trafficking with either Nation to be interrupted, but always restored to the French what Ships the Holland Vessels had intercepted, either returning from Spain or going to Spain, with which they were then at War. See the Discourse of LUDOVICUS SERVINUS, formerly the King's Advocate, which he made in the Year 1592, in the Affair of the Hamburgers. But the same Dutch would not suffer the English to carry any Goods into Dunkirk, where they had then a Fleet: As the Dantzickers declared to the Dutch, in the Year 1455, that they should carry nothing into the City of Koningsberg, according to GASPAR SOUTZIUS, in his Prussian History. See CABET. Decis. XLIII. Num. 2. and SERAPHIN. De Freitas, in Lib. de justo Imper. Lusitan. Asiat. where he quotes several other Authors. GROTIUS.

- [7] The most learned JOHANNES MEURSIUS has many Things of this Subject, in his Danish History, B. I. and XI. where you will find the Lubeckers and the Emperor for Commerce, and the Danes against it. See also CRANTZIUS, Vandal. B. XIV. THUANUS, on the aforesaid Year 1589, B. of Hist. XCVI. CAMBDEN, besides the abovementioned Places on the Years 1589 and 1595 where that Dispute between the English and the Hanse Towns is treated of. GROTIUS.

[e] Polyb. 1. 1. c. 73.

[f] Plut. Demetr.

[8] Not much unlike to this is what PLUTARCH relates of Pompey, in his History of the Mithridatick War, He set Guards at the Bosphorus, to observe if any sailed into the Bosphorus, and whosoever were caught were put to Death. Vit. Pomp. (p. 639.) GROTIUS.

[1] VI. (1) Ἡ δόλω, &c. So our Author quotes that Verse from HOMER. But all he says is:

Ἄυτάρ ἐπεὶ μνηστῆρας ἐνὶ μεγάροισι τεοῖσι
Κτείνης, ἧὲ δόλω ἢ ἀμφοδὸν ὄξει χαλκῷ, &c.

Odyss. Lib. XI. Ver. 118, 119. It is the Shade of Tiresias who tells Ulysses, that when he returns Home he will kill his Wife's Suitors, either by Fraud or open Force. See also B. I. Ver. 295, 296. where Minerva says the same Thing to Telemachus. Our Author has taken the Verse he recites from the Collections of STOBÆUS, who ascribes it to Antigonus, as made by him in Imitation of the antient Poet: Ἀντίγονος ἐρωτηθεὶς, πῶς ἄν τις ἐπιθῆτο τοῖς πολεμίοις, εἶπεν Ἡ δόλω, &c. Florileg. Tit. LIV. (or LI.). De Imperatoribus, &c. p. 365. Edit. Gesner 1549.

[2] Isthm. Od. IV. 81, 82.

[3] Upon Occasion of some Trojans who had put on the Arms of the Greeks their Enemies:

Mutemus clypeos, Danaumque insignia nobis
Aptemus. Dolus, an virtus, quis in hoste requirat?

Aeneid. Lib. II. Ver. 389, 390. And one of those who uses this Strategem, is ranked amongst the justest and most virtuous of the Trojans:

Hoc Rhiphaeus, hoc ipse Dymas, omnisque juvenus
Laeta facit — —
— — Cedit & Rhiphaeus justissimus unus,
Qui fuit in Teucris, & servantissimus aequi.

(Ver. 394, 426, 427.)

[4] Our Author no doubt speaks of the Stratagem used by Solon for taking the Island of Salamis. See his Life in PLUTARCH, p. 82. Vol. I. Edit. Wech.

[5]

— — Tacitusque quiete
Exin virtuti placuit dolus — —
De bello Punic.

II. Lib. XV. Ver. 326, 327.

[6] He not only speaks of War, but of all Cases, in which Fraud is the means, or Remedy, for extricating People out of Danger, as the Falshoods made use of by Ulysses for his own Preservation, and to obtain the return of his Companions. In Philopseud. circa init. p. 326, 327. Edit. Amstel. Vol. II.

[7] De Magister. Equit. Cap. V. Num. 9. Edit. Oxon. See also his De Cyr. Institut. Lib. I. Cap. VI.

[8] Lib. V. Cap. IX. Edit Oxon. What THUCYDIDES expresses here by the Word κλέμματα, VIRGIL calls also Belli furta, Aen. Lib. XI. (Ver. 515.) upon which the Grammarian SERVIUS cites a like Passage in SALLUST : Gentis ad furta belli peridoneae. GROTIUS.

The last Passage is a Fragment which I find in NONIUS MARCELLUS at the Word Furtum, p. 310. Edit. Paris. Mercer. See Mr. WASSE's Note upon that Fragment, Addend. p. 291. col. 2. It is in Lib. I. Cap. XX. of the Collection.

[9] Apophthegm. Laconic. p. 209. B. Vol. II. Edit. Wech.

[10] Lib. IX. Cap. XI. p. 766, 767. ISAAC CASAUBON translates the Word ἐλάττω in this Passage, in a Manner which would render the Application of it not very just, pauciora esse, &c. But that learned Interpreter does not seem to have given sufficient Attention to the Connection of the Discourse, and was led into the Mistake by the Word πλείω in the following Period, which in Reality implies the Number, and not the Quality of the Actions in Question; from whence he probably believed that the Word ἐλάττω should be taken in the same Sense in the preceding Period: Whereas the Historian's Thought is, that the Conduct of a Stratagem in War is not only of greater Consequence, but more difficult; Experience proving, that People more often miscarry than succeed in it: Ὅτι γε μᾶλλον αὐτῶν, &c. By all which he intends to prove, that the Use of Stratagems is very laudable. So that our Author was in the right to translate, quae vi fiunt in bello minoris censenda, &c. And I find, that JUSTUS LIPSIUS understood this Passage in the same Sense, which he quotes in his Politic, Lib. V. Cap. XVII. where he expresses it thus: Facinorum militarium ea esse minoris laudis ac momenti, &c.

[11] Thus our Author cites this Verse with Reason, which agrees with the best Manuscript unless it be better to read dextrae than dextra, as the last Editor Mr. DRAKENBORG, Professor at Utrecht, has done in his Text. The vulgar Editions have indice dextrae; of which CELLARIUS has made, indice dextrâ, and explains it in this Manner: Si actiones bellicae, prius quam fiant, quasi indice digito hostibus praemonstrentur. But this Explication is contrary to the Design of the General, who speaks. He intends to shew, as appears by what goes before, that the Resolution he takes to make use of Stratagem, is not only necessary with regard to the Conjuncture, but that it will not be less glorious for him to succeed that Way than by mere Force. Whereas according to CELLARIUS, he would say on the contrary, that Exploits are more glorious, when performed by open Force. Besides, this Interpretation is somewhat forced, and is not supposed by any Example of an Expression, that seems extraordinary enough. What our Author observes with great Probability, that this is an Imitation of a Passage in POLYBIUS, which we have seen in Note 10. serves also to confirm the Manner, in which he gives the Verse. He cites here also in a Note a like Thought from the ALCORAN, in which Mahomet says, that War makes Deceit necessary. He remarks further that VIRGIL puts not only Anger, but Ambuscades in the Retinue of the God Mars:

— — *Circumque atrae Formidinis ora
Iraeque insidia que Dei comitatus aguntur.*

Aeneid. XII. 335, 336. Upon which SERVIUS the Grammarian says, that the Poet intends to signify, that Stratagem is necessary in War, as well as Valour: Non tantum virtute, sed insidiis comitatum se ostendit.

[12] Vit. Marcell. p. 311. A. B. Vol. I. Edit. Wech.

[13] Vit. Lysandr. p. 437. The Historian does not speak there of his own Head, and those whose Opinion he gives blamed on the contrary that Conduct, as appears by what follows and goes before.

- [14] PLUTARCH compares him to Sylla, in whose Mind Carbo said, there was the Lion and the Fox. Vit. Syll. p. 469. F.
- [15] Vit. Philopoem. p. 363. E.
- [16] It is in Sapores's Letter to the Emperor Constantius, where that Prince says, this Maxim of the Romans had never been received by his People: Illud apud nos nunquam, &c. Lib. XVII. Cap. V. p. 179. Edit. Vales. Gron.
- [17] Non fuit autem contentus, &c. Digest, Lib. IV. Tit. III. De dolo malo, Leg. 1. § 3. See Mr. NOODT's Treatise, De forma emendandi doli mali, Cap. I.
- [18] Digest, Nihil interest, &c. Lib. LXIX. Tit. XV. De Captiv. & Postlim. &c. Leg. XXVI.
- [19] Quum autem justum bellum suscipitur, &c. Quaest. X. super Joshua. Our Author has changed some Terms in this Place, from having followed the Summary of a Canon, in which this Passage is recited. Caus. XXIII. Quaest. II. Can. II.
- [20] The Passage will be cited below, § 17. Note 2.
- [1] That is to say, when by not saying or doing a Thing, we designedly give room to others to believe, what we know is false. From whence may easily be discerned wherein deceiving by a positive Act consists.
- [2] LABEO autem posse & sine dissimulatione, &c. Digest, Lib. IV. Tit. III. De Dolo malo, Leg. I. § 2.
- [3] Quod si Aquiliana definitio vera est, &c. De Offic. Lib. III. Cap. XV. I have already observed upon Law of Nature and Nations, B. IV. Chap. I. § 9. Note 5. that CICERO speaks only of a Feint and Dissimulation attended with Injustice and Breach of Faith. Our Author himself cites that great Orator below, § 9. amongst those who believed some Lies innocent.
- [4] Licet veritatem occultare, &c. Lib. contra Mendacium, Cap. X. The same Father says in another Place, that there is a Difference between lying and concealing the Truth. Quoniam aliud est, &c. In Psalm v. vers. Perdes omnes. The Passage is cited in the CANON LAW, Caus. XXII. Quaest. II. Cap. XIV. See THOMAS AQUINAS II. 2 Quaest. LXXI. Art. III. in Resp. ad tertium: As also SYLVEST. in verb. Bellum, Part I. Num. 9. GROTIUS. The first Passage of St. AUSTIN, cited here by our Author, is not totidem verbis in the two Treatises of that Father contra Mendacium: But I find the Sense of it in the Chapter of the second Treatise, to which he refers, where the Example of our Saviour JESUS CHRIST is alledged; who did not lie in telling his Disciples that he had many Things to say to them, but that they could not yet bear them: non autem hoc est occultare veritatem, &c. Lib. contra Mendac. Cap. X.
- [5] Our Author refers us here in the Margin to Orat. pro Milon. and that pro Plancio, & Lib. VII. Epist. IX. The last Citation is false as well as many others, which I correct without taking Notice, for the Passage is in Letter VIII. of B. X. and moreover the Letter is not CICERO's but PLANCIUS's who in giving an account of the Conduct he had observed during the Troubles of the Republick, says, that he had been obliged against his Will to feign and dissemble many Things to attain his Ends: Ita nunquam diffitebor, multa me, ut ad effectum horum consiliorum, &c. The Passage of the Oration for Milo, relates to a different Thing. The Orator endeavours to excuse Pompey, for having given Credit, upon too slight Grounds, to the false Reports, which had been spread concerning Milo: He says for that Purpose, that those who have the Government of the State in their Hands are obliged to hear too many Things, and that they cannot avoid doing so: Laudabam equidem incredibile, &c. Cap. XXIV. I am deceived if this Mistake of our Author did not arise from his having the Politicks of JUSTUS LIPSIUS before him, when he quoted this Passage; which Author, in this, as he does in many other Places, applies the last Words to a Subject different from that upon which they were writ. For he also quotes the two other Passages; of which the last, that remains to be examined, is more to the Purpose. CICERO says, that the People are pleased to give their Suffrages in such a manner, as will leave them at Liberty to carry fair with every Body, and to conceal their Inclination to favour some Competitors more than others: Etenim si populo grata est tabella, &c. Orat. pro Plancio, Cap. VI.

[a] See St. Chrysostom, De Sacerdot. l. 1.

[6] St. AUSTIN says, that the Patriarch did not lie, and that he only concealed the Truth: Sed veritatem voluit celari, non mendacium dici. In GENES. Quaest. XXVI. This Passage is quoted in the Canon Law, Caus. XXII. Quaest. II. Can. XXII. GROTIUS.

See PUFENDORF, Law of Nature and Nations, B. IV. Chap. I. § 11. That Chapter with the Notes should be always compared with this Place, as it treats the same Subject with more Extent and Exactness. As to the Words of St. AUSTIN, which our Author cites, they are indeed so conceived in the Canon referred to; but they are not to be found in Question XXVI. upon Genesis. Which proceeds, as is remarked upon that Canon, from its being composed of different Passages of St. AUSTIN, which GRATIAN has joined together. That Father expresses himself in this manner upon the same Subject in his second Treatise cont. Mendac. Aliquid ergo veri tacuit, non falsi aliquid dixit, quando tacuit uxorem, dixit sororem. Ad CONSTANTIUM, Cap. X. CLEMENS ALEXANDRINUS observes, that Abraham intimates that it was not lawful in those Times to marry a Sister by the same Mother; by which he evidently supposes, that Sarah was actually the Sister of that Patriarch by the Father, and not merely a Relation in some more remote Degree. Strom. Lib. II. Cap. XXIII. p. 502. Edit. Oxon. I find the Passage has been already cited by Mr. LE CLERC, upon the twentieth Chapter of Genesis, where the Story is related. The late Mr. BAYLE relates it also in the Article Sarah of his Historical and Critical Dictionary, (p. 2536. col. 2. of the third Edition) but he explains the Word ὁμομητρίας, as only signifying an Uterine Sister. And indeed that is the proper Sense of the Term. But I do not know whether CLEMENS ALEXANDRINUS has not improperly taken it for a Sister both by Father and Mother. Thus he understands by the Word Polygamy, the Condition both of those who have Wives at the same Time, and of those who have several one after another, as appears from the Passage recited below, Chap. IV. of this B. III. § 2. Note 3.

[1] There was a People of Ethiopia according to PLINY, who had not the Use of Speech, and conveyed their Meaning to each other by nodding their Heads, and by various Motions of the other Parts of the Body: Quibusdam pro sermone nutus motusque membrorum est. Hist. Natural. Lib. VI. Cap. XX. The Roman Lawyers have decided, that if those who cannot speak express their Thoughts by the Efforts, which they make to be understood in some other Manner, and by an inarticulate Voice, such Endeavours ought to be deemed a sufficient Declaration of their Will, which otherwise ought to be declared in Words: Nam etsi prior atque potentior est, quam vox, mens dicentis, &c. Digest, Lib. XXXIII. Tit. X. De Supellectile legata, Leg. VII. § 2. in fn. In the Decretals, it is said that a deaf, and a dumb Person may enter into a Contract of Marriage, by making known their Consent by Signs: Nam Surdi & Muti possunt, &c. Lib. IV. Tit. I. De Sponsalib. & Matrim. Cap. XXV. GROTIUS.

[2] It is in a Law, where he says; It is not by the Figure of the Letters used in writing, but by the Words they represent, that an Obligation is contracted; insomuch as it has been thought fit, that the Writing should have the same Force, as what is signified by Word of Mouth: Non figura literarum, sed oratione, quam exprimunt literae obligamur, &c.

Digest, Lib. XLIV. Tit. VII. De obligat. & action. Leg. XXXVIII. The Lawyer expresses himself in a very philosophical Manner in saying placuit, it has been thought fit, &c. for he thereby insinuates that the Use of Signs is the Effect of a Convention, ἐκ συνθήκης. GROTIUS.

[3] This Distinction is scarce better founded than that of the Law of Nations, with which our Author compares it, and in which we have elsewhere shewn the want of Solidity. All the Obligation that is here consists in this; that when a Person is bound to declare his Thoughts, as that cannot be done but by Signs capable of making them known to those he is concerned with, it is commonly necessary for him to employ such as are most used, because there are none more known by all the World, nor consequently more suitable to that Purpose. See what I have said in the Chapter of PUFENDORF, which answers to this, § 5. So that the Difference between Words, Characters, Gestures and other Signs, consists in this, that the Use of the latter being less common; or rather, Use not having given them a determinate Signification, they are not of themselves proper to convey clearly the Sense of the Person that employs them: So that whilst they have no fixed and determinate Meaning either one way or other, they cannot be considered as Signs, upon which there is room to rely. And if it be incumbent on Persons not to use them, when they foresee that others will explain them in a certain Sense, contrary to their Intent, it is not upon account of the Error considered in itself, but of the accidental Consequence, of which our Author speaks, and which we are otherwise obliged to prevent by Virtue of a Law of Nature, whereby we are to avoid all Things that may occasion Evil, directly or indirectly, to those who have not deserved it. Now this would also take Place, admitting that the same Effect should result from the Use of Speech; if, for Instance, we had Reason to believe, that a Person, either thro' Ignorance, Distraction, or otherwise, should take in a wrong Sense what we say to him in the most common and clear Terms.

[4] De Interpret. Cap. IV.

[a] St. Aug. De Doct. Christ. 1. 2. c. 24.

[5] As Michal did to save David her Husband. 2 Samuel xix. 16. GROTIUS.

[6] CLEMENS ALEXANDRINUS reasons almost in the same Manner upon this Example; and I am surprized that our Author has not made Use of that Authority. That Father says that St. Paul thus became all Things to all Men out of Condescension; and that without departing from the fundamental Principles of the Christian Religion, he gained all the World by such Management, which cannot be treated as Falshood, properly so called. Stromat. Lib. VI. Cap. XV. p. 802. Edit. Oxon.

[7] Thus St. CHRYSOSTOM says it ought to be called, and not ὑπάτην Deceit, in his first Book De Sacerdot. And again, the same Author upon 1 Cor. iv. 6. This was no Cheat but a certain Compliance and Condescension. And again, on ix. 20. That he might convert those that are really so, he became such in Appearance only, and did the same Things as they, but not with the same Intention. To this we may refer the counterfeit Madness of David, (1 Sam. xxi. 13.) GROTIUS.

See a Passage of St. CYRIL, which will be cited below, § 13. Note 2. and that of CLEMENS ALEXANDRINUS quoted in Note 6.

[8] These Words that our Author quotes without mentioning the Place from which he takes them, are in Stromat. Lib. VII. Cap. IX. p. 863. Edit. Oxon. a little after the Passage, which he cites below, § 14. Note 10. in as loose a Manner. The Father speaks in both of his Gnostick.

[b] Liv. Lib. 5: c. 48.

[c] See Sylvest. verb. Bellum. Part 1. n. 8.

[1]

Ἐχθρὸς γὰρ μοι κείνους, &c.

Iliad. Lib. IX. Ver. 312, 313.

[2]

Καλὸν μὲν οὖν, &c.

This is a Fragment of a Tragedy that is lost, intitled Creusa, preserved by STOBÆUS, Florileg. Tit. XII.

[3]

ψευδὸς δὲ μισεῖ πᾶς ὁ φρόνιμος καὶ σοφός

STOBÆUS has also preserved us this Verse in the same Place, Tit. XII. where is also another very like it, which immediately follows, attributed by the common Editions to MENANDER; but in that of our Author, which he revised upon the Manuscript it is called anonymous.

ψευδὸς δὲ μισεῖ πᾶς σοφός καὶ χρήσιμος

[4] Ethic. Nicomach. Lib. IV. Cap. XIII. p. 55. C. Vol. II. Edit. Paris.

[5] St. IRENAEUS tells us, he was taught this Maxim by an old Priest; that we ought not to condemn those Things which the holy Scriptures relate simply, without censure: De quibus Scripturae non increpant, sed simpliciter sunt positae, nos non debere fieri accusatores, Lib. IV. Cap. L. GROTIUS.

The Maxim laid down by this good Priest so generally, is undoubtedly false. But it is certain that of all those Things, on which the Scripture decides nothing clearly and incontestably in regard to their Nature, there is not one, whereof we find so many Examples in holy Writ, as of those innocent Lies, practised by virtuous Persons without scruple of Conscience. Besides, as MOSES AMYRAUT observes in his Christian Morals, “There are many Places where the Faults of the faithful are related without blame in the Word of GOD; but it is only in the History of these officious Lies, that the Holy Spirit has commended them, in regard to Rahab and the Midwives of Egypt, who were praised and rewarded.” Vol. III. p. 283.

[6] Some of those Passages will be cited below.

[7] He confesses this in his Questions upon LEVITICUS : Sed utrum haec aliqua compensatione, &c. Quaest. LXVIII.

[8] Magna quaestio, latebrosa tractatio, dispensatio inter doctos alternans. De Mendacio, Cap. I. Our Author himself, after the first Edition of his Book, in a Letter wherein he asks the Advice of the celebrated GERARD JOHN VOSSIUS, concerning a new Edition he was preparing, confesses that the Question about Lying was one of those that puzzled him most: Aestuo enim in nonnullis quaestionibus, maxime illa de Mendacio, &c. Part I. Epist. CCXVIII. But this Difficulty arose from his not knowing perfectly the Topick of the Question, because he had not sufficiently dived into the Nature of the Thing, and the simple Principles of natural Right.

[9] It is XENOPHON who has preserved the Thoughts of that great Philosopher, in his Memoirs of his remarkable Actions and Sayings. He makes Euthydemus, with whom he discourses, agree, that there is no Injustice either in deceiving an Enemy or even a Friend for his good: And he proposes, by way of Example, a General of an Army, who to raise the drooping Courage of his Soldiers, tells them, that Aid will soon arrive; tho' he knows that it is not true; and a Father, who seeing his Son's Aversion for a Remedy necessary to his Health, makes him take it by way of Food, Lib. IV. Cap. II. § 16, 17.

[10] Some Passages of this Philosopher will be cited below, upon Paragraph XV. Note 2, 4.

[11] The Passage cited in Note 9. suffices to shew the Opinion of this Philosopher, who, as the Disciple of SOCRATES, approved without doubt all the Sentiments of his Master which he has given us. See also those cited above, upon § 6. Note 6.

[12] Alicubi CICERO, says our Author. See the Passage, which he cites below, Note 15. and those recited in PUFENDORF, B. IV. Chap. I. § 21. with what I say there in Note 1.

[13] De Stoicorum repugnant. p. 1055, 1056. Vol. II. Edit. Wech. The Opinion of these Philosophers may be seen explained at large in STOBÆUS, Eclog. Ethic. Cap. IV.

[14] This Orator gives by way of Example the small Lies told to a sick Child; those invented to preserve the Life of a Person fallen into the Hands of Robbers, or to deceive an Enemy, when the Safety of a Man's Country requires it: Ac primum concedant mihi, &c. Instit. Orat. Lib. XII. Cap. I. p. 1054. Edit. Burman.

[15] I shall give the Passages quoted by our Author in the Margin, where the Figures are a little faulty in the Editions before mine. The Philosopher speaking of the Vices opposite to Veracity, gives as one of the Extremes, the pretending to have advantageous Qualities which we have not, or not to have what we have. Ethic. Nicomach. Lib. II. Cap. VII. p. 25. Vol. II. Edit. Paris. By which he gives us to understand, that Feigning and Dissimulation are not always vicious, but only from the Excessor Defect in the Things feigned or disguised. And he says in so many Words in the other Passage upon this Head, that those who dissemble with Moderation, and in Things that are not obvious, pass for polite People, Lib. IV. Cap. XIII. in fin. p. 56. B.

[16] Paraph. in Lib. V. Cap. VIII. Ethic. Nicomach. p. 297. Edit. Heins.

[17] Sic judicet, pleraque esse, &c. Institut. Orator. (Lib. XII. Cap. I. p. 1054. Edit. Burm.) He says in another Place, Nam & Mendacium dicere, &c. (Lib. II. Cap. XVII. p. 127.) GROTIUS.

[18]

Ἵπολαμβάνω τὸ ψεῦδος, &c.

These Verses have been preserved by STOBÆUS, Florileg. Tit. XII.

[19]

ΝΕ. Οὐκ αἰσχρὸν ἦγὼ δῆτα τὰ ψευδῆ λέγειν;

ΟΔ. Οὐκ, εἰ τὸ σωθῆναί γε τὸ ψεῦδος φέροι.

Philoctet. Ver. 107, 108.

[20]

Ὁ Ὑ Νέμεσις καὶ ψεῦδος, &c.

This Verse is also in STOBÆUS, Tit. XII.

[21] This perhaps is what he makes Ulysses say, that, when he was discovered as a Spy in Troy, he invented a thousand Things to avoid Death:

ΕΚ. Τί δ' ἦτ' ἔλεξας, δοῦλος ὦν ἔμους τότε:

ΟΔ. Πολλῶν λόγων εὐρήμαθ' ὧς μῆ θανεῖν.

Hecub. Ver. 249, 250. In Mr. BARNES'S Collection of Fragments there is one which might be applied here, Incert. Ver. 73. But it is MENANDER'S and is in p. 208. Ver. 57. Collect. Cleric.

[22] What he calls there κατὰ καιρὸν, the Grammarian DONATUS expresses by in tempore, adding, that some Moralists approve of Deceit when reasonable: Quamquam & ipsum fallere in tempore, quidam de Officiis scribentes, rectum putant. In Adelph. Act IV. Scen. III. (Ver. 18.) CICERO insinuates, that there are honest and charitable Lies, as those by which we endeavour to save the Life of an unfortunate Citizen: Si honesto & misericordii saluti civi calamitoso esse vellemus, &c. Orat. pro Ligar. (Cap. V.) GROTIUS.

[23] The Historian makes Otanes say; it is necessary to lie when some Reason requires it: Ἐνθα γὰρ τι δεῖ ψεῦδος λέγεσθαι, λεγέσθω, Lib. III. Cap. LXXII.

[a] Thom. ii. 2. Quaest. 110. Art. 1. in Resp.

[1] He cites upon it the Words of P. NIGIDIUS, contemporary with Julius Caesar, and CICERO : Verba sunt haec ipsa P. NIGIDI, &c. Lib. XI. Cap. XI. St. AUSTIN observes also, that Nobody is guilty of Lying, when he believes what he says to be true: Ream linguam non facit, nisi mens rea. De verbis Apostoli, Serm. XXVIII. Nemo mentiens judicandus est, &c. Enchirid. Cap. XVIII. These two Passages are quoted in the CANON LAW, Caus. XXII. Quaest. II. (Can. III. IV.) GROTIUS.

[2] Thus Abraham when he was going to sacrifice his Son upon the Mountain Morijah, said to his Servants: Abide you here with the Ass; and I and the Lad will go yonder and worship, and come again to you. In which he spoke ambiguously according to St. AMBROSE, lest, if those People had known his Design, they should have endeavoured to hinder him from executing it, or importuned him against it with Cries and Tears. Captiose autem loquebatur, &c. Lib. I. De Abrahamo, (Cap. VIII.) That Father of the Church approves the Patriarch's Conduct, and GRATIAN after him, Caus. XXII. Quaest. II. post Can. XX. GROTIUS.

This Example includes more than a simple Ambiguity. "Every one sees that if Abraham did not speak contrary to his Desire, he spoke at least contrary to his Hope, and by his Words put other Ideas into the Minds of his Servants, than he had in his own, as AMYRAUT says very well, Morale Chretienne." Vol. IV. p. 523. It does not suffice in order to say there is no Lie, that the Words we use are susceptible of a Sense which answers to what we think; it is moreover necessary, that in the present State of Things, and the manner the Persons to whom we speak, are disposed, they have room to take our Words in that Sense; otherwise a Door would be opened for Deceit in Relation to Affairs, wherein all the World agrees, that we ought to speak sincerely what we think. This our Author was well aware of, since he observes immediately after, talem locutionem usurpatam temere non probandam. See PUFENDORF, § 13. of the Chapter which answers to this. Now could Abraham's Servants, ignorant as they were of the Order of Heaven to that Patriarch, ever imagine, that the Words we will come again to you, could mean only the Father, and not the Father and Son, whom Abraham mentioned just before? I go farther to maintain, that tho' the Words are conceived in such a manner, that those to whom they are spoke could with good Attention, see thro' the Ambiguity, and know the Sense that the Speaker has in his Mind; if however the latter has Reason to believe, that they will take them in a Sense quite different from his Thoughts, it is then, with regard to them, a downright Lie, since it produces the same Effect as if he had used Terms, that were susceptible only of one Sense, contrary to the Thought of him that employs them. So that not only Abraham, and many other holy Persons, but also our Saviour JESUS CHRIST, having used, as our Author observes a little lower, Expressions, which they well knew, would be understood in a different Sense from what they had in their Minds; hence results, I conceive, an invincible Argument against those of the contrary rigid Opinion, who assert, that we are always guilty of a criminal Lie, when we speak, or act, in a manner, whereby we would make others understand something different from our own Thoughts. It signifies nothing to say, that it was for a good End our Saviour spoke in this manner; for the End does not make the Use of a Means, bad in itself, innocent.

[3] See my Reflection upon the preceding Note 2.

[4] Instabat quidem Narcissus, &c. TACIT. Annal. Lib. XI. (Cap. XXXIV. Num. 2.) The same Historian says, that there are many People, who express their meaning in ambiguous Terms, that they may afterwards have it in their Power to explain them according to their Interest. Non, ut plerique incerta disseruit, &c. Histor. Lib. III. (Cap. III. Num. 2.) He gives elsewhere an Example of it in the Person of Mucianus, Governor of Syria, who writing to the Generals Antonius Primus and Arrius Varus sometimes talked to them of the Necessity of hastening the Execution of the concerted Projects, and sometimes of the Advantage, that would arise from delaying it; composing his Discourses in such a Manner, that he might according to the Event either condemn the Generals, if unsuccessful; or arrogate Honour to himself, if otherwise: Namque Mucianus tam celeri, &c. Ibid. (Cap. LII. Num. 3.) GROTIUS.

[5] And also this מִיחָר מִפְּנֵי תַשְׁלִים לְשִׁגְזָה One may speak ambiguously for Advantage, quoted by MANASSES BEN-ISRAEL, In suo Conciliat. Quaest. 27. and St. CHRYSOSTOM, he is also called a Deceiver, that uses such a Thing to injure one, not he that does it to a good End. De Sacerdot. Lib. I. GROTIUS.

[6] PHILO of the Life of MOSES, I speak of Facts that relate to the Honour of GOD, in which only we ought to speak Truth, even if a Man were otherwise given to Lying; for Truth is the Attendant of GOD; and St. AUSTIN, Epist. VIII. It is one Thing to know, Whether a good Man may sometimes lye; and another Whether a Writer of the Holy Scriptures should lye. See hereafter, § 15. (Num. 2.) GROTIUS.

[7] AESCHYLUS in his Prometheus, λέξω τοῦτ' ἄρ' ἔγωγε, &c. (p. 39. Edit. H. Steph).

*I'll shew you plainly what you want to learn,
Nor will I wrap in dark Disguise the Truth;
But tell it with a Frankness that the talk of Friends
Does always justly claim.*

GROTIUS.

[b] B. 2. c. 12. § 9.

[8] Tollendum est igitur ex rebus contrahendis omne mendacium. De Offic. Lib. III Cap. XV.

[9] DEMOSTHENES speaks of this Law. Orat. adversus Leptin. p. 363. A. Edit Basil 1572.

[1] See what I have said upon Note 2. of the preceding Paragraph.

[2] Wherefore he that deprives a Man of the Means of knowing certain Things, is said in the Hebrew Tongue, Furari cor, to steal away his Heart. See GENES. Chap. XXXI. Ver. 26, 27. with the Chaldaick Paraphrase of ONKELOS, and the Version of the LXX. See also the Rabbi DAVID in his Book De Radicib. The Rabbi SOLOMON in his Commentary, and ABEN EZRA another Rabbi. GROTIUS.

[3] Our Author said a little lower in his first Edition, That the Obligation Men are under to discover to each other by their Words what they have in their Thoughts, arises from a tacit, tho' not particular Convention; and which is made only when they begin to speak, as in the Case of Promises: But from a Kind of general and antient Convention; like that, which we have said above, took place in the Establishment of Property, with regard to the Restitution of Things belonging to another, which we have in our Hands: A Convention however, which is of such a Nature, that the Compensation of a Debt, and other such Things hinder it from having its Effects. These Words, which are retrenched in the later Editions, serve for our better comprehending the Ideas of our Author. He founds the Obligation we are under to speak Truth, upon the tacit Agreement Men entered into amongst themselves, in introducing the Use of Speech, that this, and other such Signs, should be used, so as to make known reciprocally what they thought. But this Agreement is no better founded than the other with which he compares it, and of which we have shewn the Uselessness in the Notes upon PUFENDORF, Law of Nature and Nations, B. IV. Chap. XIII. § 3. Note. 1. The Establishment itself of the Signification of Words, tho' it is made by a kind of Consent of Mankind, is not made by a Convention properly so called, and of an obligatory Force, as we have proved in the same Notes, B. IV. Chap. 1. § 1. Note 1. And it is not at all necessary to suppose, that Men have agreed amongst themselves to manifest their Thoughts to each other by the Use of Words, and that in a manner proper for making them known. Men being often obliged to communicate their Thoughts reciprocally, in order to discharge what they owe to each other; and having no other Means to do that, than Words used in a certain Sense, which is generally the most common; it follows from that alone, that they ought to make such an Use of them, by Virtue of the known and incontestable Rule, that whoever is bound to procure an End, is also bound to employ the Means necessary to obtain that End. Neither, in my Opinion, is there any need to suppose, that when we begin to speak to another, we make a particular Agreement, by which we profess our Consent to enter into the general Agreement. Which however is pretended by the ingenious Author of a Piece, published in the JOURNAL LITERAIRE of the Hague, Vol. V. Part II. p. 256 & seq. which the Reader will do well to peruse, and wherein the vicious Extremes are avoided. But it seems to me more simple to say, without so many turnings and windings, that the Question about Lying is reduced to this, whether there be always some Reason, which obliges us to make known our Thoughts to those with whom we discourse: For suppose there are Cases, in which there is no such Obligation, we may then make what Use we please of Speech. Now the greatest Partisans of the rigid Opinion, confess, that we may sometimes conceal what we think from others; and thence it is, that they would have us get off either by saying nothing, or by declaring we will not speak what we think. Now what does it signify to others in those Cases, whether they are left in their Ignorance, or made to believe Things which are not? When the Question is about any Thing, which we are not obliged to tell them, it is the worse for them if they rely upon our Words; and much more when there is good Reason to hinder their knowing what we think. So that there being many Cases, wherein neither the Laws of Justice, nor those of Humanity or Charity, lay us under any Obligation to discover our real Thoughts to others, it is often allowable to disguise them, without the Inconveniences I have spoken of in my great Note upon PUFENDORF, B. IV. Chap. I. § 7. Note. 1. on account of which we ought not to indulge ourselves in it, but for some considerable Reason; yet those Inconveniences do not hinder, but that there may be certain Cases wherein we not only may, but ought to use some innocent Falshood either to procure ourselves or others some great Good, or to avoid some great Evil. The Advantage of human Society makes both the one and the other equally requisite.

[4] All this is manifestly superfluous according to the System laid down in the foregoing Note.

[5] The Passage has been cited before, B. II. Chap. XI. § 1. Num. 8.

[6] In all the Editions without excepting the first, the Text here has only, Describunt testimonio sive elocutione adversus proximum. But it is plain, that either the Copist, or the Printers, have left out the Word falso, which is absolutely necessary to denote the Idea of Lying in the Expression of the Scripture, of which the Decalogue gives us an Instance in the ninth Commandment. I have therefore ventured to correct this evident Omission in my Edition of the Original.

[7] The Passage is: Omnis autem, qui mentitur contra id quod animo sentit, loquitur voluntate fallendi. Enchirid. Cap. XXII. This is recited in the Canon Law, Caus. XXII. Quaest. II. Can. IV.

[8] A Christian should never tell a Lye, with a Design to deceive or hurt: Ut non mentiatur unquam. &c. LACTANT. Institut. Lib. VI. Cap. XVIII. (num. 4. Edit. Cellar.) GROTIUS.

[9] Ut reddere depositum, &c. De Offic. Lib. I. Cap. X.

[1] LUCRET. Lib. I. Ver. 939.

[2] The Passage in which this is has been cited above, § 9. Note 13.

[1] In hoc omnis hyperbole extenditur, ut ad verum mendacio veniat — — incredibilia adfirmat, ut ad credibilia perveniat. De Benefic. Lib. VII. Cap. XXIII.

The Passage of QUINTILIAN, is in Institut. Orator. Lib. VIII. Cap. VI. towards the End. But in OBRECHT's Edition, in which he follows that of Oxford, and has corrected it exactly after several Manuscripts, it is read, (p. 500.) in a manner that conveys a quite different Sense. Est haec DECENS sermonis superjectio. That is to say, the Hyperbole is a reasonable Exaggeration, or which is not carried too far. The last Editor, Mr. BURMAN, only recites the various Readings, most of them evidently faulty, of the Manuscripts and Editions. Had OBRECHT found his in some Manuscript, it ought certainly to be preferred to all others. But, to consider it only as a Conjecture, it may be easily drawn from the Vestiges of those corrupt Readings, and is confirmed by what QUINTILIAN says afterwards: Sed hujus quoque rei servatur mensura quaedam. Quamvis enim est omnis Hyperbole ultra fidem, non tamen esse debet ULTRA MODUM — — nec ita ut mendacio fallere velit. Quo magis intuendum est, quousque DECEAT extollere, quod nobis non creditur, p. 753. Edit. Burman.

[a] Liv. I. 32. c. 12.

[b] Appian. Bell. Hispan. p. 513. Edit. Amst. (301. H. Steph.)

[2] Add also St. CYRIL in his Work against the Emperor Julian, Lib. IX. in fin. [“St. PETER did not differ in Opinion with St. PAUL : But by adapting his Conduct to Occasions, he endeavoured to obtain by all Sorts of Methods the Advantage of those, who were desirous of being his Disciples. Whereas St. PAUL acting in a uniform Manner, thought himself obliged to give St. PETER Advice upon that Head; lest the Intention of the latter should not be understood, and some should take Offence at his Behaviour.” P. 325. C. D.

Edit. Spanheim.] TERTULLIAN is almost in the same Opinion, Lib I. contra Marcion (Cap. XX.) and Lib. IV. (Cap. III.) Lib. V. Cap. III. [Add also, De praescript. advers. Haereticos, Cap. XXIII.] GROTIUS.

[3] See his Letter to St. AUSTIN, Vol. II. p. 336. & seqq. Edit. Froben.

[c] Galat. ii. 14.

[a] Lib. 3. Epist. 16. n. 3, 4, 5, 6.

[1] This Saying is preserved by STOBÆUS, Florileg. Serm. XII.

[2] I do not know from whence our Author took these Words. The Passage cited above, § 9. Note 9. includes the Sense, but not in the same Terms.

[3] He maintains, that in this Case it is rather telling a Lie than Lying, and all edges the Example of a Physician who deceives his Patient in order to cure him. Stromat. Lib. VII. Cap. IX. p. 873. Edit. Oxon. See a like passage of ORIGEN which GRONOVIVS relates upon § 9. and what PHILO says, De Cherubim, p. 110. D. Edit. Paris. a Passage which I find also quoted by the Bishop of Oxford.

[4] Dissert. III. p. 30. Edit. Cantab. Davis. St. CHRYSOSTOM, Lib. I. all edges also the Example of Physicians. GROTIUS.

[5] There is the same Thought in this Verse of MENANDER'S:

Κρείττον δ' ἐλέσθαι ψεῦδος, ἢ ἀληθὲς κακόν

Ex incert. Comoed. apud STOB. Tit. XII.

[6] And when Agesilaus came into Boeotia, and there understood that Pisander was vanquished in a Sea fight by Pharnabazus and Conon, he published the contrary in his Army, and putting on a Crown, offered Sacrifices for the Victory. PLUTARCH in the Life of Agesilaus, p. 605. C. GROTIUS.

[b] Liv 1. 1. c. 27. n. 8.

[7] Et Romani, quia paucitas, &c. LIV. Lib. II. Cap. LXIV. Num. 6.

[1] HOMER tells us, that Agamemnon, General of the Greeks, in order to sound his Army, pretended that he would have them return Home, and he speaks of this Feint as of an innocent Artifice, allowable for him to use:

Πρῶτα δ' ἐγὼν ἔπεσιν, &c.

Iliad. Lib. II. Ver. 73, 74.

GROTIUS.

But it is another Question, whether the Feint of that General was seasonable or not; on which Point, as well as many others, the Abbé TERRASSON has cut out Work enough for the excessive Admirers of HOMER, in his judicious Critical Dissertation upon the Iliad, Vol. I. p. 357. & seqq.

[2] De Repub. Lib. III. p. 389. B.

[3] But see what I have said upon PUFENDORF, Law of Nature and Nations, B. IV. Chap. I. § 17. Note 1. Second Edition.

[4] That Philosopher thus proves, that it is not consistent with the Divine Nature to lie. GOD, says he, has no Occasion to lie, either to represent like the Poets, antient Things under ingenious Fictions, as if he was ignorant how all Things have passed: Or to deceive his Enemies, as if he feared them: Or to prevent the Effects of the Folly of his Friends; for no foolish or mad Person is the Friend of GOD. De Repub. Lib. I. p. 382. D. E. Vol. II. Edit. H. Steph.

[5] For GOD, having an infinity of Means for the Attainment of his Ends, has no need of this to which Men are obliged to have recourse, because they cannot otherwise effect certain Things they propose to themselves. From whence it appears that Men are no more obliged to imitate GOD in this Respect, than to desire to be omnipotent like him. This might suffice to answer the specious Objection which is deduced from the Example of the Supreme Being, and which opens a fine Field for Declamation. But let us say something more, in Order to set the Weakness of such an Argument in its full Light. It is with Pleasure I find that the learned and judicious Mr. NOODT has answered this Difficulty in a few Words, in an Addition made by him to the second Edition of his Treatise, De forma emendandi doli mali, &c. "It will be objected, says he, that GOD, whose Perfections Men ought to imitate as much as possible, is true in his Words. Be it so; but who does not know, that the same GOD, who is true, is also, above all Things, a Lover of the Good and Preservation of Mankind? Why therefore should not Man, to whom the Example of GOD is proposed, continually labour to make himself useful in all Respects to the Rest of his Species; if that can be, by telling them the Truth; if not, by using Disguise and Dissimulation necessary to their Good?" Let us add some Reflections, which will serve more clearly to shew, that those who make the Objection under Consideration, extend too far what is here truly imitable in the Divine Perfections. The Veracity of GOD engages us to love Truth; but not all Sorts of Truths; and still less to speak always whatever is true. We are obliged to love and seek after those Truths only which are useful in Regard to our Condition; as for those which are not so, we may neglect them, and are even obliged to do so sometimes, because the searching after them would injure the Knowledge of useful Truths. When we have discovered these useful Truths, we ought to communicate them to others; but we are not obliged to do it at all Times, and in all Places: There are Conjunctions wherein the Discovery of this Kind of Truths would produce no good Effect, or even sometimes occasion more Hurt than Good; they may then be concealed. Our Saviour JESUS CHRIST has set us an Example of it, which his Apostles have imitated. If this may take Place in Regard to Truths the most useful to others, why is it not allowable in Relation to Things, of which the Knowledge is of no Service to those we speak to, or which might give them Occasion to hurt either our selves or others, whether with or without Design, and thereby to commit an Imprudence, or a Sin; why, I say, is it not allowable to conceal, not only the Truth, but even to tell them positively something false? It is not necessary to push these Reflections any further; those who will consider them without Prejudice, and give Attention to all that has been said above, and in the great Work of PUFENDORF, will easily be convinced, that there is no Subject on which all the Evidence of common sense is more visibly contradicted, than it is by those who maintain the Opinion I oppose. But I cannot help referring the Reader further to some Passages of an Author which I have cited above, and which I again direct to, because, in the Judgment of some People, there are Authorities which add great Force to Arguments, and even sometimes make more Impression upon them than the best Reasons in the World. This Author is MOSES AMYRAUT, whose Morale Chrétienne may be seen, Vol. III. p. 249, 307. and Vol. IV. p. 514, 532. Tho' he has not cleared up the Point so well as has been done since, he has however abundance of judicious Reflections, and solid Answers to divers Objections, deduced either from Reason or the Holy Scriptures. Since I wrote this Note I have an Opportunity to add a more modern Authority, and which will strike no less a great Number of Persons: It is that of the celebrated Mr. SAURIN, Pastor of the Hague, in his Historical, Critical, Theological, and Moral Discourses, upon the most memorable Events of the Old and New Testament, where he treats of the innocent Artifice of the Aegyptian Midwives, tho' he does not venture to determine, whether what they told Pharaoh was true, or an officious Lye; he declares however, that admitting the latter, No one can justly blame their Behaviour, or maintain the Thesis, that they would have acted with more Sanctity, had they observed a different Conduct. He afterwards rejects, (as I do below, and as I have already done, in my great Note upon the Chapter of PUFENDORF which answers to this) The Distinction made between their Intention, and the Means they employed to put it in Execution. Disc. XLIII. p. 7. Edit. in Octav. But I know this Author will explain himself still better upon the Question of Lying, in the Sequel of his Work, where, on the Occasion of Rahab's History, related in the Book of JOSHUA, he will give the World a Dissertation in Form upon that Subject.

[6] CASSIODORUS calls this a wise Dissimulation of Severity. Quum fratribus dispensatoria, &c. De Amicitia. GROTIUS.

[a] De Joseph. p. 550. & seq. Ed. Paris.

[7] Non semper autem, etiam si frequentissime, &c. Institut. Orator. Lib. II. Cap. XVII. p. 131. Edit. Obrecht.

[1] St. AUSTIN on the fifth Psalm, related by GRATIAN, in Caus. XXII. Quaest. II. C. nequis, There are two Sorts of Lyes, not much to be blamed, yet not wholly blameless, when we either jest, or tell a Lye to serve our Neighbour. The jocular one is not pernicious, because it does not deceive, for he to whom it is directed knows it was spoken in Jest. And the other, the officious Lye, is the less faulty, because it has in it something of Kindness (or Charity). TERTULLIAN, in his Book De pudic. among our daily Sins of Infirmity, to which we are all subject, puts also this, To Lye out of Necessity. Cap. XIX. GROTIUS.

[2] The Commentator says decently; for it is a brave Thing to lye for Justice. Like to that of St. CHRYSOSTOM, on Rahab, O excellent Lye! O laudable Deceit! Not of one that betrayed the Interests of Religion, but that did an Act of true Piety. And St. AUSTIN, of the Aegyptian Midwives, O brave Invention of Humanity! O pious Lye to save Life! St. JEROME also commends those Midwives, and believes the Rewards given them to be eternal, upon EZEKIEL xvii. and ISAIAH lvi. St. AMBROSE, on Syagrius, B. VI. and St. AUSTIN himself, to Consentius, Against a Lye, Cap. XV. varying here, according to Custom, are of the same Opinion. TOSTATUS says there is no Sin in it. And St. AUSTIN doubts of it, B. II. Quaest. super Exod. And THOMAS, II. 2. Quaest. XC. Art. LV. Ad. IV. And also CAJETAN. See also ERASMUS's Moriae Encomium, and the learned MASIVS upon JOSHUA ii. 5. GROTIUS.

St. AMBROSE should not be named amongst those, who praise the Conduct of the Aegyptian Midwives; for that Father, on the contrary, speaks as if he doubted whether they did well. The Passage our Author had in View is this, Qui locus, ut superioriutilis ad Hebraeorum salutem, ita reliquo confragosus ad obstetricum fidem, quae didicerunt mentiri pro salute, & fallere pro excusatione. Lib. VIII. Epist. LXIV. p. 625. A. Edit. Paris. 1569. In regard to Rahab's Lye, see what is said upon PUFENDORF, Law of Nature and Nations, B. IV. Chap. I. § 16. Note 2. The first Example of the Aegyptian Midwives is very remarkable, and furnishes an Argument to which it would be very difficult to say any Thing plausible by Way of Answer. I have spoke of it in the great Note upon Paragraph 7. of the Chapter now cited, and shall add two weak Evasions used, after other Writers, by the late Mr. BERNARD, whose Knowledge and Judgment I otherwise respect, and for which we ought, without Doubt, to honour his Memory. One of these Subterfuges is, that GOD rewards the Actions of Men, tho' imperfect; otherwise he would not reward any; because our best Works are attended with a thousand Imperfections. The other is, that the Rewards conferred upon the Midwives were proportioned to their Works, which being only materially good, were in Consequence rewarded only with some temporal Blessings. Discourse upon Lying, at the End of the Treatise Of the Excellency of Religion, Vol. II. p. 813. I say, with Respect to the first of these Answers, that the Imperfection of our Actions, which does not hinder GOD's being pleased with, or rewarding them, does not regard the Nature of the Things we would do, or of the Means employed in Order to succeed; but the Disposition with which we do them. When we do a good Action, and employ only lawful Means to that Purpose, tho' we are not actuated with all the Ardor we ought; and even tho' some human Consideration has a Share in it, GOD, however, approves it, as if there were no Imperfection at all: This is worthy of his Goodness, and does not clash with any of his Perfections. But the Holiness of GOD does not permit him to give the least Sign of Approbation, in Regard to an Action bad in itself, or that has been effected by Means bad in themselves; such as Lying would be, according to the Principles of those against whom we dispute. However good the Intention may have been, that does not hinder the Action, upon the Whole, from being bad, and, consequently, punishable, rather than worthy of Reward. GOD may not punish, and may pardon it, in Consideration of the other Part of the Person's Conduct who has acted thus; but to pretend, that the most holy Being authorizes and approves in the least such an Action, upon Account of the good Intention of the Agent in doing it, is opening a Door for the most pernicious Maxims of the loosest Morality. So that those who affect to be so rigid on the Question of Lying, run into an extreme Looseness of Principle, without perceiving it. The other Subterfuge, to which they have Recourse on this Occasion, is no less frivolous. Does the Nature or Degree of the Reward prevent its being a Reward; and, consequently, a Thing which necessarily supposes an Approbation? And where do we find, that the temporal Blessings with which GOD vouchsafes to reward Men, are dispensed indifferently to those who do Evil and those who do Good? If he makes his Sun to rise upon the Righteous and upon the Wicked, and his Rain to fall upon the Lands of the Just and the Unjust, it is, with Regard to the latter, an Effect of his Goodness, which waits their Repentance; and of his Wisdom, which does not permit him to suspend every Day, by sensible Miracles, the Laws it has established in Nature.

[a] De Rep. l. 2.

[b] Memor. Socrat. l. 4. c. 2. § 16. Ed. Oxon. & de Cyr. Inst. l. 2.

[1] Our Author quotes in the Margin, the Book intituled De migratione Abraham, in which I find nothing that is to the Purpose. But there is something upon this Subject in a Passage which I have already referred to, § 14. Note 10. De Cherubim, p. 110. D. Edit. Paris.

[2] That Father says, that if we examine the Actions of the most celebrated Captains in all Ages, we shall find that most of their Victories were the Effect of some Fraud; and that such as have obtained Advantages in that Manner, are more praised than those who have performed Exploits by open Force. De sacerdot. Lib. I. GROTIUS.

[3] The same Prophet gives us another Example, in the second Book of Kings, Chap. VIII. ver. 10. according to the Correction of the Massorethes, followed by the vulgar Translation; for Elisha says thus to Hazael, Go, say to him [King Benhadad] thou mayest certainly recover: Howbeit, the LORD hath shewed me that he shall surely die. GROTIUS. Elisha, as has been observed, speaks of the Disease which the King of Syria actually had, and of which, in Truth, he did not die. This was a very true Answer to the Question that Prince had sent to ask him. But at the same Time the Prophet foretold that he should die in another Manner, as the Event verified.

[4] Our Author cites Nobody here: But he has undoubtedly taken this from FRONTINUS, who does not say, however, that Valerius Laevinus boasted of having killed Pyrrhus; but only, that a Soldier of Pyrrhus's Army having been killed, Valerius Laevinus, shewing the Sword all bloody with which he had been slain, made both Armies believe that it was the King. Valerius Laevinus adversus Pyrrhum Epirotarum regem, occiso quodam gregali, tenens gladium cruentum, exercitui utrique persuasit, Pyrrhum intererunt. Stratagemat. Lib. II. Cap. IV. Num. 9. This happened, as we may see in PLUTARCH, from Pyrrhus's having caused Megacles, one of his Men, to put on his Armour and Habit; he was killed by a Roman, who believed him to be the King. Vit. Pyrrh. p. 393. E. F. So that here was no Lye, as our Author imagined, upon FRONTINUS's Authority. Quamobrem hostes, destitutos se ducis morte credentes, consternati a mendacio, se pavidi in castra receperunt. The Example of Jugurtha might have been alledged with more Propriety, which follows, Num. 10. who boasted falsely, that he had killed Marius. See SALLUST, Bell. Jugurth. Cap. Cl. (CVII Edit. Wass.)

[5] In Ethic. ad Nicomach. Lib. VI. Cap. IX.

[6] The Passage has already been cited, upon Paragraph 9. Note 14.

[c] Thom. Summ. Theol. ii. 2. qu. 110. art. 1. & 3. Covarr. in cap. Quamvis, de pactis, in vi. part. 1. § 1. n. 15. Soto de Justit. 5. qu. 6. art. 2. Tolet. 1. 4. c. 21. & 1. 5. c. 58. Less. 1. 2. de Justit. c. 42. Dub. 9.

[7] The Abbe RUPERT has writ against the Opinion of that Father, who had himself been formerly of another. GROTIUS.

[8] This the Philosopher Chrysippus maintained, according to AULUS GELLIUS ; Chrysippus ait, omne verbum ambiguum natura esse, quoniam ex eodem duo vel plura accipi possunt. Noct. Attic. Lib. XI. Cap. XII. SENECA says there are a great many Things that have no peculiar Names, and which we are obliged to express by borrowed Names. Ingens copia est rerum sine nomine, &c. De Benefic. Lib. II. Cap. XXXIV. GROTIUS.

[9] Primae notionis. This is what CICERO calls Domicilium proprium; and derived Significations, Secundae notionis, he terms Migrations in alienum; according to the learned GRONOVIVS's Remark, Unde illud tam ἄλλοθεν, valetudini fideliter inserviando? Unde in istum locum fideliter venit? Cui verbo Domicilium est proprium in officio, migrationes in alienum multae. Nam & doctrina, & domus, & ars, & ager fidelis dici potest, &c. Lib. XVI. Ad familiar. Epist.

[10] St. AUSTIN, De mag. That we have found out no Sign, which among the other Things that it denotes, does not also signify itself. Nullum nos signum, &c. DeMagistro. Cap. VII. GROTIUS.

[d] See above, § 10. and 1. 2. c. 16. § 9.

[1] Agesilaus, in PLUTARCH, distinguishes thus, To break Leagues is to despise the Gods; but otherwise to deceive an Enemy, is not only just but glorious, and a Pleasure with Profit. GROTIUS.

The Original of this Passage has been given above, § 6. Note 8. All the Difference is, that here our Author quotes it, as it is in the Life of Agesilaus, where the Terms are a little different, but the Sense exactly the same.

[1] See what is said upon B. II. Chap. XIII. § 14. & seq.

- [2] This is not peculiar to an Oath; but we ought to express ourselves in that Manner as often as those we speak to have a Right to require a faithful Discovery of our Thoughts; in a Word, as often as Lying cannot be innocent. See what I have said upon Note 2. of § 10. of this Chapter. So that Swearing would then only make the Lye more criminal.
- [3] Δεῖ τοῦς παῖδας, &c. Some ascribe this Saying to Lysander, some to Philip of Macedon, and others to Dionysius the Tyrant. See AELIAN, Var. Hist. Lib. VII. Cap. XII. and the Commentators upon that Place.
- [1] Var. Hist. Lib. XII. Cap. LIX.
- [2] Protrep. Cap. XX.
- [3] Ethic. Nicomach. Lib. IV. Cap. VIII.
- [4] De educatione liberor. p. 11. C. Vol. II. Edit. Wech. See PHILO the Jew, Lib. Quod omnis probus est liber, (p. 888. B. Edit. Paris.)
- [5] For which Reason he considers PTOLEMY as an Historian most to be relied on, with Regard to the Actions of Alexander the Great. De Expedit. Alexand. Lib. I. (init.)
- [6] Lib. VII. (Cap. V.)
- [7] Mira est in principe nostro [Juliano], &c. Panegy. Julian. (Cap. XXVI. Num. 3. Edit. Cellar.)
- [8] PLUTARCH, Vit. Aristid. Vol. 1. p. 319. D. Edit. Wech.
- [9] Adeo veritatis diligens, &c. CORNELIUS NEPOS, Vit. Epaminond. Cap. III. Num. 1. Edit. Cellar.
- [10] Christianity, rightly understood, prescribes no thing upon this Head more than the Law of Nature. It is not probable that our Saviour intended, for Instance, to render the Condition of Christian Nations more unhappy than that of Pagan States, by prohibiting them to use the Stratagems of War; by the Means of which great Advantages may be obtained, and great Dangers avoided.
- [11] The Term in the Original signifies more than Idle and useless Talk; it imports inconsiderate or malicious Words, which produce some bad Effect. See HAMMOND and LE CLERC upon this Passage.
- [12] Itaque viator ille verus ac justus, &c. Instit. Divin. Lib. VI. Cap. XVIII. Num. 6. Edit. Cellar.
- [13] Philoctet. (ver. 85. & seq.)
- [14] What Neoptolemus says of his Father Achilles, is confirmed by HORACE,

*Ille non inclusus equo, Minervae,
Sacra mentito, &c.*

Lib. IV. Od. VI. (ver. 13. & seq.)

*Not he in great Minerva's Horse
Had cheated Troy, and Priam's heedless Court,
Dissolv'd in Wine and Sport;
But hot, and deaf to all Remorse,
Had fiercely storm'd our Walls with open Force.*

Upon which the Scholiast remarks, that the Aversion of Achilles to the Stratagems of War, arose from the Confidence he had in his own Valour and Strength. Achillem nihil fraude, sed semper palam, virtutis fiducia, dimicasse.

[15] Rhes. ver. 510, 511.

[16] PLUTARCH, Vit. Alex. p. 683. D. Vol. I. Edit. Wechel. See QUINTIUS CURTIUS, Lib. IV. Cap. XIII. Num. 9. and the Commentators there.

[17] POLYBIUS, Lib. XIII. (Cap. I.)

[18] In VI. Consul. Honor. ver. 248, 249.

[19] Var. Hist. Lib. XII. Cap. XXXIII.

[20] Haec, ut summa ratione acta, &c. LIVY, Lib. XLII. Cap. XLVII. Num. 4, 8.

[21] Reperio apud Scriptores, &c. ANNAL. Lib. II. (Cap. LXXXVIII. Num. 1.) AELIAN says the same.

[22] This we learn from the antient Scholiast upon APOLLONIUS, in Argonautic. Lib. II. &c. in ver. 1112.

[23] This last Example is not very clear. All that Mardonius says in his Speech, to persuade Xerxes to make War upon the Greeks, is, “The Greeks, as I am informed, generally make War in a very rash Manner, on Account of their Ignorance, and Want of Ingenuity: For after having declared War against each other, if they find a fine level Country, they go thither, in Order to fight.” HERODOTUS, Lib. VII. Cap. IX. Our Author might have here applied the Passage of LIVY, Note 20. with more Propriety than this.

[1] So MAIMONIDES teaches, חוכל הלוכת, Chap. V. Sect. X. GROTIUS.

[2] See upon this PUFENDORF, B. VIII. Chap. VI. § 16. and what will be said below, Chap. IV. of this Book, § 18.

[3] Nihil interest, utrum ipse scelus admittas, an alium propter te admittere velis. This is in his Treatise De moribus Manichaeorum, where the last Words are conceived in this Manner, Anpropter te alio admittivelis. But our Author quotes after ALBERICUS GENTILIS, who gives the Passage in those Words, De Jure Belli, Lib. II. Cap. IX.

[a] B. ii. ch. 26. § 5.

[1] Transfugam jure belli recipimus. Digest, Lib. XLI. Tit. 1. Deadquir. rerum Domin. Leg. LI. See upon this Law, CUJAS, Observ. Lib. IV. Cap. IX. and PETER DU FAURE, Semest. Lib. II. Cap. III. p. m. 13.

[2] Neither are we to deliver them up, unless it be so stipulated by the Articles of Peace, as in the Peace with Philip, the Aetolians, and Antiochus, POLYBIUS, In Excerpt. Legat. IX. XXVIII. XXXV. MENANDER, Protect. is of the same Opinion. GROTIUS.

[1] See the Beginning of Chap. I.

[2] It is determined in the Decretals, that the Heirs of an Incendiary or Usurer, shall make good the Wrong he has done, or Damage caused, out of his Goods. Et Haeredes ejus moneas, & compellas, &c. Lib. V. Tit. XVII. De raptoribus, incendiariis, &c. Cap. V. Quod Filii ad restituendas usurias, &c. Tit. XIX. De usuris, Cap. IX. See what we have said above, B. 11. Chap. XXI. § 19.

[3] Grave est non solum legibus, &c. Code. Lib. XI. Tit. LVI. Ut nullus e vicaneis pro alienis vicaneorum debitis teneatur. Leg. unic.

[a] Cod. l. 4. tit. 12. and tit. 13.

[4] Si quid universitati debetur, &c. Digest. Lib. III. Tit. IV. Quod cujuscumque universitatis nomine, vel contra eam agatur, Leg. VII. § 1.

[5] Si quis patriae meae pecuniam, &c. De Benefic. Lib. VI. Cap. XX. Deinde ego quoque illi, &c. Cap. XIX. Debebunt autem singuli, &c. Ibid.

[b] See the Sicilian Laws, l. 1. in fin.

[6] The Law has been cited a little above, Note 3. See CUJAS upon it.

[7] Nullam possessionem alterius, &c. Cod. Lib. XII. Tit. LXI. De Executoribus & Exactoribus, Leg. IV.

[8] Inhonestas pignorationes, &c. Novell. LII. Princ. & Cap. I. What the Emperor here calls Pignorationes, is the Translation of the Greek Word Ἐνεχρησιασμός, and in barbarous Latin it is expressed by the Word Repressaliae, which has been received in the vulgar Tongues; as appears by the Decretals, Et si pignorationes, quas vulgaris elocutio Repressalias nominat, &c. In VI. Lib. V. Tit. VIII. De injuriis, &c. Cap. unic. Where it is better to read with some Manuscripts, Repressalias; for that Word answers exactly to the Saxon Withernam. But Use has carried it for Repressaliae. GROTIUS.
See lower, § 4.

[9] Foedum est, inter jura publica, &c. Var. IV. 10.

[1] This is not an arbitrary or voluntary Establishment, founded upon any pretended Right of Nations, of which the Existence cannot be proved, and where all is reduced to a Custom more or less extended, but which, in itself, has never the Force of a Law. The Right in Question is a necessary Consequence of the Constitution of Civil Societies, and an Application of the Maxims of the Law of Nature to that Constitution. In the Independence of the State of Nature, and before there was any Kind of Civil Government, one could come upon those only who had done the Wrong, or upon their Accomplices; because there was then no Tie between Men, by Vertue of which a Man might be deemed to have consented, in some Manner, to what others did, even without his Participation. But after Civil Societies were formed, that is to say, Bodies, of which all the Members were united together, for their common Defence; there resulted from thence a Community of Interests and Wills; whereby, as the Society, or the Powers which govern it, engage to defend each against the Injuries of every other, whether Citizen or Stranger; so every Individual may be deemed to be engaged to answer for what the Society, or Powers which govern it, do, or owe. No human Establishment, no Tie into which Men enter, can dispense with the Obligation of that general and inviolable Law of Nature, That Damage or Wrong ought to be made good; unless those, who are thereby exposed to suffer Wrong or Damage, have manifestly renounced their Right to demand that Reparation. And when such Kind of Establishments prevents, in certain Respects, the injured from obtaining so easily the Satisfaction due to them, that Difficulty should be made up, by supplying the Persons interested with all other possible Means of doing themselves Justice. Now it is certain, that the Society, or the Powers which govern it, by being armed with the Force of the whole Body, are encouraged to baffle, and may often with Impunity baffle, Strangers, who come to demand something due to them: And every Subject contributes some Way or other to enable them to act in this Manner, so that he may thereby be deemed to consent to it. But if he does not actually consent; there is, after all, no other Means to facilitate, to injured Strangers, the Prosecution of their Rights, become difficult from the united Force of the whole Body, than to authorize them to come upon all those who are Members of it, whether they have or have not consented. Besides, how can Strangers know who those are that actually have or have not given their Consent? If they must wait to be fully informed on that Head, they might, generally speaking, as well continue quiet, and patiently suffer the Injury done them: So that, from a necessary Consequence of the Constitution of Civil Societies, every Subject, whilst he continues such, is answerable, with Regard to Strangers, for what the Society, or the Powers that govern it, do or owe; he may, however, demand to be indemnified, when there is any Fault or Injustice on the Part of his Superiors; or when, having been exposed to suffer unjustly for the Body, what it has cost him amounts to more than the Quota he is obliged to contribute for the publick Good. And if he is sometimes disappointed of this Reparation, it must be considered as one of the Inconveniencies which the Constitution of human Affairs renders inevitable in all human Establishments. The Reasons alledged by our Author, serve to strengthen the Principles I have now advanced, which, when considered together, will, in my Opinion, plainly shew that it is not necessary to suppose here a tacit Consent of Nations.

- [2] See PUFENDORF, Law of Nature and Nations, B. IV. Chap. IX. § 7. Note 5. where this Distinction is explained.
- [3] Jus autem gentium, &c. Institut. Lib. I. Tit. II. De Jur. Nat. Gent. & Civili. § 2.
- [a] Thom. Summ. Theol. ii. 2. qu. 40. art. 1. Molin. Disp. 120. & 121. Valent. Disp. 3. qu. 16. n. 3. Navarr. c. 27. n. 136.
- [4] The learned NICOLAUS DAMASCENUS distinguishes Wars from these Reprisals, where he shews, that tho' it were not lawful for Herod to make War upon the Arabian, he might yet ἐύσια λαμβάνειν, use Reprisals, for Debts due unto him by Contract. JOSEPHUS, Lib. VI. Antiq. Hist. where he has these Words, Saying that there were five hundred Talents due to Herod, and a Bond given that if the appointed Day of Payment were passed, he might take what he could through all the Country of Arabia, he therefore called this Action, not a warlike Expedition, but a just Execution, to recover his own Due. GROTIUS.
- [5] Ob eam rem ego, Populusque Romanus, &c. LIVY, Lib. I. (Cap. XXXII. Num. 13.)
- [6] Isque [P. Sulpicius] rogationem, &c. Idem, Lib. XXXI (Cap. VI. Num. 1.)
- [7] Quodque Populus Romanus cum Populo Hermundulo, &c. This Passage is part of a Declaration of War which AULUS GELLIUS has preserved from a lost Treatise of CINCIUS, De re militari. Noct. Attic. Lib. XVI. Cap. IV.
- [8] Cneus Manlius being accused of having made War upon the Gauls, tho' it had been only decreed by the Senate against Antiochus, defended himself with this Reason; that the Gauls were amongst the Troops, and in the Fortresses of Antiochus, and therefore, that the War ought to be deemed declared also against them. Atqui cum Antiocho, non cum Gallis bellum, &c. LIVY, Lib. XXXVIII. Cap. XLVIII. Num. 9.
- [9] PLUTARCH, In vit. Agesil. p. 602. D. F. See also XENOPHON, Hist. Graec. Lib. IV. (Cap. I. § 15.)
- [1] DEMOSTHENES, Orat. adversus Aristocrat. p. 440. C. See the learned SALMASIUS, De modo usurarum, p. 212. & seq.

[2] Orat. advers. Aristocrat. (p. 440. C.) GROTIUS.

Our Author reads ἰκέτην instead of οἰκέτην, in the End of this Passage; which Correction I find in the last Edition of WOLFIIUS that I use. But there are some other Places, where he restores the Text, without taking Notice of it, in a Manner which seems to me to be well founded. He might have only added, θήσω γὰρ οὐτω, instead of θήσω γὰρ οὐτω, as good Manuscripts, and some Editions have it.

[a] B. ii. ch. 21. §5.

[3] Lib. VIII. § 50. Edit. Amstel.

[4] Voc. Ἀνδροληψία.

[5] Orta deinde Altercatio est, &c. Liv. Lib. XXXIV. Cap. LXI. Num. 12, 13.

[1] It is also writ Ἐνεχυρασμός and ἔνεχυράζειν. SALMASIUS makes some Difference between these Words, according as the iota is retained or left out; De modo usurarum, p. 553. & seqq. But see the late Baron SPANHEIM upon the Clouds of Aristophanes, Ver. 35. Our Author added here in a little Note, that the Right of Reprisals is expressed also by the Greek Word, Σύλαι: and cites DEMOSTHENES, Orat. pro Coron. and ARISTOTLE'S Oeconomic. Lib. II. The Passage of the latter will be cited in the End of the following Paragraph, Note 9. As for the other, the Term in Question is not in it, that I can find. Our Author saw that HARPOCRATION, at the Word Σύλας, cites that Orator, ἐν τῷ περὶ τοῦ στεφάνου τῆς τριηραρχίας: And the Passage, to which HENRY DE VALOIS refers us, is: Καὶ μόνους ὑμῖν οὐδαμῶσε ἔστιν ἄνευ κηρυκείου βαδίσαι διὰ τὰς ὑπὸ τούτων ἀνδροληψίας καὶ σύλας κατεσκευασμένας, p. 717. B. He has thereupon confounded this little Oration with the famous long one for Ctesiphon, Περὶ τοῦ στεφάνου, where a different Sort of Crown is spoken of. For the rest, the learned Commentator upon the Greek Lexicographer, whom I have just quoted, alledges several Examples, from good Authors, where Σύλαι and Συλασθαι are taken for a kind of Right of Reprisal.

[a] Bald. 3. Cons. 58.

[2] From Wither or Wider, which signifies again, and Nam or Namp that is to say, taken. This Etymology alone shews that those are mistaken, who, with Mr. BOHMER (Introd. ad jus Publicum Universale, p. 348.) pretend that the Right of Reprisals consists properly, in the refusal of the Sovereign of one Country to do Justice to the Subjects of another Sovereign, who has refused it to his Subjects. This is only a Thing, which has the same Foundation, as what is understood by Reprisals, or is sometimes reduced to the same Thing; because, for Instance, it is all one either to take some Effects from foreign Merchants, or to prevent the People of the Country from paying them what they owe them.

[3] This Word is derived from the German Word Marck, that is to say Boundaries; because Reprisals are generally made upon the Frontiers. See the Glossary of DU CANGE, upon the Word Marcha.

[4] See BARTOLUS, De Repressaliis, Quaest. V. § Ad Tertium, Num. 9. INNOCENT. and PANOR. in Can. VIII. Decretal. De immunit. Eccles. &c. DOMINIC. SOTO. Lib. III. Quaest. IV. Art. V. JACOB DE CANIBUS, ANCHAR. DOMINIC. FRANC. in Can. I. De Injuriis, in VI. FULGOSIUS and SALICETUS, in Authent. Omnino, Col. De Act. & Obligation. JACOB DE BELLO VISU, in Authent. Ut non fiant pignorationes. SYLVEST. Verb. Repressaliae. GUIDO PAPA, Quaest. XXXII. GAILIUS, De Pignor. Observ. I. Num. 5. FRANCISC. VICTORIA, De Jure Belli, Num. 41. COVARRUVIAS, in Cap. Peccatum, Part II. § 9. Num. 4. GROTIUS.

[1] He followed in this the Opinion of JULIAN another Lawyer: JULIANUS, verum debitorem, post litem contestatam, manente adhuc judicio, &c. Digest. Lib. XII. Tit. VI. De conditione indebiti, Leg. LX. Princ. See GAILIUS, De pace publica, Lib. II. Cap. VIII. Num. 7 and FERDINAND VASQUEZ, Controv. Illust. Lib. IV. Cap. X. § 41. GROTIUS. Mr. COCCEIUS in a Dissertation, De vero Debitore sententiâ absoluto, Sect. IV. § 1. & seqq. has racked his Wits to explain the Law here cited, so as to elude the Sense our Author finds, in it, and which is what naturally offers itself. The antient Lawyer there decides clearly enough, that if the Person who is actually Debtor, pays during the Course of the Suit, before Judgment given, he cannot afterwards redemand as not due what he has so paid; and he proves it by this Argument, a major ad minus, that if the Debtor had paid after final Judgment, he could not even then redemand any Thing, tho' the Cause had been adjudged in his Favour: Quia nec absolutus, nec condemnatus, repetere posset: For this cannot be understood, as simply intended to mean, that the Debtor, who has paid before Judgment, cannot redemand any Thing after it; because as soon as he has satisfied the Plaintiff, the Suit is at an End. There is in the same Title a Law of the Civilian PAULUS, the same who recites and approves JULIAN's Opinion in this Case, wherein he says, that if, after Sentence past, the Debtor pays of his own free Will (that is to say, without Compulsion but thro' Error, which must always be supposed on this Subject) even tho' he has cast his Adversary, he loses thereby the Right of redemanding his Money: Which is founded upon the Principle established by JULIAN in a general Manner, I mean, that a Debtor continues such by the Law of Nature, whether the Judge condemns or discharges him: Judex, si male absolvit, & absolutus sua sponte solverit, repetere non potest, Leg. XXVIII. Our German Lawyer however goes so far as to maintain, that by Virtue of the Authority, which the civil Law gives to the Sentence of the Judge, the natural Obligation of the Debtor, discharged without Reason, is entirely extinguished, so that he may in Conscience dispense with paying his Debt, or redemand what he has paid thro' Ignorance. But this is a very evident Example of the Extremes into which People run when they are for reconciling, at any Rate, the Decisions of the antient Civilians, well or ill understood, with the Principles of natural Equity. The Debtor, in the present Question, either believed himself such before the Sentence, or was not convinced of the Debt, till after he was unjustly discharged. In the first Case, he ought not to have pleaded, and is as culpable in so doing, as the Person, with whom any Thing is deposited, is in denying the Trust. In the other, he is very excusable for having refused to pay what he did not believe he owed; but the Moment he discovered himself to be a Debtor, the Obligation of paying begins to display its whole Force. The Judge's Sentence does not diminish it in the least, and only leaves the Breach of Faith unpunished; supposing the Laws extended so far his Authority. The End, which Legislators propose to themselves, requires no more, as appears from the Principles I have laid down in my Discourse upon the Permission and Benefit of the Laws. Fortherest, if we examine all Mr. COCCEIUS says, in the Dissertation I speak of, to support his Hypothesis, and reconcile it with the Laws alledged to prove, that a Debtor unjustly discharged continues a Debtor by the Law of Nature, we shall conclude, I believe, that it would be very difficult to understand that modern Lawyer's Meaning, with out acknowledging, that the antient Lawyers in this as well as many other Things, were of a different Opinion: A Confession, which it would have been as hard to have extorted from Mr. COCCEIUS, as to have made him own that their Principles were sometimes incoherent, and inconsistent with the Law of Nature. The Reader need only see the extravagant Encomiums he makes upon them in the beginning of that Dissertation.

[2] Et quum, per injuriam judiciis, &c. Digest, De Distraction, Pignor. & Hypothec. Leg. XII. § 1.

[3] There is an Example of this in AMMIANUS MARCELLINUS, where we find that Julian the Emperor seized some Franks, till their King had restored all the Prisoners, as he had engaged to do by a Treaty of Peace: Quatuor comites ejus [Regis Hortarii] quorum ope & fide, &c. Lib. XVII. (Cap. XI. p. 189. Edit. Vales. Gron.) See LEO AFER, where he speaks of the Mountain Beni Gualid, (Lib. III. p. 211. of the old French Translation.) GROTIUS. They were not Franks, but Alamanni, whom Julian seized. Besides, they were kept for Hostages; so that this Example belongs to another Subject.

[4] These Horses were seized by Augeus King of Elis, and were sent by Nestor's Father to some Games that were celebrated there:

Καὶ γὰρ τῶ χρεῖος, &c.

Iliad, (Lib. XI. Ver. 697. & seqq.) Hyperochus reigned at that Time in Elis: Nestor killed his Son Hymoneus, who opposed his taking away the Herds of Oxen:

— Ὅτ' ἐγὼ πᾶνον Ἴτυμονήα, &c.

Ibid. (Ver. 761. & seqq.) POLYBIUS uses the Word Ἰύσια in the same Sense as EUSTATHIUS, speaking of the Achaeans, who used Reprisals against the Boeotians, with Philopoemen's Permission, Excerpt. Legat. XXXIII. See also Excerpt. CXXIII. I find also Ἰυσιάζειν used in DIODORUS SICULUS to express, to make Reprisals, Excerpt. Pieresc. But Ἰύσια καταγγέλλειν is an Expression used in War, upon a Subject very like this, as we shall see in the following Chapter, § 7. GROTIUS.

[5] Iliad. Ver. 704.

[6] Frumentum Cumis quum coemtum esset, &c. LIV. Lib. II. Cap. XXXIV. Num. 4.

[7] That Historian relates the Fact otherwise. He says, that the Romans, who had followed Tarquin, and whose Estates had been confiscated at Rome, upon seeing Roman Embassadors come to Cumae to buy Corn, immediately solicited Aristodemus, King of Cumae, first to put those Embassadors to Death: But not being able to obtain that, they fell in their Demand, and only desired Permission to arrest them by Right of Reprisals, till the Romans had restored them their Effects. Aristodemus set the Embassadors a Time to plead their Cause before him, and left them at Liberty, upon laying down a Sum of Money by Way of Security for their Appearance. As the Suit were commenced, and Nobody kept them in Custody, they fled. This Account is in Chap. II. and XII. of the Roman Antiquities. The Prince upon this caused the Servants, Cattle and Money they had brought for the purchase of Corn, to be seized, Cap. XII. p. 411. Edit. Oxon. (427. init. Edit. Sylb.)

[8] The Philosopher says, the Carthaginians had a great number of Strangers in their pay, whose Arrears they were not able to discharge. In order to pay off their Debts, they thought of this Expedient. They put out a Proclamation, that such Citizens and Inhabitants, as had a Right of Reprisals in regard to any State or Person, and were willing to claim it, should declare it. A great number of People presented themselves upon this Proclamation, and Ships, trading in the Euxine Sea under some manifest Pretext, were seized: After which a Time was fixed for judging what was a lawful Prize. By this Means a great Sum of Money was raised, and they were enabled to pay off the Troops, which they disbanded. The State out of its Revenues made Restitution to those who had been seized unjustly. Oeconomic. Lib. II. p. 503. C.

[b] B. 2. ch. 15. n. 7. and ch. 21. § 2. n. 2.

[1] See an Example of this in the Passage of HOMER, cited in the foregoing Paragraph, Note 5.

[2] But see what I have said upon the Place referred to in the Margin. Certainly, if our Author's Opinion took Place, the Right of Reprisals would be very useless to a Christian, when those, against whom he would use it, knew him to be in that Disposition: For they would not fail to defend themselves, till there should be a Necessity of killing them, if he did not let them go.

[b] B. 2. ch. 1 § 12, 13.

[a] Decius, Cons. 352. Bald. in leg. 3. Digest, De Offic. Adessor.

[1] But according to our Author himself, the Privileges of Embassadors take Place only with Relation to the Powers to whom they are sent, and not with Regard to those, thro' whose Dominions they pass: And he requires also, their having been acknowledged and received as Embassadors. See above, B. II. Chap. XVIII. § 5. Wherefore then should they not be liable to Reprisals, on the Part of those, to whom they are not sent; especially as Reprisals suppose certain Dispositions, which approach the State of Hostility?

[2] The Law of Nations grants this Right to all those, who cannot obtain Justice from the Sovereign of a Country, without considering whether they are Members of some other civil Society or not. So that for Instance, at the first Institution of civil Societies, when there were still many Individuals, who continued in the Independence of the State of Nature, those Individuals might no doubt use the Right of Reprisals, with Regard to those who were Subjects. Besides, those who being Subjects, use the Right of Reprisals, have not that Right, properly speaking, as Members of a civil Society; because they would have had it independently of that Relation, by Virtue of the Law of Nations, or rather the Law of Nature itself, according to what we have laid down above. Thus far therefore our Author's Opinion may be admitted. But it is true on the other Hand that Reprisals, being a kind of Act of Hostility, and an Introduction to a War; the End of civil Society requires, that private Persons should not make use of this Right, but with the Permission, either express or tacit, of the Sovereign; as the Commentators upon our Author have observed, who does not explain himself sufficiently in this Place. And in the Example, he alledges of this kind of Reprisals, which was practised by the Athenians, the Power, which the Relations of the Deceased had to seize three Persons of the State, that protected the Murderer, was founded, as we find, upon a formal Law.

[3] This must be understood in the same manner, as what we have just said in the preceding Note. The Refusal which has been made of restoring what was due, excuses the injured Person from keeping as a Pledge, the Things he has seized by Way of Reprisals and authorises him to appropriate them to himself. See PUFENDORF, Law of Nature and Nations, B. V. Chap. XIII. § 10. or last. But in a civil Society, the good of Order, and the fear of Consequences, require that the injured Persons be not Judges, and absolute Masters of the Reparation, which they may make to amount too high; and that we should even wait some Time to know whether Foreigners will not come to themselves, and pay what they owe, with the Charges, Damages and Interest.

[4] The Venetians followed this Rule of Equity, having taken the Genoese Ships in Galata. But they did not in the least diminish any Thing of the Goods in the Ships taken; their Lading was Wheat and Barley, and salt Fish, taken in the Lakes of Capais and Maeotis and the River Tanais; but these they carefully preserved, and when they had received their Debt, they restored them entire. NICEPHOR. GREGOR. Lib. IX. GROTIUS.

[b] See Aegid. Regius, De Act. Supern. Disp. 13. Dub. 7. n. 117.

[5] Thus PLUTARCH (in the Life of Cimon) of the Scyrians: Many of them would not contribute Money, but commanded those, who either had then in Possession, or had taken away other Men's Goods, to repair the Loss, (p. 483. C. Vol. I. Edit. Wech.) GROTIUS.

[a] B. 1. ch. 3.

[1] To which the Epithet Just is sometimes applied: Thus a Fight is said to be Just in Opposition to some slight Skirmish: Qui intentiore cura suos, quasi ad justum praelium, paucis adhortatus, &c. QUINT. CURT. Lib. III. Cap. XIII. Num. 8. See PRISCUS, upon this Passage, and ALBERICUS GENTILIS, De Jure Belli, Lib. I. Cap. II. p. 20, 21.

[2] Hostes hi sunt, &c. Digest, Lib. L. Tit. XVI. De verborum significatione, Leg. XCVIII.

[3] Hostes sunt, quibus bellum publice Pop. Romanus, &c. Digest. Lib. XLIX. Tit. XV. De Captivis & Postliminio, &c. Leg. XXIV. We find Examples of Persons taken by Robbers in the Poenulus of PLAUTUS and the Eunuchus of TERENCE. This was also the Fate of Eumaeus, as he relates it himself in the Odyssey of HOMER, Lib. XV. (Ver. 402. & seq.) GROTIUS.

[4] A piratis, aut Latronibus, capti, liberi permanent. Digest. Lib. XLIX. Tit. XV. De Captivis & Postlim. &c. Leg. XIX. § 2. Pompey declared those who had been taken by the Pirates to be free. APPIAN. Bell. Mithridatic. (p. 237. Edit. H. Steph.) See HERRERA, Vol. II. GROTIUS.

[5] In civilibus dissensionibus, &c. Ibid. Leg. XXI. § 1.

[6] He insinuates this in speaking of the antient Wars of the Romans, in Opposition to the civil War of Mark Anthony: Ac maioribus quidem vestris, &c. Orat. Philip. IV. Cap. VI.

[1] See PUFENDORF, Lib. VIII. Chap. VI. § 5. Of the Law of Nature and Nations.

[2] Consult what our Author says in his preliminary Discourse, § 24.

[3] PROCOPIUS describes them thus: A Multitude assembled and united not according to the Laws, but by their Crimes. Vandalic. Lib. II. (Cap. XV.) GROTIUS.
These Words are in the Oration of BELISARIUS, upon the Revolt of the Roman Soldiers in Africa.

[a] B. 2. ch. 15. § 5. n. 2 and ch. 20. § 43.

[4] In Lib. I. (§ 5. Edit. Oxon.)

[5] Geograph. Lib. XI. The Grammarian SAXO relates the same Thing of another People, Lib. XIV. (p. 234. where, however, there is nothing that has any Relation to this Subject.) PLUTARCH, speaking of the Inhabitants of the Isle of Scyros, says, that formerly they were contented with Piracy, but at Length they had arrived at such a Degree of Wickedness, as to rob the Strangers, who came to traffick with them. Vit. Cimon. p. 483. C. Vol. 1 Edit. Wech. GROTIUS.

The People STRABO speaks of are the Achaeans, the Zygiens, and the Heniochians, all inhabitants of one Coast of the Bosphorus, which makes a Part of Mount Caucasus. The Passage is: Μετὰ δὲ τῆν Σινδικήν, &c. p. 758. A. 759. A. Edit. Amstel. JACOBUS THOMASIIUS, who refers us to this Passage in his Dissertation intituled, Historia de latrocinio gentis in gentem, § 22. criticises our Author, as if thro' mistake he had understood all the Booty those People made, whereas the Geographer speaks only of the Persons they took. But he is mistaken himself, in having blindly followed the Latin Version, which without Reason so determines the Generality of the Sense, apparently from the ἀνδραποδισμῶν χάριτιν which goes before. The same Author also without ground confines the Passage in Question to the Heniochi, which relates equally to both the other People; as will appear upon examining the Sequel of the Discourse. In another Dissertation, De moralitate latrocinii gentis in gentem, §9. he quotes ARISTOTLE, who ranks the Heniochi amongst the Anthropophagi [or Maneaters] and there upon seems to question, what STRABO says of them in the Passage here cited. But the one does not hinder the other from being true.

[6] Ver. 85. & seqq.

[7] Semper enim ex eo quod maximas partes continet, &c. Cap. XXX.

[8] This is in a Fragment of his third Book, De Republica, which St. AUSTIN has preserved in his De Civitat. Dei, Lib. II. Cap. XXI. I shall give the Whole Passage, because it is fine: *Respublica res est Populi, quum bene ac juste geritur, sive ab uno Rege, sive a paucis Optimatibus, sive ab universo Populo. Quum vero injustus est Rex, quem Tyrannum voco; aut injusti Optimates, quorum consensus Factio est; aut injustus ipse Populus, cui nomen usitatum nullum reperio, nisi ut etiam ipsum Tyrannum adpellem: Non jam vitiosa, sed omnino nulla, Respublica est; quoniam non est res Populi, quum Tyrannus eam, Factiove, capessat: Nec ipse Populus jam Populus est, si sit injustus; quoniam non est multitudo Juris consensu, & utilitatis communione, sociata: "A State is really a State, that is to say, the Government of the Affairs of the People, when they are administred well, and according to the Rules of Justice, either by a King or the principal Persons of the State, or the Whole Body of the People. But when the King is unjust, which I call a Tyrant; or the principal Persons are unjust, and by agreeing together, form a Faction; or even the Body of the People are unjust, an Abuse, for which there is no Name that I know of, unless it may be called a Tyranny of the People: This, cannot properly be called a bad Government but absolutely none at all; since it is a Tyrant or Faction, that reigns and administers his, or their Affairs, and not those of the People. The People themselves are no more a Body of People, from the Moment they are unjust; because they are no longer a Multitude of People united together by a Community of Rights and Interests." It appears from hence that CICERO speaks of an Abuse of the Supreme Authority, carried so far by those, who have that Authority in their Hands, as to be an entire Subversion of lawful Government; in which Case he might well say, that the State, or Government was destroyed; tho' indeed, with regard to Strangers, it remains still a State, but an ill governed one.*

[9] Nec ideo tamen vel ipsum, &c. De Civit. Dei, Lib. XIX. Cap. XXIV.

[10] Orat. Borysthenit. & De Lege.

[11] This CICERO says of the Condition in which the publick Affairs were in his Time: Nec Leges ullae sunt, nec judicia, nec omnino simulacrum aliquod ac vestigium civitatis, Lib. X. Ad Famil. Epist. I. GROTIUS.

[12] That Orator does not speak of a Sovereign, who reigns tyrannically, but of a Man, who has possessed himself of the Government of a free State; for the Greeks gave the Name of Tyrant to such Usurpers, whatever Moderation and Equity they administred the publick Affairs with. ARISTIDES to induce the Rhodians to Unity and Concord, shews, that it is better for a Republick to lose its Liberty in that manner, than to be torn in pieces by Sedition and Civil Wars, and he alledges this amongst other Reasons, that some Legislators themselves have believed it necessary to make Laws under a Tyrant or an Usurper, whereas Nobody ever imagined, that a Government could ever be formed or subsist during a Sedition. Orat. De Concordia, ad Rhodios, Vol. II. p. 385. A. B. Edit. Paul. Steph.

- [13] Politic. Lib. V. Cap. IX. p. 401. B.C. Vol. II. Edit. Paris.
- [14] See Paragraph I. of this Chapter, Note 3.
- [15] Latrocinia nullam habent infamiam, &c. De Bell. Gall. Lib. VI. Chap. XXIII.
- [16] Nam quicquid inter Peucinos, &c. German. Cap. LXIV. Num. 2.
- [17] Iisdem temporibus, &c. Annal. Lib. XII. Cap. XXVII. Num. 3.
- [18] Nam populus Oëensis, &c. Ibid. Hist. Lib. IV. Cap. L. Num. 6.
- [19] A Triumph was decreed to Augustus Caesar, as we learn from APPIANUS ALEXANDRINUS, Bell. Illyric. p. 1208. Edit. Amstel. (766. Edit. H. Steph.) and not to Cneus Fulvius Centumalus, as GRONOVIVS says here, who confounds the Times and Persons. For that Consul's Expedition was followed by a Peace.
- [20] He triumphed on their account, but at the same Time he triumphed for having conquered Mithridates. See APPIANUS ALEXANDRINUS, De Bell. Mithridatic. p. 416, 417. Edit. Amstel. (252. Edit. H. Steph.) PLINY has preserved the Inscription of this Triumph, at the Head of which are these Words: Quum oram maritimam a praedonibus liberasset, &c. Hist. Natur. Lib. VII. Cap. XXVI. Pompey was not the only Person who had the Honour of a Triumph, for having conquered Pirates. See the Note of the learned GRONOVIVS.
- [1] It is said in the Book of Judges, Chap. XI. Ver. 3. that Jephtha went to settle in the Land of Tob, and there were gathered vain Men to Jephtha, and went out with him. This was against the Enemies of Israel, that harassed and pillaged them often. See Mr. LE CLERC's Commentary upon the Place. So that he only rendered like for like.
- [2] He became a famous King of Parthia from being a Captain of Robbers: Erat eo tempore Arsaces, vir, sicut incertae originis, ita virtutis expertae, &c. JUSTIN, Lib. XLI. Cap. IV. Num. 6, 7.
- [3] Ceterum Lusitanos VIRIATUS erexit, &c. FLORUS, Lib. II. Cap. XVII. Num. 15.
- [4] The antient Mamertines are an Example of this Kind. See DIODORUS SICULUS, in Fragment. (Lib. XXI. XXII.) GROTIUS.
- [5] Hoc malum si in tantum, &c. De Civit. Dei, Lib. IV. Cap. IV.
- [a] B. 1. ch. 3.
- [b] Cajet. 2. 2 Qu. 40 Art. 1.
- [1] As the Duke of Lorraine in CRANTZIES, Saxon. XII. 13. The City of Straelsund declared War against the Dukes of Pomerania, its Princes; the same CRANTZIVS, Vandal. XIV. 35. GROTIUS.
- [1] JOSEPHUS, the Jewish Historian, says, that it is unjust to make War without having first declared it. Antiq. Jud. Lib. XV. See Examples of Declarations of War, in CRANTZIVS, Saxonic. Lib. XI. and in the Life of Basilides, Great Duke of Muscovy, by ODERBORN, Lib. III. NICETAS, Lib. III. (Histor. Manuel. Comnen. Cap. VI.) blames the Sultan Chliziastlan; and elsewhere, Lib. V. (Cap. IV.) Neeman, a Prince of the Servians, for having acted in a different manner. GROTIUS.
- The promulgata praelia is not ENNIUS's but CICERO's, who uses this Expression of his own Head in citing some Words from that antient Poet: Etenim ut ait ingeniosus Poeta & Auctor valde bonus praeliis promulgatis, Pellitur e Medio non solum ista vestra verbosa simulatio prudentiae, sed etiam ipsa illa domina rerum SAPIENTIA :VI GERITUR RES. Orat.

pro Muraena. Cap. XIV. See AULUS GELLIUS, Lib. XX. Cap. IX. where he recites the Verses, from whence this is taken. Our Author fell into this small Mistake from having followed ALBERICUS GENTILIS, De Jure Belli, Lib. II. Cap. I. p. 217. In the Passage of JOSEPHUS, it is Herod who speaks and gives Athenion to understand, that in attacking him by Surprise, and without having declared War, he had committed a second Injustice, Cap. VIII. p. 522. D.

[2] Ac belli quidem aequitas, &c. De Offic. Lib. I. Cap. XI. JUSTUM BELLUM est, quod, &c. (Origin. Lib. XVIII. Cap. I.) GROTIUS.

I do not find that ISIDORE gives this Definition as from an antient Author: GROTIUS cites the Passage here, as he found it recited in the Canon Law, Caus. XXIII. Quaest. II. Can. I. But according to DENNIS GODEFROY'S Edition, which I use, it is: Justum Bellum est, quod ex praedicto geritur, de rebus repetitis, aut propuls and orumhostium causa. The Corrector of the Roman Edition maintains also, that this is the better reading, as it is confirmed by all the Manuscripts, as well as Editions. The Sense is much the same, according to our Author, who understands by edictum the same Thing as is meant by ex praedicto; which appears, from what he says a little lower, §7. Num. 4. So that the Definition, according to him, is defective, in not expressing the other Condition, or publick Deliberation, which the Declaration however supposes. ALBERICUS GENTILIS, De Jure Belli, Lib. II. Cap. I. p. 216, 217. pretends that ex edicto should be read; founding his Opinion solely upon the Passage in LIVY, which will be recited in the following Note.

[3] Bellum palam & ex edicto gerere, says our Author. He does not direct us to the Passage, where these Words are, tho' he might easily have done it after ALBERICUS GENTILIS, (ubi supra) from whom he has taken them. It is in the first Book, where the Historian, speaking of the War of the Fidenates and Vejentis against the Romans, says, that Metius Fuffetius, Dictator of Alba, had secretly encouraged them to undertake it, upon promise to assist them by betraying the Romans: QUIA suae civitati animorum. &c. Cap. XXVII. Num. 2.

[4] Hic exercitus [Acarnanum] primo, &c. Lib. XXXI. Cap. XIV. Num 10.

[1] Lib. I. Cap. LXXXVI. Edit. Oxon. The same Author makes the Plataean Deputy say, that by the Laws, of all Nations, it was allowable for a People to defend themselves against an Invader, Lib. III. Cap. LVI. For this Reason Flaminius, as DIODORUS SICULUS tells us, called the Gods and Men to witness, that he was not the Aggressor, but King Philip. Excerpt. Peiresc. p. 297. See MARIANA XIX. 13. and DEXIPPUS, in Excerpt. Legat. GROTIUS.

The Passages, quoted in this Note, speak only of the Justice of Defence against an unjust Aggressor; but have nothing in them that relates to Declarations of War.

[2] It is where he complains of Aeneas and the Trojans, for having plundered his Country without any Reason, and without having declared War. Antiq. Roman. Lib. I. Cap. LVIII. p. 46. Edit. Oxon. (47. Edit. Sylb.)

[3] It is in his Tacticks or Treatise upon the manner of drawing up an Army in order of Battle, a Work believed to be done by an Author more antient than him, whose Var. Histor. and Histor. Animal. are known to all the World. OBRECHT directs us to the Place of that Work, where this Passage is found, and that of PLATO quoted there. But he should have added, that neither the one nor the other are to the Purpose. AELIAN to prove the Utility of the military Art, says, that all Men ought to provide for War, for the Reason contained in the Passage of PLATO, which, as we shall see in the following Note, signifies something different from what our Author finds in it. The Words of him who cites the antient Philosopher are: Ὅτι μὲν τοι τὸ μάθημα, &c. Cap. I. p. 12. Edit. Arcer. 1618.

[4] The Cretan Interlocutor says, that even in Time of Peace, it is necessary to think of War; because properly speaking, there is no true Peace; all States, being naturally at War with each other, a War that is not declared by Heralds; that is to say, they either have a secret Enmity, or a Disposition to make implacable War against one another; according to the most common and known Signification of the Epithet, ἀκήρυκτος when joined with the Word War. De Legib. Lib. I. p. 626. A. Vol. II. Edit. H. Steph. So that there is nothing in the Passage which tends to establish, that when we act only on the defensive, the Declaration of War is unnecessary.

[5] Orat. ad Nicomed.

[6] Et nondum aut indicto bello, &c. Lib. XXXV. Cap. LI. Num. 2, 3.

[7] Provided we are well assured that he who detains our Right, will not restore it. Mr. CARMICHAEL, Professor at Glasgow, adds another Exception, which is, when we cannot retake our own without hurting others, who keep the Thing taken away or detained unjustly, in which Case he is of Opinion, that a conditional Declaration ought to precede. Not. in PUFENDORF, De Offic. Hom. & Civ. Lib. II. Cap. XVI. § 7. But if those People know or can easily know, that he, who gave them the Things to keep, possesses it unjustly; they are Accomplices in the Injustice, and there for edeserve to be treated with no greater Tenderness, than the principal Detainer. And if they are actually ignorant, it is the same in this Case, as when after having declared War in form, we commit Hostilities, which we foresee must hurt the innocent, as well as guilty, Subjects of the Enemy. This is a Misfortune to which they are exposed, by an inevitable Consequence of the Constitution of civil Societies: We are not therefore obliged to abandon, or suspend, the pursuit of our Effects or Rights, especially, when a favourable Occasion offers, which we are afraid to miss.

[a] B. 2. ch. 7. §2. B. 3. ch. 1. §2. n. 3. and ch. 2. § 2.

[b] B. 2. ch. 21. §2, &c.

[c] Mariana, Hist. Hisp. xxvii. 13.

[8] It is not only honest and commendable; we are even obliged to act so by the Law of Nature, as often as we can without Prejudice to ourselves. We do not indeed injure him, properly speaking, who, as far as in him lies, has given us just Cause to take up Arms against him. But the Love of Peace, Humanity, and Compassion for a great Number of innocent Persons, who are always involved in the Calamities of War, undoubtedly require, that all Means should be used to avoid it, and that we should retain as long as possible the Hope of bringing the Aggressors to right Reason.

[d] B. 2. ch. 23. §7.

[9] This is a Verse of SENECA, Agamemn. Ver. 153.

[10] The Jewish Historian, speaking of the War of the other Tribes against the Tribe of Benjamin, says, that as soon as they were assembled at Silo, after having known what had been done to the Levite's Concubine, they would have taken up Arms against the Inhabitants of Gaba; but the Council of the principal Persons of the Nation restrained them by representing, that they ought not to proceed so soon to a War with their Countrymen, or before they had proposed their Grievances to them by a friendly Conference; and that they were obliged the more to use such Delay, as the Law did not permit their marching with an Army, even against Strangers, whatever Wrong they might think they had received, without first sending Embassadors to endeavour to obtain a reasonable Satisfaction from them. Antiq. Judg. Lib. V. Cap. II. GROTIUS. The Law of DEUTERONOMY did not extend to all People, against whom the Israelites might make War. See Mr. LE CLERC's Comment. upon it.

[e] Deut. xx. 10.

[11] In the Original it is cum jure Gentium. But our Author intended no doubt to say, Jure Naturae or Jure Gentium communi; taking thus the Law of Nations in the same Sense as the Roman Civilians, and not as his arbitrary Law of Nations, of which he does not yet speak.

[12] Cyrop. Lib. II. Cap. IV. § 19. Edit. Oxon. in fin. Lib.

[13] But if one of the Enemies has attacked the other without declaring War, and has reduced him to the Necessity of defending himself without giving him Time to make a Declaration in form, shall not this War have the same Effect, as if it had been declared on one Side? And wherefore should the Attacked, who could not declare War, suffer, because the Aggressor, who could, did not declare it? Besides, we shall shew in the following Chapter, that the Effects meant by our Author, which are Impunity, and the Right of appropriating to ourselves what we take from the Enemy; that these Effects, I say, do not arise from the Declaration of War, nor from a pretended arbitrary Law of Nations, and that they are not particular to Wars declared in form. As to our Author's Division of Declarations of War into conditional and pure or simple; some Writers pretend, that it has no solid Foundation, and that every Declaration of War, in what so ever Manner it be made, is conditional, either expressly or tacitly. For, say they, we ought always to be disposed to accept a reasonable Satisfaction, and the Moment an Enemy offers that, we cannot continue the War against him without great Injustice, even tho' the Declaration, which preceded it, was pure and simple. But, besides, that our Author here treats of the Law of Nations, which according to him, often imports no more than Impunity; the Manner, in which he explains his Division, supposes that he, against whom War is declared purely and simply, has already sufficiently shewn, that he had no Design to spare us the Necessity of taking up Arms against him. So far therefore the Declaration of War may well be pure and simple, without Prejudice to the Dispositions, wherein we ought always to be, with regard to the future, if the Enemy will hearken to Reason; which relates to the Conclusion, rather than Commencement of a War; to the latter of which the Distinction of pure and conditional Declarations belongs.

[1] See PARUTA, De Bello Cyprio, Lib. I. PETER BIZAR. Lib. XXIII. where he speaks of the Turks: REINKING. Lib. II. Class. III. Cap. IV. GROTIUS.

[2] [RES RAPUISSE LICEBIT] Clarigationem exercere, hoc est per Feciales bellaindicere. Nam veteres laedere res, RAPERE dicebant, etiamsi Rapinae nullum crimen existeret: Similiter satis facere, res reddere dicebant. In AENEID. X. Ver. 14.

[3] This will be given in Note 8. upon this Paragraph.

[a] B. 2. ch. 21. §4.

[4] Clarigatio. Et Legati, quum ad hostes clarigatumque mitterentur, id est, res raptas clarè repetitum, unus utique Verbenarius vocabatur. Hist. Nat. Lib. XXII. Cap. II. See also SERVIUS in Aeneid. XI. (Ver. 53.) and X. (Ver. 14.) The Naturalist in the Passage here cited, says, that one of the Heralds, who went to make the Summons, was called Verbenarius, because he carried Vervain to the Enemy: As is said elsewhere: Nostri Verbenacam vocant: Haec est quam Legatos ferre ad hostes indicavimus, Lib. XXV. Cap. IX. GROTIUS.

[5] Eam se contumeliam injuriamque, ni sibi ab iis qui fecerint, dematur, ipsos omni vi depulsuros esse, Lib. VIII. Cap. XXIII. Num. 7.

[6] Praemittit [Germanicus] litteras ad Caecinam, venire se valida manu, ac ni supplicium in malos praesumant, usurum promiscuâ caede. Annal. Lib. I. Cap. XLVIII. Num. 1. He speaks there of the Revolt of Legions: So that it was a threatning of Chastisement, and not a Declaration of War.

[7]

Ἐλθὼν δ' ὑπὲρ τ' Ἄσωπον, &c.

Supplic. Ver. 383. & seqq. There is a Declaration of War of the like Kind in the Battle of the Frogs and Mice, ascribed to HOMER, (Batrachomyomach. Ver. 135. & seqq.) In PLAUTUS's Amphitryon we see, that General sends first the principal Officers of his Army to the Telebaeans, to tell them, that if without coming to Blows, they would agree to restore what they had taken from the Thebans, and deliver up the Authors of those Violences, he would return with his Troops and leave them in Peace; and if not, he would immediately lay Siege to their City, and push it on with the utmost Vigour:

Principio ut illo advenimus, &c.

(Act I. Scen. I. Ver. 48. & seqq.) See also CROMER, Derebus Polon. Lib. XXI. GROTIUS.

In the Passage of POLYBIUS, to which the learned GRONOVIVS refers us here, I cannot tell whether any Thing is meant, but the Right of Reprisals, upon which our Author has cited the same Historian in the preceding Chapter, § 5. Note 5. The Eleutherneans, suspecting that Timarchus, one of their Citizens, had been assassinated by the Order of Polemocles, Admiral of Rhodes, gave Permission at first to use Reprisals against the Rhodians, and afterwards declared War against them, Lib. IV. Cap. LIII. In my Opinion, far from departing here from the ordinary Signification of the Word Ἐύσια, it is very natural to apply it in this Passage. As to condicere, see the form of Declarations of War in the following Note.

[b] See the Passage cited in §5. n. 2.

[c] See an Example in Bembus, l. 3.

[8] Si non deduntur, quos exposcit [Legatus] diebus tribus & triginta, (tot enim solennes sunt) peractis, bellum ita indicit: Audi, Jupiter & tu Juno, Quirine, Diique omnes coelestes, vosque terrestres, vosque inferni, audite. Ego vos testor, populum illum, (quicumque est nominat) injustum esse, neque jus persolvere. Sed de istis rebus in patria majores natu consulemus, quopactojus nostrum adipiscamur. Cum his nuntius Roman ad consulendum redit. Confestim Rex, his fermé verbis Patres consulebat: Quarum rerum, litium, causaram, condixit pater patratus Populi Romani Quiritium patri patrato priscorum Latinorum, hominibusque priscis Latinis, quas res dari, fieri, solvi, oportuit, quas res nec dederunt, nec fecerunt, nec solverunt, dic, inquit ei quem primum sententiam rogabat, quid censes. Tum ille: Puro pioque duello quaerendas censeo; itaque consentio, consciscoque. Inde ordine alii rogabantur: Quandoque pars major eorum, qui aderant, in eamdem sententiam ibat, bellum erat consensu fieri solitum; ut Fecialis hastam ferratum, aut sanguineam praeustam, ad fines eorum ferret, & non minus tribus, puberibus praesentibus diceret: Quod populi priscorum Latinorum, hominesque prisci Latini, adversus populum Romanum Quiritium fecerunt, deliquerunt, quod Populus Romanus Quiritium bellum cum priscis Latinis jussit esse, Senatusque Populi Romani Quiritium censuit, consensit, conscivit, ut bellum cum priscis Latinis fieret; ob eam rem ego populusque Romanus populis priscorum Latinorum, hominibusque priscis Latinis, bellum indico facioque. Id ubi dixisset hastam in fines eorum mittebat. LIV. Lib. I. Cap. XXXII. Num. 9. 14. where the form of declaring War by the Romans is very curiously related at large. The late Mr. JAMES GRONOVIVS, in a long Note upon this Passage, has pretended, that our Author was deceived in believing after TURNEBIVS that the Word Condixit, used here in the Deliberation upon the War, signifies the preceding Summons, or the conditional Declaration of War. But I confess, the Reasons of that learned Man do not appear sufficiently strong to make me subscribe to his Criticism. He says that neither in LIVY nor elsewhere is it found, that the King at Arms (Pater patratus) was employed to make that Summons or Demand; that it was always attributed to the Heralds, without mentioning their Chief, and that LIVY in Chapter XXIV. of the same Book says very expressly, that the Pater patratus only took the Oath, and recited the Conditions in Treaties of Alliance. But it suffices, that this Chief did not go alone, and that he was attended by some other Heralds, in order to his being comprised under the general Name of Feciales: Now this is what SERVIUS says in so many Words, upon Ver. 14. of B. X. of the Aeneid, tho' he speaks elsewhere of the Feciales in general, without mentioning the Pater patratus. Unless therefore it be clearly proved, that in this Passage of LIVY, the Summons (clarigatio) is not meant, his Authority is of Use to explain, what other Authors and himself have said in a general manner, in Places, where the Question was not to describe more particularly a Thing, which they supposed sufficiently known. The Grammarian SERVIUS, in one and the same Passage, (one Part of which I shall cite presently, and the other in Note 11.) after having said, that the Chief of the Heralds was the Person who declared War, ascribes that Declaration a little lower to the Feciales in general. As to the twenty fourth Chapter of LIVY, I find there indeed, that the Pater patratus is employed to treat of Alliances, but I find nothing which insinuates that this was his sole Business. And on the contrary, the Passages, cited also from SERVIUS, say, that the Heralds, and their Chief without Distinction, made Alliances and declared War: Atqui Feciales & Pater patratus, per quos bella vel Foedera confirmabantur, numquam utebantur vestibis lineis—Qua [verbena] coronabantur Feciales & Paterpatratus foedera facturi, vel bella indicturi. In Aeneid. XII. 120. Thus the order of the Things are changed, that we may not think the one regards the Feciales, and the other the Pater patratus. But here is an express Passage of the same Grammarian: Quum enim volebant bellum indicere, Paterpatratus, hoc est, princeps Fecialium, proficiscebatur ad hostium fines, & praefatus quaedam solennia, clara voce dicebat, se bellum indicere propter certas causas: Aut quia Socios laeserant, aut quia nec abrepta animalia, nec obnoxios, redderent. Et haec Clarigatio dicebatur a claritate vocis. In Aeneid. IX. 53. He will have it moreover that the Word Condicere is only said of Things in regard to which the two Parties agree. But FESTUS tells us, that it signified in general to declare and make known: CONDICERE est dicendo enuntiare. In short the whole Connection of the Discourse, and even the Terms of the Deliberation upon the War, are repugnant to what is meant here by condixit, a Treaty lately made between the Latins, and the Romans, as he imagines who criticises our Author in this Place. The Historian describes in general the manner in which Satisfaction was demanded, and the War afterwards declared. Whence it is that after the refusal of restoring what was due, mention is made of a People, whosoever they were: Populum illum (quicumque est nominat). The Latins are indeed named after: But that is because the Terms of Forms require their being determined to some particular People. And in the Form in Question, the first Words, Quarum rerum, litium, causarum plainly denote every Kind of Complaint in general, and all Affairs, about which they might have any Controversy with each other: So that they do not seem to me compatible with the Determination of the Sense of condixit, to the Ceremony of concluding a Treaty. But farther: The Historian says clearly, that the Reason, why Satisfaction was demanded of the Latins was their having made Incursions into the Territories of the Romans: Et quum incursionem in agrum Romanum fecissent, repetentibus res Romanis superbe responsum reddunt, Num. 3. He was not therefore speaking of the Violation of a Treaty: Of which it is probable he would not have omitted to say something. I insert this Note, as I composed it several Years ago at Lausane. I have since seen with Pleasure, that Mr. JENS in a good Dissertation, De Fecialibus Populi Romani, (which is Part of his Ferculum Literarium published 1717.) is exactly of the same Opinion with me, and tacitly refutes the late Mr. GRONOVIVS almost by the same Reasons. It may be seen, by what there is of more or less in the one and the other, and by the different manner in which our Arguments are turned; that as that learned Gentleman could not take from me, I have not robbed him. All the rest of his Dissertation is well worth reading.

[9] Consultique Feciales ab Consule Sulpicio, &c. LIVY, Lib. XXXI. Cap. VIII. Num. 3.

[10] Consul deinde Manius Acilius, &c. Idem, Lib. XXXVI. Cap. III. Num. 9, 11.

[11] Denique, quum Pyrrhi temporibus, &c. In Aeneid. IX. 53.

[12] See THUCYDIDES, Lib. I. Cap. XXIX. Edit. Oxon.

[1] It was a Staff, or Kind of Scepter, wrapped up in a Figure of Serpents twisted together. PLINY says, that the Use of this Figure came from a Sort of Eggs, formed by a Heap of Serpents twined and glued in a Manner to each other; so that this Staff was intended to be an Emblem of Peace between two Enemies, who reciprocally send Heralds with the Caduceus in their Hands, Angues innumeri, aestate convoluti, &c. Hist. Nat. Lib. XXIX. Cap. III. See also SERVIUS upon the Aeneid. Lib. IV. (ver. 242.) and Lib. VIII. (ver. 138.) GROTIUS.

It appears by the Passage of PLINY, which our Author only quotes, and still better by those of SERVIUS, to which he refers us; that the Caduceus was a Token of Peace rather than War, and therefore, that the proper Design of its Institution was not to declare War. The Commentator upon VIRGIL says expressly, that those who carried the Caduceus were Embassadors of Peace, as the Feciales were employed in declaring War. Unde, secundum LIVIUM, legati pacis Caduceatores dicuntur. Sicut enim per Feciales, a foedere [dictos should be added here] bella indicebantur; ita pax per Caduceatores fiebat. In Aeneid. IV. 242. See also ISIDORUS, Orig. Lib. VIII. Cap. XI. Col. 1027. Edit. Gothofr. SUIDAS calls the Caduceus Σύνημα Φιλίας, a Symbol of Friendship, (voce Κηρύκειον) which he has taken from POLYBIUS, Hist. Lib. III. Cap. LII. And AULUS GELLIUS informs us, upon the Authority of some antient Histories, that the General Quintus Fabius, intending to give the Carthaginians their Choice of War or Peace, sent them from the Roman People, a Pike and a Caduceus, as two Signs, the one of War and the other of Peace. Quod Q. Fabius, Imperator Romanus, dedit ad Carthaginientes e pistolam, ubi scriptum fuit Populum Romanum misisse ad eos hastam & caduceum, signa duo belli aut pacis, &c. Noct. Attic. Lib. X. Cap. XXVII. But I find in THUCYDIDES, two Passages which prove clearly, that the Use of the Caduceus, supposed the War already declared. The first is in the Place where he relates the Sea-Fight between the Corinthians, and the People of Corfu. The latter being victorious, the others thought of retiring, but as they apprehended that the Athenians, who were come to the Aid of the People of Corfu, with a considerable Reinforcement, would look upon the Fight as a Rupture of the Alliance, and consequently, upon them as Enemies; they sent some Persons to them in a Skiff, without the Caduceus, to sound their Sentiments, says the Historian; which manifestly implies, they intended to shew on their Side, that they did not mistrust them, nor consider them as declared Enemies. Lib. I. Cap. LIII. Edit. Oxon. The other Passage is at the End of the same Book, where the Historian says, that notwithstanding all the Differences which he had related, the People of Peloponnesus had not discontinued their Commerce with each other, and went freely into each other's Country, without the Caduceus, tho' not without some Mistrust. Cap. CXLV. The Historian says also, in the Beginning of the following Book that after the Peloponnesian War broke out, they had no longer any Communication without the Caduceus. See the Greek Scholiast upon the two last Passages.

[2] See the Passages of PLINY, which are cited above, § 7. Note 2 and FESTUS, on the Word Sagmina. LIVY, however, mentions the Use of this Herb only in the Ceremony of Treaties of Alliance, for which the chief Herald at Arms was sent. Lib. I. Cap. XXIV. Num. 4, 5. and Lib. XXX. Cap. XLIII. Num. 9. He says not a Word of it in the Place where he relates the Manner of demanding Satisfaction, and declaring War, tho' every Thing there seems well circumstantiated. Might not the Circumstances of those two Ceremonies have been confounded? We may be induced to believe so, from a Passage in VARRO, where that learned Roman says, that Vervein was to the Romans what the Caduceus was amongst the Greeks; namely, a Token of Peace; pacis signum VARRO pronuntiat. De Vita Populi Romani. Lib. II. Verbenatus ferebat verbenam; id erat Caduceus, pacis signum, nam Mercurii virgam possumus aestimare. Apud NON. MARCELL. p. 528. Edit. Paris. 1614.

[3] That Javelin was burnt at the End, as LIVY says, who puts also the Alternative of a Javelin, headed with Iron. See the Passage cited in Note 9. upon the preceding Paragraph.

[4] This is what LIVY tells us the College of Heralds were consulted upon, in the War against Antiochus and the Aetolians. Et num prius societas eis [Aetolis] & amicitia renuntianda esset, quam bellum indicendum. Lib. XXXVI. Cap. III. Num. 10.

[5] See SERVIUS upon the ninth Book of the Aeneid, (ver. 53.) and AMMIANUS MARCELLINUS, Lib. XIX. (Cap. II. p. 229. Edit. Gron. Vales.) with the Note of the learned LINDENBROG upon that Passage. GROTIUS.

Our Author supposes in this Place, that the Heralds threw a Javelin twice into the Enemy's Lands, Hastae missio iterum. But he was mistaken, through his misunderstanding the Sequel of the Discourse, in the Passage of SERVIUS which he cites; as it would be easy for me to prove.

[6] It is in the Place where, to retort the Reproach of Novelty thrown on the Christians, he shews that the Romans themselves had in many Things abandoned the Customs of their Ancestors. Amongst others he gives for an Example, that the College of the Feciales, or Heralds at Arms, were no longer consulted in Regard to War, nor sent to demand Satisfaction in Form, before the Declaration of War; and that the Time for beginning a War was no longer signified by a Flag displayed upon the Capitol. Quam paratis bella, signum monstratis ex Arce? Aut Fecialia jura tractatis? Per clarigationem repetitus res raptas? Adversus Gentes, Lib. II. p. 91. Edit. Ludg. Batav. 1651.

[7] I shall set down the Passage wherein he informs us, that in his Time the Feciales were still employed in making publick Treaties, but not in declaring War. Feciales, quod fidei publicae inter Populos praeerat: Nam per hos fiebat, ut justum conciperetur bellum, (& inde desitum) & ut foedere fides pacis constitueretur. Ex his mittebant, antequam conciperetur, qui res repeterent: & per hos etiam nunc sit foedus, &c. De Ling. Lat. Lib. IV. p. 23. Edit. H. Steph. As for these Words, & inde desitum, I am inclined to believe that the Author wrote sed inde desitum. The Change of sed into & might very easily happen. Mr. JENS, in his Dissertation cited above, p. 64. suspects that there is another Word corrupted in this Place; conciperetur for conscisceretur.

[8] It is from APPIANUS Alexandrinus, that our Author has taken this Circumstance. De bell. Punic. p. 69. Edit. Amstel. (43. H. Steph.)

[9] Our Author had probably in his Eye the long Discourse made by Maecenas to Augustus, when the latter asked his Advice with Regard to his Design of abdicating the Government of the Republick. But I find nothing, either in this Discourse or that of Agrippa, that relates to the Forms used in Declarations of War. The Origin of the false Citation is this, ALBERICUS GENTILIS, De Jure Belli, Lib. II. Cap. I. in fin. p. 218. remarks, that Maecenas, (apud DION. Lib. LII.) seems to say, that only Democratical States observe the Formalities with which Declarations of War are attended. What gave the Italian Civilian Occasion to form this Conjecture, was the Passage where Maecenas says, that in advising Augustus to retain the Government of the State, he does not pretend to persuade him to act as a Tyrant, but only to regulate, in Concert with the chief Men of Rome, all the Affairs of the State, in a just Manner, and conformably to the Good of the Publick. He represents at the same Time, that the State would thus be much better governed, and in Consequence more happy, than if the supreme Authority were put into the Hands of the People. When it shall be necessary (says he, amongst other Things) to undertake a War, you will do it secretly, and by making good Use of favourable Occasions. p. 542. E. Edit. H. Stephens. The War here meant is not one made rashly, and without being declared; but Augustus's Courtier, as appears from the Sequel of his Discourse, opposes Wars undertaken wisely to dangerous Wars, in which the Romans had been engaged by the tumultuous Deliberations of the People; Secresy not being observed in them, and the ambitious great Men finding Means to win the Populace, and to make them consent to take Arms under their Conduct. This is the true Sense of the Passage: Our Author has followed, without Hesitation, that which GENTILIS spoke with some Doubt.

[1] Diffidato Principe, diffidati ejus adherentes. See BALDUS, Ad Leg. II. Code, De Servis, Num. 70. For in their barbarous Phrase Diffidare signifies to declare War.

[2] Feciales responderunt. — Aetolos ultro sibi, &c. LIVY, Lib. XXXVI. Cap. III. Num. 13.

[1] See what is said above, B. I. Chap. III. Num. 4.

[2] Mr. BUDEUS, in his Dissertation intitled Jurisprudentiae Historicae Specimen. § 110. subscribes here to our Author's Opinion, which is also that of the Generality, even of his Commentators, except OBRECHT. The latter, speaking of the Case in Question, upon the Passage cited in the preceding Note, which however relates to another Thing, contents himself with referring to Chap. XXXV. of B. I. of CAESAR's own Commentary upon the War in Gaul. CAESAR there, alledging his Reasons for undertaking the War with Ariovistus, says, amongst other Things, that in the Consulship of Messala and Piso, the Senate had decreed, that whoever should be Proconsul of Gaul, should defend the Eduans, and the other Friends of the Roman People, as much as he could, without Prejudice to the Welfare of the Republick. Quoniam M. Messala M. Pisone, Coss. &c. BOECLER, in his Dissertation De Actis Civitatis, Vol. I. p. 887. approves this Reason, and confirms it by the Example of CICERO, who, when Proconsul of Cilicia, believed himself authorized to act something like it, by Vertue of a like Decree of the Senate, as appears from what he says himself, Lib. XV. Epist. Ad Familiar. II. FLORUS also speaks of Caesar's Expedition against Ariovistus, as of a very just War. Sed prima contra Germanos illius pugna, justissimis quidem ex causis: Haedui enim de incursionibus eorum querebantur. Quae Ariovisti superbia? &c. Lib. III. Cap. X. Num. 10. And DION CASSIUS makes Caesar say, that the extraordinary Command decreed him by the Senate and People of Rome, included a Permission to undertake War against whomsoever he should think fit. Lib. XXXVIII. p. 96. B. Edit. H. Steph. So that the Question only is to know whether Caesar had good Reasons for making Use of this Permission. It is not denied but that this Conqueror might have been prompted by his Ambition, which made him seek and embrace eagerly all Occasions for taking up Arms: But as the Thing itself, and not the secret Motives, is the Matter in Question, it suffices that Ariovistus had given him just Occasion to attack him. Now this is what the late Mr. CELLARIUS proves very well in a good Dissertation, De C. Julii Caesaris adversus Ariovistum Regem, aliosque Germanos Bello; which is the sixth of the Collection, published MDCCXII. Ariovistus, says he, had no Right to appropriate a Part of Gaul to himself: That Prince pretended in vain, that he had made himself Master of it by Right of Conquest. Admitting that he had Reason for passing the Rhine, and for joining the Sequani against the Haedui, why did he not return home after the War was ended? Why did he oppress both his conquered Enemies, and the Conquerors his Friends, by loading the former with Imposts, and depriving the latter of the best Part of their Lands. It was besides the Interest of the Romans, not only to protect the Haedui, their Allies, but also to hinder Ariovistus from continuing too long in Gaul. The Example of the Cimbri and Teutones gave them just Reason to apprehend lest the Fancy should take him to enter their Province, and settle in it.

[3] In the same Class may be placed the War made by Ulysses, and his Companions, against the Ciconians, who, during the Siege of Troy, had sent Aid to Priam, under the Command of Mentes. See HOMER, Odys. Lib. VIII. and the Scholia of DIDYMUS, upon Ver. 40. GROTIUS.

[4] Patres rogationem ad Populum, &c. LIVY, Lib. XXXVI. Cap. 1. Num. 5.

[5] Senatus consultum inde factum, &c. Idem. Lib. XLII. Cap. XXXI. Num. 1.

[a] Alb. Gentilis, l. 2. c. 2.

[1] As the Romans did to Porsenna, as PLUTARCH relates, in the Life of Publicola. The Turks two Days before a Battle make Fires in several Places. CHALCOCONDYLAS, Lib. VII. GROTIUS.

See what is said, Chap. I. of this Book, § 20.

[2] But are People more assured of that, when a Herald comes to declare War with certain Ceremonies, than they would be when they see an Army upon their Frontiers, commanded by some principal Person of the State, and ready to enter the Country? On the contrary, might it not more easily happen, that a Person, or some few Persons, should assume the Character of Heralds, than that one Man should raise an Army by his own Authority, and march at the Head of it to the Frontiers, without the Sovereign's Privity? And the Thing could still less be supposed to happen on both Sides. The Truth is, that the principal End of Declarations of War, or at least what occasioned the Custom of them to be established, was, as some Commentators upon our Author observe, to make known to all the World, that there was just Cause for taking up Arms, and to signify to the Enemy himself, that it had been, and still was, his Fault, if he did not avoid it. I find in NONIUS MARCELLUS, a Passage of VARRO, part of which our Author has cited elsewhere, (Preliminary Discourse, § 27.) from whence it appears clearly, that this was the Opinion of the antient Romans. They undertook no War hastily, says he, or without just Cause; from whence it was that they declared it beforehand, and established, for that Purpose, some Heralds at Arms, whom they sent, to the Number of four, to demand Satisfaction of those from whom they believed they had a Right to exact it. This is visibly the Sense of the following Words, tho' not very correct in some Places, Itaque bella & tardé & magna licentia, [MERCIER tells us it is writ so in all the Manuscripts, instead of nulla licentiâ, which was in the other Editions. Might not magna decentia be read, a Term of which that Grammatician cites an Example, p. 203. from CICERO ? for the Explanation MERCIER gives us here, valde licito, appears too subtle] suscipiebant: Quód bellum nullum, nisi pium, putabant geri oportere, prius indicerent, [indicebant probably should be read, a Word, which having been changed by the Copyists into indicerent, has occasioned the foisting in quam after prius in the preceding Editions] bellum iis, a quibus injurias factas sciebant: Feciales legatos res repetitum mittebant quatuor, quos Oratores vocabant. In Voce Feciales, p. 529. Edit. Mercer. DIONYSIUS HALICARNASSENSIS refers also to the extreme Regard the Romans had to Justice in their Wars, the Establishment of the College of the Feciales, and in particular, the Function of declaring War, with which these were charged. Antiq. Rom. Lib. II. Cap. LXXII. The Grammarian SERVIUS is of the same Opinion, in a Passage which our Author has quoted several Times: He says, that Ancus Marcius seeing the Roman People too fond of War, and that they often engaged in it without just Cause, borrowed from the Aequicolae the Fecial Law. Sed Ancus Marcius, quum videret Populum Romanum ardentem amore bellorum,&c. In Aeneid. X. 14. It does not appear, that in all this they thought of the Effects of which our Author speaks.

[3] Ad arma protinus, &c. De Ira, Lib. III. Cap. II.

[a] Ayala, l. 1. c. 1.

[1] See what I shall say, Chap. VI. of this Book.

[b] Alberic. Gentil. l. 2. c. 2.

[2] But see what I have already said in Note 13. upon Paragraph 6. of this Chapter.

[a] §6.n.6.& § 8. in fin.

[1] This is required even by the Law of Nature itself, as often as it can be done without Prejudice to ourselves, eventho' there is not much Hope that he, against whom War is declared, should be inclined to prevent it, by giving us Satisfaction. For we ought to neglect no Means of letting all the World know, and even the Enemy himself, that we do not take Arms to obtain or defend our just Rights, till reduced to the last Extremity, and after having tried all other Methods, and given the Enemy full Time to come to himself.

[1] Aeneid. Lib. X. ver. 11. & seqq.

[2] Nam si quando homines aut animalia, &c. In Aeneid. Lib. X. ver. 14.

[3] These Words have already been cited, upon Paragraph 7. of the preceding Chapter, Note 4.

[4] I do not see how our Author can deduce this Consequence from the Passage of SERVIUS. It is plain, in my Opinion, that all the Grammarian means, is, that before War was declared, in the Manner which he informs us was usual, it was allowed to plunder; because, before that, the People of whom there was Room to complain were not yet considered as Enemies; in a Word they were not yet at War.

[a] Ch. 3. § 1.

[1] He speaks of Things indifferent in themselves, as is the Use of all Kind of Meats without Distinction, from which, however, we ought to abstain, when eating them is not expedient; that is to say, when some bad Effect, either in Relation too thers, or ourselves, may result from it. But then those Things become obligatory; and consequently, the Passage makes nothing to the Subject. See what our Author himself says, in his Notes upon the New Testament.

[2] TERTULLIAN against Marcion, I. Abstinence from Marriage would be no Matter of Commendation, if Licence (to marry) were taken away. See the same Author, B. I. Ad uxorem, upon this Subject, and concerning Flight in Times of Persecution; and St. JEROME against Helvidius, A Virgin deserves the greater Honour, while she disdains that, which to do were no Sin. And against Jovinian, Therefore does CHRIST love Virgins the more, because they freely give what was not commanded them: And to Pammachius, Difficult and heroical Actions are always left to the Choice of those who have Courage to undertake them, that, as they are free, they may be worthy of Recompence. And Saint CHRYSOSTOM, upon 1 Cor. vii. declares Continence to be the better; and upon Rom. vii. 6. If we keep not the Commandments, we are threatened with Hell, thereby shewing that Things positively commanded, are not like those that are left to the free Choice of the Combatant, (such are Virginity, and the renouncing of our Possessions) but the others must of Necessity be performed: And in his second Oration, concerning Fasting, He left Virginity without the Lists, he left it above what we are commanded to strive for, so that they who keep it may shew the Greatness of their Soul, and they who do not may enjoy the Favour of GOD. Which he afterwards applies to ἀκτημοσύνη, The Renouncing of Possessions. To which we may add what GRATIAN gathers out of St. AUSTIN, and others. Caus. XIV. Quaest. I. GROTIUS.

This Distinction between Counsels and Precepts, and the Application of it to the Examples here given by our Author, have been sufficiently refuted, B. I. Chap. II. §9. Note 19.

[a] Lib. 1. c. 18.

[3] STROMAT. IV. where, among other Things, he speaks of one married a second Time, He does not indeed sin against the divine Covenant, for there is no Law that forbids it; but he does not fulfil that most excellent Perfection of an evangelical Life. GROTIUS.

That Father speaks here indeed of second Marriages, but in the Words immediately going before he seems to speak of Polygamy in general, as simply contrary to evangelical Perfection, whether a Man has several Wives one after another, or at the same Time. He says, that GOD not only permitted, but required, under the Law, that Men should marry in that Manner, for the Multiplication of Mankind. Ἀλλ' ὁ αὐτὸς ἐνῆρ, &c.

[b] Ad Pollent. 1. 1. c. 13. and 18.

[4] Heic autem ubi de dimittendo, &c. Ad Pollent. De adulter. conjug. Lib. I. Cap. XIX. See Canon Law, Caus. XXVIII. Quaest. I. (Cap. VIII. IX.) where many Things have been copied from Chap. XIV. and XVIII. GROTIUS.

[5] Si tamen quum posset effundere, Digest. Lib. XVIII. Tit. VI. De periculo & commodo rei venditae, Leg. I. § 3. This Example is ill applied. See what I have said upon PUFENDORF, Law of Nature and Nations, B. V. Chap. V. § 3. Note 8. of Edition II.

[6] TERTULLIAN, in his Exhortation to Chastity, Permission often exposes one to the Temptation of violating the Rules of the Gospel: And again, all Things are lawful, but we cannot do every Thing that is lawful without Prejudice to Salvation. And COLUMELLA, in his Preface to B. VII. Neither must we take Advantage of what so ever is lawful, for the Antients reputed Summum jus, the Rigour of the Law, to be the greatest Torment. And St. JEROM, The Rigour of Law is the highest Wickedness. Ep. ad Innocent. GROTIUS.

[7] See PUFENDORF, B. VII. Chap. I. § 3. Law of Nature and Nations.

[8] Sunt enim quaedam, &c. Instit. Orat. Lib. III. Cap. VI. p. 173. Edit. Obrecht. But Mr. BYNKERSHOEK has shewn, in his Observat. Jur. Civ. Lib. I. Cap. I. that this Orator, and some other antient Authors, have mistaken the Law of the Twelve Tables, which only signifies, that the Creditors might sell their Debtor by Auction, in Order to divide the Price of his Liberty between them. This is not the only Instance wherein Moderns have understood certain Passages of Antiquity better than antient Authors.

[9] In speaking of CINNA, who had unjustly put some illustrious Romans to Death. Beatusne igitur, qui hos interfecit, &c. Tusculan. Quaest. Lib. V. Cap. XIX.

[10] Heic jam, judices, vestri consilii res est, &c. Orat. pro C. Rabir. Posthum. Cap. V.

[11] This is what St. CHRYSOSTOM says, where he speaks of St. John the Baptist, who, notwithstanding that, presumed to say to King Philip Herod, and with Authority: It is not lawful for you to have this Wife. De Poenitent. VIII. GROTIUS.

[c] B. i. ch. 3, 4.

[12] De IV. Consul. Honor. ver. 267.

[13] STOBÆUS has preserved this Saying. The Philosopher added, that the Princes who use such Language to their Subjects, do not long retain their Dignity. Florileg. Tit. XLVI. (or XLVIII.) Admonit. De Regno. p. 328. Edit. Gesner. 1549.

[14] He gives, for Instance, the Permission of going into Bawdy-Houses. Potest, inquit, Haec enim Lex, quid oporteat, quaerit; aliae, quid Liceat. Licet ire in lupanar. Lib. IV. Controv. XXV. p. 308.

[15] Dissimulans scire, quod sunt aliqua, quae fieri non oportet etiamsi Licet. Lib. XXX. (Cap. VIII. p. 657. Edit. Vales. Gron.)

[16] Oportet quidem, quae sunt inhonesta, non quasi illicita, sed quasipudenda, vitare. Lib. V. (Ep. XIV. Num. 9. Edit. Cellar.)

[17] Est enim aliquid, quod non oporteat, etiamsi Licet. (Cap. III.)

[18] Ut eum nihil delectaret, quod aut per naturam Fas esset, aut per leges Liceret. Cap. XVI.

[19] Ego porro non hanc interpretationem istius verbi video ut jura spectanda sint, sed illud aliquando, uti justitia spectetur. Declam. CCLI. (See also Declam. CCCLXVI. in fin.)

The Reader, upon this Subject, may see my two Discourses, De Legum permission. & Benefic. which are annexed to the fourth Edition of PUFENDORF's De Offic. Homin. & Civis.

[a] Ch. 1. § 2. & seq.

[1] L. Sulla cui omnia in victoria, &c. (Orat. II. Ad Caesar. De Republ. Ordinanda, Cap. XLVIII. p. 126. Edit. Wasse) SENECA makes Pyrrhus say the same Thing in one of his Tragedies:

Quodcumque libuit facere Victori, licet.

Troad. (Ver. 335.)

[1] It is not necessary to suppose here a tacit Consent of Mankind, or an arbitrary Law of Nations, of which the Reality cannot be proved. We can produce very good Reasons, founded on the Law of Nature itself, and which take Place with regard to other Wars, besides those that are publick and declared in form, to which our Author without Reason confines the Impunity he speaks of. Let us suppose, that in the Independence of the State of Nature, thirty Heads of Families, inhabiting the same Country, but having no other Tye amongst them, than that of Neighbourhood or Friendship, which Neighbourhood might occasion; should form a League amongst themselves to attack or repel a Body, composed of other Heads of Families: I say, that neither during that War, nor after its being terminated, those of the same Country, or elsewhere, who had not joined in the League of either Side, ought or could punish as Murtherers or Robbers, any of the two Parties who should happen to fall into their Hands. They could not do it during the War: For that would be espousing the Quarrel of one of the Parties, and as they continued Neuter at first, they had evidently renounced the Right of intermeddling in what should pass in the War. And much less could they do it after the Conclusion of the War; because as the War could not be concluded without some Sort of Accommodation or Treaty of Peace, the Parties concerned were reciprocally discharged from all the Evils they had done to each other. This the Interest of human Society also required. For if those, who continued Neuter, had however been authorised to take Cognizance of the Acts of Hostility, exercised in a War of others, and to punish such as they believed to have committed unjust ones, or to take up Arms on that account, instead of one War, two or more might have arisen and proved a Source of Quarrels and Troubles. The more Wars became frequent amongst Mankind, the more it was necessary for their Tranquillity, as well to avoid espousing rashly other People's Quarrels, as, when it was not judged proper to take Part in a War, to consider all that should pass in such a War, as authorised by the Right of Arms. The Establishment of civil Societies only rendered this Impunity the more necessary; because Wars then became, if not more frequent, at least more extensive, and attended with a greater number of Evils. There is nothing then here, which either requires the general Consent of Nations, or is peculiar to Wars made between two Sovereigns, and declared in form. The Effect in Question, is founded on one of the clearest and most general Laws of natural Right, and the Custom of most Nations, conformable to it, only renders the Practice of it more indispensable, since, as I have observed several Times, we are, and ought to be, deemed to conform to a known Custom, when we do not declare at a proper Time that we intend not to follow it. Our Author excepts the Wars against Robbers and Pirates: But he probably makes the Exception only with respect to them, as he has done above, in regard to the Right of appropriating to ourselves Things taken in War, § 12. of the preceding Chapter. Now, if those Robbers have not the Privilege of Impunity, it is because they are Robbers, (See DEMOSTHENES, Orat. de Halones. Princ.) and consequently People, whose Acts of Hostility are all manifestly unjust, the declared Enemies of Mankind: Whereas in other Wars, it is often very difficult to determine which Side is in the Right; so that the Affair remains, and ought to remain, undecided, with regard to those, who have joined neither Party. As to civil Wars, which our Author excepts also, the Reasons I have alleged are still stronger with regard to them, than with regard to the Wars made between two Kings, or two States; because the Constitution of civil Societies, and the Peace of Mankind make it still more requisite, that Strangers should not rashly intermeddle in what passes within a State. And it is quite another Question, whether Impunity, and the Right of appropriating to ourselves what is taken in War, have, or have not, Place amongst the Members of the same civil Society, either in the Wars of one Part of a Republick against the other, or in those of a King against his Subjects: The Decision of that Question depends on other Principles. In fine, I do not see, that the Declaration of War contributes any Thing to the Effects under Consideration. It is often no more than a meer Ceremony. But whether the War be, or be not, declared, the Reasons I have laid down still subsist in all their Force. See further what I have said in the preceding Chapter, § 6. Note 13. and § 11. Note 2.

[2] Atque ex auctoritate [legati Massiliensium] haec, &c. CAESAR, De Belle civili, Lib. I. Cap. XXXV.

[3] Quonam modo ea, quae belli jure, &c. Lib. XXXIX. Cap. XXXVI. Num. 11.

- [1] Ione, Ver. 1334.
See also Ver. 1046, 1047. PLATO says, that according to an antient Law, founded upon an Oracle at Delphos, those, who had killed an Enemy in War, ought not to be looked upon as defiled; no more than if they had killed a Friend without Design in some publick Exercise: About which the Philosopher makes a Law in his imaginary Republick; where he often borrows those already established amongst the Greeks. De Legib. Lib. IX. p. 165. A. B. Vol. I. Edit. H. Steph.
- [2] See above, B. I. Chap. II. § 5. with the Notes 5 and 7. I find a remarkable Passage on this Subject in ANTIPHON, Orat. XIV, XV. The Greek Orator says, that the Reason why all Tribunals, which take Cognizance of Murther, judge and pass Sentence in an open Place, is solely, that the Judges may not be in the same Place with the Criminal, whose Hands are polluted with Blood, and that the Accuser also may not be under one Roof with the Murtherer, p. 93. Edit. Wechel. See also Orat. XVI. p. 139.
- [3] Quae autem singulis victor aut ademi, aut dedi, quum BELLI JURE, tum excujusque merito satis scio me fecisse, Lib. XXVI.
- [4] Sed haec patienda censeo potiús, &c. Idem, Lib. XXI. (Cap. XIII.) Num. 9.
- [5] Atque haec tamen hostium iratorum, ac tum maxime dimicantium, JURE BELLI, in armatos repugnantesque edebantur, Lib. XXVIII. Cap. XXIII. Num. 1.
- [6] Tibi porro inimicus cur esset, a quo quum interfici BELLI LEGE, &c. Cap. IX.
- [7] Nam quum, ipsius VICTORIAE conditione, JURE omnes victi occidissemus, &c. Cap. IV.
- [8] CAESAR, nuntiis ad civitatem Aeduorum missis, &c. Comment. De bell. Gall. Lib. VII. (Cap. XLI.)
- [9] De bell. Judaic. (Lib. III. Cap. XXIV. p. 852. B.)
- [10] (THEBAID. Lib. XII. Ver. 552, 553.) The Grammarian SERVIUS observes, that Priam complains, not that Pyrrhus had killed his Son Polytes, as he might do by the Right of War: But that he had made the Father the wretched Spectator of the Son's Death: ME CERNERE] De spectaculo queritur, non de morte. Quia JURE BELLI Polyten Pyrrhus occiderat: Sed cur ante oculos patris? In Aeneid. II. (Ver. 538.) SPARTIANUS speaking of the Persons, whom the Emperor Severus had caused to be put to Death, distinguishes those who had been killed by the Law of Arms: Multos praetereaobscuri loci homine interemite, praeter eos, quos jus praelii absumsit. In Vit. Sever. (Cap. XIV.) GROTIUS.
- [11] Nam in pace caussas & merita spectari, &c. Annal. Lib. I. Cap. XLVIII. Num. 3.
- [12] Celeberrimos auctoreshabeo, tantam victoribus adversus fas nefasque irreverentiam fuisse, ut gregarius eques, occisum a se proxima acie fratrem professus, praemiumaducibus petierit. Nec illis aut honorare eam caedem, jus hominum; aut ulcisci, ratio belli permittebat. Hist. Lib. III. Cap. LI. Num. 1, 2.
- [13] Jam primum omnium satis constat, Troja capta, in ceteros saevitum esse Trojanos, duobus Aenea Antenoreque, & vetusti jure hospitii, & quia pacis, reddendaeque Helenae, semper auctores fuerant, omne JUS BELLI Achivos abstinuisse, Lib. I. Cap. I. Num. 3.
- [14] Quae clam commissa capite luerent, eadem, quia paludati fecerunt, laudamus. Epist. XCV. (p. 464. Edit. Gron. Var.) See what is said above, B. II. Chap. I. § 1. Num. 3. GROTIUS.

[15] Madet orbis mutuo sanguine, &c. Epist. II. Edit. Pamel. or Lib. Ad Donatum, de gratia Dei, p. 5 and 7. Edit. Fell. Brem.

[16] Quantum autem, &c. Instit. Divin. Lib. V: Cap. IX. Num. 4. Edit. Cellar.

[17]

Jusque datum sceleri canimus — —

Pharsal. Lib. I. Ver. 2.

[a] Liv. 1. 38. c. 48. See above, ch. 2. of this book, §2. n. 2.

[c] Ad Leg. V. Dig. De Justitia.

[1] See BEMBO, Hist. Lib. I. CICERO justifies Ligarius for this Reason, that being in Africa before the Civil War, it was not in his Power to leave it when it broke out suddenly: [Tertium est tempus, quo post adventum Vari in Africa restitit Ligarius; quod si est crinosum, necessitatis crimen est, non voluntatis. An ille, si potuisset illinc ullo modo evadere, Uticae potius, quam Romae; cum P. Attio, quam cum concordissimis fratribus; cum alienis esse, quam cum suis, maluisset? Orat. pro Ligar. Cap. II.] The Roman Consuls, when they went to besiege Capua, had Orders to declare first to the Campanians within it, that if they thought fit, they might quit the Place with all their Effects: Consulibus literae a P. Cornelio praetore missae, Ut prius quam clauderent Capuam operibus, &c. LIVY, Lib. XXV. (Cap. XXII. Num. 12.) GROTIUS.

[2] The late Mr. COCCEIUS, in a Dissertation which I have already cited, De jure Belli in amicos, § 23. rejects this Distinction, and is of Opinion, that even Strangers, to whom some small Time to retire has not been given, should be deemed of the Enemy's Party, and thereby liable to just Acts of Hostility. He himself afterwards distinguishes, to supply this pretended Defect, between Strangers, who continue in a country, and those, who only pass thro' it, or if they make any stay, are obliged to do so either by Sickness, or the Necessity of their Affairs. But even this shews, that Mr. COCCEIUS here, as well as in many other Places, has censured our Author without understanding him. In the following Paragraph, GROTIUS evidently distinguishes, from the Strangers he speaks of just before, those, who are the Enemy's Subjects from a permanent Cause; by which without doubt he means, as the learned GRONOVIVS explains it, those who are settled in the Country. Our Author explains himself upon this Head, in Chap. II. of this Book, § 7. Num. 2. where he speaks of Reprisals, which he even grants against this kind of Strangers; whereas he does not admit them against those who only pass thro', or stay some short Time in the Country. So that here is the precise Distinction, which the Critick gives for new.

[3] They extended this Permission to the People of the City, as well as Strangers. THUCYD. Lib. I. Cap. XXVI. See another Example in the same Historian, Lib. IV. Cap. XV. where a Term of five Days is granted them to depart.

[1] See above, Chap. II. of this Book, § 7. Num. 2. and Note 2. upon the preceding Paragraph of this Chap. IV.

[a] Ch. 3. of this Book, §9.

[2] This is a Fragment of a Tragedy of that Poet's, which is not named by the Writer, who has preserved it: It is in p. 429. of our Author's Excerpta, and the 363d Verse of Mr. BARNES's Collection; neither of them mention the Author from whom they take it.

[3] Transfugas licet, ubicumque inventi, &c. Digest, Lib. XLVIII. Tit. VIII. Ad Leg. Cornel. de Sicariis, &c. Leg. III. § 6.

[4] See what we shall say below, Chap. VI. § 26. and ALBERICUS GENTILIS, Hispanic. Advocation. Lib. I. Cap. VI. as also PAULUS MATTHIAS WECHNER, Consil. Franconic. XCII. GROTIUS.

[b] B. 2. ch. 21. §6. n. 1.

[5] Add, that the Sovereign of the Country, by continuing Neuter has tacitly engaged not to permit Acts of Hostility to be committed on either Side in his Dominions.

[6] Ipsē [Scipio] cum C. Laelio, &c. Lib. XXVIII. (Cap. XVII. Num. 12. & seqq.) There are other Examples in History of the like Nature. The Venetians hindered the Greeks from attacking the Turks in one of their Ports. CHALCOCONDYL. Lib. IX. See what was done at Tunis in regard to the Venetians and Turks in BEMBO, Lib. IV. and in Sicily, relating to the Pisans and Genoese. In BIZARO, De bell. Pisan. See also PAULINUS, Goth. in regard to Rostoch and Gripswald. GROTIUS.

[c] Triremes, with three Oars on each Side.

[d] Having five Oars on each Side and not three, as our Author says here.

[1] Quorum connexa cum Cananaeis erat caussa, says our Author: That is to say, whom the Divine Vengeance had condemned to be utterly extirpated, as well as the seven Nations of the Canaanites. Such were the Midianites, NUMBERS xxi. 2. the Amalekites, EXODUS xvii. 14.

[2] JOSEPHUS speaking of the Amalekites says, that King Saul caused them all to be put to the Sword, without sparing either Women or Children. [See 1 Samuel xv. 3.] not believing, adds he, that he acted too cruelly in that respect; first because they were Enemies whom he treated in that manner, and next because what he did was by the Order of GOD, which he could not disobey without Danger. Antiq. Jud. Lib. VI. Cap. VIII. GROTIUS.

[e] B. 2. ch. 21. § 14.

[3] Iliad. Lib. XXII. Ver. 61. The Emperor Severus, ordering his Soldiers to put all to the Sword in Britain, used some other Verses of HOMER, in which Agamemnon says, that none of the Trojans should be saved, not even the Children in their Mother's Wombs:

— — Τῶν [τρώων] μήτις, &c.

[Iliad. Lib. VI. Ver. 57. & seqq. See XIPHILINUS, Vit. Sever. p.342. Edit. H. Stephens.] GROTIUS.

[f] Lib. 7. c. 29.

[g] De Exped. Alexand. l. 1. c. 8. in fin.

[h] Bell. Hispan. p. 457. Edit. Amst. (272. H. Steph.)

[4] Non sexus, non aetas, miseracionem adtulit. Annal. Lib. I. Cap. LI. Num. 2. Scipio did the same at the taking of Numantia. The Emperor Julian's Soldiers killed the Women of the City of Dacira, whom the Men had left in it; as ZOSIMUS tells us, Lib. III. (Cap. XV. Edit. Cellar.) The same Emperor, when he took the City of Majozamalcha in the Country of Babylon, spared neither Sex nor Age: Et sine sexūs discrimine vel aetatis, &c. AMMIAN. MARCELLIN. Lib. XXIV. (Cap. IV. p. 436. Edit. Vales. Gron.) GROTIUS.

Our Author gives us no Authority for what he says of Scipio: And indeed in all Appearance he had none to give, but that of an unfaithful Memory. We find nothing like it in the Historians, who have writ of the War and taking of Numantia. Scipio, far from having put the Women and Children to the Sword, as APPIANUS ALEXANDRINUS expressly says, kept only fifty of the Numantines, after the City surrendered, for his Triumph; all the rest were sold. De Bell. Hispan. p. 532. Edit. Amstel. (311. H. Steph.)

[5] I find nothing in JOSEPHUS, from whence it can be so much as inferred that Titus made the Jewish Women and Children encounter wild Beasts. On the contrary, that Historian says, after the taking of Jerusalem, Titus caused all those to be sold, that were under seventeen Years of Age. De Bell. Jud. Lib. VII. Cap. XVI. in Lat. (XLV. in Graec.) p. 968. C. Our Author has copied this from ALBERICUS GENTILIS, De Jure Belli, Lib. II. Cap. XXI. p. 425. But the latter alledges no Authority except CARDAN's, a very inaccurate Author, who declaims on that Head against Titus in his Encomium Neronis. The Words of the latter are Pergamus ergo ad illas humani generis delicias, Titum, Neronique comparemus, qui uno spectaculo aliquot millia Judaeorum, in quibus pueri & mulieres, feris dilaniandos exposuit. Auctor illius amicus JOSEPHUS : Ne quicquam ex fide decedere credas, Vol. I. p. 205. Opp. Edit. Ludg. 1663.

[2] Troad. Ver. 333.

[3] Ver. 446.

[4] Lib. I. Epist. 69.

[5] SERVI [dicuntur] qui servati sunt, quum eos occidi oporteret jure belli. In TERENT. Adelphi, Act. II Scen. I. Ver. 28.

[a] L. 1. c. 30.

[b] Appian. Hannibal. Bell. p. 556.

[6] Et a M. Bruto non pauci. And M. Brutus also put many to Death. These Words, which were in the first, have disappeared, I know not how, in all the subsequent Editions; tho' the Citation from DION CASSIUS, Lib. XLVII. where the Fact is, p. 405. D. is continued in the Margin. They could not have been struck out designedly by our Author, who had no Reason to retrench a Fact well applied.

[7] Pro tuo, inquit, summo beneficio, Scipio, &c. De bell. Afric. Cap. XLV.

[1] See the ILIAD. Lib. XX. Ver. 463. & seqq. Lib. XXI. Ver. 73. & seqq.

[2] The Passage, that regards Mago, has been given in Note 1. on the foregoing Paragraph. That in Relation to Turnus is in Aeneid. XII. 930. & seqq.

[3] Quod alibi jure belli licuisset, &c. De Civit. Dei, Lib. I. Cap. I.

[4] Our Author cites Nobody here, and would, I believe, have found it very difficult to have alledged any Authority for this Fact, with which his Memory supplied him. Alexander the Great's Historians say nothing like it. That Conqueror sent the Greeks that were taken at the Battle of the Granicus into Macedonia to work as Galley-Slaves. See ARRIAN, De expedit. Alexandr. Lib. I. Cap. XVII. and at the End of this Book.

[5] Postero [die] misère legatos [Uspenses]— quod adspernati sunt victores, quia trucidare deditos saevum, tantam multitudinem custodia cingere arduum: Ut belli potius Jure caderent. Annal. Lib. XII. Cap. XVII. Num. 1, 2.

[a] See Thuan. l. 70. in fin. in the Affairs of Ireland, at the Year 1580.

- [1] Or rather the principal Persons of the Aurunci, to whose Party this Latin Colony had gone over. LIVY, who relates this Action, condemns it at the same Time: Ceterum nihilo minus foedè, dedita urbe, quam si capta foret, Aurunci passim principes securi percussi; sub corona vaenierant coloni alii, &c. Lib. II. Cap. XVII. Num. 6.
- [2] I find nothing of this Kind in Relation to the Samnites, either in PLUTARCH or APPIANUS ALEXANDRINUS. Our Author has followed ALBERICUS GENTILIS in this Place, without examining his Authority, De Jure Belli, Lib. II. Cap. XVII. p. 364. This appears from his citing, as he does, DION. Lib. XLV. instead of XLIII. a Citation that relates to the Example of the Numidians, and not as our Author thought, to that of the Samnites, for which the Civilian, whom he copies, quotes no Writer. The latter probably had in his Thoughts, what Sylla did to the People of Antemna, a City of the Sabines, but not without notorious Perfidy, since he had promised them their Lives. PLUTARCH, in Vit. Syll. p. 471. D. Vol. I. Edit. Wechel. So that the Example is misapplied.
- [a] Dion Cassius. l. 43. p. 245. Edit. H. Stephens.
- [c] Idem, l. 40. p. 156.
- [3] See CICERO, Lib. V. in Verr. (Cap. XXX.) LIVY, Lib. XXVI. (Cap. XIII. Num. 14.) and elsewhere: TACITUS, Annal. Lib. XII. (Cap. XIX. Num. 3.) There is an Example of the same Kind in the Chronicle of REGINON, upon the Year 905. GROTIUS.
- [4] Galba upon making his Entrance into Rome, ordered those who had surrendered to him to be decimated: Horror animum subit, quoties recordor feralem introitum, & hanc solam Galbae victoriam, quum in oculis Urbis decimari deditos jubenet, quos deprecantes in fidem acceperat. TACT. Hist. Lib. I. (Cap. XXXVII. Num.3.) Quumque, direptis omnibus, Aventicum, gentis caput, &c. Ibid. Cap. LXVIII. Num. 5, 6. GROTIUS.
- [a] Chalcocondylas, l. 8.
- [b] B. 2. c. 21.
- [1] (Lib. XIV. Cap. XLVII. p. 421. Edit. H. Steph.) The other Passage is in Lib. XVI. Cap. XXXI. p. 526. See also what the same Historian says in the Excerpta of Mr. PEIRESKIUS, in regard to Spondius, and Amilcar Barca, (p. 277.) GROTIUS.
- [2] It was not the Neapolitans, who made this Answer to Belisarius, but two Advocates, Pastor and Asclepiodotus, speak thus to the Goths and Neapolitans, Lib. I. Gothic. Cap. VIII. Our Author has again in this Place relied upon ALBERICUS GENTILIS who expresses himself precisely in these Terms, Lib. II. De jure Belli, Cap. XVI. p. 345, 346.
- [3] Praesidio decedere, apud Romanos, capital esse. LIVY, Lib. XXIV. (Cap. XXXVII. Num. 9.) See also POLYBIUS, Lib. I. (Cap. XVII.) and Lib. VI. (Cap. XXXV.) GROTIUS.
- [a] Plut. De Virt. Mulier.
- [b] Dion. Halicarn. l. 6 c. 30.
- [1] TACITUS, whom our Author cites here in the Margin, speaks only of the Children of Kings in general, without saying whether young or not: Ideo Regum obsides liberos dari [a Parthis] &c. Annal. Lib. XII. Cap. X. Num. 5. He says elsewhere, partem prolis, Lib. II. Cap. I. Num. 2. In the Passage of the MACCABEES, there is only ἰουός. However as the Term is general; nothing hinders its including young Children, whom their tender Age and Innocence might render more dear to their Parents, and thereby more proper to serve as Sureties to those, who demanded or received them for Hostages. This may be inferred almost with certainty from a Passage in STRABO, quoted by JUSTUS LIPSIUS : For we find there, that Phraates King of Parthia gives Titius, Governour of Syria for the Romans, four of his legitimate Sons as Hostages, with two of their Wives, and four of their Sons. Geograph. Lib. XVI. p. 1085, 1086. Edit. Amstel. (748. Edit. Casaub. Par.) For in this Number there must have been some Children very young. But the following are express Authorities. SUETONIUS informs us, that Caligula in one of his ridiculous Diversions, placed himself upon a Chariot in the Habit of a Coachman, and set an Infant, named Darius, before him, who was an Hostage of the Parthians: Postridie quadrigario habitu, curriculoque bijugi famosorum equorum, prae se ferens Darium PUERUM, ex Parthorum obsidibus, &c. Vit. Caligal. Cap. XIX. The same Historian speaks elsewhere of certain Hostages, probably given by some People of Germany, whom Caligula ordered to be taken from School: Rursus obsides quosdam abductos e literario ludo, &c. Cap. XLV. But it is also known that the famous Clelia, having the Choice amongst all the Hostages given with her by the Romans, obtained Liberty for those, who were not arrived at the Years of Puberty: Productis omnibus eligisse IMPUBERES dicitur, &c. LIVY, Lib. II. Cap. XIII. Num. 10.

[c] 1 Mac. xiii. 16.

[d] In the famous Story of Clelia, Liv. 1. 2. c. 13.

[2] Our Author cites here the fourth Book of TACITUS's History in the Margin, where I find nothing to this Effect. The Passage is in the Description of Germany, where the Historian says, that those People believed themselves more strongly obliged, when they gave Maids of illustrious Birth as Hostages: Adeo ut efficacius obligentur animi Civitatum, quibus inter obsides puellae quoque nobiles imperantur, Cap. VIII. Num. 2. He adds, that the Germans imagined most Women to have a Spirit of Prophecy: And as he speaks also of this in the fourth Book of his History, Cap. I. XI. Num. 4. that probably made our Author confound the two Passages in his Memory.

[1] Without this general Consent, which it is more easy to suppose, than prove; it suffices to say, that, it being the Custom among Nations at Variance with us, not to make Use of Poison against an Enemy, we are supposed to comply with it, when on beginning a War, we do not declare, that we are at Liberty to act otherwise, and leave it to the Enemy's Option to do the same. This tacit and particular Convention is so much the more real, as Humanity, and the Interest of both Parties, equally require it; since Wars are so frequent, and often undertaken upon so slight Occasions, especially since the Mind of Man, ingenious in inventing Means to do hurt, has so much multiplied those, which are authorised by Custom, and considered as honest. See upon this Head Mr. GRIBNER, Professor at Wittemburg, in his Principia Jurisprudentiae Naturalis, Lib. III. Cap. IX. § 3.

[2] The Senators, or rather the Consuls, C. Fabricius, and Q. Aemilius, in the Letter they wrote to inform Pyrrhus, that one of his People had offered to poison him, say, that it was not for his sake they gave him that Information, but that they might not incur the Infamy of having caused him to be destroyed in that Manner. [PLUTARCH, in Vit. Pyrrh. p. 396. C. Vol. I. Edit. Wechel.]GROTIUS.

[3] Haec ad ea, quae ab Eumene delata erant, accessire, quo maturius hostis Perseus judicaretur. Quippe, quem non justum modo adparare bellum regio animo, sed peromnia CLANDESTINA grassari SCELERA latrociniorum ac VENEFICIORUM cernebant. Lib. XLII Cap. XVIII. Num. 1.

[4]

— — Bellumque negavit [Fabricius]
Per famuli patrare NEFAS. — —

De Bell. Gildonic. Ver. 273, 274.

[5] Sed magnum dedecus & flagitium, quicum laudis certamen fuisset, cum non virtute, sed SCELERE superatum. De Offic. Lib. III. Cap. XXII.

[6] Sed communis exempli & fidei ergo visum est, uti te salvum velimus; ut esset, quem armis vincere possemus. EX CLAUD. QUADRIGAR. Noct. Attic. Lib. III. Cap. VIII.

[7] Et [memor Senatus] armis bella, non venenis, geri debere. Lib. VI. Cap. V. Num. 1.

[8] The Passage has been recited above, Chap. I. § 20. Note 21.

[a] See Bemb. Hist. l. 2. in fin.

[9] That Lawyer would, I believe, have found it very difficult to point out the Passage of VEGETIUS, where he pretends to have read this: As ALBERICUS GENTILIS has already observed, De Jure Belli, Lib. II. Cap. VI. p. 256.

[1] They made use of the Gall of Vipers. OVID, who tells us this, calls it giving Death two Ways with one Wound:

*Qui mortis saevo gement ut vulnere caussas,
Omnia vipereo spicula felle linunt.*

De Ponto, Lib. I. Eleg. II. Ver. 17, 18. PLINY says of the Scythians, that they rubbed their Darts with human Blood, and the Gore of Vipers: SCYTHAE sagittas tingunt viperina sanie, & humano sanguine, irremediabile id scelus, mortem illico adfert levi tactu. PLINY,
Hist. Natur. Lib. XI. Cap. LIII. See HELMOLDUS's Supplement, where he says something like this of the Servians, Chap. IV. GROTIUS.

[2]

Spicula nec solo spargunt [Parthi] *fidencia ferro
Stridula sed multo saturantur tela veneno.*

Pharsal. Lib. VIII. Ver. 303, 304.

[3] The Nubians:

Tempora multiplici mos est [Nubis] *defendere lino,
Et lino munire latus, scelerataque succis
Spicula dirigere & ferrum infamare veneno.*

SILIUS ITALIC. Lib. III. Ver. 271. & seqq. NICHOLAS HEINSIUS reads inflammare veneno.

[4]

Sed didicit non Ethiopum geminata venenis Vulnera — —

In I. Cons. Stilicon. Lib. I. Ver. 350.

[5] Therefore Ilus Mermerides denies Poison to Ulysses for his Darts.

Ἐπει ἕα θεοῦς νεμεσίζετο αἰὲν ἕοντας.

- [6] Nec Veneni, licet videam ab Infidelibus, &c. Polycratic. Lib. VIII. Cap. XX. p. 653.
- [7] In the Verses quoted above, Note 3. upon this Paragraph.
- [8] Where he speaks of a Roman General, who had poisoned the Springs, to oblige some Cities to surrender: AQUILIUS Asiatici belli reliquias confecit, mixtis (nefas!) veneno fontibus ad deditionem quarumdam urbium. Quae res, ut maturam, ita infamem fecit victoriam: Quippe quum CONTRA FAS DEUM, MORESQUE MAJORUM, medicaminibus impuris, in id tempus sacrosancta Romanorum arma violasset. Lib. II. Cap. XX. Num. 9. See ult.
- [9] This the Geographer proves from a Column, upon which in his Time remained the Articles of the Conventions, those People had made with each other in Relation to Acts of Hostility. Lib. X. p. 688. B. (448. Edit. Paris.)
- [1] By dead Bodies or Lime; as Belisarius did during the Siege of Auximum according to PROCOPIUS, Gotthic. Lib. II. (Cap. XXVII.) GROTIUS.
- [2] The Turks did the same at Diadibra, as NICETAS tells us in the History of Alexis, Brother of Isaac, Lib. I. (Cap. IX.) See other Examples in OTHO FRISINGENS. and the Poet GUNTHER, in Ligurin. GROTIUS.
- [3] During the Siege of Cirrha or Crissa, a City of Phocis, Solon advised the Amphictyones to turn off the River Plithus, which ran through the City; after which he caused the Roots of Hellebore to be thrown into it, and then ordered the Waters to be brought into their ancient Channel. The People of Cirrha, having drank of them, were seized immediately with a Diarrhoea, which obliged them to leave their Walls undefended, so that the Place was taken. This PAUSANIAS relates, whom our Author quotes in the Margin, Lib. X. or Phocic. Cap. XXXVII. p. 356. Edit. Graec. Wechel. See also POLYEN. Strategem. Lib. VI. Cap. XIII. Our Author quotes also in the Margin, besides FRONTINUS, Strateg. Lib. III. Cap. VII. Num. 6. the Orator AESCHYNES, Orat. de male obita Legat. The Passage he had in his Thoughts, was probably the Article of the Oath of the Greeks, by which they engaged not to destroy any City, that sent Members to the Council of the Amphictyones, and not to deprive them of the Use of any running Water, either in Time of Peace or War; which implies, that otherwise it might be done against an Enemy. p. 262. A. Edit. Basil. 1572.
- [a] Frontin. l. 3.
- [b] Priscus. in Excerpt. legat.
- [1] This is related after ALBERICUS GENTILIS, De Jure Belli, Lib. II. Cap. VIII. p. 274. who cites BONFINIUS, Rerum Hungar. I. 8. in the Margin.
- [2] Lib. V. Cap. LXXXI.
- [a] Warnefrid, l. 6.
- [3] He wished to have such brave Men on his Side, Juberem macte virtute esse, si pro mea patria ista virtus staret. LIVY, Lib. II. Cap. XII. Num. 14.
- [4] Caeterum inter molitionem pii pariter ac fortis propositi oppressus, &c. Lib. III. Cap. III. Num. 1. PLUTARCH praises this Scaevola, as a Man distinguished by all Virtues, and especially by his Skill in military Affairs. (Vit. Poplicol. p. 106. B. Vol. I. Edit. Wech.)

[5] Mortem — ego vir consularis, tantis rebus gestis, timerem? Praesertim cum ejus essem civitatis, ex qua Q. Mutius solus in castra Porsennae venisset, eumque interficere, proposita sibi morte, conatus esset? Orat. pro P. Sextia, Cap. XXI.

[b] Justin, 1. 2.

[*] The Emperor Valens promised a Reward to whoever brought him the Head of a Scythian, upon which they made Peace with him; as ZOSIMUS tells us, Lib. IV. (Cap. XXII. Edit. Cellar.) GROTIUS.

This is not very exactly related. See the Passage in ZOSIMUS.

[c] Livy, 1. 27.

[d] Tac. Hist. 1. 5.

[6] Offic. Lib. I. Cap. XL. And JOSEPHUS, Antiq. Hist. XV. There is a like Action of Theodosius against Eugonius, in ZOSIMUS, B. IV. of the Gauls against the King of Persia, in AGATHIAS; of ten Persians against Julian, in AMMIANUS, XXIV. and ZOSIMUS III. of Alexius Comnenus against Toruses, in NICETAS CHONIATAS, B. IV. De Manuele; of the Bulgarians against the Emperor Nicephorus, in ZONARAS, (Vol. III. in Nicephor.) GROTIUS. It is not Alexius Comnenus, but Andronicus, that NICETAS CHONIATES speaks of. The Fact is in Chapter IV. of the Book referred to.

[e] Livy, 1. 2.

[7] De Bell. Punic. (p. 33. Edit. Amstel. 2. H. Steph.)

[f] See Cromer. Rer. Polon. 1. 5. p. 113. Edit. Basil.

[8] This is a Verse from PLAUTUS's Trinumum. Act. IV. Scen. III. ver. 30.

[9] Upon a different Subject; for he speaks of those that by false Hopes deceive an avaritious Person, who wanted to get their Estates. Alii contra hoc ipsum laudibus ferunt, quod sit frustratus improbas spes hominum; quos sic decipere, pro moribus temporum, prudentia est. Epist. VIII. Num. 3.

[10] ZIEGLER accuses our Author here of contradicting himself, and what he had advanced above; at the End of the first Chapter of this Book, § 21, 22. And it must be confessed from the Manner in which our Author expresses himself in this Place, that he seems to give Room to think, either that it is always unlawful by natural Right to make use of a Traitor, for obtaining some Advantage, or committing some Act of Hostility against an Enemy; which is contrary to the Distinction he makes in the Place referred to; or that the Law of Nations, of which he speaks, as forbidding the Assassination of an Enemy by the Hand of a Traitor, regards only those who have solicited him to Treason, and not those who have taken the Advantage of the Traitor's Disposition, who voluntarily offered himself, which would be unwarrantable; for those Nations who have held the former unlawful, have also condemned the latter. However I do not think our Author has either changed his Opinion, in Regard to his Distinction, upon which he reasons again elsewhere, or that he intended to restrain the Rule of his arbitrary Law of Nations. But here an Inaccuracy of Expression has slipt from him, which he has overlooked, I know not how, even in his Revisals of this Work. Wherefore when he says in this Place, that We sin against GOD, and violate the Law of Nature, when we make use of wicked Instruments against an Enemy, and employ the Arm of a Traytor to dispatch him; this should be understood according to the Distinction I have mentioned, of those only who themselves seek for such Means, and solicit Persons to commit Treason, that, perhaps, would never have entertained such a Design, without the Allurement of the Rewards promised, or even given them beforehand. As to the Thing itself, this in my Opinion may be said, I. There are two Points to be distinguished: The one, whether the Enemy himself be wronged, against whom the Traitors are used: The other, whether, tho' he be not wronged, something bad however be committed. It seems to me, that admitting the War to be just, no Wrong is done the Enemy, whether we take Advantage of the Opportunity of a Traitor, who freely offers himself, or whether we seek for it, and bring it about ourselves. The State of War into which the Enemy has put himself, and which it was in his own Power to prevent, permits of itself all Methods to be used against him; so that he has no Room to complain, whatever is done. Besides, we are no more obliged to regard the Right he has over his Subjects, and the Fidelity they owe him as such, than their Lives and Fortunes, of which we may deprive them by the Right of War. II. I believe, however, that a Sovereign who has the least Tenderness of Conscience, and is convinced of the Justice of his Cause, will not endeavour to find out treasonable Methods, in order to subdue his Enemy, nor eagerly embrace such as may offer of themselves to him. The just Confidence which he may have in the Protection of Heaven; his Horror for the Traitor's Perfidy; the Fear of making himself an Accomplice of it, and of setting a bad Example, which may fall again upon himself and others, who have not deserved it; will make him either despise, or not accept without Regret, every Advantage he might propose to himself from such a Means. III. This Means cannot even be considered as a Thing of which the Use is always innocent, in Regard to the Person who employs it. The State of Hostility, which dispenses with the Commerce of good Offices, and authorises to hurt, does not therefore dissolve all Ties of Humanity, nor remove our Obligation to avoid as much as possible, the giving Room for some bad Action of the Enemy, or his People, especially those who of themselves have had no Part in the Occasion of the War. Now every Traitor undeniably commits an Action equally in famous and criminal. For it is absurd to think, as the late Mr. TITUS has ventured to do, (Observat. in PUFENDORF, DCCI.) with a perhaps; that admitting the War to be just on the other Side, he who betrays his Prince, does not commit a real Act of Perfidy; because, for Instance, the Party in whose Favour he assassinates him, had a Right to kill him. This, I say, is unwarrantable; for a Subject indeed ought not to serve his Prince in a War manifestly unjust; but he is not therefore authorised to side with the Enemy; and the Injustice of a Prince towards Strangers, does not discharge his Subjects from the Fidelity they owe him. So that I believe, with our Author, we can never, in Conscience, seduce, or solicit, the Subjects of an Enemy to commit Treason; because that is actually and directly inciting them to commit an abominable Crime, to which, otherwise, they might never have proceeded of themselves. IV. The Case is different when we only take Advantage of the Occasion, and the Dispositions we see in a Person, who did not want soliciting to commit Treason. Here the Infamy of the Treachery does not rebound upon him who finds it entirely formed in the Heart of the Traitor. This Traitor, from the Moment he conceives within himself the Design of committing Treason, may be deemed to be as criminal as when he has actually committed it.

*Nam scelus intra se tacitum qui cogitat ullum,
Facti crimen habet — —*

This Maxim would not be well applied in other Respects, I confess; but that is because, excepting these Cases between Enemies, there is none, in my Opinion, where the Thing, in Regard to which we make our Advantage of the bad Dispositions of others, can be of such a Nature, that we may lawfully and innocently do it ourselves. Upon the Whole, for the Reasons alledged, we ought not to take Advantage of a Treason which offers itself, unless it be to obtain some considerable Advantage, or to avoid some great Danger; in a Word, from a Kind of Necessity. V. What I have said, regards the Law of Nature; in Respect to the Law of Nations, of which our Author speaks, and which, at Bottom, is no more than the Custom of several Nations, tho' that Custom has nothing obligatory of itself, yet, if the People with whom we are at Variance, look upon the very Acceptance of the Offers of a certain Sort of Perfidy as unlawful, as to assassinate, for Instance, one's Prince or General, we tacitly submit to it, in the Manner, and for the Reasons, mentioned above, § 15. Note 1.

[11] Impia enim bella suscipitis, & quum habeatis arma, licitamini hostium capita. QUINTUS CURTIUS, Lib. IV. Cap. I. Num. 12.

[12] Utpote qui ne belli quidem in me jura servaveris. Ibid. Num. 13.

[13] Veram enimvero, quum modo milites meos literis ad proditionem, modo amicos, &c. Lib. IV. Cap. XI. Num. 18.

[14] The Passage has been quoted before, § 15. Note 3.

[15] Ea omnia quam Diis invisae essent, sensurum in exitu rerum suarum. LIVY, Lib. XLIV. Cap. I. Num. 11.

[16] VIRIATI etiam caedes, &c. Lib. IX. Cap. VI. Num. 4. The Author De Viris illustribus, [who is believed to be AURELIUS VICTOR] says, that the Senate did not approve this Victory, because it had been bought, Quae victoria, quia emta erat, a Senatu non probata. Cap. LXXI. in fin. According to EUTROPIUS, the Murderers of Viriatius having demanded a Reward of the Consul, he answered them, that the Romans had never approved the Conduct of Soldiers who killed their General. Quum interfectores ejus praemium a Caepione Consule peterent, responsum est, numquam Romanis placuisse, Imperatorem a suis militibus interfice. (Lib. IV. Cap. VIII. Edit. Cellar.) There seems to be Reason for supplying a Word in this Passage, à Caepione Consule promissum. AMMIANUS MARCELLINUS disapproves also the Assassination of Sertorius, committed at a Feast by Perperna, his Lieutenant. Lib. XXX. (Cap. I. in fin.) GROTIUS.

It does not appear from other Authors, that the Consul Caepio had promised a Reward to those who killed Viriatius. So that the Text of EUTROPIUS is not faulty.

[17] And indeed Traitors seldom offer their Service, or are applied to, but to assassinate Persons of a high Rank, as Princes or Generals.

[18] Nec Antigonium, nec quemquam ducum, sic velle vincere, ut ipse in se exemplum pessimum statuar. Lib. XIV. Cap. I. Num. 12.

[19] Our Author cites JUSTIN again here, Lib. XII. Apud eundem, says he in the Text; tho' he had mentioned him before only in the Margin. In the first Edition he had said, Apud CURTIUM. This was from his finding afterwards in JUSTIN the following Words, Reputans [Alexander] non tam hostem suum fuisse Darium, quam amicum ejus, a quo esset occisus. Cap. I. Num. 11. But he had Reason to cite QUINTUS CURTIUS, who has something more express upon this Subject. Quem quidem [Bessus] cruci adfixum videre festino, omnibus regibus Gentibusque fidei, quam violavit, meritas poenas solventem. Lib. VI. Cap. III. Num. 14.

[20] Oedip. ver. 139.

[21] Oedip. ver. 242.

[22] This Passage has been quoted above, § 15. of this Chapter, Note 6.

[23] Nec irritae, aut degeneres, insidiae fuere adversus transfugam & violatorem fidei. Annal. Lib. XI. Cap. XIX. Num. 2. AMMIANUS MARCELLINUS, speaking of Florentius and Barchalba, who had seized and brought the Rebel Procopius to the Emperor Valens, and were killed at the same Time, observes upon it, that if they had betrayed a lawful Prince, Justice itself would have passed Sentence of Death upon them; but that having betrayed a Rebel, and a Disturber of the publick Tranquillity, as Procopius was according to the general Opinion, so memorable an Action ought to have been amply rewarded. Parique indignationis impetu Florentius, &c. (Lib. XXVI. Cap. IX. in fin. p. 513. Edit. Vales. Gron.) The Historian PROCOPIUS, for the same Reason praises Artabanus for having killed Gontharides, Vandalic. Lib. II. in fin. (Cap. XXVIII.) See also CROMER, Rer. Polon. Lib. XXVIII. concerning the Murther of Suchodolius, (p. 604. Edit. Basil.) GROTIUS.

[24] Quae [perfidia] tamen jam minus, &c. Lib. VII. Cap. V. Num. 20.

[1] Gesset curam pudicitiae, etiam in hoste, servandae. AUSTIN, De Civit. Dei, Lib. I. Cap. VI. [See LIVY, Lib. XXV. Cap. XXV. Num. 7.] The same Thing is related of Lucullus, in DION CASSIUS, (Lib. XXXV. p. 2. A. Edit. H. Steph.) See the Edict of Gabao, King of the Moors, in PROCOPIUS, Vandalic. Lib. I. (Cap. VIII.) GROTIUS.

[2] Meae, Populique Romani, disciplinae, caussâ, &c. LIVY, Lib. XXVI. Cap. XLIX. Num. 14.

[3] Lib. XIX. Cap. VIII. p. 674. Edit. H. Steph. APPIANUS ALEXANDRINUS treats this as the Act of Barbarians, in speaking of the People of Chios, who were exposed to it by the Troops of Mithridates. Bell. Mithridatic. p. 340. Edit. Amstel. (201. H. Steph.) GROTIUS.

[4] Var. Hist. Lib. VI. Cap. I.

[5] Belisarius always observed it, and so did Totilas, at the taking of Cumae and Rome. PROCOPIUS, Goth. III. GROTIUS.

What our Author says here of the usual Conduct of the Roman General, is related in Chap. I. of the Book referred to, and in the twentieth Chapter we see the Care which the King of the Goths took, to prevent any Violence being done to the Wives, Maids, or Widows, when he made himself Master of Rome. As to what regards the taking of Cumae, I find nothing upon it; and it is likely, that our Author, citing by Memory, has put Cumae for Naples, for it was after taking of the latter, that Totilas condemned one of his Guards to die, for having ravished the Daughter of a Roman, a Native of Calabria; upon which that Prince made a fine Speech to those who came to intercede for the Criminal. Chap. VIII.

[6] PHILO much commends that Law, in his Book, περὶ φιλανθρωπίας : And JOSEPHUS against APPION. The Law also takes Care of Prisoners of War, to preserve them from Reproach, especially Women. Lib. II. p. 1075. D. GROTIUS.

[7] He, says he, praises rather than blames it: De Expedit. Alexandr. Lib. IV. Cap. XIX. Edit. Gron.

[8] De Fortuna vel virtut. Alexandr. Orat. II. p. 332. E. Vol. II. Edit. Wech.

[9] Cosroes, King of Persia, crucified one for ravishing a Virgin at Apamea, PROCOPIUS, Persic. Lib. II. Chap. XI. GROTIUS.

[1] Neque est contra naturam, &c. (Cap. VI.) SUETONIUS relates, that Nero having received Advice of some Commotions in Gaul, was thought to be very well pleased with the News, because he had an Occasion of plundering those rich Provinces by Right of War. Adeoque lente ac secure tulit, gaudentis etiam suspicionem praeberet, tamquam occasione nata spoliandarum Jure Belli opulentissimarum provinciarum. Vit. Neron. Cap. XL. St. CYPRIAN says, that when a City is taken by an Enemy, all those who are within it, are liable to be plundered. Sic quum irruptione hostili civitas aliqua possessa est, omnes simul captivitas vastat. De mortalitate, (p. 159. Edit. Brem.) GROTIUS.

[2] He says, that in taking or destroying these Kinds of Things, the Enemy is weakened, and our own Affairs advanced. Cap. XI. p. 501, 502. Edit. Amstel.

[3] It is the Deputies of Athens who speak thus in the Assembly of the Aetolians, and say that is not the Subject of their Complaint. Neque id se queri, quod hostilia ab hoste passi forent: Esse enim quaedam Belli Jura, quae ut facere, ita pati, sit fas: Sata exuri, dirui tecta, praedas hominum pecorumque agi; misera magis, quam indigna, patienti esse. Lib. XXXI. Cap. XXX. Num. 2.

[4] Sed oppidani, portis sponte patefactis, &c. Annal. Lib. XIII. Cap. XLI. Num. 3.

[1] Jus Gentium merum, says our Author, that is to say, that which not only grants Impunity, but even authorizes of itself to act, so that we do nothing in Conscience but what is just and innocent, whilst there is no other Consideration drawn from Duty, which engages us to abate of our Right.

[2] Quum loca capta sunt, &c. Digest. Lib. XI. Tit. VII. De religiosis, & sumtibus funerum, &c. Leg. XXXVI. It is upon this TERTULLIAN founds the Reproach he casts upon the Pagans, of paying little Respect to their own Divinities: “Wars, says he, generally occasion the Taking, and the Ruin of Cities; which cannot be done without Offence to the Gods; for the Victor spares the Temples no more than he does the Walls of the Place; the Priests are exposed to Slaughter as well as the Citizens; the sacred as well as the profane Goods are plundered: So that the Romans commit as many Sacrileges as they make Conquests, as often as they triumph over Men they triumph over the Gods; and the Statues of captive Divinities make Part of all the Spoils of their conquered Enemies, which are preserved to this Day.” Porro bella & victoriae, &c. Apologetic. (Cap. XXV.) He says lower the same Thing of the destroying of Temples. Et bene, quod si quid adversi, &c. (Cap. XL.) GROTIUS.

[3] He says Marcellus did not touch those Things out of a Principle of Religion. Has tabulas [quibus interiores templi Minervae parietes vestiebantur] &c. In Verr. Lib. IV. Cap. LV.

[4] Revera non eripiuntur humanis usibus. These are our Author’s Terms, which I recite to defend him against a false Criticism, which, tho’ it has no other Foundation than Want of due Attention, and a Desire to censure, is however proposed with great Confidence. The late Mr. COCCEIUS, in his Dissertation De evocatione Sacrorum, Sect. II. § 24. blames our Author, as pretending that sacred Things, whilst they remain such, are not entirely exempt from profane Uses. But the whole Sequel of the Discourse shews, he means only, that those Things do not acquire the Quality of holy and sacred, as an indelible Character, of which they cannot be deprived; but that the Sovereign, who made them so, by devoting them to the Uses of Religion, may make them return into Commerce, and thereby become profane again. GRONOVIVS, and Mr. VANDERMUELEN have very well explained this, in their Notes; and if the Author who made the Extract in the Bibliotheca Germanica, (Vol. I. p. 55.) had taken the Trouble to read the Passage in the Original, he would have had Occasion to find Fault with the inexcusable Inadvertency and Rashness of the German Civilian, who had made it his Business to criticise our Author almost every where; he would not at least have given Room to believe that he approves a Censure so ill founded.

[5] See THUCYDIDES, Lib. IV. (Cap. XCVIII. Ed. Oxon.) And TACITUS, Annal. Lib. III. (Cap. LXXI. Num. 2.) This Custom appears also from a Passage of POLYBIUS, which we shall cite below, Chap. XII. § 7. See also MARSILIUS PATAVINUS, in his Defensor Pacis, &c. Cap. V. § 2. NICOLAS BOERIUS, Decis. LXIX. Num. 1. AEGIDIUS BOSSIUS, Practic. Criminal. De foro competente, Num. 101. CATHMANNUS, Consil. C. Num. 30. GROTIUS.

[a] B. ii. ch. 5. § 31.

[6] Publicum jus in sacris, in sacerdotibus, in magistratibus, consistit. Digest. Lib. I. Tit. I. De justitia & jure, Leg. I. § 2. See Mr. NOODT's Comment upon this Title, p. 5. and upon Tit. VIII. De divis. rerum. &c. p. 27.

[7] It is in a Place where he endeavours to shew that Augustus was not the first that seized, by Right of War, upon Things consecrated to the Gods. In Arcad. seu. Lib. VIII. p. 275. Edit. Graec. Wech. Cap. XLVI. Edit. Kuhn.

[8] Quamvis sacra profana fieri [possunt]. Digest. Lib. XLV. Tit. I. De verborum obligationibus, Leg. LXXXIII. § 5.

[9] Where he speaks of the Nullity of conditional Stipulations, in which the Sale of Things sacred, or of such other as do not enter into Commerce, is supposed; a Condition which is considered as impossible; though the Impossibility may afterwards cease; that is, as we see, for Instance, that what is sacred may become profane. Quum quis sub hac conditione stipulatus sit, si rem sacram aut religiosam Titius vendiderit, vel Forum aut Basilicam, & hujusmodi res, quae publicis usibus in perpetuum relictæ sunt, ubi omnino conditio jure impleri non potest, vel id facere ei non liceat: Nullius momenti fore stipulationem, proinde ac si ea conditio, quae naturâ impossibilis est, inserta esset. Nec ad rem pertinet, quod jus mutari potest, & id, quod nunc impossibile est postea possibile fieri: Non enim secundum futuri temporis jus, sed secundum praesentis, aestimari debet Stipulatio. Ibid. Leg. CXXXVII. § 6.

[10] As by the Syracusans, in Timoleon's Time, which PLUTARCH informs us of, in the Life of that great Captain. (p. 247. E. Vol. I. Edit. Wech.) The People of the Island of Chios, not having Money to pay the Fine laid on them by Mithridates, sold the Ornaments of their Temples. APPIAN, Bell. Mithridatic. (p. 339. Edit. Amstel. 201. H. Steph.) Sylla being in Want of Money, during the War against the same Mithridates, took what was most valuable amongst the Things consecrated to the Gods, in the Temples of Olympia, Epidaurus, and Delphos. PLUTARCH, in ejus Vit. (p. 459. Vol. I.) APPIAN, Bell. Mithridatic. (p. 346, 347. Edit. Amstel. 206. H. Steph.) He afterwards returned the Value of them, if we may believe DIODORUS SICULUS, in Excerpt. Peiresc. (p. 406.) Augustus, in a like Necessity, borrowed Money out of the Treasures kept in the Temples. APPIAN, Bell. Civil. Lib. V. (p. 1082. Edit. Amst. 678. H. Steph.) Sacred Things were also made Use of upon other Occasions, besides War. We see in CASSIODORUS, that Agapetus, Bishop of Rome, had pledged the sacred Vessels. Var. XII. 20. The Emperor Heraclius, in great Necessity, coined the Church Plate into Money; but returned the Value of it afterwards, as THEOPHANES tells us. See also ANNA COMNENA, Lib. V. (Cap. I.) and Lib. VI. (Cap. II.) CROMER. Rerum Polon. Lib. XXIII. (p. 516. Edit. Basil. 1655.) The Discourse of Laurentianus, in BEMBO, Lib. VI. and what we shall say below, Chap. XXI. § 23. in the Text and Notes. GROTIUS.

The first of the Examples alledged here by our Author, is a little doubtful. PLUTARCH says only, that the Syracusans had so little Money, as well for the War as their other Occasions, that they sold even their Statues. And a Proof, that the Statues of their Gods are not intended, is his saying a little lower, that the Syracusans preserved the Statue of Gelon, their antient Prince, in Remembrance of the Victory obtained by him over the Carthaginians, at Himera. For the Rest, I have suppressed in this Note, where the Things were besides not sufficiently distinguished, a Passage of PLINY, which is not very much to the Purpose. It is where he says that Cato permitted the sacred Trees or Groves to be cut, having first made a certain Sacrifice. Idem [Cato] arbores religiosas, lucosque succidi permisit, sacrificio prius facto: Cujus rei rationem quoque eodem volumine tradidit. Hist. Natur. Lib. XVII. Cap. XXVIII. sive ult. in fin. He does not speak there of Cutting down those Trees entirely, nor of depriving them of their Sanctity, but only of lopping them in order to render them more beautiful and venerable. Lucum conlucare, Romano more, sic oportet, &c. See the rest of the Passage in the Book, De re rustica, Cap. CXXXIX. which the Naturalist had in View.

[11] Our Author took this without doubt from THUCYDIDES, Lib. II. Cap. XIII. and from DIODORUS SICULUS, Lib. XII. Cap. XL. who both say, that Pericles, intending to shew the Athenians, that they had wherewithal to undertake War, represented to them, that besides the Money and Vessels of the Temples, they might take the Gold of Minerva's Statue, to whom they might restore as much after having made Use of it for the good of the Publick.

[12] He plundered the Temples of the City of Cadiz, then in Alliance with Carthage. Non aerario modo eorum, [Gaditanorum] sed etiam Templis spoliatis, &c. LIVY, Lib. XXVIII. Cap. XXXVI. Num. 3.

[13] Our Author had undoubtedly in his Thoughts, what APPIANUS ALEXANDRINUS informs us, that the Senate, being in want of Money to defray the Expences of the War against Mithridates, decreed, that the Things, consecrated by Numa Pompilius for the Sacrifices, should be sold. De bell. Mithridat. p. 317. Edit. Amstel. (185. H. Steph.)

[14] I find nothing on that Head, in the Authors who have writ the Life and Actions of Pompey, except what DION CASSIUS says, near the beginning of Lib. XLI. of his History; which is, that Pompey got a Decree of the Senate, that the Money in the publick Treasury, and all the Presents, offered to the Gods at Rome, should be carried with him into Campania. But, as the same Historian adds a little lower, (p. 174. Edit. H. Steph.) Nothing was touched of all that, for fear of Caesar, after the Return and Report of the Deputies, which were sent to him.

[15] Our Author probably remembred what he had read in SUETONIUS; that Caesar when in Gaul, plundered the Temples, that were full of the Offerings, which had been made to the Gods: In Gallia sana templaque Deûm, donis referta, expilavit. Cap. LIV. See also DION CASSIUS, Lib. XLII. and XLIII. Caesar himself however, to justify the civil War in which he had engaged, complains amongst other Things, that the Money had been taken out of the Temples by the opposite Party: Pecuniae a municipiis exiguntur, & a fanis tolluntur: Omnia divina & humana jura permiscuntur. De Bell. Civil. Lib. I. Cap. VI.

[16] Vit. Tiber. & C. Gracch. p. 832. A. Vol. I. Edit. Wech.

[17] Pro republica plerumque templa nudantur, & in usum stipendii dona conflamus, Lib. IV. Excerpt. Controv. IV.

[18] Eo accedit, quod TREBATIUS, &c. Apud MACROB. Saturnal. Lib. III. (Cap. III.) The Grammarian SERVIUS, speaking of the Temple of Ceres, which stood without the Gates of Troy, says, that Aeneas, who appointed that Place for the Rendezvous of his People, well knew, that it had been profaned before: Nam Aeneas scit ante esse profanatum. In Aeneid. II. (Ver. 713.) He makes the same Remark upon III. IX. and XII. Books. And he says on Eclogue VII. that Presents, offered to the Gods, are sacred so long as they have not been rendered profane: Dona autem oblata numinibus, tamdiu sacra sunt, & dona possunt dici, quamdiu non fuerint profanata. (In Ver. 31.) GROTIUS.

[19] Profana simul & sacra, &c. Annal. Lib. I. Cap. LI. Num. 2.

[20] In the Passage cited above upon Paragraph II. of this Chapter, Note 7.

[21] P. Servilius quae signa atque ornamenta ex urbe hostium vi & virtute capta, BELLI LEGE atque imperatoria jure sustulit, &c. In Var. Lib. I. (Cap. XXI.) VIRGIL mentions a Shield, which the Greeks had taken out of the Temple of Neptune, where it had been consecrated

Et clipeum efferi jussit, Didymaonis artes Neptuni sacro Danais de poste refixum.

Aeneid. Lib. V. (Ver. 359, 360.) Fabius Maximus, as PLUTARCH relates, after having taken Tarentum, caused a Statue of Hercules of an extraordinary Bigness to be carried to Rome, leaving the Tarentines the rest of their Gods, because offended against them for their Crimes. Vit. Fab. Max. (p. 187. C. Vol. I.) To this may be referred the Passage of TERTULLIAN, which we have cited above, § 2. Note 2. and another from the same Father, where he says the same Thing: Tot deinde de Deis, quot de gentibus triumphi: Manent & simulacra captiva: Et utique sentiunt, quos non amant. Ad Nationes, Lib. II. (Cap. XVII.) GROTIUS.

[22] Ornamenta urbis, signa, tabulasque, &c. Lib. XXV. Cap. XL. Num. 2.

[23] Ambraciam oppugnatam & captam, &c. Idem, Lib. XXXVIII.

[24] Fulvius, in the Speech he made to justify his Conduct, asks whether this was the only City exempt from the Rights of War: Nisi Syracusarum, &c. Idem, (Lib. XXXI. Cap. IV. Num. 12.) See also POLYBIUS, Excerpt. Legat. XXVI. GROTIUS.

[25] Quae belli saevitia esset, quae victis acciderent, &c. (Bell. Catilen. Cap. L. p. 156. Edit. Wass.) Cosroez plundered a Church in Antioch, as PROCOPIUS relates, Persic. Lib. II. [Cap. IX. but preserved the Building for a certain Sum paid him.] See CROMER, Rerum Polon. Lib. XVII. (p. 402.) GROTIUS.

[26] The two Laws ill explained, are in the same Place of that Author: Let no one speak ill of the Gods, held by other States to be such. Let no one plunder the Temples of Strangers, nor take away any Thing consecrated to any God. Antiq. Jud. Lib. IV. Cap. VIII.

[27] See the foregoing Note. He says elsewhere, that their Law forbids them to scoff at, or speak ill of, those whom Strangers hold for Gods; because of the Name of GOD, which they bear. Contra Apion. Lib. II. p. 1077. D. Others believe, and with more Reason, that the Jewish Historian intended hereby to explain another Law, namely, that of EXODUS xxii. 28. where the Original says in so many Words, Thou shalt not revile the Gods. By the Gods, the Legislator manifestly understands the Magistrates, as appears from the following Words, which are a Comment upon those that go before, Nor curse the Rulers of thy People. But JOSEPHUS has taken the Word Gods in the literal Sense; and if he did so sincerely, the Motive our Author mentions, no doubt contributed to his falling into that Error.

[28] Profana illic omnia, quae apud nos sacra. Histor. Lib. V. Cap. IV. Num. 1.

[29] TROGUS POMPEIUS, imitating without doubt the Language of the Greek Authors, from whom he composed his History, says, in JUSTIN's Abridgment, which we have, that Xerxes seemed to have designed to make War upon the Gods as well as upon Men: Ante navalis praelii congressionem miserat Xerxes quatuor millia armatorum Delphos, ad templum Apollinis diripiendum: Prorsus quasi non cum Graecis tantum sed & cum Diis immortalibus bellum gereret. Lib. II. Cap. XII. Num. 8, 9. See the Passage of CICERO cited in the following Note.

[30] This is the Reason given for it by ASCONIUS PEDIANUS, whom our Author cites in the Margin. CICERO, to aggravate the Crime of Verres, who had plundered amongst others the Temple of Delos, sacred to Apollo, says that even the Persians, who, when they carried the War into Greece, had declared it against both the Gods and Men, (the Roman Orator here speaks the Language of the Greek Authors) being arrived at Delos, with a Fleet of a thousand Sail, did not violate or touch the Temple in question. Tantaque ejus auctoritas religionis & est, & semper fuit, ut ne Persae quidem, &c. In Verr. Lib. I. Cap. XVIII. The antient Commentator observes upon that, that the Persians made no Scruple to destroy Temples and Statues, because, according to the Ideas of their Nation, they believed, that no Temples ought to be built to the Gods; and the rather, because the whole World would scarce suffice for the Temple of the Sun alone, which those People adored: DIIS HOMINIBUSQUE quia non solum hostes erant, utpote Barbari; verum etiam, more gentis suae, nulla Diis in terris templa condenda esse credebant; praesertim, quum uni Soli, quem venerarentur, vix mundus ipse sufficeret. Our Author cites also in a little Note, what DIOGENES LAERTIUS says, that the Magi condemned the Use of Statues. Lib. I. § 6. Edit. Amstel. See MENAGE upon it, and the Index Philologicus of Mr. LE CLERC upon STANLEY'S History of the Eastern Philosophy, at the Word Statuae.

[31] The Reader may see upon this Head the History of the antient Persians, writ in Latin by the late Mr. HYDE, a learned Englishman, who has endeavoured to prove, that those People of old adored neither Fire, nor the Sun, but the true GOD; which, he believes, is to this Day the Religion of some of their Descendants.

[32] Ad fores [Templi Hierosolymitani] tantum Judaeo aditus: limine, praeter Sacerdotes, arcebantur. Hist. Lib. V. Cap. VIII. Num. 2.

[33] Romanorum primus, Cn. Pompeius Judaeos domuit. Templumque JURE VICTORIAE ingressus est. Histor. Lib. V. Cap. IX. Num. 1.

[34] Pompeius ergo, Populi Romani praeclarissimus Princeps, Judaeam cum exercitu ingressus, civitatem capit, templumque reserat, non devotione supplicis, sed JURE VICTORIS, De Civit. Dei, Lib. XVIII. Cap. XLV.

[35] At Cn. Pompeius, captis Hierosolymis, &c. Orat. pro L. FLACCO, Cap. XXVIII.

[36] There is besides another Reason, which might justify the Pagans against the Reproach of Sacrilege, even when they plundered the Temples of the Gods whom they acknowledged as such. And that is, because they imagined, that when a City was taken, the Gods, who were adored in it, abandoned their Temples and Altars at the same Time; especially after they had been called out, they and all the sacred Things, with certain Ceremonies. See the learned GRONOVIVS'S Note upon § 2. of this Chapter, and the Dissertation of Mr. COCCEIUS, De evocatione Sacrorum.

[1] Sepulchres were consecrated to the infernal Gods, whereas sacred Things were for the other Gods. See Mr. NOODT upon the Digest, Lib. I. Tit. VIII. p. 58.

[2] Sepulcra hostium, &c. Digest, Lib. XLVII. Tit. XII. De sepulcro violato, Leg. IV.

[3] It suffices to say, that this is of no Use either for our Defence, the Support of our Rights, or in a Word for any lawful End of War.

[1] See what is said upon the foregoing Chapter, § 18. Note 10.

- [1] See what we say upon the last Paragraph of this Chapter.
- [a] B. 2. ch. 7. §2.
- [b] Ibid. ch. 20.
- [2] “We should add,” (says Mr. LE CLERC in his Comment upon this Passage) “that the Effects of others become ours, when having raised an Army at our own Expence, we carry off such Effects from those, who had taken them, whilst the Persons, to whom they had belonged, remained in quiet. For it was not of the Spoils only of the Kings, that came from beyond the Euphrates, that Abraham offered the Tenth, but of the recovered Goods also of the People of Sodom, and other Neighbours; the remainder of which that Patriarch returned to their antient Proprietors, after having offered the Tenth.” This is what the learned and judicious Commentator says, and is agreeable to what our Author himself lays down below, § 7. where however he has forgot this Example. It appears also from the last Verse of the Chapter of GENESIS, from which this History is taken, that the Patriarch kept out of the Booty recovered, besides the Provisions consumed by his People, the Part which was due to his Allies, Haner, Eschol, and Mamre, as our Author observes in a small Note, where he refers to what JOSEPHUS says on this History, Antiq. Jud. (Lib. I. Cap. XI.) and what he says himself below, Chap. XVI. § 3. For the rest, we must suppose here, that those, who do not attempt to recover their Effects, have both an Opportunity and the Means of doing it. See what we say below upon Chap. XVI. § 3. Note 2.
- [3] See SELDEN’S Dissertation upon Tithes, Sect. III. translated into Latin by Mr. LE CLERK, and inserted at the End of his Commentary upon the Pentateuch.
- [4] Our Author, as GRONOVIVS observes, confounds here the Tenth, with what the Romans called Spolia opima, which were dedicated to Jupiter Feretrius.
- [5] The Chaldee Paraphrase expounds it done by his Prayers to GOD, who by his special Favour preserved Sichem for Jacob and his Posterity. GROTIUS.
- [6] Or rather over the Madianites; for they are meant by the Chusites. See BO-CHART’S Phaleg. Lib. IV. Cap. II.
- [7] Et, quod est militaribus &c. De Benef. Lib. III. Cap. XXXIII.
- [8] Lib. De Diris & Execrat. init. p. 930. A. Edit. Paris.
- [1] See what we have said upon Chapter IV. of this Book, § 4. Note 1. It may be proper to relate here, what Mr. CARMICHAEL, Professor at Glasgow, says in his Notes upon the Abridgment of PUFENDORF, De Officio Hom. & Civ. Lib. II. Cap. XVI. p. 303 & seqq. He distinguishes between moveable and immoveable Things. The Acquisition of the first ought to be regarded as valid and lawful, because if the antient Proprietors could reclaim them from neutral People, where they are transported in consequence of Commerce, every State would see itself thereby exposed to enter into the War against its Will, as it would be obliged to examine, whether the Things reclaimed be good Prize, and consequently which Side has the best Cause. But as to Things immoveable, I do not find (adds this Author) that it is established by the common Consent of Nations, that the antient Owner ought to have less Right against the Third, who holds them of the Enemy, by what Title soever, than against the Enemy himself; unless that antient Owner has declared, in some manner or other, that he abandons his Right. All that can be said is, if the neutral People owe any real Servitude to the Lands, which an Enemy has taken from his Enemy, they may discharge it to the new Possessor, without the antient Proprietors having just Room to complain. I approve this Distinction in the main. But as I do not acknowledge that common Consent of States, upon which he founds the Law of Nations after our Author, it suffices for me to say, that moveable Things, being easily transferred by Commerce into the Hands of the Subjects of a neutral State, often without their knowing that they were taken in War, the Tranquillity of Nations, and the State of Neutrality require, that they should always be reputed lawful Prize. But the Case is not the same in regard to Immoveables. They are immoveable in their Nature: And those, to whom a State, which has taken them from an Enemy, would resign them, can hardly be ignorant of the manner, in which it possesses them.

- [2] He speaks both of Things and Men. De Institut. Cyri, Lib. VII. Cap. V. § 26. Edit. Oxon.
- [3] De Legib. Lib. I. p. 626. B. Vol. II. Edit. H. Steph.
- [4] Sophist. p. 219. D. E. Vol. I. and Ibid. p. 222. C.
- [5] Memorab. Socrat. Lib. IV. Cap. II. § 15.
- [6] De Republ. Lib. I. Cap. VI. p. 301. D.
- [7] This does not belong to Antiphanes, but ANTISTHENES, the Cynick Philosopher; and I find the Passage so expressed in STOBÆUS, Florileg. Tit. LIV. De Imperat. under the Name of the latter. I have observed a like Error either of our Author, or his Copists, in his Commentary upon the second Commandment of the Decalogue, where Antiphanes is cited in the same manner for Antisthenes, in Reference to the Invisibility of GOD; a Passage, which is recited above, B. II. Chap. XX. § 45. Num. 2. in a Note, and ascribed to the true Author of it. For the rest, STOBÆUS took this Saying from PLUTARCH, who gives it also to Antisthenes, De Fortun. Alexandr. Orat. II. p. 330. A. Vol. II. Edit. Wechel. From whence it appears, that there was no Reason to suspect the Error to be in STOBÆUS, where the Names of the Authors cited, are sometimes confounded. Let me also observe, that this Apophthegm of the antient Philosopher is omitted in STANLEY's philosophical History, and even in the Latin Version of the late Mr. OLEARIUS, who had taken upon him to supply what was wanting in the Original.
- [8] It is one of Alexander's Courtiers, who makes this Reflection upon that Conqueror's Saying, when he took the Tent of Darius, that he would go and bathe also in the Bath of the conquered King, in order to cleanse himself from the Dust of the Battle: SIRE, said the Courtier to him, say the Bath of Alexander, and not the Bath of Darius; for what belonged to the vanquished, &c. Vit. Alexandr. (p. 676. A. Vol. I. Edit. Wech.) Alexander says himself upon another Occasion, that he had forgot that the Goods of the vanquished were the Victor's. [P. 684. A.] GROTIUS.
- [9] Cyrop. Lib. II. (Cap. III. § 2. Edit. Oxon.) These Words which our Author gives us as taken by PLUTARCH from XENOPHON, I do not find any where.
- [10] Epist. ad Athenien. apud DEMOSTHEN. p. 64. B. Edit. Basil 1572.
- [11] Orat. de male obita legat. (p. 251. B.) DIODORUS SICULUS says, That we ought not to give up what we acquire by the Right of War. Excerpt. Peiresk. (p. 406.) See a Passage of AGATHIAS, cited below, Chap. VIII. § 1. Note 10. GROTIUS.
- [12] The Passage has been already cited upon Chap. IV. of this Book, § 5. Note 3.
- [13] Si Philippus bello cepisset, &c. LIVY, Lib. XXXIX. Cap. XXIX. Num. 2.
- [14] Ceperat cum [Agrum] ab Carthaginiensibus, &c. LIVY, Lib. XL. Cap. XVII. Num. 2, 4.
- [15] Non Cappadocia filium, &c. Lib. XXXVIII. Cap. V. Num. 6.

- [16] Quid Mytilenae? quae certè vestrae, QUIRITES, belli lege ac victoriae jure, factae sunt. Orat. De Lege Agrar. contra Rull. Cap. XVI.
- [17] Sunt autem privata, &c. De Offic. Lib. I. Cap. VII.
- [18] This Passage is in Lib. XLI. towards the End.
- [19] It is upon the Occasion of the Israelites carrying away the Vessels of Gold and Silver of the Egyptians, when they quitted Egypt. That Father says, they did so, either by way of Amends for what the Egyptians owed them, for the severe Labour they had forced them to undergo, or by Right of War, against a People, who had reduced them against their Will to a cruel Slavery. Stromat. Lib. I. Cap. XXIII. p. 416. Edit. Oxon. In which he only copies PHILO the Jew, as appears by the Passage, which the learned Bishop of Oxford cites in his Notes, and our Author gives below at length upon Chap. VII. of this Book. § 6. Num. 8.
- [20] Item quae ex hostibus capiuntur, Jure Gentium statim capientium fiunt. Digest, Lib. XLI. Tit. I. De acquirendo rerum dominio. Leg. V. § 7. See also the Institutes, Lib. II. Tit. I. De divisione rerum, § 17.
- [21] Lib. II. Tit. I. § 17.
- [22] Politic. Lib. I. Cap. VIII. p. 304. D. Vol. II. Edit. Paris.
- [23] Dominiumque rerum ex naturali, &c. Digest, Lib. XLI. Tit. II. De adquir. vel amittenda possess. Leg. I. § 1.
- [24] Hist. Graec. Lib. III. Cap. I. § 23.
- [1] It is where he speaks of Things taken away by some Beast; for in his Opinion, they are deemed lost to the Person from whom they are taken, when the Beast is secured from his pursuit: Ita ex bonis quoque nostris capta a bestiis marinis & terrestribus, &c. Digest, Lib. XLI. Tit. I. De adquir. rerum domin. Leg. XLIV. See above, B. II. Chap. IV. § 5. Num. 2. But there is a Difference between this and the Case, to which our Author compares it, that will not permit us to form the same Judgment of it; because according to the Lawyer, it is presumed, that the Owner has abandoned his Goods, when he can pursue the Beast no longer that took them away; whereas between two Enemies there is no room for such a Presumption. Every Enemy, as such, and whilst he continues such, retains the Will to recover what the other has taken from him. His present Inability only reduces him to wait for a more favourable Opportunity, which he still seeks and desires. So that, in regard to him, the Thing ought no more to be deemed taken, when in a Place of Safety, than whilst he is still in a Condition to pursue it: All that can be said is, that in the latter Case the Possession of the Enemy is not so secure as in the former. The Truth is, this Distinction has been invented to establish the Rules of the Right of Postliminy, or the manner in which the Subjects of the State, from whom something has been taken, re-enter upon their Rights, rather than to determine the Time of the Acquisition of Things taken between Enemies. See TITII, Observ. in Compend. Lauterbach. Obs. 1446. and what we say below, upon Chap. IX. § 16.
- [2] Postliminio rediisse videtur, quum, &c. Digest. Lib. XLIX. Tit. XV. De Captivis & Postliminio, &c. Leg. XIX. § 3. Si id, quod nostrum hostes ceperunt, ejus generis est, ut postliminio redire possit; simul atque ad nos redeundi caussâ, profugit ab hostibus, & intra fines imperii nostris coepit, postliminio rediisse existimandum est. Ibid. Leg. XXX.

[3] In bello [Postliminii jus competit] quum hi, qui nobis hostes, sunt, aliquem ex nostris ceperunt, & intra praesidia sua perduxerunt.—Antequam in praesidia perducatur hostium, manet civis. Ibid. Leg. V. § 1.

[4] In the first of the two Laws cited above on this Paragraph, Note 2. See below, Chap. IX. § 5. and 16.

[5] In the Law cited above, Note 3.

[6] See the Law cited in Note 20, upon the foregoing Paragraph. ZIEGLER is for having the Word Statim of the Roman Lawyers taken literally. But OBRECHT defends our Author's Explanation; and founds his Opinion upon this Example, chosen from many others, which, says he, might have been alledged. We call a Thief taken in the Fact, (Fur manifestus, or ἐπ' αὐτοφόρῳ, deprehensus) not only him whom we seize the Moment he has stolen something, but even him whom we find carrying away the Thing stolen, before he arrives at Home, or where he designed to put it. See Institutes, Lib. IV. Tit. I. § 3. The following is a more express Example. When a Person is adjudged to pay a certain Sum immediately, that, say the Lawyers, is to be understood with some Modification; for it is not meant that the Person must go that Moment with the Money, to his House to whom it is to be paid. Quoddicimus — debere STATIM solvere, cum aliquo scilicet temperamento temporis intelligendum est: Nec enim cumsacco adire debet. Digest. Lib. XLVI. Tit. III. De solution. & liberat. &c. Leg. XC.

[a] Consulat. Maris. c. 283. & 287. Constit. Gall. l. 20. tit. 13. art. 24.

[7] This is observed by Land also, as appears from THUANUS's History, on the Year 1595, Lib. CXIII. where we find, that the Town of Liere in Brabant, having been taken and retaken the same Day, the Plunder taken from the Inhabitants was returned them, because it had not been twenty-four Hours in the Enemy's Hands. This Custom is derived from the antient Laws of Germany, and was established in Imitation of the four and twenty Hours, which, not without Reason, was the limited Time, in Respect to the Permission of taking a Beast wounded by another. See Lex Longobard Lib. I. Tit. XXII. § 6. The same Thing is observed in England, and in the Kingdom of Castile, as ALBERICUS GENTILIS informs us, Hispanic. Advoc. I. 3. GROTIUS.

It has been observed, that this Rule of twenty-four Hours was changed in Part, in Regard to the United Provinces, since the Publication of our Author's Work; and a Placart (of March 11, 1632.) is cited, which, abrogating the antient Laws, adjudges to those who retake a Ship from the Enemy, two Thirds of it, and of the Cargo, without any Regard had to the Time that the Vessel was in the Enemy's Hands; provided it was not carried into any Place under their Dominion. See SIMON DE GROENEWEGEN, De Legibus abrogatis & inusitatis in Hollandia vicinisque regionibus, upon Law II. of the Title, De Captivis & Postliminio, of the Digest. p. 301. Edit. Noviomag. 1664.

[a] Coma Lapide in Gen. c. 14. Molina, disp. 118.

[1] Rursum, si cum magna vi, &c. Digest. Lib. XLI. Tit. II. De adquir. vel amittenda possessione, Leg. XVIII.

[2] Hannibal was informed of this by a Prisoner, and thought it such a Piece of Assurance, that to brave the Romans in his Turn, he caused the Goldsmiths Shops round the Forum of Rome to be sold by Auction: Parva autem [res minuit spem Annibalis] quod per eos, &c. LIVY, Lib. XXVI. Cap. XI. Num. 6. The Remark upon the preceding Paragraph, Note 1. is also applicable in this Place.

- [3] The Sense of FLACCUS is, that the People, who went out to settle in some Country, called the Extent of Land, which they had seized for their Use, after having terrified and expelled the Inhabitants, Territory: Praemensumque quod universis, &c. p.3. Edit. Goes.
- [4] VARRO says, Ab eo coloneis locus communis, qui prope oppidum, relinquitur, Territorium, quod maxime teritur. Lib. IV. p. 9. Edit. H. Steph. The Lawyer POMPONIUS derives it from the same Word as SICULUS FLACCUS, but for a different Reason; that is, says he, the Power of the Magistrates to awe the People. [Territorium est universitas agrorum intra fines cujusque civitatis: Quod ab eo dictum quidam aiunt, quod Magistratus ejus loci intra eos fines terrendi, id est, submovendi, jus habent. Digest. Lib. L. Tit. XVI. De verborum significat. Leg. CCXXXIX. § 8.] GROTIUS.
- [5] FRONTINUS does not derive the Etymology of the Word Territory from Terra, but from Terrere, with SICULUS FLACCUS, and that in a Manner more conformable to the Sense and End of our Author. Territorium, says he, est quidquid hostes terrendi caussa constitutum est; or, as Mr. VANDER GOES conjectures, Quo quid hostis, &c. De limitibus agrorum, p. 42. But it is a modern Civilian, the great CUJAS, who says in a Note upon the Codex, Lib. X. Tit. XXXI. De Decurionib. &c. Leg. LIII. Territorium a terra malo deducere, quam a terrendo: And gives for his Reason, that Territorium is sometimes taken for a private Possession, and to the Laws he cites, a Passage from SICULUS FLACCUS himself may be added, p. 42. which Mr. VANDER GOES notes in his Index. This Etymology, as it is the most simple, seems to me the best; tho' the learned GRONOVIVS approves that of POMPONIUS, in a Note upon this Passage of our Author, which the Reader may see. For the Rest, the Thing is not very material, and the Arguments deduced from the Etymology of Words are often very slender. But it is not improper to apprize my Reader, that I find here another Instance of what I have remarked in several other Places, that our Author sometimes quoted upon the Authority of others; for if he here ascribes to an antient Author the Conjecture of a modern Civilian, that undoubtedly proceeds from his having read in DENNIS GODEFROY's Note upon the Law of the Digest, cited in the foregoing Note, the following Words, A terrendis hostibus [etymon deducit] Frontinus in libro de agrorum qualitat. a terra, Cujac. ad L. 53. C. de Decurion. he believed, through Mistake, that the Words a terra related to the Author first spoken of, and not to the latter. We have seen above, in B. II. Chap. XVIII. § 1. Note 2. a like Oversight into which he fell on Occasion of a Note of the same DENNIS GODEFROY.
- [6] He speaks of two fortified Places that the Athenians had near their Silver-Mines, by the Means of which, with the Addition of a third Fort, which they might build upon an Eminence, it would not be difficult for them to preserve their Mines in Time of War. Lib. De Reditibus, Cap. IV. 43, 44. Edit. Oxon.
- [1] That is to say, if neutral Strangers supply our Enemy with any Thing, and that with Design to put him into a Condition to distress us, they may then be considered as being of our Enemy's Party, and, in Consequence, their Effects are liable to be taken by the Right of War. Now as this can scarce take Place but in Relation to moveable Things, as the late Mr. COCCEIUS observes, in his Dissertation, De jure belli in amicos, § 36. that Civilian might have spared himself the Trouble of criticising our Author, as not having distinguished in this Place between immoveable and moveable Things. The Distinction follows from the very Nature of the Thing which our Author lays down.
- [2] Orat. de male obita Legat. p. 251. B.
- [3] A Commentator upon our Author opposes him here with an Argument ad hominem. If, according to your Opinion, says he, it is lawful to kill the Strangers we find upon an Enemy's Lands, there is much more Reason to hold it lawful to seize their Effects. And as he rightly foresaw, that he might be answered from what has been said above, (Chap. IV. of this Book, § 6.) that there is something to be feared from the Persons, but nothing from the Effects, of Strangers, who are not in the Enemy's Country; he replies, that the Effects of Strangers serve to encourage the Enemy, and confirm him in his Designs. But some have answered, that Effects being only the Accessory of Persons, cannot be taken by the Right of War, unless when those they belong to, are, or may be, deemed our Enemies. So that the Use which the Enemy may make of the Effects of others in his Territories against us, authorises us to repute them good Prize, only when they have been sent thither on Purpose to succour him, or when the Proprietors, tho' timely warned, have omitted to withdraw them. See HENNINGES and OBRECHT.

[1] Neither do the Ships of Friends become lawful Prize, on the Account of the Enemies Goods, unless it is done by the Consent of the Owners of the Ship, L. Cotem. D. De publicanis. RODERICUS ZUARIUS, Lib. De usu Maris, Consil. II. Num. 6. And so I take the Laws of France should be understood, which made Prize of the Ships on Account of the Goods, and of the Goods on Account of the Ships; such as those of Francis I. made in the Year 1543. Cap. XLII. Henry III. in the Year 1584. in the Month of March, Cap. LXIX. the Law of Portugal, B. I. Tit. XVIII. otherwise the Goods only are made Prize. Meursius Danic. B. II. So in the War between the Venetians and Genoese, the Ships of the Grecians were searched, and the Enemies taken out, if any were there. GREGORAS, B. IX. See also CRANTZIUS, Saxon. II. and ALBERICK GENTILIS, Advocat. Hispan. I. 20. GROTIUS.

[1] See Note 2. upon Paragraph I. of this Chapter.

[2] So Rezin, King of Syria, having taken the City Eloth, which had belonged to the Idumaeans, gave it to be inhabited, not by the Idumaeans but the Syrians, according to the Reading of the Masoreths. 2 Kings xvi. 6. GROTIUS.

But that Reading is faulty. See Mr. LE CLERC's Commentary upon the Text.

[3] Lib. VI. Cap. XXXVI. p. 355. Edit. Oxon. 369. Sylburg.

[4] PLUTARCH relating in what Manner the Veii had commenced Hostilities against the Romans, under Pretext that the latter had refused to restore the City of Fidenae, to which they pretended to have a Right; observes, that this was both unjust and ridiculous, because the Veii had not defended Fidenae, and had suffered the Romans to make a Conquest of it. Vit. Romul. (p. 33. B. Vol. I. Edit. Wech.) GROTIUS.

[5] DIONYSIUS HALICARNASSENSIS, Antiq. Rom. Lib. VI. Cap. XXXII. (p. 352. Edit. Oxon. 366. Sylb.) This Example is not to the Purpose. The Romans having overcome the Volsci Ecetrani, and deprived them of their Lands, the Volsci Aurunci demanded their being restored to them.

[6] DIONYSIUS HALICARNASSENSIS, Lib. VIII. Cap. X. p. 470. Edit. Oxon. (488. Sylb.) The Volsci demanded only the Lands and Towns which the Romans themselves had taken from them. So that this is also an Example extra oleas.

[7] Excerpt. Legat. (Cap. II. p. 705.)

Of all these Examples there is not one which agrees with the Case in Question. The Volsci demanded Restitution of Lands, which the Romans had taken from themselves. DIONYSIUS HALICARNASSENSIS, Lib. VI. Cap. XXXIV. Fregellae was a City of the Volscians which had been taken and demolished by the Samnites. The Romans rebuilt it, and settled a Colony in it. See LIVY, Lib. VIII. Cap. XXIII. Num. 6. This occasioned the Complaint of the Samnites. The Affair of Fidenae is evidently foreign to the Subject. We do not find in all these Instances any Thing taken from an Enemy, who had before taken it from others by the Right of War.

- [8] Et Lunam coloniam eodem anno, &c. LIVY, Lib. XLI. Cap. XVII. Num. 4, 5, 6.
- [9] Bell. Mithridatic. (p. 404. Edit. Amstel. 244. Edit. H. Steph.) The same Historian says in another Place, that Pompey made this the Pretext for depriving a Prince of his Dominions, of whom the Roman People had no Reason to complain. Bell. Syriac. (p. 190, 191. Edit. Amstel. 119. H. Steph.) Antiochus himself acknowledges in POLYBIUS, That Conquest is the best of Acquisitions. Excerpt. Legat. Cap. LXXII. GROTIUS.
Our Author confounds here two Antiochus's; for he of whom he speaks in the latter Part of this Note, is not Antiochus Pius, but Antiochus, surnamed the Great.
- [10] Igitur ut habenti regnum non ademerit, &c. Lib. XL. Cap. II. Num. 4.
- [11] It was after Marius had defeated the Cimbri, that Apuleius, Tribune of the People, proposed the Distribution of those conquered Lands. APPIAN. Bell. Civil. p. 625. Edit. Amstel. (367. H. Steph.)
- [12] The antient Franks did not restore to the Romans the Lands in Italy, surrendered to them by the Goths. PROCOPIUS, Gotthic. Lib. IV. See also what the King of Sweden says, in Relation to his Dispute with the Poles about Livonia. THUANUS, Lib. LXXVI. upon the Year 1582. GROTIUS.
- [1] As Strangers in the Service of the State.
- [a] Bart. ad leg. 28. Dig. de Captiv. & Postlim. Alexand. & Jason ad leg. 1. Dig. de adquir. possess. Angel. ad Inst. de rerum divis. § 17. Panorm. ad Decret. de Jurejur. c. 29. Thom. Gramm. Decis. Neapol. 71. n. 17. Martin. Laud. de bello, quaest. 4.
- [2] The Law is cited above, § 2. Note 20.
- [3] The Canons on which this is founded, consist of two Passages; the one from ISIDORUS, whom we shall cite below after our Author, § 17. Note 13. the other from St. AMBROSE, who will be also cited, § 23. Num. 2. Note 8.
- [4] Our Author confounds here different Things: The Question does not relate to the Law of Nations, properly so called; for in whatever Manner that Law is understood, and whatever it be founded on, it ought to regard the Affairs in Dispute between State and State. Now, whether the Booty belongs to the Sovereign who makes War, or the Generals of Armies, or the Troops, or other Persons, that take any Thing from the Enemy, it signifies nothing either to the Enemy or other States. What is taken is taken; and if it be good Prize, it is of very small Consequence to those who have lost it, in whose Hands it remains. As to neutral People, it suffices, that those of them who have bought, or any other Way acquired, a moveable Thing taken in War, cannot be molested, or prosecuted, upon that Account. See above, § 1. Note 1. The Truth is, the Regulations and Customs upon this Head are of publick Right. And their Conformity in many Countries implies no more than a civil Right common to several States separately, which our Author distinguishes elsewhere from his Law of Nations. See B. II. Chap. III. § 5. Num. 2. and Chap. VIII. § 26.
- [5] Without supposing any general Consent of Nations in this Place, it suffices to say, that the State of Hostility gives a Right of taking the Things which belong to an Enemy, in the same Manner as if they had no Proprietor, and as if the first Occupant were entitled to them; because the Law which forbids the taking away the Effects of others, ceases between Enemies, merely on Account of their being Enemies.
- [6] In Paragraph II. of this Chapter, Num. 3. Note 23.

- [1] Quod naturaliter acquiritur, &c. Digest. Lib. XLI. Tit. I. De adquir. rerum domin. Leg. LIII.
- [2] Possessionem adquirimus, &c. Recept. Sentent. Lib. V. Tit. II. De Usucap. §1.
- [3] Per Procuratorem, Tutorem, &c. Digest. Lib. XLI. Tit. II. De adquir. vel amitt. possess. Leg. I. § 20.
- [4] See PETER DU FAURE's Agonisticon. Lib. I. Cap. III. p. 14, 15. and Cap. XXVI. p. 170. Ed. Ludg. 1595. The Example which the learned GRONOVIVS alledges here, does not seem well applied. It is likely that Alexander, the Son of Amyntas, King of Macedon, entered himself as a Combatant in the Olympick Games, since Justin, who is quoted, gives this Circumstance as a Proof that Nature had adorned that Prince with every excellent Quality. Cui [Alexandro] tanta omnium virtutum, &c. Lib. VII. Cap. II. Num. 14. But the same Commentator adds another Example, very proper here, taken from the Romans, amongst whom a Person might obtain the Prize in the Games of the Circus, either by himself, or the Slaves he sent thither: Namque ad certamina in Circum per ludos & ipsi descendebunt, & servus suos quique mittebant, &c. PLINY, Hist. Natur. Lib. XXI. Cap. III.
- [5] Because, according to the Roman Law, Acquisitions were not made for a Man by another, unless that other was under his Power as a Slave, real or supposed, or a Son not emancipated. Ex his itaque apparet, per liberos homines, &c. Institut. Lib. II. Cap. IX. Per quas personas, &c. §5.
- [6] See Note 1. on this Paragraph. The Words there recited are preceded by the following, Ea, quae civiliter adquiruntur, per eos, qui in potestate nostra sunt, adquirimus, veluti stipulationem: Quod naturaliter, &c.
- [7] He decreed, that the Possession of a Thing might be acquired by the Means of any free Person, even tho' we did not know that he had taken Possession of it in our Name; so that the Moment we come to know it, the Time of Prescription commenced. Per liberam personam ignorantique quoque, &c. Code, Lib. VII. Tit. XXXII. De adquir. & retin. possess. Leg. I. See CUJAS upon this Law, Vol. IX. Opp. p. 1049, 1050. and the Receptae Sententiae of JULIUS PAULUS, Lib. V. Tit. II. § 2. with Mr. SCHULTING's Note, Jurisprud. Ante-Just. p. 434. This had been established before Severus, by the Decisions of the Civilians. See JANUS A COSTA, upon the Institutes, Lib. II. Tit. IX. § 6. Our Author cited here one Title in the Codex for another.
- [8] These are two Rules in the Canon Law quoted in the Margin by our Author, Potest quis per alium, quod potest facere per seipsum. Decretal. in VI. De Reg. Juris, Reg. LXVIII. Qui facit per alium, est perinde, ac si faciat per seipsum. Reg. LXXII.
- [1] This Decision has been criticised not without Reason in my Opinion. Every publick War being made by the Authority of the People, or their supreme Magistrate, all the Right private Persons can have to Things taken from the Enemy, is originally derived from them: The Sovereign's Consent, either express or tacit, is always necessary in this Case. See ZIEGLER upon this Place, and PUFENDORF's Law of Nature and Nations, Lib. VIII. Cap. VI. § 18.
- [2] Syphax Populi Romani auspiciis, &c. Lib. XXX. Cap. XIV. Num. 9. Neither this Example, nor the following, have any Thing in them, that tends to establish the Distinction of our Author.
- [1] Verum est, expulsis hostibus, &c. Digest. Lib. XLIX. Tit. XV. De Captivis & Postlimin. &c. Leg. XX.

- [2] That is, for a Thing which belongs to him who has taken it.
- [3] Vandal. II. See what follows there. Also (the Emperor) Severus gave the Lands conquered from the Enemies to the Captains and Soldiers of the Frontier Garrisons, as LAMPRIDIUS observes. In the Helvetick League it was stipulated, that the Towns and Forts taken, should belong to the whole Body, as we find in many Places of Simlar, De Repub. Helvetiorum. GROTIUS.
- [4] This is inferred from the Manner, in which the Land of Canaan was divided among the Israelites, according to the Order which GOD himself had given in the Book of Numbers xxvi. 55. xxxiii. 54. xxxvi. 2. Our Author observed here in a Note, that among the same Hebrews, the King had for his Share of the Lands taken in War, as much as a whole Tribe, and refers to the Title, De Rege, of the Talmud. See SELDEN, De jure Natur. & Gent. secund. Hebr. Lib. VI. Cap. XVI. p. 785.
- [5] I am very much deceived, if our Author, trusting to his Memory, has not confounded the Lacedaemonians with the Athenians, in this Place. The Scholiast upon ARISTOPHANES says, that it was the Custom with the Athenians, when they had taken an Enemy's City, and expelled the antient Inhabitants, to distribute the Lands by Lot amongst the Victors. In Nub. ver. 203. See the late Baron SPANHEIM upon that Passage. Long before him, THOMAS GATAKER had cited this Passage, amongst many others, in his Historical and Theological Treatise upon the Nature and Use of Lots, writ in English, Chap. IV. p. 76. But neither the one nor the other mention the Lacedaemonians; tho' the latter, who was a Man of very extensive Reading, made it his Business to collect all he could find upon that Head, in the Customs of the Greeks, Romans, and other Nations.
- [6] Page 604. Edit. Amstel. (353. H. Steph.)
- [7] Page 840. (516. Edit. H. Steph.)
- [8] Consecrabantar agri, &c. Orat. de domo sua ad Pontifices, Cap. XLIX.
- [1] Admitting the Sovereign's express or tacit Consent.
- [2] Et quae res hostiles apud nos sunt, &c. Digest. Lib. XLI. Tit. 1. De adquir. rerum Domin. Leg. LI.
- [3] Verum in pace, qui pervenerunt ad alteros, si bellum subito exarsisset, eorum servi efficiuntur, apud quos jam hostes suo fato [as it must be read and not facto or pacto, as the Editions have it] deprehenduntur. Digest. Lib. XLIX. Tit. XV. De Captivis & Postlimin. &c. Leg. XII. princ. The Grammarian SERVIUS opposes Destiny to Merit, when he says, that VIRGIL takes Care, in relating the Adventures of the Trojans, to attribute every Thing to the Destinies, and nothing to the Faults of the Exiles. ACTI FATIS, Si fatis, nulla Junonis invidia est: Si odio Junonis, quomodo acti fatis? Sed hoc ipsum Junonis odium fatale est: Laborat enim VIRGILIUS nil Trojanorum meritis, sed omnia fatis adscribere. In Aeneid. (ver. 32.) GROTIUS.
- The Passage of NAEVIUS, which our Author alledges here, by Way of Example, is cited, as GRONOVIVS informs us, by the Grammarian TARENTIANUS, 2439. Edit. Putsch. As to the Correction of the Word Fato, it is exactly according to the antient Editions of the Body of Law, and some of the modern ones. Mr. BYNCKERSHOEK, who makes the Remark, prefers facto however, upon the Authority of the Florence Manuscript, and explains the Passage with some small Difference, by changing the Punctuation. Observ. Jur. Roman. Lib. IV. Cap. XIV. He confesses at the same Time, that Fato makes a very good Sense, and indeed the Thing is little important at Bottom.

[1] See above, § 8. Note 4.

[1] Iliad. Lib. I. ver. 125.

[2] Lib. IX. ver. 330, & seq.

I cannot help observing here, that Madam DACIER has manifestly changed the Sense of HOMER, in ver. 334, 335. of this Passage, by translating them thus, Retenoit le reste pour lui, & en faisoit, comme il lui plaisoit, des presens aux Generaux, & aux Princes. “Reserved the Rest for himself, and made Presents out of it, as he thought fit, to the Princes and Generals.” Upon which she supposes, without other Proof, that the King distributed to such as he thought fit to distinguish, all the Booty he had reserved for himself. But the Poet evidently distinguishes the Part Agamemnon kept for himself, from that which he took for Presents to the Generals, and the Leaders of the Army; which makes that Portion he left for the Soldiers still the less.

[3] Lib. I. ver. 163, 164.

[4] Lib. IX. ver. 279, & seq.

[5]

Et jam porticibus vacuis, &c.

Aeneid. Lib. II. ver. 761. & seq.

[a] Plut. in ejus Vit.

[b] Herod. 1. 9.

[c] Plut. in ejus Vit.

[6] See XENOPHON, in his Treatise upon the Lacedemonian Government, Cap. XIII. Num. 11. Edit. Oxon. Our Author observed here, that whilst Agesilaus was in Asia, Spithridates, who had come over to his Party, having taken the Camp of Pharnabazus, converted the Booty to his own Use; but Erispides, the Lacedemonian, having caused strict Search to be made on that Account, obliged Spithridates to run away. This PLUTARCH relates in the Life of Agesilaus, p. 601. E.

[7]

*Si vero capere Italiam, sceptrisque potiri
Contigerit victori, & praedae ducere sortem, &c.*

Aeneid. Lib. IX. ver. 267, 268.

[d] Homer, Iliad 10.

[e] Plin. 1. 23. c. 3.

[f] Plut. in ejus Vit. Curt. 1. 4. Diod. 1. 17. Strabo, 1. 15.

[g] Diod. 1. 13.

[h] Livy, 1. 23.

[8] You have this in TURONENSIS, B. II. Chap. XXVII. AYMON, Lib. I. Cap. XII. and in the Epitome published by FREHER, Cap. IX. This was also an antient Custom of other Nations. SERVIUS, upon the third Aeneid. Sortitus non pertulit ullos. Because the Prisoners and Spoil were divided among the Conquerors by Lot. And upon praedae ducere sortem. See JOHANNES MAGNUS, of bestowing the Prey in common, and of clearing by Oath, among the Swedes and Goths, Lib. XI. Cap. II. GROTIUS.

In the Passage of the History of JOHANNES MAGNUS, referred to by our Author, there is not a Word upon the Subject for which he quotes it. Nor do I find any Thing said of it, in any other Part of that History, or in that of OLAUS MAGNUS his Brother, and Successor in the Archbishoprick of Upsal, intitled Historiae Septentrionalium Gentium Breviarium; or in the Historia Suecorum Gothorumque, of another Historian of the same Name, ERICUS OLAUS. I am afraid our Author has mistaken one Name for another in this Place.

[9] Antiq. Roman. Lib. VII. Cap. LXIII. p. 450. Edit. Oxon. (467, 468. Sylburg.)

[a] See Simler, De Rep. Helvetior.

[1] The learned RHABOD HERMAN SCHELIUS, in his Tract De Praeda, which is amongst those that follow his Commentary upon HYGINUS and POLYBIUS, De Castris Romanorum, (p. 253. & seq. Edit. Amstel. 1660.) refutes DIONYSIUS HALICARNASSENSIS in this Place, without mentioning our Author, who long before him had made the same Criticism, and treated historically the Point of Antiquity in Question, better than any Body else, even since, has done.

[2] POLYBIUS very much commends the Disinterestedness of Paulus Aemilius, who, when he had made himself Master of the whole Kingdom of Macedonia, by the Defeat of King Perseus, and had full Power to dispose of every Thing as he thought fit, coveted nothing in the least. Excerpt. Peiresc. De Virtut. & Vit. (p. 1454. Edit. Amstd.) GROTIUS.

[3] Aemilius primo resistere, &c. Lib. XXXVII Cap. XXXII. Num. 12.

[4] Nec duci [Camillo] qui ad Senatum, &c. LIVY, Lib. V. Cap. XXII. Num. 1.

[1] Thus Lucius Mummius filled all Italy with the Statues and Pictures he had taken in the Plunder of Corinth, none of which were carried to his own House; as the anonymous Author of the Lives of illustrious Men, (supposed to be AURELIUS VICTOR) informs us. Mummius Corinthum signis tabulisque spoliavit, quibus quum totam implevit Italiam, in domum suam nihil contulit. (Cap. LX. Num. 3.) PLUTARCH, in the Life of Paulus Aemilius, of whom we have spoken, (Note 2. upon the preceding Paragraph) says, that his Generosity and Greatness of Soul was highly extolled, because he would not so much as see the Gold and Silver that had been taken from King Perseus, but ordered it all to be paid to the Treasurers of the Republick, [the Quaestors.] (p. 270. Vol. 1. Edit. Wechel.) GROTIUS.

[2] Praeda dicitur corpora ipsa rerum, quae capta sunt: Manubiae vero adpellatae sunt Pecunia a Quaestore ex venditione praedae redacta. Noct. Attic. Lib. XIII. Cap. XXIV. GROTIUS.

[3] Praedae ex assiduis populationibus, &c. Lib. IV. Cap. LIII. Num. 10.

[4] Quae omnis [pecunia Tigranis] sicuti Pompejo moris erat, &c. VELLEJUS PATERCULUS, Lib. II. (Cap. XXXVII.) Pompey generally acted in that Manner, but not always. See the Passage of LUCAN, cited in the next Paragraph. (Num. 7.) GROTIUS.

[5] De praeda mea, praeter Quaestores urbanos, &c. Lib. II. Epist. ad Famil. XVII. p. 113. Edit. Graev. maj.

[6] Bacchid. Act. IV. Scen. IX. ver. 152.

[7] Captiv. Act. I. Scen. II. ver. 1, 2.

[8] Where Decius says, in accusing Coriolanus, that he had neither delivered the Booty to the Quaestor, nor sold it himself, in Order that the Money might be laid up in the publick Treasury: Antiq. Roman. Lib. VII. Cap. LXIII.

[a] Livy, l. 1.

[b] Livy, l. 3.

[c] Dion. Hal. l. 2.

[d] Livy, l. 1.

[1] Apud milites vero, obeundo pericula, &c. Lib. I. Cap. LIV. Num. 4.

[2] Altera [sententia] Appii, &c. Idem. Lib. V. Cap. XX. Num. 5.

[3] JOSEPHUS tells us this was practised among the Hebrews, B. III. Antiq. Histor. GROTIUS.

Our Author probably infers this from the Jewish Historian's saying, that after the Defeat of the Amalekites, MOSES gave Rewards to those who had distinguished themselves by their Bravery. Cap. II. p. 76. Edit. Lips. He had just spoken of the great Booty made by the Israelites in this Victory; but all these Circumstances are not mentioned in that Part of Holy Writ, where the Defeat of the Amalekites is related. Exod. xvii.

[4] In the Words of LIVY, which follow those quoted Note 2. upon this Paragraph, Si semel nefas ducerent, &c. Lib. V. Cap. XX. Num. 5.

[a] Lib. 10.

[5] In dies aut vigiliis, says our Author. This is not very conformable to his Original. It is not likely, that after the taking of a City the Soldiers should be sent out to plunder, during the whole Night. POLYBIUS only says, that every Day were drawn out, sometimes a certain Number of Soldiers from the whole Army, in Proportion to the Bigness of the City, and sometimes only so many Standards or Companies. Lib. X. Cap. XVI. p. 821. Edit. Amstel. He informs us a little before, that when Scipio had taken New-Carthage in Spain, upon the Approach of Night, he caused the Troops to desist from plundering, and to carry all the Booty already taken into the midst of the publick Market-Place; where a good Guard was posted during the Night. So that this is very contrary to the Manner in which our Author expresses himself in this Place.

[6] See SELDEN, De Jure Nat. & Gent. Secund. Hebr. Lib. VI. Cap. XVI. p. 784, 785.

[b] Livy, l. 45.

[7] Pediti in singulos, &c. LIVY, Lib. XLV. Cap. XL. Num. 5.

[8] Tantaque praeda fuit, &c. Idem ibid. Cap. XXXIV. Num. 5.

[9] APPIANUS ALEXANDRINUS says a Tribune and Colonel of Horse. Bell. Civil. Lib. II. (p. 803. Edit. Amst. 491. Edit. H. Steph.) GROTIUS.

This was the real Partition. I do not know where our Author had what he speaks of in the Text. It is very probable that it arose from a Mistake. He had in View this very Passage, of which his Memory altered the Sense; and he did not remember afterwards, that it had been the Foundation of what he had advanced. He cites also in the Margin, a Passage from SÜETONIUS, in CAESAR, Cap. XXXVIII. init. where according to the best Editions, the Proportion observed in the Distribution of the Spoils, is not mentioned; and admitting the Gloss which had long remained in the Text, the Proportion would be different from all those our Author speaks of. See the last Commentators upon the Place.

[10] See LIVY, (Lib. II. Cap. XXXIII.) and PLUTARCH, in the Life of Coriolanus, (p. 218. A. B. Vol. II. Edit. Wech.) GROTIUS.

There is nothing of this in LIVY. But the Reader may see DIONYSIUS HALICARNASSENSIS, Antiq. Roman. Lib. VI. Cap. XCIV.

[c] See Leunclav. Hist. Turc.

[11] There are Authors, who pretend that this Portion of the General's was most commonly called Manubiae. The Grammatician ASCONIUS PEDIANUS is of that Number, who says, Manubiae autem sunt praeda Imperatoris, pro portione de hostibus capta. (In CICERO, Verr. Lib. I. Cap. LIX.) GROTIUS.

See GRONOVIVS's Note upon this Question of Grammar.

[12] So Nestor had a Woman for his Share

— — Ἡ οἱ Ἀργαῖοι

Ἐξέλεον — —

*Whom without Lots the Greeks a Present made
To him.*

Iliad. Lib. XI. ver. 625, 626.

Ulysses says,

Τῶν ἐξαίρετῶν Μενεοικέα, πολλὰ δ' ὀπίσω

Λάγχανον — —

*I chose the fair Menecca first; the Rest
I took by Lot. — —*

Odys. Lib. XIV. ver. 232, & seq.

GROTIUS.

I know not by what Authority our Author, without taking the least Notice, has changed the last Passage, and found the proper Name of a Woman in it, instead of an Adjective, very common in HOMER, ΜΕΝΕΟΙΚΕΑ, for ΜΕΝΟΙΚΕΑ: This would rather be the Name of a Man; and there is not the least Necessity for any Alteration. Ulysses had said, that before the Trojan War he had commanded in chief in nine Expeditions by Sea, wherein he had taken to himself by Right of Preciput, what he thought fit, after which he had by Lot a further considerable Share.

Πρὶν μὲν γὰρ Τροίης, &c.

[13] Trad. ver. 32. & seq.

[14] Ibid. (ver. 274.)

[15] (Aeneid. IX. ver. 270, 271.)

[16] He had the tenth Part of the whole Booty. Lib. IX. Cap. LXXX. King Agamemnon had Cassandra by this Right of Preciput, according to EURIPIDES, Ἐξαίρετόν τιν ἔλαβεν Ἀγαμέμνων ἄναξ.

(Troad. ver. 249.) See THUCYDIDES upon the Portion of the Booty given in particular to Demosthenes, General of the Athenians. Lib. III. (Cap. CXIV. Edit. Oxon.) GROTIUS.

[17] It was not Servius Tullius, but Tarquinius Superbus, for Ocrisia was the Mother of the former; as GRONOVIVS observes upon this Place. He might have added that our Author's Mistake arose from Ocrisia's Husband's being called Tullius. See DIONYSIVS HALICARNASSENSIS, Antiq. Rom. Lib. IV. Cap. I.

[18] Excerpt. p. 714. Edit. Oxon.

[19] Item praedae decisio, &c. (ORIGEN. Lib. V. Cap. VII.)

[20] Eaque ipsa causa belli, &c. Lib. I. Cap. LVII. Num. 1.

[21] It is not of the General that SERVILIUS speaks, but of Servius Galba, who complained, that Paulus Aemilius had not rewarded his Army by the Distribution of the Spoils, Quum te praeda partienda, &c. LIVY, Lib. XLV. Cap. XXXVII. Num. 10.

[22] See Note 11. upon this Paragraph.

[23] This follows the Passage of DIONYSIVS HALICARNASSENSIS, cited above, Note 18. of this Paragraph. The Emperor Julian, as our Author observes in a short Note, proposed the Example of Fabricius to himself and his Soldiers, as appears by a Speech ascribed to him by AMMIANUS MARCELLINUS, Lib. XXIV. Cap. III. p. 429. Edit. Vales. Gron.

[24] PLUTARCH, in Vit. M. Caton. p. 342. A. Vol. I. Edit. Wech.

[25] Pharsal. Lib. IX. ver. 197, 198. See above, § 16. Note 4.

[d] Livy l. 4.

[26] This was because it had been upon the Point of being defeated, through the Consul's ill Conduct who commanded, and who, upon that Account became Lieutenant, from Commander in chief. Carebis, inquit, [Dictator L. Quintius Cincinnatus] praedae parte miles, ex eo hoste, cui prope praedae fuisti; & tu, L. Minutii, donec Consularem animum incipias habere, legatus his legionibus praeeris. LIVY, Lib. III. Cap. XXIX. Num. 2.

[27] Simili etiam modo a gestorum absolvimus ordinatione, &c. Lib. VIII. Tit. LIV. De Donation. Leg. XXXVI. § 1.

[28] This Example is not well applied. The Accusation of Camillus had another Foundation. See LIVY, whom our Author cites in the Margin, Lib. V. Cap. XX. XXII. XXIII. XXXII. and PLUTARCH, in Camill. p. 132, 133.

[29] Lib. VII. Cap. LXIV. Edit. Oxon. I read  $\sigma\tau\rho\alpha\gamma\epsilon\iota\delta\zeta$ , instead of  $\sigma\tau\rho\alpha\tau\upsilon\delta\zeta$ , in this Passage; according to the Conjecture of SYLBURG, which the Authority of a good Manuscript in the Vatican, that Mr. HUDSON had good Reason to follow, renders indisputable.

[a] Dion. l. 4.

[b] Livy, l. 4.

[1] This was in Consequence of a Resolution of the Senate; for Camillus was averse to granting that Permission, as LIVY tells us, Lib. V. Cap. XX.

- [2] That Consul did not suffer it to be plundered in the Manner now under Consideration, that is, that every one might keep what he should take; for DIONYSIUS HALICARNASSENSIS expressly says, that he caused the Booty to be divided. Antiq. Rom. Lib. VI. Cap. XXIX.
- [3] This Example is dubious. It does not appear that the Army was permitted to plunder in the Manner our Author understands it. See DIONYSIUS HALICARNASSENSIS, Lib. IX. Cap. LV.
- [c] Dion. l. 10.
- [d] Livy, l. 45.
- [4] Our Author forgot that he had himself cited this Example above, where he speaks of the Distribution of the Booty in certain Proportions, § 17. Note 8. For the Fact he relates here is in the same Chapter of LIVY, Senatum praedam Epiri civitatum, quae ad Persea defecissent exercitui dedisse. Lib. XLV. Cap. XXXIV. Num. 1. The Example, which he adds here in a little Note, is more to the Purpose; it is that of the Plundering of Athens by Sylla's Army, as APPIANUS ALEXANDRINUS informs us, De Bell. Mithridat. p. 331. Edit. Amstel. (195. H. Steph.)
- [5] See APPIANUS ALEXANDRINUS, De Bell. Mithrid. PLUTARCH relates, that he gave the Plunder of Tigranocerta to his Soldiers; besides, out of the Spoils, 800 Drachmas given to each. Severus gave the Spoil of Ctesiphon to his Army: He also ordered the Tribunes and Captains, and the very Soldiers to keep to themselves what they got in the Streets, according to AELIUS SPARTIANUS. Mahomet II. promised both the Spoil of Constantinople, and the Slaves, to his Soldiers. GROTIUS.
- Our Author confounds here two Roman Emperors, through the Resemblance of their Names. The first Thing he says of Severus, that is to say, of Septimius Severus, does really agree to him, and is related by the Historian he quotes; tho' it does not appear very clearly, whether this Emperor left to every Soldier what he had taken, or divided the Booty according to Custom. Harum adpellationum caussa donativum militibus largissimum dedit, concessâ omni praeda oppidi Parthici; quod milites quaerebant. SPARTIANUS, in Septim. Sever. Cap. XVI. But the other Circumstance is told of Alexander Severus, by LAMPRIIDIUS, who speaks of the Spoils taken from the Persians: Et de Praeda, quam Persis diripuit, suum ditavit exercitum; quum & Tribunos ea quae per vicus diriperant, & duces, & ipsos milites, habere jussisset. Cap. LV.
- [6] He gives the Omission of this Manner of acquiring Property, as an Example of an imperfect Enumeration, which an Orator would make in saying to a Person, "As you possess this Horse, you must either have bought, inherited, had him given you, bred him yourself, or stolon him. Now you neither bought, inherited, had him given you, &c. therefore you stole him." He should have added, says CICERO, that this Horse might have been taken from the Enemy, and left out of the Number of Things to be sold for the Benefit of the Publick. Praeteritur quiddam in ejusmodi enumerationibus: Quoniam habes istum equum, aut emeris oportet, &c. De Invention. Lib. I. Cap. XLIX.
- [7] VARRO reckons six Ways by which one may become a lawful Master. 1. Entrance on a just Inheritance. 2. Selling before Witnesses. 3. Giving up Right. 4. Long Possession, or Prescription. 5. Selling for Slaves out of a Booty. 6. By a publick Auction of the Goods of any one. De re Rust. Lib. II. Cap. X. GROTIUS.
- See upon this Passage WILHELMI GOESII, Vindiciae pro recepta de mutui alienatione sententia, p. 66. & seq. and Mr. SCHULTING's Notes upon the Institutions of CAJUS, Lib. I. Tit. VI. § 3. p. 53. Col. A. De Jurisprud. Ante-Justiniana.
- [e] See a Passage of Procopius, which shall be cited on § 24. n. 11.

[8] Non avidas in direptiones manus otiosorum urbanorum praerepturas fortium bellatorum praemia esse: Quum ita ferme eveniat, ut qui segnior sit, praedetur, at fortissimus quisque labores periculique praecipuam petere partem soleat. Lib. V. Cap. XX. Num. 6. I recite the Passage after our Author, who corrects without saying any Thing, and as he understands it, the Editions published in his Time; whereas, in the most antient Editions, and the best Manuscripts, which J. FREDERICK GRONOVIVS follows, there is, Ut segnior sit praedator, ut quisque laboris, &c. The Sense however is not very different; for those Words, read in this Manner, signify, that the Soldiers who endeavour to have the greatest Share in Fatigues and Dangers, are the last in running after Plunder; which sufficiently implies, that the least brave are, on the contrary, the most keen in Quest of Spoils. See the Note of that great Critick.

[9] De Instit. Cyr. Lib. VII. Cap. XI. § 4. Edit. Oxon.

[10] Gratius id fore, laetiusque, &c. LIVY, Lib. V. Cap. XX. Num. 8.

[11] Publicari praedam Tribunis placebat, &c. Lib. VI. Cap. IV. Num. 11.

[12] Nec continere suos, &c. Idem. Lib. XXXVIII. Cap. XXIII. Num. 4.

[1] Thus the Consuls Menenius Agrippa, and Postumius Tubertus, having overthrown the Sabines, sold the Prisoners, and out of the Money raised in that Manner, reimbursed those who had contributed to the Support of the Army. DIONYSIUS HALICARNASSENSIS, Antiq. Rom. Lib. V. Cap. XLVII. p. 300. Edit. Oxon. (313. Sylb.) Which Passage our Author had in View in the marginal Citation, where he quoted only the Book.

[a] Livy, l. 5.

[1] See above, § 1. Note 3.

[b] Ibid.

[2] Consul (Cnaeus Manlius) armis hostium, &c. LIVY, Lib. XXXVIII. Cap. XXIII. Num. 10.

[3] DIONYSIUS HALICARNASSENSIS, Antiq. Rom. Lib. VIII. Cap. LXXXII. p. 526. Edit. Oxon. (549. Edit. Sylb.) The Word λεία in this Passage, includes only Cattle; since the Prisoners are distinguished from it.

[c] Dion. l. 10.

[d] Ibid.

[e] Ibid.

[f] Livy, l. 5.

[g] Id. l. 6.

[h] Id. ibid.

[4] Which DIONYSIUS HALICARNASSENSIS makes Fabricius himself say, Excerpt. p. 714. Edit. Oxon. Our Author added here, in a Note, that Fabius Maximus, after having taken Tarentum, distributed the whole Booty to his Soldiers, and brought only the Money that arose from the Sale of Prisoners, to the publick Treasury. But LIVY, Lib. XXVII. Cap. XVI. Num. 7. And PLUTARCH, Vit. Fab. p. 187. C. relate the Fact in a different Manner. I suspect that our Author has confounded what the first of those Historians says of Fabius, with what he relates a little lower of Scipio, the Conqueror of Asdrubal. Scipio, castris hostium potitus, quum praeter libera capita, omnem praedam militibus concessisset, &c.

[i] Id. l. 25.

[k] App. Pun.

[l] Livy, l. 37.

[1] Scipio & A. Hostilius legatus, &c. LIVY, Lib. XXXVIII. Cap. LV. Num. 6.

[2] Sed enim M. Cato, in oratione—Fures, inquit, privatorum furtorum in nervo atque in compedibus aetatem agunt; fures publici, in auro atque in purpura. Noct. Attic. Lib. XI. Cap. XVIII.

[3] Cato Censorius—Miror audere, &c. Apud PRISCIANUM, Lib. VII. in fin. p. 275. Edit. Basil. 1568.

[4] It was a Statue of Mercury, which Scipio had found long before, amongst the Spoils of the City of Carthage, and had made a Present to the City of Tyndaris. Est peculatus [crimen] quod publicè Populi Romani signum, &c. In Verr. Lib. IV. Cap. XLI.

[5] Lib. X. Cap. XVI. p. 822. Edit. Amstel.

[6] Item in Libro ejusdem CINCII, de Re Militari, &c. Noct. Attic. Lib. XVI. Cap. IV. See the Dissertation of SCHELIUS, De Sacramentis militum, annexed to his Commentary, De Castris Romanorum, p. 184. & seqq.

[7] Is, qui praedam ab hostibus captam subripuit, peculatûs tenetur, & in quadruplum damnatur. Digest. Lib. XLVIII. Tit. XIII. Ad. Leg. Jul. peculatûs, &c. Leg. XIII.

[1] See PUFENDORF, Law of Nature and Nations, B. IV. Cap. IX. § 9. Note 1.

[2] Missilia. See PUFENDORF, where cited in the preceding Note, Note 9.

[1] Queen Amalasontha makes Use of this Reason, in her Letter to the Emperor Justinian, which PROCOPIUS relates, Gotthic. Lib. I. (Cap. III.) GROTIUS.

[2] He speaks also of those who teach the Sciences. Itaque his [Medico,&bonarum artium praeceptor] &c. De Benefic. Lib. VI. Cap. XV.

[3] Neque enim video, quae justior acquirendi ratio, &c. Instit. Orator. (Lib. XII. Cap. VII. p. 735. Edit. Obrecht.) Which TACITUS calls, Omitti curas familiares, utquis se alienis negotiis intendant. Annal. (Lib. XI. Cap. VII.)

[4] See PLUTARCH, in his Life of Marcellus. GROTIUS.

I find nothing in the Life of Marcellus, that can be applied here, except where he says, speaking of that Roman General, that after the Defeat of the Gauls, the Roman People were so pleased with that Victory, that they sent a fine Present to the Temple of Delphos for Apollo, and gave, moreover, a Part of the Spoils to the Cities of their Allies, as also to Hiero, King of Syracuse, the Friend and Ally of the Romans, p. 302. Vol. I. Edit. Wech.

[1] Our Author does not express himself sufficiently upon the Clause of this Treaty. It took Place as well with Regard to the Wars made by the Latins, as those made by the Romans; for they mutually engaged to aid each other, in Case of being attacked, βοηθείωσαν τε τοῖς πολεμουμένοις ἀπάση δυνάμει, λαφύρων τε καὶ λείας τῆς ἐκ τῶν πολέμου κοινῶν [it must be read so, according to the Vatican Manuscript, instead of τοῖς πολέμου κοινῶν] τὸ ἴσον λαγχανέτωσαν μέρος ἀμφοτέροισι. DIONYSIUS HALICARNASSENSIS, Lib. VI. Cap. XCV. p. 400. Edit. Oxon. (415. Sylburg.) LIVY, who was cited in the Margin, but erroneously in all the Editions before mine, says indeed, that the Romans made a Treaty of Alliance with the Latins, Lib. II. Cap. XXXIII. Num. 4. but mentions no Article of that Treaty.

[2] PLINY tells us that the Roman People gave the Latins a third Part of the Spoils. Quibus [priscis Latinis] ex foedere tertias praedae Romanus populus praestabat. Hist. Natur. Lib. XXXIV. Cap. V. The Swiss Cantons, as SIMLER informs us, divide the Booty according to the Number of Troops they severally furnish. The Pope, the Emperor, and the Venetians made their Division in Proportion to what each of them had contributed towards the Expences of the War; as PARUTA observes, Lib. VIII. Pompey the Great gave Armenia Minor to King Dejotarus, because he had aided the Romans in the Mithridatick War. GROTIUS.

Our Author took this last Fact from EUTROPIUS, for which he gives no Authority. Armeniam minorem Dejotaro, &c. Lib. VI. Cap. XI. Num. 5. Edit. Cellar. See also STRABO, Geogr. Lib. XII. p. 823. A. Edit. Amst. (547. Edit. Paris.)

[3] Et ita in foedere primo, &c. LIVY, Lib. XXXIII. Cap. XIII. Num. 10. See also POLYBIUS, Lib. XI. Cap. V.

[a] Plut. Demet.

[4] Sane iis qui secum fuissent, &c. Lib. I. De Abraham. Cap. III. This Passage is cited in the Canon Law, Caus. XXIII. Quaest. V. Can. XXV.

[5] The Pisidians gave Part of the Booty to those who looked after their Houses, as CHALCOCONDYLAS relates, Lib. V. GROTIUS.

[b] Plut. Apoph.

[6] Namque id solum [tabernaculum] intactum, &c. Lib. III. Cap. XI. Num. 23. See DIODORUS SICULUS, Lib. XVII. (Cap. XXXV.) And PLUTARCH, in Vit. Alexandr. (p. 676. A. Edit. Wechel.) There is something of the same Kind in XENOPHON, Cyropaed. Lib. IV. (Cap. VI. § 6. Edit. Oxon.) and Expedit. Cyri, Lib. IV. (Cap. IV. § 13.) GROTIUS.

[c] Tit. De Rege.

[7] The Grammarians understand by Σκῆλα, the Spoils of the Dead, and by Λάφυρα, the Plunder taken from the Living. See SUIDAS upon the first of these Words.

[8] The Historian whom our Author cites in the Margin, says only, that Sylla plundered that City. APPIAN ALEXANDRINUS, De Bell. Civil. Lib. I. p. 643. Edit. Amstel. (380. H. Steph.)

[9] Pharsal. Lib. VII. ver. 736. & seqq.

[d] App. Civil.

[10] Expugnatae Urbis, &c. Hist. Lib. III. Cap. XIX. Num. 4.

[11] POLYBIUS uses this Argument, to prove the Wisdom of the Romans, individing the Spoils equally among the Soldiers, after an Expedition. Hist. Lib. X. Cap. XVI. XVII.

[12] Et imbelles vulgus, &c. Annal. Lib. XIII. Cap. XXXIX. Num. 7.

[13] Conferti tantum & pilis emissis, &c. Idem. Annal. Lib. XIV. Cap. XXXVI. Num. 4.

[14] See the Passage of PROCOPIUS quoted above, (§ 11. Num. 1.) That Historian farther observes, that the Soldiers of the same Salomon, in an Expedition against the Levatae, (a Kind of Moors) murmured upon his keeping the Booty from them; but that he represented to them, he only did so in order to distribute it according to each Man's Merit, when the War was concluded. Vandalic. Lib. II. (Cap. XXI.) All the Spoils taken at Picenum were brought to Belisarius, who divided it in that Manner; giving for his Reason, that it was not just that whilst some were at great Pains to kill the Drones, others, who had no Share in the Labour, should eat the Honey. Gotthic. Lib. II. (Cap. VII.) GROTIUS.

[15] See the Passage above, § 21. Note 6.

[16] The Turks have the same Custom, according to LEUNCLAVIUS, Lib. III. and Lib. V. GROTIUS.

[17] Amongst the Goths, the Engines of War were excepted, as JOHANNES MAGNUS informs us, Hist. Sued. Lib. XI. Cap. XI. GROTIUS.

I must say the same Thing of this Quotation as I have done of that above, upon § 14. Note 8. There is nothing of that Kind, either in the Place referred to, or in any other of JOHANNES MAGNUS's. Our Author having probably added at the same Time, these two Particularities, from the Customs of the antient Goths, to his Example, which he had taken from the same Place, has confounded in both the Paragraphs, to which he refers them, the Name of one Historian with that of another.

[1] Dicamus in primis, &c. Instit. Orat. Lib. V. Cap. X. p. 432. Edit. Burman.

[a] Ch. 4. § 7.

[1] Si autem Antiochi, &c. LIVY, Lib. XLV. (Cap. XLIV. Num. 15.) So after the Defeat of Jugurtha, King Bocchus, his Son in Law, did not obtain the Lands he pretended to, because they were not Jugurtha's, but belonged to the Children of Masinissa, as we find in APPIANUS ALEXANDRINUS, Excerpt. Legat. XXVIII. There is something of a like Nature in ALBERTUS CRANTZIUS, Saxonic. Lib. XII. (Cap. VII.) GROTIUS.

Our Author said here by Mistake, The Children of Bocchus, instead of the Children of Masinissa.

[2] See PUFENDORF, Law of Nature and Nations, B. V. Chap. XI. § 6. Note 3. (Retention).

[3] Plane qui alienum fundum, &c. Digest. Lib. XLI. Tit. I. De acquir. rerum Domin. Leg. III. See also Lib. VIII. Tit. III. De Servit. praedior. rustice. Leg. XVI.

[1] But see what I have said upon Chap. IV. § 4. Note 1.

[2] In most civil Wars no common Judge is admitted. If the State be monarchical, the Dispute turns either upon the Succession to the Kingdom, or upon a considerable Party of the State's, pretending, that the King has abused his Power, in a Manner that authorizes the Subject to take up Arms against him. In the first Case, the Nature itself of the Cause for which the War is undertaken, occasions the two Parties of the State to form, as it were, two distinct Bodies, till they come to agree upon an Head by some Treaty, made either by Consent, or in Consequence of the Superiority of one of the Parties. Upon this Treaty depends the Right Persons may have, or not have, to what has been taken on any Side; and nothing hinders that Right from being admitted to take Place in the same Manner, as in publick Wars between two States always distinct. Other Nations which have not been involved in the War, have no Authority here to examine into the Validity of the Acquisitions; and the two Parties, by reuniting, may as well discharge themselves from the Damages they have mutually occasioned each other. The other Case, I mean the Rising of a considerable Part of the State against the Prince upon the Throne, can hardly happen, unless when that Prince has given Room for it, either by Tyranny, or the Violation of the fundamental Laws of the Nation. Thus then the Government is dissolved, and the State also divided into two distinct and independent Bodies; so that we are to form the same Judgment here, as in the first Case. And much more does that take Place in the civil Wars of a republican State; in which the War immediately, of itself, dissolves the Sovereignty, that subsists solely in the Union of its Members. And if the Roman Laws decreed that the Prisoners taken in a civil War could not be made Slaves, that was, as the Civilian ULPIAN says, according to the celebrated Mr. NOODT's Explanation, (in his Comment. in Digest, Lib. I. Tit. V. p. 30, 31.) because a civil War was considered, not properly as a War, but as a civil Dissention. For, adds he, a real War is made between those who are Enemies, and animated with the Spirit of Enemies, which prompts them to endeavour the Ruin of each other's State. Whereas, in a civil War, however pernicious it often proves to a State, both Parties are supposed to intend the Preservation of the State; the one is only for saving it in one Manner, and the other in another: So that they are not Enemies, and every Person of the two Parties continues always a Citizen of the State, so divided. These are the antient Lawyer's Words, In civilibus dissentionibus, quamvis saepe per eas Respublica laedatur, non tamen in exitium Reipublicae contenditur; qui in alterutras partes discedent, vice hostum non sunt eorum, inter quos jura captivitatum, aut postliminiorum fuerunt, &c. Digest. Lib. XLIX. Tit. XV. De Captivis & Postlimin. Leg. XXI. § 1. Mr. NOODT adds to this two Passages from CICERO, Orat. pro Ligar. Cap. VI. & in Catilin. Orat. III. Cap. X. But that is a Supposition or Fiction of Right, which does not hinder all I have been saying from being true, and from taking Place in general. The State, of which the Preservation is intended, is not, in the Cases I have spoke of, a Body of Citizens, united under the same Government; it is an Assemblage of People, who having been in Subjection to the same Government, within a certain Extent of Country, are willing indeed to continue for the future in a common Dependence, but do not agree amongst themselves upon the Person, or Body of Men, in whose Hands the supreme Authority ought to be lodged. And as, after their Reunion, the Sovereign acknowledged by all, commonly suffers the antient Laws to subsist, either by an express or tacit Consent, which always takes Place, when there appears no express Will by which he abrogates those Laws, either in Whole or in Part: Hence it was that amongst the antient Romans, one could not appropriate to one's self the Prisoners taken in a civil War, as real Slaves; and not upon Account of any Defect of Conditions or Formalities required, according to our Author, by the Law of Nations, in a publick or solemn War.

[a] B. ii. ch. 22. § 11.

[1] Servitus est constitutio Juris Gentium, qua quis dominio alieno contra naturam subjicitur. Digest. Lib. I. Tit. IV. De statu hominum, Leg. IV. § 1.

[b] B. ii. ch. 5 § 27.

[2] That is to say, where it is customary to make Slaves of all such as are taken in War; for our Author says below, that this is not now practised amongst Christians, and that even formerly it was not a received Custom with all Nations. But in this Case, as in other Things, which our Author refers to his arbitrary Law of Nations, the Power of a Master over his Slaves, made such in this Manner, is not derived solely from Custom. If a Prisoner of War found the Condition of a Slave too hard, it was in his own Power to avoid it, by declaring that he would not acknowledge him for his Master, who had taken him. He did not thereby commit any Offence, nor violate any Law to which he was obliged to submit; he only exposed himself to the Effects of the Enemy's Resentment, and to the Loss of Life, from the Fear of losing his Liberty. But if the Prisoner made no Declaration of his Will, contrary to the received Custom of States at War, he was, and might be deemed tacitly to submit to it, after the Victor had declared on his Side, his being contented to give him his Life, upon Condition, that he would acknowledge him for his Master, which he did by not keeping the Prisoner in Bonds, or narrowly watched; for neither was he in Rigour obliged, by Vertue of the Custom, to give the Prisoner Life, even tho' the latter was willing at that Price to become his Slave: It was only necessary for him to make known sufficiently his not being willing to accept the Prisoner's Offers. So that the Force of the received Custom was only founded upon the mutual Consent, express or tacit, of the Victor and Prisoner, from whence resulted an Engagement, which was presumed, and might easily be presumed, from the good Reasons for which this Custom was introduced, and of which our Author will speak below.

[3] See the Law cited in the preceding Chapter, § 3. Note 3.

[4] See also the preceding Chapter, § 12. Num. 1.

[5] Histor. Lib II. (Cap. LVIII. p. 200. Edit. Amstel.) The Grammarian SERVIUS says, that Hesione, the Daughter of Laomedon, King of Troy, was made a Captive by Right of War, A cujus portu [Trojae quum, &c. In Aeneid. Lib. I. (ver. 619.) He observes elsewhere, in relating the same Fact, that the Greeks refused to restore Hesione to the Trojans, because she was theirs by the Right of War. Hesionem Graeci Trojanis reddere noluerunt, dicentes, se eam habere Jure Bellorum. In Lib. X. JOSEPHUS speaks of some Jews, whom Cassius had taken Prisoners, but not according to the Laws of War; for which Reason, upon Hyrchanus's demanding them in the Name of the Nation, Mark Anthony ordered them to be restored. Antiq. Jud. Lib. XIV. (Cap. XXII. p. 492. A.) He mentions the Law relating to Prisoners of War in another Place, Τῶν δοϋαλότων νόμος, which MENANDER the Protector expresses thus, Δοϋληπτῶν θεσμός. Many Things upon this Subject are said in the preceding Chapter; for Authors join together, or put in the same Class, Prisoners of War, and Things taken from Enemies. GROTIUS.

[6] Lib. omnem virum bonum esse liberum p. 866. Edit. Paris.

[7] Orat. XV.

[1] Jure Gentium servi nostri sunt qui ab hostibus capiuntur, aut qui ex ancillis nostris nascuntur. Digest, Lib. I. Tit. V. De Statu Hominum, Leg. V. § 1. See above B. II. Chap. V. § 29.

[2] He speaks of the Wife of Arminius, who was taken by the Romans, being with Child: Arminium, super insitam violentiam, &c. Annal. Lib. I. Cap. LIX. Num. 2.

[1] Our Author cites here in the Margin of his first Edition, X. Controv. V. The others have I. Controv. V. but there is nothing of this Kind in either of those Places. The Passage is in Lib. V. Controv. XXXIV. wherein the Rhetorician calls this absolute Power of Masters over their Slaves, a Right known to all the World: Qui [Pictor] haec tantum, &c. p. 391. Edit. Gron. Var. The fifth Declamation of the tenth Book of Excerpta Controv. treating this same Subject occasioned this Mistake: For the latter is extracted, Ex Controv. V. Lib. X. This we observe by the by as an Example of the Origin of these Mistakes, into which our Author pretty often falls. I find also a Passage very like this in SENECA the Philosopher: Quum in servum omnia liceant, est aliquid, quod in hominem licere commune jus animantium vetet. De Clement. Lib. I. Cap. XVIII.

[2] This Restriction is to be well observed; for if the Master treats the Slave, acquired by the Right of War, with excessive Cruelty, what ever Impunity he may promise himself, either from the civil Laws of his Country, or from neutral People; the Prisoner, who only submitted to Slavery upon the tacit Condition, that the Victor should behave to him in such a manner as not to make him think his Fate more insupportable than Death itself, is then discharged from his Engagements, and reenters into a State of War with his Master, who has violated his.

- [3] Igitur in potestate sunt servi, &c. Digest, Lib. I. Tit. VI. De his qui sui vel alieni Juris sunt, Leg. I. § 1. See also the Institutes, at the same Title, I. 8. The Grammarian DONATUS says, [JUSTA & CLEMENS] Ita dixit justa, ut alibi. Non necesse habeo omnia pro meo jure agere. Quod enim non justum domino in servum? In Andr. Terent. Act I. Scen. I. (Ver. 9.)
- [4] Ipsa enim servus, qui, &c. Institut. Lib. II. Tit. IX. § 3. VALERIUS MAXIMUS, speaking of a Consul, who had been taken by the Carthaginians, says, that he had lost every Thing by Right of War; but he recovered all and was even made a Consul again: Quo [Cn. Cornelius Scipio Asina] Consul, &c. Lib. VI. Cap. IX. Num. 11. PHILO Judaeus says that a Slave can call nothing his own, not even his Person. Lib. Omnem virum bonum esse liberum, (p. 871. C.) GROTIUS.
- [1] See what PUFENDORF says upon this Question, B. VIII. Chap. VI. § 11. Law of Nature and Nations.
- [2] Thus according to the Romans Laws, a Father who had been made Prisoner, if he returned into his Country, still retained the Rights of his paternal Power: But if he died in Captivity, his Children were deemed free from the Moment he had been taken, so that those Rights were then immediately extinct. Si ab hostibus captus fuit parens, &c. Institut. Lib. I. Tit. III. Quibus modis jus patriae potestatis solvitur, § 5. So, those who had surrendered themselves to the Enemy, not having any Claim to the Right of Postliminy; if a Father had fallen in this manner into the Hands of the Enemy, his Children from thenceforth were no longer in his Power, whether he did or did not return into his Country: Postliminio carent, qui armis victi hostibus se dederunt. Digest, Lib. XLIX. Tit. XV. De Captivis, &c. Leg. XVII. See below, Chap. IX. § 8.
- [a] Chap. iv.
- [1] SERVORUM adpellatio, &c. Digest, Lib. L. Tit. XVI. De verborum significatione, Leg. CCXXXIX. § 1. See also the Grammarian SERVIUS, where he gives the Etymology of the Word Saltem, in Aeneid. Lib. IV. (Ver. 327.) GROTIUS.
- [2] Lex naturae haec est, ut qui nascitur, sine legitimo matrimonio, matrem sequatur, nisi lex specialis aliud inducit. Digest. Lib. I. Tit. V. De Statu hominum, Leg. XXIV. But there is just Reason to believe, that the Civilian understands here, by the Law of Nature, natural Right properly so called, and this is alluded to by a Passage of CICERO's which Mr. SCHULTING cites in his Notes upon the Fragments of ULPIAN, Tit. V. § 8. Ut enim, Jure Civili, qui matre est libera, liber est: Item, Jure Naturae, qui Dea matre est, Deus sit necesse est. "As according to Civil Right, an Infant born of a free Woman is also free. In like manner by the Law of Nature, he who has a Goddess for his Mother, must necessarily be a GOD." De Natur. Deor. Lib. III. Cap. XVIII. For the antient Lawyers pretended, that according to the Law of Nature, founded upon Reason, Children, born out of Wedlock, follow the Condition of their Mother, on account of the Uncertainty in Relation to the Father. And this indeed takes Place, by the very Principles of that Law, in regard to Children born of a Mother, who abandons herself to all Comers: But as to those, whose Father is sufficiently known, as the Father of the Children of a Woman Slave may be, the Law of Nature of itself is far from allowing that their Condition shall always be the same with that of the Mother. See above, B. II. Chap. V. § 29. Num. 1. There is in Reality no greater Certainty, in regard to the Birth of Children, whose Mother is lawfully married: It is only a Presumption, authorized by the Laws, which leave it without Force, the Moment it is destroyed by sufficient Reasons. So that, according to the Roman Law, an Husband is not bound to acknowledge a Child for his own, because born of his Wife and in his House, in the Sight and Knowledge of all his Neighbours, if it appears by good Proof, that he has not lain with his Wife for some Time, upon account of a Distemper, or some other Impediment, or if he was impotent: Sed mihi videtur, quod & SCAEVOLA probat, &c. Digest, Lib. I. Tit. VI. De his qui sui vel alieni juris sunt, Leg. VI.

[b] B. 2. ch. 13. § 26.

[3] P. 1073. Vol. I. Edit. Wech.

[4] Obstructae strage corporum viae, &c. (Cap. XLIV. Num. 1.) The same Historian Remarks elsewhere in speaking of the People of Cremona, that it signified nothing to the Soldiers to make them Prisoners, for all Italy were agreed not to buy such Slaves: Inritamque praedam fecerat consensus Italiae, emtionem talium mancipiorum aspernantis, Lib. III. (Cap. XXXIV. Num. 3.) GROTIUS.

[5] Item quae ex hostibus capiantur, &c. Digest, Lib. XLI. Tit. I. De acquirendo rerum dominio, Leg. V. and VII. Princ.

[1] See below, Chap. IX. § 5. PLINY says, that Marcus Servius was taken twice by Hannibal, and escaped as often out of Prison: Bis ab Annibale captus—bis vinculorum ejus profugus, &c. Hist. Natur. Lib. VII. Cap. XXVIII. GROTIUS.

[2] But there is an express or tacit Consent of the Prisoner in this Case, by Virtue of which, the Victor has acquired a Right over him, that lays the Slave under a real Obligation, and consequently will not permit him in Conscience to run away, or to withdraw himself in any other manner from the Subjection, into which he is entered. See above, § 1. of this Chapter, Note 2. § 3. Note 2. and PUFENDORF's Law of Nature and Nations, B. VI. Chap. III. § 6. as also Mr. NOODT's Discourse Of the Power of Sovereigns, p. 247. & seqq. the second of the French Translation. The Justice or Injustice of the War has nothing to do in this Case. How unjustly soever an Enemy has taken up Arms, the Conventions made with him whilst an Enemy were not the less valid, by the Confession of our Author who lays that down as a Principle below. Besides both Parties generally believe their own Cause just: And if the Victors apprehended, that the Prisoners under Pretext of the Injustice of the War, should believe they had a Right to throw off the Yoke, as soon as they had a favourable Occasion; they would give none of them their Lives. The Interest therefore of Mankind, and even the good of the Conquered, required, that the Engagement of Prisoners, whether express or tacit, should be valid, and that they should renounce the Right of using Reasons deduced from the Injustice of the War, or the Necessity to which they had been reduced, in order to save their Lives. From whence appears the Difference between this Case, and that objected, of a Person who falling into the Hands of Robbers and Pirates should engage to become their Slave. See a Dissertation of the late Mr. HERTIUS, De Lytro, in Vol. I. of his Comment. and Opuscul, &c. Sect. II. § 24. p. 277, 278. The Reader may consult also the Commentary of Mr. VAN DER MEULEN, who also refutes our Author.

[3] Dominium, quod tantum in judicio humano, & quidem coactivo, valeat, says our Author.

[4] See PUFENDORF's Law of Nature and Nations, B. IV. Chap. X. § 7.

[5] That is to say, in the Prescription of thirty or forty Years: For Faith and just Dealing was required in the Usucaption, or ordinary Prescription. See PUFENDORF, Law of Nature and Nations, B. IV. Chap. XII. § 1.

[6] De Sophist. Elench. Lib. II. Cap. V. (XXV.) p. 308. D. Vol. I. Edit. Paris.

[a] See Bembo, Hist. 1. 10.

- [7] Our Author then confesses, that an express Promise would be valid in this Case. Now such Promises were often made. And wherefore should not a tacit Engagement have as much Force?
- [8] Nihil interest, quomodo captivus, &c. Digest, Lib. XLIX. Tit. XV. De Captivis & Postlimin, &c. Leg. XXVI.
- [9] This does not prove, that the Obligation of Prisoners of War was considered as of no Force: Otherwise they ought to have been received also, and to have had the Right of Postliminy granted them, after the making of Peace. But this was, because during the course of the War, the Prisoners were not deemed to be fully engaged as Slaves. It was not known to what Fate the Conqueror would doom them. There was always Hopes of recovering them, and it gave no great Trouble, if they had contracted in that respect any particular Engagement, which the State was not obliged to make good. In making Peace then, the State renounced the Right of receiving Prisoners, and of reinstating them in all the Rights of their former Liberty, if it was not stipulated by the Treaty.
- [10] Idque naturali aequitate introductum est, ut qui PER INJURIAM ab extraneis detinebatur, is, ubi in fines suos rediisset, pristinum jus suum reciperet, Digest, Lib. XLV. Tit. XV. De Captivis & Postlimin. &c. Leg. XIX. Princ. I do not know, whether this Lawyer intended to tax with Injustice, in the Sense and Meaning of our Author, the Detention of a Prisoner of War, much less his Subjection to Slavery. Upon that Foot all the Wars of the Romans were just on their Side, as the Right of Postliminy, of which we now speak, took Place in them all. It is likely, that PAULUS means only, that the Prisoner was in no Fault, and the Word injuria, signifies in this Place no more than an Act of Hostility, just or not, on the Side of those, who exercise it. It is in this Sense, that another Civilian, speaking of violent Means, used by private Persons, says, that, if without having assembled People, or beaten any one, they have taken away per injuriam, that is to say, by main Force, any Thing belonging to another; they render themselves thereby liable to the Penalty of the Julian Law. De Vi privatâ: Sed si nulli convocati, nullique pulsati sint; PER INJURIAM tamen ex bonis alienis quid ablatum sit: Hac lege teneri eum, qui id fecerit. Digest, Lib. XLVIII. Tit. VII. Ad Leg. Jul. de Vi privat. Leg. III. § 2. Per injuriam signifies the same in this Passage, as Vim facere in the beginning of the Law.
- [11] This being a Consequence of our Author's Principle, which we have refuted in Note 2. upon this Paragraph, it follows that we must decide in a manner directly contrary to it.
- [12] To this may be referred the Passages of St. IRENAEUS and TERTULLIAN, which we have quoted before, B. II. Chap. VII. § 2. Note 3. There is a Passage in PHILO JUDAEUS, where the same Subject is handled, that is, what the Israelites did on their Departure out of Egypt. "As the Egyptians, (says he) subdued at Length by so many Plagues from Heaven, pressed the Israelites to depart, and expelled them in some Measure; the latter calling to mind the Dignity of their Origin, undertook a Thing worthy of free Men, who had not forgot the unjust and cruel Treatment they had been made to suffer. For they carried off a great Booty, with one Part of which they loaded themselves, and with the other their Beasts of burden. Not that they were greedy of Riches, or coveted the Goods of others, as Slanderers might accuse them; for from whence could they have such Sentiments? But their Motive was, first to obtain by that Means the Reward due to them for their long Service, and next to avenge themselves, tho' not so much as the Egyptians deserved, for the Slavery they had imposed upon them. For there is no Comparison between Loss of Money and Loss of Liberty; for the Preservation of which, wise Men sacrifice both their Lives and Estates." So that whether the Israelites are considered in a State of Peace or War with the Egyptians, it is most easy to justify their Conduct. For, in the first Case, they did no more than seize the Wages, that had been so long kept from them, and in the other, they plundered their Enemies by the Right of Victors, as they had supplied them with a just Cause for taking up Arms, by treating them like Prisoners of War, when they were Strangers, and Suppliants. De Vita Mosis, (p. 624. Edit, Paris.) In St. JEROME's Letters there is a like Account concerning an holy Person named Malchus. See also that of Leupges the Lombard as related by his great Grandson, PAUL WARNAFREDE, Lib. IV. and the Confession published under the Name of Lanicus Patricius. GROTIUS.

The Case of the Israelites is very different from that in Question; and the Passage of PHILO, which I have cited more at large than our Author has done, relates as little to it; as any one will easily conclude upon Reflection. The same must be said of the Story of Malchus: For he had been taken by Arabian Robbers, and escaped from their Slavery, carrying away with him two of his Master's Goats. See St. JEROM, De vita Malchi, Vol. I. p. 256. & seqq. Edit. Froben.

[13] That of the Council of Gangra: Si quis servum alienum, &c. Caus. XVII. Quaest. IV. Can. XXXVII. See also the following Canon, and what has been said above, B. II. Chap. V. § 29. in fin. GROTIUS.

[1] Our Author's Principles do not agree very well in this Place. For if the Slave, of whom he speaks, may run away, I do not see, why he may not resist his Master, and even kill him, when he has it in his Power, in order to deliver himself from Slavery; since if there be no Engagement on his Side, the State of War subsists always between him and his Master. See the following Note.

[2] No doubt he may, if he was not bound by any Engagement to his Master. But the Magistrate supposes or ought to suppose, a real Agreement by which the Slave is bound; and that is the reason, why he may be obliged to deliver him up to the Master, who reclaims him, without putting himself to the Trouble of examining, whether the War, in which the Slave was taken, was just or unjust.

[3] B. I. Chap. IV. But there also we have shewn that our Author carries the Obligation of Non-resistance to Sovereigns too far.

[4] The Passage has already been cited in the same Place § 7. Num. 8. Note 31. I find since, that our Author in reciting it in his Treatise De imperio Summarum Potestatum circa Sacra, Cap. III. § 6. gives it as St. PROSPER's, Sentent. XXXIV. ex AUGUSTIN. in Psalmum CXXIV. but adds he, non ad verbum, that is to say the Sense is in that Father, tho' not the express Terms of the Passage.

[1] Amongst the Indians there were no Slaves. STRABO, Geograph. Lib. XV. p. 1036. Edit. Amstel. (710. Paris.) GRONOVIVS cites this Example.

[a] Deut. xxiii. 15. See precep. vetant. 109.

[2] This is a meer Supposition. The Law is general, and relates to all Slaves, that is to say, the Slaves of other Nations. See Mr. LE CLERC's Commentary upon it. So that this Law may be considered as one of those, wherein GOD used his Right of Sovereignty over the Goods of Men; by which the Israelites were excused from restoring foreign Slaves to those to whom they belonged.

[1] And before them the Essenes, from whom the first Christians derived their Original, according to JOSEPHUS. GROTIUS.

The Jewish Historian speaks of a Sort of Essenes, who believe, says he, that there was some Injustice in having Slaves. Antiq. Jud. Lib. XVIII. Cap. II. p. 618. B. What our Author lays down, as a Fact in regard to the Origin of the first Christians, is besides a mere Conjecture.

[2] 2 B. IV. where are these Words, It is a Custom delivered without Corruption from the Antients to Posterity, that it was lawful not only for the Graeco-Romans and Thessalians, but for the Illyrians, Triballians and Bulgarians, because they were of the same Faith, to seize upon the Goods indeed as Spoils, but not to take the Men Prisoners of War, nor kill them, when the Battle was over. Adam Bremen of St. Ansgarius, returning from thence to Hamburg, rebuked the Nordalbins for selling the Christians. This Custom BOER. speaks of Decis. 178. and adds, it is observed in France, England and Spain, that if a Duke, Count or Baron was taken, he does not belong to the Soldiers, but to the Prince who makes War. GROTIUS.

[3] Our Author cites here in the Margin one of PLATO's Dialogues, wherein that Philosopher, whom he supposes in this to have followed his Master's Doctrine, establishes for one of the Laws of his Republick, that no Greek should make Slaves of those of his own Nation, nor advise other Greeks to do so: De Legib. Lib. p. 469. C. Vol. II. Edit. H. Steph.

[4] See CHALCOCONDYLAS, Rerum Turcic. Lib. III. LEUNCLAVIUS, Lib. III. and XVII. BUSBEQU. Epist. exotic. III. (p. 162. Edit. Elzevir 1662.) GROTIUS.

[5] See upon this Subject a Dissertation of the late Mr. HERTIUS, De Lytro, in the first Volume of his Comment. & Opuscul. &c. p. 253. & seqq.

[1] Provided there be on the Side of the Conquered either an express or tacit Consent. And in that Case the Acquisition is deemed lawful, whether the War was just or unjust; as I shall explain below, Chap. XIX. § 11. Note 1. Compare this Place with PUFENDORF, B. VII. Chap. VII. § 5. and what Mr. CARMICHAEL, Professor at Glasgow, says in his Notes upon the Abridgment De Officio Hom. & Civ. Lib. II. Cap. X. § 2. and Cap. XVI. § 14. The late Mr. COCCEIUS, has however maintained, that, in a just War, the Victor acquires an entire Right of Sovereignty over the Vanquished, by the sole Right of Conquest, independently of all Convention, and that, even tho' the Victor has otherwise obtained all the Satisfaction and Amends he could require. The principal Reason this Doctor makes Use of to prove his Opinion is, that otherwise the Conqueror could not be assured of the peaceable Possession of what he had taken, or forced the Conquered to give him, for his Pretensions; since they might retake it from him by the same Right of War. See the Dissertation, De jure Victoriae diverso a jure Belli, § 23. But an Author of the same Nation, Mr. FREUER, Professor of Politicks and Ethicks at Helmstadt, has refuted this Opinion in his Notes upon PUFENDORF, De Offic. Hom. & Civ. Lib. II. Cap. XVI. § 13. The Reason alledged proves only, that the Victor, who has possessed himself of an Enemy's Country, may command in it, whilst he holds it, and not resign it, till he has good Security, that he shall either obtain, or possess without Hazard, what is necessary for the Satisfaction and Amends he has a Right to exact by the Methods of Force. But the End of a just War does not always demand of itself, that the Conqueror should acquire an absolute and perpetual Right of Sovereignty over the Conquered. It is only a favourable Occasion of obtaining it, and for that Purpose there must always be either an express or tacit Consent of the Conquered; otherwise the State of War still subsisting, as is granted; the Sovereignty of the Victor has no other Title, but that of Force, and continues no longer than the conquered People are in capable of throwing off the Yoke. All that can be said is, that the neutral Powers, as being such, may and ought to look upon the Conqueror, as the lawful Possessor of the Sovereignty, even tho' they should believe the War unjust on his Side; and that without the Necessity of supposing here, with our Author, an arbitrary Law of Nations.

[2] Servus, inquit, est meus, quem ego emi belli jure; vobis Athenienses, expedit: Alioquin imperium vestrum in antiquos fines redigitur, quidquid est bello partum, et est contra. At ille, &c. Controvers. Lib. V. Contr. XXXIV. p. 390. Edit. Gron. Major. Tho' the Sense of this Passage is sufficiently clear, the Words are however corrupted, as the learned Commentator JOHN SCHULTING remarks, who conjectures with Probability enough, that it ought to be read: Servus, inquit, est meus, quem ego emi belli jure. Id tueri vobis, Athenienses, expedit: Alioquin—redigitur; quidquid est bello partum perdetis. Contra ait: Ille, &c. It seems to me only that after belli jure, captum ought to be read, or some Term of the same Sense, as I have expressed it in my Translation; for it is not by the Right of War, that the Painter bought the Slave; but the Validity of the Purchase was founded upon the Seller's possessing the Slave by the Right of War. For the Rest, the reasoning contained in those Words amounts to that of our Author, by the Reason of Contraries. For the Painter means, if Prisoners of War are not lawfully acquired by those who take them, neither can a Conqueror lawfully become Master of a People by the Right of Conquest.

[3] Ni fallor enim, omne Regnum, vel Imperium, bellis quaeritur, & victoriis propagatur. Apologetic. Cap. XXV.

[4] Sed hinc aspera & vehemens quaestio exoritur de jure Belli, dicentibus Thessalis, hoc regna populos fines gentium atque urbium contineri. Instit. Orat. Lib. V. Cap. X. p. 431. Edit. Burman.

[5] Leges autem a victoribus dici, accepi a victis, Lib. IV. Cap. V. Num. 7.

[6] Cur Syracusas, &c. Lib. XXXV. Cap. XVI. Num. 3.

[7] Ad haec Ariovistus respondit, &c. De Bell. Gall. Lib. I. Cap. XXXVI.

[8] Fines imperii tueri magis, &c. Lib. I. Cap. I. Num. 3. & seqq.

[9] Se non hostili animo, &c. De Bell. Jugurth. Cap. CX. p. 506. Edit. Wass.

[10] Alexander the Great after the Battle of Gaugamela (otherwise called the Battle of Arbela) was saluted King of Asta. PLUTARCH, in Vit. Alex. p. 685. B. Vol. II. Edit. Wech.

The Romans appropriated to themselves by the Right of War, (πολέμου νόμῳ) the Countries which had belonged to King Syphax. APPIAN ALEXAND. Excerpt. Legat. X. Num. 28. The Embassadors of the Goths, as AGATHIAS relates, told Theodorick, one of their Kings, that having overcome Odoacer, a Stranger, of Scyros, he was become Master of all his Dominions, by Right of War: Ἄλλ' Ὀδοάκρον καθελῶν τὸν ἐπιλύτιν τὸν Σκύρηνον (as it must be read instead of Τύρηνον) τάκεινους ἅπαντα κατέσχε τῷ τῷ πολέμου θεσμῷ. Hist. Lib. I. (Cap. IV. p. 11. Edit. Vulcan.) But MENANDER the Protector informs us, that when the Huns pretended to have conquered the Gepidae, because they had taken their King, the Romans denied it, averring the Chief of the Gepidae was a Prince rather than a real King, and that therefore the Gepidae were not his, as a patrimonial Estate. GROTIUS.

In the Passage of AGATHIAS, the antient Version of CHRISTOPHER PERSONA a Roman, printed at Ausburgh in 1519. has, Et peregrino strenue debellato Tyranno: From whence it appears, that the Translator read τύραννον in his Original, instead of Τύρηνον. Our Author, citing this Passage above, probably by Memory, (Chap. VI. of this Book, § 2. Note 11.) says πολέμου νόμῳ, for θεσμῷ.

[11] The Persians, as the same MENANDER, cited in the foregoing Note relates, maintained, that the Territory of the City of Daros belonged to them, because they had conquered that City: Belisarius, after having defeated the Vandals, insisted that the City of Lilybaeum in Sicily should become dependent upon the Roman Empire, because the Goths had given it to the Vandals: But the Goths denied their having given it to them, as we find in PROCOPIUS, Vandalic. Lib. II. (Cap. V.) Henry the Son of the Emperor Frederick Barberossa, after having taken Sicily, claimed also the Cities of Epidamnium, Thessalonica, and other Places possessed by the Sicilians: NICETAS, Lib. I. De Alexio Isaaci fratre, (Cap. IX.) Bajan, Chagan (or Prince) of the Avari, told the Emperor, that the City of Sirmium was his, because it had belonged to the Gepidae, whom the Avari had conquered. MENANDER, Protector, (Cap. III. Legat. Justin. Justinian & Tiber.) Peter, Justinian's Ambassador, told Chosroez, King of Persia, that he who is Master of the Principal, ought to be so of the Accessory; and that therefore Suania was conquered with the Lazi, as the Suanians and Lazians agree that the latter had formerly been in Subjection to the former. Apud eundem, (Chap. III.) See above, § 4. GROTIUS.

[1] See above, B. I. Chap. III. § 12. Num. 2.

[2] Politic. Lib. VII. Cap. XIV. p. 442. D.

[3] (In Anchis. Excerpt. Vett. Comic. & Frag. p. 639.) TACITUS says: Additque praecepta [Claudius Caesar]—ut non dominationem & servos, sed rectorem & cives cogitaret. Annal. Lib. XI. (Cap. XII. Num. 2.) GROTIUS.

[4] De Agesil. (Chap. I. § 22. Edit. Oxon.) GROTIUS.

[1] This in a Treaty of Peace granted by Porsenna, King of Etruria, to the Romans, after they had expelled their Kings, there was an express Clause, that the Romans should not have any Instruments of Iron, but for the Uses of Agriculture. In foedere, quod, expulsis regibus, &c. PLINY, Hist. Natur. Lib. XXXIV. Cap. XIV. Our Author quotes this Example himself in a Note upon the first Book of SAMUEL, Chap. XIII. Ver. 19. where he thinks a like Method is spoke of, which the Philistines used for disarming the Israelites. But it seems probable, that it was in a different Manner; the Reader may see Mr. LE CLERC's Commentary upon it. The Roman Historians have passed over in silence this Circumstance of the Treaty between Porsenna and the Romans, as shameful to a People, who were afterwards Masters of the World; as our Author observes in the same Place. To this maybe added a Note of FREINSHEMIUS upon FLORUS, Lib. I. Cap. X. Num. 2.

[2] The learned GRONOVIVS introduces here very properly the Example of the Lydians, from whom Cyrus, after having conquered them, took away their Arms and Horses, obliging them at the same Time to frequent Taverns, Places of Diversion, and bawdy Houses: Quibus [Lydis] iterum victis, arma & equi ademti, jussique cauponias & ludicras artes, & lenocinia exercere. JUSTIN. Lib. I. Cap. VII. Num. 12. See Mr. BERNEGGER's Note upon this Passage, who adds other Examples.

[1] See above, B. I. Cap. III. § 8. and B. II. Cap. V. § 31. and in this B. Cap. V. § 2. and afterwards, Cap. XX. § 49. Add also the Extracts of POLYBIUS, Legat. CXLII. they that yield themselves to the Romans, do first give up their Country and the Cities therein, besides all the Men and Women that are in the Country or the Cities. Also all the Rivers and Ports, and in general all Things Sacred and Religious: So that the Romans become Lords of all, and those that surrender themselves have nothing that they can call their own. See what has been said above, B. I. Cap. IV. § 7. JUSTIN, B. XXXV. speaking of the Jews, says, afterward, with the Persians they fell into the Power of Alexander the Great. GROTIUS.

[2] Agrum, de quo ambigitur, &c. Lib. III. Cap. LXXI. Num. 6.

[3] Quidquid Romani tot triumphis. &c. Idem, Lib. XXI. Cap. XLIII. Num. 6.

[4] Quo [Lysimacho] victo, quum omnia, &c. LIVY, Lib. XXXIII. Cap. XL.

[5] See STRABO, Geograph. Lib. XII. (p. 815. Edit. Amstel. 541. Paris.)

[a] Dion. Hal. 1. 3. c. 31.

[6] See PUFENDORF, Law of Nature and Nations, B. VIII. Chap. VI. § 20. and what our Author says in the following Chapter, § 9. Num. 2. Mr. CARMICHAEL, Professor at Glasgow, says in his Notes upon the Abridgment De Officio Homin. & Civis, Lib. II. Cap. XVI. § 14. that the Advantage of the Discharge, in the Case under Consideration, can hardly be extended to beneficent Contracts, or such as have been entered into solely for the Debtor's Benefit. So that it does not suffice, according to this Author, that the Conqueror discharges those of such a Debt owed to the Conquered. But if the Neutrality, which dispenses with the Debtor's examining into the Justice of the War and of the Conquest, lays him under the Obligation of paying the Conqueror, and thereby discharges him with regard to the Creditor, to whose Rights the Conqueror is deemed to succeed: I do not see why the same Thing should not take Place in the Case of a Donation, or an Acceptilation. What Generosity or Humanity requires is foreign to the Question: But as to Right, properly so called, that is certainly the same in both Cases.

[7] Tum secundo gradu, &c. Institit. Orat. Lib. V. Cap. X. p. 432. Edit. Burman.

[8] Qui in servitute est, usucapere non potest, nam, quum possideatur, possidere non videtur. Digest, Lib. L. Tit. XVII. De diversis Reg. Juris, Leg. CXVIII.

[9] In sua enim potestate non videtur habere, qui non est suae potestatis, Lib. XLVIII. Tit. V. Ad Leg. Jul. de Adulteriis coecondis, Leg. XXI.

[b] Cicer. Epist. ad Brut. VI.

[10] Antony commanded the Tyrrians to restore what they held belonging to the Jews, not granted by the Senate, and possessed before the War of Cassius, as JOSEPHUS relates. See also BIZAR. Genuens. Histor. Lib. X. GROTIUS.

[1] AS CICERO informs us, who recites both Etymologies: Sed quum ipsius Postliminii vis quaeritur, & verbum ipsum notatur: In quo Servius noster, ut opinor, nihil putat esse notandum, nisi post, & liminium illud, productionem esse verbi vult, ut in finitimo, legitimo, aeditimo, non plus inesse timum, quam in Meditullio, tullium. SCAEVOLA autem P. F. junctum putat esse verbum, ut sit in eo & post, & limen: Ut quae a nobis alienata sunt, quum ad hostem pervenerint, & ex suo tamquam limine exierint, dein quum redierint post ad idem limen, postliminio videantur rediisse. Topic. (Cap. VIII.) For this Reason TERTULLIAN used the Word Postliminium in a metaphorical Sense, to express the return or Re-establishment, by which a Sinner is received into the Peace of the Church: Incesto fornicatori postliminium largitus pacis Ecclesiasticae &c. De Pudicitia, Cap. XV. FESTUS says in regard to Limen: LIMUS, obliquus id est, transversus: Unde & LIMINA. See also SERVIUS, upon the twelfth Book of the Aeneid, (Ver. 120.) and DONATUS upon the Eunuch of TERENCE, Act. III. Scen. V. (Ver. 53.) ISIDORUS says with respect to Limes & Limen: LIMITES adpellati, antiquo verbo transversi. Nam transversa omnia antiqui Lima dicebant: A quo & limina ostiorum, per quae foris & intus itur; & limites quod per eos foras in agros eatur. Orig. Ling. Lat. Lib. XV. Cap. XIV. And in the old Glossary, (published by HENRY STEPHENS.) Limes is explained by Πλαγία ὁδός. GROTIUS.

The Passage of SERVIUS referred to by our Author in this Note, but without marking the Verse where it is found, tends to prove that Limus signifies oblique, what goes across. And the Grammarian speaks of it upon Occasion of a Word of the Poet, which some Antients believed corrupted Lino, instead of which they were for reading Limo, the Ablative of Limus taken as a Substantive. And by Limus they understood a Kind of Vestment bordered with watered Purple, which reached from the Navel down to the Feet. This, by the way, is a Word omitted in the Dictionaries, tho' found in the Grammarian, who has commented upon VIRGIL, and in ISIDORUS, who informs us further that this Vestment was peculiar to the Slaves of the Publick. See also HYGINUS, De limitib. constituendis, p. 151. and the Notes of the late Mr. GOES upon him, p. 162, 163. as also LAURENT. PIGNORIUS, De Servis, p. 29, 30. Edit. Patav. 1656. As to the Word Limen, which our Author believes to have signified of old the same as the Word Limes, following a Remark contained in a Passage of the Institutes, which will be cited upon the next Paragraph, Note 2. The learned SALMASIUS has taken upon him to refute this Opinion in his Observationes ad jus Atticum & Romanum: And MENAGE agrees with the latter in his Amoenitates Juris Civilis, Cap. XXXIX. p. 331. Edit. Lips. But as Mr. SCHULTING observes, upon the Institutions of CAJUS, Lib. I. Tit. VI. § 2. p. 49. the very Passages, alledged by MENAGE, prove, that the Word Limen was used to express the Frontiers or Bounds of a State, by other antient Authors, than those followed by TRIBONIANUS.

- [2] From whence came the Name of a Goddess, called Postvorta. GROTIUS.
She was one of the Goddesses who presided at the Birth of Children. See AULUS GELLIUS, Noct. Attic. Lib. XVI. Cap. XVII.
- [3] Compago and Compages, a Joint, which was formerly Compagen, as the Genitive Case shews, and the Verb derived from it, (Campagino, to join) as also sanguis, was formerly sanguen, Blood. GROTIUS.
- [4] And Colliminium, a Word which may be found in SOLINUS, (Cap. XV. or XXV. according to some Editions) instead of Collimitium, which is commonly used. GROTIUS.
- [1] That is to say a Right, in Virtue whereof, the Things, and Persons, taken by the Enemy, return to their first State: The Person recovering their Rights, and the Things returning to their former Masters.
- [2] Dictum est autem Postliminium, &c. Institut. Lib. I. Tit. XII. Quibus modis jus patriae potestatis solvitur, § 5.
- [3] Tunc autem reversus intelligitur, si aut ad amicos nostros perveniat, aut intra praesidia nostra esse coepit. Digest, Lib. XLIX. Tit. XV. De Captivis & Postliminio, &c. Leg. V. § 1.
- [4] Postliminio rediisse videtur, quum in fines nostros intraverit: Sicuti amittitur, ubi fines nostros excessit. Digest, Lib. XLIX. Tit. XV. De Captivis & Postliminio, &c. Leg. XIX. § 3.
- [5] See Note 3. upon this Section.
- [6] Sed & si in civitatem sociam amicamve, aut ad regem socium vel amicum, venerit, statim postliminio rediisse videtur: Quia ibi primum nomine publico tutus esse incipiat. Ibid. Leg. XIX. § 3.
- [7] The King of Morocco and Fez understood so, according to THUANUS, Hist. Lib. CXXX. upon the Year 1603. GROTIUS.
- [8] POLYBIUS, Lib. III. Cap. XXIV. p. 248. Edit. Amstel.
- [9] VAL. MAX. B. V. Cap. II. 6. DIOD. SIC. Excerpt. Legat. Note 3. So the Rhodians freely restored to the Athenians, what Athenian Citizens they had bought in Philip's War. POLYBIUS, Excerpt. Legat. III. GROTIUS.
- [1] Quum duae species postliminii sint, ut aut nos revertamur, aut aliquid recipiamus, &c. Digest, Lib. XLIX. Tit. XV. De Capt. & Postlimin. &c. Leg. XIV. Princ.
- [1] In bello Postliminium est, &c. Ibid. Leg. XII. Princ.

[2] See below, § 18. of this Chapter, Note 4. where the Law is cited.

[a] See Paruta, De Bell. Cypr. l. 1.

[3] See JOSEPHUS, Antiq. Hist. XIII. 2. POLYBIUS tells us, that in the Treaty of Peace which the Romans made with Philip King of Macedon, in that with the Aetolians, in which however there was some Exception, and in that with Antiochus, it was agreed that all Prisoners on either Side should be restored, Excerpt. Legat. IX. 28, 35. LIVY has the same Examples, and adds that of the Peace with Nabis. There are some also in ZOSIMUS. The Peace of Probus with the Vandals and Burgundians runs thus, That all the Prey which they had taken, and all the Prisoners, should be restored, B. I. He also relates a like Peace made by Julian with the Germans in general, also with the Quadi, that were in Germany, B. III. (Cap. VII. where there is no such Thing.) AMMIANUS MARCELLINUS, of Suomarius, King of the Almains, or Germans; he begged Peace on his Knees, and he obtained it with the Forgiveness of what was passed, upon this Condition, that he should restore our Prisoners. Again of the Sarmatians, being ordered to get dwelling Places, they without Fear delivered up our Prisoners. He again says the same of another Part of the Sarmatians. And many such in ZONARAS, among the Rest, in the Affairs of Michael Son of Theophilus, speaking of the Bulgarian Prince, he says, He set the Prisoners at Liberty. NICETAS, B. II. says, that Liberty was given to all the Prisoners, except to the Corinthian and Theban Men and Women. Sometimes it is agreed, that the Prisoners should be restored that properly belonged to the State, as it is in THUCYDIDES V. GROTIUS.

[4] It is not necessary to recur to the Correction of PETER FABER, which our Author adopts. The illustrious Mr. BYNKERSHOEK has shewn in a very clear manner, that when the Civilian says (in the Passage referred to in Note 1.) In pace postliminium est his, qui bello capti erant, de quibus nihil in pactis erat comprehensum; he means those, he speaks of afterwards, who were made Prisoners, only from being unfortunately upon the Lands of the Enemy in the beginning of an unforeseen War. See that great Lawyer's Observations, Lib. I. Cap. XX. and the Law cited above in this Book, Chap. VI. § 12. Num. 1.

[5] As in Note 3. The Passage is in Vol. III. of ZONARAS.

[6] Si captivus, &c. Digest, Lib. XLIX. Tit. XV. De Capt. & Postl. &c. Leg. XX. Princ.

[7] PAULUS : Immo si in bello captas, &c. Ibid. Leg. XXVIII. See the Observations of Mr. BYNKERSHOEK upon this Law, Lib. III. Cap. VI. and the Jurisprudentia Papiniana of ANTHONY FAURE, Tit. XI. Princip. VIII. Illat. XXV. p. 635.

[8] See the Law quoted in Note 1. upon this Paragraph.

[9] The Passage will be cited below, Chap. XXI. § 24.

[10] Not only that: They have renounced the Right of examining the Justice of the Cause, and have tacitly engaged, by only remaining Neuter, to suppose the Acts of Hostility, and the Acquisitions thereby made to be just on both Sides. See what I have said upon Chap. IV. of this Book, § 4. Note 1. There is no Occasion for supposing any Thing else.

[11] See PRISCUS, Excerpt. de Legat. XXVIII. And BEZAR, of the War of the Genoese against the Venetians, B. II. GROTIUS.

[12] But our Author has said above, Chap. VII. § 1. that even those, who have fallen in this manner into the Enemy's Hand by pure Misfortune, are however Slaves by Right of War: Because they, who have taken them, are not obliged to enquire whether they are culpable, and it suffices that they are of the Enemy's Party. Besides, young Children cannot be supposed guilty of any Fault, who however, according to our Author, may be made Prisoners and Slaves in the same manner, as if they were at Years of Discretion. So that the Reason alledged, of a pretended Consent of Nations, is far from being solid: And the more, as it does not appear, that after the Conclusion of a Peace, the Parties believed they had less Right, either over the young Children they had taken, or the unfortunate Prisoners in question, and who were not included in the Treaty, than over those who had been taken in Arms. This then is no more than a civil Law of the Roman People; by which, in Consideration of the unhappy Fate of such, as were become Slaves to the Enemy, without having exercised, or having it in their Power to exercise, any Act of Hostility, they were granted the Right of Postliminy, even after the Peace; whereas it was refused to the others. And if the Masters of these Slaves, after the making of Peace, could not reclaim this kind of Prisoners from the antient Enemy of the State, (for it does not appear, that the Case was the same with neutral States) it was because as the State knew, or might know, the Custom of the Romans, it was supposed, for itself and People, to renounce its Right, from the Time it had not stipulated by the Treaty, that such Slaves for the future, as well as others that belonged to it, should be restored. In regard to the latter see what I have said before, Chap. VII. of this Book, § 6. Note 9.

[13] That is to say if they happened to escape, and return into their own Country.

[14] Totilas declared to Pelagius the Deacon who was sent to him from the Romans, that he should not mention the restoring the Sicilian Slaves, alledging that it was unjust that the Goths should deliver their Fellow Soldiers to their old Masters. The Passage is in Goth. Lib. III. Chap. XVI. GROTIIUS.

Our Author in the last Words had put the Romans for the Goths. And the Passage relates to fugitive Slaves to whom the Goths had engaged by Oath not to deliver them up to their antient Masters.

[15] Dicamus imprimis in eo quod, &c. Institut. Orat. Lib. V. Cap. X. p. 432. Edit. Burman.

[16] The Emperor JULIAN, in his Oration against the Followers of the Cynick Philosophy misunderstood, maintains, that to speak philosophically, a Man cannot really be said to be another Man's Slave, from that other's having only given Money to the Seller for his renouncing his Right to him. For adds he, at that Rate Prisoners of War, when redeemed, should also be stiled the Slaves of those who redeem them; whereas the Laws give them their Liberty, the Moment they return into their Country, and they are ransomed, not in order to their being Slaves, but that they may enjoy their Liberty. Orat. VI. p. 195, 196. Edit. Spanheim. GROTIIUS.

See below, § 10. Num. 3. where the Law to which the Emperor alludes is spoken of.

[1] Non enim postliminio revertatur, &c. Digest. Lib. XLIX. Tit. XV. De Capt. & Postlim. &c. Leg. XII. § 9. See also Leg. V. § 3.

[2] See the Law cited above, Chap. VII. of this Book, § 6. Num. 7. Note 8. Our Author alledges here in a little Note the Example of the Huns, who took away, and set at Liberty, some Prisoners, whom the Sclavonians had taken, as PROCOPIUS relates, Gothic. Lib. III. Cap. XIII. The Huns are put for the Herulians; for that Historian says this of the latter, who having taken up Arms for the Romans met a Troop of Sclavonians upon their March, who had taken some Prisoners from the Romans along the Danube.

[3] Quum non redemptum ab hostibus filium, &c. Cod. Lib. VIII. Tit. LI. De Postliminio reversis, &c. Leg. V.

[4] As the Youth Childubius in the same Book of PROCOPIUS, He alledged that from the Time he returned into his own Country, he should by Law be free for the future; and LEUNCLAVIUS observes, that formerly there was no Postliminy among the Turks for

- [5] Ut scias, inquit, servos fuisse, &c. Lib. V. Controv. XXXIV. p. 390.
- [6] Because the Olynthians were Allies of the Athenians, as is said a little before: Quid enim si Atheniensem a Philippo emissis? Atqui sciebas Olynthios nobis conjunctos esse foedere. Our Author insinuates therefore, that it was the worse for the People either of the same Country; or of the States in Alliance with them, if they bought any Slave who was free by Right of Postliminy; because in buying him, they ought to have supposed, it might possibly happen that the Slave might have that Right, and therefore that they could only acquire him under that tacit Condition, as is said in the following Paragraph, in regard to the Goods of a Prisoner returned, which had been alienated.
- [1] The Distinction between Things recoverable and not recoverable, by the Right of Postliminy, relates merely to Civil Right, and takes Place only in Regard to the Subjects of the State itself, who would reclaim what has been retaken from the Enemy. See below, § 13. Note 3, 4. So that the Difference here put by our Author, in Regard to Things alienated in a neutral State, has no Foundation. The Prisoner of War returned home has an equal Right to recover them all.
- [2] That is, when a Person discharges another of a Debt, by declaring he has received what was not actually paid. See the Institutes, Lib. III. Tit. XXX. § 1.
- [1] Caetera, quae in jure sunt, &c. Digest. Lib. XLIX. Tit. XV. De Capt. & Postlim. Leg. XII. § 6. See also § 15. and Leg. V. So when a Son returned from Captivity, the Rights of paternal Power, suspended in Regard to him, resumed all their Force. Ipse quoque filius, Neposve si ab hostibus captus fuerit, similiter dicimus, propter jus postliminii, jus quoque potestatis Parentis in suspenso esse. Institut. Lib. I. Tit. XII. Quibus modis jus Potestatis Patriae solvitur, § 5.
- [1] Postliminio carent, qui armis victi hostibus se dederunt. Digest. Lib. XLIX. Tit. XV. De Captiv. & Postlim. &c. Leg. XVII. This can be looked on only as a particular Law of the Roman People, instituted solely to animate the Citizens to fight to the last Extremity. For as the State had no Part in their Engagement, so was it not held to make it good, and might, if it thought fit, grant them, during the War, the Right of Postliminy, in the same Manner as to those, who, having been made Prisoners by superior Force, and without surrendering, were, however, become the Enemy's Slaves, by either an express or tacit Convention. See what I have said above, Chap. VII. of this Book, § 6. Note 9.
- [2] Tum octo ex iis, &c. Noct. Attic. Lib. VII. Cap. XVIII.
- [3] Induciae sunt, quum in breve & in praesens tempus convenit, neinvicem selacessant: Quo tempore non est postliminium. Digest. ubi supra, Leg. XIX. § 1. See below, Chap. XXI. § 6. It is plain, that this Decision is a Consequence of the Nature itself of a Truce, which will be treated of below in its Place.
- [4] Eos qui ab hostibus capiuntur, vel hostibus deduntur, jure postliminii reverti, antiquitus placuit. Digest. ibid. Leg. IV. Our Author, in his Florum sparsio ad jus Justinianicum, p. 221. Edit. Amstel. says that we must read here, Ab hostibus deduntur, and he explains the Words before, ab hostibus capiuntur, as de hostibus, &c. On that Foot the Sense of the Law would be, that the Prisoners retaken from the Enemy, and those which we recover, by their being restored voluntarily, enjoy the Right of Postliminy. So that then there would be nothing in it relating to the Subject. Our Author, without Doubt, supplies the Particle ab, according to the Reading in the vulgar Editions, Ab hostibus deducuntur. But the Authority of the Florence Edition, with the Example that immediately follows, gives Room to believe that our Author's first Thought was the best. See above, B. II. Chap. XXI. § 4. Num. 8. where he explains the Case of this Law himself. However, we must then confess, that in the Beginning of the Law, it treats of Persons restored in a certain Manner: Otherwise there would have been no Difficulty in the Case proposed, if it had been the general and received Maxim of antient Times, (antiquitus placuit) that every Person delivered up to the Enemy, returned by Right of Postliminy. See the following Note.

[5] That is to say, if they have not engaged to put themselves into the Power of the Enemy, and if the State which delivers them up, has not deprived itself, by a real Agreement, of the Right it had to recover or receive them; in a Word, when it has delivered them simply and purely of its own Accord, or has been reduced to do so by the Superiority of the Enemy's Forces. This is probably what our Author means. For if, according to him, the Engagement of a Prisoner of War, contracted without the Participation of the State, is of sufficient Force to oblige the State to refuse him the Right of Postliminy, the Prisoner much more ought to be excluded from it, when the State itself is bound by its Promise. And if there be no such Engagement, the Action of delivering up does not, of itself, imply any Obligation towards the Enemy, or Intention to deprive the Person delivered up, of the Right of Postliminy. It is the Enemy's Business to keep him, who has been given up into their Hands, or to lay him under the Restriction of some Promise. See what our Author says above, B. II. Chap. XXI. § 4. Num. 6. The Civilian MODESTINUS, whose Words I have recited in the preceding Note, speaks there, in my Opinion, of those whom the State has delivered up purely and simply, being compelled to it by the Misfortune of War; and this may be inferred from his joining them with the Prisoners of War, taken in some Battle, or military Expedition. For it is without Necessity, that FRANCIS BAUDOUIN, (Jurisprud. Mucian. p. 48.) and Mr. THOMASIVS, (Diss. de sponsione Roman. Numantina, § 75.) after him conjecture, that instead of Vel hostibus deduntur, it should be read in a quite contrary Sense, NEC hostibus deduntur. The Difficulty arose from another Manner of delivering up, treated of in the End of this Law, which, according to the particular Custom of the Romans, excluded those from the Right of Postliminy, who had been delivered up, so that a Rehabilitation was necessary, in Order to their becoming Citizens again, tho' the Enemy had not been willing to receive them. I have spoke of this above, B. II. Chap. XXI. § 4. N. V. 13, 14, 16. and the Thing is fully confirmed by what follows. I say then, that in this Part of the Law we are now considering, as well as in the last Law of the Title De Legationib. the Question solely relates to Persons delivered up, in Order to discharge the State of some Crime, or shameful Engagement, which, tho' committed or contracted without its Order or Participation, seemed to fly back upon it, principally because the Authors were Persons otherwise invested with its Authority. The Romans, either out of Horror for the Crime, or a great Sensibility for the Dishonour, with which they were at least, as much touched to the Quick; judged proper, at the same Time they delivered up such People, not to consider them any longer as Citizens, whether those to whom they delivered them up, received them or not. And this was executed with great Ceremony, by the Chief of the Heralds at Arms, (Feciales) who caused the Person delivered up to be stript naked, and bound; as appears by the History itself of Hostilius Mancinus, who is there spoken of. See VELLEIVS PATERCULUS, Lib. II. Cap. I. DIONYSIVS HALICARNASSENSIS, Antiq. Rom. Lib. II. The Form used by the Herald, shews the Aversion the Romans professed, both for the Persons delivered up in this Manner, and the Occasion which obliged them to do so, Quandoquidem hice homines, injussu populi Romani Quiritium, foedus ictum iri sponponderunt, atque ob eam rem noxam nocuerunt; ob eam rem quo Populus Romanus scelere impio sit solutus hosce homines vobis dedo. LIVY, Lib. IX. Cap. X. Num. 9. They apprehended, that without this, the most just Wars might become unjust; as the same Roman Historian makes another General of the Army, Spurius Postumius, say, on an Occasion of the same Nature with this of Mancinus.

Dedamur per Fetiales, nudi vinctique. Exsolvamur religione populum, si qua obligavimus; ne quid divini humanive obstet, quominus justum piumve de integro ineatur bellum. Cap. VIII. Num. 6. Mancinus, in Order to be received in the Camp of the Romans, after the Refusal of the Numantines, to whom he had been delivered up, had Occasion to call in the Aid of Religion; the Augurs being consulted, declared in his Favour, without which he would not have been admitted. Deditus nec receptus, augurio in castra deductus. AURELIUS VICTOR. De Viris Illustr. Cap. LIX. It is not then to be wondered at, that when the Enemy, or allied State, refused to take those delivered up to them, that Refusal did not hinder their being considered as deprived of all the Rights of a Citizen, from the Moment the Herald at Arms had pronounced the Sentence for abandoning them. HENNINGES, who has espoused this Opinion, in his Notes upon our Author, (Lib. II. Cap. XV. § 16. p. 751.) with Reason alledges in this Place, what Postumius says, the Moment the Ceremony was over, that he was become a Citizen of the Samnites, who, however, had not then accepted him, nor would receive him afterwards. Haec dicenti Fetiali, Postumius genu femur, quanta maxima vi, perculit, & clara voce ait, se Samnitum civem esse, &c. LIVY, ubi supra, Cap. X. Num. 10. So that Mucius had Reason to compare those unfortunate Persons, to such as were banished the State by a Decree, prohibiting all Persons to give them Fire and Water; and in Consequence, excluding them from the Right of Postliminy, as did the Tribune of the People, who, as CICERO relates, hindered Mancinus from entering the Senate. Quia memoria sic essit proditum, quem—Pater patratus dedisset, ei nullem esse postliminium. De Orat. Lib. I. Cap. XL. If that Orator seems elsewhere to decide in Favour of Brutus, (Topic. Cap. VIII. and Orat. pro Caecin. Cap. XXXIV.) that only proves, either that he has changed his Mind, as he does sometimes, or that he believed, notwithstanding the Decision of Mucius, followed by the Senate, the Case ought to have been adjudged in a different Manner. He says, in one of these Passages, that the Opinion in favour of Mancinus might be defended, and not that it may be well demonstrated. The Passage has been cited above, B. II. Chap. XXI. § 4. Note 13. So that it is not necessary to have Recourse to the Reconciliations laid down by FRANCIS BAUDOIN, Jurisprud. Muc. p. 46. M. THOMASIVS, Diss. de Spons. Numant. § 67. and Mr. JENS, de Fetialib. Pop. Rom. Cap. VI. p. 71, 72. In a Word, Mancinus, and every other Person, who being delivered up, had been refused, was not indeed the Slave of those to whom he was designed to be delivered up, but he did not therefore continue a Roman Citizen; he was free, but a Stranger, as ANTHONY FAURE very well observes, Jurispru. Papin. Tit. XI. Princ. VIII. Illat. I. All that I have now advanced is founded upon the Genius and Sentiments of the Roman People. So that it is of no Use to prove, as Mr. THOMASIVS doth, (ubi supra, § 14. & seq.) that the Treaty concluded with the Numantines, without the Participation of the Roman People, was not really shameful, and that the Fault itself was not to be ascribed to Mancinus, but to Tiberius Gracchus. It suffices that the Roman People believed the contrary, and that they followed the Principles of their Ambition, rather than those of natural Equity, according to which, I confess, they ought to have laid down other Maxims. It is as easy to destroy, by the Reasons here alledged, the Endeavours of the late Mr. COCCEIUS, (Dissert. De Postlimin. in Pace) to reconcile here, as well as every where else, the Rules of the Roman Law with those of the Law of Nature and Nations, both of which he misunderstands.

[1] See PUFENDORF, B. VIII. Chap. VI. § 23. Of the Law of Nature and Nations.

[2] See above, B. II. Chap. IX. § 6.

[3] They may always be considered of the same Nation, but they have no longer that Tie which formed a Body of People, or a State. So that the Objections here raised against our Author, fall to the Ground of themselves.

- [4] That is to say, the Debts paid to him whom the Person was Prisoner to, or those of which he had discharged the Creditor; for the Case is not the same, with Regard to other Debts.
- [5] Non ut pater filium, ita uxorem maritus, jure postliminii, recipit, sed consensu redintegratur matrimonium. Digest, Lib. XLIX. Tit. XV. De Captiv. & Postlim. Leg. XIV. § 1. See also Leg. VIII. But it is not the same amongst Christians. Pope LEO says, that if the married Person, who remained in the Country, has married again, during the Captivity of the other, and the other returns, let the Marriage, contracted in the latter's Absence, be annulled. Ut sicut in mancipiis, vel agris, aut etiam in domibus, ac possessionibus, in captivitate ductis, postliminium reversis de captivitate servatur; ita etiam & conjugia, si aliis juncti fuerint, reformatur. Epistol. ad Nicet. Aquileiens. Episc. See HINCMAR, Opusc. de divortio Lotharii & Tethbergae, ad Interrog. XIII. and the Answer of Pope Stephen, Cap. XIX. in the second Tome of the Gallican Councils. GROTIUS. See CUIJAS upon the Novel. XXII. and in JULIANI Digest. Lib. LXII. p. 445. Vol. III.
- [1] Transfugae nullum postliminium est: Num qui malo consilio & proditoris animo, patriam reliquit, hostium numero habendus est. Digest, Lib. XLIX. Tit. XV. De Captiv. & Postlim. &c. Leg. XIX. § 4. Some say here, that our Author has improperly stated this Exception, as peculiar to the Roman Laws, and add, that the same Thing took Place amongst all other Nations. That may be. But they alledge neither Example nor Proof. For the Passage of LIVY, Lib. XXVII. Cap. XVII. Num. 10. which GRONOVIVS cites, is not very conclusive, it only proves the Diffidence and Horror they had for Deserters.
- [2] Filius quoque familias transfuga non potest liminio reverti, neque vivo patre: Quia pater sic illum amisit, quemadmodum patria, & quia disciplina castrorum antiquior fuit parentibus Romanis, quam caritas liberorum. Digest. Ibid. § 7.
- [3] That Consul, as is known, caused his own Son to be put to Death, for having given Battle contrary to his Orders, tho' he gained the Victory: And the Orator says, that he confirmed the Law of military Discipline by a Sentence, which he could not pass without plunging himself into the greatest Affliction. Quod vero securi filium percusserit, privavisse se etiam videtur multis voluptatibus, quum ipsi naturae patrioque amori praetulerit jus Majestatis atque imperii—Sin ut dolore suo sanciret militaris imperii disciplinam, exercitumque in gravissimo bello an imadversionis metu contineret; saluti prospexit civium, quâ intelligebat contineri suam. De Finib. Bon. & Mal. Lib. I. Cap. VII. & X.
- [4] DEMOSTHENES, Orat. in Nicostrat. (p. 724. B. Edit. Basil. 1572.) The same Thing is decreed in the Edict of Charles the Bald, passed at Pistes, Cap. XXXIV. GROTIUS.
- [5] This Sort of Prisoners, ransomed by a Citizen of the State, continued, as a Kind of Pledge, in his Service who had paid their Ransom, till they had reimbursed him, or he had forgiven them the Debt. Ab hostibus redempti, &c. Code, Lib. VIII. Tit. LI. De Postliminio reversis, &c. Leg. II. See the Title of the Digest. Leg. XV. Leg. XX. § 2. and CUIJAS, Recit. in Cod. Vol. IX. Opp. p. 1372, 1373. ANTHONY FAURE, Jurispr. Papin. Tit. III. Princ. IV. Illat. III. p. 118. JAMES GODEFROY, in Cod. THEODOS. Lib. V. Tit. V.
- [6] It is in an Ordinance of HONORIUS and THEODOSIUS, adopted by him. Ne quando enim damni consideratio &c. Cod. Lib. VIII. Tit. LI. De Postliminio reversis & redemptis ab hostibus, Leg. XX. seu ult.
- [7] Si patre redempto & ante luitionem defuncto, &c. Digest. Lib. XLIX. Tit. XV. De Capt. & Postlim. &c. Leg. XV. We see in this Passage of ULPIAN, that he does not absolutely decide, but with a perhaps; and that after having said, that the Son may, by paying the Ransom owed by his Father, be considered as his proper Heir. The Civilian even finds a Subtlety in the last Thought, undoubtedly with Regard to the Principles of the Roman Law, upon various Matters which relate to the present Case. This the subtil ANTHONY FAURE treats at large in the Place of his Jurispr. Papin. p.119. & seq. cited above, Note 5.

[8] Si is, qui te ab hostibus, &c. Cod. Lib. VIII. Tit. LI. De Postliminio reversis, &c. Leg. XIII. See the Jurisprudentia Papiniana of ANTHONY FAURE, Tit. XI. Princ. VIII. Illat. XXII. p. m. 634.

[9] Foedissimae mulieris nequitiâ permovemur. Quum igitur Filiam tuam, abhostibus captam, ac prostitutam ab ea, quae eam redemerat, &c. Ibid. Leg. VII.

[10] See the Law cited above, § 7. Note 1.

[11] This Example is not applicable in this Place, but to the Case treated by our Author, in Paragraph 9.

[12] Quae vero per usucapionem vel liberationem, &c. Cod. ubi supra, Leg. XVIII.

[13] This is called in the Roman Law by one Word Liberatio. The Reader may see the Interpreters upon the Digest. Lib. XLVI. Tit. II. & seqq. but especially the Treatise of the President BARNABY BRISSON, De Solutionibus & Liberationibus.

[14] As an usufructuary Right, which is lost by Non-Usage for a certain Time.

[15] Si cujus quid de bonis, &c. Digest. Lib. IV. Tit. VI. Ex quibus causis majores viginti quinque annis in integrum restituantur, Leg. I. § 1. After bonis should be added diminutum erit. See Mr. NOODT, upon this Title, p. 189, 191, 192.

[16] In omnibus partibus juris, is qui reversus non est ab hostibus, &c. Digest. Lib. XLIX. Tit. XV. De Capt. & Postlim. &c. Leg. XVII. Bona eorum, qui in hostium, &c. Ibid. Leg. XXII. Princ. See the Jurisprudentia Papiniana of ANTHONY FAURE, Tit. XI. Princip. IX.

[a] See Lex Wisigoth. l. 5. tit. 4. c. 15.

[17] See above, B. II. Chap. IX. § 1. Num. 3.

[18] According to the Rule of the Civil Law. Quod attinet ad jus civile servi pronullis habentur. Digest. Lib. L. Tit. XVII. De diversis Reg. Juris, Leg. XXXII. And this was conformable to the received Custom; according to which, every Prisoner of War was deemed to be the Enemy's Slave who had taken him. From whence it arose also, that those, of whom no Mention was made in the Treaty of Peace, and who remained Slaves without Resource, were considered as having no longer any Right, and as incapable of transferring any, with Regard to the Things which had belonged to them in the Country. It was to elude this Principle, that the Fiction of the Right of Postliminy and the Cornelian Law was invented, in Regard to Prisoners who returned, or died, during the Course of the War. In which, if there was any Thing contrary to the Right, established by Custom, in Relation to Prisoners of War, the Enemy however had no Cause to complain, because it was sufficiently declared, that this Custom would not be observed, and that the Enemy without being opposed, might dispense with following it, by making, on his Side, the same Supposition. Hence the Prisoners were not deemed to be actually engaged to be Slaves, during the Course of the War, in Regard to the Right, which the State had to receive and consider them as free Persons.

[19] Our Author in this Place confounds the Effects of the Right of Postliminy in Relation to Strangers, with those it might have in Regard to Citizens of the same State. For it belongs to the Sovereign to dispose of the latter, as he thinks proper, and he has no Occasion to have Recourse for that End to any Fiction. He may therefore extend them further than the Law of Nations, or the Custom of States does, which are not concerned in this Point.

[20] Quod si nemo ex lege Cornelia haeres extiterit, bona publica fient. Digest. Lib. XLIX. Tit. XV. De Capt. & Postlim. &c. Leg. XXII. § 1. See also Tit. XIV. De jure Fisci, Leg. XXXI.

[1] But by an Edict of Theoderick it was thus ordained, That Slaves, or Tenants taken by the Enemy, and returning home, be restored to their own Lords, if they were not bought before by some other. See also CASSIODORE, Lib. III. Cap. XLIII. But by the Law of the Wisigoths, a Slave recovered by War is restored to his Lord, and the Captor receives the third Part of the just Value. But if he were sold by the Enemy, his Lord was to pay the full Price for which he was sold, together with what had been laid out to render him more capable of Service, B. V. Tit. IV. XXI. GROTIUS.
See what I say below, upon § 14. Note 2.

[2] So the Slaves to whom Mithridates had given their Liberty, were restored by Sylla to their antient Masters. APPIANUS ALEXANDRINUS, Bell. Mithrid. (p. 355. Edit. Amstel. 211. H. Steph.) GROTIUS.

[3] Quia hostium jure manumissio obesse civi nostro servi domino, non potuit. Digest. Lib. XLIX. Tit. XV. De. Capt. & Postlim. &c. Leg. XII. This was because, during the Course of the War, the Acquisition of Things, taken from the Enemy, was not full and entire, no more than the Slavery of Prisoners; on Account of the Hopes People had, and the Right they retained, of recovering what they had lost. See what is said above, Chap. VII. of this Book, § 6. Note 9.

[4] Unless he serves some other Citizen. PAULUS : Immo quum servus civis nostri, ab hostibus captus inde aufugit, & vel in urbe Roma ita est, ut neque in domini sui potestate sit, neque ulli serviat: nondum postliminio rediisse, existimandum est. Digest. ibid. Leg. XXX. sive ult. To consider the Thing in itself, I do not see upon what this Difference is founded; and the rather, because, according to the following Law, the Will of the Slave is not necessary in the Case. ANTHONY FAURE, in his Jurispr. Papin. Tit. XI. Princ. VIII. Illat. XXVII. finds an Instance in it of the Spirit of Contradiction, with which the Civilian PAULUS wrote his Notes upon LABEO's Probable Rules. He explains the Thought of the former in this Manner. The Slave, says he, in the present Case, tho' returned into the Dominions of the State, can neither of himself enjoy the Right of Postliminy, because he never was a Citizen; nor have that Right in favour of the Person of his former Master, so long as he keeps away from him, and does not put himself again into his Power. If there be not an Exception in this to the general Rule, as Mr. BYNCKERSHOEK (Observ. III. 6, and 12.) is for having all these Notes of PAULUS to be considered, which others call Criticisms, and even treat sometimes as Cavils; it is at least a meer Subtlety of the Roman Law. The Person of the Slave is not here in Question, but only that of the Master: It is to the Master the Right of Postliminy belongs, the Slave is only the Matter, or passive Subject of it. It is not the Slave that recovers himself, as Persons do who were before free; it is the Master who recovers the Slave. In a Word, the Slave here is to be considered only as Goods recovered by the Right of Postliminy; and, if so, wherefore does it not suffice, that the Slave is in the Country, tho' the Master know nothing of it; as it is allowed, that Things inanimate are deemed to be recovered by their antient Proprietors, the Instant they are within the Country again; whether the Owner of those Things be informed of it or no? Besides, according to the Principles of the Roman Law, a Master retains the Possession of his fugitive Slave, as long as he is not in the Service of some other, who possesses him as his own. (Digest. Lib. XLI. Tit. II. De adquir. vel amitt. Poss. Leg. XIII. Princ. Leg. XV. Leg. I. § 14.) wherefore then could he not recover this Possession by Right of Postliminy, even tho' the returned Slave conceals himself from him? And the rather, because during the War, the Captivity of the Slave only suspends, in some Measure, the Rights of the Master.

- [5] Certe apud hostes manumissus liberatur, &c. Digest. ibid. Leg. XII. § 9. See the Jurisprudentia Papiniana of ANTHONY FAURE, Tit. XI. Princ. VIII. Illat. XIX. p. 631. & seq.
- [6] Si vero servus transfugerit, &c. Digest. ibid. Leg. XIX. § 5. See the same ANTHONY FAURE, cited in the preceding Note. Ibid. Illat. III. p. 613.
- [7] Ab hostibus capti & non commercio redempti, &c. Cod. Lib. VIII. Tit. LI. De Postliminio reversis, &c. Leg. XII.
- [8] Even tho' he who ransoms them knows to whom they belong. Si quis servum captum, &c. Digest. Lib. XLIX. Tit. XV. De Capt. & Postlim. &c. Leg. XII. § 7. Consult ANTHONY FAURE here again, Jurispr. Papin. Tit. XI. Princ. VIII. Illat. II. p. 622. & seq.
- [9] It is in Num. 64 of those Laws, the Latin Version of which, by JOHN LEUNCLAVIUS, is annexed to VEGETIUS, of Plantin's Edition, with the Notes of STEWECHIUS, printed in 1607. The learned GRONOVIVS refers us in this Place to the Edition of Simon Schardius, published at Basil, in 1561, which is probably the first.
- [1] That is to say, that the People delivered from the Dominion of the Enemy, should return to their lawful Sovereign; upon Condition, that the latter reimburse the Deliverer the Expences he has been at in his Expedition.
- [1] Verum est, expulsis hostibus, &c. Digest. Lib. XLIX. Tit. XV. De Capt. & Postlim. &c. Leg. XX. § 1.
- [2] STRABO, Geogr. Lib. VIII. (p. 577. Edit. Amstel. 376. Paris.) This was, because they had been of the Lacedemonian Party. For the Rest, see what we have said above, Chap. VI. of this Book, § 7. GROTIUS.
- [3] See Novel. XXXVI. of JUSTINIAN.
- [4] And that by a Law of Honorius, who, tho' Spain were left to the Vandals, yet, whilst the Vandals possessed it, he would not allow that a Prescription of thirty Years should prejudice the antient Lords, as in PROCOPIUS, Vandal. I. The same Exception is found in a Novel of VALENTINIAN'S with Respect to some Lands in Africa, possessed by the Vandals. Tricennali temporum &c. Nov. De episcopali judicio. The second Council of Seville decides, that a Church ought to recover the Parishes it had before the War: And that it cannot be deprived of them by Right of Prescription: Just as by the Roman Laws, a Prisoner of War recovers his Possessions, when he returns from Captivity. GRATIAN, in Caus. XVI. Quaest. III. Can. XIII. See also the Decretals, Lib. II. Cap. XXVI. and CUJACIUS, on the Title, C. de Praescript 30 Annor. GROTIUS.
- [5] Quod si ab hac calamitate, &c. Digest. Lib. XI. Tit. VII. De Religiosis, &c. Leg. XXXVI.
- [6] Quae [Diana Segestana] Carthaginiensium victoriâ, &c. Lib. IV. Cap. XXXV.
- [7] In tantum ut & soli domini, &c. Digest. Lib. I. Tit. VIII. De divisione rerum, & qualitate, Leg. VI. princ.
- [8] This is formally decided by the Civilian PAULUS, in the Law which our Author cited in the Margin, where he says the same Thing of a Slave, of whom a Person has the Use without the Property. Siagerab hostibus, &c. Digest. Lib. VII. Tit. IV. Quibus modis ususfructus, vel usus, amittitur. Leg. XXVI.
- [9] Sed quemadmodum si eodem impetu, &c. Ibid. Leg. XXIII. See Mr. NOODT'S fine Treatise, De Usufructu, Lib. II. Cap. XI.

[a] Reg. Constit. l. 10. tit. 29. part. 2.

[1] He says, that whatever is Part of the Booty is not recoverable by the Right of Postliminy. Si, quod bello captum est, in praeda est, non postliminio redit. Digest, Lib. XLIX, Tit. XV. De Captivis & Postlim. &c. Leg. XXVIII. I have followed Mr. BYNKERSHOEK'S Correction of this Law, with a very small Alteration, which seemed necessary: Si, QUOD, &c. for Si, quid, &c. Observat. Jur. Civ. Lib. III. Cap. VI. For the Rest, this general Rule concerning moveable Things, relates only to civil Right. The same Reasons which authorize the Right of Postliminy, in Regard to Immoveables, take Place in this Case, and with equal Force. Mr. COCCEIUS confesses it, in his Dissertation De Postliminio in Pace, Sect. II. § 5. and he says, that if the Roman Laws determined otherwise upon it, it was in order to an imate the Soldier stop lunder. Another Reason might have been added, of which I shall speak in the following Note.

[2] Slaves being of the Number of Effects, and of moveable Effects, it does not appear at first, why they were excepted out of this general Rule, as our Author has shewn above, § 11. ZIEGLER says, it was because Slaves might run away from their Masters, and afterwards pretend to have been taken. It is more likely, that it was, because it was easy to know to whom a Slave belonged; whereas, had it been necessary to restore inanimate moveable Things to their first Owners, that would have given Room for much Contest and Difficulty. Besides, those Things not being capable to return of themselves, from the Moment they were taken by the Enemy, the Owner ought to consider them as lost; and the more because it was scarce known into whose Hands they were fallen; whereas a Slave might have the Will, and find the Means to return.

[3] The Reason why the first Owner could not claim moveable Things, in a neutral Country, is founded on the Nature itself of that Sort of Things. It would be the same with Regard to Immoveables, if it were possible that they could be found on the Lands of a neutral People, taken by Right of War, and afterwards alienated in Favour of some Person of such neutral State. This is a Consequence of the State of Neutrality, which obliging the neutral People to consider, as lawfully acquired, what one of the Enemies has taken from the other, engages also to maintain the Title of those who hold of them any Thing of this Nature, unless it belonged before to a Prisoner of War, who by returning home, and thereby in a Manner recovering himself, has recovered all his Rights, even with Regard to neutral States. See above, § 6.

[4] See § 3. Note 1.

[5] Postliminio redeunt haec: Homo, navis, mulus clitellarius, equus, equa, quae fraena recipere solet. Topic. Cap. VIII. This Distinction is only in Favor of the Subjects of the State, who had lost things of this Nature that were retaken by People of the same Party. But they can no more be claimed in a neutral Country, than others not excepted.

[6] It is MARCELLUS, and not MODESTINUS : Navibus longis, atque onerariis, &c. Digest. Lib. XLIX. Tit. XV. De Capt. & Postlim. &c. Leg. II. Our Author, in giving us the Abstract of this Law, joins with Naves Actuariae, those called Lusoriae. And as there were some of the latter, which served to guard the Frontiers of the Empire upon the Danube, the Rhine, and other Rivers; a German, named JOHN JAMES WISSENBACH, Professor at Franeker, in his Life-Time, criticises our Author in this Place, as denying the Right of Postliminy to all those small Vessels comprized under the general Name of Lusoriae Naves. But the Critick was not aware, that GROTIUS has distinguished the two Sorts with sufficient Clearness, in describing that of which he intends to speak in this Manner: Voluptatis caussâ paratae; which extends also to the Naves Actuariae, some of which were also of Use in War. See the Note of the learned GRONOVIVS upon this Place, and JAMES GODEFROY, upon the Theodosian Code, Lib. VII. Tit. XVII. De Lusoriis Danubii, Vol. II. p. 401. & seq. The same WISSENBACH, in the same Place (that is to say, Exercit. in Pandectas, Disp. XXXIX. Num. 23.) suspects also, that our Author has omitted Fishing-Boats or Vessels, in Favour of the Hollanders, who have great Numbers of them. But this Suspicion is ridiculous, since the Question does not relate to modern Usages. I should rather believe that the Omission proceeded from the Copists or Printers.

[7] Id quod apud hostes est, legari posse, OCTAVENUS scripsit: & postliminii jure consistere. Digest. Lib. XXX. De Legatis & Fideicommissis I. Leg. IX. See CUJAS upon it, Recit. in Dig. 103. T. VII.

[8] It is plain that this is upon the Supposition of their being recovered. PAPINIANUS, De re, quae apud hostes est, MARCELLUM reprehendit, &c. Digest. Lib. X. Tit. II. Familiae erciscundae, Leg. XXII. § 5. and Leg. XXIII. See the great CUJAS here again, Recit. in Paul. p. 363. Vol. V. Opp.

[9] Non idem in armis juris est: Quippe nec sine flagitio amittuntur: Arma enim postliminio reverti negatur quod turpiter amittantur. Item vestis. Digest. Lib. XLIX. Tit. XV. De Capt. & Postlim. &c. Leg. II. § 2. and Leg. III.

[10] In the Law cited above, Note 5.

[1] The late Mr. COCCEIUS, in the Dissertation cited before, De Postlim. in Pace, & Amnestia, Sect. II. § 6. & seq. pretends the modern Usage is, on the contrary, that all moveable Things, of whatsoever Nature they be, are recovered by Right of Postliminy. But he alledges only some Examples from the Custom in Germany. And therefore the Argument which he founds upon what our Author says concerning Ships, as if it were an Exception to the general Rule, is of no Force, as the Universality of the Custom is not proved. See the different Regulations made in these Provinces, relating to the Recovery of Vessels, in the Commentary of the late Mr. VOET, upon the Digest, Tit. De Captivis & Postliminio, &c. § 4.

[a] Decis. Genuens. 101.

[2] See the Law cited above, Chap. III. of this Book, § 1. Note. 3. A Piratis, aut Latronibus, capti, liberi permanent, says PAULUS, another Civilian, in the same Title, Leg. XIX. § 2.

[3] He speaks of a Slave, who having been carried off by Robbers, had passed by Traffick from Hand to Hand to the Germans, that is to say, to the Enemies of the Roman People, and afterwards had been taken from them, in a Defeat, and then sold. Notwithstanding all this, the Presumption would not run in Favour of the Buyer, according to this Lawyer, who follows the Opinion of three others upon this Point. Latrones tibi servum eripuerant, &c. Digest. Lib. XLIV. Tit. XV. De Captiv. & Postlim. &c. Leg. XXVII. DENNIS GODEFROY opposes this with the sixth Law of the same Title, wherein, however, there is nothing contrary to it. See the Jurisprud. Papinian. of ANTHONY FAURE, Tit. XI. Princ. VIII. Illat. VI. p. m. 615, 616.

[4] DEMOSTHENES, (aut alius sub ejus nomine) Orat. De Haloneso, p. 30. See the Letter of Philip himself, p. 63. A. B.

[a] B. ii. ch. 10. § 9.

[1] The same is among the Venetians, as appears from the Letters of FRAXINIUS CANAEUS, Tom. I.

- [2] The End of such a Law is to animate Soldiers and Privateers to pursue Robbers and Pirates, from the Hopes of possessing Things taken even from the Subjects of the State. GROENEWEGEN, in his Treatise De legibus abrogatis & inusitatis, &c. (in L. 24. and 27. D. De Captiv. & Postlim.) says, this is practised in Holland and the neighbouring Countries.
- [a] See B. ii. ch. 15. § 5.
- [1] Similique in genere, &c. De Orator. Lib. I. Cap. XI.
- [2] Cum populis liberis, &c. Apud FESTUM, voce Postliminium.
- [3] Non dubito quin foederati & liberi nobis externi sint: Non inter nos atque eos postliminium esse. Digest, Lib. XLIX. De Capt. & Postlim. &c. Leg. VII. Princ. So the Florence Manuscript has it. The vulgar Editions add a Negative here: Nobis externi non sint. And ANTHONY FAURE defends this reading in his Jurisprud. (Tit. XI. Princ. VIII. Illat. VII. p. 616, 617.) but by giving the Word Strangers (Externi) an improper Signification, which he does not justify by any Example. The learned SALMASIUS on the contrary, whose Opinion GRONOVIVS approves was willing to reconcile the Readings, by striking out both the Negatives, and saying: Quum foederati & liberi nobis externi sint, inter nos atque eos, &c. But this is not to be defended, and directly contradicts the Words that follow, where the Civilian shews, that there is no Occasion for the Right of Postliminy between the Romans and those Allies or free People, because by Virtue of such Relation between them, the Citizens on both Sides retained their Liberty, and the Property of their Effects out of their own Country: Etenim quod inter nos atque eos postliminii opus est, quum & illi apud nos & libertatem suam, & dominium rerum suarum, aequae atque apud se, retineant, & eadem nobis apud eos contingant? Tho' the Lawyer might have expressed himself more clearly, his Meaning is evident enough. The Right of Postliminy had Place originally, and generally between Stranger and Stranger. The allied and free People did not therefore cease to be Strangers; which is the Exception POMPONIVS observes; as CUJAS very well explains him, Observat. Lib. XI. Cap. XXIII. This will appear still more, if we call to mind what we have said, B. I. Chap. III. § 21. Note. 25. upon the Condition of the People in question with regard to the Romans.
- [4] In pace quoque Postliminium datum est: Nam si cum gente aliqua, &c. Digest. Ibid. Leg. V. § 2. The illustrious Mr. BYNKERSHOEK, in his Dissertation, De dominio Maris, (Cap. I. p. 5) asserts, that what is said in this Place of a free Person, who becomes a Slave, by having been taken by the Subjects of any of the foreign Nations in question; ought to be understood only of those, who have been made Prisoners for some lawful Cause. But the Words of the antient Lawyer are too clear to admit that Restriction. The late Mr. COCCEIUS, (Diss. de Postlim. in Pace, Sect. II. § 29.) gives another the most forced Construction, to the whole Law: He is for having it relate only to People with whom War was made, and when a Clause of general Amnesty has not been inserted in the Treaty of Peace. But this was necessary to reconcile the Roman Law with the imaginary System of that Author, of a Right of War subsisting after a Peace between antient Enemies; of which we may speak else where, upon Chap. XX. § 15. of this last Book.
- [5] See Note. 3.
- [6] Quae Nationes in ditione nostra sunt, eum his Postliminium non est: Instead of: Quae Nationes in opinione nostra sunt eum his, &c. as it is in FESTUS's Edition. See the Chapter of that great Lawyer's Observations, cited in Note 3. FULVIUS URSINUS had before corrected the Word opinione in the same manner.

- [1] The late Mr. COCCEIUS in the Dissertation I have just cited, (Sect. II. § 8.) finds this Decision impertinent and unjust: Because there is no Right of War in Relation to Pirates. But our Author supposes them not to be considered as Pirates. And if the Custom be such, it may be justified by the Reason alledged above, § 17. Note 1.
- [1] Ver. 333, 334.
- [2] Sciendum itaque est, &c. Instit. Lib. II. Tit. XXIII. De Fideicommissari is hereditat. § 1.
- [3] Non enim aliter, &c. Declamat. CCLXXIII.
- [4] Speaking of the Reign of Saturn. OVID. Fast. Lib. I. Ver. 249. & seqq.
- [5] De Legib. p. 943. E. Vol. II.
- [6] In Protagor. (p. 322. C. Vol. I. Edit. H. Steph.)
- [7] Ad princip. in erudit. (p. 781. Vol. II. Edit. Wech.)
- [8] Antiq. Roman. Lib. VI. (Cap. XXXVI. p. 354. Edit. Oxon. 369. Sylb.)
- [9] Antiq. Jud. Lib. XIII. Cap. XIX. (p. 456. A.)
- [10] In speaking of Marriages, wherein Modesty, properly so called is intended: The Lawyer says, that it is contrary to the Rules of this natural Modesty, and in Consequence to the Law of Nature, to marry one's own Daughter: In contrahendis matrimoniis, Naturale jus & Pudor inspiciendus est. Contra pudorem est autem, filiam uxorem ducere. Digest, Lib. XXIII. Tit. II. De ritu Nuptiarum, Leg. XIV. § 2.
- [11] Honour, in general, is not meant here, according to the Idea, which our Author, after the Antients, affixes to the Word Pudor, I mean, a constant Adherence to the Rules of Honesty and Virtue. CICERO speaks of that Virtue, which consists in the Observation of the Rules of Decorum: JUSTITIAE partes non violare homines, VERECUNDIAE, non offendere. De Offic. Lib. I. Cap. XXVIII.
- [12] Ut hoc ita sit, quam angusta innocentia, &c. De Ira, Lib. II. Cap. XXVII. That Philosopher observes elsewhere, that there are many Things, for which there is no Law nor any Action to be brought, that however the Rules of Commerce in human Society require, which are superior to all written Laws: Multa legem non habent, nec actionem, ad quae consuetudo vitae humanae, lege omni valentior dat aditum. De Benefic. Lib. V. Cap. XXI. CICERO maintains, that the Laws redress Wrongs, in a different manner from that in which the Philosophers correct them. The Laws confine themselves to what is more gross and palpable; the Philosophers cut off every Thing, as far as the Light of an attentive and penetrating Reason extends: Sed aliter Leges aliter philosophi tollunt astutias: Leges quatenus manu tenere possunt: Philosophi, quatenus ratione & intelligentia. De Offic. Lib. III. Cap. XVII. See a Passage in QUINTILIAN, Instit. Orat. Lib. III. Cap. VI. which has been cited above in the fourth Chapter of this Book, § 2. Num. 2. GROTIUS.
The Reader may see my two Discourses, De Permissione & Beneficio Legum, upon this Subject.
- [13] Et in mancipio cogitandum, &c. Lib. I. De Clementia, Cap. XVIII. We might believe from what the Philosopher calls in the End of this Passage, commune jus animantium, that according to the Stoicks, there was a Right really and properly common to Men and Beasts. But see what I have said upon PUFENDORF, Law of Nature and Nations, B. II. Chap. III. § 2. Note 2. and § 3. Note 10. of the second Edition.

- [1] Sed non, quid ego fecerim in disquisitionem venit, quem, quidquid in hostibus feci, jus belli defendit, sed quid isti parti debuerint. LIVY, Lib. XXVI. Cap. XXXI. Num. 2. So our Author cites this Passage. But the Words quem, quidquid in hostibus feci, jus belli defendit, which he cites also above, Chap. IV. of this Book, § 5. Note 3. are not in the Manuscript, and GRONOVIVS had Reason for omitting them in his Edition, which has only, in disquisitionem venit, quamquidisti. See that learned Critick's Note. He might have observed, that this Gloss crept in probably from the following Words, which are a little lower in the Text, and which I have substituted in the Note referred to: Quae autem singulis victor aut ademi, aut dedi, quum belli jure, tum ex cujusque merito, scio me fecisse.
- [2] Politic. Lib. I. Cap. VI. p. 302. A. Vol. II. Edit. Paris. See GIPHANIUS's Commentary upon it.
- [3] SENECA says, that some acquire a Right to Lands belonging to other People by Arms: Alii armis sibi jus in aliena terra fecerunt. Consolat. ad. Helviam Cap. VI. Right, and the Acquisition of another's Effects, continuing such, seem incompatible. But they are reconcileable by the Principles we have here laid down in the Text. Add what we have said in Chap. IV. of this Book, § 2. GROTIUS.
- [4] Lib. III. Cap. LXVI. Edit. Oxon.
- [5] See the Law cited above, Chap. VII. of this Book, § 6. Note 10. with the Reflection which I have made there.
- [6] He says, that as the Title of Knight arose from Ambition, the Names of freed Man and Slave derived their Origin from Injury and Injustice: Quid est Eques Romanus, aut Libertinus, aut Servus? Nomina ex ambitione, aut ex injuria nata. Epist. XXXI.
- [7] On the contrary it was the Greeks, who were for keeping what they had taken, during the War, from the antient Inhabitants of Italy: Graeci res a quibusdam Italici generis, &c. Lib. XXIX. Cap. I. Num. 16, 17.
- [8] Orat. XV.
- [9] Itaque quum de Officiis, &c. Instit. Divin. Lib. VI. Cap. VI. Num. 24. St. AUSTIN says, that if Men duly observed the Precepts of the Gospel, War itself would not be made without Charity and Benevolence: Ac per hoc si terrena, &c. Epist. IV. Ad Marcellin. He observes elsewhere, that Wars themselves are peaceable among the sincere Adorers of the true GOD: apud veros DEI cultores, etiam ipsa bella pacata sunt. De diversis Ecclesiae Observationibus. GROTIUS.
The last Passage is cited in the Canon Law, Caus. XXIII. Qu. I. C. I.
- [10] These Words have been cited above, Chap. IV. of this Book, § 5. in fin.
- [1] See NUMBERS v. 6, 7. St. JEROME says, that if all we have unjustly taken be not restored, we cannot avoid the Sentence of Condemnation: Nec differtur ultionis sententia, si non reddantur universa. Ad Rusticum. St. AUSTIN maintains, that if another's Goods are not restored, for which we have sinned, when it is in our Power to restore them our Repentance is not real, but feigned. Ad Macedon. Epist. LIV. The latter Passage is cited in the CANON LAW, Caus. XIV. Quaest. VI. Can. I. GROTIUS.
I do not find the Words of St. JEROME in the Place referred to.
- [2] It is in the fine Passage of ISAIAH, Chap. LVIII. Ver. 5, 6, 7. that JUSTIN Martyr, repeats in Greek in his Dialogue with Tryphon. (p. 47. Edit. Oxon.) GROTIUS.

[3] MICOTZI, Lib. Praeceptorum Legis, Praecept. jub. XVI. See also the Penitential Canons of MAIMONIDES, Cap. II. § 2. GROTIUS.

[a] See Leunclavius, Turc. v. and 17.

[a] B. 2. c. 17.

[1] It is decided in a Law, which our Author cites in the Margin, that if two or more Men have stolen a Beam, which one of them alone could not carry off, each of them is entirely responsible for the Theft: Si duo pluresve unum, &c. Digest, Lib. XLVII. Tit. II. De Furtis, Leg. XXI. § 9. We must further observe here, that it is generally impossible for a Soldier to make amends for the Damage, to which he has concurred in common, and for which he is thus wholly responsible. The Instance of burning a City suffices to explain this. And as to what a Soldier has done, where the Proportion of the Damage he has caused, may be distinguished, as when he has been concerned with others in plundering a City; he cannot commonly know to whom what he has taken belonged, nor in Consequence to whom he ought to restore it. In the first Case the absolute Impossibility of Amends must acquit him, with regard to those who have suffered the Damage. In the latter, the Obligation of making Restitution is suspended, till the Soldier has discovered the right Owner of the Booty he has taken. But in either Case, a Person that has the least Tenderness of Conscience, will be extremely mortified for the Impossibility either absolute or present under which he finds himself; since when People have the Means in their own Hands of making Amends for a Wrong done, it is a great Consolation, and a Discharge, which obliterates in some Sort the Crime. After all, as the Powers, who undertake an unjust War, are always more culpable than those who serve under them in such Wars, they can also generally make Amends, either wholly or in Part, for the Evils of which they have been the first Cause; and by discharging their Duty in that manner, exempt the Soldiers from the Obligation they are under of making Restitution, which they very seldom believe they are bound to do.

[1] In all the Editions it is in this Place: Si modo in ipsis aliquid haereat culpae. But our Author's Answer to this Proposition shews, that there must be some Fault in it. I therefore translate it, as if it had been writ: Aliquid haereat DOLOSAE culpae. The Sense necessarily requires something of this Kind, and I might perhaps assure myself, that I have guessed the Word, if I had SYLVESTER, to whom our Author refers in the Margin, (Part I. Num. 10) and whom he refutes.

[2] Res hostium in praeda captas, quae belli jure nostrae videbantur, remisimus, Lib. IX. Cap. I. Num. V.

[3] See above, B. II. Chap. XII. § 26. or last.

[a] See B. 2. ch. 10.

[1] This must be explained according to the Principles referred to in my Notes upon the Chapter cited in the Margin.

[2] Idem [Populus Romanus] quum, &c. Lib. VI. Cap. V. Num. I. Mark Anthony caused the Tyrrians to return what belonged to the Jews. He ordered, that the Prisoners, who had been sold should be set at Liberty, and the Effects taken from the Jews restored to their Right Owners. JOSEPH. Antiq. Jud. Lib. XIV. (Cap. XXII. p. 492. G.) Macrinus restored the Prisoners and Booty to the Parthians, because the Romans had broken the Treaty without Cause. HERODIAN. Lib. IV. in fin. Sultan Mahomet set the Prisoners at Liberty that had been taken at Santa Maria in Achaia, CHALCOCONDYLAS, Lib. IX. GROTIUS.

[3] Phocaeensibus & ager, quem, &c. LIVY, Lib. XXXVIII. Cap. XXXIX. Num. 12.

[4] Quas ob res, placere Senatui, &c. Idem. Lib. XLII. Cap. VIII. Num. 7. See also DIOD. SICUL. Excerpt. Peiresc. (p. 298.) GROTIUS.

[5] Iisdem mandatum, ut & Hostilio, &c. LIVY, Lib. XLIII. Cap. VI. Num. 21.

[1] LUCAN. Pharsal. Lib. I. Ver. 349, 350.

[2] Sunt autem quaedam officia, &c. De Offic. Lib. I. Cap. XI. See what we have said above, B. II. Chap. XX. § 2. and 22. and the Passages of St. AUSTIN, cited in the preceding Chapter, (§ 2. Num. 3. Note 9.) in regard to the Benevolence Christians ought to retain for each other, even in War. ARISTOTLE speaking of a too rigorous Punishment exercised of old at Thebes and Heraclea, ascribes it to a Spirit of Sedition. Politic. Lib. V. Chap. VI. THUCYDIDES ranks amongst the Disorders of Greece, of which he gives a lively Description, the revenging of Injuries, beyond the Bounds of Justice and the publick Good, Lib. I. (Cap. LXXXII.) TACITUS says of Pompey, that in making too rigorous Laws for the Correction of Vice, the Remedies were worse than the Diseases: Tum Cn. Pompeius, tertium Consul, corrigendis moribus delectus & gravior remediis, quam delicta erant, &c. Annal. Lib. III. (Cap. XXVIII. Num. 1.) The same Historian blames Augustus a little above, for having forgot, in the Punishment of Adultery, the Clemency of the antient Romans, and his own Laws: Nam culpam inter viros ac foeminas, &c. (Ibid. Cap. XXIV. Num. 3.) JUVENAL observes that an Husband's Resentment for his Wife's Infidelity hurries him sometimes into more terrible Extremities, than all the Laws have ever admitted in favour of Revenge:

— — Exigit autem
Interdum ille dolor plus, quam Lex ulla dolori
Concessit — —

Sat. X. Ver. 314, 315. QUINTILIAN takes it for granted, that only the most atrocious Parricides are punished, when no longer in Being, that is to say, by depriving their Bodies of Sepulture: Ideoque non nisi ab ultimo parricidio exigitur poena trans hominem. Declam. VI. (Cap. X. p. 137. Edit. Burm.) The Emperor Marcus Antoninus wrote to the Senate so to moderate the Proscription and Punishment of the Accomplices in the Revolt of Avidius Cassius, that nothing might be too rigorous nor cruel in them: Et ad Senatum scribam, ne aut proscriptio gravior sit, aut poena crudelior. VULCAT. GALLICAN. Vit. Avid. Cass. (Cap. XI.) AUSONIUS intimates, that Punishment and Vengeance may exceed the Crime:

— — Vindictaque major
Crimine visa suo — —

[Cupid. Crucifix. Ver. 93, 94.] AMMIANUS condemns such Conduct in regard to a conquered Enemy: Saevitum est in multos acrius, quam errata flagitaverant, veldelicta, Lib. XXVI. (Cap. X. p. 514. Edit. Vales. Gron.) There is a like Reflection in AGATHIAS, Lib. III. [or rather Lib. IV. Cap. VI.] GROTIUS.

[3] Verumtamen quamdiu imperium, &c. De Offic. Lib. II. Cap. VIII.

[4] Illos ergo Crudeles vocabo, &c. De Clement. Lib. II. Cap. IV.

[5] Orat. Leuc tric. I. (p. 94. A. Vol. II. Edit. Paul. Steph.)

[6] De Ponto, Lib. I. Epist. VIII. Ver. 19, 20.

[7] Orat. Plataic. p. 298. B. Edit. H. Steph.

[8] Lib. III. Eleg. XVII. Ver. 28.

[9] (Metam. Lib. VIII. Ver. 101, 102.) The same Poet says elsewhere, that Compassion is laudable even towards an Enemy:

Est etiam miseris pietas, & in hoste probatur.
Trist.

Lib. I. Eleg. VIII. (Ver. 35.) GROTIUS.

[1] But see what I have observed above, B. II. Chap. I. § 13. Note 1.

[a] B. 2. ch. 21. § 5.

[1] Lib. XIII. Cap. XXIX. p. 345. Edit. H. Steph.

[2] Si quis hoc rebellandi, &c. Lib. II. Cap. XXIII.

[3] Itaque corpus dumtaxat suum, &c. Lib. XXVII. (Cap. XVII. Num. 13.)

[4] Propterea quod omnes, &c. Orat. pro P. Quint. [Cap. II.]

[5] Tertium est tempus, &c. Orat. pro Qu. Ligario, Cap. II.

[6] Residui omnes abierunt innocii, &c. Lib. XXI. Cap. XII. p. 307. The Historian adds immediately after, that this Emperor who was of a mild and merciful Disposition acted in this manner from the Motive of Equity: Id enim aequitate pensatâ statuerat placabilis Imperator & Clemens. THUCYDIDES makes Cleon the Athenian say that he pardoned those, whom the victorious Arms of the Enemy had compelled to revolt, Lib. III. (Cap. XXXIX.) This is what PAULUS the Lawyer [in treating another Subject] calls: Contemplatio extremae necessitatis. Recept. Sentent. Lib. V. Tit. I. § 1. And certainly nothing is stronger than Necessity, as SYNESIUS said: Ἰσχυρὸν ἀνάγκη πρῶγμα, καὶ βίαιον. JUVENAL, speaking of the Calaguritani a People of Spain, who were reduced in a Siege to eat human Flesh, maintains, that Men and Gods ought to pardon them upon account of the Extremity to which their City was reduced:

— — Quis nam hominum veniam dare, quisve Deorum,
Viribus abnueret dira atque immania passis.

Sat. XV. 102, 103. See CASSIODORUS upon what Famine is capable of reducing Men to do, Var. Lib. IX. Cap. XIII. The Emperor Pertinax, to excuse Laetus the Praefectus Praetorio, and some others, who had been the Instruments in Commodus, his Predecessor's Crimes; said, that they had been compelled to obey him; but that since they were at Liberty to speak and act, they had shewn of what Sentiments they had always been: Nec parendi scis necessitatem, &c. (CAPITOLIN. in Pertin. Cap. V.) Cassius Clemens justifies himself to Severus thus: "I knew, says he, neither you nor Piscennius Niger: But finding myself in the midst of his Party, I did what Necessity obliged me to do: I obeyed him, who was in the actual Possession of the Empire, not with design to make War against you, but to expel Julian." XIPHILIN. in Sever. The Emperor Aurelian having entered Antioch, where many People adjoined Zenobia against him, published an Edict, by which he granted a general Amnesty to all those who had escaped, regarding all that was past as the Effect of Necessity, rather than a Disposition to revolt. (ZOSIM. Lib. I. Cap. LI.) The General Belisarius forgave the Africans, because they had submitted to the Vandals only through Force. PROCOP. Vandal. Lib. I. (Cap. XX.) TOTILAS, as the same Historian relates, tells the Neapolitans that he knew they were under the Romans only out of Necessity. Gothic. Lib. III. (Cap. VII.) NICETAS, or the Person who continues his Work, informs us, that the Emperor Henry, the Brother of Baldwin, caused the Inhabitants of a certain City to be put to the Sword, like an Herd of Beasts, and not a Multitude of Christians; and with so much the greater Cruelty, adds he, because they had submitted to the Blachi thro' Force, and not Persuasion. GROTIUS.

[b] Ad Lib. 1. Cap. 55.

[7] P. 299. A. Edit. H. Steph.

[8] Lib. IX. Cap. XVII.

[9] ARRIAN. De Exp. Alexandr. Lib. I. Cap. XVIII. Edit. Gronov.

[10] Lib. XIII. Cap. XXVII. p. 344. Edit. H. Steph.

[11] Nec postea pacem Tyranni, &c. Lib. XXV. Cap. XXIX. Num. 3.

[12] Veniamque his, qui superfuerunt, &c. Lib. XXVIII. Cap. IV. Num. 13.

[1] DIONYSIUS HALICARNASSENSIS lays down as a Maxim, that whatever is involuntary deserves Pardon. Antiq. Rom. Lib. I. (Cap. LVIII.) PROCOPIUS says, that when any Man is injured, either thro' Ignorance or Forgetfulness, the Sufferer ought to forgive the Offence. Gotthic. Lib. III. (Cap. IX.) GROTIUS.

[2] Ver. 157, 186.

[3] Delinquitur autem aut proposito, &c. Digest, Lib. XLVIII. Tit. XIX. De Poenis, Leg. XI. § 2.

[4] Sed in omni injustitia &c. De Offic. Lib. I. (Cap. VIII.) SENECA says, that an upright Judge often chooses to acquit a Person, tho' accused and convicted of having done ill, if his Repentance gives Reason to conceive good Hopes of him; and he finds his Fault did not arise from a confirmed habit of Wickedness. He will even punish (adds he) sometimes great Crimes with less Rigour than small ones, if the former have been committed, not out of Cruelty but Weakness, and the latter are the Effect of concealed and inveterate Malice. He will not punish the same Fault alike, if of two Criminals the one has been guilty through Negligence, and the other by premeditated Design. Dimittit saepe eum, &c. De Ira, Lib. I. Cap. XVI. GROTIUS.

[5] De Legib. Special. Lib. II. p. 791. B. Edit. Paris.

[6] See what we have said above, B. II. Chap. XX. § 29. and in this Chapter, § 29. Alcidas, the Lacedaemonian General, having caused many Prisoners to be put to Death, the Embassadors of Samos represented to him, that he called himself the Deliverer of Greece with a very ill Grace, whilst he put Persons to Death, who had not taken Arms against him, nor were his Enemies; because if they had joined the Athenians, they had been reduced to do so by Necessity. THUCYDID. Lib. III. (Cap. XXXII.) St. CHRYSOSTOM says that Enemies themselves know how to pardon Enemies, tho' they have suffered ever so great Injuries by them, when the latter have acted involuntarily. De Provident. V. The Misimians, as AGATHIAS relates, believed themselves not entirely unworthy of Pardon, and the Clemency of the Romans, because they had only committed the Offences, that had induced the latter to turn their Arms against them, out of brutal Rage occasioned by having been unjustly treated in several Respects. Lib. IV. Cap. VI.

[7] P. 449. B.

[8] P. 524. The Passage is quoted above, B. II. Chap. XX. § 29. Num. 2.

- [9] Lib. IV. Cap. XCVIII. See what is said in DEUTERONOMY, Chap. XXII. Ver. 26. in regard to a Maid ravished in the Country and the Rabbi MAIMONIDES, Duct. Dubitant. III. 41. GROTIUS.
- [10] Ne adpellarent consilium, quae vis ac necessitas adpellenda esset. Lib. VII. Cap. XX. Num. 5.
- [11] Factum Phocensium, &c. Lib. VIII. Cap. I. Num. 10.
- [12] Our Author repeats these Words without saying from which Work of the Greek Orators he takes them. I am almost certain that there is no such Sentence in ISOCRATES ; and I believe one Name is put here for another. Since I wrote this I am convinced of the Truth of my Conjecture, and have found the Thought, and even the Words in a Passage of PORPHYRY, to which our Author refers in B. II. Chap. XX. § 29. Note 4.
- [13] Orat Leuc tric. II. p. 145. C. Vol. II.
- [14] De Vit. Sophist. Lib. II. Cap. XV. § 2. p. 596. Edit. Olear.
- [15] Ethic. Nicomach. Lib. V. Cap. XI. On the Contrary Cleon, to render the Cause of the Mitylenians odious, said, that they had with premeditated Design, laid Ambuscades for the Athenians, and in consequence deserved no Pardon, which is due only in Cases, where People act involuntarily, Lib. IV. Cap. XL. PHILO the Jew praises his Nation, for their making a Difference, when they punished Injuries done them, between such as are used to commit Insults upon others, and those who observe a quite different Conduct. For, adds he, it is brutal and barbarous to kill without Mercy all who come in the Way, without distinguishing those who have had little or no Share in the Offence. De constit. Princip. (p. 734. B.) GROTIUS.
- [16] Orat. de laud. Valent. Imp. SENECA observes, in speaking of Jupiter's Thunderbolts, that if the Antients believed that God sometimes threw small ones, it was to instruct those who are charged with the Care of Punishing, and fulminating, to use that Expression, against the Crimes of Men, that they are not always to strike in the same Manner: That there are Cases wherein the Whole is to be broken, others in which slightly hurting is sufficient, and some where only shewing the Bolt is enough. Illos vero altissimos viros, &c. Natur. Quaest. Lib. II. Cap. XLIV.
- [17] Such was Trajan, one of the best of the Roman Emperors. XIPHILINUS gives him this Praise, in his Life, (p. 230. Edit. Rob. Steph.) HERODIAN also says in praise of Marcus Antoninus, that he was the only Emperor who applied himself to Philosophy, in which he shewed the Progress he had made, not by his Discourse, or the vain Ostentation of Science, but by the Gravity of his Manners, and the Regularity of his Life. (Lib. I. Cap. II. Num. 6. Edit. Boecler.) Macrinus, another Roman Emperor, observed the Laws more exactly than he was acquainted with them. XIPHILINUS, in ejus vit. (p. 342.) GOD grant us such good Princes in these Days! GROTIUS.
- [18] De Bell. Jud. Lib. V. Cap. XIII. (VI. 5. Latin.) p. 912. B. The Emperor gives this as a general Maxim, that when a single Person has committed the Offence, it is necessary to punish him really; but when a Multitude are criminal, it suffices to menace them. So that we see our Author does not exactly give the Sense of the Jewish Historian.
- [a] See Gailius, De pace publ. 1. 2. c. 9. n. 18.
- [b] Lib. 9. c. 85.

[1] In all the Editions before mine they are called Principes Ardeae; that is to say, the principal Persons in the City, instead of the Ringleaders of the Insurrection. But I believed, that the Copists or Printers had left out the Word seditionis, from its Likeness to securi, which follows; tho' our Author never perceived it, as has happened to him in other Instances. However it was, the Original is, Romanus Consul [M. Geganius] Ardeae turbatas seditione res, principibus ejus motus securi percussis, bonisque eorum in publicum Ardeatium reductis, composuit. Lib. IV. Cap. X. Num. 6.

[2] Oppido recepto Levinus, &c. Idem. Lib. XXVI. Cap. XL. Num. 13.

[3] Atellaque & Calatia, &c. Ibid. Cap. XVI. Num. 5.

[4] Quoniam auctores defectionis, &c. Ibid. Lib. VIII. Cap. XX. Num. 11. and Cap. XXI. Num. 10.

[5] Vicit sententia lenior, &c. Idem. Lib. XXVIII. Cap. XXVI. Num. 3.

[6] Supplic. ver. 878, 879.

[7] Lib. III. Cap. XXXVI. The Sense of the last Words is clear; but there is some Difficulty in the Expression: Upon which the Reader may, if he pleases, consult a Note of the late Mr. PERIZONIUS, in AELIAN, Var. Hist. III. 43. Note 4. p. 288.

[1] Heic ignoscendi ratio queritur, &c. Lib. II. Cap. XVII.

[2] Hostes dimittet salvos, &c. De Clement. Lib. II. Cap. VII.

[3] Poenitebatque [Cerites] populationis, &c. Lib. VII. Cap. XX. Num. 2. This is what the Historian says, and it appears by the Sequel, the Cerites excused themselves by saying, that having only given Passage to the Tarquinius, some Peasants purely by their own Authority, had joined them, in order to go and plunder the Lands of the Romans. Those Kinsmen, of whom our Author speaks, were therefore the Tarquinius. But a faulty Punctuation in all the Editions, not excepting the first, had so much disfigured the Passage, that it made the Phoceans, a People of Greece, the Relations of the Cerites, a People of Etruria. In this Supposition, the learned GRONOVIVS criticises our Author in this Place, and he takes great Pains to discover the Origin of a Fault which he finds in the following Period. This is one of the Places wherein the first Edition has been of most Use to me, and might alone shew how necessary it was to compare the Text with that Edition, and the others of antient Date. In the Margin there was Appian. Syr. That Citation being omitted, I know not how, in all the Editions I have seen, after the first, prevented GRONOVIVS from consulting the Historian from whom our Author had extracted the Fact, and whose Passage being found, immediately shews the faulty Punctuation, which ought to be placed to the Account of the Printers or Copists. See Note 6. of this Paragraph. So that the Fault of our Author consists in his not having perceived, that, contrary to his Intent, they had put quod fuerint auxilio consanguineis Phocensibus Chalcidensibus, & aliis, qui, &c. instead of quod fuerint auxilio consanguineis. Phocensibus, Chalcidensibus & aliis, &c. as I have printed it in my Latin Edition.

[4] ISOCRATES says, that a conquered Prince ought sometimes to be pardoned, who did not know the Justice of the Conqueror's Cause. The Passage has been translated by AMMIANUS MARCELLINUS. Ut ISOCRATIS memorat pulchritudo; cujus vox est perpetua docentis, Ignosci debere interdum armis superato Rectori, quam justum quid sit ignorant. Lib. XXX. (Cap. VIII.) GROTIUS.

I do not know whether the Passage of the Greek Orator is to be found amongst the Remains of his Works. At least the Words which the learned VALOIS cites from the Oratio Panathenaica, are entirely foreign to the Subject.

- [5] APPIANUS ALEXANDRINUS says this of the General Manius Acilius Glabrio. De Bell. Syr. p. 160. (98. Edit. H. Steph.) See Note 4. above.
- [6] Orat. Leuctr. II. p. 135. B.C. Vol. II. Edit. Paul. Steph.
- [7] Partâ autem victoriâ, &c. De Offic. Lib. I. Cap. XI.
- [8] PLUTARCH gives us this Saying of Ptolomy's, when he sent back the Baggage and Prisoners to Demetrius, after having defeated the latter in a Battle near Gaza. In Vit. Demetr. p. 891. A. Vol. I. Edit. Wech.
- [9] Lib. III. Cap. VI. Num. 9. Edit. Boecler.
- [10] Erat obscuritas quaedam, &c. Orat. pro Marcell. Cap. X.
- [11] Etsi aliquâ culpâ tenemur erroris humani a scelere certâ liberatisumus. (Ibid. Cap. V.) So THUCYDIDES lays down as a Maxim, καὶ ξυγγνώμη, &c. Lib. I. Cap. XXXII. GROTIUS.
- [12] Neque enim ille [Dejotarus] odio tui progressus, sed errore communi lapsus est. Orat. pro Reg. Dejot. Cap. III.
- [13] Cetera multitudo vulgi, &c. Orat. I. ad Caesar. De Rep. ordinand. Cap. XXXIV. Lib. VI. Fragm. Edit. Wass.
- [14] Scribis enim, acrius, &c. CICERO, Epist. II. ad Brut. See BEMBO, Hist. Lib. IX. GROTIUS.
- [1] Theodorick, King of the Goths, said, that the most successful Wars he had made, were those in which he had used Moderation in Victory. Moderation, adds he, is a continual Victory to him who knows how to manage it. Illa mihi feliciterbella provenerunt, quae moderato fine peracta sunt, Is enim vincit adsidue, qui novit omnia temperare. CASSIODORUS, Var. II. 41. GROTIUS.
- [2] Et ignoscendo Populi Romani magnitudinem auxisse, &c. Orat. I. Philipp. Fragment. I. 13.
- [3] Verum ita majoribus placitum, &c. Annal. Lib. XII. Cap. XX. Num. 4.
- [4] Muliebres est, furere in ira: Ferarum vero, nec generosarum quidem, praemordere & urgere projectos. Elephanti Lionesque transeunt, quae impulerunt. De Clement. Lib. I. Cap. V.
- [5] Aeneid, Lib. X. ver. 528, 529.
- [6] Item: Bene majores nostri, &c. Lib. IV. Cap. XVI.
- [7] Cautior licet sit, qui devinctos, &c. (Panegy. Vet. VI. Cap. X. Edit. Cellar.) I am far from approving the Revival of the Custom the Orator speaks of. We see however that Joshua caused the Kings he had taken to be put to Death. JOSEPHUS, Antiq. Jud. Lib. V. Cap. I. Cajus Sossius, having defeated Antigonus King of the Jews, caused him to be whipped, being fastened to a Cross. DION CASSIUS, who relates this, (Lib. XLIX. p. 463. D. Edit. H. Steph.) adds wisely, that no conquered King had ever been used so by the Romans. There is the same History in JOSEPHUS, Antiq. Jud. Lib. XV. (Cap. I.) EUTROPIUS tells us, that Maximianus Herculeus [or rather Constantine] having made the Kings of the Franks and Germans Prisoners, exposed them to fight with wild Beasts, in the magnificent Games he had prepared to exhibit. Qui [Constantin.] in Galliis, &c. Lib. X. (Cap. II. Num. 9.) See what AMMIANUS MARCELLINUS says of one of the Kings of the antient Germans, who was hanged, Lib. XXVII. (Cap. II.) Theodorick, King of the Wisigoths, caused Athiulphus, King of the Suevi, who had settled in Spain, to be put to Death, as JORNANDES tells us, in his History of the Goths, (Cap. XLIV.) These Examples ought to teach Kings to be moderate and discreet in Prosperity, and to reflect, that when God pleases, they are subject, as well as others, to the most unhappy Vicissitudes of human Events; in a Word, that according to Solon's Thought, which Croesus called to mind in a like Danger, nobody can be deemed happy before Death. GROTIUS.

The last Fact is related by HERODOTUS, Lib. I. Cap. LXXXVI. As to Antigonus, King of the Jews, his Head was cut off by the Order of Mark Antony, whose Lieutenant Sossius was in Syria, and who, in favour of Herod, did not reserve that unfortunate Prince for the Day of his Triumph; and it is in this Kind of Death by which no conquered King had ever been punished before, that STRABO, whose Words JOSEPHUS has preserved, makes the Novelty of the Example consist, as appears also by PLUTARCH, Vit. Anton. p. 932. C. As to the Words of the antient Panegyrist, in which our Author corrects the manifestly corrupt Reading: The same had been done before him by the Jesuit JULIUS CAESAR BOULANGER, in his Book De Spoliis bellicis, trophaeis, arcubus triumphalibus, & pompa triumphi, Cap. XXVIII. p. 76. Edit. Paris. 1610. which is followed by the later Editions. The learned Civilian PETER DU FAURE, in his Semestria, Lib. II. Cap. III. p. 35. proposes another, which is not so natural. GRONOVIVS is also for having calcat STRATOS, instead of calcat IRATOS, read in the Beginning of the Passage.

[8] De Bell. Jud. Lib. VII. p. 979. E. F.

[9] Tamen quum de Foro in Capitolium, &c. In Verr. Lib. V. Cap. XXX.

[10] He was the Bastard of Eumenes, King of Pergamus, and, notwithstanding the Will of his Brother Attalus, the legitimate Son, who had appointed the Roman People his Heirs, had taken Possession of the Crown. But he reigned in such a Manner that he was afterwards acknowledged lawful King, as JUSTIN insinuates, Quum multa secunda praelia adversus civitates, quae metu Romanorum se ei tradere nolebant, fecisset; justus Rex jam videratur, &c. Lib. XXXVI. Cap. IV. Num. 7. So that the Remark made here by GRONOVIVS, in Vindication of the antient Romans, is not entirely just. See VELLEIVS PATERCVLVS concerning this Prince's Death, Lib. II. Cap. IV. And EUTROPIVS, Lib. X. Cap. I.

[11] See upon the Death of this King of Numidia, LIVY, Epitom. Lib. LXVII. and EUTROPIVS, Breviar. Lib. IV. Cap. XI. in fin.

[12] Or rather Artavasdes, for so the Roman Authors write this King of Armenia's Name. Here the learned GRONOVIVS remarks with Reason, that Mark Antony caused Artavasdes to be put to Death, by his own Authority, and without the Senate's Approbation, after having taken him by Treachery, and led him in Triumph, not at Rome but Alexandria. TACITVS exclaims highly against that Perfidy. Infida [Armenia] ob scelus Antonii, qui Artavasden Regem Armeniorum, specie amicitiae inlectum, dein catenis oneratum, postremo interfecerat, Annal. Lib. II. Cap. III. Num. 2. See VELLEIVS PATERCVLVS, Lib. II. Cap. LXXXII.

[13] The Historians do not agree about the Manner of this Prince's Death, who was King of Part of Numidia. Several make him die near Rome, before the Day of the Triumph, [at Tibur or Tivoli. See LIVY, at the End of the thirtieth Book. Cap. ult. Num. 4.] POLYBIVS on the contrary says, that he was led in Triumph. APPIANVS ALEXANDRINVS relates, that he died of a Distemper, whilst they were debating what to do with him. [De Bell. Punic. p. 15. Edit. Steph.] GROTIUS.

POLYBIVS says, that this conquered Prince died in Prison some Days after having been led in Triumph. Lib. XVI. Cap. XII. SILIVS ITALICVS seems to insinuate that only the Effigy of Syphax was carried in Triumph, Punic. Lib. XVII. ver. 630. where the Reader may see

- [14] He was a King of Illyria. See LIVY, Lib. XLV. Cap. XLIII.
- [15] He was the Son of the King of Numidia, and part of Mauritania. Julius Caesar, in the room of his Father, who was killed in a single Combat, led this young Prince, then an Infant, in Triumph. See PLUTARCH, in Caesar. p. 733. and APPIANUS ALEXANDRINUS, De Bell. Civ. Lib. II. p. 491. Edit. H. Steph. His Life was not only spared, but he was so well educated, that he became more celebrated for his Writings than his Birth, and the Shadow of Royalty conferred on him by Augustus. See upon that Head the Treatise of VOSSIUS, De Historic. Graecis, Lib. II. Cap. IV.
- [16] A petty King of the antient People of Great Britain.
- [17] Where he speaks of the Destruction of Corinth, De Offic. Lib. I. Cap. XI. and Lib. III. Cap. X.
- [18] Excerpt. E. Lib. XXXI.
- [19] Vit. Agid. p. 804. E.
- [20] Lib. XVII. Cap. XXXVIII. p. 582. Edit. H. Steph.
- [21] Alexander, quamquam belli, &c. Lib. IX. Cap. I. Num. 22.
- [a] Chap. 1. of this Book, § 4. Num. 5.

- [1] In the latter Part of this Passage, read ἑναντίοις instead of ἐναντίοις, as in the Editions. Lib. V. Cap. XI. GROTIUS.
- [1] Puerum aetas excuset, Foeminam sexus. De Ira, Lib. III. Cap. XXIV. The Lion, when enraged, falls upon Men rather than Women, and does not hurt Children but when pressed with extreme Hunger, as an antient Naturalist observes. Etubisaevit [Leo] &c. PLINY, Lib. VIII. Cap. XVI. HORACE representing Achilles, as a Warrior void of Pity, that did not spare even Infants, without excepting those in their Mother's Womb; professes by a lively Exclamation, that he looks upon this as an horrible Excess of Fury.

*Sed palam captis gravis, heu nefas heu!
Nescios fari pueros Achivis
Ureret flammis, etiam latentes
Matris in alvo.*

Lib. IV. Od. VI. ver. 17. & seqq. An antient Scholiast observes upon this Passage, how much the Poet expresses his Dislike of such Barbarity, [HEU NEFAS] Dolenter exclamat in saevitiam Achilles, qui si per Apollinem vivere licuisset, adeo saevus erat, ut nec infantibus, nec in utero gestantibus pepercisset. PHILO the Jew says, that it was a Rule of War with his Nation, to release the Maids and Wives taken Prisoners, without doing them any Hurt, and he gives this Reason for it; that it would have been great Inhumanity to have destroyed with the Men that Sex, which their natural Weakness made incapable of War. De Princip. constitut. (p. 734. A. B. Edit. Paris.) He observes elsewhere, that between Persons at Years of Discretion, a thousand specious Reasons may be found to justify Quarrels and Enmity; but that as to Infants lately come into the World, Malice itself cannot make those innocent Creatures guilty of any Thing, with the least Appearance of Reason. De special. Leg. Lib. II. (p. 795. D.) JOSEPHUS speaking of Manahem, who, after taking the City of Thapsus, spared not even the Infants, calls that the utmost Excess of Cruelty and Barbarity. That Usurper, adds he, treated the People of his own Nation in a Manner that would have been unpardonable, even tho' he had to do with conquered Strangers. Antiq. Jud. Lib. II. (Cap. XI. p. 320. D.) The same Jewish Historian informs us, that Judas Maccabaeus having taken the Cities of Bosra and Ephron, put all the Males to the Sword, with all those who were capable of bearing Arms. [Ibid. Lib. XII. Cap. XII. p. 417. B. G.] In another Place he calls the Fury of Alexander, surnamed the Thracian, an inhuman Revenge, in causing the Wives and Children of the Jews to be put to Death with them, and before their Eyes. [Lib. XIII. Cap. XXII. p. 461. C.] AGATHIAS makes this Reflection upon the Romans, whatever just Reason they might have for punishing the Missipians, they were inexcusable, for having been so unmerciful to murder the Children at their Mother's Breasts, and who, consequently, could have no Share in their Father's Crimes: Nor did such Cruelty remain unpunished: (Lib. IV. Cap. VI.) NICETAS, or the Person who continues his History to the Reign of Henry, condemns in stronger Terms a like Excess of Hostility, committed by the Scythians, in taking the City of Atyra. They spared, says he, not even Infants at the Breast; those young Plants were cut down like Grass, or tender Blossoms, by those merciless Victors, who did not know that it is sinning against Nature, and violating the common Right of Men, to extend Rage beyond Victory, and to act with Fury against a reduced Enemy. (In Vit. Balduin. Cap. IX.) See also what BEDE says, Lib. II. Cap. XX. concerning the Cruelty of Carevolla; and the merciful Orders given by Queen Elizabeth, according to CAMBDEN, upon the Year 1596. (p. 668.) SIMLER recites a good Law instituted by the Swiss, [which prohibits the doing any Injury to the Women, unless a Woman has furnished the Enemy with Arms, thrown Stones, or exercised some other Act of Hostility. De Rep. Helvet. Lib. II. p. 302. Edit. Elzevir.] GROTIUS.

[2] Num quis irascitur, &c. De Ira Lib. II. Cap. IX.

[3] Pharsal. Lib. H. ver. 108.

[4] Sunt & belli, sunt pacis jura, &c. [Lib. V. Cap. XXVII. Num. 7.]

[5] Vit. Camill. p. 134. B.

[6] In the Passage of that Historian, which our Author has in View, the Reading is integra dignitate. The Whole is as follows, Eam namque vir sanctus & sapiens veram sciebat victoriam, quae, salva fide, & integra dignitate, pareretur. Lib. I. Cap. XII. Num. 6. It relates to Camillus also, who would not take the Advantage of a Schoolmaster's Treachery.

[7] Puellis, ut saltem parcerent, orare institit; a qua aetate etiam hostes iratos abstinere, &c. Lib. XXIV. (Cap. XXVI. Num. 11.)

[8] Trucidant inermes juxta atque armatos, foeminas pariter ac viros, usque ad infantium caedem ira crudelis pervenit. Lib. XXVIII. Cap. XX. Num. 6.

[9] Lib. I. Sylv. VI. ver. 53.

[10] NER. Quod parcis hosti. PRAE. Femina hoc nomen capit? Octav. (ver. 864.) For this Reason Tucca and Varus were for striking out of the Aeneid, the Verses where Aeneas deliberates whether he shall kill Helen. GROTIUS.

The Passage begins at the 567th, and ends at the 588th Verse. Jamque adeo super unus eram, &c. Talia jactabam & furiosa mente ferebar. The Reader may see the Notes of Father CATROU, the last French Translator.

[11] Bellum cum captivis & foeminis gerere non soleo: Armatus sit oportet, quem oderim. Lib. IV. (Cap. XI. Num. 17.)

[12] Contra Gryphus orare, &c. Lib. XXXIX. Cap. III. Num. 7.

- [13] The Historian makes Arminius say this in Regard to Women with Child. Non enim se proditione, &c. Annal. Lib. I. Cap. LIX. Num. 4.
- [14] Efferatam crudelitatem suam, &c. Lib. IX. Cap. II. Num. 4.
- [15] Lib. XIII. (Cap. LVII. p. 360. Edit. H. Steph.)
- [16] Et in sexum, cui bella parant, in pace saevitum, (Cap. XXIX. Edit. Cellar.)
- [17] Thebaid. Lib. V. ver. 258, 259.
- [1] Atque haec tamen hostium, &c. Lib. XXVIII. Cap. XXIII. Num. 1.
- [2] This Reflection the Jewish Historian ascribes to Vespasian and Titus, who, notwithstanding the Instances of the People of Alexandria and Antioch, would not deprive the Jews settled in those two Cities of the Rights and Privileges they had enjoyed till then. Those of that Nation, said they, who took up Arms against us, have been sufficiently punished by the unfortunate Event of their Rebellion: For the Rest, who have done no Ill, it would be unjust to deprive them of what they possess. Antiq. Jud. Lib. XII. Cap. III. p. 398. D.
- [3] Et Dictator [Camillus] &c. LIVY, Lib. V. Cap. XXI. Num. 13.
- [4] This merits particular Observation. The Security of Persons of this Kind, and of all others, whose Manner of Life has in itself no Relation to the Business of War, is founded upon the Supposition that they act nothing in any Manner against an Enemy. But if an Ecclesiastick abandons his Prayer-Book, to enter into the Councils of Princes, if he is the first Promoter of a War, and even takes the Field, and commands Troops, either directly or indirectly, he deserves to be spared the less, as he acts contrary to the Engagements of his Character. See FELDEN's Note upon this Place; and what is observed above, concerning the Canons prohibiting Ecclesiasticks to carry Arms. B. I. Chap. V. § 4. Note 2. and B. II. Chap. I. § 13. Note 5.
- [5] The Rabbins say, that Hyrchanus, at the very Time he besieged Jerusalem, sent Victims into the Temple. PROCOPIUS praises the Goths, for having spared the Priests of the Churches of St. Paul and St. Peter, which were at some Distance from Rome. Gotthic. Lib. II. (Cap. IV.) See the Supplement of CHARLEMAGNE to The Law of the Bavarians and Lombards, Lib. I. Tit. XI. Num. 14. GROTIUS.
- [6] Quaest. Graec. XXI. p. 296. C.
- [7] SERVIUS informs us, that in Italy they paid this Regard to Priests and Priestesses, as well as to old Men, Quia vatem. Nam eam defendebat a bellis, si non aetas, saltem religio Sacerdotis. Ad Aeneid. Lib. VII. (ver. 442.) GROTIUS.
- The Passage of SERVIUS does not relate to the Safety of Priests in Time of War; but he means that their Character excuses them from being concerned in Affairs of War. The Reader need only see the Sequel of the Discourse in the Verses of the Poet, to be assured that this must be the Commentator's Sense. As to the Greek Proverb, which our Author repeats, he took it from SUIDAS, at the Word Πυρφόρος. According to that Lexicographer, to express that no Quarter was given to any one, it was usual to say, that not a single Priest had escaped, that is not one of those who marched in the Front of the two Armies. They carried a Torch in their Hands, as the Scholiast upon EURIPIDES informs us in the Phoenissae, Ver. 1386. from whence they were called Πυρφόροι, Fire-bearers: And in Consideration of their Character, no Hostility was exercised against them. ERASMUS, in his Adages, upon the Proverb, Ne ignifer quidem reliquus est factus, cites EUSTATHIUS in this Place, in Iliad, Lib. XII. Ver. 73. See also the Commentators upon POLLUX, Lib. VIII.

[8] Geogr. Lib. VIII. (p. 358. Edit. Casaub. Paris.) See also POLYBIUS, Hist. Lib. IV. (Cap. LXXIII.) and DIODORUS SICULUS, Excerpt. Peiresc. (p. 225.) Those who went to Combat in the Olympick, Pythian, Nemaean, or Isthmian Games, enjoyed also an entire Security in Time of War. THUCYDID. Lib. V. and VIII. PLUTARCH, Vit. Arat. (p. 1040. B.) GROTIUS.

[9] Conversi, Converts, which is not so common and intelligible in the Sense it is here used as Lay Brother, which is also derived from the Latin Frater laicus. These are Persons, who retire into Convents, but are not in Orders, do not sing in Choirs, nor make the Vow of Poverty. Our Author stiles them Penitents, because they were originally secular Persons converted, who engaged in that way of Life by way of Penance. See the Authors cited here by GRONOVIVS.

[10] Innovamus, ut Presbyteri, Monachi, Conversi, Peregrini, Mercatores, Rustici, euntes vel redeuntes, vel in agricultura existentes & animalia, quibus arant & semina portant ad agrum, congrua securitate laentur. Decretal. Lib. I. Tit. XXXIV. De Treuga & Pace, Cap. II.

[1] See the Canon cited in the last Note of the preceding Paragraph.

[2] Lib. II. Cap. XXXVI. p. 86. Edit. H. Steph.

[3] Quaest. Graec. p. 295. B.

[4] He offered the King of Assyria to spare his Husbandmen, provided that on his Side he did no Hurt to the Husbandmen of those Provinces that had engaged in his Party. Cyrop. Lib. V. Cap. IV. § 12. Edit. Oxon.

[5] Voc. βελισάριος. GROTIUS.

[1] See the Canon cited, § 10. Note 10.

[a] Ch. 10. § 1. Note 1.

[1] Et in mancipio cogitandum est, non quantum illud impune pati possit, sed quantum tibi permittat, aequi bonique natura: Quae parcere etiam Captivis & pretio paratis, jubet. De Clement. Lib. I. Cap. XVIII.

[b] Sect. 9. of this Chapter, Note 8.

[2] Hostem pugnans necessitas, &c. Ad Bonifac. Epist. CCV. GRATIAN, in repeating this Passage, says in the beginning, necessitas deprimat, and not perimat, (Caus. XXIII. Quaest. I. Can. III. ex Epist. CCVII.) Epaminondas and Pelopidas, when they gained a Victory, never put any of the Conquered to Death, nor deprived any City of its Liberty: So that it was said of them, had they been present, the Thebans would never have treated the Orchomenians as they did: This PLUTARCH tells us, Vit. Marcell. (p. 316. D.) Marcellus acted with the same Lenity, at the taking of Syracuse, as the same Historian testifies, Ibid. (p. 308. D.) See also what he says in the Life of Cato Uticensis, (p. 787. C. D.) TACITUS says of Primus Antonius, and Varus Arrius: Quos [Primum Antonium Varumque Arrium] recentes, clarosque rerum fama, &c. Hist. Lib. V. (Cap. XXXIX. Num. 4.) Cabades, King of Persia, having taken the City of Amida, as his Troops made a great Slaughter of the Inhabitants, a Priest represented to that Prince, that it was unworthy of a King to massacre the Conquered. PROCOP. Persic. Lib. I. (Cap. VII.) The Author who relates this says elsewhere, that it is a vile Action to discharge one's Fury upon Prisoners of War. Lib. II. (Cap. IX. in the Speech of Cosroez to the Roman Embassadors.) See also, in the same Historian, the fine Speech of Belisarius to his Soldiers, after the taking of Naples. Gothic. Lib. I. (Cap. IX.) When Somebody advised the Emperor Alexis to put his Scythian Prisoners to Death, he replied: That the Scythians, tho' Scythians were however Men: And their having been our Enemies does not make them unworthy of our Compassion. ANNA COMNENA, (Lib. VIII. Cap. IV.) NICEPHORUS GREGORAS says, that whatever is done in the heat of Fight is excusable in some manner, because at that Time Men are not their own Masters, and act with a blind Impetuosity: But that when the Danger is over, and the Mind in its natural Situation has Time and Liberty to examine all Things aright, if they do not restrain their Power, it is a sign they pay no regard to what Decency requires, and trample upon all Consideration of Duty, Lib. VI. (p. 92. Edit. Colon. 1616.) See another Passage of the same Historian, which we have cited in a Note at the End of the seventh Chapter of this Book, and what CHALCOCONOYLAS says of a certain laudable Custom amongst the Poles, Lib. V. The Emperor JULIAN, in his Praise of Constantius, to give an Idea of a good Prince says, that when he had gained a Victory he put an immediate stop to the Slaughter, convinced that it was infamous to deprive People of their Lives, when they defended themselves no longer. (Orat. p. 86. C. Edit. Spanheim.) GROTIUS.

[3] De Agesil. Cap. I. § 21. Edit. Oxon.

[4] Lib. XIII. (Cap. XXIV. p. 434. Edit. H. Steph.)

[5] Lib. XVII. (Cap. XIII. p. 568.)

[6] Numidae puberes interfecti, &c. Bell. Jugurth. Cap. XCVI. Edit. Wass.

[7] Instit. Divin. Lib. V. GROTIUS.

[8] Orat. II. De Pace, (p. 80. C. Vol. II.)

[9] Ver. 965, 966.

[10] Lib. XII. Cap. LXXXII. p. 328.

[11] Lib. XIII. Cap. XXVI. p. 344. CAPITOLINUS praises the Emperor Marcus Antoninus for observing the Rules of Equity even with regard to his Prisoners of War: Aequitatem etiam circa captos hostes custodivit, Cap. XXIV.

[12] See Note (1) on this Paragraph.

[13] Our Author makes this Reflection after ALBERICUS GENTILIS, (De Jure Belli, Lib. II. Cap. XVI. p. 344.) The latter alledges two Examples of this Kind, the one taken from BUCHANAN, and the other from PAULUS JOVIUS. In the first, we see, in the Reign of Robert I. King of Scotland, the Earl of Mar, having almost as many Prisoners as Troops of his own, contented himself with making them swear, that they would lie still, when the two Armies came to Blows, and should continue Prisoners even tho' the English should be strong enough to set them at Liberty. Rerum Scotic. Lib. IX. p. 320. Edit. Amstel. 1643. The Historian makes many Reflections in the same Place upon the Generosity and Humanity with which the Prisoners were treated. As to that of PAULUS JOVIUS, he speaks of the Duke D'Anguien, who after the Battle of Cerisoles released all the Prisoners, to rid his Camp of useless Mouths, that consumed his Provisions; and required only from them, that the Spaniards should return into Spain, and the Germans into Germany by the Way of France. Hist. Lib. XLV. seu ult. circa init. p. 267. Vol. III. Edit. Basil. 1556.

[1] The Romans informed the Persians besieged in the Citadel of Petra, that resolved as they seemed to perish, they chose rather to preserve their Lives, out of a Compassion worthy of Romans and Christians. PROCOP. Gothic. Lib. IV. (seu Hist. Miscell. Cap. XII.) See

- [2] De Exped. Alexandr. (Lib. I. Cap. IX.)
- [3] Cap. LVIII. Edit. Oxon.
- [4] Lib. XI. in fin.
- [5] Νόμος ἐστὶ τοῦς ἰκέτας σώζειν ἐν τοῖς πολέμοις.
- [6] Ad haec Caesar respondit, Se magis consuetudine suâ, quam merito eorum, civitatem [Atuaticorum] conservaturum, si prius, quàm aries murum attigisset se dedidissent, &c. De Bell. Gall. Lib. I. Cap. XXXII.
- [7] Et cum iis, quos vi deviceris, consulendum est, &c. De Offic. Lib. I. Cap. XI.
- [8] See on that Head the Passages cited by SELDEN, De Jure Nat. & Gent. secundum discipl. Hebr. Lib. VI. Cap. XV. in fin. Our Author observes here in a short Note, that Scipio Aemilianus, at the Time he was preparing to destroy Carthage, made Proclamation, that whoever would, might quit it with Safety. He cites POLYBIUS to prove this in general, without referring to any Passage. But I can find nothing like it in that Historian, and am very much mistaken, if our Author had not in his Thoughts what he had read in FLORUS, upon the Summons made to the Carthaginians, when the Romans had resolved that they should quit their Country: Tum evocatis principibus, si salvi esse vellent, ut migrarent finibus, imperatum, Lib. II. Cap. XV. Num. 8. And perhaps his Memory at the same Time had recalled a confused Idea of the Proposals, Scipio caused to be made to Asdrubal by Gulussa, as POLYBIUS relates, Excerpt. Peiresc. p. 178. from whence arose this mixture of two Facts, and the confounding of two Authors.
- [1] Quod aspernati sunt victores, quia trucidare deditos saevum, &c. Annal. Lib. XII. Cap. XVII. Num. 2.
- [2] The Passage is cited in Note 6. upon § 13. of this Chapter. The other which our Author cites is: Alios item non armatos, neque in praelio belli jure, sed postea supplices, per summum scelus interfectos. Orat. de Rep. ordin. Cap. XXXVI. Edit. Wass.
- [3] In the beginning of § 10.
- [4] Qui [C. Popilius] deditis, contra jus ac fas bellum intulisset, &c. Lib. XLII. Cap. XXI. Num 3.
- [5] Vit. Brut. p. 996. A. I do not know, why our Author translates the Word περιύπτειυσε by equitatu circumdedit. It only signifies, that Brutus rode about on all Sides to give Orders to his Troops not to charge the Enemy, and not that he invested them with his Cavalry.
- [1] Our Author here had ALBERICUS GENTILIS in View, De Jure Bell. Lib. II. Cap. XVIII. where that Lawyer adds some other Cases. But I find no Example of this, unless that of Subjects, who have unjustly taken Arms against their lawful Sovereign, without any plausible Reason whatsoever, may be intended. See below, Chap. XIX. § 6. Num. 1. It was principally for this Reason, that in the War of the Peasants of Germany, which began in 1525. Count Truchses punished with an exemplary Death most of the Rebels, whom he had reduced to surrender. See the History of that Insurrection by PETER GNODAL, p. 292. & seq. Edit. Basil. 1570.
- [2] As the Thebans did when besieged by Alexander the Great, (DIOD. SICUL. Lib. XVII. Cap. IX. and XIII.) and the Athenians, besieged by Sylla. PLUTARCH, De Garrulitate, Vol. II. p. 505.) GRONOVIVS gives us the first of these Examples. The latter had been cited before by ALBERICUS GENTILIS, (ubi supra, p. 377.) where the Reader may find several others. See also Dissertation XIX. of OBRECHT, intituled, Hostis dedititius, § 24.

[3] So Julius Caesar caused Publius Ligarius to be put to Death, who was perjured and perfidious. HIRTIUS, De bello Africano, Cap. LXIV. See other Examples in ALBERICUS GENTILIS, p. 379. & seq.

[4] See also ALBERICUS GENTILIS here, p. 382.

[5] Examples of this may be found in the same Author, p. 383. & seq.

[a] B. 2. ch. 21. § 18.

[6] Orat. II. De Pace, p. 75. C. Vol. II.

[7] He calls this the most inhuman of Timoleon's Actions, who might if he had pleased have prevented that unjust Punishment. Vit. Timoleon. p. 252. C. See also DION's Life, p. 983. E. and DIODORUS SICULUS, Biblioth. Lib. XIV. Cap. XLVII.

[8] POLYAEN Strateg. Lib. IV. Cap. III. Num. 30.

[9] De Exped. Alex. Lib. I. Cap. XX.

[10] Lib. XIV. Cap. CXIII. p. 453. Edit. H. Steph.

[11] Pharsal. Lib. VII. Ver. 312. & seq.

[12] Iliad Lib. XXIII. Ver. 176. SERVIUS observes, that the Custom of putting Prisoners of War to Death upon the Tombs of the bravest Warriors, seemed in process of Time to have something cruel in it: Sane mos erat in sepulchris virorum fortium captivos necari: Quod postquam crudele visum est, placuit, &c. In Aeneid. X. (Ver. 519.) GROTIUS. See the Parrhasiana of Mr. LE CLERC, Vol. I. p. 12, 13.

[a] See B. 2. c. 13. § 4.

[1] In singulos severitas Imperatoris, &c. De Ira, Lib. II. Cap. X. The Scholiast upon JUVENAL cites a Passage from LUCAN, where he says, that Crimes committed by a Multitude pass with Impunity:

— — — Quidquid multis peccatur inultum est.

[Pharsal. Lib. V. Ver. 260.] Livia, the Wife of Augustus, represented, that if every Thing were to be punished as it deserved, the greatest Part of Mankind would be destroyed. Apud XIPHILIN. ex DION. CASS. (p. 87. Edit. Rob. Steph.) St. AUSTIN says, that Crimes committed by a few Persons should be punished with Rigour: But when a Multitude are criminal, they should be instructed rather than commanded, and Reprimands preferred to Menaces: Non ergo asperere, quantum existimo, &c. Epist. LXIV. See GAILIUS, De Pace publica, Lib. II. Cap. IX. Num. 37. GROTIUS.

[2] Pharsal. Lib. II. Ver. 198. & seq.

[3] Ne autem nimium multi poenam capitis subirent, ideo illa sortitio comparata est. Orat. pro Cluent. Cap. XLVI. See what I have said in my Dissertation upon the Nature of Chance, § 20.

[4] Neque quisquam te ad crudeles poenas, aut acerba judicia, invocat, quibus civitas vastatur magis, quam corrigitur, &c. Orat. II. Ad Caesar. De Republ. ordinand. Cap. XL. p. 119. Edit. Wass.

[a] B. 2. ch. 21. § 2. B. 3. ch. 2. § 6.

[1] See above, Chap. IV. of this Book, § 14. and ALBERICUS GENTILIS, De Jure Belli, Lib. II. Cap. XIX. p. 395.

[2] Neque se in obsides innoxios, sed in ipsos, si defecerint, saevitutum: Nec ab inermi, sed ab armato hoste poenas expetitutum. LIVY, Lib. XXVIII. Cap. XXXIV. Num. 10. The Emperor Julian made the same Declaration as EUNAPIUS relates, Excerpt. Legat. I. (p. 213. Edit. Commelin.) GROTIUS.

[3] Some Persons, who had hid themselves to avoid being sent as Hostages, were punished for it as NICETAS informs us, Lib. II (Cap. VII. in Vit. Isac. Angel.) GROTIUS.

[4] Apud Regem Etruscum, non tuta solum, sed & honorata virtus fuit: Laudatamque virginem parte obsidum se donare dixit, Lib. II. Cap. XIII. Num. 9. See what will be said below, Chap. XX. § 54.

[2] SALLUSTIUS duceslaudat, qui victoriam incruento exercitu deportarent, Ex SERVIO, in AEN. XI. Frag. p. 102. Edit. Wass.

[3] Rari excursus & fortuita pugna. German. (Cap. XXX. Num. 5.) PLUTARCH blames Demetrius, for exposing his Soldiers, rather for the sake of acquiring Glory by Combats, than any real Advantage. Demetr. p. 908. C. GROTIUS.

[a] B. 2. ch. 2. § 9.

[b] Vict. de Jure bel. n. 52. and 56.

[1] Our Author has already recited the Passage of that Historian, which he has here in View, in the preceding Chapter, § 8.

[2] Stratagem. Cap. VI. (p. 15. Edit. Rigalt. 1590.) GROTIUS.

The Reader upon this Passage of ONOSANDER's may see the Note of JOHN CHOKIER, p. 18, 19, of his Edition in 1610, but especially the full Part of JANUS GRUTERUS's Dissertations, printed as a Supplement to the Edition of REGAULT in 1604 with this Title: Varii discursus, sive prolixiores Commentarii ad aliquot insigniora loca TACITI atque ONOSANDRI. Our Author perhaps might have made Use of this Collection: For almost all the Passages which he cites in this Chapter, are in it, (p. 138. & seq.) with others in a much greater Number than in ALBERICUS GENTILIS, De Jure Belli, Lib. II. Cap. XXIII.

[3] PHILO Judaeus insinuates that it is customary to ravage the Lands of the Enemy, that the Want of Necessaries may reduce them to surrender. De vit. contemplat. (p. 891. D. E.) The same Author speaking of the Ravages occasioned by an Irruption of the Enemy, says it is a double Misfortune to those who are exposed to it, as their Friends on the one Side suffer by Famine, and the Enemy on the other profits by the abundance of Provisions he carries off. De Diris, (init. p. 930. A. Edit. Paris.)

[4] Quippe credibat [Darius] inopiâ debellari posse nihil habentem nisi quod rapiendo occupasset. Lib. IV. Cap. IX. Num. 8.

[1] There is great Reason to believe, that the Law regards only the Siege of the Cities, which were in the Land of Canaan, intended for the Abode of the Israelites, as Mr. LE CLERC observes. So that it was not out of Consideration for the Conquered, that the Law-giver prescribed the Moderation here meant; since the Conqueror not only might, but was bound in Duty to put all to the Sword, without Distinction of Sex or Age, in the Cities of the seven Nations devoted to utter Extirpation; and in regard to the more remote Places, all the Favour the Besieged had to hope for, was that their Women and Children should be reserved for Slavery: Besides, it is doubtful, whether the male Infants were not included in the general Term of Males, for whom there was no Quarter, Ver. 13. What Probability is there then, that GOD should have in View any respect to the Goods of these People, over whose Lives he had given the Israelites such power. This does not hinder however, in my Opinion, but that a good Argument may be drawn from hence to our Author's Purpose. For if the Creator and supreme LORD of Mankind did not approve, that the Israelites should lay waste without Necessity the Lands of the People, against whom he had armed them in an extraordinary Manner, and had made them as it were the Executors of his terrible Judgments; much more would he not approve our doing so in ordinary Wars, often unjust, and undertaken without much Necessity, and wherein the Party, who boasts the most of the Justice of his Cause, is sometimes in the wrong.

[2] De creation. Magistrat. (p. 734 C) There is another Passage of that Jewish Author, which tho' long, merits a Place here. MOSES, says he, Extends Moderation and Lenity so far, that next to rational Creatures he makes Beasts the Object of it; and after them, even Plants; of which we must now speak, as we have sufficiently explained what regards Men and all animate Beings. The Lawgiver then forbid the cutting down of any Fruit Tree, the reaping of Fields of Corn before the Season, in a Word the spoiling of any of the Fruits of the Earth: And that in order that Mankind might have not only allowance of Food, and Things necessary for Life, but also of those for Pleasure. The Provision of Grain is indeed necessary for the Subsistence of Man, and the infinite Variety of Fruits, which the Trees bear, contributes to his Delight: Which Fruits also at certain Times of Dearth, may supply the Place of the most necessary Aliments. But MOSES goes farther: He even forbids wasting the Lands of an Enemy. He enjoins us to abstain from cutting down the Trees upon them, holding it unjust to discharge the Resentment, with which we are animated against Men, upon innocent Things. Besides which, it was his Design to teach us not only to think of the present, but extend our Views to the future, and to consider that in the Vicissitudes, to which all human Things are liable, it might easily happen, that those who are to Day our Enemies will to morrow be our Allies, by the Effect of an happy Conference. Now in this Case, it would have been cruel to deprive our Friends of necessary Things, of which they might not have made Provision for the future. The Antients have indeed said with great Reason, that we ought to live with our Friends in such a Manner, as if we were not ignorant that they might one Day become our Enemies, and on the contrary that we ought so to act in regard to those with whom we are at Variance, as if we had Reason to hope for a Reconciliation. By the first a Resource is preserved for our own Security, and we guard against having Cause to repent too late of our too great Facility in discovering more, than is proper, by our Actions and Discourse. A most important Maxim, which states ought also carefully to observe; in providing during Peace for what is necessary in War, and during War for what regards Peace: So that, on the one Side, they do not confide too much in their Allies, as if no Change could happen, to induce them to become Enemies, and on the other, not entirely despair of an Enemy, as if it were not possible for him to become a Friend. But tho' we ought not to do any Thing in favour of Enemies, in hopes of a Reconciliation, we should not therefore vent our Rage upon Plants and Trees. Nothing of that Kind is at War with us: On the contrary all such Things are at Peace, and conduce to our good. Fruit Trees especially and cultivated Plants are very necessary to us, as their Fruits serve for our Nourishment, or something equivalent to it. We ought not therefore to make War upon what neither would nor could do us any Hurt. We ought not to cut down, burn, or root up Things, which Nature herself takes care to form and raise by the Waters with which she moistens them, and the Temperature of the Seasons, which she regularly brings on, in order that each revolving Year should pay tribute to Men, as to so many Kings. That wise and good Mother gives perpetual Force and Vigour not only to Animals, but Plants, especially such as are cultivated, that require the greatest Care, and are not so fruitful as those that are wild, De Humanitate, (p. 712, 713.) GROTIUS.

- [3] He extends the Prohibitions of that Law so far, that he does not seem to except even the Case, wherein no other Wood could be found for forming the necessary Machines of War. Antiq. Jud. Lib. IV. Cap. VIII. p. 130. B.
- [4] De Vit. Pythagor. § 99. Edit. Kuster. See also DIOGENES LAERTIUS, Lib. VIII. § 23.
- [5] That Philosopher speaks of the Sect of the Essenes in particular. De abstin. Animal. Lib. IV. p. 394. Edit. Ludg. 1620.
- [6] On the contrary, they are for having this Exception added: Unless the Fruit Trees are in Suburbs, or hinder shooting and throwing Darts against the Enemy. GROTIUS.
See the learned SELDEN's Treatise, De Jure Natur. & Gent. secundum discipl. Hebraeorum, Lib. VI. Cap. XV.
- [7] Strateg. Lib. III. Cap. X. Num. 5.
- [8] De Repub. Lib. V. p. 471. A. Vol. I. Edit. H. Steph.
- [9] Nollem Corinthum [Funditus sublatam.] De Offic. Lib. I. Cap. XI. See also Lib. III. Cap. XI.
- [10] Sed quid ego vestram crudelitatem, &c. Orat. pro domo sua. Cap. XXIII.
- [11] There is a remarkable Letter of Belisarius on this Subject to Totilas, Gothic. III. It was formerly esteemed an Effect of the Wisdom and Genius of great Politicians, to raise noble Structures; and to destroy them after they were built, the Part of Fools, not blushing to transmit to Posterity Tokens and Monuments of their Folly. It is manifest, that Rome is the biggest and most beautiful City of all the World (or that the Sun be holds) and that it could not arrive to that Greatness and Splendor, by the Labour of one single Man, nor in a short Time; but many Kings, and Emperors, an infinite Number of illustrious Persons, many Ages, and a prodigious Mass of Treasure, had drawn thither, as other Things, so also the most curious Artificers in the World. Thus Rome was formed by little and little, such as you now see it, full of the Monuments which each of those that contributed to its Improvement, has left of his Wisdom and Ingenuity. Wherefore to ruin or destroy it, would be injurious to Mankind of all Ages; to rob our Ancestors of the Memory of their just Praise; and future Ages the Pleasure of so glorious a Sight. Since Things then are thus, consider that one of these two must certainly happen; either you will be conquered or Conqueror in this War. If you be Conqueror, then by destroying the City, you destroy not what is another's, but your own; and by preserving it, you will enjoy the most beautiful Possessions in the World: On the other Side, if you should be vanquished, the preserving the City of Rome will be a great Argument to incline your Conqueror to shew Mercy to you, but if it be destroyed your Affairs will be lost beyond any Hopes of Mercy. And you will not only get no Advantage by doing it, but you will have such a Name from all Mankind, as such a Fact deserves. So it is in your Will to have Fame make her Report of you; for as the Actions of great Men are, so is their Reputation. See the Law of Frederick I. in CONRAD. Abbot of Ursperg, and concerning Frederick Count Palatine, MELANCTHON's Chronide. GROTIUS.
- [12] Ita ad Capuam res compositae, &c. Lib. XXVI. Cap. XVI. Num. 11, 12.
- [13] Troad. Ver. 276. & seq.
- [1] Inde hostem petens milites, &c. Lib. XI. Cap. VI. Num. 1.

[2] Vit. T. Quint. Flamin. p. 371. So Gelimer, and the Vandals under his Command when they besieged Carthage, avoided plundering, and laying waste the Country, preserving it as their own, as PROCOPIUS informs us, Vandalic. Lib. II. init. (Cap. I.) HELMOLDUS has a Reflection to the same Effect: Nonne terra quam devastamus, nostra est; & populus, quem expugnamus, populus noster est? Quare ergo invenimur hostes nostrimet, & dissipatores vectigalium nostrorum? Lib. I. Cap. LXVI. See something of the same Kind in BEMBO, Hist. Lib. IX. (Fol. 149. Ver. 1. Edit. Venet. 1551.) and in PARUTA, Lib. VI. concerning the Germans.

[3] HERODOT. Lib. I. Cap. LXXXVIII.

[4] Phoeniss. (sive Thebaid.) Ver. 558. & seq. Edit. Gronov.

[5] Nullum desperationis illorum magis indicium esse, quam quod urbes, quod agros suos urerent: Quidquid non corrupissent hostium esse confessi. Lib. IV. Cap. XIV. Num. 2.

[6] In bello non congredi [Philippum] aequo campo, &c. Lib. XXXII. Cap. XXXIII. Num. 11, 12.

[1] Lib. I. Cap. LXXXI.

[2] Lib. II. Cap. XXXVI. p. 86. Edit. H. Steph. Cap. XL. p. 88.

[3] Cyrop. Lib. V. Cap. IV. § 13. Edit. Oxon.

[4] Stratag. (Lib. III. Cap. X. Num. 9.) PLUTARCH says the same Thing of the Megarians, Quaest. Graec. (XVII. p. 295. B.) Totilas, when he marched to besiege Rome, hurt none of the Peasants of Italy: On the contrary he commanded them to till the Land as before, paying him the ordinary Contributions. PROCOPIUS. Gotthic. Lib. III. Cap. XIII. CASSIODORUS says, it is the highest Praise to those who defend a State by Arms, to act in such Manner during a War, that the Husbandmen should not discontinue their Labours in the Field: Defensorum maxima laus est, &c. Var. Lib. XII. Cap. V. GROTIUS.

[5] Oeconomic. Lib. II. p. 507. A. Vol. II. Edit. Paris.

[6] See the Canon cited at the End of § 10. in the preceding Chapter.

[7] Besides the Advantage of Agriculture, Regard was had also to the Interest of the Revenue, which required, that the Debtors to it should not be rendered incapable of paying the Taxes in due Time: Exsequutores, a quocumque iudice dati, ad exigenda debita ea quae civiliter poscuntur, servos aratores, aut boves aratorios, aut instrumentum aratorium, pignoris causa de possessionibus non abstrahant, ex quo tributorum illatio retardatur. Cod. Lib. VIII. Tit. XVII. Quae res pignori obligari possunt, &c. Leg. VII. See CUJAS, Observ. IV. 20.

[8] AELIAN. Var. Hist. Lib. V. Cap. XIV. See also COLUMELLA, De Re Rust. Lib. VI. Princ. PORPHYRIUS, De non esu Animal. Lib. II. (p. 173, & seq.) This was also the Custom in Peloponnesus, as VARRO informs us, De Re Rustica. Lib. II. (Cap. V.) In regard to the Romans, see PLINY, Hist. Natur. Lib. VIII. Cap. XLV. VEGETIUS, De arte Veterinaria, Lib. III. GROTIUS.

[1] Mittunt Rhodii ad Demetrium, &c. AUL. GELL. Noct. Attic. Lib. XV. Cap. XXXI. See PLINY upon this Head, Hist. Natur. VII. 38. XXXV. 10. and PLUTARCH. Vit. Demetr. (p. 898. E.) The Letter of Belisarius, which we have given above, § 2. Note 11. includes the same Thought. GROTIUS.

[2] The Passage will be cited below, at the End of § 7.

[3] Itaque aedificiis omnibus, &c. In Verr. Lib. IV. Cap. LIV.

[4] Apud eos autem quos, &c. Ibid. Cap. LX.

[a] Ch. 5. of this Book. § 2.

[1] It is, according to POLYBIUS, a Sign of excessive Folly to insult the Divinity, because you are angry with Men. Excerpt. Peiresc. That Author is in the Right: For, as the Emperor Alexander Severus said, it were better to pay the Divinity a religious Worship, whatever it be, in a Temple, than to give the Place to People, who make a Victualling-house of it: Quum Christiani quemdam locum, qui publicas fuerat occupassent, contra Popinarii dicerent, sibi cum deberi, rescripsit, Melius esse, ut quomodocunque illic Deus colatur, quam Popinariis dedatur. LAMPRID. Alex. Sever. (Cap. XLIX.) The famous Hannibal spared the Temple of Diana at Saguntum, out of Respect for Religion: Cui [Templo Dianae Sagunti] pepercit religione inductus Hannibal, &c. PLINY, Hist. Natur. Lib. XVI. Cap. XL. APPIANUS Alexandrinus makes Brutus say, that it was the Custom of the Romans to leave even their foreign Enemies the Temples of their Gods. De Bell. Civ. Lib. III. (p. 516. Edit. II. Steph.) PLUTARCH relates, that the Amphyctyons objected to Sylla's Manner of treating them, the Moderation of Flaminius, Manius Aquilius, and Paulus Aemilius, the first of whom, when he had drawn Antiochus out of Greece, and the two others, after having conquered the Kings of Macedonia, not only spared the Grecian Temples, but adorned and enriched them with magnificent Presents. Vit. Syll. (p. 459. C. D.) The same Author praises Agesilaus for a like Respect to sacred Places: And before him, the Latin Author, who had writ the Life of that famous King of Lacedaemonia, affirms the same of him, and also that he held it Sacrilege to hurt those who had taken Refuge in Temples, and there by implored the Protection of the Gods: Tamen ante tulit irae religionem.— Itaque praedicabat, mirari se, non sacrilegorum numero haberi, qui supplicibus Deorum nocuissent; aut non gravioribus poenis adfici, qui religionem minuerent, quum qui fana spoliarent. [CORNELIUS NEPOS, Agesil. Cap. IV.] See also VITRUVIUS, De Architect. Lib. II. (Cap. VIII.) DION CASSIUS, Lib. XLII. PLUTARCH, Vit. Caesar. (p. 720.) J. BRODAEUS, Miscell. Lib. V. (Cap. XXIX.) Gabaon, King of the Moors, tho' a Pagan, disproved the Conduct of the Vandals, who profaned the Churches of the Christians, and made them make Amends for their Irreverence. He hoped, that the Impiety of those People would be punished by the God of the Christians, whoever he were; as PROCOPIUS informs us, Vandalic. Lib. I. (Cap. VIII.) Chosroez, King of Persia, tho' no more a Christian than the other, spared the Church of the Christians at Antioch. Idem, Persic. Lib. II. (Cap. IX.) The Emperor Justinian, having found amongst the Spoils taken from the Vandals, the Things, which Vespasian had formerly taken out of the Temple at Jerusalem, and Gizerich had afterward carried from Rome into Africa, did not dare to keep them, and sent them back to Jerusalem to be placed in the Church of the Christians. Idem, Vandalic. Lib. II. (Cap. IX.) The Rabbi BENJAMIN, in his Itinerary, relates the Respect which the Mahometans have retained for the Place where the Bones of Ezechiel, and the three Companions of Daniel were buried. GROTIUS.

I do not find in any Part of POLYBIUS, the exact Words cited by our Author in the beginning of this Note. But there is the same Sense in two Passages of the Excerpta Peiresciana, p. 66. and 169.

[2] Lib. IV. Cap. XCVII.

[3] Templis tamen Deum (ita enim edictum ab Rege fuerat) temperatum est, Lib. I. Cap. XXIX. in fin.

[4] Punic. Lib. XIII. Ver. 316. & seq. Edit. Drakenborg.

[5] Et obstringere religione Populum, &c. Lib. XLII. Cap. III. Num. 9.

[b] Geogr. l. 4. p. 188. Ed. Par. Casaub.

[6] DIOD. SICUL. Lib. XIX. Cap. LXXII. p. 705. Edit. H. Steph.

[7] Testantur hoc Martyrum loca, & Basilicae Apostolorum, quae in illa vastatione urbis ad se confugientes, suos, alienosque receperunt. Huc usque cruentus saeviebat inimicus: Ibi accipiebat limitem trucidationis furor: Illo ducebantur a miserantibus hostibus quibus, [qui must undoubtedly be read in this Place: For St. AUSTIN distinguishes between those, who were moderate, and the less merciful; and OROSIUS, who relates the same Fact, Lib. VII. Cap. XXVIII. confirms this manner of reading:] Etiam extra illa loca pepercerant, ne in eos incurrentes, qui similem misericordiam non haberent: Qui tamen ipsi alibi truces, atque hostili mare saevientes: Posteaquam ad loca illa veniebant, ubi fuerat interdictum, quod alibi jure belli licuisset, tota saeviendi refranabatur immanitas, & captivandi cupiditas frangebatur. De Civit. Dei. Lib. I. Cap. I. ISIDORUS has copied this Passage in Chronic. Gotth. upon the Year 447. The Fact happened under Alarick, an Arian Prince, of whom CASSIODORUS has preserved another memorable Action, by which he signalized himself upon the same Occasion. It was this; when the consecrated Vessels taken out of the Church of St. Peter were brought to him; he asked what they were, and upon being informed, he ordered them to be carried back into the Church by the same Persons, who had taken them out of it: Nam, quum Rex Alaricus, &c. Var. Lib. XII. Cap. XX. GROTIUS.

If GRONOVIVS may be believed, whose Note the Reader may see, there is nothing to be corrected in the Passage of St. AUSTIN.

[8] The Goths, who besieged Rome under King Vitiges, spared also the same Churches, as PROCOPIUS informs us, Gotthic. Lib. II. Cap. IV. Even the Barbarians, not Christians, found an Asylum in these sacred Places. See ZOSIMUS, Lib. IV. Cap. XL. in regard to the Tomitani. The Swiss have a good Law upon this Head, recited by SIMLAR, De Rep. Helvet. (p. 302. Edit. Elzevir.) See also NICETAS, in the History of the Emperor Alexis Comnenus, (Cap. IV.) and the Place where that Historian blames the Sicilians for having profaned the Churches of Antioch. In Andronic. (Cap. IX.) GROTIUS.

[1] Nam summam esse rationem, quae pro religione facit. Digest, Lib. XI. Tit. VII. De Religiosis & sumptibus funerum, &c. Leg. XLIII.

[2] Ver. 95. & seq.

[3] PHILOSTRAT. De Vit. Apoll. Tyan. (Lib. V. Cap. XVI. Edit. Olear.) Thus DIODORUS SICULUS explains another antient Fable in this Manner, I mean that of Epopheus. GROTIUS.

It was in the Excerpta, published by HENRY DE VALOIS, our Author found the Passage he speaks of. But the Fable, which the Historian explains, is not there: He only relates that Epopheus, King of Sicyone, destroyed Temples and Altars: And he calls that, making War upon the Gods. The Passage is: Ὅτι Ἐπωπεὺς βασιλεὺς, &c. p. 221.

[4]

Praecipue quum sacrilegus [Hannibal] face miscuit arces Ipsius

[Herculis]

Sylv. Lib. IV. Sylv. VI. Ver. 82. Our Author, who does not mark the Place from whence he took these Words, probably quoting by Memory, changes arces into aras, and makes the Poet say: Deum face miscuit aras.

[5] De Bell. Punic. p. 83. Edit. II. Steph.

- [6] Lib. XLII.
- [7] The Passage has been cited above, Chap. V. of this Book, § 2. Note 2.
- [8] A little before: Quae [aedes Minervae] ab eo [Verre] sic spoliata atque direpta est, non ut ab hoste aliquo, qui tamen in bello, religionis & consuetudinis jura retineret, sed ut a barbaris praedonibus vexata esse videatur. In Verr. Lib. IV. Cap. LV.
- [9] Quod contigisse Brenno dicitur, ejusque Gallicis copiis, quum fano Apollonis Delphici nefarium bellum intulisset. De Divinat. Lib. I. Cap. XXXVII.
- [10] Qui [Pyrrhus] quum ex Sicilia rediens Locros classe praeterveheretur, inter alia foeda—facinora—thesauros quoque Proserpinae intactos ad eam diem, spoliavit—Quae tantâ clade edoctus, tandem Deos esse superbissimus Rex, pecuniam omnem conquistam in thesauros Proserpinae referri jussit, Lib. XXIX. Cap. XVIII. Num. 4, 6.
- [11] Lib. XIV. (Cap. LXIV. p. 430. Edit. H. Steph.)
- [12] Adeo omnia simul divina humanaque jura polluerit, ut priore populatione cum infernis Diis, secunda cum Superis, bellum nefarium gesserit. Lib. XXXI. Cap. XXX. Num. 4. In Deos superos inferasque nefanda ejus scelera, &c. Ibid. Cap. XXXI. Num. 3. Praebuit huic furori materiam, &c. Cap. XXVI. Num. 11.
- [13] Quum ille [Philippus] ultra jus victoriae in templa, aras, & Sepulcra ipsa saeviret, (Lib. II. Cap. VII. Num. 4.) POLYBIUS relates, and at the same Time condemns in the strongest Terms, a like Action of Prusias, King of Bithynia. The Passage is in SUIDAS, at the Word ΠΡΟΥΣΙΑΣ, and in the Excerpta Peiresciana, (p. 169. Edit. Paris. p. 1468. Edit. Amstel.) GROTIUS.
- [14] Lib. V. Cap. XI.
- [1] Lib. I. Cap. LXXXII.
- [2] XENOPH. Hist. Graec. Lib. IV. (Cap. VI. § 13. Edit. Oxon.) PLUTARCH also mentions this in his Life of Agesilaus, (p. 608. B.) GROTIUS.
- [3] JUVENAL viii. 124.
- [4] Et non omnia concremari tecta, &c. Lib. V. Cap. XLII. Num. 2.
This is an Imitation of the Passage in THUCYDIDES, cited in Note 1. of this Paragraph, as MATTHIAS BERNEGER pretends in his Observationes Miscellae, published at Strasburgh in 1669. Obs. XII. where he says many Things, and alledges many Authorities entirely the same as in this Place, without however quoting our Author, who had writ long before him.
- [5] In Tarentino domum agro pacatum, &c. Lib. XXIV. Cap. XX. Num. 10.
- [6] Lib. XLIX. p. 472. D. E. Edit. H. Steph.
- [7] Strateg. Lib. III. Cap. X. § 9.
- [8] Vit. Flamin. p. 371. D.
- [9] Auspiciis Imperatoris Caesaris Domitiani, &c. Strateg. Lib. IV. Cap. III. Num. 14.
- [10] Praecepta in avaritiam & crudelitatem, &c. Lib. XXVI. Cap. XXXVIII. Num. 3, 4.
- [11] This the Orator AESCHINES informs us: De male obita legat. p. 262. A. Edit. Basil. 1572.

[12] See PLUTARCH, in the Life of that famous Conqueror, p. 671. B.

[1] See the Opinion of Pope Innocent related by BEMBO, Hist. Lib. I. GROTIUS.

This was Pope Innocent VII. whose Nuncio's declared in his Name at Trent, that the Emperor Sigismund, having been the Aggressor in the War with the Grisons, and the Venetians at great Expences to support that War; the latter had a Right to keep two Forts, which they had taken from the Emperor: But however, that the Holy Father prayed the Senate of Venice, that they would consent to restore those Places, to avoid giving Occasion for a Rupture between the Emperor and the Holy See, &c. Hist. Venet. Lib. I. Fol. 12. Edit. Venet. 1551.

[2] The Romans condemned Prusias, King of Bithynia, not only to make Attalus, King of Pergamus amends, but to pay him a Sum of Money, by way of Penalty. APPIAN. Alexand. De Bell. Mithridat. (p. 172, 173. Edit. H. Steph.)

[a] Chap. 2. of this Book.

[3] See above, B. II. Chap. XI. Num. 5.

[4] We have shewn above, Chap. II. of this Book, § 2. Note 1. that this is founded upon Reasons independent of this Consent of Nations, which is supposed, but not proved.

[1] These Reasons would only prove, that so much Rigour ought not to be used with regard to the Subjects for the latter as the former Sort of Debt. For if there be any just War merely penal, as our Author acknowledges there is, and that in such War, there be no Means of getting Satisfaction for the Offence received, or the Crime committed, without having recourse to the Effects of the Subjects themselves, who have no Share in it, and without keeping those Effects; I see no Reason, why the Subjects in that Case should not answer for the Fact of the State, as well as upon Refusal of what is Due, for Instance, by Virtue of a Treaty. The Reasons, which I have alledged elsewhere, founded upon the Constitution itself of Civil Societies, (Chap. II. of this Book, § 2. Note 1.) subsist in this Case in all their Force, and that without having Occasion for a tacit Consent of Nations.

[a] Ch. 2. § 3. of this Book.

[2] But even by seizing these Persons, it was supposed at least, that the State might render itself culpable by a Refusal to do Justice, without which it would not have been necessary to have proceeded so far. Besides, when the State had actually refused to punish or deliver up the Murderer, and had thereby rendered itself worthy of Punishment, without doubt the Persons, who had been seized on that Account, were not released: Otherwise to what Purpose would they have been seized? Why then might the Liberty of the Subjects be answerable for the Crime of the State, rather than their Effects? Are the latter dearer to them than the former? It is in vain to say, that the Subjects were only deprived of their Liberty for a Time, that is, till the State had done what it ought. For it might easily happen, that the Prisoners might die before that: And it will be said also, in regard to Goods, that they are seized till the State has made, either out of its own Effects or otherwise, a Satisfaction answerable to the Punishment it deserves.

[1] Ea, quae Legato magna ad pacem impetrandam videbantur, parva Romanis visa. Nam & impensam, quae in bellum facta esset, omnem praestare Regem aequum censebant; cujus culpa bellum excitatum esset. Lib. XXXVII. (Cap. XXXV. Num. 8.) POLYBIUS mentions this, Excerpt. Legat. XXIII. The People of Asia were condemned to the same Thing by Sylla, as APPIANUS ALEXANDRINUS relates, De Bell. Mithridat. (p. 213. Edit. H. Steph.) The King of Poland alledges this Custom in his Favour. THUANUS, Hist. Lib. LXXIII. upon the Year 1591. The Scholiast of HOMER explaining wherein the Amends demanded by the Greeks from the Trojans for the Expences of the War consisted, makes it the Moiety of the Riches of the City. In Iliad. Lib. III. (Ver. 286.) GROTIUS.

[2] Impenas belli lege justa suscepturus [Perseus] Lib. XXXIII. Cap. I. Num. 5. So our Author cites this Passage, I know not from what Edition: For all that I have seen say without any Variety of Reading whatsoever: Lege VICTI. That is to say, according to the Condition generally imposed on the Conquered by the Victor.

[3] Lib. I. Cap. CXVII. Edit. Oxon.

[1] Etiam quum istud periculum est Sponsoris, miserabile est: Bonitate labitur, humanitate conturbat. [Declam. CCLXXIII.] The same Author adds, that the Creditor cannot, with Honesty, sue a Surety, unless there is no Means of recovering the Debt from the Principal himself. Non enim aliter, salvo pudore, ad Sponsorem, venit Creditor, quam si recipere a Debitore non possit. He has Reason for saying, salvopudore, with Honesty; for as CICERO observes, there is a Kind of Shame and Dishonour in suing a Surety. Esti Sponsores adpellare, videtur habere quamdam, δυσωπίαν. Lib. XVI. Epist. ad Attic. XV. GROTIUS. What our Author observes here is the more proper, as, in CICERO's and QUINTILIAN's Time, the Creditor could chuse whether he would sue the Security or the Principal first. But the Emperor Justinian abolished that Permission, and decreed in his Novel. IV. Cap. I. that the Surety should not be proceeded against, except in Default of the principal Debtor. See the Julius Paulus of Mr. NOODT, Chap. XI. where he cites several Examples of this Kind.

[2] Ptolemy having gained a Victory over Demetrius, the Son of Antigonus, sent back his Tent, and the rest of his Baggage, with the Money also which he had taken from him, telling him, that their Dispute was for Empire and Glory, and not for every Kind of Things. This PLUTARCH relates, in the Life of Demetrius, (p. 891. A. The last Words of which Passage are cited above, in Chap. XI. of this Book, § 6. Num. 2.) See also what Sancho King of Navarre did, in MARIANA, Hist. Lib. XI. Cap. XVI. GROTIUS.

[3] XENOPHON, De Cyri Instit. Lib. VII. Cap. V. § 26. Edit. Oxon.

[4] Et TREBATIUS ait agrum, qui hostibus devictis ea conditione concessus sit, ut in civitatem veniret, habere adluvionem, neque esse limitatum, &c. Digest, Lib. XLI. Tit. I. De adquir. rerum Domin. Leg. XVI. The Lands spoken of in this Passage, were not purely and simply restored, but upon Condition of paying a certain Tribute, which was exacted from the Body of the conquered State, and not from every individual; for which Reason the Lands are said to be given to the State. See the Notes of the late Mr. GOES upon the Auctores Rei Agrariae, p. 198.

[5] Item si forte ager fuit, &c. Digest. Lib. VI. Tit. I. De Rei vindicat. Leg. XV. § 2. It relates to some private Persons, to whom this Mark of Distinction was given, when the Rest of the Lands were divided amongst the Soldiers. An antient Author speaks of it thus, Nec tamen omnibus personis victis ablatis sunt agri: Nam quorundam dignitas aut gratia, aut amicitia, victorem ducem movit, ut eis concederat agros suos. SICULUS FLACCUS, De conditionib. agror. p. 16. Edit. Goes. See CUJAS, upon the Law here quoted, Recit. in Digest, p. 278, 279. Edit. Fabrott.

[6] APPIANUS ALEXANDRINUS says in general, that the antient Romans acted in this Manner, with Regard to their conquered Enemies. De bell. Civil. Lib. II. (p.516. Edit. H. Steph.) We find in History, that the Vandals observed the same Maxim in Africa, and the Goths in Italy. GROTIUS.

[a] Chap. 12. of this Book. § 4. Num. 3.

[a] Chap. II. of this Book, § 4. & seq.

[1] (P. 714. Edit. Basil. 1572.) Alexander the Great, that Prince's Son, when he took the City of Thebes, excepted out of the Number of Prisoners that were to be made Slaves, the Priests, and such as had not given their Consent to the publick Ordinances made against him. Which PLUTARCH tells us in his Life, (p. 670. E.) GROTIUS.

[1] There is here, in the Original: Sed primum notandum est, &c. In the first Edition this was annexed to Num. 2. of the preceding Paragraph; the Author added afterwards what follows, without observing, that he had left a Connection here, which did not agree to what was put between. This I have altered, and take Notice of it, as an Instance of the small Amendments it was necessary to make in several Places, which it would have been too tedious to specify.

[2] See the foregoing Chapter, § 1, and 2.

[3] Servi poenae. A Term of the Roman Law, for which this is the Reason and Foundation. It was of old the Privilege of all the Roman Citizens, as such, not to be deprived either of their Lives or Liberty, but by their own Consent. The Abuse of this Privilege, having produced great Licentiousness and horrible Disorders, Means were found to elude it by a Fiction of Right. When a Roman Citizen had committed a Crime that merited Death, or some other Punishment, amounting to a Privation of Liberty, he was not condemned as a Citizen, but before Condemnation declared to be no longer a Citizen; he was considered as a Slave, and had the Sentence executed upon him accordingly. See the Probabilia Juris of Mr. NOODT, Lib. III. Cap. XII. and the Observations of GRONOVIVS, Lib. I. Cap. VIII. p. 77. & seq.

[4] PLUTARCH, Apophthegm. [p. 234. C. Vol. II. Edit. Wech.] PHILO the Jew, speaking of those who have fallen into the Hands of Pirates, or have been taken by the Enemy, says, that the Laws of Nature, superior to those established amongst Men, declare such Persons free, tho' a Father or a Son are obliged to ransom them: (Lib. Quod omnis Probus liber, p. 870. E. Edit. Paris.) Thus THEODECTES, an antient Poet, makes Helen say,

Θεῶν ἄπ' ἀμφοῖν ἐκγόνων ἑιζωμάτων

Τίς ἂν προσειπέιν ἀξιώσειν λάτριν.

*Dared they presume to call a Woman Slave,
On both Sides sprung from Gods — — —*

GROTIUS.

These two Verses are preserved in ARISTOTLE, Politic. Lib. I. Cap. VI. But they should be read in the Beginning, Θεῶν δ' ἄπ', &c. according to the Paris Edition, and that of DANIEL HEINSIUS.

[5] Orat. Plataic. p. 300. A. Edit. H. Steph.

[6] Servus, ut placet CHRYSIPPO, perpetuus mercenarius est. DeBenefic. Lib. III. Cap. XXII.

[7] That is to say, no Regard was had to the Years which had elapsed since the Slave had sold himself, because the Slave was deemed to have gained by his Work for his Master's Benefit, the Value of what his Master had given him for that Time: So that no more was reckoned than what the Slave might gain in the Years to come, till the Sabbatical Year, or Jubilee, which restored Slaves to their Liberty, without their being obliged to pay any Thing. In like Manner as Lands returned to their antient Owners, in the Year of Jubilee, if the Person, who had sold his Field, would redeem it before that Time, as he might, the Value of the Produce only for the Years which remained to the Jubilee, was reckoned. See the Passages cited in the Text.

[8] Chap. X. of this Book, § 1. Num. 3.

[9] Apud STOBÆUM, Tit. I. XII. Some learned Men are for reading δοῦλος ἦ, and in the second, ἔσθ' ἄνθρωπος, &c.

[10] Servi sunt? Immo homines. Servi sunt? Immo contubernales. Servi sunt? Immo humiles amici. Servi sunt? Immo conservi, si cogitaveris tantumdem in utrosque licere fortunæ. Epist. XLVII. init.

[11] Et ut primum de servis loquamur, jocone an serio putas, esse hominum genus, quod Dii immortales, nec cura sua, nec providentiâ, dignentur? An forte servos in hominum numero esse non pateris? Saturn. Lib. I. Cap. XI. The Reader may see the Rest of the Chapter, in which the Author expatiates very much upon this Subject.

[12] Lib. VII. Cap. XIV. There is the same Thought in the Letter of St. BARNABAS, where he says, that he who treats his Slave with Cruelty, shews, in doing so, that he does not fear him who is the God of both. GROTIUS.

[13] Paedagog. Lib. III. Cap. XII. p. 307. Edit. Oxon. Potter.

[14] The Author of Ecclesiasticus, Cap. XXXII.

[1] It is not as Master that he has this Power of Life and Death, but as Father of a Family. The reciprocal Engagement, which there is between the Master and the Slave, does not imply this of itself, whether the Slave has sold his Liberty, or has been deprived of it by a Consequence of the Right of War. The perpetual Service, to which the Prisoner of War engages himself, is a sufficient Reward for the Life which the Conqueror spares. The Consent of the Slave, either tacit or express, is necessary to the Master's having a Right of Life and Death over him; and this tacit Consent is presumed with Reason, when the Custom is such, as it took Place formerly, not only in the Independence of the State of Nature, where every Father of a Family was a Kind of Sovereign in his own House; but even in Civil Societies, as long as the Laws left to the Masters this Right over their Slaves.

[2] The Passage has been cited already, in Chap. X. of this Book, § 1. Note 8.

[3] Si non dat beneficium Servus Domino; nec Regi quisquam suo, nec Duci suo Miles? Quid enim, interest, qualis quis teneatur imperio, si summo tenetur? De Benefic. Lib. III. Cap. XVIII.

[4] Nam si servo quominus in nomen, &c. Ibid.

[5] Et Domum pusillam Rempublicam esse judicaverunt [majores nostri]. Epist. XLVII.

[6] Nam servus respublica quaedam, & quasi civitas, Domus est, Lib. VIII. Epist. XVI. Num. 2.

[7] Vit. M. Caton. p. 349. A.

[1] These Words, Thou shalt not oppress him, are ill applied. For, in the seventeenth Verse, from which our Author took them, there is, Thou shalt not oppress one another. And this does not regard Slaves, but the perpetual Alienation of Lands, which the Legislator forbids, under any Pretext whatsoever. The Author cited Deuteronomy in this Place also for Leviticus: From whence it appears, that all this was writ hastily in the first Edition, without having ever been corrected in the Revisals of other Editions.

[2] Θεράποντες τύχη μὲν ἐλάττονι — — ἀλλ' ὑπ' ἀκρασίας τῆν ὑπεύθυνον (so it must be read, instead of ἀνεύθυνον) κολαζούσης κατὰ τυραννικῆν δύναμιν. De Legib. Specialib. Lib. II. (p. 728. D. Edit. Paris.) St. CYPRIAN expresses himself very strongly upon this Head; he maintains, that those who exercise so tyrannical an Authority over their Slaves, do not acknowledge GOD for their Lord and Master. Tamen nisi tibi pro arbitrio tuo serviatur; nisi ad voluntatis obsequium pareatur, imperiosus & nimius servitutis exactor, flagellas, verberas, fame, siti, nuditate, ferro frequenter & carcere, affligis, & crucias, & non adgnoscis miser Dominum DEUM tuum, quum sic exerceas ipse in hominem dominatum. Ad Demetrian. (p. 188. Edit. Fell. Brem.) See MOSES DE CORZI, Praecept. Jub. CXLVII. CLXXV. CLXXVIII. and the Comparison between the Roman Laws and the Law of MOSES, Tit. III. PRISCUS, in the Excerptae Legationes, where he prefers the Manners of the Romans of his Time to those of the Barbarians, observes, to the Advantage of the former, that they treated their Slaves with much more Humanity. They behave, says he, towards them, as if they were their Fathers or Preceptors. They only chastise them to prevent their doing any Thing dishonest, according to their Notions, and that as if they were their own Children; for they have not a Power of Life and Death over them, as Masters have amongst the Scythians. Besides, with the Romans, Masters have Power to make their Slaves free, as they often do in different Manners, not only during their Lives, but at their Deaths; that last Will being regarded as a Law. (p. 47. Edit. Hoeschel.) See also the Laws of the Wisigoths, Lib. VI. Tit. I. Cap. XII. GROTIUS.

[3] Numquidnam aequum est, &c. De Clement. Lib. I. Cap. XVI.

[4] Quid enim stultius quam in jumentis & canibus, &c. Ibid. Cap. XVII.

[5] PHILO says, that the Master is hereby punished doubly, as he loses both the Slave's Service, and the Money he gave to purchase it. A third Punishment, adds he, and one still more mortifying than both the former, is the seeing himself compelled to do the greatest Good to a Person whom he hated, and desired perhaps to have Power to distress perpetually. The Slave, on the contrary, is doubly made amends for the Injuries he has suffered, as he not only recovers his Liberty, but is also delivered from the Yoke of so cruel a Master. De legib. special. Lib. II. (p. 808. A. B.) GROTIUS.

[1] See Chap. XIV. of the Letter of the Bishops to King Lewis, inserted in The Capitulary of Charles the Bald. The Athenians treated their Slaves with great Humanity, as XENOPHON observes to their Honour, in his Description of the Republick of Athens. SENECA blames those who work their Slaves too hard, as if they were Beasts of Burden, and not Men. Alia interim crudelia & inhumana praetereo, quod nec tamquam hominibus quidem, sed tamquam jumentis, abutimur, &c. Epist. XLVII. GROTIUS.

[2] Video quam molliter tuos, &c. Lib. V. Epist. XIX. The Verse of HOMER is in the Odyssey, Lib. II. ver. 47. and 234.

[3] Ne illud quidem videtis, &c. Epist. XLVII. This has been copied by MACROBIUS, in the Place already cited, Saturnal, Lib. I. Cap. XI. p. 235. Edit. Gronov. Our Author observed here in a little Note, that EPICURUS called Slaves the Master's Friends, and cites SENECA to prove it, Epist. CVII. But, on the contrary, Friends are put there in Opposition to the Slaves he mentions, who had run away. The Passage is in the Beginning of the Letter, where that Opposition immediately appears, though there is otherwise some Corruption in the Text.

[4] Δεσπότην δὲ οὐχ ὅπως τῶν ἐλευθέρων, &c.

[5] Odyss. Lib. XXI. ver. 215. & seq.

- [6] Sed & gratius nomen, &c. Apologet. Cap. XXXIII.
- [7] Familiam tuam ita rege, &c. Epist. Vol. I. p. 114. Edit. Basil.
- [8] Domestica pax a justis, &c. De Civit. Dei, Lib. XIX. Cap. XVI. What St. AUSTIN says here of the Motives which Religion supplies, he repeats elsewhere, and remarks, that Slaves, for the same Reason, on the other Side ought to obey their Masters with the greater Alacrity. Tu Dominis servos non tam conditionis necessitate, quam officii delectatione doces adhaerere. Tu Dominos servis, summi Dei scilicet, communis Domini, consideratione placabiles, & ad consulendum, quam ad coercendum, propensiores facis. De Moribus Eccles. Catholicae, Lib. I. Cap. XXX. St. CYPRIAN had before laid down as a Maxim, that Masters ought to use their Slaves, when converted to Christianity, with more Favour. Testimon. Lib. III. (§ 82. p. 85.) Which he proves by the Passage in the Epistle of St. PAUL to the Ephesians, vi. 9. LACTANTIUS, speaking of the Equality of Christians, as such; for which Reason they all call one another Brethren; extends that Appellation even to Slaves, who, tho' of a different Condition, in Regard to the Body, are, as to the Mind and Religion, Brothers, even of their Masters; and Servants of one common Lord. Dicet aliquis: Nonne sunt apud vos alii Pauperes, &c. Instit. Divin. Lib. V. Cap. XV. See also ISIDORUS, Pelusiot. Lib. I. Epist. CCCCLXXI. GROTIUS.
- The Passage cited here by our Author, as Saint CYPRIAN's, is only the marginal Summary, which answers to the Citation of the Passage in Saint PAUL.
- [9] Our Author gives this as said upon the famous Verse of VIRGIL, Claudite jam rivos, pueri, &c. Eclog. III. ver. ult. But there is nothing like it there. It is on Eclogue VI. that SERVIUS remarks barely, and without adding any moral Reflection that relates to the present Subject, that Domesticks were called Children. Utrum ergo aetate Pueros an ministros & familiares solemus communiter Pueros vocare? In ver. 14.
- [10] It is ATHENAEUS who relates this, Lib. VI. Cap. XVIII. But the learned GRONOVIVS is of Opinion, that the Word Δωροφόροι signifies rather Donors, or Tributaries, and that their being called so is founded upon the Work which they do, either for their own Masters, or such as hire them, being a Kind of Tribute, which is looked upon as a Present. The grammatical Analogy favours this Explication.
- [11] Frumenti modum Dominus, aut pecoris, aut vestis, ut Colono injungit: Et servus hactenus paret. German. Cap. XXV. Num. 2.
- [12] She says at the same Time, that it is the Means of gaining the Friendship of Domesticks, which is not bought with them: And gives for the Reason of the Humanity with which they ought to be treated, what has been mentioned upon this Head more than once, viz. that Slaves are Men as well as their Masters. Fragment. Pythagoreor. in Opusc. Mythologicis, Phys. Ethic. &c. Amstel. 1688. p. 746, 747.
- [1] Quibus [Servis] non male praecipiant, qui ita jubent uti, ut mercenariis: Operam exigendam, justa praebenda. De Offic. Lib. I. Cap. XIII.
- [2] Oeconomic. Lib. I. Cap. V.
- [3] Familiae male ne sit, ne algeat, ne esuriat. De Re Rustic. Cap. V.
- [4] Est aliquid, quod Dominus praestare servo debeat, ut cibaria, ut vestiarium. De Benefic. Lib. III. (Cap. XXI.) Familia vestiarium petit victumque. De Tranquill. Anim. (Cap. VIII.) The Romans, besieged by the Goths, and pressed by Famine, told Bessas and Conon, who commanded the Army of the Besiegers, "If you would have us surrender ourselves as Prisoners of War, give us Provisions, if not so much as we stand in need of, at least enough to keep us from starving." PROCOPIUS, Gothic. Lib. III. (Cap. XVII.) St.

CHRYSOSTOM considers the Obligation of Masters to provide his Slaves with Food and Cloaths, as a Kind of Servitude; because, if he does not discharge that Engagement, the Slaves are discharged from theirs, and no Law, in such Cases, can compel them to serve. In Eph. v. 2. GROTIUS.

[5] Servi quaternos modios accipiebant frumenti in mensem, & id Demensum dicebatur. In TERENT. Phormion. Act. I. Scen. I. ver. 10.

[6] Those Things, for that Reason, were not deemed to be a Part of the Slaves peculium, which belonged to his Master, tho' the Slave possessed it as distinct Effects, Si vero tunicas, aut aliquid simile, quod ei Dominus necesse habet praestare, non esse peculium. Digest, Lib. XV. Tit. I. De Peculio, Leg. XL.

[7] The Cruelty of the Emperor Isaacus Angelus to the Sicilians, whom he had made Prisoners of War, is also censured by NICETAS, who recites a Letter writ by the King of Sicily to the Emperor, upon that Subject. Vit. Isaac. Ang. Lib. I. Cap. III. GROTIUS.

[8] Et eo perducam servum, &c. De Benefic. Lib. III. Cap. XIX. and XXI.

[9]

*Quod ille unciatim vix de demenso suo
Suum defraudens genium, comparsit miser.*

Phorm. Act. I. Scen. I. ver. 9, 10.

[10] Institut. Lib. IV. Tit. VII. Quod cum eo qui in al. pot. &c. §4. HOMER makes Eumaeus say, that if Ulysses had returned to his House, he would have given him a House, an Inheritance, a desirable Wife, in a Word, every Thing that a good Master could give a faithful and affectionate Domestick.

Ὅς κεν' ἔμ' ἐνδυκέως, &c.

Odyss. Lib. XIV. (ver. 62. & seq.) Ulysses himself makes a like Promise to Eumaeus, and the other Shepherd Philoetius, Lib. XXI. (ver. 214, 215.) VARRO advises Masters to treat their Slaves with Humanity, to supply them plentifully with Food and Raiment, to give them Relaxation from Labour, and suffer them to feed some Cattle of their peculium, in their Grounds, in Order to encourage them to work with the more Zeal. Studiosiores ad opus fieri, &c. (De Re Rustic. Lib. I. Cap. XVII.) GROTIUS.

The learned Civilian FRANCIS HOTMAN observes, that the Word Peculium is derived from the Custom of giving Slaves some Herd to feed, as their own Property, Riches consisting at first in Cattle. And he cites upon it, (Comm. in Tit. Digest, De Pecul. § 2.) this other Passage of VARRO. Tu, inquit, tibicen non solum adimis Domino pecus, sed etiam Servis Peculium, quibus Domini, dant ut pascant, &c. De Re Rustic. Lib. I. Cap. II.

[11] See above, B. I. Chap. III. § 4. Num. I.

[12] Peculium dictum est, quasi pusilla pecunia, seu patrimonium pusillum. Digest, Lib. XV. Tit. I. De pecul. Leg. V. § 1. Very well: But this Patrimony, according to the Principles of the Roman Law, did not cease to belong entirely to the Master. (Institut. Lib. II. Tit. XII. Quibus non est permissum facere Testament. princ.) The Slave did not possess it by a civil Right. Et Peculium, quod Servus civiliter, quidem possidere non posset, sed naturaliter tenet, Dominus creditur possidere. Digest, Lib. XLI. Tit. II. De adquir. vel amitt. Possessione, Leg. XXIV. And he might make himself guilty of Theft, in Regard to his own Stock: Quum autem Servus rem suam peculiarem, furandi consilio amovet—Si alii tradiderit, furtum faciet, Lib. XLVII. Tit. II. De Furtis, Leg. LVI. § 3. All Acquisitions came also to the Master, Instit. Lib. II. Tit. IX. Per quas personas nobis adquiritur, § 1, 3. So that a Slave is only improperly said sometimes to have a Kind of Patrimony. See the great CUIJAS, in his Work Ad Africanum, Tractat. II. upon Law CVII. § 1. Digest, De Legat. I. Our Author seems here to have had that Passage in View. See also LAURENTIUS PIGNORIUS, De servis, p. 4. Edit. Patav. 1656.

[13] He had just said, that tho' the Peculium and Person itself of the Slave, belonged to the Master, the Slave, however, might make his Master a Present, Num quid dubium est, &c. De Benefic. Lib. VII. Cap. IV.

[14] Si quod Dominus servo, &c. Digest. Lib. XII. Tit. VII. De conditione indebit. Leg. LXIV.

[a] Dion. Halic. Antiq. Rom. l. 2. c. 10.

[15] The Example of Contributions for the Portion of a Daughter, or the Ransom of a Son taken Prisoner, is indeed confirmed in Regard to Clients, by the Authority of DIONYSIUS HALICARNASENSIS, in the Place quoted in the Margin: But in Relation to Slaves, I am very much mistaken if our Author had any other Authority than what we read in the Scene of a Comedy in TERENCE, from which he has cited something before, Note 9. We there see a Slave makes a Present to the Bride his Master's Son had married, out of his Savings. He that speaks, who is himself a Slave, believes, that his Friend will be obliged to do as much when his Mistress shall be brought to bed, on the Child's Birth-Day, and that of his being initiated in certain Mysteries.

Nam herilem filum ejus duxisse audio
Uxorem: Ei, credo, munus hoc conraditur.
 * * * * *
 — — — Porro autem Geta
Ferietur alio munere, ubi hera pepererit:
Porro autem alio, ubi erit puero natalis dies,
Ubi initiabunt, &c.

Phormio, Act. I. Scen. I. ver. 5, 6, 12. & seq. For the Rest, I am surprized that our Author forgot one Thing in this Place, which makes very much for his Subject; that is, that amongst the Romans, a Slave might ransom himself by an Agreement with his Master, to whom he gave, as the Price of his Liberty, either what he had laid up by his Savings, or received from the Liberality of others, or got in any other Manner. This Custom was introduced early, as SENECA not only speaks of it, (Peculium suum, quod compararunt ventre fraudato, pro capite numerant, &c. Epist. LXXX.) but there are also Proofs of it in PLAUTUS, (Aulul. Act. V. ver. 8, 9. Casin.) Act. II. Scen. V. ver. 6. & seq. Rudent. Act. IV. Scen. II. ver. 23, 24.) The Emperors Marcus Antoninus and Verus, confirmed afterwards the Validity of such a Convention, in giving the Slave Power to complain juridically, and obliging the Master to infranchise him; in Default of which the Slave was declared free, as appears by the Digest, Lib. V. Tit. I. De judiciis, Leg. LIII. and LXVII. Lib. XL. Tit. I. De manumissionibus, Leg. IV. V. &c. See JACOBUS RAEVARDUS, In divers. Reg. Juris, Leg. XVI. (p. 174. & seq. Edit. Wechel. 1622.) JUSTUS LIPSIUS, upon TACITUS, Annal. Lib. XIV. Cap. XLII. CUIJAS, Recit. in Digest. Vol. IV. Opp. Edit. Fabrott. p. 164. and the President BRISSON, De Formulis, Lib. VI. p. 559.

[16] Alterum, quum permitto, &c. Lib. VIII. Ep. XVI.

[b] B. ii. ch. 5. § 30.

[17] See POLLUX, Lib. VII. § 13. and the Commentators upon it.

[18] Nam Antoninus consultus a quibusdam Praesidibus provinciarum de his servis qui ad Aedem sacram, vel ad statuam principum confugiunt, praecipit, ut si intolerabilis videatur saevitia Dominorum, cogantur servos suos bonis conditionibus vendere.—Sed & Dominorum interest, ut auxilium contra saevitiam, vel famem, vel intolerabilem injuriam, denegetur iis, qui juste deprecantur. Ideoque cognosce de querelis eorum, &c. Institut. Lib. I. Tit. VIII. De his qui sui vel alieni juris, § 2.

[19] Sed postea quam Jure Gentium Servitus invasit, sequutum est beneficium manumissionis. Digest, Lib. I. Tit. I. De Justit. & Jure, Leg. IV.

[20] (Andr. Act. I. Scen. I. ver. 10, 11.) I read servibas in these Verses, after the Manuscripts, and not serviebas. VARRO informs us, that in Feronia's Grove the Romans used to say to their Slaves, Let those who have deserved well, sit down Slaves and rise up Freedmen. It was customary in some Places to give Slaves their Liberty, when they had earned eight Times as much as they had cost their Masters. GROTIUS.

What our Author observes here upon VARRO's Authority, he certainly had from SERVIUS: But that Grammarian says it of his own Head, in speaking of the Goddess Feronia's Temple at Terracina: For she was the Goddess of Freedmen, and there was there a Stone Seat, where the Slaves were made to sit down, when the Cap was given them, as a Sign of their being made free. The Words in Question were cut on this Seat. Haec etiam [Feronia] Libertorum Dea est, in cujus Templo raso capite pileum accipiebant. — In hujus Templo Tarracinae sedile lapideum fuit, in quo hic versus incisus erat: BENE MERITI SERVI SEDEANT: SURGANT LIBERI. In Aeneid, VIII. ver. 564. Our Author's Mistake arose, from the Commentator's giving VARRO's Etymology of the Name of the Goddess, immediately after the Passage cited. Quam VARRO libertatem [libertatis should be read] Deam dicit Feroniam quasi Fidoniam. The Reader may see further, concerning this Goddess, the Notes of TORRENTIUS upon HORACE, Lib. I. Sat. V. ver. 24. The learned JAMES GODEFROY, proves from the Passage of SERVIUS, and other Authorities, that amongst the antient Greeks and Romans, the freeing of Slaves was often performed in the Temples consecrated to the false Divinities, and that it was from this Custom the Emperor CONSTANTINE took the Manner of infranchising in Churches, which he established by a Constitution, come down to us. But this great Civilian, (in Cod. Theodos. IV. 7. De Manum, in Eccl. L. unic. p. 355. Vol. 1.) quotes PLUTARCH, in the Life of Publicola, where I can find nothing that makes for the Subject. And in the Citation from LIVY, Lib. II. is quoted probably for Lib. XXII. Cap. I. towards the End. Which may be observed by the Way.

[21] In usu siquidem quotidiano, &c. Ad Eccles. Catholic. Lib. III. p. 413. Edit. Paris. 1645.

[22] Custom interpreted this Law, so that no less than thirty Shekels ought to be given. See the Rabbi MOSES DE COTZI, Praecept. Jubent. LXXXIV. GROTIUS.

[23] In Vit. M. Caton. p. 338, 339. See what follows, where the Reflection is extended, even to Beasts.

[1] Or rather by Virtue of the Convention, express or tacit, which he has made with the Conqueror, for sparing his Life. See what I have said above, Chap. VII. of this Book, § 6. Note 2.

[a] Respons. 16.

[a] See B. ii. ch. 5. § 29.

- [1] That is to say, about ten Crowns of French Money. Our Author has probably taken this from ARISTOTLE, who however does not ascribe this Custom to the Greeks; he gives it only as an Example of Things arbitrary in themselves, which are regulated in a certain Manner, by the Laws and Customs of States, but does not say amongst which it was established. Ethic. Nicomach. Lib. V. Cap. X. And that the Ransom of a Prisoner of War was not fixed at a Mina, according to the Custom of the Greeks, I find a clear Proof in DEMOSTHENES. For, in speaking of some Greeks taken by Philip of Macedon, he says, that one of those Prisoners borrowed for his Ransom three, another five, Minae, and others more or less, according as their Ransom was rated. Orat. de male obit. legation. p. 222. A. Edit. Basil. 1572.
- [2] In the War made by the French against the Spaniards in Italy, the Ransom of an Horseman was a fourth Part of his Year's Pay, but the Captains, and other superior Officers, and Prisoners taken in a Battle, or a Siege, were not included in this Rate. This MARIANA tells us, Lib. XXVII. Cap. XVIII. GROTIUS.
- [3] Quaest. Graec. p. 295. B. Vol. II. Edit. Wechel.
- [4] (De Offic. Lib. I. Cap. XII.) Tiberius, the Christian Emperor, acted with the like Generosity in Regard to the Persians; and MENANDER the Protector praises him for it, (Cap. XVII, p. 141. Edit. Hoeschel.) MARIANA praises Sisebutus for the same Conduct, (Lib. VI. Cap. III.) as also Sancho King of Castile: De rebus Hispanic. Lib. XI. (Cap. V.) GROTIUS.
- [a] Strabo, l. 7.
- [1] Epist. II. Ad Philip. p. 409. Edit. H. Steph.
- [1] Neque victis quidquam, praeter injuriae licentiam, eripiebant, [nostrimajores, religiosissimi mortales] Bell. Catilinar. Cap. XII. Edit. Wass.
- [2] Postremo sapientes, paucis caussa bellum gerunt, laborem spe otii sustentant. Orat. I. ad Caesar. De Reb. ordinand. Cap. XL.
- [3] Politic. Lib. VII. Cap. XV. See also the foregoing Chapter, and Ethic. ad Nichom. Lib. X. Cap. VII.
- [4] Bellum autem ita suscipiatur, ut nihil aliud, nisi pax quaesita videatur, De Offic. Lib. I. Cap. XXIII.
- [5] Fines imperii tueri, magis quam proferre, &c. JUSTIN, Lib. I. Cap. I. Num. 3, 4.
- [6] The Emperor Alexander told Artaxerxes King of Persia, that every Prince ought to be contented with his own Possession, and not undertake a great War, for the Sake of extending his Frontiers. GROTIUS.
This Passage is in HERODIAN, Hist. Lib. VI. Cap. II. Num. 9. Edit. Boecler. I see no Reason for our Author's having put in the Beginning of it, ἐν τοῖς ἰδίοις ὄροις, instead of ἐν τοῖς τῶν ἰδίων ὄροις. The Correction is not at all necessary, admitting our Author had believed the Reading faulty.
- [7]
- [1] Quid hodie esset imperium, nisi salubris providentia victos permiscuisset victoribus? De Ira, Lib. II. Cap. XXXIV.
- [2] At Conditor noster Romulus tantum sapientia valuit, ut plerosque populos eodem die hostes, dein cives, habuerit. Annal. Lib. XI. Cap. XXIV. Num. 7.

- [3] Quid aliud exitio Lacedaemoniis & Atheniensibus, quamquam armis pollerent, nisi quod victos pro alienigenis arcerent? Ibid. Num. 6.
- [4] Vultis, exemplo majorum, augere Rem Romanam, victos in civitatem accipiendo? Lib. VIII. Cap. XIII. Num. 16.
- [5] Gallos Caesar in triumphum ducit, idem in Curiam. This is a Kind of a Song, made by Persons discontented with the Government, as SÜETONIUS informs us, in the Life of Julius Caesar, Cap. LXXX. from which our Author took this Verse.
- [6] Ipsi plerumque Legionibus nostris praesidetes: Ipsi has aliasque provincias regitis. Nihil separatum clausumve. Hist. Lib. IV. Cap. LXXIV. Num. 3.
- [7] In Orbe Romano qui sunt, ex Constitutione Imperatoris Antonini, cives Romani effecti sunt. Digest. Lib. I. Tit. V. De Statu Hominum, Leg. XVII. This was the Emperor Caracalla, and not Antoninus Pius, as is said in Novell. LXXVIII. of JUSTINIAN, Cap. V. nor Marcus Antoninus, to whom AURELIUS VICTOR attributes the Constitution in Question, De Caesaribus, Cap. XV. Num. 13. upon whose Authority GROTIUS seems to determine in Favour of the latter Emperor, in his Sparsiones Florum ad Jus Justinian, p. 75. Edit. Amstel. Neither was it from a Motive of Moderation, or good Policy, that Caracalla made all the Subjects of the Empire, who were Freeman, Citizens of Rome; but to encrease his Finances, by multiplying the Profits and Echeats, which he derived only from Roman Citizens, upon Occasion of several Things that Strangers had no Share in. This the Learned have long ago observed, chiefly from the express Words of DION CASSIUS, Excerpt. Peiresc. p. 744. And after them the late Baron SPANHEIM has exhausted the Subject, in his excellent Work, intituled Orbis Romanus, Dissert. II. Cap. I. & seq.
- [8] Roma communis nostra patria, &c. Digest, Lib. L. Tit. I. Ad Municipalem, &c. Leg. XXXIII.
- [9] In secundum Consulatus Stilichonis. ver. 154, 159.
- [1] Troad. ver. 725. & seq.
- [2] Si vero regnum quoque suum tuto relinqui apud eum potuit, reponique eo unde deciderat: Ingenti incremento surgit laus ejus, qui contentus fuit, ex Rege victo nihil, praeter gloriam, sumere. De Clement. Lib. I. Cap. XXI. The whole Passage is well worthy of being read: Especially what follows immediately, where the Philosopher says, that to act so is to triumph over Victory itself, and to shew, in the most evident Manner, that the Victor found nothing amongst the Vanquished worthy of him. Hoc est etiam ex victoria sua triumphare, testarique, nihil se, quod dignum esset victore, apud victos invenisse. Pompey the Great left Tigranes, King of Armenia, Part of his Dominions, as EUTROPIUS informs us, Brevar. Hist. Roman. Lib. VI. Cap. X. GROTIUS.
- [3] Lib. V. Cap. IX.
- [4] This the Embassadors of Rhodes said to the Roman Senate, Ne alios populos enumerem, Carthago libera cum suis legibus est. LIVY, Lib. XXXVI. Cap. LIV. Num. 25. See what is remarked upon this Liberty, left by the Romans to conquered Kings and States, Book I. Chap. III. § 21. Note 21.
- [5] Bell. Mithridat. (p. 251. Edit. H. Steph.) To understand the Condition of those free States read POLYBIUS, Excerpt. Legat. Num. 9. And SÜETONIUS, in the Life of Julius Caesar, (Cap. XXV.) There are also some Things, well worth reading upon this Head, in FRANCIS GUILLIMAN, De Rebus Helvetiorum, (Lib. I. Cap. VIII.) GROTIUS.

- [6] LIVY, Lib. XXXIII. Cap. XII. Num. 5, and 9.
- [7] Sic Zorsini victo nihil ereptum. Annal. Lib. XII. Cap. XIX. Num. 3.
- [8] Pepin left the Crown to Aistulphus the Lombard. GROTIUS.
 King Pepin had neither in the first nor second Expedition he undertook against Aistulphus, made himself Master of all that the Lombards possessed in Italy. He had only besieged Pavia, the Capital of their Kingdom. It is true, that as he came into Italy, at the Solicitation of Pope Stephen, he was contented with demanding of Aistulphus, by the Treaty of Peace, the Restitution of the Exarchat of Ravenna. See EGINHARD, De vita Caroli Magni, Cap. VI. with the Note of the last Edition; as also the Authors cited by Father DANIEL, Hist. de France, Tom. I. p. 371 & seq. Edit. Amster.
- [1] Or rather by the ten Embassadors, sent by the Romans to conclude a Peace with Philip. Postremo ita decretum est, &c. LIVY, Lib. XXXIII. Cap. XXXI. Num. 2.
- [2] But the same Flaminius afterwards gave up this Article, as POLYBIUS informs us, Excerpt. Legat. Num. 9. and PLUTARCH, Vit. Tit. Q. Flamin. (374.) GROTIUS.
- [1] Simul & illud Asia cogitet, &c. Lib. I. Epist. Ad Quint. frat. I. Cap. XI.
- [2] Nos, quamquam totiens lacessite, &c. Hist. Lib. IV. (Cap. LXXIV. Num. 1, 2.) See what AGATHIAS says, concerning the Custom of the Persians, Lib. IV. (Cap. IX.) GROTIUS.
- [a] B. ii. c. 15. § 7. n. 7.
- [1] Sed difficilium est provincias obtinere, quam facere. Viribus parantur jure retinentur. Lib. IV. Cap. XII. Num. 29.
- [2] Parari singula acquirendo facilius potuisse, quam universa teneri posse. Lib. XXXVII. Cap. XXXV. Num. 6.
- [3] Upon Occasion of Alexander the Great, who after having conquered a great Part of the World, at the Age of thirty-two Years, was in Pain about what he should do afterwards. Apophthegm. p. 207. D. So DION CASSIUS observes, that Augustus was praised for his Moderation, in contenting himself with the Dominions he possessed. GROTIUS.
 The Passage of DION CASSIUS is in Lib. LIII. except the first Words, which our Author adds to it, no Doubt, from quoting by Memory; and which express the Approbation given by the Publick to the Moderation of Augustus. The Historian relates only what that Emperor believed his Duty to do, and the Advice he gave to the Senate upon it. p. 602. C. Edit. H. Steph. But Tiberius, his Successor, praised him for that, amongst other Things, in his funeral Oration, Lib. LVI. p. 684. E. 685. B. See also p. 678. A.
- [4] In the Passage cited by our Author in this Place, and which he takes from QUINTUS CURTIUS, there is not peregrinum imperium, but praegrave, that is to say, too weighty an Empire. Periculosum est praegrave imperium: Difficile est continere, quod capere non possis.—Facilius est, quaedam vincere, quam tueri. Quam hercule expeditius manus nostrae rapiunt quam continent. Lib. IV. Cap. XI. Num. 8, 9. If the Reader desires a greater Number of Authorities to confirm the present Reflection, he may find an ample Collection in the Varii Discursus JANI GRUTERI in aliquot insigniora loca ONOSANDRI atque TACITI, Part I. p. 141, & seq.
- [5] By this Comparison the Indian Philosopher intended to signify, that Alexander ought not to remove from the Midst of his Dominions; for in treading upon the Extremity of the Leather the Motion was occasioned, which ceased when he put his Foot upon the Middle of it. PLUTARCH, Vit. Alexandr. p. 701 E.

[6] Our Author cites nobody here: But he took this Fact from Aristides, which he relates in his Eulogy of Rome. And the Comparison is said there to have been made in another Sense and View: For if the Rhetorician is to be believed, Oebarus used it, to give Cyrus to understand, when tired with travelling so much in his Dominions, that doing so was absolutely necessary, in Order to preserve Tranquillity and good Order; and that, if he contented himself with visiting only some Places, leaving Things to go as they would in others, it would be like treading upon Leather only on one Side, which is thereby kept under, whilst the other Parts of it rise up. Orat. in Romae laudat. p. 353, 354. Vol. I. Edit. Paul Steph. It is true the Panegyrist introduces this on Occasion of the antient Persian Kings, who neither knew how to push nor keep their Conquests in Europe. For the Rest, as I did not remember to have read any where this Saying of Cyrus's Favourite, and the Commentators upon PLUTARCH have not mentioned it, where he speaks of the Indian Philosopher: I should not have thought of looking for it in ARISTIDES, if I had not met with it by Chance, inrunning over the Observationes Historico-Politicae of MICHAEL PICART, formerly Professor at Altorff; in which he has collected (Decad. IV. Cap. VIII.) a great Number of Authorities, to shew that a Prince ought to reside in the Center of his Dominions, to have an Eye upon all Things from thence, and to maintain Order every where.

[7] Caeterum sicut testudinem, &c. Lib. XXXVI. (Cap. XXXII. Num. 6, 7.) PLUTARCH has the same Thought. (Vit. Flamin. p. 378. D.) GROTIUS.

[8] P. 690. E. Vol. II. Edit. H. Steph. The Passage of HESIOD is in his Works and Days. ver. 40.

[9] He says, that he himself was witness to the Embassies of Nations which were rejected. Praefatio.

[10] Qui [Africanus posterior] quum lustrum conderet, &c. VALERIUS MAXIMUS, Lib. IV. Cap. I. (Num. 10.) The Consul Claudianus Julianus, quotes this History, in his Letter to Papianus and Balbinus, (related by CAPITOLINUS, in Maxim. & Balbin. Cap. XVII.) GROTIUS.

[1] Apud STOBÆUM, Serm. XLIII.

[2] Id nuper acciderat, &c. Annal. Lib. VI. Cap. XLII. Num. 3.

[3] They may certainly be very much to his Prejudice, on Account of the particular Genius of every People, and their Attachment to that Form of Government to which they have been accustomed.

[1] Vetere ac jampridem recepta Populi Romani consuetudine, ut haberet instrumenta Servitutis & Reges. Vit. Agricol. Cap. XIV. Num. 2.

[2] Antiochus—inservientium Regum ditissimus. TACITUS, Hist. Lib. II. Cap. LXXXI. Num. 1.

[3] By POLLIO VALERIUS.

[4] Geogr. p. 288. Edit. Paris. Casaub.

[5] Pharsal. (Lib. VII. ver. 228.) See also the Panegyrick in Honour of Maximianus, (Cap. X.) GROTIUS.

[6] That is to say, they judged according to their own Laws, as did most of the People dependent upon the Roman Empire. For the Rest, before Archelaus was banished to Vienna, the compleat Sovereignty was no longer in the Jewish Nation. See the Note of GRONOVIVS upon this Place, and what is said above, Book I. Chap. III. § 22. Note 3.

[7] It was upon those Conditions he concluded Peace. Bibl. Hist. Lib. XV. Cap. VIII. p. 462. Edit. H. Steph. See a little above, in the foregoing Chapter, and same Page.

[8] In the same Manner the Great King, or King of Persia, had other Kings under him, as appears by this Verse of AESCHYLUS, Βασιλεῖς βασιλέως ὑποχοι μεγάλου.

Kings subject to a greater King.

In Persis. There were antiently such Kings, dependent upon other Kings, in Italy, as SERVIUS observes on B. X. of the Aeneid, (ver. 655.) And there are still such amongst the Turks, as LEUNCLAVIUS relates, Lib. XVIII. GROTIUS.

[a] B. i. c. 3. § 17. and B. iii. c. 8. § 3.

[9] See Chap. III. of this Book, § 4. Num. 4. or last.

[1] The Emperor Augustus, as PHILO the Jew observes, was as careful to preserve and confirm the Laws of every Nation, as to maintain those of the Romans. In Legat. ad Cajum. (p. 1014. B. Edit. Paris.) GROTIUS.

Mr. BYNKERSHOEK, in the ninth Chapter of his Dissertation upon the ninth Law of the Digest, De Lege Rhod. (p. 90) is for translating here, instead of The Laws of each People, as our Author renders it, the antient Establishments of each People: But he confesses at the same Time, that this principally regards the Laws. For the Rest, the Reader may see, and examine what the same Author advances in this Chapter; that the Nations, whom the Romans permitted to retain their own Laws, had this Liberty only so far as their Laws included nothing contrary to the Roman Laws.

[2] Habuisse [Apameam] privilegium & vetustissimum morem, arbitrio suo rempublicam administrare. Epist. LVI. The City of Sinope, tho' dependent upon the Persians, was governed democratically, as APPIANUS ALEXANDRINUS informs us, Bell. Mithrid. So the Greeks, after their falling under the Dominion of the Romans, retained a Shadow of their antient Liberty. Quibus [Athenis & Lacedaemoni] reliquam umbram, & residuum libertatis nomen erigere, durum, ferum, barbarumque est. PLINY, Lib. VIII. Epist. XXIV. See also CICERO, Lib. VI. ad Attic. Epist. I. (p. 584. and II. p. 603. Edit. Graevii.) It appears by one of the Epistles of the latter, that the People of Cyprus could not be obliged to quit their Island to appear before any foreign Tribunal. Nam evocari ex insula Cyprios non licet. Lib. V. ad Attic. Epist. XXI. GROTIUS.

What our Author observes in the Beginning of his Note, concerning the City of Sinope; the Historian, whose Authority he uses, says of another City of Pontus, or of that mentioned in the Text, named Amisus. The Passage proves also, what our Author says there of Lucullus, to whom he ascribes the Concession of that Privilege. Λούκουλλος δὲ καὶ Ἄμισσον, &c. APPIANUS ALEXANDRINUS, Bell. Mithrid. p. 228. Edit. H. Steph. As Sinope, and the Sinopians are spoken of in the Beginning, and at the End, of this Passage, our Author, in hastily reading it, did not observe that all the rest of it relates to Amisus. And that this City is meant, appears from its being said, that it had formerly been a Colony of the Athenians; for we find the same Thing in STRABO, Geogr. Lib. XII. p. 547. Edit. Paris. and in the Peripl. ARRIAN. p. 16. Edit. Hudson. Vol. I. Geogr. min. who say nothing of this Kind in Relation to Sinope.

[3] See the Passage referred to in the foregoing Note.

- [1] It is better that they should have some Kind of Religion than none at all; as we have observed above, in giving the Words of the Emperor Severus, (Chap. XII. of this Book, § 6. Note 1.) The Goths declared of old, that they would compel nobody to embrace their Religion. PROCOPIUS, Gothic. Lib. II. (Cap. VI.) GROTIUS.
- [2] De Bell. Jud. Lib. VII. Cap. X. Graec. p. 949. G.
- [3] Provided it be done by lawful Means, that is to say, without having Recourse to Violence, except to oppose those who use it first, to establish or advance their Religion: Otherwise, all Methods but that of Persuasion are unlawful, both by natural Right and revealed divine Right.
- [1] Ad hoc Populo Romano, jam a principe, inopi, melius visum, amicos, quam servos, quaerere; tutiusque rati, volentibus quam coactis, imperitare. (Bell. Jugurth. Cap. CIX. Edit. Wass.) The Lacedemonian Embassadors say in THUCYDIDES, that the Method of extinguishing the Animosity which subsists between two Enemies, is not for the Victor to abandon himself to his Resentment, and to make the utmost of his Superiority over the Vanquished, but to be reconciled with the latter, upon just and reasonable Conditions: For then, being gained by the Victor's Generosity, he believes himself obliged in Honour to shew his Gratitude, and is far from having any Thoughts of violating his Engagements. Lib. IV. (Cap. XIX. Edit. Oxon.) GROTIUS.
- The Collection of GRUTER, already quoted, may be seen again in this Place, Part II. p. 56. & seq. where, upon a Passage of TACITUS, he cites a great Number of Authorities, which confirm the Reflections of our Author.
- [2] Ipsi Britanni delectum, &c. Vit. Agricol. Cap. XIII. Num. 1.
- [3] It is not he who gives this Reason, but the Senate itself, or the Majority of the Senate, who generously took in good Part, and considered as Sentiments worthy of a brave Man, and a Freeman, what some amongst them had censured as too bold, and tending to excite other Nations to Rebellion. Quid si poenam inquit [Consul] remittimus, &c. Lib. VIII. Cap. XXI. Num. 4. & seq. What follows will confirm our Author's Position. Ibi pacem esse fidam, ubi voluntarii pacati sunt; neque eo loco, ubi servitutem esse velint, fidem sperandum esse.
- [a] Chap. 13. of this Book.
- [b] Ch. 10. § 3, &c.
- [1] Traditio nihil amplius transferre debet, vel potest, ad eum, qui accipit, quam est apud eum, qui tradit. Digest, Lib. XLI. Tit. I. De adquir. rer. domin. Leg. XX. princip. See also, Lib. IX. Tit. IV. De noxalibus actionib. Leg. XXVII. § 1.
- [2] Quoniam nemo potest, quod non habet, dare. De Benefic. Lib. V. Cap. XII.
- [3] The Law is cited above, Chap. IX. of this Book, § 16. Note 3.
- [4] 4 He is followed in this by PET. ANT. DE PETRA, De Potestate Principis, Cap. III. Quaest. IV. BRUNINGUIS, De Homagiis, Conclus. CCXLI. GROTIUS.
- [1] Et auget gloriam, &c. Lib. III. Cap. X. Num. 1.
- [2] Praedae pars, sua cognoscentibus, &c. (Lib. IV. Cap. XXIX Num. 4.)
- [3] Biduum ad recognoscendas res datum dominis. [Lib. V. Cap. XVI. Num. 7. where he relates the Defeat of the Tarquinians.]

- [4] Et quod laetissimum, &c. LIVY, Lib. X. Cap. XX. Num. 15.
- [5] Altero exercitu Samnites, &c. Idem. ibid. Cap. XXXVI. Num. 16. & seq.
- [6] Pugnatum haud procul Ilipe, &c. Idem. Lib. XXXV. Cap. I. Num. 11.
- [7] Praeda omnis praeterquam, &c. Idem. Lib. XXIV. Cap. XVI. Num. 5.
- [8] Lib. II. (Cap. XXXI.) GROTIUS.
- [9] Also DIODORUS SICULUS, Excerpt. Peiresc. and VALERIUS MAXIMUS, B. I. Chap. I. Num. 6. Also the Humanity of the last Scipio Africanus, was eminently famous; for when he had taken Carthage, he sent about to all the free Cities of Sicily, that they should, by their Embassadors, fetch back all the Ornaments of their Temples, which the Carthaginians had taken away, and to take Care that they were set up again in their former Places. GROTIUS.
- [10] Etenim ut simul P. Africani, &c. Lib. II. Cap. XXXV.
- [11] Phaneas & pro societate belli, &c. LIVY, Lib. XXXIII. (Cap. XIII. Num. 9. & seq.) Pompey restored Paphlagonia to Attalus and Pylamenes. EUTROPIUS, Breviar. Lib. VI. Cap. XI. By the Treaty of Alliance between the Pope, the Emperor Charles V. and the Republick of Venice, against Solyman it was agreed that each should recover what they had been dispossessed of, as we find in PARUTA's History, Lib. VIII. and, in Vertue of that Clause, the Island of Cephalenia, which had been taken by the Spaniards, was restored to the Venetians. There is also a Passage in ANNA COMNENA to the same Effect, in that Part of her History which treats of GODOFROY, Lib. XI. Cap. VI. GROTIUS.
- [12] STRABO, Geogr. Lib. XIV. p. 642. Edit. Paris.
- [a] B. ii. ch. 10. §9.
- [1] But see what is said in the Place referred to in the Margin, Note 3. The Truth is, that it is proper to distinguish here, whether a Thing taken in an unjust War were honestly bought or not; that is to say, whether the Buyer did or did not know, that the Thing fell into the Seller's Hands, or the Hands of those from whom he had it by such a Title. If the Buyer knew that it did, he possesses it dishonestly, and, in consequence, ought to make a simple and absolute Restitution. If he did not know it, and there was no Reason to suspect it, he has all the Rights of an honest Possessor, and consequently he is not bound to restore, what he believed, and had Reason to believe, was lawfully acquired, without receiving all he had given for it of his own; according to the Principles which I have laid down in the Chapter here referred to, and in that of PUFENDORF, where the same Subject is treated. So that the Whole depends upon knowing, whether, in Case the Buyer was not ignorant that what he bought was taken in a War, he believed, or had Reason to suspect, that the War was unjust.
- [2] Our Author here proceeds imperceptibly to the Application of the Question he treats of, to the Things which the Enemy, from whom they were taken, had himself acquired by Arms in an unjust War. And here it is certain, that tho' in taking such Things from the Enemy, they are known to be the Property of another, that does not lessen our Right to demand a Reimbursement from the antient Proprietor of what it cost us to get Possession of his Effects; that is to say, not only of the Expences of the Expedition, but also the Pains taken, and Dangers incurred, to which we were not obliged to expose ourselves, for the Recovery of another's Goods. But farther, if the Person to whom the Effects belonged, having Opportunity and Means to endeavour their Recovery, remained idle, he is deemed to abandon them, and, in Consequence, the other, who has taken them from the unjust Possessor, then acquires them fully and absolutely. See what I have said above, Chap. VI. of this Book, § 1. Note 2.

[3] This is what the Rabbi JACCHIADES remarks, in his Commentary upon DANIEL, Chap. V. ver. 17. SULPICIUS SEVERUS says, that the Patriarch, after having given the tenth Part of the Booty to Melchisedek, restored the Rest to those from whom it had been taken. Eidemque (Melchisedek) decimas praedae dedit. Reliqua his quibus erepta erant, reddidit. (Hist. Sacra, Lib. I. Cap. VI. Num. 6.) St. AMBROSE, speaking of the same Thing, says, that Abraham was rewarded by GOD, because he would receive no Recompence from Men. Ideoque quoniam sibi mercedem, ab homine non quaesivit, a DEO accepit. De Abrah. Patriarch. Lib. I. (Cap. III.) With this Action of Abraham may be compared something like it done by Pittacus, one of the seven Sages. He refused half of the Lands which the Mitylenians offered him, after they had recovered them under his Conduct. He believed, as VALERIUS MAXIMUS says, that the Greatness of the Spoil, should he accept it, would lessen the Glory of his Exploits. Atque etiam quum recuperati agri—deforme judicans, virtutis gloriam magnitudine praedae minuere. Lib. VI. Cap. I. Num. 1. extern. PLUTARCH, speaking of Timoleon, [who accepted a magnificent House and a fine Estate] observes, that it is not dishonourable indeed to receive in the like Case, but that it is more glorious to refuse such Offers, and argues the highest Degree of an eminent Virtue, which can deny itself those Things which it is lawful to desire. In Vit. Timoleont. (in fin. p. 277. B. Vol. I. Edit. Wechel.) See what we have said above, B. II. Chap. XIV. § 6. and Chap. IV. of this Book, § 2. GROTIUS.

The Author expresses himself here, in the Original of this Note, as if Timoleon had refused, as well as Pittacus, what was offered him: Facta Pittaci & Timoleontis, &c. whereas he did quite the contrary, as I have distinguished by the Words in a Parenthesis; for that Reason I have changed the Turn of Expression, which conveyed a false Idea.

[4] Not that the whole Booty consisted in this, there were also, no Doubt, Things amongst it that belonged to the five Kings.

[1] The banished Saguntines were re-established by the Romans, after six Years Absence. [See LIVY, Lib. XXVIII. Cap. XXXIX.] The Emperor Marcus Antoninus restored those to Liberty, who had been made Slaves during the War with Avidius Cassius; and caused also their Effects to be returned to the antient Proprietors. [CAPITOLINUS, in Marc. Anton. Cap. XXV.] The King of Castile, and other Princes, restored Calatrava to the Knights of that Order, whom the Moors had deprived them of it, as MARIANA relates, in his History of Spain, Lib. XI. (Cap. XXV.) See what has been said above, Chap. X. of this last Book, § 6. GROTIUS.

[2] It was Lysander who commanded their Army at that Time. Hist. Graec. Lib. II. Cap. II. Num. 5. Edit. Oxon.

[3] Si sibi Antiochus pulchrum esse, &c. LIVY, Lib. XXXIV. Cap. LVIII. Num. 10. & seq.

[1] That is to say, when a Thing taken from one Subject of a State, in an unjust War, on the Side of the Enemy who takes the Booty, is fallen into the Hands of another Subject of the same State.

[a] B. ii. ch. 4.

[1] Cum quibus caussas cognovit, &c. CICERO, De Offic. Lib. II. Cap. XXIII. King Ferdinand did the same in Spain, as MARIANA relates, Lib. XXIX. Cap. XIV. GROTIUS.

[2] This is the Conduct an Arbitrator, rather than a Judge, should observe, who, in this Case, is indispensibly obliged to leave Things in the State they are, supposing there be no civil Law to direct his Judgment and Award. But, as the Laws themselves do not always regulate Things, so as to satisfy the Consciences of those who follow their Direction, the principal Question here is to know, what each ought then to do of their own free Will, and without Regard to any other Rules than those of natural Equity. Now when it is supposed, as our Author does, that the Justice of the War is very doubtful, there being no more Reason to regard the Acts of Hostility, as just or unjust, on one Side than the other, Reason requires that they be considered indifferently as just on both Sides, with Regard to the Effects of the Acquisition of Things taken. The Possessor then, as in all other doubtful Cases, has the best Right, and, consequently, those who hold any Thing from him, with a Title lawful in other Respects, may consider themselves as having lawfully acquired it.

[a] B. ii. ch. 2. § 10.

[1] De Exped. Cyr. Lib. II. Cap. III. § 13. Edit. Oxon.

[2] XENOPHON, Hist. Graec. Lib. III. Cap. I. § 8.

[3] Triduum, non plus, &c. LIVY, Lib. XLI. Cap. XXVII. Num. 6.

[4] PLUTARCH, Vit. Agid. p. 801. D. The same Author relates the same of Flaminius, in the Life of that famous Roman General. GROTIUS.

[5] Putares Sullam venisse in Italiam, &c. VELLEIUS PATERCULUS, Lib. II. Cap. XXV. Num. 1.

[6] Cujus [Pompeii] legiones sic in Asiam, &c. Orat. pro Leg. Manil. (Cap. XIII.) The same Pompey being informed, that his Soldiers committed Disorders in Sicily, during their March, ordered their Swords to be sealed up in their Scabbards, and punished those who were found to have broken the Seals. PLUTARCH, Vit. Pomp. (p. 624. A.) GROTIUS.

[7] Quum in finibus Ubiorum castella, &c. FRONTINUS, Stratagem. Lib. II. Cap. XI. Num. 7.

[8] Quam [Parthicam expeditionem] tanta disciplina, &c. LAMPRIIDIUS, Vit. Alex. Sever. Cap. L.

[9] Nullus tumultus, nulla confusio, &c. LATIN PACAT. Panegy. (Cap. XXXII. Panig. ult. 1. XII.) There are many Things in CASSIODORUS upon the Moderation of the Goths, in Regard to the Subject in Question; for Instance, Var. V. 10, 11, 13. Theodorick their King prescribes it to them in these Words. Illud tamen necessario commonentes, ut venientium nullus provenire possit excessus nec possessorum segetes aut prata vastetis—Quia ideo exercitiales gratanter subimus expensas, ut ab armatis custodiatur intacta civilitas Lib. V. Epist. XXVI. Athalarick, another King of the Goths, praises a Senator, whom he recommends, upon that Account. Arma ejus nulla possessorum damna senserunt. Lib. IX. Epist. XXV. GROTIUS.

[10] CLAUDIAN, in prim. Consulat. Stilich. Lib. I. ver. 162. & seq.

[11] See SUIDAS, upon the Word Belisarius. PROCOPIUS, that famous Captain's Companion, and the Witness of his Actions often praises his Moderation. The Reader need only see the fine Speech he ascribes to him, addressed to his Soldiers upon that Head near Sicily, when he went into Africa, Vandalic. Lib. I. (Cap. XII.) and the Manner in which he says Belisarius conducted himself in his march thro' that Country, Ibid. (Cap. XVII.) But I must add here another entire Passage, wherein the Historian gives his Hero the highest Praise on that account. "Belisarius," says he, "took so much Care of the Country People, that they never suffered any Violence from the Armies he commanded. On the contrary their Passage enriched them all, contrary to all Appearance, because they sold their Provisions and Wares to the Soldiers at their own Price. When the Corn was ripe, the Cavalry were hindered from spoiling it, and as to the Fruits, he would not suffer a single Apple to be gathered from a Tree." Gothic. Lib. III. (Cap. I.) NICETAS praises the Germans for acting in the same Manner in their Expedition to the Holy Sepulchre. Vit. Manuel Comnen. (Lib. I. Cap. IV.) NICEPHORUS GREGORIAS relates also, that the good Discipline of the Venetians, and their Greatness of Soul, attended with Justice and Equity, was much admired upon this Account. Not one, says he, of their whole Army, would take any Thing without paying for it, Lib. IX. (p. 188. Edit. Colon. 1616.) GROTIUS.

[12] The Roman Generals, as PLINY observes, took special Care, that Commerce should not be interrupted during the War: Curve Romani Duces primam semper in bellis commerciorum habuere curam? Hist. Natur. Lib. XXVI. Cap. IV. Care should be taken that the Soldier may have wherewithal to buy, in order to prevent his being forced to think of pillaging; as CASSIODORUS says very well: Habeat, quod emat, ne cogatur cogitare, quod auferat. Var. IV. 13. See the same Author, V. 10. and 13. GROTIUS.

[13] He ascribes this Maxim to the Emperor Julian, who gives for the Reason of it, the Danger of the Soldiers committing Ravages, and thereby obliging the People, who suffer them, to break the Peace: Adserens [Caesar] pacatorum terras non debere caleari, ne, ut saepe contigit, per incivilitatem militis occurentia vastantis abruptè foedera frangerentur. Lib. XVIII. Cap. II. p. 205. Edit. Vales. Gron. The Author refers here in a little Note to another Place in AMMIANUS MARCELLINUS, Lib. XXI. He had probably in his Thoughts the Exhortation of the same Emperor to his Soldiers, in an Harangue, where he animates them to march against Constantius. He represents to them, to induce them not to plunder and use the Provincials ill, that this Moderation had contributed more to their past Glory, than the Victories they had obtained over their Enemies: Illud sane obtestor & rogo, observate ne impetu gliscentis ardoris in privatorum damna quisquam vestrum exsiliat sed cogitans [I do not know whether the Copists should not have put cogitans for cogitantes in this Place: It is more natural to think, that the Emperor intended to refer this to the Soldiers, and to let them make the Reflection to themselves: The Fault might besides have easily crept in:] Quodhaud ita nos illustrarunt hostium innumerae strages, ut indemnitas Provinciarum & salus, exemplis virtutum pervulgatae. Cap. V. p. 293, 294. Edit. Vales. Gron.

[14] It is in a Letter writ by Aurelian before he was Emperor, to his Lieutenant General: Nemo pullum alienum rapiat, ovem nemo contingat. Uvam nullus auferat, segetem nemo deterat: Oleum, sal, lignum, NEMO EXIGAT, &c. Vit. Aurelian, Cap. VII.

[15] Ita tamen ut milites tibi commissi vivant cum Provincialibus Jure Civili, nec, insolescat animus, qui se sentit armatum: Quia clypeus ille exercitus nostri quietem debet praestare Paganis. Var. VII. 4. Our Author had writ the last Words in this Manner: But in three Editions, which I have, I find Romanis, and I do not observe that the Editors or Commentators have noted any various Reading. The Opposition indeed is more just in following the Correction, which our Author seems to have intended. But the hard and incorrect Style of CASSIODORUS gives Reason to believe it not necessary.

[16] De Exped. Cyr. Lib. VI. Cap. II. § 4. Edit. Oxon.

[17] The Term of the Original (συχλοφάντεϊν) may be rendered to plunder, to take by Force, as it is used in the Greek Version, JOB xxxv. 9. Psalm cxix. 122. Proverbs xiv. 31. xxii. 16. xxviii. 3. Ecclesiast. iv. 1. and Leviticus xix. 11. The common Version translates the same Word by defraudare, LUKE xix. 8. GROTIUS.

[18] St. AMBROSE says upon this Passage, that the Custom of paying Troops was established to prevent their pillaging: Docens, idcirco stipendia constituta militiae, ne dum sumtus quaeritur, praedo grassetur. Comment. in LUC. Lib. II. Cap. III. (p. 1647. Edit. Paris. 1569.) A Thought which St. AUSTIN has copied, Serm. XIX. De verbis Domin. secund. Matth. There are some fine Ordinances upon this Head in GREGORIUS TURONENSIS, Lib. II. Cap. XXXVII. in the Capitularies of CHARLES and his Successors, Lib. V. Tit. CLXXXIX. in the Councils of France, Vol. II. in the Capitularies of Lewis the Debonair II. 14. See also Lex BAJOARIORUM, Tit. II. 5. Frederick I. Emperor of Germany, decreed by a Law of Military Discipline, that if a Soldier should set the Farm or House of such as live in Peace on Fire, he should be branded in the Forehead, and turned out of the Army after having been well bastinadoed. GUNTHER expresses this Regulation in his Ligurinus thus:

*Si quis pacificae plebis villasve, domosve
Usserit, abrasis signabitur ora capellis,
Et pulsus castris post verbera multa recedet.*

(Lib. VII. p. 385. Edit. Reuber.) GROTIUS.

[19] Annonâ suâ contentus sit. De praeda hostis, non de lachrymis Provincialium, habeat. Vit. Aurel. Cap. VII.

[20] GUICCIARDIN Reasons in this Manner, Hist. Lib. XVI. GROTIUS.

[21] Universi quoque exercitus, &c. Strateg. Lib. IV. Cap. III. Num. 13. See, in regard to Scaurus, who is himself the General and Writer here spoken of, GERARD. JOHN VOSSIUS, De Historicis Latin. Lib. I. Cap. IX. The Author refers here to what SPARTIAN relates, of the rigorous Manner in which Pescennius Niger punished the stealing of a Cock, Cap. X.

[22] Omnia libidine ac licentia militum, nihil institutio ac disciplina militiae, aut imperio eorum qui praeerant, gerebatur, Lib. XXVIII. (Cap. XXIV. Num. 9.)

[23] Socii erant: Sed propter inopiam, haud secus quam hostium fines Macedones populati sunt. Rapiendo enim passim, villas primùm, dein quosdam vicos etiam evastarunt; non sine magno pudore Regis, quum sociorum voces, nequicquam Deos Sociales nomenque suum implorantes, audiret, Lib. XL. (Cap. XII. Num. 10, 11.)

[24] Dum socios magis, quam hostes, praedatur.—Quod ubi turpi fama divulgatum, &c. Annal. Lib. XII. (Cap. XLIX. Num. 2.)

[25] Per omnia Italiae municipia desides, tantum hospitibus metuendos, &c. Hist. Lib. III. (Cap. II. Num. 2.)

[26] Tu in iisdem locis Legatus Quaestorius, &c. In Verr. Lib. I. Cap. XXI. GROTIUS.

The Passages from Note 22. to this Place are not in the first Edition. They interrupt the Connection of the Sense, and agree very little with what follows, and precedes them, as they are Examples of a Practice quite contrary to that of which the Author intends to shew both the Justice and Possibility. I am surprised that he has not quoted a Passage from ONOSANDER in this Chapter, who in giving Precepts to Generals of Armies does not forget this, that they forbid the Soldier to take or spoil any Thing in the Country of an Ally. Strategic. Cap. VI. p. 14. Edit. Pigalt.

[27] See above B. II. Chap. XXI. § 2.

[1] See what is said upon PUFENDORF, Law of Nature and Nations, B. VIII. Chap. VI. § 7. Note 2.

[a] Ch. 1. of this B. §5.

- [b] See a singular Instance in Paruta, B. 8.
- [2] Lib. I. Cap. XXXV.
- [3] Dupliciter ab eo [Philippo] foedus, &c. LIVY, Lib. XXX. Cap. XLII. Num. 8.
- [4] Vos tamen, inquis, vestramque, Idem, Lib. XXXIV. Cap. XXXII. Num. 14, 15.
- [5] On the contrary, as the same Historian makes Queen Amalasontha say in a Letter to the Emperor Justinian, that not only joining a Prince with Arms in the Field, but to supply him publickly with all Necessaries of War, is being a Friend and Ally. Gothic. Lib. I. (Cap. III.) GROTIUS.
- [6] Philipp. III. p. 46.
- [7] Militem tamen nullum Antiocho dederant [Epirotæ] pecunia juvisse cum insimulabantur — Iis, &c. LIVY, Lib. XXXVI. Cap. XXXV. Num. 8, 9.
- [8] Et juvisse eos [Tejos] commeatu, &c. Idem, Lib. XXXVII. Cap. XXVIII. Num. 2.
- [9] In Brut. p. 1011. D.
- [10] Pacem utrique parti, quod medios deceat amicos, optent; bello se non interponant. LIVY, Lib. XXXV. (Cap. XLVIII. Num. 9.) Καλὸν ἴσχυρία. [Apud PLUTARCHUM Apophtheg. p. 219. A.]
- [1] POPILIUS Imperator tenebat, &c. De Offic. Lib. I. Cap. XI.
- [a] See Xenophon, Cyr. Inst.
- [2] Tam inutilis animi minister est, quam miles, qui signum receptui negligit. De Ira, Lib. I. Cap. IX.
- [b] Ch. 3. of this Book, § 10, 12.
- [3] Pro nullis habentur, says our Author, applying here what the Roman Lawyers say of Slaves with regard to civil Rights: Quod adinet ad jus civile, Servi pro nullis habentur. Digest, Lib. L. Tit. XVII. De diversis Reg. Jur. Leg. XXXII. But this Fiction, which in some manner excludes Slaves from the Number of Men, in order to rank them amongst the Goods of Fortune, is only founded upon the arbitrary Decisions of a particular Legislator, which can have no Place in the present Question. It were better to give this for the Reason of it; that neutral People, from only continuing such, being bound to regard the Acts of Hostility on both Sides, as equally just; it suffices, with regard to them, that he is a Person of one of the Parties, who has killed or plundered his Enemy: They have then no Business to trouble themselves whether he, who has committed such an Act of Hostility, acted or not by the publick Authority. For tho' we were to suppose a Law of Nations merely arbitrary, such as our Author imagines there is, as this Right would necessarily turn upon Things, of which the common Interest of Nations required the Observation; there would be nothing in this Case that can be referred to it, since it is of no import to Nations, whether private Persons do or do not, act against an Enemy of their own Head, and since the End of the War demands on the contrary, that all those of one Party may take all Occasions to hurt the other. So that the present Question can only regard the publick Right of every State. See what our Author observes at the End of this Chapter.
- [4] In bello, qui rem a Duce prohibitam fecit, aut mandata non servavit capitepunitur etiamsi res bene cesserit. Digest, Lib. XLIX. Tit. XVI. De Re Militar. Leg. III. § 15.

[5] Avidius Cassius punished some Officers of his Army with Death, who had gone without his Orders with an handful of Men to surprize three Thousand, tho' they had put the latter to the Sword and returned laden with their Spoils. He gave as his Reason for so severe a Sentence, that there might have been some Ambuscade: Dicens evenire potuisse, ut essent insidiae, &c. VULCATIUS GALLICAN. Cap. IV. GROTIUS.

[6] Quod in bello saepius vindicatum est in eos, &c. Bell. Catilinar. Cap. IX. Edit. Wass.

[7] PLUTARCH, Lacon. Apophth. p. 236.

[8] Quaest. Rom. XXXIX. p. 274. A.

[9] Lib. II. Cap. VI.

[10] This indeed proves, that the Enemy is not wronged, when a private Act of Hostility is committed against him; but it does not follow from thence, that in Civil Society a private Person can act against the Enemy without the express or tacit Order of those, who are invested with the publick Authority. So that the Question, as we have said, relates to publick Right: And the Law of Nature, upon that Foot, far from leaving every one at Liberty to commit Acts of Hostility of his own Head, requires on the contrary, that in a Thing of so great Importance, and which relates to one of the principal Parts of Sovereignty, nothing should be done without the particular or general Permission of the Sovereign, or his Ministers; since that is a necessary Consequence of the Engagement of a Subject, considered as such.

[c] B. 2. Ch. 20. § 11.

[11] Aut certè si esset tumultus, &c. SERVIUS in Aeneid. VIII. 1.

[12] Declarations of War sometimes not only license, but order, The Subjects of an Enemy to be attacked wherever they are found.

[a] B. 3. Ch. 6. § 23, 24.

[b] B. 3. C. 13.

[1] It has been said with Reason, that it is very difficult to make an exact Estimate in this Case; but I do not think it in the least necessary: There is great Reason to presume, that the Sovereign in having authorised Voluntiers, Partisans, and those who fit out Vessels to make Incursions upon the Enemy, and to keep the Booty for themselves, was also willing, that the Whole, however great it were, should be theirs; unless he had previously reserved a Part of it to himself. These Captures are generally not considerable enough with regard to the State, tho' they are so to the private Persons who take them, and may therefore be left entirely to them, without Prejudice to the Publick.

[1] PLUTARCH blames Crassus for this in his Life, p. 543. D. GROTIUS.

[a] B. 2. C. 1.

[b] B. 3. C. 2.

[1] This Passage is quoted above, B. I. Chap. III. § 5. Num. 4.

[a] B. 3. Ch. 1. § 1.

[1] Punic. Lib. XIV. (Ver. 169. & seq.) The Philosopher Archelaus, as APPIANUS ALEXANDRINUS relates, said, that Treaties solemnly made and sworn, ought to be sacred and inviolable, even between Enemies. Bell. Civil. Lib. IV. (p. 628. Edit. H. Steph.)

GROTIUS.

[2] Cap. III. § 5. Edit. Oxon.

[3] P. 184. C. Vol. II.

[4] Nemo est igitur, qui non hanc, &c. De finib. bon. & mal. Lib. V. Cap. XXII.

[5] Ego publicam adpello fidem, quae inter Piratas sacra est: Quae inter armatos hostes inducias facit: Quae deditarum civitatum jura conservat. Declam. CCXLVII. in fin. p. 505. Edit. Burman.

[6] Fides supremum rerum humanarum vinculum est: Sacra laus fidei inter hostes. Declam. CCCXLIII. p. 721.

[7] Liquet igitur, etiam in bello fidem & justitiam servari oportere. De Offic. Lib. II. Cap. XXIX.

[8] Fides enim quando promittitur, etiam hosti servandum est, contra quem bellum geritur. Epist. CCV. Ad Bonifac. This Father treats the same Subject at large in Letter CCXXV. GROTIUS.

To the Passage cited here St. AUSTIN adds, that with much greater Reason we ought to keep our Promise made to a Friend: Quanto magis amico pro quo pugnatur? It is probable that he had in View the following Words of JOSEPHUS, the Jewish Historian: Ὅς ἦγε πίστις ἔχουσα καὶ πρὸς τοὺς πολεμωτάτους τόπον, τοῖς γε φίλοις ἀναγκαιοτάτη τετηρῆσθαι, &c. Antiq. Jud. Lib. XV. Cap. VIII. p. 521.

[9] Nobis cum Faliscis, quae pacto fit humano, societas non est: Quam ingeneravit natura, utrisque est, eritique. LIVY, Lib. V. Cap. XXVII. Num. 6. See what I have said upon PUFENDORF, Law of Nature and Nations, B. VIII. Chap. VII. § 2.

[b] B. 3. Ch. 1. § 17.

[10] Ethic. Nicomach. Lib. IV. Cap. XIII. See what I have said upon the Preliminary Discourse, § 44. Note 4.

[11] In Arcadic. Cap. VII. p. 241. Edit. Wech.

[12] Nonne bellum adversus, &c. (Lib. IX. Cap. VI. Num. 2. Extern.)

[13] The Passage of HOMER cited here is not exactly repeated. The Author trusting without doubt to his Memory, has said, καλλίον ἔστι, where he finishes the Sense, but in the Original there is:

— — Τῷ οὐ νότι κέρδιον ἡμῶν
Ἐλπομαι ἐκτελέεσθαι, ἵνα μὴ ἑξέξομεν ὧδε.

That is to say: I believe our Affairs will not prosper, if we do not this, or if we do not restore Helena to the Greeks, with all her Riches. In which the Sense is finer, and conveys another important Reflection to dissuade from Perfidy.

[1] See PUFENDORF upon this Subject, Law of Nature and Nations, B. III. Chap. VI. § 9. and 11. and B. IV. Chap. II. § 8. The Passages of CICERO are quoted in B. II. Chap. XIII. § 15.

[2] Quidquid erat, quo mihi cohaereret, intercisajuris humani Societas abscidit. De Benefic. Lib. VII. Cap. XIX.

[3] SENECA the Father says also, Non putavi adulterium, uxorem Tyranni polluere, sicut nec homicidium, Tyrannum occidere. Excerpt. Controvers. Lib. IV. Cap. VII. The Lawyer JULIUS CLARUS believed, that Adultery might be committed with Impunity with a banished Woman. In § Homicidium, Num. 36. GROTIUS.

[a] R. Levi Ben. Gerson, and R. Salomo, ad Levit. xx. 10.

[4] See his Life in PLUTARCH, p. 632, 633. Vol. I. Edit. Wechel.

[5] Didius was blamed for his shameful Perfidiousness to the Celtiberians, an antient People of Spain, who lived by Rapine. GROTIUS.

Our Author had in his Thoughts what Titus Didius the Roman General acted in regard to the Celtiberians, settled near the City of Colenda, as APPIANUS ALEXANDRINUS relates it. De Bell. Hispan. p. 312. Edit. H. Steph. For the Rest, I find no where else, not even in the antient Geographers, this City of Colenda: Neither does the learned CELLARIUS in his antient Geography mention it.

[6] De abstin. animal. Lib. III. p. 322. Edit. Ludg. 1620.

[b] L. 36. Ecl. 3. L. 56. p. 686. Edit. H. Steph.

[a] B. 2. Ch. 11. §7.

[1] The Passage is recited above, Chap. V. of this Book, § 1. Note 1.

[b] B. 2. Ch. 16. §6.

[2] De nomine hoc [Tyranni] &c. LIVY, Lib. XXXIV. (Cap. XXXI. Num. 12, 13, 15.) In TERENCE a Merchant of Slaves says, “Tho’ I am a Pimp, the common Bane of Youth, a perjured Wretch, a publick Nuisance, yet I never wronged you:”

Leno sum, fateor, pernicies communis adolescentium, Perjurus, pestis: Tamen tibi a me nulla est orta injuria.

Adelph. (Act II. Scen. I. Ver. 34.) See the Author, who has writ concerning the Treaty of Peace between the Princes and States of the Empire of Germany. GROTIUS.

[a] B. 2. Ch. 11. §7.

[1] But see what I have said upon PUFENDORF, Law of Nature and Nations, B. III. Chap. VI. § 11. Note 11.

[a] B. 2. Ch. 13. § 14, &c.

[1] But we have rejected this Principle, after PUFENDORF, in B. II. Chap. XIII. § 14. & seq.

[2] See what I have said after PUFENDORF, Law of Nature and Nations, B. IV. Chap. II. § 17.

[1] Compare this again with PUFENDORF, B. VIII. Chap. VIII. § 2.

[2] We have also shewn in the Notes upon B. I. Chap. IV. how far this Obligation of Non-Resistance extends, to judge of it by Principles, that have nothing extravagant either on one Side or the other.

[a] B. 1. C. 4.

[3] This Obligation is the more inviolable, as Sovereigns are very apt to treat as Rebellion and Disobedience a Resistance, by which the Subject only maintains his just Rights, and opposes enormous Violations of the Engagements of Sovereigns, either as such, or by Virtue of the fundamental Laws of the State. History furnishes but too many Instances of this Kind.

[4] This was a terrible Earthquake, which happened at Lacedemon, and threw down the Whole City, five Houses only excepted, as AELIAN relates, Var. Histor. Lib. VI. Cap. VII. In this Passage of AELIAN, it is very likely that instead of the Words, which our Author translates Slaves of Taenarus, τοὺς ἐκ Ταϊνάρου οἰκέτας, the reading ought to be (and is) according to some Manuscripts, Τοὺς ἐκ Ταϊνάρου ἰκέτας, that is to say, Suppliants, as the late Mr. PERIZONIUS observes in his Note upon this Passage.

[5] In this Temple Slaves, who were ill treated by their Masters, took Refuge, Lib. XI. (Cap. LXXXVIII. p. 288. Edit. H. Steph.)

[6] He had sworn to the Son of Manlius, and not to himself, that he would desist from proceeding on the Accusation he had brought against the Father; and he declared in the Assembly of the People, that the Reason of his doing so, was because Titus Manlius had made him swear it, by threatening to kill him. SENECA, in relating this Fact, observes, that this young Man was the only Person, that found Means to restrain a Tribune of the People with Impunity: Juravit Tribunus, nec fefellit; & causam actionis remissae concioni reddidit. Nulli alii licuit impunè Tribunum in ordinem redigere. De Benef. Lib. III. Cap. XXXVII. GROTIUS.

See also CICERO upon this Fact, Offic. Lib. III. Cap. XXXI.

[a] B. 2. Ch. 4. §8. n. 3.

[b] In the following Chapter, § 7.

[1] See my Observations upon PUFENDORF, Law of Nature and Nations, B. IV. Chap. II. § 17. Note 2. Edit. II.

[2] See PLUTARCH upon this Head in the Lives of those two celebrated Legislators, p. 57. D. E. and p. 92. But there is no mention in that or any other Place, (that I know of) of renewing the Oath annually. On the contrary it seems, that such renewal was not thought necessary for continuing the Oath in all its Force, notwithstanding the Change of Persons. I find at least that DIONYSIUS HALICARNASSENSIS, a Greek Author, says expressly, that the Oath once taken by the Whole People was sufficient to make a Law irrevocable, even in regard to the Posterity of those, who had sworn to observe it. This is where he treats of sacred Law, of which more will be said in the following Notes. Antiq. Rom. Lib. VI. Cap. LXXXIX.

[3] LEGE itaque Legem, quae te jurejurando obstrictam tenet. Lib. V. Cap. III. Num. 3. Extern.

[a] See Manutius de Legibus.

[4] GRONOVIVS criticises our Author in this Place. This is not CICERO's Thought, says he. The Orator confines himself to proving, that nothing is sacred but what the People have declared so: Sacrosanctam enim nihil potest esse, nisi quod per Populum Plebemve sancitum est. Orat. pro Balbo. Cap. XV. So that the Authority of the People was indeed necessary to the making a sacred Law: But every Law, to the Establishment of which the Interposition of the People was necessary, was not therefore Sacred, unless it implied, that whoever violated it, his Head should be forfeited to the Gods, so that any other Person might kill him with Impunity: For that is understood by Caput sacrum sancire, or consecrare. But this makes nothing against our Author. He never pretended, that the Reason, why a Law was called Sacrata, was only because it had been established by the Authority of the People. The Thought is too absurd to have entered into the Mind of GROTIUS, or for him to have ascribed to CICERO. He says expressly the contrary in his Florum Sparsio ad Jus Justinian. (p. 25, 26. Edit. Amstel.) Erant autem Leges omnes sanctae, quae sanctionem haberent, at non omnes sacratae. After which he cites the Definition of these sacred Laws from CICERO himself, in the fourteenth Chapter of the same Oration: And he adds there FESTUS (on the Words Sacratae Leges sunt, &c.) as also the Scholiast upon the Words of HORACE, Sanctarum inscitia Legum, (Lib. II. Sat. I. Ver. 81.) Our Author therefore intended only to say, that the People, in instituting this Kind of Laws, bound themselves to observe them by the Sanctity of an Oath, religione obligabatur: Words, to which the learned Critick ought to have attended, and which are taken from the Orator himself, upon whose Authority he founds his Opinion: Qui, injussu suo, nullo pacto potest RELIGIONE OBLIGARI.— Quod PUBLICA RELIGIONE sanciri possit, id abest. He says a little above, Quod quum magis fide illius Populi, justitiâ vestrâ, vetustate denique ipsâ, quam aliquo PUBLICO VINCULO RELIGIONIS teneretur, &c. Ibid. Cap. XV. So that it is not without Foundation, that our Author makes CICERO say, the People's Oath was necessary in these Sort of Laws: And we find in DIONYSIUS HALICARNASSENSIS, (ubi supra VI. 89.) that the most Eminent were attended with it; besides the Imprecation against the Head of all those who should violate them. See also FESTUS, at the Word Sacrosanctum. Whether they were called Sacratae for the one or the other of these Reasons, is a different Thing; and it does not appear clearly, that our Author intended to give the Etymology of that Word in this Place; At least CICERO, whom he cites, makes use of another Term, Sacrosanctum. It appears also by what FESTUS says at the Words Sacratae Leges, that even the Antients disagreed concerning this Etymology. The Reader may see upon this Question of Criticism, the Animadversiones of the late Mr. PERIZONIUS, p. 418, 419. and the Remarks of the same learned Man upon the Minerva of SANCTIUS, p. 761, 762. of the last Edition.

[5] Et quum religione, &c. Lib. III. (Cap. LV. Num. 7. & seq.)

The learned GRONOVIVS does not think our Author's Reason well founded for the Difference between the Tribunes of the People and the Ediles, &c. The Truth is, says he, that no one could be considered as a sacred Person (Sacrosanctus) according to the Custom of the Romans, unless he was formally declared so by a Law, as the Tribunes had been, according to LIVY, Lib. II. Cap. XXXIII.

[6] Antiq. Rom. Lib. VI. (Cap. LXXXIX.)

[7] As reported at large by PLUTARCH in his Life.

[1] See above, B. II. Chap. XXV. § 8. Num. 3. and a Dissertation of OBRECHT, De Sponsore Pacis, § 3. Diss. VII. p. 151, 152.

[2] See what the Author has said above, B. II. Chap. XI. § 18. Num. 1.

[3] Perseus thought that the hardest Condition in the Treaty: Una eum res, quum victo, &c. LIVY, Lib. XXXIX. Cap. XXIII. Num. 6.

[a] B. 1. Ch. 3.

[1] It is necessary in my Opinion to distinguish here, whether he who has compelled the other to treat by the Superiority of his Arms, had undertaken the War without Reason, or whether he could alledge some specious Pretext for it. If it was without any Cause, as Alexander's going to conquer remote Nations, who had never heard of him, and of Consequence could not have done any Thing against him, nor owe him any Thing; or even if the Cause alledged be evidently a frivolous Pretext in the Judgment of every Man of common Reason: I do not see wherefore the Conquered should be obliged to observe the Treaty of Peace, any more than a Man fallen into the Hands of Thieves should be held to carry exactly, or pay at their Demand, the Money he had promised them as a Ransom for his Life or Liberty; which our Author himself does not pretend; tho' building upon false Principles, which we have rejected more than once, he is for having such a Promise to be valid in itself. But if the Conqueror had undertaken the War for some plausible Reason, tho' unjust at Bottom, when examined without Prejudice, in such Case the common Interest of Mankind undoubtedly requires, that some Difference be made between Promises extorted by Fear between private Persons, and those to which a Sovereign Prince or People is compelled by the bad Success of their Arms, tho' just. The Reason our Author uses in this Place is very good: And that without supposing a tacit Consent of Nations, which only renders the Engagement of the Conquered the stronger. For the Law of Nature itself which requires that Societies, as well as every Individual, should endeavour their Preservation, does by that alone make us regard not properly Acts of Hostility as just on the Side of the unjust Conqueror; but the Engagement of the Treaty of Peace as valid notwithstanding; so that the Conquered cannot dispence with observing it, upon the Pretext of the unjust Fear that occasioned it, which they might have done without the Consideration of the Advantage arising from thence to Mankind. This Interest of publick Tranquillity requires also, that even when a Treaty of Peace has been made, in Consequence of a War undertaken without Cause, or for one manifestly frivolous, the unjust Conqueror, who had no lawful Title, acquire it afterwards, in a reasonable length of Time, when the Conquered submit patiently to the Yoke, without being forced to it by the same Fear, which induced them to treat at first. See above, B. II. Chap. IV. § 12. & seq. To what I have said may be added the Reason alledged by PUFENDORF, Law of Nature and Nations, B. VIII. Chap. VIII. § 1.

[a] See the Treatise De Compos. Pacis.

[2] Est autem jus etiam bellicum, fidesque juris jurandi saepe cum hoste servanda. De Offic. Lib. III. Cap. XXIX.

[3] The Passage has been already quoted above, Chap. XII. of this last Book, § 7. Note 8.

[1] Thus a Promise extorted from an Ambassador made Prisoner is not valid, according to the Law of Nations. See MARIANA, De Rebus Hispan. Lib. XXX. GROTIUS.

The Spanish Historian speaks of Antony Acunia, Bishop of Zamora, whom John D'Albret the last King of Navarre had laid under an Arrest, and afterwards released upon his Promise to return, as soon as required. But that Prelate had not been received as Ambassador: And there were good Reasons not to receive him as such, as he had been present at the Battle of Ravenna between the Spaniard, and French, which latter were the King of Navarre's Allies. See Chap. XII. and XIX. of the Book referred to in this Note. So that the maxim, true in itself, is here misapplied. See what our Author says above, B. II. Chap. XVIII. § 5. and 6.

[a] B. 2. Ch. 13. § 16.

[1] Quanta autem Justitia sit, &c. Offic. I. 29.

[2] Se tunc Senatus non eos, &c. Lib. VI. Cap. VI. Num. 3.

[3] Item bellis Punicis omnibus, &c. (Bell. Catilinar. in Orat. Caesar. Cap. L. Edit. Wass.)

[4] De Bell. Hispan. p. 388. Edit. H. Steph.

[5] Misericordia ergo illam quaestionem, non aequitas, rexit: Quoniam quae innocentiae tribui nequierat absolutio, respectui puerorum data est. Lib. VIII. Cap. I. Num. 2.

- [6] Quod item apud Catonem scriptum esse [in Originibus] video, nisi pueris & lachrymis usus esset, poenas eum daturum fuisse. De Orat. Lib. I. Cap. LIII. See also in Brut. Cap. XX.
- [1] Compare PUFENDORF with this Place, Law of Nature and Nations, B. V. Chap. XI. § 9. and what our Author has already said, B. II. Chap. XV. § 15.
- [2] Nunciate, inquit, Regi vestro, Regem Romanum, &c. (LIVY, Lib. I. Cap. XXII. Num. 7.)
- [3] Digest. Lib. XVII. Tit. II. pro Socio, Leg. XIV.
- [a] B. 2. Ch. 7. §2.
- [1] See PUFENDORF, Law of Nature and Nations, B. V. Chap. XI. § 5. & seqq. Our Author cites here in a Note the Passage of TERTULLIAN, where he says, that no one ought to object to a Compensation of good or ill on both Sides: Nulli compensatio invidiosa est, in qua aut gratiae, aut injuriae, communis est ratio. Scorpiac. adv. Gnosticos, Cap. VI.
- [2] Sic Debitori suo Creditor, &c. De Benefic. Lib. VI. Cap. IV.
- [1] If a Man, says he, has entrusted me with a Deposit, and afterwards stole something from me, I ought to prosecute him for the Theft, tho' he may Claim the Deposit from me by another Action: Separantur actiones, &c. Ibid. Cap. V. See the Receptae Sententiae of the Civilian JULIUS PAULUS, Lib. II. Tit. XII. § 12. and the Notes of CUJAS and Mr. SCHULTING upon him.
- [2] Quae proposuisti, mi Liberalis, exempla, &c. Ubi supra, Cap. VI.
- [1] Colonum suum non tenet, &c. De Benefic. Lib. VI. Cap. IV.
- [2] These Words are in the Passage which I have cited above, § 15. Note 2.
- [3] Beneficium nulli legi, &c. Ubi supr. Cap. VI.
- [1] Dedisti beneficium, &c. Ibid. Cap. V.
- [2] Potius comparatione facta, &c. Cap. VI.
- [1] Nullam excusationem receperunt, &c. De Benefic. Lib. VII. Cap. XVI.
- [a] B. 3. Ch. 3. §2.
- [2] The King commended by Jarchas was named Ganges, whose Ally is said to have carried his infidelity so far, as to seize the Person of the Queen his Spouse. PHILOSTRAT. Vit. Apollon. Tyan. Lib. III. Cap. XX. Edit. Olear.
- [b] B. 2. Ch. 11, 13, 15, 16.
- [a] B. 2. Ch. 15. §3.
- [1] In Statu vere regio, says the Author. That is to say, if the King be absolute, and not obliged by the fundamental Laws of the Kingdom, to consult the People, or the Nobles of the State upon making War or Peace.
- [a] See B. 1. Ch. 3. § 24.
- [1] See GUICCIARDIN, Hist. Lib. XVI. and Lib. XVIII. where he treats several Times of this Case. GROTIUS.

[2] So that, according to our Author, when the Kingdom is patrimonial, the King, tho' a Prisoner, can make Peace, in the same Manner as he may treat validly in regard to his private Estates, tho' he holds the Kingdom only by an usufructuary Title. Our Author supposes without doubt, that the King, who is a Prisoner, is not become a Slave by the Right of War, or that he, who has taken him, either expressly or tacitly has renounced his Right. The question is otherwise useless, because Estates are acquired with the Person, according to what has been said above, Chap. VII. of this Book, § 4. and Chap. VIII. § 1. Num. 3.

[b] Ch. 23.

[3] What LUCAN says may be applied here, that during the Time the Dictator Camillus was at Veii, Rome also was there, tho' the Gauls were Masters of the City:

— — Tarpeja sede perustâ
Gallorum facibus, Veiosque habitante Camillo
Illic Roma fuit. — —

Pharsal. (Lib. V. Ver. 27. & seq.)

See CHASSANÆUS, De Gloria Mundi, Part V. Consider. IX. GROTIUS.

[4] Our Author supposes here again without doubt, that the King has been unjustly expelled his Dominions. Otherwise, as he would be fallen from the Sovereignty, he would be equally incapable of making Peace, which is one of the most essential Parts of it.

[5] Sententiam ne diceret, &c. CICERO, De Offic. Lib. III. Cap. XXVII.

[a] B. 2. Ch. 5. § 17.

[1] Which he makes Aristenus, Praetor of the *Achaean*s, say: Ubi semel decretum erit, omnibus id, etiam quibus ante displicuerit, pro bono atque utili foedere defendendum. Lib. XXXII. (Cap. XX. Num. 6.)

[2] Antiq. Rom. Lib. XI. (Cap. LVI.)

[3] Singulos enim, integrâ re, dissentire fas esse: Peractâ, quod pluribus placuisset, cunctis tenendum. Lib. VI. Epist. XIII.

[1] But tho' the Act of Alienation has not been previously declared entirely null, it is however no less so. The Nullity follows necessarily, from the King's Power being limited in that Respect by the very Nature of his Kingdom; and much more, if in conferring the Sovereignty, it was expressly stipulated, that he should not alienate any Part of it. It is a different Question to know whether the Alienation remaining without Effect, the King, as for his own particular Part be not held to make the other contracting Party some Amends, admitting he can do so in a Manner not prejudicial to the Interests of his Subjects, or the State. See the following Note.

[2] It suffices to say, that the other Party may, and generally do know, that it is not in the King's Power to treat: In which Case they can only blame themselves. The Reason alledged by our Author, may afterwards be put to account, but without its being necessary to found it upon a meer Supposition of a tacit Consent of Nations. For the rest, if we suppose that the Party, with whom the King has treated, could not know, that the Alienation was not in his Power; I see no Reason, why in such Case they may not have a Right to come upon the King's patrimonial Estate for Damages and Interest; in the same Manner as those, who have treated with a publick Minister, acting without Authority, may exact this Amends from him, according to the Principles laid down by our Author himself elsewhere, B. II. Chap. XV. § 16. Num. 6. But farther: In a doubt, or when the King has alienated some Part of his Kingdom, for very evident Reasons of Necessity or Utility, it may be presumed, that the People have given their Consent, according to what has been also advanced above, B. II. Chap. VI. § 8. 11. and Chap. XIV. § 12.

[3] See what has been said above, B. II. Chap. VI. § 6, 7. with the Notes.

[4] In which Case therefore he may indeed alienate the Whole Kingdom, but not a Part of it.

[a] B. 2. C. 19. § 10, &c.

[1] See REINKING. B. I. Class. III. Cap. V. Num. 30. and compare this with what has been said above, B. II. Chap. XIV. § 7. and 12. GROTIUS.

[2] But see what we have said upon B. I. Chap. III. § 11. Num. 1.

[3] I add the Words, upon this Condition, which necessarily must be understood according to the Thought of our Author, who expresses himself clearly in another Place, where he has treated of the same Case: Ut paterfamilias latifundia possidens, NEMINEM ALIA LEGE suas terras habitantem recipere velit, &c. B. I. Chap. III. § 8. Num. 2. This gives me Occasion to defend him against a very sour and ill-grounded Criticism of the late Mr. COCCEIUS, in a Work published some little Time after his Death, intitled, Autonomia Juris Gentium, &c. He says there, (Cap. XII. § 5.) Our Author supposes a Master of a Family, who, possessing a vast extent of Land, entertains a great Number of Servants and Workmen for the culture of them. This is not, adds he, a State, but a great Family; this Man is not a King, but a rich private Person: And GROTIUS confounds in this Manner the Head of a Family with an absolute Prince, which is very absurd. But is it not more absurd, to make so judicious a Man as GROTIUS say a Thing so contrary to the plain Sense of his Words, which import not a simple Contract of Hire, as it is supposed without Reason, but a Convention by which the Head of a Family in Question grants Lands, upon Condition that the Inhabitants of them shall acknowledge him for the future as their absolute Sovereign? He afterwards maintains, that admitting such a Convention, the new King would have no Right to alienate his Kingdom, and founds his Reason upon this, that there neither is nor can be, as is pretended, any patrimonial Kingdom. This is not the proper Place to examine the Reasons he brings for this Doctrine, nor to shew their Weakness. Besides, I have already said, B. I. Chap. III. § 2. Note 4. what we ought to think upon this Head, to avoid vicious Extremes.

[a] Gail. 2. Obs. 57.

[b] B. 1. Ch. 6. B. 2. Ch. 14. § 7, 8.

[a] B. 3. ch. 6. § 3.

[b] Ch. 10. § 5.

[1] There are some, who say, that War being deemed to be undertaken by the Consent of all the Citizens, every particular Person is also deemed to have exposed himself voluntarily to support all the Losses, which he may sustain in Consequence of the Acts of Hostility, especially in a War purely defensive; and therefore, that the State is not held to reimburse any one; unless it has received Advantage from what private Persons have lost, or unless the Damage was sustained by such Persons, in Consequence of the Hazards they run by Order of the Sovereign. For the Rest, it is so much the worse for those that have suffered, even tho' they have suffered more than others. But the Consequence is not just. This tacit Consent of the Citizens to the undertaking of a War, implies indeed a Will to suffer Loss, when they cannot do otherwise; but not if there be any way to make them Amends, either fully, or in Proportion to what they have suffered more than their Fellow-Citizens, who were equally obliged to it. The one does not hinder the other.

[2] There may be another considerable Reason for this, which is the Difficulty of estimating, and comparing together the Losses of every one. Besides, if private Persons are rich, and the Publick poor, as it sometimes happens, this sufficiently excuses the State from making any Amends.

[1] Compare this with what has been said above, B. II. Chap. X. § 1. Num. 5. and Chap. XIV. § 8.

[2] Our Author understands thereby the eminent Domain of the State, of which the lawful Use is founded upon the publick Utility, and consequently forms an Exception included in Property, as in every other Right of private Persons.

[a] B. 3. ch. 2.

[a] B. 2. ch. 16. § 11, 12.

[1] This is a natural Consequence of the Thing, or of the Intention of the contracting Parties reasonably presumed. For, as each believes himself in the Right, each no doubt is for making his Condition as good as he can, and at least as advantageous as that of the other Party. So that the Distinction of favourable and odious, of which we have elsewhere shewn the Usefulness and Want of Solidity, is not more necessary in this Place.

[2] See for Instance THUCYDIDES IV. 65. which I have already cited above, upon B. II. Chap. IV. § 8. Num. 3.

[1] It is in Chap. IX. of this last Book, § 4. Num. 1. where the Law has been quoted. The Reader may see what I have said upon it, Note 3.

[2] See the Law of the Digest quoted above at the End of Chap. I. of this Book. It is also sometimes agreed by Treaty of Peace, that such as would go over from one Party to the other, shall not be received. See the Articles of Peace concluded between the Emperor Justinian and Chosroez King of Persia, in the History of MENANDER the Protector, (Chap. II.) GROTIUS.

[a] B. 3. ch. 6. §4.

[3] De Corona, p. 316. B.

[4] Consult PUFENDORF, Law of Nature and Nations, B. VIII. Chap. VI. § 19.

[b] See above, Chap. 7. § 4.

[5] This is our Author's Meaning, whose concise Expression has been very ill understood by the learned GRONOVIVS. Suppose, for Instance, that a Person has the Use and Profits, or the Fief of a Land, if the Enemy seizes this Land, tho' he does not take the Lord of the Fief or Tenant Prisoner, as neither the one nor the other can exercise his Right but in a conquered Country, their Liberty is of no manner of Service to them; the Right then passes over to the Enemy, without the Person to whom it adhered, and becomes real from personal as it was before. So that, after a Treaty of Peace, this Sort of Goods continue, as well as others, to the Party who retains the Lands, to which they adhere.

[1] The Possession, here intended, is rather the Possession of a Country in general, than that of private Persons. So that in regard to private Persons, Things ought to stand upon the same Foot, as if the Possession had never been interrupted by War. And this would take Place, tho' it were even supposed, that the private Person in question has been unjustly dispossessed, in what manner soever, by a Subject of the other State, with which Peace has been concluded. For as this Injustice is supposed to have happened before the War, he who has suffered it, may demand Reparation in the same Manner as he might have done at first.

[1] But, says ZIEGLER, admitting even that such a People has not submitted to the Dominion of either Party, unless by Force or Fear, I see no Reason, why they can pretend to be reinstated in their first Condition, by Virtue of the Interpretation of that general Clause; especially if it is of no Importance to the other Party, whether that People be reinstated in the Possession of their Liberty or not. I answer for our Author, that he supposes here, as appears from the Examples which follow, a People who were the Ally of the contrary Party to that they have surrendered to, or who were concerned in some other Manner in the War: Otherwise the Question would be entirely impertinent. Now upon this Foot, such a People may well be included in the general Clause, according to which all Things are to be reinstated in their first Condition; if the State to whose Power they have submitted, have no other Title but an Act of Hostility; but not if they have submitted voluntarily: For the Clause in question regards only Acts of Hostility; and the Party, who has submitted voluntarily, has by that alone renounced all Benefit of a future Treaty of Peace.

[2] THUCYD. Lib. V. (Cap. XVII. Edit. Oxon.) The Historian had already said the same Thing of the same City in another Place, Lib. III. (Cap. LII.) GROTIUS.

[3] THUCYD. Ubi supra V. 17.

[4] Quae si maneret, captarum tamen urbium ea lex est. Thessaliae civitates suâ voluntate in ditionem nostram venerunt. LIVY, Lib. XXXIII. Cap. XIII. Num. 12.

[1] That is to say, Damages caused to private Persons of the other State at War, by lawful Acts of Hostility; and not those, which private Persons may have occasioned of their own Head, or under the Pretext of War against the Subjects of the Enemy, or those of the same State. The late Mr. COCCEIUS in a Dissertation, De Postliminio in Pace, Sect. I. has advanced contrary to the Opinion of our Author, and several others whom he quotes; that by simply making Peace, the Parties do not hold themselves reciprocally discharged from the Damages occasioned on both Sides, and that an express Clause of general Amnesty is necessary to that Effect. He founds his Opinion on what follows. I. A Treaty of Peace, says he, is nothing more in itself than a Transaction upon what occasioned the War, and consequently upon a publick Interest, in regard to which if there be any Thing given up that concludes nothing in respect to the Interest of particular Persons who have suffered Damage from the Enemy during the War. II. This Damage, adds he, ought naturally to fall only upon those, who had no just Cause for making War. Now in a Treaty of Peace, nothing is determined as to the Justice of the War, each continuing in his own Opinion as to that Point. III. From whence it arises, that the Right of Postliminii subsists even after such a Peace, according to Law XII. of the Digest, Princ. De Captiv. & Postlim. IV. It is to avoid this Inconvenience, that in Treaties of Peace, the Clauses, by which a general Amnesty is stipulated on both Sides, are so express and extensive. But this general Amnesty has a necessary Connection with the intent of a Peace, because the contrary might make Room for a new War. And the very Circumstance of not deciding upon the Justice of the Cause, proves, that the Damages, occasioned in Consequence of Acts of Hostilities, ought to be deemed by both Parties as justly sustained. The Law quoted is only a civil Law of the Roman People, upon a particular Case. See above, Chap. IX. of this Book, § 4. Note 3. and 11. Nor does the last Reason prove any Thing, since Things are often expressed which could not fail of being understood, in which Case they are only recited for the Sake of greater Precaution.

[1] For Instance, if before the War, a Thing had been sold and delivered to some Merchant of the Enemy's Country, and that Merchant had not paid for the Goods. The Examples alledged by GRONOVIVS in this Place are entirely misapplied, because they suppose the Creditor and Debtor are both of the same State.

[2] Hanc enim ob causam maxime, ut sua tenerent, Respublicae Civitatesque constitutae sunt. De Offic. Lib. II. Cap. XXI.

[1] The Example is not well applied, says GRONOVIVS, here. For these Merchants were not thrown into the Sea before the Peace was concluded, but some time after the End of the first Punick War. So that, as soon as the Affair came to the Knowledge of the Romans, they were for avenging it as an Infringement of the Treaty, and declared War against the Carthaginians, who, to avoid it, gave them up Sardinia. But our learned Critick himself without Reason supposes, that the Question here relates to Things committed during the War, but unknown at the Time the Treaty of Peace was on Foot. There is no Difficulty in regard to Things of this Kind. For who can know all the Acts of Hostility, that have been committed during the Course of a War? So that by the Parties holding themselves reciprocally discharged from all the Mischief they have done each other during the War, they always understand, as well what they do not know, as what they do. The false Application of the Example therefore consists, only in the Crime of the Carthaginians not being committed before the War, but after the Peace made and concluded.

[2] Antiq. Rom. Lib. III. Cap. VIII. p. 138. Edit. Oxon.

[3] Orat. Plataic. p. 299. Edit. Henr. Steph.

[1] Antiq. Rom. Lib. III. Cap. IX.

[1] It is, because then the Condition of the contracting Parties being unequal, there is great Reason to believe, that he, to whose Disadvantage the Inequality is, has pretended to engage himself as little as possible: And it was the other's Business, who was to have the Benefit of it, to have the Thing explained in as clear a Manner as possible.

[2] Each Party ought, and generally does, Interest itself more in the Restitution of Persons than Effects. Hence, in a doubt, they are supposed to have intended, that the Prisoners should be restored, for Instance, before all other Things, animate or inanimate, moveable or immoveable.

[3] Lands are commonly of much greater Value than moveable Things: And War is more frequently made for them. Hence it is supposed with Reason, that the former were more immediately the Object of Consideration than the latter.

[4] What the State has taken is also generally of much greater Value than what it has left to private Persons. Besides, it is more easy to be known.

[5] It is plain, that the Restitution of this Sort of Things is more easily granted, since in restoring them, nothing is lost that might have been had without that.

[1] ZIEGLER has Reason to say, that if the Party, to whom a Thing is yielded up by the Treaty of Peace, had seized it before, during the War, he ought also to have the Revenues of it for the Whole Time it has been in his Possession, by the Right of War; tho' the Cession of it gives him a new Title. But the Thing is clear in itself, and our Author intended to speak only of the Case, in which there might be some Difficulty. When a Thing is yielded up, which we had in our Power, as we seem thereby to acknowledge, that those to whom we make such Cession had a Right to it, it also seems first, that we ought to restore the Revenues, which have arisen to us from it, from the beginning of the War to the Conclusion of the Treaty of Peace. But when we only leave the Thing to those who have taken it, the Question is evidently superfluous; because the Possession, supported by the Right of War, secures the Revenue to the Possessor. Nevertheless, in the former Case, the Cession of itself, if rightly considered, has no retroactive Effect with regard to the Revenues. For till the Treaty of Peace, by which the Cession was made, the Right to the Thing yielded up was in Dispute; so that the Party who gives it up, acknowledges no Right in the other, but for the Time to come, and by Virtue of the Cession alone which he makes to him, by a Kind of Transaction. For the rest, that our Author intended to speak solely of this Case, appears from the Example which he alledges. For Sextus Pompeius was not in Possession of Peloponnesus. APPIANUS ALEXANDRINUS, whom our Author cites in the Margin, speaking before of the Conditions of the Treaty made between Octavius and Mark Antony on the one Side, and Sextus Pompeius on the other, distinguishes clearly Sardinia, Sicily, the Island of Corsica, and some others, which Pompey held at that Time from Peloponnesus, which he was to have besides, p. 713.

[1] See FRANCIS GUICCIARDIN in the fifth Book of his History. GROTIUS.

It will not be amiss to relate the Fact from this Historian in a few Words. Lewis XII. King of France, and Ferdinand V. King of Spain, had divided between themselves the Kingdom of Naples, after having expelled Alphonso King of Aragon. In this Partition Terra-di labore and Abruzzo were adjudged to the King of France; and Pouilla with Calabria to the King of Spain. A Dispute arose upon that about Capitanata, a small Country in the Kingdom of Naples. The French pretended, that this Country was Part of Abruzzo; and the Spaniards insisted, that it belonged to Pouilla. The first supported their Pretence by the antient Denomination, and the latter by the Custom of the present Times, established after the new Division which Alphonso had made of the Provinces. This gave Occasion to a great War between France and Spain.

[1] Compare PUFENDORF with this Place, Law of Nature and Nations, B. V. Chap. XII. § 9.

[1] PUFENDORF gives good Reasons for this, Law of Nature and Nations, B. VIII. Chap. VIII. § 4.

[a] See Albert. Argentin.

[2] Our Author has in View what the DECRETALS lay down with respect to Emphyteote, to whom they grant a small Delay, in regard to the Estates of the Church, after two Years have expired without his having paid Rent. See Lib. III. Tit. XVIII. De Locat. & conducto, Cap. ult.

[1] In this Case the strongest generally speaks first: But when Conditions are to be asked the weakest begins. Which Sylla told King Mithridates. PLUTARCH, in Vit. Sull. (p. 497. C.) GROTIUS.

[2] Est quidem ejus, qui dat, non qui petit, conditionem dicere pacis, &c. [LIVY, Lib. XXX. Cap. XXX. Num. 24.]

[3] This is determined by the Roman Law: Veteribus placet, pactionem obscuram, vel ambiguum, Venditori, & qui locavit, nocere: In quorum fuit potestate, legem apertius conscribere. Digest, Lib. II. Tit. XIV. De Pactis, Leg. XXXIX. It is indeed the Seller's Business to tell the Price of his Merchandize:

SA. Indica, fac pretium. Do. Tua merx est, tua indicatio est.

PLAUT : in Pers. (Act IV. Scen. IV. Ver. 37.) GROTIUS.

[1] For when there is no Contravention to the Articles of the Treaty, tho' a new Occasion of War be given, the Penalty agreed on is not thereby incurred, which was to have taken Place on the Violation of any of the Articles: Nor is the Party offended discharged from his Engagements. However, as Mr. BUDDAEUS observes in his Dissertation De Contraventionibus Foederum, (Cap. III. § 4.) when a new Occasion of War is given in this Manner, the Treaty of Peace is thereby broken indirectly; and with regard to the Effect, if Satisfaction for the Offence be refused. For then, the Offended having a Right to take Arms in order to do himself Justice, and to treat the Offender as an Enemy, against whom every Thing is lawful; he may also undoubtedly dispense with observing the Conditions of the Peace, tho' the Treaty has not been formally broken with regard to its Tenor. The same Author also very well observes, that this Distinction can scarce be of Use in these Days, because Treaties of Peace are conceived in such a Manner, that they include an Engagement to live in Amity for the future in all Respects; so that the least Occasion of War, how new soever it be, may be deemed an Infringement of the most important Article of the Treaty.

[1] (Lib. I. Cap. CXXIII.) A Deputy from the Armenians, in his Speech to Cosroez, King of Persia, said amongst other Things, as PROCOPIUS informs us, that they who break the Peace are not always the first in taking up Arms, but those who lay Snares for their Allies, even in the Time of the Alliance. Persic. Lib. II. (Cap. III.) The same Historian makes the Moors speak thus in another Place: "Those who break the Treaty of Peace are not such, as having received manifest Injuries, and made open complaint thereof separate from the Offender: But they are those, who making Profession of their Willingness to observe the Alliance, commit Violence however against their Allies, and thereby render GOD their Enemy. They are not People, who in breaking with an Ally, only carry off their own Effects; but such as by taking away those of others, reduce the lawful Proprietors to the Necessity of exposing themselves to the Dangers of War." Vandalic. Lib. II. Cap. XI. AMMIANUS MARCELLINUS relates, that in the Time of Valentinian, the Romans gave way on Purpose before the Persians, that they might not be the first in committing Hostilities, and thereby give Reason to believe, that they had broke the Alliance; so that they did not come to Blows, till the last Extremity: Operâque consultâ retrocedentes, &c. Lib. XXIX. init. GROTIUS.

[1] The Condition is partly arbitrary, (potestativa) as the Party, with whom the Peace is directly and immediately made, can contribute something, in some Manner or other to hinder his Allies from offending his antient Enemy. But it is casual, as he cannot absolutely hinder them from doing it, if they will not pay any regard to what he says or does for that End, and they are at the same Time in a Condition not to fear him. However as, from his having consented to the Rupture, in case his Allies should commit any Act of Hostility, he seems to have taken upon himself to hinder them from doing so; he has no Reason to complain, when that happens, even tho' he should have omitted nothing that depended on him. See further, upon the Division of Conditions into arbitrary, casual, and mixt, what PUFENDORF says in his Treatise, Of the Law of Nature and Nations, B. III. Chap. VIII. § 4.

[2] That is to say, the Plataeans. For when the Lacedaemonians had broke the Peace by seizing treacherously the Citadel Cadmea, the Thebans believed they had a Right to seize the City of Plataea, under Pretext, that having been the Ally of the Lacedaemonians, the act of the latter included also a Rupture with it. See PAUSANIAS, Lib. IX. seu Baeotic. Cap. I.

[a] Gel. 1. 7. cap. 3.

[1] This might be expressed in Latin by the Words of PLAUTUS : De praeda praedam capio. In Trucul. (Act II. Scen. VII. Ver. 15, 16.)

[2] He makes Philip King of Macedon say this, Lib. XVII. Cap. V.

[3] [See the Passage cited above, B. II. Chap. XXV. § 9. Note 2.] The Sabirian Huns fought also sometimes on one Side and sometimes on the other, as AGATHIAS observes, B. IV. (Cap. III.)

[4] Sanguini tamen nominique & praesentibus periculis consanguineorum id dari, ut si qui juventutis suae voluntate ad id bellum eant, non impediunt. Lib. V. (Cap. XVII.)

[1] In this Manner Augustus passed Sentence in favour of Herod against Syllaeus. See JOSEPHUS, Antiq. Jud. Lib. XVI. Cap. XVI. GROTIUS.

[1] See THUANUS, Hist. Lib. LXV. upon the Year 1578. There is also something upon this Head, in FRANC. HARAEUS, Hist. Brabant. Vol. II. upon the Year 1556. GROTIUS.

[2] But see what I have said, upon the Passage cited in the Margin.

[a] B. 2. Ch. 16. § 13.

[4] Our Author supposes reasonably, that those with whom we have this Kind of Ties, are not under our Dependence. For if the Injury is done, for Instance, to the Queen, or a Prince, the King's Son, not reigning himself elsewhere, it is the same as if offered to the King's Person. See BODIN, De Republic. Lib. V. Cap. VI. p. 951. Edit. Francofurt. 1622. The Roman Law considers an Injury received by the Wife or the Children, as received by the Husband or Father, and gives an Action to the latter in his own Name. See the Receptae Sententiae of the Civilian PAULUS, Lib. V. Tit. IV. § 3. and CUJAS and Mr. SCHULTING upon him; as also the JURISPRUDENTIA PAPIANEA of ANTHONY FAURE, Tit. IX. Princip. II. Illat. XXII.

[b] B. 2. Ch. 25. §4.

[1] SENECA, in Agamemn. Ver. 243.

[2] See a fine Example of it in the Treaty of Peace between the Emperor Justinian, and Cosroe, King of Persia; as MENANDER the Protector informs us, (Cap. II.) GROTIUS.

[a] See B. 2. Ch. 15. § 15.

[3] Lib. V. Cap. LXXIX.

[1] As in the Treaty of Peace between the Goths and the antient Franks. See PROCOPIUS, Gotthic. Lib. I. Cap. XII. GROTIUS.

[b] B. 3. ch. 19. § 14.

[a] B. 3. ch. 19. § 13.

[1] Nam si cum gente aliquâ, neque amicitiam, neque hospitium, neque foedus amicitiae caussâ factum habemus, &c. Digest, Lib. XLIX. Tit. XV. De Captiv.& Postlim. Leg. V. § 2. GROTIUS.

See what has been said above, B. II. Chap. XV. § 5.

[2] Post reditum in gratiam, si quid est commissum, id non neglectum sed violatum putatur, nec imprudentiae, sed perfidiae, adsignari solet. Fragm. Orat. pro. Aul. Gabin. apud Hieronym. Apolog. adv. Ruffin.

[3] Si quis sic fecit injuriam, &c. Digest, Lib. XLVII. Tit. X. De injuriis & famosis Libellis, &c. Leg. XV. § 35. See the same Title of the Institutes, §3.

[1] The famous Legislator Solon ordained, that no Strangers should be received into the Number of the Citizens of Athens, but such as were banished for ever by their Country, or who came to settle at Athens with their whole Families, in order to follow some Employment. PLUTARCH, in Vit. Solon. (p. 91. E.) King Perseus, as APPIANUS ALEXANDRINUS relates, said, to justify his giving Refuge to Exiles, that it was the common Right of all Men. Excerpt. Legat. Num. 25. (p. 367. Exc. Ursin.) This common Right is often confirmed, or rendered more strong by Treaties. See the Peace made with Antiochus, in POLYBIUS, Excerpt. Legat. XXXV. and that made between the Romans and Persians according to MENANDER the Protector, (Legat. Justin. Justinian. & Tiber. Cap. II.) as also what SIMLER says on the Articles of the Confederacy of the Swiss Cantons. The Aradians, whilst the Kings of Syria made War upon each other, obtained this Condition by a Treaty; that they should be permitted to give Refuge to all Syrians who came to take it in their Country; but that they should not expel, or deliver them up against their Will. STRABO, Geogr. Lib. XVI. (p. 754. Edit. Paris. Casaub.) GROTIUS.

[a] B. 2. Ch. 5. § 24.

[b] B. 2. Ch. 5. § 25.

[2] Et hercule quid adinet cuiquam exsilium patere, si nusquam exsuli futurus locus est? Lib. XLII. Cap. XLI. Num. 7.

[3] Orat. Leuctr. I. p. 105. C. Vol. II. Edit. P. Steph.

[4] See what is said upon that Place.

[c] Ubi supra, § 24. See Beza, l. 12.

[d] B. 3. ch. 7. §8.

[e] B. ii. ch. 21. § 3. &c.

[1] ZIEGLER, and others after him, criticise our Author, without Reason, in this Place, from having taken his Thought wrong. They make him say, that the Method of Lots is only to be used, when the Parties have an absolute Propriety in the Thing disputed for. But had they duly considered the Sequel of the Discourse, they would have found, that GROTIUS never intended to say so. For he simply admits of a Recourse to Lots, when we are sensible of being too weak to resist, and he makes no Distinction there between the Things, of which the Sovereign has always full Power to dispose, as his peculiar Right, and those which appertain to the Subject, for the Defence of which he has undertaken the War. What misled the Interpreters, was the Expression of the Original, which is a little ambiguous: Sortis aleae subjici belli exitus licite non semper potest, sed tum demum quoties de re agitur, in quam plenum habemus dominium. It seems at first Sight, that these Words, sed tum demum, &c. specify the Case excepted, in which the Method of Lots may be used: But here the semper potest is to be understood; for the Sense is, that it is only in Regard to Things of this Kind, that we always may, if we will, refer the Issue of a War to the Decision of Lots, even tho' we should do it in Circumstances, wherein it is not prudent to act in such a Manner; because every one may dispose of his own as he thinks fit. Whereas, when the Interest of the Subject is concerned, of which we are not absolute Masters, every other probable Means is to be tried, before we proceed to this, which is in its Nature entirely uncertain. This is our Author's Thought. It is however not amiss to observe upon this Occasion, how much it concerns an Author, especially when he writes in a concise Stile, to express his Sense with all possible Plainness and Perspicuity: Otherwise he gives Room for such as do not examine Things with sufficient Attention, that is to say, the greatest Part of his Readers, to take his Words in a quite different Meaning from his own, and to ascribe Things to the Writer, which never once entered his Thoughts.

[1] See B. XII. of VIRGIL's Aeneid, where the Combat is related at Length by the Poet, who, perhaps, invented it: For I know no other Authority for the Fact. There is nothing said of it in the little Treatise, De Origine Gentis Romanae, ascribed to AURELIUS VICTOR : He only says that Aeneas killed Turnus.

[2] This is related in the third Book of the Iliad.

[3] This Fact is in THESEUS, an antient Author, cited by STOBÆUS, Serm. VII. See the Miscellanea Laconica of MEURSIUS, Lib. IV. Cap. XIII.

[4] See above, Chap. IV. of this third Book.

[a] B. 2. c. 19. §5. and c. 21. § 11.

[b] B. 2. c. 1. § 12, &c.

[5] All these Reasons (says Mr. BUDDÆUS, Jurispr. Histor. Specim. § 23.) either prove nothing, or prove at the same Time, that it is never lawful to venture one's Life in a Combat of any Kind whatsoever. And this is what GRASWINCKEL has before asserted in his Defence of our Author against FELDEN, p. 259. See what I shall say presently, in Note 7.

[6] This was a superstitious Custom of the antient Germans, who called this Kind of Combats Judicia Dei, or Ordalia. See FRANCIS HOTOMAN, Obs. III. as also the Dissertation of Mr. BUDDÆUS, cited in the foregoing Note, § 25. that of Mr. HERTIUS, De Consultat. Legg. & Judiciis in Specialib. Rom. Germ. Imp. Rebuspubl. § 21. Vol. II. Opusc. 459, 460. and one of Mr. SLICHER's, intitled, De debita ac legitima Vindicatione Existimationis, &c. Printed at Amsterdam in 1717. p. 37. & seq.

[7] This Exception shews that the Thing is not bad in itself, and that all the Harm consists in exposing our own, or the Life of others, without Necessity to the Hazard of a single Combat, which would be unlawful, even tho' done without any Agreement. The Desire of terminating War, which has always such fatal Consequences, even to the victorious Party, is so laudable, that it may even excuse, if not intirely justify, those who engage, either themselves or others, imprudently in a Combat of this Nature. At least it seems to me, that in such Case, those who combat, not merely of their own Will, but by the Order of the State, are entirely innocent; for they are no more obliged to examine, whether the State acts prudently or not, than when they are sent upon an Assault, or to fight a pitched Battle.

[8] But there is a great Difference between these Examples and the Case in Question. When Usurers and Courtesans are tolerated, that Toleration of itself implies no Approbation; it is a simple Impunity, which the Law and Magistrates may, and ought often to grant, in Regard to several vicious Things. But set Combats are, by their Nature, such as could have no Effect, without being positively authorised by the State: So that if our Author's Reasons were good, the State never could, I do not say decree such Combats of their own meer Will, but even permit Champions to fight them, who should offer themselves for that Purpose; because that Permission implies always an Approbation, and is adequate to an express Order.

[c] See B. 2. ch. 23. § 10.

[9] See the foregoing Note.

[10] As Hyllus long before challenged Eurystheus. See EURIPIDES in the Heraclidae ver. 804, & seqq.

[11] Antiq. Rom. Lib. III. Cap. XII. It appears by what follows, that the Question is not at all determined by our Author's Principles and Reasons. For the Alban General refuses the Combat of one to one, and chooses rather that three should fight with three; because, says he, the Number Three includes, a Beginning, a Middle, and an End. Which is fine Morality.

[12] Thus the Adrianopolitans answered Mahomet, concerning himself and Musa Zeleb, as LEUNCLAVIUS relates, Lib. XI. In like Manner Cunibert, King of the Lombards, challenged King Alachis. PAUL. WARNAFRED. Lib. V. So Pharnacus challenged the General of the Sauromatae, to try which of them should have the Fortress of Cherso, that their Dispute might not expose a great Number of People to the Dangers of War. CONSTANTINE, Porphyrogonnet. Cap. De Castro Chersonis. See an Example of a single Combat for a Kingdom, in PONTANUS's History of Denmark, (Lib. V. p. 151. Edit. Amstel. 1631. where the Champions were Edmund Ironside and Canute) and what Historians say of the Challenges which passed between the Emperor Charles V. and Francis I. King of France. GROTIUS.

[1] Some Commentators say, that this Consent is not necessary, because the King of a Kingdom, not patrimonial, having a Right to make War and Peace, has also, by necessary Consequence, that of terminating War in such Manner as he shall judge most conducive to the Good of the Publick. But the Consequence is not just: For as the fundamental Laws, or rather the Nature of a Kingdom not patrimonial, deprive the King of the Power to alienate validly the Crown, by his sole Consent; by that alone, I say, the Right of making Peace includes an Exception of the Case, in which the Alienation of the Kingdom would be concerned.

[2] In feudis non liberis. Our Author uses here the Distinction of Fiefs free and not free, in an improper Sense, as he has done elsewhere. See what I have said B. I. Chap. III. § 23. Num. 2.

[1] There is a Verse of ENNIUS which says, that to be really Victor, even when victorious, it is necessary the Vanquished should confess it.

Qui vicit, non est victor, nisi victus fatetur

See SCALIGER upon FESTUS, at the Words Herbam do. GROTIUS.

The Passage of ENNIUS is in the Collection of HIERONYMUS COLUMNA, p. 133. Edit. Amsted. where the Note of that Commentator may be seen.

[2] Pulsique quum in fines suos se recipissent [Aequi] &c. Lib. III. Cap. I. Num. 12. In oppida sua se recepere, uti sua popularique passi, &c. Ibid. Cap. II. Num. 10.

[3] PLUTARCH says, this Permission, demanded by the Thebans after a Battle, assured the Victory to Agesilaus. In Vit. Agesil. (p. 606. B.) The same Historian observes elsewhere, that those who had obtained Permission to bury their Dead, were deemed, according to the received Custom, to have renounced the Victory, and could not erect a Trophy. In Vit. Niciae, (p. 527. A. B.) GROTIUS.

[1] Arbitrorum enim genera sunt duo, &c. Digest. Lib. XVII. Tit. II. Pro socio, Leg. LXXVI.

[2] These Arbitrators, according to the Ideas of Roman Law, are generally chosen by the Parties, to judge and determine something relating to the Engagements of a Contract; whereas the former are taken to terminate a Quarrel.

[3] Si Libertus ita juraverit, &c. Digest. Lib. XXXVIII. Tit. I. De operis Libertorum, Leg. XXX. See CUJAS, upon Law XLIII. of the Title of the Digest. De verborum obligationibus, Vol. I. Opp. Edit. Fabrott. p. 1224. & seq.

[4] See PLUTARCH, in the Life of Demetrius, p. 899. A.

[a] B. 2. c. 23. §8.

[5] See MARIANA, Hisp. Lib. XXIX. 15. BEMBO, Lib. IV. [Fol. 62. where he treats of an Arbitration between the Florentines and Venetians, in which the latter had made choice of Hercules, Duke of Ferrara, for their Arbitrator.] There are many Examples of Treaties of Peace concluded by the Means of Arbitrators in CROMER's Hisp. Polon. Lib. X. XVI. XVIII. XXI. XXIV. XXVII. XXVIII. There are also some in PONTANUS's History of Denmark, Lib. II. See also those we have cited above, B. II. Chap. XXIII. § 8. GROTIUS.

[6] Adeo summum quisque caussae suae judicem facit, quemcumque elegit, &c. Hist. Nat. Praefat.

Our Author undoubtedly supposes that there is neither Fraud nor Collusion on the Side of an Arbitrator. See PUFENDORF, Law of Nature and Nations, B. V. Chap. XIII. § 4. with which Place it is necessary to compare this whole Subject.

[1] Ideo melior videtur conditio causae bonae, si ad Judicem, quam si ad Arbitrum mittitur, &c. De Benefic. Lib. III. Cap. VII. But the Ambiguity of the Latin Word Arbiter misled our Author in this Place. Arbitrators, properly so called, are not meant here, but real Judges, who in Affairs bonae fidei, as the Roman Law expresses it, were to determine according to the Maxims of Equity, and not according to the Rigour of the Law, as I have observed elsewhere. See Mr. NOODT's Treatise, De & Imp. Lib. I. Cap. XIII.

[2] Rhetoric. Lib. I. Cap. XIII. in fin.

[3] Semper in obscuris, quod minimum est, sequimur. Digest, Lib. L. Tit. XVII. De divers. Reg. Jur. Leg. IX.

[1] This the Duke of Savoy said, in the Dispute which he had concerning the Marquisate of Saluzzes. See DE SERRES, [or rather the Continuator of his Work] in the Reign of Henry IV. GROTIUS.

[2] But see what I have said in the Chapter of PUFENDORF, cited § 6.

[3] Eodem anno inter Populum Carthaginiensem, &c. Lib. XL. Cap. XVII. Num. 1, 6.

[1] Which the Latins called Permittere de se arbitrium, as appears by the Demand which the Roman Senate made to the Aetolians, Interrogati ab uno Senatore, permetterent arbitrium de se Populo Romano, &c. LIVY, Lib. XXXVII. (Cap. XLIX. Num. 4.) GROTIUS.

[2] De Punic. Bell. (p. 34. Edit. H. Steph.)

[3] In Reality it is not merely as being become the Conqueror's Subject, that the Conquered may be treated in this Manner. Our Author is far from believing, that the latter, who in extreme Necessity, for Instance, render themselves Subjects to any one, who was not their Enemy, and give him the most absolute Power over them (which in Latin is expressed by dedere se.) (See above, B. II. Chap. V. § 31.) that the latter, I say, consent, that he should dispose at his Pleasure of their Estates and personal Liberty, and still less of their Lives. I observe this, because some Writers have falsely imagined that our Author has confounded these different Manners of submitting to a Person with each other.

[4] Et permissio libero arbitrio, ne in corpora sua saeviretur, metuebant. Lib. XXXVII. (Cap. VII. Num. 1.)

[a] Ch. 8. of this Book, § 4.

[5] Mos vetustus erat Romanis, &c. Idem, (Lib. XXVIII. Cap. XXXIV. Num. 7.) GROTIUS.

Our Author cites this Passage from the seventh Book of the Roman Historian, which was occasioned by his having taken it from the Semestria of PETER DU FAUR, Lib. I. Cap. VII. p. m. 43. where we find this false Citation, with another from another Book of LIVY.

[b] B. 3. c. 11. § 16.

[1] See a remarkable Example of this in MARIANA's History of Ferdinand, King of Leon, Lib. XI. Cap. XV. and compare this Place with what we have said in the eleventh Chapter of this last Book, § 14, 15. GROTIUS.

[a] B. 3. c. 15. § 16.

[2] Lib. XIII. Cap. XXI. and XXIII. p. 342, 343. Edit. H. Steph.

[3] De Bell. Civil. Lib. V. p. 697. Edit. H. Steph.

[4] For Instance in LIVY : Legationes finitimas ab Elaeunte, & Dardono, & Rheteo, TRADENTES IN FIDEM civitates suas benigne audivit. Lib. XXXVII. (Cap. IX. Num. 7.) Paullo, ut se suaque omnia in FIDEM ET CLEMENTIAM Populi Romani PERMITTERET, contendente. Lib. XLV. Cap. IV. in fin. GROTIUS.

To which may be added, this Passage of another Roman Historian, from whence it appears, that Persons surrendered in this Manner without Conditions: Mittuntur ad Imperatorem legati, qui Jugurtham imperata facturum, ac SINE ULLA PACTIONE sese regnumque suum IN ILLIUS FIDEM tradere. SALLUST, De Bell. Jug. Cap. LXVI. Edit. Wass.

[5] It is the same Thing, according to POLYBIUS, as to surrender to the Conqueror's Discretion. Excerpt. Legat. XIII. The Greeks express this thus, Ἐἰς δίκην σφᾶς αὐτοὺς παρὰ ἀδιδόναι, as in THUCYDIDES, Lib. III. (Cap. LXVII.) DIODORUS SICULUS says, Καθ' αὐτῶν ἐπιτρέπειν ἕξουσίαν. Lib. XIV. GROTIUS.

The last Passage is, Τῆν πᾶσαν καθ' αὐτῶν ἐπιτρέψαντες ἕξουσίαν. Biblioth. Histor. Lib. XIV. Cap. CXII. p. 453. Edit. H. Steph.

[6] Ubi supra, (p. 1116. Edit. Amstel.) LIVY expresses it thus, Ita ad extremum finivit, ut diceret, Aetolos se suaque omnia fidei Populi Romani permittere. Lib. XXXVI. (Cap. XXVIII. Num. 1.) GROTIUS.

[7] Non in servitutem inquit, &c. LIVY, ubi supra, Num. 4, 5, 6.

[8] Ubi supra.

[9] Adversus quam [civitatem] saevire cupiens, &c. VALERIUS MAXIMUS, Lib. VI. Cap. V. Num. 1.

[10] CAMPANORUM aliam conditionem esse, qui non foedere, sed per deditionem, in fidem venissent. LIVY, Lib. VIII. (Cap. II. Num. 13.)

This Example relates to a different Manner of speaking, of which our Author has himself treated above, B. I. Chap. III. § 21. Num. 3.

[11] Clementia liberum arbitrium habet; non sub formula, sed ex aequo & bono, judicat. & absolvere illi licet, & quanti vult, taxare litem. De Clement. Lib. II. Cap. VII. This alludes again to the Difference there was, according to the Roman Law, between Judex and Arbiter, of which I have spoke in Note 1. upon § 47.

[1] Thus the Inhabitants of the City of Phocaea, when they surrendered their City to L. Aemilius Regillus, stipulated, that no Hurt should be done to them. Tum portas aperuerunt, pacti, ne quid hostile poterentur. LIVY, Lib. XXXVII. Cap. XXXII. Num. 10.

[2] The Roman Praetor, spoken of in the foregoing Note, restored to the Phocaeans their City, Lands, and Liberty to live according to their own Laws. Urbem, agrosque, & suas leges iis restituit. LIVY, ibid. Num. 14. It is true, the Historian does not say this was by Way of Composition; but nothing hinders its being stipulated upon surrendering. Mr. THOMASIUS, in his Dissertation De Sponsione Romanorum Numantina, § 12. maintains, that there is no Example of a Composition, by which the Conqueror left those who surrendered any Part of their Civil Liberty. He adds some other Remarks against our Author, which I shall not examine; tho' he does not seem to have sufficiently comprehended his Principles. See above § 49. Note 3.

[a] B. 1. c. 3. § 17.

[a] B. 3. c. 4. § 14. and c. 11. § 18.

[2] And, in Consequence, the State may engage the corporal Liberty of Subjects, which is all that the Engagement of Hostages includes of itself. See PUFENDORF, Law of Nature and Nations, B. VIII. Chap. II. § 6.

[3] Or unless it has been expressly stipulated in the Act of Investiture. See CUJAS, in Feud. Lib. II. Cap. VII. and ALBERICUS GENTILIS, De Jure Belli, Lib. II. Cap. XIX. p. 397.

[1] Hostages are demanded and given for the Security of the Execution of some Engagement: Now in this Case it suffices, that the Hostages are retained, in such Manner as shall be judged proper, till the Performance of the Things agreed on; it is not at all necessary, that the Hostages become Slaves. But it is not the same in Regard to those which are taken after a City has been reduced to surrender; for they ought to be considered as Prisoners, who, according to the received Custom of old, became Slaves. The Hostages also, who have been given voluntarily, if those who gave them break the Conventions, and renew the War, fall into the same Condition; because, from thenceforth they become Enemies again. This Mr. BATTIER observes also, in the Dissertation cited before, (§ 19.)

[2] DIVUS COMMODUS rescripsit, Obsidum bona, sunt Captivorum, omnimodo in fiscum esse cogenda. Digest, Lib. XLIX. Tit. XIV. De Jure Fisci, Leg. XXXI. But the Hostages might make Wills, if the Roman People or Emperor permitted them; or if they had acquired the jus togae, that is to say, the Freedom of the City of Rome. See the following Law of the Title here cited, and CUJAS upon Law XI. of the Title Qui testamenta facere possunt, p. 1068. col. 2. Vol. I. Opp. Edit. Fabrott. as also the Treatise of the late Baron SPANHEIM intitled Orbis Romanus II. 7. p. 239, 240.

[1] But says Mr. BUDDAEUS, (in his Dissertation intitled, Jurisprud. Hist. Specimen, § 56.) either the State did intend that the Hostage should continue in the Hands of him to whom he was given, or that the State had not Power to oblige the Hostage to remain. The first is manifestly false; for otherwise the Hostage could be no Security, and the Convention would be illusive. Nor is the other more true; for if the State, by Vertue of its eminent Domain, can expose even the Lives of the Citizens, why may it not engage their Liberty? Mr. BATTIER, in the Dissertation which I have cited more than once, (§ 18.) declares also, and with Reason, against our Author's Opinion; who does not agree himself with what he advances, that the State ought to give up fugitive Hostages, as Mr. VANDER MEULEN observes on this Place.

[2] See what PLUTARCH says upon it, in the Life of Publicola. VIRGIL speaking of the Action of Clelia, says, that, having broken her Chains, she saved herself by Swimming,

Et fluvium vinclis innaret Cloelia ruptis.

(Aeneid, VIII. 651.) which the Commentator SERVIUS explains of the Engagement of the Treaty. Sed vincla pro custodiis accipimus, aut certe pro foederibus, &c. GROTIUS.

[3] Quemadmodum, si non dedatur obses, pro rupto se foedus habiturum, &c. LIVY, Lib. II. Cap. XIII. Num. 8.

[4] Et Romani pignus pacis ex foedere restituerunt, &c. Ibid. Num. 9.

[a] See B. 3. c. 2.

[1] That is to say, even tho' there be some other Reason for which they might be retained without that Clause. This is evidently our Author's Thought. So that ZIEGLER, and others after him, are in the Wrong to suppose the contrary; since they object to him, that an express Convention would not have more Force than a tacit one, by which the Party that receives Hostages, always engages to restore them, as soon as that is performed, for the Security of which they were given.

[1] See the Law cited above, Chap. IX of this Book, § 10. Note 7.

[2] De Bell. Syr. p. 117. Edit. H. Steph.

[3] Patruus ejus Demetrius, qui obses Rome erat, cognita morte Antiochi fratris, Senatam adiit, Obsidemque se, vivo fratre, venisse; quo mortuo, cujus obses sit, seignorare. Lib. XXXIV. Cap. III. Num. 6. Our Author observed here, that it was better to read, for the Connection of the Discourse, Obsidem inquiring se, &c. But BERNEGGER rejects this Correction, in his Note on this Place, without saying who is the Inventor of it. SCHEFFER however approves it. It is better, in my Opinion, to read Obsidem se, leaving out the que, which is not in some Manuscripts, as the latter of those Commentators acknowledges, that the Passage may be read without Inconvenience, by an Ellipsis, frequent in the antient Abridger we speak of.

[a] B. 2. c. 16. § 16.

[1] That is to say, they ought themselves to execute, in default of him for whom they are given as Hostages, what he had engaged to do, so that the Obligation of the former does not cease by the Death of the latter: And, at Bottom it is the same Thing as if they had entered into the Engagement themselves, and in their own Name. For, as to the Rest, our Author does by no Means pretend, that their Obligation may not be in itself subsidiary; as ZIEGLER supposes, and others after him, who, without Reason, often criticise this great Man, for Want of understanding his Thoughts.

[a] B. 2. c. 15. § 16.

[2] ALBERICUS GENTILIS, whom our Author cites in the Margin, does not say this. He supposes, on the contrary, (p. 396. Edit. Hanov. 1612.) that there has been a Consent of the Hostages themselves. ZIEGLER has before observed this Mistake.

[1] With this Difference however, that in such Case the Pledge is retained as a Pledge; but the Hostage not as an Hostage, but as a Subject responsible in that Quality for the Act of his Sovereign; as our Author has explained it above, § 55. Num. 2.

[2] One is more easily induced to leave Things than Persons in the Hands of another. This suffices as a Foundation for the Restriction.

[a] B. 2. c. 4. § 15.

[1] See what I have said, B. II. Chap. IV. upon § 15. or last.

[1]

— — — BELLI COMMERCIA
Turnus Sustulet ista prior — — —

(Aeneid X. 532.)

[2] Neque enim capere, aut venundare, aliudve quod BELLI COMMERCIIUM, sed caedes, patibula, &c. Annal. Lib. XIV. Cap. XXXIII. Num. 5. See also Histor. Lib. III. Cap. LXXXI. Num. 4.

[3] Iliad. Lib. XXII. ver. 261.

[4] Etenim cum inter Bellum & Pacem medium nihil sit, &c. Philip. VIII. Cap. I.

[5] (Ethic. Nicomach. Lib. I. Cap. III.)

[6] Ibid. Lib. VIII. Cap. VI.

[7] Paraph. Lib. I. Cap. XIV. p. 47. Edit. Heins.

[8] Ad VI. Ethic. Nicom. (Cap. I.)

[*] SENECA maintains, that an eloquent Man is such, tho' he holds his Tongue, and an Artist an Artist, tho' he has not the Instruments necessary for the Exercise of his Trade: Artifex est etiam, cui ad exercendam artem instrumenta non suppetant—Quomodo est disertus, etiam qui tacet. De Benefic. Lib. IV. Cap. XXI.

[9] Nam neque pax est Induciae: Bellum enim manet, pugna cessat, &c. Noct. Attic. Lib. I. Cap. XXV.

[10] Quum induciae bella suspenderant, &c. Cap. IX. Num. 5. Edit. Cellar.

[11] For Instance, to pay so much for the Ransom of Prisoners, during the War, &c. that Commerce should be free during the War, between Merchants, &c.

[12] If, for Instance, certain Contributions during the War be agreed on, as those Contributions are only granted to prevent Acts of Hostility; they ought to cease during the Truce, because at that Time Acts of Hostility are no longer lawful.

[13]

— — — Et pace sequestrà
Per Silvas Teucris, mixtique impune Latini
Erravêre jugis — — —

Aeneid, Lib. XI. ver. 133. & seq.

[14] PACEM ergo SEQUESTRAM inducias dicit: id est, pacem temporalem, & mediam inter bellum praeteritum & futurum.

[15] In Lib. I. Cap. XL. p. 25. Note 3. Edit. Oxon. It is a maritime Term applied here. See the Dissertation of a learned German Civilian named JOHN STRAUCHIUS, De Induciis, (§ 2.) which is the fifth and last of a Collection printed at Brunswick, in 1662.

[16] INDUCIAE, inquit, sunt pax castrensis, paucorum dierum. Apud GELLIUS, ubi supra, I. 25.

[17] Item alio in loco: INDUCIAE, inquit, sunt belli feriae. Idem, ibid.

[18]

Et PACEM piger annus habet, messesque reversa
Dimisere forum — — —

Silvar. Lib. IV. Silv. IV. ver. 40.

[19] Lib. De Somn. & Vigil. Cap. I. in fin.

[20] INDUCIAE sunt pax in paucos dies, vel quod in diem dentur, vel quod in dies otium praebeant. In Eunuch. TERENCE. Act. I. Scen. I. ver. 15.

[21] Neque paucorum tantum, &c. Noct. Attic. I. 25.

[22] See Lib. I. Cap. XV. and Lib. VII. Cap. XX. and compare PUFENDORF with this Place, Law of Nature and Nations, B. VIII. Chap. VII. § 3, 4.

[23] Induciae sunt, quum in breve & in praesens tempus convenit, ne invicem se lacessant: Quo tempore non est postliminium. Digest, Lib. XLIX. Tit. XV. De Captiv. & Postlim. &c. Leg. XIX. § 1.

[24] For Instance, if it be agreed, that, during the Peace, the Subjects on both Sides may traffick in certain Merchandises of no Use in War.

[a] B. 2. c. 16. § 20.

[1] Mr. BARBEYRAC has thrown all but the last Period of this Paragraph into a Note, and says, it may serve, as much as any other, to justify the same Liberty, which he has taken in many Places, in Regard to Things little necessary, that often interrupt the Chain of the Discourse, so as to occasion the losing Sight of the principal Subject. What a Mess are all these grammatical Niceties, continues he, to a Reader who enquires here after the Law of Nature and Nations? How well founded and useful soever they may be in other Respects, an Author ought to resist the Temptation he may be under, of placing so preposterously the Discoveries he believes he has made of this Kind; and nothing proves better the Necessity of permitting Writers to use Notes upon their own Works; because they may thereby satisfy themselves, and even sometimes serve the Publick, without Offence to their Readers, or prejudicial to the Understanding of the Subject they treat of. For the Rest, as Tastes are very different, especially in Point of Etymologies, some are for deriving Induciae, not from inde, but from the old Word endu or indu, for in. See the Institutiones Oratoriae of VOSSIUS, Lib. IV. Cap. XIII. § 11. and his Etymologicon.

- [a] See Servius in Aen. x. 24.
- [b] And from Ostrea, Ostreorum, Ostraea, Ostreae, an Oyster.
- [2] Thus, for Instance, LIVY says of Papirius, in Regard of the Falisci. Et Faliscis PACEM petentibus annuas Inducias dedit. Lib. X. Cap. XLVI. Num. 12. See the Passage cited in Note 2. on the following Paragraph.
- [1] See PUFENDORF, Law of Nature and Nations, Lib. VIII. Cap. VIII. § 6.
- [2] Cum Veientibus nuper acie, &c. Lib. IV. Cap. XXX. Num. 14.
- [1] That is to say, from the Moment the Truce is concluded, to the same Moment of the last Day; and not with Regard to the Beginning or End of the Civil Day, which begins and ends at different Times, according to the Places and Customs of different Nations. Thus, by the Roman Law, an Infant is held to be a Year old, when it attains to the Beginning of the three hundred and sixty-fifth Day: Whereas, according to the natural Calculation, the Year is not compleat till that Moment of the Day in which the Child came into the World. Anniculus, non statim ut natus est, sed trecentesimo sexagesimo quinto die dicitur, incipiente planè, non exacto die: Quia annum civiliter, non ad momenta temporum, sed ad dies, numeramus. Digest, Lib. L. Tit. XVI. De verborum signific. Leg. CXXXIV.
- [2] Thus decides BALDUS, De Statutis, in verb. Usque. BARTOLUS in L. Patronus, D. De Legat. III. & in L. Nuptae 12. D. De Senatorib. ARCHIDIACONUS, in C. Ecclesias. XIII. Qu. 1. HIERON. DE MONTE, Lib. De Finibus, Cap. XXIII. GROTIUS.
- [3] Metaphys. Lib. V. Cap. XVII.
- [4] Si quis sic dixerit, ut intra diem mortis ejus aliquid fiat; ipse quoque dies, quo quis mortuus est, numeratur. Digest, Lib. L. Tit. XVI. De verb. signific. Leg. CXXXIII.
- [5] Introiit Curiam, spreta religione, Spurrinamque irridens, & ut falsum arguens, quod sine ullâ noxâ Idus Martiae adessent. Quamquam is, venisse quidem eas, diceret, sed non praeteriisse. SÜETONIUS, in Caes. (Cap. LXXXI. in fin.) DION CASSIUS expresses the Soothsayer's Words thus, Πᾶρεστιν, οὐδέ ποῦ δὲ παρελήλυθεν. (Lib. XLIV.) And APPIANUS ALEXANDRINUS, Πάρεισιν αἱ Ἴεδοι, Ἄλλ' οὐ παρεληλυθασιν. (De Bell. Civ. Lib. II. p. 522. Edit. H. Steph.) GROTIUS.
- [6] But see PUFENDORF, in the Chapter already cited more than once, § 8. What our Author says here is so much the worse founded, as it does not agree with what he had said just before himself; that in Regard to a Truce, the Prolongation of Time has something favourable in it. STRAUCHIUS, in the Dissertation I have cited before, Cap. V. § 2. had long ago declared himself against our Author, upon this Head.
- [1] They cannot know it certainly before that: And the Case is the same as when the War began. It frequently happens that there is Reason to believe, from the Preparations making, and the Rumours or Advices to be relied on, that a War is resolved: However, till the Declaration of it be published in Form, no one ought to attack the Enemy, as may be done afterwards. So that nothing is more frivolous, than the Objections which some Commentators make in this Place against our Author's Opinion.
- [2] It is true they are not in fault, as it is supposed, that the Truce could not be notified sooner to such as are at a remote Distance. But as each Party stands engaged for himself and Subjects, who, from the Moment the Truce is concluded, should all be held to discontinue Acts of Hostility, if it were possible for them to be apprized of the Treaty, which ought immediately to be notified to them; each ought also to be deemed as engaged to disapprove, and hold for null, all Acts of Hostility committed in remote Places, and, in Consequence, to make all possible Amends to such as have suffered by them. It suffices, that they are not responsible for the Impossibility they have been under to prevent them, and that it cannot reasonably be considered as an Infringement of the Truce.

[3] This the Athenians pretended, in Relation to Scione, which had surrendered two Days after the Conclusion of a Truce. See THUCYDIDES, Lib. IV. (Cap. CXXII.) So what the Spaniards did in Italy, according to MARIANA, XXVIII. 7. is not to be justified. GROTIUS.

[1] The Truce is here supposed to be general. But sometimes a Truce is made for certain Places only, for Instance, by Sea, and not by Land: Or in Regard to certain Acts of Hostility, as the ravaging of the Country, &c. See PUFENDORF, in the Chapter cited above, § 3. Our Author observed, in a small Note upon § 10. that Examples of Truces may be found in PROCOPIUS and MENANDER the Protector, in which certain Places were excepted.

[2] Nunc Fraudem hostium incusans, qui, pace petita, induciis datis, per ipsum induciarum tempus, contra jus gentium, ad castra oppugnanda venissent. Lib. XL. Cap. XXVII. Num. 9.

[3] See the Law cited above, § 1. Note 23.

[4] Denique obsessa urbe, &c. In Aeneid, XI. 134. But here the Safety of Egress and Regress is rather meant, than the Care not to do any Thing in going out and coming in, that may give Umbrage to the other Party. For the Rest, the Reader may see the Paroemiae Juris Germanici of the late Mr. HERTIUS, II. 14, 15. wherein he explains in what Manner safe Conduct is abused.

[a] See an Example in Paruta, l. 3.

[1] Coronaei & Haliartii, &c. Lib. XLII. Cap. XLVI. Num. 9, 10.

[a] Port, Centcelles, and Albe.

[1] But see what I have said against PUFENDORF, who is of the same Opinion, § 10. of the Chapter already cited several Times. Our Author, and STRAUCHIUS, who follows him, (Cap. ult. § ult. Diss. De Induciis.) have here departed without Reason from ALBERICUS GENTILIS, De Jure Belli, Lib. II. Cap. XIII.

[a] B. 3. c. 9. § 4.

[2] Tamen eum, qui ante Idus Martias profectus ex portu, & relates tempestate in Insulam deductus esset, si inde exisset non videri contra legam fecisse. Digest, Lib. XXXIX. Tit. IV. De Publicanis, & Vectigalibus, & Commissis, Leg. XV. Si propter necessitatem adversae tempestatis expositum onus fuerit, non debere hoc commissio vindicari, Divi Fratres rescripserunt. Ibid. Leg. XVI. § 8.

[1] They cannot, for Instance, retire during that Time, into a more secure Post, nor intrench themselves. PUFENDORF, in the Chapter to which I have referred several Times, is of a different Opinion, § 9. He maintains, after STRAUCHIUS, (Diss. De Induc. Cap. V. § 4.) that these Sort of Things, which tend solely to put one's self into a State of Defence, have nothing unlawful in them, because no one is deemed to renounce his Right to defend himself. And, adds he, it is the Fault of him who grants such Truce, if it gives the Enemy Opportunity to render himself stronger. But these Reasons, upon close Examination, prove nothing: And the late Mr. BATTIER, whom I have quoted before, has declared, with Reason, for GROTIUS, in a small Academical Dissertation, intituled, De Induciis Bellicis, printed in 1697. The Party, says he, that hath granted a short Truce for the Interment of the Dead, hath granted it for that Purpose only, and there is all the Reason in the World to believe, that he would not have permitted any Thing further, had it been demanded of him. And besides the Reason alledged by our Author, if, in the Time granted by the Truce for the Interment of the Dead, the Enemy endeavours to intrench himself, and we prevent him by Force, I do not see that he can have any Room to complain. Now how could one and the same Convention give one Party a Right to do a Thing, and the other to prevent it? I add, that the Right of defending one's self, which PUFENDORF speaks of, and which no one, he says, is supposed to renounce, regards only the Case wherein one is actually attacked, and not the Measures which may be taken to prevent a remote and uncertain Danger. Now the Question here relates to the latter. For the Rest, the Examples of Tissaphernes, from CORNELIUS NEPOS, in Agesil. Cap. II. and of XENOPHON, Orat. de laud. Agesil. Cap. I. § 10, 11. Edit. Oxon. are very apposite. But as to that of Philip, alledged by Mr. BATTIER, and others, after ALBERICUS GENTILIS, Lib. II. Cap. XIII. p. 313. it is not applicable here, but to the Case our Author speaks of in § 7. where he also alleges precisely the same Fact. He who first cited it repeats it wrong: Se recepit, says he, in loca tutiora, which LIVY does not say, but only that Philip decamped without Noise. Silenti agmine abiit, Lib. XXXI. Cap. XXXVIII. at the End.

[2] As the Neapolitans obtained from Totilas, in PROCOPIUS.

[3] See the Decretals, Tit. De Judaeis. Cap. XI.

[4] By reserving a Right to pillage, when the Security of Persons on both Sides is agreed on; the Right of defending against Pillage is also reserved: And hence the Security of Persons is not general; but only for such as go and come without Intent to take any Thing from the Enemy, with whom such limited Truce is made.

[a] B. 3. c. 19. § 14. and c. 20. § 35.

[1] In this Case, the Party against whom Hostilities are committed, notwithstanding the Truce, may also, besides the Penalty stipulated by it, exact Amends for what he has otherwise suffered by the Infraction of the Treaty. Mr. BATTIER makes this Remark in the Dissertation cited before, § 10. or last.

[2] See PUFENDORF, Law of Nature and Nations, § 11. of the Chapter which answers to this.

[1] If, for Instance, to treat of Peace be the Matter in Question, and the Passport has been given for that End.

[1] Thus, in the Roman Law, concerning privileged Wills, the Word Miles, in Opposition to that of Paganus, generally signifies all those who are actually upon a military Expedition, whether they command or obey, are Officers or common Soldiers.

[2] According to which those who obey are called Milites, or Troops, in Opposition to Officers, Generals or Subalterns. This is a known Thing, and ALBERICUS GENTILIS proves it by Authorities, in his De Jure Bell. Lib. II. Cap. XIV. p. 321. where he decides in a different Manner from our Author, both upon this and the following Example.

[3] The Word Κληρικοὶ, from whence the Latin Clerici, and our Words Clerk, and Clergy, are derived, included at first, that is to say, from the Beginning of the third Century, when this Custom was introduced, all publick Ministers of Religion, of whatsoever Order they were; in Opposition to Laicks, (Λαϊκοὶ) or simple Believers. See Mr. BOEHMER's Dissertation, De differentia inter Ordinem Ecclesiasticum & Plebem, seu inter Clericos & Laicos, which is the sixth of his Dissertationes JURIS ECCLESIASTICI antiqui ad PLINIUM SECUNDUM, & TERTULLIANUM, and the ninth Dissertation of the same Collection, § 2. as also the fifth Chapter of his Origines praecipuarum materiarum Juris Ecclesiastici, published with his SCHILTERUS illustratus. To which may be added, the fifth Chapter of the first Book of Mr. BINGHAM'S Antiquities of the Christian Church, from which the learned and judicious Author of the Bibliotheca Anglicana has given us several curious Extracts. But in Process of Time the Term Clerk or Clergy was confined to Ecclesiasticks of an inferior Class; so that Bishops were not comprehended under that Name. Examples of this are very common; and to this relates a Passage of the DECRETALS, cited by our Author in the Margin, but which is improperly placed in the Margin of the preceding Paragraph, in all the Editions of the Original, without excepting mine, (Mr. BARBEYRAC'S) where the Printers have forgot to put it in its right Place, as I had marked it in their Copy. CLERICI sane, si contra istam formam quemquam elegerint; & eligendi tunc potestate privatos, & ab Ecclesiasticis beneficiis triennio noverint se suspenses—EPISCOPUS autem, si contra hanc fecerit, aut consenserit fieri, in conferendis praedictis Officiis & Beneficiis potestatem amittat, &c. Lib. I. Tit. IV. De Electione & Electi potestate, Cap. VII. § 3. In the CODIX THEODOSIANUS the Bishops are called Primi Clerici, Lib. XVI. Tit. VIII. De Judaeis, Caelicolis, &c. Leg. XIII. See the learned JAMES GODOFROY, p. 228. Vol. VI. and p. 31, 32. of the same Volume.

[4] In classibus omnes Remiges & Nautae milites sunt; & jure militari eos testari posse, nulla dubitatio est. Digest, Lib. XXXVII. Tit. XIII. De bonorum possessione ex testamento militis, Leg. I. § 1.

[1] There may be however some Cases in which the one does not imply the other. Let us suppose, for Instance, that a safe Conduct is granted to some Person of the Enemy's Party to go, not into some other Place of their own People's, but into a third or neutral Country; to Rome, for Example, or into France, when he cannot go thither without passing through the Dominions of him who grants the Passport: In that Case, if he would return by the same Rout, a new Passport is necessary; the Advantage of the first being expired. This the late Mr. HERTIUS, after others, very well observes, in his Dissertation De Literis Commeatibus pro pace, § 13. p. 327, 328. Vol. I. Opusc. & Commentat.

[2] This was a Blot, says PLUTARCH, that tarnished the Lustre of that Conqueror's military Actions, who, on other Occasions, made War with Justice, and in a Manner worthy of a King. (In Vit. Alexandr. p. 698. C. Vol. I. Edit. Wech.) LEUNCLAVIUS relates a like Treachery of Bajazet to the People of the City of Widin in Servia. Hist. Turc. Lib. VI. GROTIUS.

[3] Mr. HERTIUS maintains, however, in the Dissertation which I have cited a little above, (§ 15. p. 330.) that when a Passport is given in Order to treat of Peace, as that may be done, either in Person or by another, the Party may either go himself or send another in his Place.

[4] If, for Instance, it be expressed, that he may come during six Months, and if he can go and come several Times during that Term.

[1] Quum precario quis rogat, ut ipsi in eo fundo morari liceat: Supervacuum est adjici, ipsi suisque. Nam per ipsum suis quoque permissum uti videtur. Digest, Lib. XLIII. Tit. XXVI. De Precario, Leg. XXI. seu penult.

[1] When, for Instance, it is expressed with his French or German Attendants. Our Author insinuates, that if it be only said, with his Attendants, or Followers, it does not signify of what Nation they are. By which he tacitly rejects the Opinion of ALBERICUS GENTILIS, who, in his Treatise De Jure Belli, Lib. II. Cap. XIV. p. 325. inclines to believe, that when the Nation is not expressed, it is supposed the Attendants or Train ought to be of his Nation to whom the Passport is given.

- [1] It may, however, be revoked, in my Opinion, if the Successor deem it proper for good Reasons; but in such Case it is necessary, that the Person to whom the safe Conduct has been granted, should have Notice given him to retire, and the necessary Time allowed him for removing into a Place of Safety.
- [a] B. 2. C. 14. § 12.
- [1] The Clause, during Pleasure, implies in itself a Continuation of safe Conduct, till it be expressly revoked, and the Change of Will thus signified, which otherwise is deemed always to subsist, whatever Time may be elapsed. This is also the Decision of ALBERICUS GENTILIS, De Jure Belli, Lib. II. Cap. XIV. in fin. where he adds another Example of the Exception, which our Author makes here after him; that is, when he who has given the safe Conduct is no longer in the Employment, by Vertue of which he was empowered to grant such Security. And indeed his Authority concluding at that Time, he is no more in a Condition to continue his good Will, than if he were dead.
- [2] Thus when a Person has given a Lodging in his House to another, during his own Pleasure, and happens to die, the Heirs may turn the other out of the House; as it is determined in a Law, explained according to the Correction of a great Man, Mr. ANTHONY FAURE, (Conject. Jur. Civ. Lib. II. Cap. XIX. LUCIUS TITIUS *epistolam talem misit: Ille illi salutem. Hospitio illo, quamdiu voluero [so this learned Civilian reads it, for volueris] utaris, superioribus diaetis omnibus gratuito: Idque te ex voluntate mea facere, hac epistola tibi notum facio. Quaero, an haeredes ejus habitationem prohibere possunt? Respondit, secundum ea quae proponerentur Haeredes ejus posse mutare voluntatem. Digest. Lib. XXXIX. Tit. V. De Donationibus, Leg. XXXII. This is very clearly expressed in another Law: Locatio, precariive rogatio, ita facta, quoad is, qui eam locasset, dedissetve, vellet, morte ejus, qui locavit, tollitur. Lib. XIX. Tit. II. Locati conducti, Leg. IV. See Cardinal TUSCHUS, Pract. Conclus. 751. lit. p. REINKING, Lib. II. Class. II. Cap. VIII. Num. 30. GROTIUS.*
- [a] B. 3. ch. 4. § 8.
- [1] Captivorum redemptio, magnum atque praeclarum justitiae munus est. Inst. Divin. Lib. VI. Cap. XII. Num. 15. Edit. Cellar.
- [2] Praecipua est igitur liberalitas, redimere captivos, & maxime ab hoste barbaro, &c. De Offic. Lib. II. Cap. XV.
- [3] Ornatus sacramentorum, redemptio captivorum est. Ibid. Cap. XXVIII. St. AUSTIN imitated this Action, as POSSIDIUS relates, who says, that some worldly Persons did not approve it. (De Vita Augustin. Cap. XXIV.) Another Bishop of Africa, named Deo-gratias, did the same Thing, as VICTOR UTICENSIS informs us, Lib. I. HINCMAR, in his Life of St. Remigius relates, that a consecrated Vessel, which had been that Prelate's, was given to ransom Prisoners taken by the Normans. MARK ADAM, in his Ecclesiastical History of Bremen, relates a like Action of Rembert, Archbishop of that City. The sixth, or rather eighth, General Council approved such a Use of consecrated Vessels; and the Decree thereupon has been inserted in the Canon Law, Caus. XII. Quaest. II. Can. XIII. GROTIUS.
- [1] The learned BOECLER, in his Dissertation, intituled, Miles Captivus, (Vol. I. p. 981.) criticises our Author upon this Place. There are, says he, no other Roman Laws, that prohibit the ransoming of Prisoners, but those of the military Discipline, the Violation of which was punished in that Manner. There is not one that forbids entirely the ransoming of Prisoners: But when the Roman Soldiers were taken by the Enemy, it was examined, whether they had observed the Laws of military Discipline, and in Consequence, whether they deserved to be ransomed. It is true the Side of Rigour generally prevailed; as that which was thought most advantageous to the Republick; from the Persuasion, that many had fallen into the Enemy's Hands, only in Consequence of some Fault contrary to their Engagements. This is all the Passage cited by GROTIUS proves; and T. Manlius Torquatus, in opposing the ransoming of Prisoners, speaks only of an antient Custom. Utmorem traditum a patribus, necessario ad rem militarem exemplo, servaretis. LIVY, XXII. 60. Num. 7. Whether the Laws themselves of the Roman military Discipline were not too rigorous, is a different Question.

[2] Nemo nostram ignorat, nulli unquam civitati viliores fuisse captivos, quam nostrae, &c. LIVY, Lib. XXII. (Cap. LIX. Num. 2.) See another Passage of the same Author, [quoted above, Chap. IX. of this Book, § 4. Num. 2.]

[3]

*Dissentientis conditionibus
Foedis, & exemplo trahenti
Perniciem veniens in aevum.
* * * * **
---- ---- *Flagitio additis
Damnum. ---- ----*

(Lib. III. Od. V. ver. 13. & seq. 26, 27.) GROTIUS.

[a] B. 2. Ch. 25. § 3.

[1] It suffices to say, that the Circumstance of the Prisoner's having more or less Riches, has no Relation to the Engagement. So that if his Ransom was to be settled by his Worth, that Condition should have been put in the Contract.

[a] B. 2. ch. 12. § 26.

[a] B. 3. Ch. 7. § 4.

[1] Caeterum quod BRUTUS & MANILIUS, &c. Digest, XLI. Tit. II. De adquir. vel amitt. possess. Leg. III. § 3. See CUJAS upon this Point, Recit. in Paulum, ad Edictum, Vol. V. Opp. p. 748.

[2] When Prisoners of War became Slaves, as, according to the received Custom, the Master acquired a Right of Property both over their Persons and Estates; it was not necessary, that he should actually take Possession of all they might have, or even have Knowledge of it, provided he could seize it, when discovered: The Intention of appropriating to himself all the Goods known or unknown of his Prisoner, was evident, and a natural Consequence of the Thing; as when a Person acquires an Estate in Land, where there may be many Things which have a natural Dependence upon it. But the Case is different amongst us, with whom the Custom of Slavery is abolished. Whatever desire we may have to take and appropriate all that belongs to a Man we have made Prisoner of War, we have no other Right over his Person, than to detain it till a Ransom be paid, or Peace concluded. So that we may search, rifle, and appropriate all we can find, that belonged to him; but if we have neglected to make the necessary Search, or the Prisoner, who is under no Obligation to declare all he has, has found Means to conceal something from us; there is then no Acquisition of that Thing; neither is it acquired as a natural Dependence of some other Thing, as the Prisoner does not belong to him, who took him. So that the Example of the Treasure, unknown to the Master of the Land, is very proper here. And further: Let us suppose that before any Agreement concerning Ransom, the Person, in whose Possession the Prisoner is, discovers some Effects belonging to the Prisoner in the Hands of a third Person, but which this third Person has found either amongst the Booty made in plundering, or in the Hands of another Prisoner, whom he has taken himself: Will any Body say, that these Effects may be reclaimed by the former, upon Pretence that they belonged to his Prisoner? So that ZIEGLER's Criticism is no better founded here, than almost every where else. I must say the same of the late Mr. HERTIUS's Thought, who in his Dissertation De Lytro, (Sect. II. § 30. p. 287. Vol. I. Opusc. & Comm.) tho' he falls in with that Commentator in regard to the pretended Acquisition of Effects unknown, approves however our Author's Decision, and makes it extend even to Prisoners of War, who actually become Slaves. His Reason is, that he who treats with his Prisoner, does thereby declare, that he is contented with the Ransom he requires of him: Whence he is deemed from thenceforth to have lost Possession of the Effects, which he had acquired with the Person; and much more, of those which he had acquired without acquiring at the same Time a Right of Property over the Person. But he who treats for Ransom with his Prisoner, intends certainly to gain something: He would gain nothing, if the Prisoner only gave him what he has already. Thus if we suppose, that even the concealed Effects belonged to him, it is evident he must have treated only under this Condition, that there shall be nothing of that Kind in what is given him for the Ransom: So that the Condition not being performed, the Agreement falls to the Ground of course. For this Reason, the Decree of Scanderbeg, which PUFENDORF also repeats, B. VIII. Chap. VII. § 12. is rather a favourable Decree, passed in Consideration of the unhappy Condition to which Persons are reduced by Slavery, than a Sentence founded upon the Rigour of Law. For as that famous Captain made War with the Turks, he had a Right to authorize, and undoubtedly did authorize, by way of Reprisals, the Slavery of the Prisoners of War.

[a] B. 2. ch. 2. § 22. and ch. 15. § 16. B. 3. ch. 20. § 58.

[1] This Paul Balioni did not do, who was released upon Condition of setting Cardinal Carvajali at Liberty, who died whilst a Prisoner. And MARIANA, Hist. Hisp. Lib. XXX. blames Balioni for having acted in that manner. But PARUTA, Lib. II. relates the Fact with some little Difference. GROTIUS.

See further, upon the same Case, which happened to a Venetian General taken by the Spaniards, PAULUS JOVIUS, Hist. Lib. XII. Vol. I. p. 203. Edit. Basil. 1556. where he is called Balconus.

[2] As thus. A Person has given a Thing, in order to have another for it. He who was to give it, fails, whether he be able to give it, or not being able, he is or is not in Fault: In this Case, the other contracting Party may either bring his Action praescriptis verbis, for Damages and Interest, or redemand what he has given, even tho' the Thing, he ought to receive, has perished by some fortuitous and inevitable Accident; as well because he had given what was his with the View of something he has not had, as because in this Kind of Contracts, which had no proper and peculiar Name, he who had begun the Execution in this Manner, was at Liberty to retract, before the other had performed his Engagements. See Digest, Lib. XIX. Tit. V. De Praescriptis verbis, &c. Leg. V. § 1. and Lib. XII. Tit. IV. De conditione caussâ datâ caussâ non sequuta, Leg. ult. Laws cited by our Author in the Margin. The Reader may consult Mr. NOODT, Probabil. Jur. Lib. IV. Cap. IV. and V. where he learnedly and judiciously explains, according to his Custom, these Laws which are both difficult, and one of them corrupt in one Place. See also what I have observed, upon B. II. Chap. XII. § 3. Num. 3. According to these Principles of the Roman Lawyers, the Person who has released a Prisoner of War in the Case in question, would have a Right to oblige that Prisoner to return into Captivity after the Death of the other.

[1] Publica Conventio est, quae fit per pacem, quotiens inter se Duces belli quaedam paciscuntur. Digest, Lib. II. Tit. XIV. De Pactis. See upon this Law, the fine Treatise of Mr. NOODT, De Pactis, Cap. VII. where he shews, that aut quotiens, &c. should be read with some antient Editions, so that there are two different Examples in this Place; the one of Conventions made when a Peace is treated of; the other of those made during a War between the Generals of the two opposite Armies. It must be confessed however, that the Words, quae fit PER PACEM, so explained, have some thing very stiff in them, as Mr. SCHULTING observes, Enarrat. in primam partem Pandectarum, ad Tit. De Pactis, § 2. I find in the Dissertation of a learned German Civilian, named STRAUCHIUS, (De Induciis, Cap. III. § 1.) which I have cited upon the preceding Chapter, an overture, of which use may be made here in joining to it the Particle aut, that he did not think of. He conjectures, that ULPIAN intended to distinguish two Sorts of publick Conventions: The one made during Peace, or between those who live in Peace with each other; the other, made during a War, wherein the Generals usually treat in the Name and by the Authority of the State, for which they command. Upon this Foot the natural Signification of the Terms, per pacem, is preserved in all the Purity of the Latin Tongue.

- [2] Nec duces novimus, nisi sub cujus auspicio bellum geritur. Lib. IV. (Cap. XX. Num. 6.)
- [3] Aliae enim sunt Legati partes, aliae Imperatoris: Alter omnia agere ad praescriptum, alter libere ad summam rerum consulere debet. Comm. de Bell. Civil. Lib. III. Cap. LI.
- [1] See CAMBDEN, upon the Year 1594. where he relates the Sentence of Count Miranda in the Affair of Hawkins, (p. 629. & seq. Edit. Amst. 1625.) GROTIUS.
- [a] B. 2. ch. 2. § 12.
- [a] B. 2. ch. 4. § 5. and ch. 15. § 17.
- [b] B. 2. ch. 10. § 2.
- [1] Cneus Domitius had taken by Treachery, and carried to Rome, Bituitus King of Auvergne. The Roman People did not approve that Action: However they would not set the King at Liberty, lest upon his return Home, he should renew the War. Cujus Factum Senatus neque probare potuit, neque rescindere voluit, ne remissus in patriam Bituitus bellum renovaret. Lib. IX. Cap. VI. Num. 3.
- [a] B. 2. ch. 2. § 12, 13.
- [1] Non tamen omne quod cum institore geritur obligat eam qui praeposuit: Sed ita, si ejus rei gratiâ, cui praepositus fuerit, contractum est, id est, dumtaxat ad id, ad quod eum praeposuit. Digest, Lib. XIV. Tit. III. De Institoria Act. Leg. V. § 11.
- [2] De quo palam proscriptum fuerit, ne cum eo contrahatur, is praepositi loco non habetur. Ibid. Leg. XI. § 2. Proscribere palam, sic accipimus, claris literis, unde de plano rectè legi possit: ante tabernam scilicet, vel ante eum locum, in quo negotiatio exercetur: Non in loco remoto, sed in evidenti, § 3.
- [3] Whether the Bill fixed up be writ in such a Manner, as it cannot be well read, or has been taken away, or spoiled by the Rain, or some other Accident: Proscriptum autem perpetuo esse oportet. Caeterum si per id temporis, quo propositum non erat, vel obscurâ proscriptione, contractum: Institoria locum habebit. Proinde si dominus quidem mercis proscripsisset, alius autem sustulit, aut vetustate, vel pluvia, vel quo simili, contingit, ne proscriptum esset, vel non pareret: Dicendum, eum, qui proposuit, teneri. Ibid. §4.
- [4] Conditio quoque praepositionis servanda est: Quid enim si certa lege, vel interventu cujusdam personae, vel sub pignore, voluit cum eo contrahi, vel ad certam rem? Aequissimum erit, id servari, in quo praepositus est. Ibid. § 5.

[5] It is not so much for this, as because the other Party supposed in treating, that the publick Minister acted with Integrity, without which he would have been far from treating. Otherwise, if he had been so imprudent to treat, tho' he knew the Minister assumed more Power than he actually had: Whatever Knavery the latter was guilty of the other Party, because he knew it, and yet acquiesced in the Minister's Protestation, would have renounced his Right to exact any Punishment or Amends; and ought to be deemed to have been willing to risk the Default of the necessary Ratification.

[a] B. 2. ch. 2. § 18.

[1] Belisarius told the Goths, that he had no Power to dispose of the Emperor's Affairs. PROCOP. Gothic. Lib. II. (Cap. VI.) GROTIUS.

[2] PLUTARCH, in Agesil. p. 601. B.

[3] Senatus, ita uti par fuerat, decernit, suo atque Populi injussu nullum potuisse foedus fieri. Bell. Jugurth. Cap. XLIII. Edit. Wass. The Words, which our Author repeats in Italick Letters, as that Historian's, are not his.

[4] Aut cui rata ista pax erit, quam sine Consule, non ex auctoritate Senatûs, injussu Populi Romani, peregerimus? Lib. XXXVII. Cap. XIX. Num. 2.

[a] B. 2. ch. 15. § 16.

[5] Si quid est in quod obligari Populus possit, in omnia potest. LIVY, Lib. IX. Cap. IX. Num. 7.

[1] PUFENDORF with Reason excepts such Truces, as Occasion all the Resemblance of War to disappear entirely, and come very near a real Peace: Law of Nature and Nations, B. VIII. Chap. VII. § 13. In my Opinion, those should be also accepted, which, continuing the Appearance of War, are made for any considerable Time. This is the Thought of AYALA, De Jure & Officiis Bellicis, Lib. I. Cap. VII. Num. 6. and of ALBERICUS GENTILIS, De Jure Belli, Lib. II. Cap. X. § 288, 289. and Cap. XII. p. 305. See also Mr. VITRIARIUS, Instit. Jur. Nat. & Gent. Lib. III. Cap. XV. Quaest. IX. And certainly Truces of this Kind are of too great Consequence to be left entirely to the Discretion of a General of an Army. Besides, Circumstances are not always so urgent, as not to admit of Time for consulting the Sovereign, which a General ought to do as much as possible, both for the good of the Publick, and his own Interest, even in regard to Things, which it may be in his own Power to transact. Amongst the Romans, Truces of any Length were never granted but by the Senate and People. There have been Nations (as the late Mr. BATTIER observes in his Dissertation De Induciis Bellicis which I have cited upon the preceding Chapter) who would not give their Generals Power to make any Truce, tho' for a short Time. So Agis, King of Lacedaemon, on one Side, and Thrasyllus with Alciphron, Generals of the Argives, on the other, having concluded a Truce for four Months, it was declared void by both States: And the Lacedaemonians were so much offended at Agis for having taken that Liberty, that they decreed he should do nothing for the future without the Participation and Consent of ten Counsellors, whom they nominated. This is in THUCYDIDES, Lib. V. Cap. LIX. LX. LXIII. Edit. Oxon. and not in DIONYSIUS HALICARNASSENSIS, Lib. II. which Mr. BATTIER cites here, § 3. not being aware that AYALA, upon whose Authority he undoubtedly repeats it, (for he gives, as he does, the Name of Thrasylulus to one of the Generals of the Argives, whereas his Name was Thrasyllus) that AYALA, I say, only cites that Greek Historian of the Roman Antiquities, to prove that the Kings of Lacedaemon were not absolute.

[2] And much less, upon this Foot, superior Officers and Commanders in Chief. So that, if after the Truce be granted, and during its Continuance, some other Commander finds Occasion for attacking, with the Hope of good Success, the Enemy, who relies upon the Faith of the Treaty for Suspension of Arms; he may do it without Scruple or Treachery, according to the Principle of our Author. But Mr. BATTIER seems to have Reason to declare himself against this Opinion in the Dissertation I have cited, § 4. And indeed, as it is with the tacit Consent of the Sovereign, that the Truce has been made, as that was included in the Extent of the Power of him who granted it; no other Minister can break the Agreement, without indirectly injuring the Sovereign's Authority. Besides, this may make way for Fraud and Distrusts, that might tend to render the Use of Truces, so necessary on many Occasions, useless and impracticable. For there would be Reason to apprehend perpetually the Being surprized during that Time by some other Body of the Enemy's Army: And even he himself, who has granted the Truce, might underhand Cause other Troops of his Party to come, and attack the Enemy, lulled asleep on the Faith of the Agreement made with him. Let us add to this another Reason from ALBERICUS GENTILIS. The General, says he, who commands an Army in Chief, may certainly oblige the Sovereign, by the Treaties which he makes, as to what regards the Conduct of the War intrusted to him: Wherefore then may not one of his Lieutenants oblige the General himself, by the Conventions which he makes within the Extent of his Office? De Jure Belli, Lib. II. Cap. X. p. 289.

[1] It was not Tigranes, that was deprived of Syria, but Antiochus, the Son of Antiochus Pius, and Grandson of Antiochus Cyzicenus; as appears from JUSTIN, whom our Author cites in the Margin: Igitur Tygrane a Lucullo victo, Rex Syriae Antiochus, Cyziceni filius, ab eodem Lucullo adpellatur. Sed quod Lucullus dederat, postea ademit Pompeius, Lib. XL. Cap. II. Num. 2, 3. Besides, as GRONOVIVS observes, Pompey had no more Right to take Syria from Antiochus, than Lucullus to give it him. According to the Rules of Right and the Laws, the Act of both the one and the other ought to have been ratified by the Roman Senate and People. See that learned Person's Note. So that the Example is not proper.

[2] And Syphax, her Husband: Et regem [Syphacem] conjugemque ejus — Roman oporteret mitti, ac Senatus Populique Romani de ea judicium atque arbitrium esse. LIVY, Lib. XXX. Cap. XIV. Num. 10.

[a] B. 3. ch. 6. § 15.

[3] Lib. III. Cap. LXXXIV.

[4] Fidem dante Maharbale—si arma tradidissent abire cum singulis vestiment is passurum, sese dediderunt, &c. LIVY, Lib. XXII. Cap. VI. Num. 11.

[5] POLYB. ubi supra, (Cap. LXXXVI.) Bajazet made Use of as frivolous an Evasion in a like Affair, against the People of Crottovo in Servia, as LEUNCLAVIVS relates, Lib. VI.

[6] Quae Punicâ religione servata fides ab Hannibale est, atque in vincula omnes conjecit. Ubi supra, Num. 12. seu fin.

[7] Ac, si fides Saturnino data est — non eam C. Rabirius, sed C. Maxius dedit: Idemque violavit, si in fide non stetit. Quae fides, Labiene, qui potuit sine Senatus-consulto dari? Orat. pro C. Rabirio, Cap. X.

[8] See SALLUST, Bell. Catilin. (Cap. XXX. Edit. Wass.) There is in GUICCIARDIN, Hist. B. VI. Chap. IX. Fol. 229. of JEROME CHOMEDEY's old French Translation, p. 339. of the Italian Original. (Edit. Genev. 1645.) a Chicanery like this of CICERO's, used by Gonsalvo against the Duke of Valentinois. GROTIUS.

[1] See APPIANUS ALEXANDRINUS, De Bell. Illyr. p. 761. Edit. H. Steph.

[1] Atque etiam, si quid singuli, temporibus adducti, hosti promiserint, est in eo ipso fides conservanda. De Offic. Lib. I. Cap. XIII.

[1] But see what we have said upon B. II. Chap. XI. § 7.

[a] B. 3. ch. 19. § 2.

[b] B. 2. ch. 2 § 7.

[c] B. 3. ch. 19. § 5.

[1] See above, § 5. of the Chapter referred to in the preceding Note.

[a] B. 2. ch. 11. § 6.

[a] B. 3. ch. 22. § 7.

[1] As for Instance, when we promise to pay certain Contributions to prevent Pillage, burning of Places, &c.

[2] It is a Carthaginian who says this to induce his Countrymen to submit to the Romans, as they were not in a Condition to resist them. De Bell. Punic. p. 55. Edit. H. Steph.

[a] B. 1. ch. 4. § 7. n. 2, 3. and B. 2. ch. 14. § 12. n. 2.

[1] Without which he would not be suffered to go Home: And it is undoubtedly better for him to have that Permission for a Time, than to continue always a Prisoner.

[2] Regulus vero non debuit conditiones pactionesque bellicas & hostiles perturbare perjurio, De Offic. Lib. III. Cap. XXIX.

[3] Lib. III. Od. V. Ver. 49, 50.

[4] Tum octo ex iis postliminium justum non esse sibi responderunt, quoniam dejurio victi forent. Noct. Attic. Lib. VII. (Cap. XVIII.) Dejurio victi, that is to say, capitis minores, as HORACE expresses himself, (ubi supra) speaking of Regulus. GROTIUS.

This De minutio capitis was a Consequence of the Oath, by which the Prisoners were engaged to consider themselves always as in the Enemy's Power, and his Slaves: So that they had lost all the Rights of Roman Citizens.

[1] Or rather the Helotae, and some others who had taken Refuge at Ithome, Lib. I. Cap. CIII.

[2] The Historian does not speak of a Promise expressly given by the Prisoners not to bear Arms: He only says, that Hamilcar in releasing them, threatned to punish them severely and without Mercy, if they bore Arms against the Carthaginians, Lib. I. Cap. LXXVIII.

[a] L. 2. c. 14. and l. 3. c. 36.

[b] B. 2. ch. 5. § 10. n. 3.

[a] B. 3. ch. 6. § 23, &c.

[1] It would be to no Purpose, that they stood engaged by Promise, if there were Nobody, who could compel them to perform it. This ALBERICUS GENTILIS says in the Chapter cited in the foregoing Note towards the End. Let us add, that this Kind of Promises either have been, or ought to be tacitly approved by the Sovereign: So that he ought to see them made good to the utmost of his Power.

- [2] Cornelius autem Nepos, &c. Noct. Attic. Lib. VII. Cap. XVIII. Before this Time the same Roman Senate had compelled some Prisoners to return to Pyrrhus, who had dismissed them upon that Condition. APPIAN, Excerpt. Legat. Num. 6. [p. 348. Eclog. Fulv. Ursin.] GROTIUS.
- [a] B. 2. ch. 16. § 2. and B. 3. ch. 20. § 26.
- [1] Reditu enim in castra, &c. De Offic. Lib. III. Cap. XXXII.
- [2] Haec eorum fraudulenta, &c. Noct. Attic. VII. 18.
- [1] There is in PROCOPIUS four Examples of this Sort of Convention. Gothic. Lib. III. (Cap. VII. XII. XXX. XXXVII.) And one, in AGATHIAS, concerning the City of Lucca, Lib. I. (Cap. VII.) Another in BIZARO, concerning a Castle in the Island of Corsica, Hist. Genuens. Lib. X. See others of the same Kind, B. XVIII. and in the War against the Moors, CROMER has also one, Lib. XI. GROTIUS.
- [a] B. 3. ch. 20. § 28.
- [1] Videtur autem in hac specie id silentio convenisse, ne quid praestaretur, si ampliore pecunia fundus esset locatus. Digest, Lib. XIX. Tit. II. Locati conducti, Leg. LI. princip. See Mr. NOODT's Treatise, De Pactis, Cap. II.
- [2] Our Author understands by mixt Conventions what he calls Sponsio, that is to say Conventions made by publick Persons and upon publick Affairs; but without any express or tacit Order of the Sovereign: For in that Respect they have something of private Agreements in them, those, who make them, having at the same Time they are made, no more Power than mere private Persons.
- [a] B. 2. ch. 4. § 4, 5. and B. 3. ch. 1. § 8.
- [1] ALBERICUS GENTILIS, (De Jure Bell. Lib. II. Cap. IX. init.) ascribes this to VALERIUS MAXIMUS, from whom he cites some Words, to which our Author seems to allude in this Place after him. But that Historian says nothing at all of Zopyrus; he speaks of Stratagems in general: Illa vero pars calliditatis egregia, & ab omni reprehensione procul remota, cujus opera, quia adpellatione nostra vix aptè exprimi possunt, Graeca pronunciatione STRATEGEMATA dicuntur. Lib. VII. Cap. IV. princ. It is true, he puts in the Number of these innocent Stratagems a like Action of Sextus Tarquinius. For the rest, see PUFENDORF, on this Case, Law of Nature and Nations, B. VIII. Chap. XI. § 5.
- [2] See it related by HERODOTUS, Lib. III. Cap. CLIV. & seqq. JUSTIN, Lib. I. Cap. ult. &c.
- [3] This is in LIVY, Lib. I. Cap. LIII. and LIV.
- [4] Aeneid. Lib. I. Ver. I. 65, 66.
- [1] It is therefore with Reason, that AGATHIAS blames Ragnaris, General of the Huns, for having treacherously attempted to kill Narses, as the latter returned from a Conference demanded by the former. Lib. II. (Cap. VII.) GROTIUS.
- [2] Deinde, quod ipsi Consuli, parum cauto adversus colloquii fraudem, insidiabantur— & successisset fraudi, ni pro jure Gentium, cujus violandi consilium ininitum erat, stetisset fortuna, Lib. XXXVIII. Cap. XXV. Num. 7, 8.
- [3] Major multo pars perfide, [it must be read so instead of perfidem] violati colloquii poenas morte luerunt. Ubi supr. (in fin. Cap.) GROTIUS.

This Correction of our Author's is entirely unnecessary, as appears from many Examples of the same Kind cited here by GRONOVIVS. See also CAESAR, De Bell. Gall. Lib. I. Cap. XLVI. and the Note of Mr. DAVIES. The Sense is the same at Bottom.

[4] Cn. autem Domitium, &c. Lib. IX. Cap. VI. Num. 3.

[5] Quum Comium comperisset, &c. Cap. XXIII. Mr. COCCEIUS, during his Life, celebrated Professor of Law at Frankfort upon the Oder, criticises our Author (in a Dissertation De Officio & Jure Mediatorum Pacis, § 24.) as if he doubted, whether there was any Perfidy in this Action of Labienus. I confess, for my Part, I cannot see the least Foundation for that Censure, and do not believe, that any Body, who will read the Passage with never so little Attention, can find any. It was the Fate of our Author to be ill understood by those who take the most Liberty in reproving him.

[1] Decepto per inducias & spem pacis Rege, &c. LIVY, Lib. XLII. Cap. XLVII. Num. 1.

[a] B. 3. ch. 1. § 6, &c.

[2] He demanded a Conference for the next Day, but decamped without Noise at the beginning of the Night. See LIVY, Lib. XXVI. Cap. XVII.

[3] Scipio sent Soldiers disguised like Slaves with his Officers, who during the Time the latter conferred with Syphax, dispersed themselves throughout the Camp, and examined every Thing. See the same Historian, Lib. XXX. Cap. IV.

[4] Strategem. Lib. I. Cap. V. (Num. 17.) and by Julius Caesar, during his Dictatorship, when he made War against the Tencteri and Usipetes. APPIAN. Excerpt. Legat. Num. 16. GROTIUS.

[1] Amongst the Persians [or rather amongst the Assyrians] the Hands joined together behind the Back was a Sign of Submission, as AMMIANUS MARCELLINUS relates, Lib. XVIII. (Cap. VIII.) upon which See LENDENBROG's Notes, (p. 222. Edit. Vales. Gron.) Amongst the Romans they had also this Sign, to put the Shield under the Arm-pit, and throw down the Standards, as appears in the same Historian, Lib. XXVI. Cap. IX. p. 512. (upon which the Reader may consult the Note of Mr. VALOIS) the Standards were also bowed down. LATINUS PACATUS mentions such a Sign in his Panegyrick, (Cap. XXXVI. Edit. Cellar.) The antient Germans, and others in Imitation of them, presented Grass to the Conqueror. See PLINY, Hist. Natur. Lib. XXII. Cap. IV. SERVIUS observes, that those who surrender themselves, lay down their Arms, to appear in the Posture of Suppliants: [MANUS INERMES]—Aut supplices—qui enim victi se dedunt, INERMES Supplicant. In Aeneid. Lib. I. (Ver. 478.) GROTIUS.

[2] This LIVY confirms: Quia erigentes Hastas Macedonas conspexerat — ut accepit hunc morem esse Macedonum tradentium sese, &c. Lib. XXXIII. Cap. X. Num. 3, 4. The learned GRONOVIVS refers to this Passage.

[3] APPIANUS ALEXANDRINUS, to whom our Author refers here in a little Note, and VALOIS has cited upon AMMIANUS MARCELLINUS, relates this, speaking of the Troops of Afranius, De Bell. Civil. Lib. II. p. 454. Edit. H. Steph.

[a] B. 3. ch. 4. § 12. and ch. 2. § 15.

[4] The People of the North kindle a Fire to signify that Demand, as appears from the History of JOHANNES MAGNUS, and other Authors. PLINY observes, that in his Time, it was customary to present a Laurel, to signify a Desire that Hostilities might be discontinued: Ipsa [Laurus] pacifera, ut quam praetendi, etiam inter armatos hostes, quietis sit indicium. Hist. Natur. Lib. XV. Cap. XXX. GROTIUS.

[a] B. 2. ch. 15 § 17. and B. 3. ch. 22. § 3.

[1] POLYBIUS handles this Question, whether when we pardon the Person who actually commits the Crime, we are not supposed by that alone to pardon him also by whose Order it was committed. Excerpt. Legat. Num. 122. For my Part, I think not. For every Man is answerable for his own Faults. GROTIUS.

The Citation from POLYBIUS was faulty (to make a transient Observation) as well as an Infinity of others in all the Editions before mine. For it was marked Num. 22. where there is nothing like it. The Fact in the true Passage, as I have corrected, is this. A Roman Ambassador had been killed by Leptines. The latter was delivered up to the Romans by King Demetrius, whose Subject he was. But he was sent back, with another of his Accomplices: And the Historian, who relates it, believes, that the Reason why the Senate acted in this Manner, was, because they were for reserving to themselves the Liberty of punishing on a proper Occasion such an Attempt upon their Ambassador, for which Satisfaction might be supposed to be taken, had they punished the Authors of the Murder, p. 1324. Edit. Amstel. But it does not appear by the Narration, that Demetrius had any Share in the Crime, and much less that he had commanded it. And as for the Question in itself, the Decision of our Author does not always take Place in my Opinion. For if he, who has commanded, or otherwise occasioned a Crime to be committed, gives up the Author of it, expressing thereby his Desire to obtain Pardon for himself; the Party, against whom the Crime hath been committed, ought to be deemed to grant the Pardon, whether he punishes the Criminal delivered up or no; unless in punishing him, or sending him back, he declares in a proper Manner, that he does so without Prejudice to the Right he reserves to himself against him who was the first Cause or Accomplice in the Crime. Otherwise, there is a tacit Consent to Pardon implied, which answers to the formal Demand of it, and which may be presumed with as much Reason as in the other Examples alledged by our Author.

[1] Nec enim ulla res vehementiùs rempublicam continet, quam fides. De Offic. Lib. II. (Cap. XXIV.)

[2] Rhetor. Lib. I. Cap. XV. p. 545. B. Vol. II. Edit. Paris.

[3] Aequè enim perfidiosum & nefarium est, fidem frangere, quae continet vitam, &c. [Orat. pro Q. Rosc. Comoed. Cap. VI.]

[4] Fides sanctissimum humani pectoris bonum est, &c. Epist. LXXXVIII. p. 390. Edit. Gron. Maj.

[5] The Emperor Justinian's Ambassadors said to Cosroez, King of Persia, according to PROCOPIUS : "If we did not speak to yourself, O King, we should never have believed, that Cosroez, the Son of Cabades, could have entered the Roman Territories in Arms, without regard to the Oath he had lately taken, that is to say, what is deemed amongst Men the most certain and most sacred Pledge of Promise given; and in Breach besides of Treaties, which are the sole Resource of those, who, from their bad Success in War, are not secure for the future. Is not this changing human Life into that of wild Beasts? For if Confidence be no longer to be reposed in Treaties, Wars must necessarily be eternal; and War without End, makes Men renounce all Sentiments of Humanity." Persic. Lib. II. (Cap. X.) GROTIUS.

[1] Postremo sapientes, pacis causâ, bellum gerunt, laborem spe otii sustentant. Orat. I. Ad Caesar. De Rep. ordinand. Cap. XL.

[2] Non enim pax quaeritur, ut bellum excitetur: sed bellum mgeritur, utpaxadquiratur. Epist. Ad Bonifac. CCVII. This Passage with many other Thoughts, which follow and precede it, is repeated in the Canon Law, Caus. XXIII. Quaest. I. Can. III. I find something like it in PLATO. That famous Pagan Philosopher says, that a good Legislator ought so to conduct the Affairs of War that all Things may tend to Peace, rather than direct the Affairs of Peace by the Views of War. De Legibus, Lib. I. p. 628. E. Vol. II. Edit. H. Steph. Long Time after a Platonick Philosopher, who lived under the first Roman Emperors, inculcated strongly the same Maxim, by declaring in the Preface to a Work, intended to establish the Principles of the military Art, that this Book ought to be regarded as an offering to Peace, p. 2. See the Note of NICHOLAS RIGAULT upon it.

[1] Viri boni est, initia belli invitum suscipere, extrema non libenter persequi. In this Manner our Author expresses the Passage, which he ascribes to SALLUST, (apud Sallustium legimus, says he) but without marking the Place, or putting the Words in Italick Characters. I can find no such Passage in the two perfect Works of that Historian, nor in his Fragments: Neither does Mr. WASSE's Index, which is very ample, and sufficiently exact, give any Light concerning it; tho' there are Expressions in this Passage, which he undoubtedly would not have failed to observe. I almost believe, that our Author, deceived by his Memory, or otherwise, has cited this Author for some other. What might have given Occasion for it, is a fine Passage in the History of the War against Jugurtha, where there is something that relates to this Place, which the Reader will not be offended at my repeating. It says, that War is easily entered into, but as hard to be got out of again; that the beginning and end are not in the same Person's Power: That any Coward may begin it, but to conclude it, depends upon the Victor's Pleasure: Omne bellum sumi facilè, ceterum agerrime desinere: non in ejusdem potestate initium ejus & finem esse: incipere, cuivis etiam ignavo licere; deponi, quum victores velint. Cap. LXXXV. Edit. Wass.

[1] It is in the seventh Book in an Harangue, wherein Titus Quintius, constituted General against his Will by the seditious Soldiers, exhorts them to Peace and Submission: Pacem, etiam qui vincere possunt, volunt, quid nos velle oportet? Quin omissis irâ & spe fallacibus auctoribus nos ipsos nostraque omnia cognitae permittimus fidei. Cap. XL. in fin.

[2] The Passages cited here, and in the following Paragraph, by our Author, without saying from what Work they are taken, are both in the Rhetorick addressed to Alexander. Cap. III. p. 616. C. Vol. II. Edit. Paris.

[1] It is in the Speech of Hannibal to Scipio: In bonis tuis rebus, nostris dubiis, tibi ampla ac speciosa danti est pax—Melior tutiorque est certa pax, quam sperata victoria. Lib. XXX. Cap. XXX. Num. 18, 19.

[2] Quum tuas vires, tum vim fortunae, Martemque belli communem, propone animo. LIVY, ubi supr. Num. 20.

[3] Rhetoric. ad Alexand. Cap. III. p. 616. PHILO maintains, that Peace, tho' very disadvantageous, is always better than War. De Constit. Princip. (p. 733. D. Edit. Paris.)

[4] In the Oration recited by DIODORUS SICULUS, from which our Author says he took this, without specifying the Place, or even the Book, it is not the Speaker that blames a presumptuous Confidence, founded upon good Success: On the contrary, the Speaker, that is to say an Athenian Demagogue, named Cleophon, exhorting the People, not to Peace but War, amongst other Reasons employs that, which he knew was very proper to animate the Multitude. The opposite Reflection is the Historian's own, who did not think fit to relate more of it than this Passage. Bibl. Histor. Lib. XIII. Cap. LIII. p. 356. Edit. H. Steph.

[5] There is an antient Greek Verse that says, the Den of a Lion even dying is dangerous:

Δειναί γὰρ καὶ κοιῖται ἀποιχομένοιο λέοντος.

GROTIUS.

Mr. BARBEYRAC in his Additions and Corrections says: After this Note was printed I found the Greek Verse by Accident in PLUTARCH, towards the End of the Life of Marius, p. 432. C. Edit. Wech. Where there are two Words differently placed from the Manner in which our Author here repeats them.

Δειναί γὰρ κοιῖται καὶ ἀποιχομένοιο λέοντος.

Besides the Word ἀποιχομένοιο is translated absent, and not dying by the Latin Interpreter, and two French Translators; which at first seems to agree very well with the Sequel of the Discourse. So that GROTIUS's Application would not be just, or else we must say, that citing by Memory, he had forgot the Sense of the equivocal Word ἀποιχομένοιο in the Place from which he took it. However when I examine well the Circumstances of Marius's Condition, who is said to have heard some Voice perpetually resounding this Verse in his Ears; our Author seems to have had good Reasons for explaining ἀποιχομένοιο by even dying: Which we should find if we had the antient Poet, from whom this Verse had probably passed into a Proverb. In the Terror and extraordinary Agitation of Mind, in which Marius was, he did not consider Sylla as absent, to whom the ἀποιχομένοιο ought to be applied, according to the Sense commonly given to that Word: On the contrary, he represented that young and vigorous Army, as present, and at the Gates of Rome, from the News he received of his approach. I therefore imagine, that he applied the Greek Verse to himself, and that he took it at the same Time as a Presage of his approaching Death, and an Exhortation to perish like an old Lion, as he was. The Word ἀποιχομένος is often applied to those who die, especially in the Poets: And I find an Example very like this in an antient Oracle repeated by LUCIAN, in which a Wolf is spoken of:

Μιμεῖσθαι γὰρ πτόμον ἀποιχομένοιο Λύκοιο.

De Mort. Peregrin. Vol. II. p. 579. Edit. Amstel. Mr. DACIER makes the chief Point of the Application of the Greek Verse consist in Rome's being the Country of Sylla. But that Circumstance did not make it more terrible to Marius, than before: It was the present Situation of Affairs, and especially the Augmentation of Sylla's Power, from the Victories he had lately acquired, which terrified Marius, and would have frightened him any where else. So that this Observation of the new Translator is no better than many others of his, for Instance, that which he makes a little lower, (Vol. IV. p. 188. Edit. Amstel.) upon PLATO's thanking his good Genius, for having occasioned his being born a Man and not a Beast. If ever Commentator endeavoured to find, Nodum in scirpo, it was certainly in this Place.

[6] GRONOVIVS properly refers us here to this Passage of FLORUS : Sed ut quammaximè mortiferi esse morsus solent morientium bestiarum: sic plus negotii fuit, semirutâ Carthagine, quam integrâ. Lib. II. Cap. XV. Num. 13. And FREINSHEMIUS cites one from SENECA upon it, Excerpt. Controv. Lib. IX. Controv. VI.

[1] Hoc unum esse tempus de pace agenda, dum sibi uterque confideret, & pares ambo viderentur. De Bell. Civil. Lib. III. Cap. X.

- [1] It is in a Fragment of his Oration for Gabinus: Ego, quum omnes amicitias tuendas semper putavi summâ religione & fide, tum eas maximè, quae essent ex inimicitiis revocatae in gratiam. Apud HIERONYM. Apolog. adv. Ruffin. Lib. I. init. p. 196. D. Vol. II. Edit. Basil. 1537.
- [1] Our Author, as the learned GRONOVIVS remarks here, uses the express Terms of the Prayer of Tiberius to the Gods, according to TACITUS : Hos [Deos precor] ut mihi, ad finem usque vitae, quietam & intelligentem humani divinique juris mentem duint, &c. Annal. Lib. IV. Cap. XXXVIII. Num. 4.
- [2] So St. CHRYSOSTOM says, Serm. De Eleemosyna. GROTIUS.
 The famous SOCRATES often spoke of the Love, which the Gods had for Mankind, φιλανθρωπία, as appears from the Memoirs, which XENOPHON has left us of his Discourses and Actions. See for Instance, Lib. IV. Cap. III. Edit. Oxon. SIMPLICIUS, in his Commentary upon EPICETUS, says, that Man is a Possession of GOD, neither vile nor contemptible; and uses that Reason to prove, that GOD cannot neglect to take Care of him, as of his Creature. In Cap. XXXVIII. p. 239. Edit. Ludg. Batav. That Philosopher Reasons upon a Principle, which PLATO had long before laid down, which is, that Man is a Kind of Possession peculiar to GOD, whom consequently he loves. In Phaedone, Vol. I. p. 62. B. Edit. Hen. Steph. I cannot conclude my Notes better than with these fine Passages, which are the more remarkable, as they are taken from Heathen Authors, whose Authority in this Point is of more Weight, than that of a Father of the Church.